42. An important law enacted in 2000 in the private sphere was the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry to Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law. The law prohibits discrimination in the provision of products or public services, granting entry to public places, or providing services in a public place due to certain grounds, including gender, sexual preference, personal status and parenthood. The law also prohibits discriminatory advertisements, and addresses the issue of civil wrongs and punishments.

43. Another relevant amendment (from 2002) was section 2B of the Public Tender Law, setting preference to private businesses owned by women in public tenders, as detailed above and in Article 4 below.

Article 2 - Obligations to Eliminate Discrimination

Legal Provisions

Basic Laws

44. The Israeli legal system is multilayered and consists of several legislative instruments in hierarchal order. One of the fundamental legislative avenues for entrenching the rule of law and human rights are the basic laws. Basic laws comprise a "constitution-in-the-making" in a piece-meal fashion. The basic laws deal with topics such as the structure of government or focus on human rights issues.
45. Basic laws enjoy a unique status and are usually superior to other laws. Thus, while the basic laws are adopted by the Knesset in the same manner as other legislation, some basic laws have "entrenched clauses" whereby a special majority is required to amend them. Furthermore, derogation from a right enshrined in a basic law may only be made if it is pursuant to the "values of the State" and for a "worthy purpose".
46. The process of legislating basic laws is complicated and necessitates balancing between the various sectors among the Israeli society. This process is ongoing and once it is completed, the Government will report to the Committee accordingly.
47. Furthermore, the Israeli Constitution, Law and Justice Knesset Committee is in the process of preparing a consensual-based constitution, and has held over 60 sessions on drafting its text. Among the topics discussed are due process guarantees, freedom of speech and assembly, the right to form and join trade unions, and the right to adequate standard of living.

Ordinary Laws

48. Since the submission of our previous report, Israel has enacted several pieces of legislation aimed at eliminating discrimination against women. Among the most important laws recently enacted, is the 2004 Amendment No. 9 to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, adding pregnancy as one of the grounds upon which a person cannot be discriminated in the workplace; section 9A of the Sports Law (Amendment No. 5) (Proper Representation), from 2003, which requires all sports organizations, including sport associations, unions and federations supported by the state, to ensure appropriate representation to women; section 2B of the Public Tender Law from 2002, that mandates the government to approve a woman-controlled business (as defined below), when receiving an equal score to a non woman-controlled business in a government tender, and the amended Planning and Building Law, requiring a mandatory representative from women's organizations to the National Council for Planning and Building.

Legal Recourse Available for the Pursuit of Women's Rights

The Public Complaints Commissioner and State Comptroller

49. As stated in our previous report, the Public Complaints Commissioner remains responsible for handling complaints and grievances from the public, including complaints from women. According to the Commissioner's records, the Commissioner received a total of 19,691 complaints in the period between 30.9.2000 – 31.12.2003. 160 of these complaints concerned women's issues, in matters such as social benefits (including alimony payments, maternity grant, and birth allowances) as well as marriage registration and sexual harassments complaints. Of these complaints, the inspection ceased in 138 instances for various grounds, 87 complaints were settled and 17 of the complaints were deemed admissible and were examined through the relevant channels.
50. Since our previous report, the State Comptroller published three reports on women-related issues. One report is The Classification and Assignment to Positions of those Designated to IDF Service: (2002). In the Defence Service Law [Consolidated Version], 5746-1986 ("Defence Service Law [Consolidated Version]") there are provisions concerning equivalent summons for initial duty, as well as medical and qualification examinations. The State Comptroller found that female-minors undergo a partial examination prior to their assignment to combat duties. The Comptroller recommended a reevaluation of these examinations, especially concerning female-candidates for military service, designated for combat duties, to ensure that the examinations are performed in an equal manner. In the government's response to this report, it was mentioned that only about a third of all future enlistments complete the medical background forms, and that the IDF is currently exploring internet based options for completing these forms. Furthermore, the IDF is performing an overall evaluation of the medical committees' procedures. Also, additional interviews for female-minors intended for combat positions were added.
51. Another report is titled Women Service in the I.D.F. (2002). The State Comptroller found that the opening of new positions for women and their integration were not accompanied by any analysis of the characteristics of each position and no standards were set to evaluate the success of integration. The Comptroller also noted the lack of research concerning the medical-physiological aspects associated with female combat duties. In the government's response to this report, it was stated that an extensive evaluation of the medical-physiological aspects of female positions in the IDF will be performed. Also, 2,500 additional posts will be available for women, throughout the IDF.

52. In The Phenomenon of Spousal Violence: (2002) report, the State Comptroller opined that spousal violence requires a systematic and effective solution. The obligation to respond effectively to spousal violence is imposed on the governmental ministries, especially the Ministry of Social Affairs, which must examine the organizational structure of the different operating services in that regard. Moreover, the distribution of responsibilities must be clear and effective, and the relevant bodies must work in full cooperation and coordination. In the government's response to this report it was stated that the Ministry of Social Affairs is now the focal point for the treatment of domestic violence, and its director general heads an inter-ministerial Committee coordinating the treatment of domestic violence. Also, control and supervision procedures were established for the regulation of the Centers for the Prevention of Domestic Violence.

Other Governmental Bodies

53. Legal recourse for women to advance their cause and to fight discrimination is available through the judicial system. In addition, governmental bodies such as the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor's Division for Employment and Status of Women, the legal aid in the Ministry of Justice, the Discipline Superintendent in the Civil Service and the Department for the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Civil Service can also provide adequate remedies, within their spheres of competence and responsibility, such as disciplinary measures, etc.

Governmental Mechanisms and Measures Established to Promote the Status of Women

Investigative and Study Initiatives by the Government

54. Since our previous report, the Authority for the Advancement of Women in Israel conducted two major surveys regarding women in Israel, as will be further elaborated, the first regarding the needs of women and their expectations for institutional solutions for these needs second regarding "Identifying Early Signs of Violence during Courtship". These surveys will be detailed below.

Mechanisms Implemented for the Improvement of the Status of Women

The Authority for the Advancement of Women in Israel

55. Since our previous report, the Authority has taken several steps to achieve advancement of these goals, including:
- 1) Training 1,000 community leaders to assist in implementing the diverse aspects of advancing the status of women in the community. This is performed through identifying "conversion agents" in the community and qualifying women's forums for leadership, working towards the advancement of the status of women.
 - 2) A range of activities aimed at the financial empowerment of women in all aspects of life. This includes promotion of women's entrepreneurship, under the guidance of a special women's entrepreneurship think-tank.

- 3) Publishing a 36-pages booklet, titled: "Women's Rights at the Workplace – you deserve to know", containing assorted information relevant to working women, including relevant laws, entitlements, sick leave, dismissal, sexual harassment, pregnancy and maternity leave, and labour court complaints. 150,000 copies of this booklet were circulated in Hebrew, Arabic and Russian.
 - 4) Issuing an extensive pamphlet providing information on women's rights, services and projects targeted at women and teenage girls. 200,000 copies of this pamphlet were distributed.
 - 5) Circulating another leaflet providing assistance in early detection of domestic violence, containing the contact numbers of all bodies relevant to the phenomenon of domestic violence. 90,000 copies of this leaflet were circulated in Hebrew, Arabic and Russian.
 - 6) Approaching the heads of all Municipalities, urging them to nominate advisors on the status of women.
 - 7) Holding courses aimed at training and professional guidance of the advisors on women status, holding annual meetings for graduates of these courses, conducting professional tours among the advisors and holding regular conferences and seminars for residing advisors.
 - 8) Collaboration and nurturing of women-leaders in different organizations, including professional organizations, political parties, youth movements and women-oriented NGO's. Organizing regular consultation and strategy meetings with the heads of major women's NGO's.
 - 9) Organizing professional seminars and conferences for the purpose of implementing the policy of widening and advancing leadership in women's status issues and combating violence against women, attended by relevant participants and policy-makers.
 - 10) Promoting issues relating to women's health and well being through periodic conferences and seminar, and providing tools to assist local advisors on the status of women in activating local projects on women's health.
 - 11) Devoting special efforts and resources towards the advancement of women in the Arab sector – assigning a special project manager for the Arab sector, addressing the state's inheritance fund to support projects within the Arab sector, mapping women associations in this sector, establishing a steering committee of all relevant factors and conducting surveys and conferences for women and policymakers regarding this sector on issues pertaining to employment, education, entrepreneurship and violence against women.
56. The Authority also receives regular appeals following their publications, in various matters, triggering women to approach them with complaints. The annual number of applications is estimated at 1,000, mostly regarding women's rights at work, the dismissal of pregnant women and post-natal women, employment related matters, entrepreneurship, and women in key positions. Additionally, there are several applications regarding marriage and divorce related issues, as well as welfare and financial issues.

57. As the Authority has no individual legal counseling, it refers the complainants to the appropriate venues, such as the Ministry of Social Affairs, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, Legal Aid, shelters, etc.

The Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women

58. The Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women has continued its activities towards the advancement of the status of women. The current committee consists of 15 members, 9 women and 6 men, from a wide range of political parties.
59. Recent legislation enacted with the support of the Committee include the Sports Law (Amendment No. 5) (Proper Representation), from 2003; the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, 5758-1998 ("Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law") (Amendment – National Service from 2004; the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law (Amendment – Authority Use in Studies), from 2004 and the advancement of a bill for Employment of Women Law (Amendment No. 28) (Permits for Dismissal or Reduction in Number of Working Hours), from 2003.
60. Since our previous report, the Committee also advanced and improved the status of women through the following measures:
- 1) Initiation of special parliamentary discussions on International Woman's Day, as well as on National Fight the Violence against Women's Day.
 - 2) Holding regular sessions with members of the Civil Service Commissioner regarding sexual harassment claims and women's representation in the Civil Service.
 - 3) Receipt of regular reports from the government ministries regarding women's representation and an approach to the Ministry of Finance on the subject of equal payment for men and women.
 - 4) Monitoring the advancement of equal representation for women, and the implementation of the relevant legislation, including in governmental tenders;
 - 5) Discussions, and an on-site visit, relating to Bedouin women issues, in cooperation with the local Bedouin population;

Performance of the Civil Service

61. The Department for the Advancement and Integration of Women within the Civil Service has been active on a wide range of topics, all aimed at promoting women in the civil service.
62. The Department heads the training and professional guidance of supervisors on the status of women in government offices and the auxiliary units (currently 78 such supervisors), interviews all new supervisors, conducts regular training courses (a 300-hours mandatory course), sessions and conferences and provides on-going updates of relevant information and material to deal with issues relating to the status of women (in 2003, for example, 35 circulars were distributed to the supervisors by the Department). In addition, all supervisors must report to the Department biannually and these reports are further discussed in biannual meetings that take place with each supervisor.

63. The Department continues to serve as an address for women civil servants to submit complaints regarding discrimination, injustice and grievance in their status and working conditions. Over a hundred such complaints are received annually, concerning a wide variety of subjects. In 2003, the Department received 119 complaints; approximately half of them involved sexual harassment allegations.
64. The Department gives special attention to the implementation of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law in the Civil Service, through training of the supervisors on the status of women in the governmental ministries, conducting seminars and conferences, regular follow up and supervision as to the law's implementation in the ministries and auxiliary units, establishing clear procedures for the treatment of sexual harassment complaints, and filing regular reports to the Knesset regarding sexual harassment cases in the civil service.

Measures Taken on the Municipal Level

65. In accordance with the Local Authorities Law (Advisor on the Status of Women), 5760-2000 ("Local Authorities Law (Advisor on the Status of Women)"), as of January 2005, there were 68 advisors in city councils and 43 in local municipalities. 38 of whom, in Arab local municipalities. These advisors are closely guided by the Authority for the Advancement of Women, keeping them informed as to the latest updates, distributing relevant material and statistics, conducting conferences and guidance sessions, as well as training courses.

Article 3 - The Development and Advancement of Women

66. Israel has taken a wide range of actions, in the political, social, economic and cultural fields, to enable the comprehensive development and advancement of women. The actions by Israel have taken place via legal developments, public and private awareness campaigns and social changes. These measures, detailed throughout the report, enhance the protection of women's rights and further develop their roles in Israeli society.

Effective national machinery and publicity

67. The Convention was translated into Hebrew and published in the "Kitvey Amana" - a public document. Additionally, the previous report submitted to the Committee is available on the Ministry of Justice's web site.
68. Various governmental ministries held Seminars and conferences regarding the status of women, discussions on the implementation of the Convention in Israel, in their relevant fields of operations. For example – "Gender, Society and Law" and "Trafficking in Women" Conferences held by the Ministry of Justice and "Women in The Labor Force – Challenges and Opportunities", held by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor.

Women with Disabilities

General and Legal Framework

69. According to estimates by the Commission for Equal Rights for People with Disabilities within the Ministry of Justice, people with disabilities make up about 10% of the Israeli population; about half of them are women. According to the Commission, women with disabilities suffer from “twofold” discrimination.
70. On March 22, 2005 the Knesset approved Amendment no. 2 to the Law on Equal Rights for People with Disabilities 5758-1998, (“Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law”). The amendment to the law obligates the state to make new buildings and infrastructures accessible. The law also requires that the service granted to the public, be made accessible to people with disabilities. Public buildings, areas of commerce, public institutions, schools, clinics, institutes of higher education, employment centers must all be made accessible to people with disabilities. The provisions of the law set up a period of 6 years for the implementation of the law in the privately-owned public areas and a period of 12 years for its implementation in public authorities.
71. Since our previous report was submitted, several other regulations that further advance the right to equality and human dignity for people with disabilities were promulgated.
72. Among these regulations are: Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Regulations (Priority Parking Spaces at the Work Place), 5762-2001 (“Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Regulations (Priority Parking Spaces at the Work Place)”); Minimum Wages Regulations (Wages Adapted to Employee with Disability with a Diminished Working Ability), 5762-2002 (“Minimum Wages Regulations (Wages Adapted to Employee with Disability with a Diminished Working Ability)”); Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Regulations (Regularization of Accessibility to Public Transportation Services), 5763-2003 (“Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Regulations (Regularization of Accessibility to Public Transportation Services)”).

General Economic and Personal Situation

73. Information regarding people with disabilities originates from details on various disability benefits given to the six main categories of disabled people. These categories determine the source and type of support provided and they are based on: general social security disability pension, employment disability pension, IDF (Israel Defence Force) disability pension, hostile operations disability pensions, Holocaust and anti-Nazi operations disability pensions, and children receiving disabled child pensions. Men are the major recipients of disability pensions in most categories, except for a slightly higher number of women among those receiving hostile operations and Holocaust and anti-Nazi operations disability pensions. The men's rate is particularly higher among the IDF disability pension recipients and the employment disability pension recipients. Women make up 5% and less than 9.8% of these last two groups respectively.

74. Women make up less than half (42%) of the general social security disability pension recipients, mostly due to the higher standard of disability required for women homemakers. Homemakers are still required to prove 50% medical disability (as opposed to the usual 40%) in order to be eligible for a pension. Their ability to function in the house is examined to assess their eligibility and they are not entitled to a dependent supplement for their unemployed partner, but only for their children.

Special Health Concerns of Women with Disabilities

75. A nation wide accessibility survey found that most health clinics are not fully accessible to people with disabilities (95.4%). Also, in a sample survey of gynecological clinics, not one of the 24 clinics sampled addressed all basic requirements of women with disabilities, and only 6 clinics corresponded with most of these requirements.

Employment

76. The majority of people with severe disabilities are unemployed and most of them have never held steady jobs. Over 70% of the people with severe disabilities, physical illnesses and mental deficiencies, as well as approximately 72% of the blind and 20% of the deaf are unemployed. Of those employed, there is a higher number of men than women (20% to 12%) and 42% of the men work full time, whilst that figure is only 33% for women.

Article 4 - Acceleration of Equality between Men and Women

Affirmative Action

Expanding Affirmative Action to Public Institutions

77. As noted before, a major recent development is the 2002 amendment of the Public Tender Law, adding section 2B, aimed at encouraging women in business. This section stipulates that in a governmental tender, a woman-controlled business (a business controlled by a woman, holding 50% or more of the means of control, alone or with other women, enabling her to direct its activity), shall be preferred, when receiving an equal score to a non woman-controlled business, provided certain preconditions are met.
78. The Civil Service Commissioner added a segment in tender announcements regarding affirmative action for women.

Affirmative Action in the Civil Service

79. The 2001 enactment of section 15A of the Civil Service Law (Appointments), detailed in our previous report, added to women's representation within the higher ranks of the civil service, as will be detailed below, although there is still room for improvement.

Affirmative Action in Governmental Corporations

80. According to current data from the Governmental Corporations Authority, as of January 2005, women constitute 37% of the governmental corporations directors. Since our previous report, more than a third of the directors nominated in governmental corporations were women (203 women of 558 nominations). To this date, there are 5 women (11.36%) serving as head of a board of directors (4 new nominations since our previous report), and 9 women (11.84%) serve as director general's of governmental corporations.

Affirmative Action in Public Corporations

81. Despite these achievements, women still lack representation in the managerial levels in boards of directors of public corporations when compared to men. In 2002, the percentage of women directors of all directors was approximately 26%.

Affirmative Action in Other Areas

82. As mentioned in our previous report, both the High Court's decisions (H.C.J 6845/00 Eitana Niv and H.C.J 5325/01 the Association for the Advancement of Women in Basketball – as detailed in article 1 above and Article 10 below) and the current legislation establish an all-encompassing basic legal principle concerning the legitimacy of affirmative action as an integral part of the principle of equality. They also established a requirement of adequate representation of women in public bodies, as part of the principle of equality.
83. Two further examples for such legislation are the amended Planning and Building Law, adding a mandatory representative of women's organizations to the National Council for Planning and Building and section 2B of the Public Tender Law, as detailed in article 1 above.

Special Measures Aimed at Protecting Maternity

84. An extensive review of this subject matter will be discussed within Articles 11 and 13, below.

Article 5 - Sex Roles and Stereotyping

85. In this Article, various issues reflecting women sex roles and stereotypes will be addressed. Firstly, we shall address the rate of women in Israeli media, including pornography and the recent innovations in this sphere. Secondly, we shall provide an update on women and religion, and finally a detailed review of the phenomenon of violence against women and the measures taken to address it.

Women and the Media

86. In the Israel Broadcast Authority (IBA), which is in charge of public broadcasting, one woman, who also serves as the deputy chairperson, is a member of the eight-member Management Committee. In the IBA Council, women compose 40% of the 20-member Council and a persistent 41% of the total number of employees of the IBA is maintained. Current 2004 data indicates progress in employing women in high-ranking positions within the IBA: there are now 14 women in high-ranking positions in the Hebrew television and 7 in the Hebrew and Arabic radio; there are also 11 women in high-ranking positions in the IBA headquarters.

87. Within the Second Authority Council, which has the highest TV ratings in Israel, and is responsible for the Authority's policy issues, 30% of the members (3 of 10) are women. Within the Second Authority itself, women make up 66.6% (4 of 6) of the high-ranking positions. In the Second Authority's radio stations and television bodies, there also are a noticeably higher number of women in managerial positions as well as women journalists compared to the IBA – Channel 2 News: 47.5% women employees, holding 50% of the journalist positions. Reshet TV: 80% women employees, holding 50% of the managerial positions and 73% of the journalist positions. Radio 102FM: 65.5% women employees, holding 80% of the managerial positions and 48.5% of the journalist positions.

Pornography

88. Following the enactment of the child pornography amendments to the Penal Law, 5737-1977 ("Penal Law"), in the 18 months between the beginning of 2003 and mid-2004, 42 investigation cases were opened by the police regarding obscene materials, 13 of which involved minors. Of these cases, 4 were transferred to the police prosecution and two more to the Attorney General's offices. Five additional cases were initiated in the parallel period regarding the publication of prostitution services by a non-minor, and two other cases involving a minor.

89. An important legislative innovation is Amendment no. 27 (from 2002) of the Communication Law (Bezeq and Transmissions), 5742-1982 ("Communication Law (Bezeq and Transmissions)"), which expanded the definition of prohibited broadcasts through the supplementary expansion of the definition of obscene material. The amendment applies to licensed broadcasters of Cable and Satellite transmissions. The amendment adds to the definition transmissions containing the presentation of sexual relations including violence, abuse, abasement, humiliation and exploitation, portraying sexual intercourse with a minor or a person pretending to be a minor, and the presentation of a person or any of his organs as an object ready to be sexually used. All of the above is considered profane so long as the programs are not distinctly of an artistic, scientific, newsworthy, educational or informative value such as to justify their broadcast under the circumstances.

90. The High Court of Justice has recently made a landmark ruling in this area, (H.C.J 5432/03, 5477/03, S.Y.N. – Women Equal Representation et al v. The Council for the Broadcast of Cable and Satellite Transmissions et al (03.03.04)). This petition was filed against the Council's decision to broadcast adult channels, whose contents are pornographic and erotic, based on Amendment no. 27 of the Communication Law (Bezeq and Transmissions). The Council initially prohibited the broadcasting of the "Playboy" Channel yet later changed its decision. The Court here agreed with the Council's interpretation of the law, both linguistically and on constitutional grounds.
91. The Court stated that according to the amendment, not all contents presenting sexual intercourse or acts, fall under the prohibition of objectification. Furthermore, pornographic broadcasts are sanctioned by at least two basic freedoms: freedom of expression and freedom of occupation. Freedom of expression, as a constitutional right, stretches over every expression, including pornographic and erotic ones, although the social value of these expressions is low. However, the offence caused by the expression of pornography, does not deny its pertinence to freedom of expression.
92. The Court examined whether the extent of the offense to the public's feelings surpasses the level of endurance, as only then it is justified to restrict the right of freedom of expression and creation. It should be noted that the broadcasts are limited to subscribers only, are broadcasted late in the day and require a secret code for each entry to the Channel. Here, feelings are offended, but since there is no obligation to watch the broadcasts, the damage is not severe and thus not sufficient to justify an affront to the freedom of expression and occupation, which are two of the basic freedoms in a democratic state. Although pornographic broadcasts are harmful to the dignity of women, under the existing social reality pornography is legal and available through the totality of mediums.

Prostitution

93. As discussed in our previous report, another form of publication, which is pertinent both to pornography and prostitution, is the advertising of sex services. On March 17, 2005, the Magistrate Court of Tel Aviv, in Cr.C. 3635/02, The State of Israel v. Shoken Network Ltd. et al., sentenced 3 persons, the head of a newspaper network, director of a newspaper and the director of the newspaper's advertisements section, to 150 hours of service for the public for violating article 205 (C) (a) of the Penal Law, prohibiting any advertisement for prostitution. Although the three were previously convicted of the above offence, the Court, based on the recommendation of the Probation Authority, decided to revoke their conviction and to require them to carry out their sentence. The Court also ordered all three relevant newspapers to pay a 125,000 NIS fine.

Women and Religion

94. Since our last report we have witnessed an important High Court of Justice decision in the matter of the "Women of the Western Wall". A group of women, representing all religious streams of Judaism petitioned the High Court of Justice (A.H.H.J.C 4128/00 The General Director of the Prime Minister's Office et al v. Anat Hoffman et al (06.04.03)) to uphold their right to freedom of religion and allow them to pray in the manner they wished – i.e., in a group wearing prayer shawls (usually only used by men) and using the Torah scroll at the Western Wall. The underlying issue is that for the prevailing Jewish denominations in Israel, and for most worshippers in the Western Wall, women prayer using male accouterments presents an affront to their practice methods and poses a problem for their own prayer methods. After further deliberation, in April 2003, the Court directed the state to make the appropriate arrangements to enable the group to pray at Robinsons Arch which is part of the Western Wall, but separate from the main prayer area, within 12 months. Modifying Robinsons Arch for the women's group required further construction work, and after a delay, on August 17, 2004, a special -prayer plaza was completed near the Robinsons Arch.

Violence against Women, Sexual Violence and Legal Aspects

Prevention of Sexual Harassment

95. Since our previous report was submitted, there were two major amendments of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, both broadening the law's spectrum. The first amendment further applied the law to those in National Service, and the second to pupils in the twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth grades, as well as pupils or students attending adult education institutions.
96. Current data indicates that since our previous report, 188 investigation cases were opened by the police due to sexual harassment complaints. 141 cases were closed due to lack of evidence, Budgetary Principles Law lack of public interest, lack of any wrongdoing or unknown offender. 36 cases are being processed by the Police Prosecution/Attorney General offices, and eleven cases are currently pending.
97. In 2002, the Victims of Offences' Rights Regulations, 5762-2002 ("Victims of Offences' Rights Regulations"), further implementing the Law, were promulgated. These Regulations list the locations where information pamphlets should be placed, in Hebrew, Arabic, Russian, Amharic, English and Braille. The pamphlets are to be placed in the following locations: social services departments, centers for the prevention of domestic violence, police stations, courts, hospitals' emergency rooms, offices of the Department for Investigation of Police Officers, criminal secretariat of the state attorney, the district attorney's general offices, Magen David Adom (an Israeli first aid organization, parallel to the Red Cross), the Ministry of Social Affairs counseling bureaus and the legal aid bureaus.

98. The Victims of Offences' Rights Law, 5761-2001 ("Victims of Offences' Rights Law") and regulations are gradually assimilated into the various relevant bodies. The Police designated 6 regional offence victims' officers in charge of contact with victims of crimes (VOC) in each region, supervising the implementation of the Law and regulations in their respective regions as well as conducting training programs.
99. The Prison Service is also working towards implementing the law and its regulations, and a VOC officer was already nominated and is providing the relevant information to interested parties. The Prison Service is in the final stages of developing a nation-wide computerized call center to provide victims of crimes with the relevant information concerning their assailant's status within the Prison Service system.
100. The Department for Pardons in the Ministry of Justice, as a matter of policy, has integrated the basic principles of this Law in every aspect of its activities. This includes meeting with victims and their families and being attentive to the needs and perspectives of the victims throughout the pardon process.

Limitation on Sex Offenders Place of Residence and Employment

101. The Knesset added another layer of protection to victims of sexual violence. Under a new Law, Limitations on the Return of a Sex Offender to the Victim of the Offence Surrounding Law, a court can prohibit an offender from residing or working near his victim's place of residence or employment. This provided the court finds that the victim may suffer concrete mental damage due to the offender's proximity. The court is instructed to give proper consideration to the harm caused to the sex offender due to these aforementioned limitations.

Stalking

102. The Prevention of Stalking Law, 5762-2001 ("Prevention of Stalking Law"), mentioned in our previous report, was enacted in October 2001. The Law is intended to protect a person from harm to his peace, privacy, freedom or body, by another person, acting in a manner constituting stalking (e.g. intimidating harassment) or bodily harm. The court may issue a protective injunction against a person who engages in stalking, or impose further restrictions. The injunction shall be issued for a maximum period of 6 months, can be extended for additional six months, and even further extended given special circumstances to a total of two years. Current statistics indicate that since 2002, 2,946 requests for restraining orders were submitted to the Courts based on this Law, with a distinct rise through the years – 472 cases in 2002, 1,167 in 2003 and 1,307 in 2004 up until October 1st.

Extent of the Phenomenon of Sexual Violence against Women

Minimum Punishments

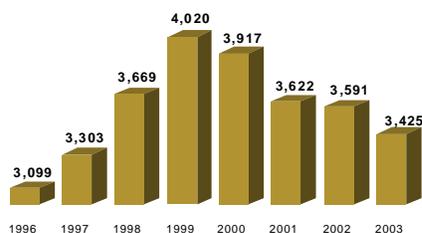

103. As detailed in our previous report, the 1998 amendment to the Penal Law, instituted a minimum punishment for serious sexual offences, constituting 25% of the maximum that may be imposed. A further 2002 amendment prohibits imposition of suspended sentences except in special circumstances, which must be specified in the court's decision.
104. The Family Court in Jerusalem, in an important decision, ordered a husband to pay his battered wife 90,000 NIS (approximately 20,000 $) compensation, mostly as “punitive damages”) F.C.C 018551/00 K.S v. K.M (07.06.04)). These damages were awarded to the wife for “five years of on-going grievance by way of abuse, scorn, humiliation and enslavement”. The court here applied the option stipulated in the law for increased damages, due to the harsh circumstances.

Raising Awareness

105. The Authority for Advancement of the Status of Women has initiated a nation-wide campaign on the issue of “Identifying Early Signs of Violence during Courtship”, holding nearly 200 seminars (with 40,000 participants) throughout Israel. The Authority also conducted a large scale campaign in the media providing women with appropriate tools to identify and avoid violence in relationships.
106. The Courts Administration holds annual 5-days seminars for the Women-Status Trustees. The Trustees serve as the focal point for women-issues throughout the Administration. In the seminars, the Trustees learn about feminism, stereotypes, affirmative action and relevant legislation. In the years 2002-2004, the Administration also held workshops on violence against women, women status, and self-defence for women.

Police Handling of Sex Crimes against Women

107. Comparing to our previous report, over the last four years there has been a decrease in the number of sexual violence cases investigated by the police.

Source: Israel Police, Crime in Israel 2003

108. In 2003, the police opened 3,294 criminal investigation cases of sexual violence involving women as victims, 655 of these cases pertaining to sexual violence against women in the family (not necessarily incest), and 294 of them were for rape and indecent acts by a spouse (compared to 281 in 2002).

Sex Criminals in the Penitentiary System

109. The Prison Service activates sexual offenders' therapeutical groups through the Mental Health Center in Ramle, targeted at lowering the risks of sexual violence. There are further programs run by social workers in the different prisons.

110. Early release and vacations of prisoners sentenced for domestic violence are discussed in joint committees held in four districts. The Committees' members are from the Prison Service and the Ministry of Social Affairs. The Committees receive the social services reports as to the status of the family (e.g. the victims) and the prisoner treatment in prison. There are also regional committees with Psychiatrists from the Ministry of Health to discuss and diagnose extreme cases of domestic violence.

The Sexual Assault Help Centers Data

111. The Israeli Sexual Assault Victim's Help Centers Union is a parent organization to all help centers operating in Israel, working as a social change agent on a national level, lobbying legislation amendments, and issuing annual reports on sexual assaults.

112. The union has initiated two major legislation amendments, one regarding the need to broaden the definition of "family member" in the Penal Law, to include family members such as foster family members and cousins. The other amendment observes the need to extend the period defined in the Limitation Law, 5718 - 1958, ("The Limitation Law") for offences committed against minors by a non-family member.

113. The union also addresses the issue of the courts' attitude towards sexual offences, with a 5.9 years average-sentence in 2003 in the District Court (which has jurisdiction over offences with a maximum penalty of over 7 years). Another issue currently promoted by the union is its campaign against the forthcoming amendment to the Limitation Law, due to the state's refusal to add a special long limitation period, specifically to victims of sexual assault.

Domestic Violence - Legal Aspects

Recent Amendments to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law

114. Amendment no. 5 (2000) to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law encompasses a change in attitude regarding firearms to those given a protective injunction. Previously, a court that convicted an individual of any violent crime was not to refuse without special reasons the prosecution's request to suspend whatever firearm license that individual might have, or to deposit that firearm with the police. Pursuant to Amendment no. 5, a person given a protective injunction shall be routinely prohibited from carrying or bearing a firearm, including one issued to him by the security forces or another state authority – this prohibition shall apply – unless certain condition specified in the law are met.
115. The 2001 Amendment no. 7 to the same law established a duty upon certain professionals detailed below, to inform a person treated or advised professionally, reasonably thought to be the victim of a violent or sexual offence committed by her current or previous spouse, of her options – turning to the police, social service department or centers for the treatment and prevention of domestic violence. The duty applies to the following: doctors, nurses, pedagogies, social workers, police officers, psychologists, clinical criminologists, para-medical personnel, lawyers, religious scholars and rabbinical pleaders.

Other Legislative Developments

116. Another important revision is Amendment No. 36 of the 1982 Criminal Procedure Ordinance (from 2002), which added Sections 59A and 62A. According to these sections, a police officer and/or a public prosecutor may not rely solely on a spouse's request as an indicator for the determination whether the matter is one that lacks public interest, thus justifying not conducting an investigation or prosecution in a sexual or violent offence among spouses. This stems from the known fact that in many of these cases the victim wishes to rebut her claim, although it has great substance, due to fear from the assailant.
117. In order to encourage victims of sexual offences to come forward and make complaints, on September 2004, the Supreme Court ruled against the publication of the complainants' identities when relating to sex offences, following the conclusive acquittal of the accused (C.A.A 5877/99 Haim Yanos v. The State of Israel (28.09.04)). The Court stated that when it rejects the specific complainant's claims, it no longer has to continue and protect her and her interests (privacy, dignity and reputation). However, above all, stands the significance of the public interest to encourage women to come forward and complain. The society's wish to expose criminals will be badly hurt if the names of complainants, even false-complainants, will be published.

Extent of the Phenomenon of Domestic Violence

Domestic Violence – General Data

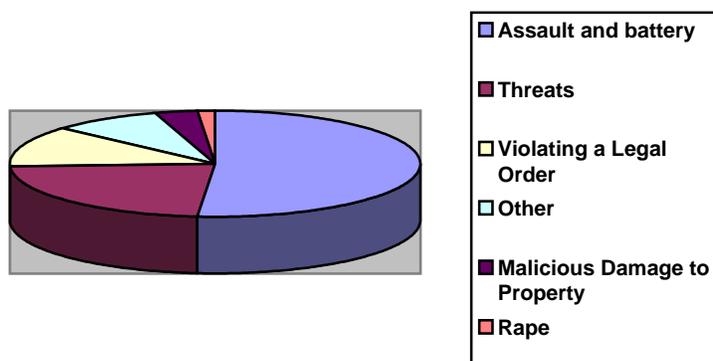

118. Recent data from the National Service for Social Work within the Ministry of Health indicates that on average, each year, 2,500 women are reported as victims of violence. These figures are based on reports from hospitals, Sick Funds and Mother and Child Care Units. Most of these women (80%) are detected due to physical injuries, 10% due to sexual assault reports and the rest – neglect and other forms of grievance.
119. The Ministry of Health initiated seminars, workshops and lectures to better prepare medical aid personnel to recognize victims of domestic violence. Over 7,000 doctors, nurses, social workers and others participated in these programs between 2000 and 2003. Furthermore, the Ministry of Health initiated a program encouraging hospital personnel to enquire women of possible violence, regardless of the cause of their admittance. The Ministry of Health' Director General recently issued a circular, obligating doctors, as part of the routine admittance procedure, to enquire about past instances of violence.
120. Among the additional steps taken to institute sensitization concerning domestic violence are: the circulation of informative and guidance materials for care-takers and female victims of violence; the reinforcement of district health bureaus and hospitals with social workers who have domestic violence treatment expertise; establishment of three district centers for the treatment of sexually assaulted women (in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Tiberias); issuing professional procedures for all agents of the health system regarding violence and sexual assault; the establishment of information pools concerning victims of domestic violence, sexual abuse and neglect of minors and the helpless.
121. The Authority for Advancement of the Status of Women conducted an extensive survey aimed at exploring the public's awareness of identifying early signs of violence during courtship. The survey showed a very low level of public awareness of these signs. Nonetheless, 90% of the women stated that they would discontinue their relationships upon identifying such indicators. About a third of the public pointed out that it had encountered spousal violence amongst their friends and about 17% of the women had themselves suffered violence during courtship.

Police Handling of Domestic Violence

122. Police records show a decrease in the number of complaints of domestic violence. Thus, in 2003, 20,267 cases of domestic violence were recorded, a 2.9% decrease to the 20,857 cases recorded in 2002. Of the cases recorded, 15,468 were for physical violence, compared to the 16,058 physical violence cases in 2002. The following chart illustrates offences upon which spousal cases were recorded.

123. Domestic violence remains a threat to women and their very existence. In the first 9 months of 2004, 10 women were murdered by their spouses. The following chart demonstrates the rise in spousal murder.

Chart 3 - Murder of Women by Their Spouse, 1994-2003

124. As detailed in our previous report, a national investigative system focusing solely on domestic violence has been operating since 1998 in all police stations throughout the country, consisting of 120 specially trained investigators specializing in domestic violence cases. Fifty other investigators handle these cases in smaller police stations in addition to their usual workload. There are 2-7 domestic violence investigators in each police station, depending on its size. Nine of the 120 positions were reserved for Arab women investigators in stations that serve the Arab community and there are currently 18 Arabic-speaking investigators, 14 Russian-speaking and 3 Amharic-speaking officers. In addition to a weeklong preparatory course detailed in our previous periodic report, which includes theoretical and practical knowledge in the sociological and legal aspects of domestic violence as well as the various police guidelines in this field, there are also yearly seminars for new investigators joining the system. Furthermore, domestic violence (as well as sex offences) workshops are held for the heads of investigation units as well as station officers, investigators, rotation officers, patrol officers, etc.

125. Following a request made by the Victims of Crimes (VOC) section in the police, the police behavioral sciences department conducted an extensive survey concerning the domestic violence investigators and patrol officers attitudes with respect to various topics regarding violence against women. By and large, the survey indicated that the domestic violence investigators have a more positive stance towards battered women than the patrol officers. Both had the same degree of faith in the women's motives for filing the complaints. Also, the investigators deem the police treatment in domestic violence as effective. The survey also compared the current survey to a survey held in 1993, measuring up police officers stance towards battered women to that of social workers. The comparison clearly demonstrates a considerable improvement in the police officers' position in general and a larger improvement in that of the domestic violence investigators.

Additional Data on Police Practices Regarding Domestic Violence Cases

126. It should be noted, that under the police internal regulations, members of the police force are to provide quick and efficient solutions in situations where restraining orders issued are violated, according to the level of severity of the violation and the potential hazards involved.

Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence

127. The number of Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence is at a constant rise - 49 to this date (18 additional centers since our previous report was submitted). In 2004, the centers treated 6,947 families (8,556 persons) – a 13% rise to 2003, of those treated – 26% were men, 65% were women and 9% were children who witnessed domestic violence. The Centers in total held 266 therapeutical groups (compared to 210 in 2003, a 27% increase). Furthermore, 15 of the Centers have programs combating violence against the elderly. Some Centers are operated by women associations and organizations, but are fully funded by the Ministry of Social Affairs (75%) and the local authorities (25%).

128. In 12 local municipalities, designated social workers were placed in police stations, for the purpose of conducting conversations with victims of domestic violence and aggressors, referring them to the Centers.

Shelters for Battered Women

129. The Ministry of Social Affairs provides battered women with three phases of shelter-care. All shelters are operated by women associations and organizations, but are fully funded by the Ministry of Social Affairs and the local authorities.

130. The first phase is aimed at women in the preliminary phase of moving out of their homes to shelters, these are “reception apartments”, located in 5 municipalities: Afula, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Be'er Sheva and Dimona. These apartments are designated for women of all sectors, and are also adapted for women with disabilities. The duration of stay in these apartments is limited to six weeks and in the year 2004 - 63 women and about 100 children were housed in these apartments (a 43% increase compared to 2003).

131. In the second phase, 14 shelters are available for battered women and their children. These shelters housed 692 women and 1,064 children in 2004. There are currently two shelters serving the Arab sector and one for Orthodox and ultra-Orthodox women. One of the Arab shelters and another shelter can house women with disabilities. Another shelter is undergoing the required arrangements to accommodate women with disabilities. The shelters are located all over Israel; all receive women on a 24 hours basis.

132. Lastly, there are currently 16 “transitional apartments”, intended to assist women in their transition back to life outside the shelter. In 2004, these apartments housed 54 women and 93 children for a length of stay ranging between 6 to 12 months.

Hotlines

133. There is currently a national hotline for battered women and children, operated by the Ministry of Social Affairs through the “Emergency Line” Association. In 2004, the hotline received 4,700 calls from women, men and children. The service is available in Hebrew, Arabic, Russian and Amharic. There are several additional hotlines run by NGO's, receiving roughly the same number of calls. The Israeli Sexual Assault Victim's Help Centers Union reported that during the first 9 months of 2004, it received 5,600 reports from women who were raped or sexually assaulted.

Treatment of Battering Men

134. There are several programs developed for the treatment of battering men. The Prison Service established various treatment frameworks for domestic violators. One such program is the “Beit Hatikvah” or “the house of hope”, aimed at lowering the inmates' level of violence, operating at the Hermon prison. Two similar programs are conducted in the Tzalmon and the Carmel Prisons. Additionally, domestic violators' treatment groups are active in all prisons, offering help in acknowledging and managing the problem.

Violence against Women within the Arab Sector

135. In 2003, 3 Arab women were murdered in the name of what is known as “family honor”. Murder is a severe crime, punishable by life imprisonment. The Israeli police, as well as Israeli legal system, regard any murder as such, and investigate it vigorously, regardless of the motives of the murderer. Israeli law recognizes no mitigating circumstances in such cases and prosecutes, indicts and punishes the perpetrators in all severity.

Article 6 - Suppression of the Exploitation of Women

General

136. Israel is a country of destination for victims of trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution. In 2003, the Police estimated that approximately 2,000 to 3,000 women were engaged in prostitution in Israel and that most women engaged in prostitution were in fact victims of trafficking. According to Police estimates, during 2004, there has been a significant decrease in the number of women engaged in prostitution, especially in the Tel Aviv area, the central location for such activities.

137. The victims of trafficking come predominantly from former Soviet Union Republics and the major trafficking route is illegal smuggling via the border with Egypt. Due to strict supervision, entry via the official sea and air ports is insignificant.

138. The State of Israel does not tolerate the phenomenon of trafficking in persons, has combated this phenomenon in the past, and has continued to do so, with increased vigor, during the reporting period. This issue is a matter of priority for the government. In the past four years, in particular, Israel has undertaken increased efforts to prevent trafficking, to protect its victims and to prosecute the perpetrators.

Prevention

Information Campaigns

139. On the prevention front, there has been great emphasis placed on performing information campaigns, for potential victims and for the public in general.

140. During the latter part of 2004, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs initiated an information campaign in countries of origin for potential victims of trafficking in order to warn them of the dangers and risks involved in entering Israel illegally, and to alert them of the gaps between what is promised by the traffickers and the harsh reality. This is a precedent-setting campaign that has already received positive feedback from organizations in the countries of origin.

141. Also in the realm of prevention, the Ministry of Justice published information on the phenomenon of trafficking and the steps taken by the government to combat it on the internet site of the ministry, accessible to the public. The public was apprised of this information by means of advertisements in two daily newspapers. In addition the Minister of Justice issued an "opinion" on the issue of trafficking which can be accessed by the public.
142. There were a number of documentary films screened on public television geared to raising the public awareness regarding the issue of trafficking. In addition, the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport is incorporating relevant programs into the school curriculum.

Border control

143. Due to strict supervision, entry via the official sea and air ports is insignificant. The major trafficking route is illegal smuggling via the border with Egypt. In March 2003, a new police unit called the Ramon Border Police Unit was established to monitor the border with Egypt in order to prevent smuggling of persons, drugs and weapons. It has received special instructions with regard to the treatment of suspected victims of trafficking. Strengthened enforcement resulted in a 20% decrease in the number of persons trafficked through the border.
144. Serious efforts have been exerted in this regard. As a result of the intense activity, in 2004, 36 women were caught being smuggled across the Egyptian border into Israel for the purpose of prostitution.

The Legal Framework

Legislation

145. Trafficking in persons is specifically prohibited by law in Israel. In fact, there is a specific provision in the Israeli Penal Law that prohibits trafficking in persons. This is section 203A of the Penal Law which states that:
- a) Selling or purchasing a person in order to engage him in prostitution or serving as a middleman in the selling or purchasing of a person for this purpose is punishable by a term of imprisonment of 16 years; for the purposes of this section, "selling" or "purchasing" includes consideration in the form of money, value, services or any other interests.
 - b) Causing a person to leave the state in which he lives in order to engage in prostitution is punishable by a term of imprisonment of 10 years."

146. If the victim is a minor, the penalty is 20 years imprisonment. Trafficking offences are also included as predicate offences in the Prohibition on Money Laundering Law, 5760-2000 ("Prohibition on Money Laundering Law").
147. A number of recently enacted laws have assisted in the battle against trafficking. For example, a landmark law against organized crime entitled the Combating Organized Crime Law, 5763-2003 ("Combating Organized Crime Law"), classifies trafficking in women as a felony. In addition, if an offence is committed in the framework of a criminal organization, even if the activity is not enumerated within the new law, the perpetrator is liable to a sentence of double the period prescribed by the relevant penal law, (up to a 25 year imprisonment limit). There are severe sentences for trafficking offences committed in the framework of organized crime- up to 25 years imprisonment.
148. In addition, further amendments have been passed limiting the minimal sentences for traffickers to a quarter of the maximum sentence, authorizing the indictment of citizens or residents who commit trafficking offences overseas even if such activity is legal in the foreign jurisdiction, expediting early testimony of victims, and allowing victims to testify in the absence of the accused.
149. There are a number of bills that have been proposed to combat trafficking in persons, amongst them is a broad bill on trafficking, with substantive and procedural provisions. This bill passed a preliminary reading and the Constitution and Law Committee has commenced deliberations in preparation for the first reading.

Investigation and Prosecution

Police Activities

150. Cooperation between Israeli police and police in countries of origin is maintained, thus laying the groundwork for the extradition of a central trafficker during 2004. The Chief of Police announced that a top priority for the year of 2004 would be combating organized crime including trafficking in persons. As a result, the police devoted increasing efforts to closing houses of prostitution and apprehending criminals involved in prostitution and trafficking.
151. Police policy in this regard dictates strengthening coordination with economic enforcement units such as the tax authorities and the Money-Laundering Agency in organized crime offences in general and trafficking offences in particular.
152. Positive cooperation has been developing between the Israeli Police forces and the Police forces of Germany, Russia and the Ukraine. Recently Germany has initiated an investigation regarding the involvement in organized crime groups and the trafficking of women, of Israeli citizens originally from Russia. Numerous arrests were executed with regard to this episode. Israel has assisted the German Police forces through supplying intelligence material and sending investigators.

Source: Israel Police, January 2005

153. In the wake of this concentrated activity, the number of trafficked victims has decreased substantially during 2004, according to Police estimates.

The Prosecution

154. Throughout 2003, over 50 indictments were filed by the State's Attorney's Office. During the period of March 2003-February 2004, the Prosecution filed approximately 53 indictments for trafficking in persons for prostitution and related offences, involving more than 90 accused.
155. According to records provided by the Courts Administration, during 2004, the Prosecution filed 89 indictments for trafficking in persons for prostitution and related offences.
156. Several indictments filed during 2004 included organized crime offences as well as trafficking offences. In several indictments a request for confiscation of the monies gained from the commission of the offences was included. In one of the cases, a request for confiscation of property and vehicles was included as well. This is an important development, as trafficking cannot be uprooted without striking at its economic roots.
157. The Prosecution advocates a broad interpretation of section 203A of the Penal Law (the trafficking offence) in court and lobbied for stringent sanctions against traffickers, including compensation for victims. Accordingly, several cases have ended with severe economic sanctions for traffickers.

Courts

158. Since its enactment in 2000, the Courts have interpreted the relevant legislation in a broad manner, thus enabling the conviction of traffickers despite the efforts of defence counsel to stress the letter of the law at the expense of its spirit. Courts have also shown enhanced understanding and awareness of the gravity of this offence and of the need for more severe sanctions. The Courts have explicitly and repeatedly stressed the severity of trafficking offences and expressed the view that it is their obligation to impose strict sentences in order to reflect the severe maximal penalty imposed by law (16 years imprisonment).

159. In addition to imposing strict punishment, according to section 77 of the Penal Law, courts are authorized to rule upon compensation to victims of offences of up to the sum of 228,000 NIS per crime. There is a growing tendency for Courts to rule upon compensation for the victims of trafficking. It is noteworthy that the strict attitude of the courts is explicitly stated in cases of related offences as well.

The Parliamentary Investigative Committee on Trafficking of Women

160. One of the main factors contributing to the combat of trafficking in persons, both in the area of legislation and in raising public awareness, is the activity of the Parliamentary Inquiry Committee on Trafficking of Women. The Parliamentary Inquiry Committee which was a temporary committee appointed for a limited amount of time, has recently become a permanent subcommittee of the government Ombudsman Committee of the Knesset. This betokens recognition in highest echelons of the Knesset of its continuing importance.
161. The Committee is active in the realm of legislation and has proposed several bills and is essentially a forum where various ministries discuss the issues and possible ways of combating the phenomenon of trafficking amongst themselves and with the NGOs.

The Actual Situation

Sentencing

Severe Sentences

162. Since the enactment of section 203A, there has been a steady increase in the sentencing of trafficking offences and in the last 2 years, there has been a series of very serious sentences meted out to traffickers. The Courts have explicitly and repeatedly stressed the severity of trafficking offences and express the view that it is their obligation to impose strict sentences in order to reflect the severe maximal penalty imposed by law (16 years imprisonment). In C.C. 904/03 the State of Israel v. Sragi Ben Victor Zlutzky et al. (1.2.05) the Court imposed harsh punishments in spirit of the law: the first defendant received a sentence of 13 year imprisonment and a sum of 25,000 NIS as compensation to be paid to each victim, the second defendant received a sentence of 6 years and 15,000 NIS to be paid as compensation to each victim. Similarly, in C.C. 212/01 the State of Israel v. Mordechai (8.2.05) the Court imposed 12 year imprisonment on the defendant for trafficking charges. In a recent case C.C. 774/04 (14.3.05) The State of Israel v. Genadi Boslovitz et al., the sentences imposed on the defendants were strict. The first defendant received a sentence of 14 years imprisonment, 2 years of suspended imprisonment, a sum of 15,000 NIS as compensation to be paid to each of the ten victims, a fine of 50,000 NIS or alternatively 6 months imprisonment, and confiscation of 200,000 NIS. The second defendant was sentenced to 10.5 years imprisonment, 1.5 years of suspended imprisonment, a fine of 20,000 NIS or alternatively 3 months imprisonment.

163. In a landmark decision this year, the Supreme Court set a sentencing policy in cases where trafficking is not attended by overt violence. In C.C. 1075/03 The State of Israel v. Alexander Shalom Melokondov (23.9.04) in which the Court meted out 12 years imprisonment, the Court ruled that the consent of the woman is irrelevant to the offence of trafficking and that this crime is so heinous that its perpetrators deserve severe sentences even if they did not use overt violence.

Compensation for the Victim of the Crime

164. According to Section 77 of the Penal Law, Courts are authorized to rule upon compensation to victims of crime up to the sum of 228,000 NIS per crime. There is a growing tendency of courts to rule upon compensation for the victims of trafficking. The majority of the cases decided by the courts included compensation for the victims. In addition, recent sums ruled upon have been relatively substantial. For example: in C.A. 3719/03 Anonymous v. the State of Israel (10.6.04) the Court ruled that 25,000 NIS should be paid to the victim. In C.C. 1237/02 the State of Israel v. Vladimir Vaba Ben Nison Chaimov et al. (15.6.04) - the Court ruled that 15,000 NIS should be paid to 2 victims by one defendant, and 7,500 NIS to the other 4 victims by each defendant. In C.C. 904/03 the State of Israel v. Sragi Ben Victor Zlutzky et al. (1.2.05) each of the victims were ordered to receive a total of 40,000 NIS, from the two defendants. In C.C. 774/04 (14.3.05) The State of Israel v. Genadi Boslovitz et al., the first defendant was ordered to pay a sum of 15,000 NIS to each of the ten victims.

Protection and the Human Dimension

Shelter

165. A shelter for victims of trafficking has been established and has been operating since February 15, 2004. The shelter has the capacity to house up to 50 individuals and creates a supportive climate, providing access to psychological, social, medical and legal assistance. The shelter has recently been in almost full capacity. While the shelter is under the responsibility and supervision of the Ministry of Social Affairs, it is operated by an NGO.

Assistance to Victims outside the Shelter's Framework

166. Housing - Victims who do not reside in the shelter are housed in a number of places. As a rule, they are not housed in prisons. Those who do not choose to testify and are not in the shelter are housed in one of the following locations: in the "Michal" facility for illegal entrants in Hadera, in Zohar in the south and in Maasiyahu prison in a special section for illegal migrants. In all these places of detention, conditions are relatively pleasant, victims are apprised of their rights, representatives of NGOs are given access in order to render assistance and attempts are made to listen to the needs of the victims.

167. Medical Services - Victims who do not reside in the shelter are given basic necessities and medical care in the framework of the facilities of the Immigration Administration. Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv and Shaarei Tzedek Hospital in Jerusalem provide the women basic medical services. The women can receive unconditional emergency medical aid at any of the emergency rooms in the country. In addition, they continue to be eligible for free medical services for sexually transmitted diseases in the two clinics in the framework of the Levinsky Medical Center in Tel Aviv and Haifa.
168. Risk Assessment - If there is some evidence of danger to a trafficking victim, Police intelligence with the assistance of Interpol and Israeli Police delegates abroad prepare a risk assessment which relates to her risk status in Israel and in her country of origin. If it is found that she is in danger in the country of origin, attempts are made to find a solution and for example by maintaining contacts with the IOM (International Organization for Migration) or NGOs in the countries of origin in order to coordinate a safe house and rehabilitation program.
169. In two cases during 2004, the Police reached the conclusion that these claims were well founded, and the women were consequently not returned to their countries of origin.

Coordination

170. In December 28, 2003, the Government decided on the establishment of a Directors-General Committee to develop policy and programs with regard to trafficking in the areas of prevention and protection of victims' rights. In this decision, the Government obligated the Minister of Justice to appoint a coordinator to be involved in prevention efforts, as well as victims' protection. For the past two years, a de facto coordinator operating under the auspices of the Ministry of Justice coordinated the efforts of other government offices and NGO's promoting the rights of the victims to the greatest extent possible. This helped forge solutions to the host of urgent, personal, problems as well as general issues that arose via the assistance of the relevant government bodies. Currently, a new coordinator is to be appointed.

Visas

171. In the past few years, the Ministry of the Interior has been granting temporary visas to the victims of trafficking for an initial period of 6 months (that may be extended). During 2004, the former Minister of the Interior has approved every application for a temporary visa submitted by victims who have concluded their testimony. All victims residing in the shelter automatically receive temporary visas. Moreover, the former Minister of the Interior issued a policy statement by which, as a rule, victims who have concluded their testimony will be issued temporary visas which include work permits. In addition, in one case, in the wake of a recommendation of the Court, the Minister granted a 2 year visa to a victim of trafficking who had been diagnosed HIV positive.

Courts

172. The Supreme Court has been in the vanguard of change and expressly stated on several occasions that trafficking is a violation of human rights and that the trafficking offence must be interpreted in a broad manner in accordance with the international conventions on trafficking and constitutional human rights law. In addition, courts have begun to develop a practice of awarding compensation to victims of trafficking. In C.C. 455/02 State of Israel v. Burstein (7.6.04), the Court further developed the interpretation of "the middleman" in the trafficking offence. This offence was broadly interpreted as not requiring direct proof of money changing hands. Another important development is a wider application of the laws of rape on trafficking situations. In such situations, a trafficker's sexual relations with a woman in his control may be viewed as rape even if she does not expressly say no or physically oppose it. (C.C. 904/03 The State of Israel v. Sragi Ben Victor Zlutzky et al).

Legal Aid

173. Legislation has entered into force in August 2003 entitling victims to representation by lawyers from the Legal Aid Division of the Ministry of Justice in civil suits initiated against traffickers and for certain administrative hearings. The legislation does not require a financial eligibility prerequisite and will be applied in a gradual manner.

Police

174. The Police have shown a growing awareness of the rights of victims and have issued guidelines to protect these rights. For example, in general, it is forbidden to arrest or investigate victims of trafficking on suspicion of crimes integral to their status in the country, such as illegal entry. In addition, police are enjoined from eliciting complaints about trafficking and are reminded that testifying victims are not to be held in detention.
175. The police also aid in the protection of victims by performing risk assessments in cases where the victim claims she or her family will be endangered if she is returned to her country of origin. In addition, investigators by and large treat victims with empathy.

Education, Awareness and Cooperation

Study and training

176. Police investigators receive special training for handling trafficking cases on an annual basis. The School of Continuing Education for Police has recently carried out two programs with relevance to trafficking. One was a week devoted to organized crime, which included trafficking rings (December 2004). The other is a week devoted to trafficking in persons in February 2005. The Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the Ministry of Justice held a seminar on the influence of international law on criminal law on February 3, 2005, which included a lecture on trafficking in persons. Both institutions have provided training on trafficking in the past 4 years, for investigators and prosecutors.

Cooperation with NGOs

177. The Government attaches great importance in maintaining an ongoing channel of communication with NGOs and civil society at large on the trafficking issue. To this end, the government cooperates with many NGOs in various fields such as prevention and protection of victims of trafficking. There is a constant dialogue between branches of government and NGOs on the trafficking issue. This exchange has borne fruit in both legislative initiatives and common action.
178. Israeli NGOs organize events for raising awareness to the issue of trafficking in persons, various grassroots meetings are held between the representatives of the government and representatives from NGOs.

International Conferences and Cooperation

179. The Government of Israel attaches great importance to its participation in relevant initiatives in the international arena. The government coordinates and participates in several international working groups and efforts to prevent, monitor and control trafficking.
180. The Israeli Police works closely with Interpol in the area of trafficking. The Israeli Police maintain direct cooperation with several countries of origin and other countries, through its representatives abroad. Over the course of 2004, there was outstanding cooperation with foreign police forces in several cases amongst them: Russia, the Ukraine and Germany.

Involvement of Minors in Prostitution

181. Current figures indicate that 10%-12% of the female-minors in the care of the Service for Women and female-minors of the Ministry of Social Affairs engage in prostitution, (approximately 45 female-minors). Another unknown number of female-minors, estimated at hundreds by the inter-ministerial and inter-organizational committee examining this issue, have been exposed to various types of commercial sexual exploitation.

Rehabilitation Programs for Women and female-minors in Distress

182. As mentioned in our previous report, there are no rehabilitation programs specifically geared for sexually exploited female-minors and women. The major rehabilitation program for female-minors is the Service for female-minors in Distress of the Ministry of Social Affairs. The service treats female-minors aged 13-21 in the Jewish sector, and up to age 25 in the Arab sector. Overall, the Service has treated 17,000 female-minors in 2004.

Article 7 - Political and Public Life

Women in Political life in Israel

183. Women in Israel are eligible to vote in all elections and to be elected to every public office, as well as to serve in publicly elected positions, they take part in the formulation of all aspects of government policies and their implementation, as detailed throughout this Article.
184. Women's representation in Israeli political life has progressed in all fields, although there is still a gap between men and women's representation in certain areas of the political life.

Women's Representation in the Knesset

185. There are 18 female Knesset members in the current 16th Knesset, comprising 15% of the Knesset members - the highest ever. The current Knesset has a woman MK serving as a Deputy Knesset Speaker, four women as head of Knesset Committees and 2 women head sub-committees.

Women in the Government

186. The current 29th Government, headed by PM Ariel Sharon, has three women ministers (Justice, Education, and Communications). In addition, there are five women director generals in various governmental ministries. There are currently four women serving as deputy-Ministers.

Women in Local Authorities

187. Although women make up about 60% of the employees in the local authorities, only 4% of them serve in high-ranking positions.
188. 207 women were elected to the local authorities' councils in the last elections - a total of 10.3% of the electives. Overall, women were chosen to councils in 87 out of the 158 local authorities. Thus, while women's percentage in Jewish local authorities' councils reaches 14.2%, Arab women comprise only 0.5%. Similarly, women were elected at 82% of the Jewish local authorities and only at 4% of the Arab local authorities. This gap is usually explained as the result of various socio-cultural factors such as religion and local tradition, given that in certain minority communities, the role of the women is still somewhat restricted when considering public service positions.

189. It should be noted that the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women is working towards increasing the involvement of women in municipalities. This is done through the strengthening of knowledge and awareness to women's involvement in local politics and the preparation of a "Women Reserve" for the next local elections, especially among the Arab sector. Appeals also have been made by the Authority and the Union of Local Authorities to appoint women to high-ranking positions in municipal corporations.

Women in the Civil Service

Ranks of Women in the Civil Service

190. Women maintain an absolute majority in the following professions in the Civil Service: nursing (85%), biochemists - engineers (84%), social workers (84%) advocates (66%) jurists (66%) and administration (63%).
191. Although women constitute 64% of the Civil Service, their representation in high-ranking posts remains relatively low. The rate of women among the three top ranks of the senior staff of the Civil Service, the main source for administration managers, has remained the same since our previous report was submitted. In 2003, women totaled 40% of the top three ranks, and 72% of the manpower in the lowest ranks.

Tenders in the Civil Service

192. A significant amendment in this field was the enactment of the Public Tender Law (Amendment no. 12 from 2002), relating to State tenders for purchasing goods, real-estate, and services which prohibits discrimination amid the candidates in a government tender for certain grounds, including gender, sexual inclination, personal status and parenthood.
193. The gaps between men and women in Civil Service's internal job-tenders participation, both as candidates and appointees, have diminished in the past four years. There were more women-candidates than men in every year since 2000, with 62.36% in 2003. This trend is also apparent in the appointment of women for positions in the Civil Service, with 61.52% women-appointees in 2003. The situation in public tenders has also improved, women being 49.11% of the candidates in 2003, and comprising 53.50% of new appointments. Yet there remains a slight disparity in favor of men (in relation to their high percentage in the Civil Service in general).

194. The Civil Service Commission, added a segment in tender announcements regarding affirmative action for women, providing special measures for women and establishing educational programs on the issue of affirmative action for women and for members of tender committees.

Women in Key Positions within Israel's Economic and Public Life

195. At the end of 2002, the Knesset amended the Planning and Building law, adding a mandatory representative of women's organizations in the National Council for Planning and Building in order to integrate women's issues into the general planning and building agenda.
196. The New Histadrut (the largest employees' organization in Israel) Employees Committees Election Code stipulates that a female candidate who received 50% of the votes shall be preferred over a male counterpart in companies that employ over 300 employees, where at least 25% of whom are female. The code further specifies that a 30% minimum of the members of employees committees shall be of each gender.

The Judiciary

197. The number of female judges continues to climb. In October 2004, there were 262 women judges out of a total of 542 judges, (48.3% of the judiciary in Israel). The number of female Justices on the Supreme Court has risen to 41% (5 out of 12 permanent Supreme Court Justices). Women continue to compose the majority of professional labor judges (67.3% of the judges, and 57.1% of the registrars), nearly half of the District Courts judges (41.3%), almost half of the Magistrate Courts Judges (48.7%) and more than half of the registrars in both instances (56.9%). Women have also increased their role as public-representatives in the labor courts (constituting 14.8%) representing employees and employers' unions side by side with professional judges.
198. The legal Profession - As detailed in our previous report, in the public sector, women remain a majority of the legal profession. The retiring State Attorney was a woman, and as of July 2004, 113 (66.9%) of the 169 legal advisors in the Ministry of Justice were women, and similar percentage of women were working in the State Attorney and the Attorney General's offices (432 women to 210 men) and the Public Defenders office (33 women to 15 men). There were also 201 female legal-interns to 120 male legal-interns, and 22 women in the senior judge-equivalent rank, to only 8 men.

Government Corporations

199. As stated in our previous report, women's representation on the Boards of Government Corporations is rising. At the beginning of 2005, women constituted 37% of the directors. There were 5 women (11.36%) serving as heads of a board of directors (4 new nominations since our last periodic report), and 10 women served as Director General's of governmental corporations.

200. The Authority for Government Corporations, in cooperation with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, have requested all governmental corporations to address the issue of women's appropriate representation in their annual reports.

Women in the Military

The Legal Framework

201. In December 2000, the Minister of Defence issued the Defence Service Regulations (Determining Positions for Women Volunteer Service), 5761-2001 ("Defence Service Regulations (Determining Positions for Women Volunteer Service)"), in accordance with section 16A of the Defence Service Law [Consolidated Version], listing all positions requiring active volunteering, thus granting equality between men and women veterans who served in those positions. In addition section 16A is aimed at ensuring substantial equality in opportunities for placement and positions within the military, as well as in duties that accompany such positions which are designated by the Minister of Defence, according to the law.
202. Following the abolition of the women corps (Chen), the Chief of Staff nominated on August 1, 2001, a special body, headed by the Advisor on Women Issues (a brigadier general). This body is assigned to create an atmosphere where women can better utilize their abilities in the IDF and advance equal opportunities, for the objective of empowering women in the IDF and the Israeli society. Per example: Implementation of the Miller Case within the Israel Defense Forces.
203. In 1995, the Supreme Court decided in the landmark Alice Miller case that the IDF could not claim that it is bound by logistic and budgetary constraints, as a justification for excluding women from serving as pilots in the Air Force. In three separate majority opinions, the Court rejected the army's reasoning and determined that the principle of equality required the army to overcome such constraints and accommodate the natural biological needs of women. The IDF continues to take steps to implement the conclusions reached in the Miller case, integrating women in the IDF in a wide range of positions previously fulfilled exclusively by men.
204. One of the measures taken to implement Section 16A of the Defence Service Law [Consolidated Version] involves a comprehensive review of all issued military orders, exploring the differentiation between men and women. In the years 2002-03, 360 such orders were examined and the Office of the Advisor on Women Issues found that 160 of them needed further examination, eventually recommending the cancellation or reduction of the gender distinction in 74% of these orders. Another measure taken was applying the rule of equality between men and women serving in combat related positions, regarding the duration of the volunteering period. Further steps are examined regarding the adding of positions open to women service in the IDF.

205. Another amendment involves women's service in the reserve forces, where women in combat-related positions now serve until the age of 45, with no exemptions for pregnant women and mothers, whilst women in non-combat-related positions serve up to the age of 38, and are exempted from service due to pregnancy and motherhood.

Women and Men in the Military

Women and Men Officers

206. Female officers make up 26% of the officers in the regular forces and 18% of the career service. In recent years there has been a dramatic increase in the number of female officers in field positions, with a 17 times rise from 1997 to this date.
207. The number of female colonel and brigadier general are at an ascent, as shown in the following table.

Table 2 - Proportion of Women among high-ranking Officers, 2000, 2003 and 2004

Rank	% of Women – 2000	% of Women – 2003	% of Women – 2004
Colonel	3%	4%	4.5%
Brigadier General	1%	3%	4%

Distribution of Men and Women

208. Over the last decade, the tendency towards opening further positions to women in the IDF has continued, leading to a growing number of female soldiers assigned to “quality” jobs and a smaller number to clerical positions.
209. As of 2004, 81% of all positions in the military are open to women, compared to 56% two decades ago. Women are placed in 62% of the positions (compared to 40% in 1990) and efforts are made towards enlarging these percentages. It is important to emphasize that this process requires exploring all physical aspects of the additional positions, including the adaptation of the relevant equipment, preparation of the staff and additional activities.

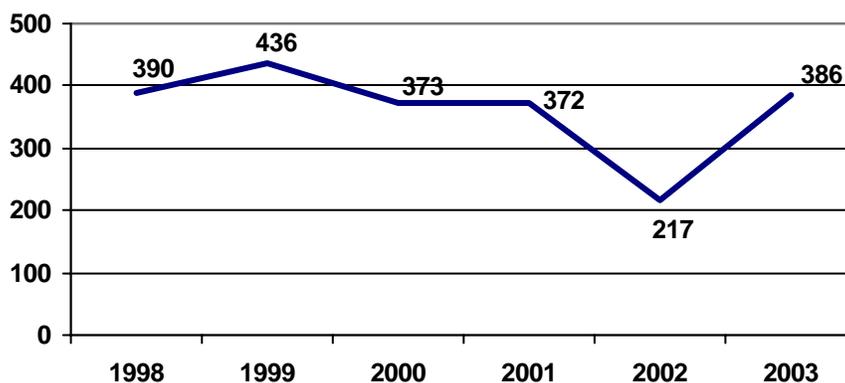

Women Scientists and Engineers in the IDF

210. As detailed in our previous report, the IDF initiated several programs intended to promote female scientists and engineers among its ranks and support them in their careers. These programs include the “Rakia” program, targeting 12th graders, interested in studying for a practical engineer degree, with the IDF funding – the number of participants has tripled from 80 in 2001 to 240 in 2003; “Tzabar” – a pre-academic one-year preparatory course aimed at assisting young women interested in studying engineering and exact sciences in the course of the academic reserve; “Technological Horizons” – a unique course for 12th graders majoring in mathematics and physics, intended to assist them in continuing to study for a practical engineering degree.
211. Women also participate in the “Atidim” Project for integrating youth from the periphery in the academic reserve (25% women in 2003); “Talpiyot” Project targeting soldiers to become part of the IDF research and development program through a comprehensive training program (11% women in 2003).

Sexual Harassment in the Military

212. The next chart details the number of annual complaints of sexual harassment in the military, showing a significant increase in 2003, attributed mainly to growing awareness and to a number of high-profile cases.

Chart 4 - Number of Sexual Harassment Complaints, Various Years

Source: IDF Chief of Staff Advisor on Women Issues

213. The IDF has taken several measures aimed at dealing with the phenomenon of sexual harassment in the military, including the establishment of a General Staff Steering Team headed by the Advisor on Women Issues, forming the IDF policies on prevention, enforcement and treatment of sexual harassment.

214. In 2002, the Chief of Staff Advisor on Women Issues initiated a wide range survey on sexual harassment in the military, as well as an extensive study of the phenomenon itself. The study has led the IDF authorities to the conclusion that they are informed of a fragment of all sexual harassment incidents, and that combating the problem requires a deep normative and educational change in all levels.
215. As a result of this survey, the IDF has expanded and improved its treatment of sexual harassment issues, including the following measures: On July 2003, the Chief of Staff issued a special notice to all members of the IDF emphasizing the importance of fighting against sexual harassment, with the commanders in charge having responsibility to do so; the IDF added trained personnel on all levels equipped to handle these complaints; an extensive publicity campaign was initiated throughout the IDF along with an obligatory annual lecture; special training courses were held for those taking care of the complainants and the Military Police Investigators; and pamphlets on sexual harassment were distributed to all new recruits and throughout the military units.

Women in the Police

The Legal Framework

216. The Police strive towards raising the number of women in the police force, via affirmative action measures like more flexible working conditions for mothers and lenient policies for pregnant women.

Women in the Police – Field Data

217. Currently, women constitute 21% of the general police force, a moderate decrease since our previous report (23%). Women officers comprise a higher percentage than their representation in the police force, with 23.4% of the police officers being female.
218. As of March 2005, there were 53 Arab women in the police force – 1 Samaritan, 19 Christians, 12 Muslims, 14 others and 7 of unknown religion.

Table 3 - Percentage of Women in the Police Force, 2004

	Women		Men		Total
	Number	% of the Women	Number	% of the Men	Number	%
Non-Officers	3,362	74.88%	13,361	78.39%	16,723	77.66%
Officers	1,128	25.12%	3,684	21.16%	4,812	22.34%
Total	4,490	100%	17,045	100%	21,535	100%

Source: Israel Police, 2004

219. Women are slightly under-represented in the higher ranks of the police force, with 17.6% of the higher ranks, to their 21% in the overall police force.

Sexual Harassment within the Police

220. The police have taken several measures to combat sexual harassment. Sexual harassment directives were prepared and distributed throughout the police force, a special sexual harassment overseer was appointed and reports on sexual harassment within the police and cases of inappropriate treatment due to harassment are published. A further informative pamphlet was prepared and will be circulated to every police officer, as well as to new recruits.
221. In the 18 months between January 2003 and June 2004, 38 sexual harassment cases were handled through criminal charges by the Department of Police Officer's Investigation in the Ministry of Justice. In the same period, 22 cases regarding sexual harassment were referred to the police disciplinary department, from the Department of Police Investigation, following the conclusion of the criminal proceedings.

Women's Organizations

222. Women's organizations continue to play an active and valuable role in the promotion of gender equality in Israel. These organizations remain dynamic and representative of women of all sectors, enabling a lively civil society.
223. Women's Organizations have a substantial impact on many areas of life in Israel, some of their major fields of operation are: promoting legislation, as detailed regarding the Sexual Assault Help Centers, in Article 5 above; assisting women in legal representation and counseling; leading information campaigns on women's rights; organizing conferences and seminars; managing sexual assault help centers and hotlines; and more.

Article 8 - International Representation and Participation

Women's Representation in the Foreign Service

224. Israel's Foreign Service is routinely working at increasing the number of women amongst its ranks.
225. The percentage of women taking the exams for the cadet course (30%-45%) is similar to the percentage of women admitted to the course (30%-48%). Note that for the most part, all cadets who attend the course – complete it.
226. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the diplomatic missions are composed of an administrative wing, a non-administrative wing and a diplomatic wing. The rate of women within the administrative and the non-administrative wings is higher than the rate of men (50.5% and 63%, compared to 49.5% and 37%, in 2003).

227. The following table further details the percentage of women within the diplomatic wing of the Foreign Service, by ranks:

Second Secretary	7 (70%)	3 (30%)	13 (48%)	14 (52%)

Source: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 2004

228. Of the promotions in rank and level in the Foreign Service since our previous report (2002-2003), 38% (69) were women.

229. It should be noted that Israel's Women's Network petitioned the High Court of Justice for the revocation of six recent nominations in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (H.C.J. 5523/04 Israel's women's Network V. the State of Israel and the Minister of Foreign Affairs et al (29.07.04)). The network claimed that the nominations discriminated against female candidates and that the Ministry failed to elect women candidates despite their equal and sometimes better qualifications. The Network claimed that the nominations were not in accordance with the Equal Rights for Women Law and the Civil Service Law. The petition was withdrawn by the petitioner, after the ministry entered an affidavit, committing to take minutes of the nominations committee's hearings and instruct the committee members to act according to the rules of affirmative action, and an internal procedure in that fashion was issued in the ministry.

Women Representatives and independent experts in International Organizations

230. Israel includes women in most of its delegations to multilateral forums, as well as a 5-6 women delegation to the Commission on the Status of Women.

231. Currently, Israel's delegation to the UN headquarters in New York consists of 4 men and one woman, and a woman has joined Israel's delegation to Geneva as of August 2004, consisting now of 2 women and four men. Ms. Ziva Patir, general manager of the Standards Institute of the Israel, serves as vice president of the international Standardization Organization, located in Geneva, as of September 2003

232. Several additional examples include Dr. Ruth Halperin, chairperson of the counseling committee to the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, that served on the panel of the UNECE in Geneva, towards "Beijing 10+"; Ms. Valerie Brechia heading the Israeli delegation to the UNEP annual conference in March 2004; Dr. Michal Haran, the Ministry of the Environment Director General and a female attorney from the Knesset representing Israel in the CSD Conference in April 2004; Dr. Ilana Zieler, representing the Ministry of Health in the state task force on sustainable development in the European Economical Council (ECE) on February 2004.
233. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women sends a yearly delegation to the Women's U.N. Conference. The last delegation was composed of 13 women and two men and the Authority also funded the Israel's Women Network NGO delegates.
234. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs encourages and assists women Israeli NGOs to apply for status in the United Nations and in fundraising both in Israel and abroad.

Article 9 - Nationality

235. Israeli citizenship and residency laws do not differentiate between men and women. Both have equal rights regarding acquisition, changing or retaining their nationality or residency. Neither the change of nationality by one spouse nor marriage to a non-citizen has any effect on one's citizenship. Either parent's citizenship carries equal weight relating to children's citizenship acquired at birth.

Article 10 - Education

Legal Developments

236. The major legal development in this area was the enactment of the Sexual Harassment Law (Amendment no. 2 from 2004). This amendment applied the law to 13th and 14th grade pupils, who are not minors, where the educator abuses his or her authoritative position. The law also applies to pupils and students in institutions granting general or vocational schooling to adults where the educator abuses his authoritative position.

High Schools in Israel

General and Technological/Vocational Tracks

237. The Israeli secondary education system is composed of both technological/vocational and general public high schools. Most of the female pupils study in the general public schools. In 2002, 68.5% of the female pupils aged 15 and over studied in the general track, while only 56% of the male-pupils aged 15 and over studied in this track. In 2003-2004, both in the Hebrew and the Arab education, most of the pupils studied in general public high schools.

Matriculation Levels

238. In 2002, 84.3% of the female-minors within the 12th grade age group (in the Hebrew education) took matriculation exams, compared with only 75.1% of the male-minors. Female-minors' entitlement to a matriculation degree was also higher and stood at 63%, compared with 49.5% of the male-minors.
239. Among the Arab education system, 91.7% of the female-minors within the 12th grade age group took the matriculation exams, compared to 84% of the male-minors. Female-minors' entitlement to a matriculation degree also was higher in this sector than male-minors (56.3% and 44.7%, respectively).

Table 5 – Examinees and entitlement to matriculation certificates – 2002

	Examinees		Entitled to a Certificate
	Total	% of pupils in grade XII	Total	% of pupils in grade XII
Hebrew Education
Male-minors	30,869	75.1	20,326	49.5
Female-minors	35,176	84.3	26,305	63

Source: Central Bureau of Statistics, 2004

240. The percentage of female-minors taking matriculation exams in science is 45%: electronics 12%, biology 66%, chemistry 62%, computers 43% and physics 30%. The percentage of those successfully completing the exams is equally high with the ratio higher among female-minors than male-minors (57% to 33%).

Education Rates, Attendance Rates and Drop-Out Rates

241. As stated in our previous report, education levels in Israel maintained a moderate increase in all population groups. In 1961, 69% of the women minority group never attended school, compared to 30% of the male minority group. In 2003, the numbers were 9.9% and 2.4%, respectively.
242. Another important indicator of school performance is the rate of attendance. In 2003-2004, the dropout rates of female-minors in the 9th to 11th grades stood around 3.1%-

3.6% and in the 12th grade the rate of dropout was just 0.7%. The dropout rates of male-minors were higher, especially in the 11th grade. Among the Arab education system, the gap between the genders was also in favor of the male-minors, although the dropout rates of Arab female-minors exceeded those of Jewish female-minors.

243. The Department for Regular Attendance and the Prevention of Dropouts in the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has been active on all levels to raise the percentage of attendance and prevent dropouts in all sectors. They have operated on three major levels – raising awareness to the issue, managerial/organizational measures throughout the system and pedagogical actions. Between the years 2002 and 2003, the dropout rate was reduced to 6% in the Jewish sector and 10% in the Arab sector.

Activities and Educational Programs to Prevent Discrimination against Women

Gender Stereotypes within School Books

244. As detailed in our previous report, The Department for Planning and Development of Curriculums in the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has been active in establishing criteria for schoolbooks, specifically within the realm of gender stereotypes. These criteria were integrated into the curriculum by a special committee appointed in 2001 by the current Minister of Education, Culture and Sport.
245. The Committee examined gender stereotypes in schoolbooks used by the Israeli education system, and endeavored to end all stereotyping in the curriculum. The Committee adjusted the previous criteria, on a qualitative and quantitative level, addressing the following issues regarding equal representation for both genders: expanding the material with illustrations to include women's contributions in all areas of life; drawing attention to pre-existing stereotypes; refraining from gender stereotypes of all kinds (both direct or implied); assigning tasks on a gender-neutral basis; selecting works, essays and papers equally representative of both genders; assigning children to courses and classes regardless of their gender; omitting gender-stereotypical drawing and illustration from schoolbooks.

Other Instructions and Intervention Programs that Aim to Prevent Discrimination against Women

246. The Ministry's Director General issued a circular in 2003 (9.4-4(d) 4/2003) regarding equal opportunities in the Education system for both genders, specifically targeting educational/social/tutorial intervention in gender issues. This circular emphasizes the institute's educational policy, and the teaching process.
247. The Ministry aims at implementing this circular via conferences and seminars for principals and supervisors, as well as targeted training to instructors on all levels. School seminars and assimilation of gender equality in the Ministry's various departments shall be another avenue of implementation.

248. The Ministry also maintains its support for the “Girls Leading a Change” program, along with the Israel Women’s Network. The goal is to work towards empowerment and leadership building, as well as advance knowledge regarding inequality issues between the genders, develop self awareness, and change positions on gender equality.
249. Another program relates to advancing female-minors in exact sciences and mathematics, encouraging female-minors to choose these topics for their matriculation, and later in higher education. “Femininity and Masculinity – the Next Generation” program is aimed at changing management and leadership patterns from purely masculine attitudes. to a combination of masculine and feminine ones.

Sex and Family Life Education

250. The current curriculum for pupils in their high school years includes sex and family life education. The program’s main topics are: individual development at the person's own pace, uniqueness, acceptance of the other even when different, male-minors and female-minors being equal yet different, developmentally adapted sexual urges, consensual contact with others, and mutual decisions in a relationship. The curriculum focuses on exposing gender stereotypes, changing positions, developing unique abilities, and providing knowledge. The curriculum includes a program titled “Non-Violent Friendship and Couplehood”, targeting the differences between respectful and equal relations as opposed to abusive or one-sided ones, the difference between courtship and offence, and the do’s and don’ts in relationships.
251. The curriculum has been adapted to the state-religious and the Arab education systems. The curriculum is identical for female-minors and male-minors, yet some schools conduct the lessons separately.

Teachers

252. In 2003-2004, the rate of Jewish men in teachers training colleges, stood at 18.3%, compared to 18.8% in 2002-2003. The rate of Arab men in teachers training colleges was 8.2%, compared to 7.6% in 2002-2003.

Higher Education

Female Students

253. The rate of women with a matriculation certificate or a higher diploma (62%) is higher than that of men (55%) among the general population. 55% of the women and 50% of the men who concluded their high school studies in the year 1994, enrolled in academic education program within 8 years.
254. In 2003, women still constituted a majority among the first (55.9%), second (57.1%) and third (52.7%) degree students. There are no dramatic changes in the percentages when compared to previous figures. However, women continue to cluster in the humanities and are less likely to enter fields such as mathematics, sciences, and engineering, where they comprise only 25% of the students. Women comprise a majority in other fields such as humanities (66.4%), social studies (61.3%) medicine (52.3%), law (49.9%) and life sciences.

255. Aside from the state universities, a number of alternative higher education institutions exist which grant non-degree diplomas. In the academic year 2002-2003, 6.4% of Jewish women, aged 20-29, attended non-university higher education institutions, compared to 5.6% in 1999-2000. The rate of Arab women attending these institutions was 4.4% (compared to 4.6% in 1999-2000).

Minorities in Higher Education

256. The gaps between men and women in higher education have been eradicated, and in the 2002-03 school year, Muslim, Christian and the Druze female students were a majority among first-degree students in the universities, in comparison to their male counterparts. The same can be said for the general student population, with the exception of the Druze sector where the gap is rapidly closing. Indeed, certain gaps still remain in higher degrees, but there too, the figures show a significant rise in the percentage of female students among these sectors.
257. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has recently granted 18 Bedouin students full scholarships in order to pursue higher studies at the Ben-Gurion University in Beer-Sheva during the academic year 2004/5. The scholarships were granted on the basis of academic excellence and financial situation. Among the 18 students' recipients of the scholarship, 12 were women. Additional scholarships are granted by various NGOs.

Women on the Academic Staff

258. In 2001, 24% of the senior academic staff financed by the Council for Higher Education were women, a rise from 20% in 1992/93. Between the years 1993-2003, 360 staff members were promoted to full professor, a position granting not only higher income, but also influential status within academia. Only 78 (about 20%) of those nominated were women. Thus far, no woman has served as president of a university and only two have served as rectors.
259. In 1988, a NGO, The Women's Lobby, approached the heads of Universities Board with an initiative to appoint Women Issue Advisors to the presidents of the all universities. Such advisors are now residing in all state universities. In April 2003, a similar initiative was brought before the heads of the academic colleges.

260. Although there are more women than men in all levels of higher education, they comprise only 24% of the academic staff, with lower numbers in engineering, exact sciences and technological studies. For example, in Engineering, women are 25% of the students and 12% of the staff, and in Physics, they comprise 36% of the students and 8% of the staff. The situation is similar in alternative institutions, where women make up only 25% of the senior academic staff.
261. Women's under-representation in academic staff, especially in senior ranks, has continued to draw attention since the submission of our previous report. The Knesset Committee on the Status of Women is dedicated to improving women's representation in the academic staff of institutes of higher education, and held a number of sessions on this matter.

Women and Gender Studies

262. Over the last few years, most of the universities and several other higher education institutes opened women and gender studies departments, aimed at exploring a range of topics regarding women and femininity. Women and gender studies are crucial for learning about women's position in society, discrimination against them and measures to be taken against discrimination.

Science and Technology Education for Women

Initiatives aimed at encouraging Female-Minors to enter the fields of Science and Technology

263. Initiatives aimed at encouraging female-minors to enter the fields of science and technology have continued. Some of the programs are:
264. The “Female Scientists Club”, targeting 6th grade female-minors with interest and knowledge in science and technology, encouraging them to carry on in these fields; The Tel Aviv University “Science Cadet Unit” is taking affirmative action measures to raise the percentage of female attendance in their activities; “The Future Generation of Hi-Tech” program, detailed in our previous report, continues to create partnerships (currently 100 schools participate in the program, compared to 23 as of 2001) between industries and junior high schools throughout the country, exposing 35,000 students to this program in the 2002-3 school year alone; “ORT to 21”, a program that encourages female students to choose and succeed at advanced technological and exact studies in high schools and higher education, with 7,400 female students participants in 23 junior high schools over the 2002-3 school year attaining excellent results; a Technion – Israel Institute of Technology program that includes community social work, promoting female pupils in science and engineering and tutoring female students in the 10th and 11th grades.

Initiatives to encourage women to study Science and Technology

265. The Ministry of Science and Technology continues its special scholarship program in which undergraduate students in engineering and exact sciences can receive a yearly stipend of 8 to 10 thousands NIS (about $2,000), in return for 100 hours of service in the National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology programs, aimed at promoting women in science. In the years 2000-3, the Ministry which granted 122 scholarships to female students in faculties where there is a low percentage of female students.
266. Further programs include the “Rakia” program, targeting 12th grade female-minors interested in studying for an engineer degree through the Israel Defence Forces; “Tal” Religious Institute offers special programs intended for religious women seeking higher education in engineering, combined with special preparation for religious women in a male-dominated work environment; The Academic College for Technology Teachers – “Ort Tel Aviv”, qualifying teachers in the fields of electricity/electronics, computer sciences, science and technology, charges female students with half of the regular tuition fees.
267. A survey initiated by the Ministry of Science and Technology in February 2003, examining basic approaches towards women in science, indicated that most of the public

(85%) has positive views towards women in science and their ability to integrate in scientific and technological studies and research. It is notable that 60% believe that women have made scientific and technological achievements that brought pride to Israel, while nearly 60% believe that women are more suitable than men to specific scientific fields such as medicine, computers, and agriculture.

Physical Education and Sports

Legal Developments

268. Section 9A to the Sports Law was adopted at the end of 2003, concluding that all state supported sports organizations, including sports associations, bodies, unions and federations, shall provide appropriate representation to women. This appropriate representation concerns both staff and management, and shall include all categories of positions. Under section 9B, sports organizations shall submit annual reports to the Knesset Committee on implementation of this section. This amendment stems from the realization that as in many other areas of life, promoting women's role in sports requires their full involvement, not only in sporting activities themselves, but also as decision makers and in managerial roles.
269. In an innovative High Court decision (H.C.J. 5325/01) filed by the Association for the Advancement of Women in Basketball against the Ramat HaSharon Local Council and others, the Court examined the issue of allocation of funds to sports institutions. The Court examined the issue of fund allocation to sports institutions. The Court based its ruling on section 3A of the Budgetary Principles Law, which establishes the criteria of equality for budget allocations to public institutions. The Court here applied the allocation criteria, adopted by the Ministry of Culture, Science and Sport, which sanctions affirmative action and grants women sports activities with 1.5 times the budget allocated to male sports activities. The Court ruled that the need for equality also concerns local authorities and their allocation of funds. The Court held that the Ramat HaSharon Council, the Head of the Council, and the Ramat HaSharon Center for Education and Sports are to allocate funds according to the above criteria.
270. In another case, in September 2004, several women football teams from the Super League petitioned the High Court of Justice (H.C.J. 8472/04 Women Football Team-Ha'poel Be'er Sheva et al v. Council for Sports' Gambling Arrangement et al). The petitioners asked the Court to order the Council for Sports' Gambling Arrangement to apply affirmative action to women football teams and grant them a higher percentage of funding than the one granted to men's teams. The petitioners demanded that the Council provide them with a better financial support than men's team, implementing special measures concerning women' teams. The petition is still pending before the Court.

Governmental Machineries for the Promotion of Women in Sports

271. As of 2000, the Sports Authority in the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport amended the criteria for funding sports associations, allotting 1.5 times more budget to women's sports associations.
272. A public committee, the "Katz Committee", was mandated to examine the criteria of the Council for Arranging Gambling in Sports and recommended affirmative action plans aimed at women and female-minors sports teams.
273. The authority has recently completed a pamphlet, to be distributed among coaches, athletes, schools, colleges and parents. This pamphlet establishes a Code of Ethics aimed at preventing harassment and sexual violence in sports. This important campaign is supplemented by seminars conveyed by the Association for the Advancement of Sports.
274. The Authority also plans to run a national program for the advancement of women in sports in the year 2005. This program will include an 80 Million NIS budget for the next 8 years; raising women's awareness to sports through national campaigns in the written and broadcasted media; preferential treatment to women in ten competitive sports, allocating the relevant unions with special allocation, provided they withstand basic conditions concerning women's participation in these fields.

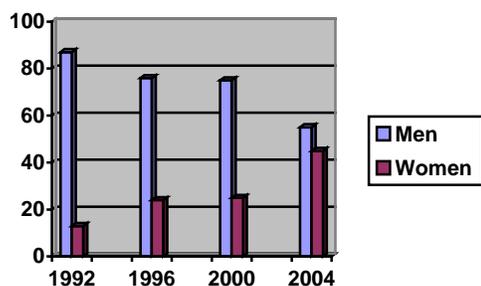

Female-Minors Sports in the School System

275. Pupils' participation in physical education classes is mandatory in the Israeli school system. The education system's core program stipulates that every pupil in all state-supervised schools must attend two weekly hours of physical education. The non-directly supervised schools must provide pupils with one weekly hour of physical education.
276. As detailed in our previous report, the Sports Association for Schools desires to set a goal of increasing the number of female pupils involved in competitive sports. Current data shows that the number of female-minors and male-minors defined as active athletes (meaning participation in 18 games in group sports and participation in 3-4 recognized competitions in personal sports) is almost equal (9,641 female-minors to 9,710 male-minors) in all areas of sports.
277. Under the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport directives, the physical education supervisors (one third of whom are women, 5 out of 15) authorizes pupil's delegation to the International School Sport Federation (ISF) competitions provided there is an equal number of female-minors and male-minors.

Current Data – Women in Sports

278. Women's participation in the Olympic Games has dramatically increased over the past few years, as indicated by the chart below:

Chart 5 - Athletes in the Olympic Games, 1992, 1996, 2000, 2004

Source: Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport, 2004

279. The overall percentage of women active in the field of competitive sports has been at a moderate ascent over the last decade, from 12% in 1994 to 15% in 2004.

280. Female representation in the management of sports associations remains at a low level of around 10%, similar to the rate of women coaches.

Article 11 - Employment

Legal Protection from Discrimination within the Workplace

281. In June 2004, Amendment no. 9 to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, added pregnancy as one of the grounds upon which a person cannot be discriminated against in the workforce, both as a job applicant and as an employee.

282. In 2001, the Minister of Labor and Welfare issued the Employment of Women Regulations (Prohibited Work, Restricted Work and Hazardous Work), 5761-2001 ("Employment of Women Regulations (Prohibited Work, Restricted Work and Hazardous Work)"), expanding the Employment of Women Regulations (Prohibited Work and Restricted Work), 1979 designed to further protect fertile and pregnant women from exposure to chemical and biological materials which may harm a fetus or a baby.

283. Israel has been a party to the following International Labor Organization conventions regarding equality and prohibition of gender discrimination: C100 Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (since 1965) and the C111 Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (since 1959).

284. Several recent rulings of Labor Courts have further reinforced the protection granted by law to women in the workforce. In November 2003, the Labor Court in Be'er Sheva ruled in favor of a female employee who received a lower salary than her male counterparts (La. 1576/99 Simmy Niddam V. Rally Electricity and Electronics Ltd. (03.11.03)). The court granted the plaintiff all social benefits along with compensation for grief caused to her in the sum of 30,000 NIS (appx. 6,500 $). The Tel-Aviv Jaffa Labor Court convicted a company that fired a temporary employee who was pregnant, two days before she completed a 6- month employment trial period. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor indicted the company on grounds of discrimination (pregnancy, parenthood and gender) based on the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. The Court convicted the company and imposed a fine of 80,000 NIS, as part of a plea bargain. (Cr.C. 100/04 the State of Israel / the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor v. S.I.R.N Ltd. et al (, 15.12.04).
285. In a January 2004 decision, the Tel Aviv Labor Court ruled in favor of a female plaintiff who received a lower salary than her male colleagues, granting her the difference between the salaries along with additional compensation based on the infringement of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law (L.A. 300880/98 Orit Goren V. Home Centers Int. (04.01.04)).

Pregnancy and Maternity Leave

286. See discussion under Article 13, below.

Parenthood

287. In a 2002 amendment, the legislator extended the single parent privilege under the Sick Pay Law (Absence from Work due to a Child's Sickness), 5753-1993 ("Sick Pay Law (Absence from Work due to a Child's Sickness)"), granting a 12-day leave to tend to a sick child (compared to the standard 8 days).

Affirmative Action in Employment

Social Security Benefits

Employment of Women - Data and Analysis

Women Participation in the Workforce

290. In 2003, the Israeli civil workforce totaled 1.4 million men and 1.2 million women. Compared to 2002, the workforce grew by 24,000 men and 39,300 women, ergo women accounted for roughly 60% of the increase.
291. In 2003, women's proportion of the labor force increased to 49.1%, compared to 48.2% in 2001 and 46.3% in 1998. Men's proportion decreased to 60.1%, from 60.7% in 2001 and 61.2% in 1998.
292. In 2003, 27% of the women in the labor force had 16 years or more of schooling, compared to 23% of the men. The level of education is a conclusive factor in female participation rates in the labor force and the rates escalate as the level of education rises. The general education level of women in the labor force is higher than that of men.

Work Patterns

293. In 2003, 87.4% of men and 62.6% of women worked full-time. Most of the usually part-time employed persons in the labor market were women (401,400 women compared to 159,500 men). 14.1% of the women stated that the motivation for part-time employment was care for their children and/or household.
294. As detailed in our previous report, temporary absence from work is higher for women when compared to men. In 2003, 15,900 women were absent due to maternity leave. In the same period, the number of absent men due to army reserve duty was 4,800.
295. In 2003, 1,072,600 women were employed (compared to 1,257,600 men), 978,000 were salaried employees. 984,600 of the employed persons were Jewish women, 895,800 of them were salaried employees. At the same time, most of the employed men (81.9%) were salaried employees and 8.8% were self-employed. 91.2% of the employed women were salaried employees and only 4.6% were self-employed. In 2002, 17,000 men and 20,000 women received their wages from manpower contractors, compared to 22,000 and 26,000 respectively, in 2001.

Unemployment

296. There are two main trends concerning the local "Unemployment Market". The first is the increase in unemployment, and the second is the derogation in the rights of unemployed persons (defined as persons who did not work for pay for one hour during the week of the survey, and who were actively seeking work). In addition, men's decreasing participation in the Israeli labor force has aggravated in 2002-2003 and reflects the despair of those searching for employment. In contrast, women's participation in the labor force has increased, apparently due to the decrease in household incomes and the need to add a second income to the household.

297. In 2003, 219,805 employment seekers applied to the Employment Service Labor Bureaus (monthly average). 114,321 were women (compared to 91,920 women in 2001) and the remaining 105,484 were men.
298. The percentage of unemployed women was 10.6%. In 2003, the percentage of unemployed males of the labor force was 10.2 % (compared to 8.4% in 2000). In 2003, the percentage of unemployed women was 11.3%, compared to 9.2% in 2000. In 2003, most of the women (83.9%) were seeking employment through newspaper advertisements, while most of the men (82.5%) were assisted by friends. It is worth noting that 5.5% of the men were trying to establish a private business at the time, compared to only 2.8% of the women. 72.5% of the women sought full-time employment while the remaining 27.5% sought part-time employment (compared to 88.2% and 11.8% of men, respectively).

Careers of Women: Levels and Salaries

Women's Occupational Distribution and Gender Segregation

299. As detailed in our previous report, women maintain their cluster in “feminine professions”, with the highest percentages of women employees in the education (20.8%) health services, welfare and social work (17.4%). However, women's soaring representation in the legal profession continued, as detailed in Article 7, above.

Salary and Earning Gaps

300. There are still gaps between male and female salaries. According to recent data, in average, men earn a 63% higher income than women.
301. One explanation for this gap is shorter working hours (or lower availability for work) for women - (In 2002, employed men worked an average of 42 hours a week, compared to employed women, who worked 31 hours a week - a 35% difference). Yet, in 2002, women's average income per hour was 36.7 NIS and men's – 45.3 NIS, a 23% gap, indicating that the difference cannot be solely attributed to the number of working hours.
302. In the Arab sector women employees earned 7% more than men. This can be explained by the fact that 47% of the Arab women are employed in academic and technical professions, while 64% of the Arab men were skilled and unskilled workers in the construction and industry branches. The differences deepen as the age rises, although both genders' income climbs with age.

Women's Entrepreneurship

303. The number of men applying to the Center for Fostering Entrepreneurship in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor is double the number of women applicants. Most of the applicants, men and women, are in the 25-34 and 35-44 age groups. 45% of the women-applicants have an academic degree while only 35% of the men-applicants have one. A majority of the applicants, both men and women, require assistance in launching a business – approximately 60%.
304. A 2001 survey indicates that 30.7% of the self-employed are women, compared to 69.3% men. Women entrepreneurs face inherent obstacles such as insufficient administrative skills, difficulties in financing and low self-esteem. Consequently, several programs were developed by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor through the Israel Small and Medium Size Enterprises Authority and in the Centers for Fostering Entrepreneurship for women of all sectors, including the Arab sector, new immigrants, and orthodox women. These programs include assistance in funding for small businesses, feminine empowerment courses, establishment of “women only” business clubs and other activities and special assistance for single mothers.

Vocational and Professional Training for Women

305. As mentioned in our previous report, the Division for Training and Development in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor organizes vocational courses for all sections of the Israeli population. The Division takes specific measures to raise the number of women participants in these courses via the establishment of separate courses for women in the ultra orthodox and Arab sector, directing the Acceptance Committees to perform their role with the utmost equality, and support for female participants in all courses, especially those previously considered “masculine”.
306. The following table depicts the distribution of men and women trainees within the various types of courses offered in the year 2003.

Child-care

307. Researches have found that the most important factor to women participation in the labor market is the availability of day-care centers that provide an educational framework to children. Alongside those centers, which are supervised by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, there are also private child-care centers as well as home care through nursemaids.

308. The Social Services Department in the Ministry of Social Affairs refers children to day-care centers due to dysfunctional family situations; these day care centers also care for working mothers' children. There are currently 1,600 day care centers and 2,300 family care centers, attended by 68,000 working mother's children and 14,000 "welfare referred" children.
309. In the Jewish sector, 63.2% of the mothers take advantage of day care centers. 9.4% of the women are supported by family members, friends or require no assistance and 27.4% remain at home. In the Arab sector, which in general is considered more traditional, 70.4% remain at home, 16.3% of the women turn to day care centers and 13.3% use other free of charge arrangements.

Enforcement of Employment Legislation

The Department of Supervision of Labor Laws in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor

310. The Department of Supervision of Labor Laws of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor supervises the enforcement of a number of labor laws, including the Employment of Women Law. Under this Law, in 2003 – 2004 (up to June 1st), 32 cases were forwarded to the legal department for the preparation indictments and 7 employers were indicted for breaching these laws. Two were convicted and fined and two other cases are still pending. Another two indictments concern discrimination of women in acceptance to work due to parenthood; in one case the employer was convicted and administered a 40,000 NIS fine, and the other case is still pending.
311. As stated in our previous report, applications concerning dismissals of pregnant women are rising steadily. According to the Department's figures, in 2003, it received 1,647 applications from employers and women regarding discharges from employment during pregnancy.
312. In the last few years, the Enforcement Division of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor boosted its activities under the Equal Employment Opportunities Law and the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law. In the years 2003-04 (until the end of June 2004), it investigated 55 complaints concerning alleged discrimination of women in their place of employment due to pregnancy, parenthood and gender. The Division conducted 477 investigations involving unlawful advertisement and levied 228 administrative fines. The Division also held 1,326 inspections of workplaces regarding the publication of the code of practice in accordance with the Sexual Harassment Law.
313. According to recent figures, 5.3% of the women who were employed during their last pregnancy, resigned from their jobs following the delivery. 2% of the women who were employed in the course of their recent pregnancy were dismissed subsequent to the delivery. This indicates a high percentage of adherence to the law. The majority of women returned to the same or a comparable position of employment following maternity leave. 4.5% of the women were promoted and 6% were demoted.

The Department of Labor Law Enforcement

314. In 2003, 1,657 applications were received concerning dismissal of pregnant employees. In 44% of the cases, the Department granted permits for dismissal while 56% of the requests were either refused or the cases were closed, a significant reduction to the 54% approval rate in 2000. The main reasons for consenting to permissions were the closing of businesses, consensual dismissal, or termination of contract.
315. The decision to approve dismissal is an administrative one, subject to judicial supervision. Both parties can petition this decision to a Labor Court. However, generally, the courts do not intercede in the authority's considerations and do not reverse those decisions, provided the authority performed its function in good faith, and in a manner relevant to its capacity.

Women's Employment among the Arab Population

316. During the last two decades, there was an increase in Arab women's participation in the labor force, from 11% in 1980 to 14.8% in 2002. Arab women today constitute about 4% of all women in the civil labor force in Israel. In 2003, there were 263,500 Arabs employed in the labor force, 204,900 (77.7%) were men and 58,600 (22.3%) were women. 34,100 of the Arab population were listed as unemployed, 6,400 (18.7%) of them were women.
317. The highest level of labor force participation for both genders is in the 25-34 age group. In the Arab sector, the majority of men (81,200) in the labor force graduated after 11-12 years of schooling, compared to the majority of women (32,100), who graduated with 13 years or more of schooling.

Article 12 - Equality in Access to Health Care

General

318. Under the State Health Insurance Law, 5754-1994 ("State Health Insurance Law"), every resident is entitled to comprehensive health care services. The services are to be provided in reasonable quality and within a reasonable time, and at a fair distance from one's place of residence. Among these services are personal preventive medicine, health education, medical diagnosis, ambulatory medical care, mental care, hospitalization, medical rehabilitation, medicine supply, medical devices and accessories, and first aid medicine.

319. Two major surveys were held since the submission of our previous report: The 2003-2004 National Health Report, performed by the I.C.D.C. – Israeli Center for Disease Control, a project initiated by the European Health Interview Surveys (EUROHIS). The survey was held among 8,000 persons over the age of 21, and the relevant chapter titled "Women Health" polled 2,711 women – 2,160 Jewish women and 551 Arab women. The topics explored include: 1. The use of gynecology services. 2. The use of sex hormones. 3. Fertility and reproduction. 4. Health behavioral patterns. 5. Body mass. 6. Health and sickness situations. Also, a 2002 survey regarding subjective health conditions indicates that 39% of Israeli women defined their health as "very good", a lower percent than that of men (45%). An equal third of men and women replied positively to an enquiry regarding the existence of a health or physical problem lasting for over 6 months. Of those with a health problem, 72% of the women and 64% of the men claimed that it disturbed their every-day functions.

Special Health Services for Women

Pre/Post Natal Services: Delivery Rooms and Maternity Wards

320. In 2002-2003, there were 0.100 beds in gynecology wards per 1,000 residents, compared to 0.103 in 2001. Bed occupancy increased from 93.1% in 2001 to 94.8% in 2003. In 2003, the number of beds in maternity wards decreased to 0.198 per 1,000 residents (from 0.203 in 2001-2002) and bed occupancy increased from 109.2% in 2001 to 113.5% in 2003.

321. Israel has preventative health service treatment for pregnant women through mother and child care stations ("Tipat Halav") for a certain minimum fee. Women, whose financial state is weak, may be exempt from this fee, under certain conditions.
322. Most Israeli hospitals conduct routine opinion polls as to the levels of satisfaction among all wards, including maternity wards. These polls indicate high levels of satisfaction with the overall treatment given.

Women Health Centers

323. Women health centers have been established in several hospitals, offering the following wards and services: labor rooms, women and obstetrician wards, fertility treatments (including IVF), specializing gynecology wards (colposcopy, oncology, adolescent medicine, premenopause, high-risk pregnancy, etc.). Most of the specific wards exist in all hospitals.
324. Women health centers are also active in the community towards empowerment of women to enable them to better utilize their health potential through a healthier schedule, routine examinations, etc.

Osteoporosis

325. According to professional estimates of the Ministry of Health, 40% of the women over 55 shall undergo at least one osteoporosis fracture. The Israeli Center for Disease Control, through a project initiated by the European Health Interview Surveys (EUROHIS) collected data which indicates that 15.8% of women aged 45-74 were diagnosed with osteoporosis, and 76.5% thereof were treated with drugs (a significant improvement to 50% in 1998). A DEXA bone density check up is provided to women over 50 every 2-5 years. The basic service basket includes about a dozen different drugs for the treatment of osteoporosis.

Family Planning

326. In 2003, 21,220 applications terminate pregnancies were submitted to the Commission for Pregnancy Terminations, 20,835 (98.1%) approvals were given and 20,069 (94.5%) actually occurred. As of 2002, the majority of applicants to the Commission are single women (previously – it was mostly married women). 15,030 were Jewish, 1,275 Muslim, and 679 were Christian women. In recent years, the main reason for pregnancy terminations was out of wedlock pregnancy. The following data refers to pregnancy terminations in hospitals.

Fertility Rates, Treatments and Services

Birth Rates and Fertility Rates

327. Since the beginning of the 1990's, the level of fertility in Israel remained constant with an average of 2.9 births per woman, a sharp decline from the 3.9 average in the 1960's.
328. In 2003, the rate of fertility among the total population was 2.95 births per woman. For Jewish women the rate was 2.73, for Muslims 4.50, for Christians 2.31 and for Druze 2.85.

Druze	3.02	2.77	2.85

329. Another noticeable trend is the ascent in the age of women bearing children, mostly due to the rise in the age of marriage. In the 1980's the average age of women giving birth was 27.4, in 2003 that age had risen to 28.8. Furthermore, the segment of women over 35 bearing a child went up from 9% in the 1980's to 16% in 2002-03, with a parallel decrease in the ratio of women under 20 giving birth, from 6% to 3% at 2002-03. Due to the relatively low number of cohabitation and traditional nature of the society, there is a limited number of out of wedlock childbearing, being approximately 3% of Jewish births.

Fertility Treatments and Services

330. As detailed in our previous report, fertility treatments in Israel remain highly developed and well subsidized. Each woman is entitled to IVF treatment until she gives birth to two children from her current relationship, regardless of children from previous marriages. This applies to unmarried women, as well as spouseless women. There are currently 24 In-Vitro fertilization (IVF) clinics in Israel. In 2002, 20,886 cycles of IVF treatment were performed, with some women receiving more than one cycle of treatment, resulting in 5,272 pregnancies and 3,734 live births (4,792 children).

Life Expectancy

332. In 2002, the average life span for Israeli women was 81.5 years and 77.5 for men. Elderly people (65+) comprise 10% of the population as of 2004 (only 3% among the Arab sector) and are expected to rise to 12% in the year 2020. In 2003, persons over 65 made up 11.2% of the female population, compared to 8.53% of the male population.

333. In the last two decades (1981-2001), life expectancy for Israeli women has increased by 5.3 years, compared to 4.6 among men. Over half the elderly women are widows, compared to only 16% of the men, mostly due to women's longer life span and their tendency to marry older men.

Mortality Rates and Causes of Death

334. In 2003, women also had a lower mortality rate than men in all age groups: 20-24 men – 1.2 to a thousand, women – 0.4 to a thousand; 50-54 – 4.3, 2.4 respectively; 80-84 – 77.1, 65.4 respectively.
335. The maternal mortality rate has remained generally low. In 2002, the maternal mortality stood at 6 deaths per every 100,000 live births.

Cancer among Women and Mammograms

336. Cancer is the second major cause of death for women, after heart illness. Breast cancer is the most common malignant illness, constituting 18% of all annual cancer instances, and 30% of the cases of cancer among women.
337. The Ministry of Health figures indicate that 3,400 new cases of breast cancer are discovered annually, 70% of the patients are over 50 and 400 annual cases can be found among the 22-40 age group. In the 45-64 age group, the average rate of breast cancer per 100,000 women is 281.1 in the Jewish sector and 118 in the Arab sector. The basic services entitlement includes over 70 different drugs for the treatment of breast cancer.

Colon and rectum cancer are the second most common cancers among women (as well as the general population), with 68 of 100,000 in the Jewish Sector and 37.6 of 100,000 in the Arab sector.

338. A 2003 national survey of women's health performed by JDC - Brookdale Institute, indicates that 13% of the women under 50 and 62% of the women over 50 had a mammography screening in the two years prior to the survey. The survey further specifies that the rates of women conducting mammograms are almost the same in all sectors, with 62% among the Jewish sector and 61% among the Arab sector (a dramatic rise from 18% in 1995).

Mental Health

339. As of the end of 2002, there were 47,660 patients in mental health clinics, 25,380 men (53.3%) and 22,280 (46.7%) women. The number of women is higher in the 45-64 and 65+ age groups.
340. In 2002, 13,295 people were admitted to inpatient care and day hospitalization, 5,565 (42.1%) of them were women. This data reflects an increase compared to 2001, when 13,014 persons were admitted to inpatient care and day hospitalization, 5,490 (42.1%) of them were women.
341. The EUROHIS data indicates that women suffer from higher levels of depression and anxiety than men. In the 45-74 age group, 4.7% of the women reported that they were diagnosed as depressed/anxious, to only 3.8% of the men. In the younger age group of 21-44, the numbers are almost identical, with 1.7% of the women and 1.5% of the men.

AIDS

342. The total number of AIDS patients up to 2004 was 924 (688 male and 236 female). There were 2,959 known cases of HIV-positive individuals in 2004 (1,798 male and 1,161 female). The percentage of women diagnosed with HIV-positive increased, from 26% in 1995 to 39.2% to this date. The Public Health Services in the Ministry of Health estimate that as of December 2003, the correct number of people living with HIV/AIDS is 4,127.
343. HIV examinations are available to each person, anonymously and free of charge. Every Israeli citizen who is HIV-positive is entitled to virtually free of charge treatment in any one of the seven regional AIDS centers. Non-Israeli pregnant women and their children are entitled to free of charge antiretroviral treatment.
344. The Ministry of Health has initiated various projects to increase awareness to HIV, especially among more traditional populations, such as the new immigrants from Sub-Saharan countries. The ministry developed a program adapted to these populations, incorporating both HIV health education and an individual support and follow-up by health educators originating from the same communities. Further programs target youth, as well as soldiers, educating them on HIV and AIDS, through direct counseling, Radio and TV broadcasts.

Women in Health Care

Women in Medical Schools

345. Women make more than half of the medicine students. In the 2002-2003 academic year, there were 3,568 students of medicine (first, second and third degrees), of which 1,867 (52.3%) were women.

Women as Medical Personnel

346. The majority of medical personal are women. In 2003, there were 156,900 persons employed in health services, 44,800 (28.6%) were men and 112,000 (71.4%) were women. 58,500 of the women worked in hospitals and 35,800 in clinics and medical institutions. In the same year, there were 104,000 salaried women employees, compared to 36,800 men.

347. In 2003, 734 licenses to practice medicine were issued, 49% to women, also, 169 new pharmaceutical licenses were issued, 63% to women.

Senior Positions for Women in the Health System

348. Women compose a majority (5 out of 7) of the Ministry of Health's district doctors. Women also head five major departments in the ministry, and there are two women deputy director generals. There are 12 women (26%) in the National Health Insurance Council.

Attitudes towards women in the Health System

349. Recent data indicates that none of the complaints submitted regarding medical treatment and medical/para medical personnel is related to discrimination against women.

Promotion of the Status of Women in the Health System

350. The Ministry of Health holds a yearly seminar for women on women-related issues, and specifically on sexual harassment issues.
351. The women status supervisor in the Ministry encourages women to apply for managerial positions and is extensively involved in matters such as sexual harassment, domestic violence, etc.
352. Every year, dozens of women represent the Ministry of Health in delegations to international conferences and seminars abroad.

Article 13 - Social and Economic Benefits

Legal Developments

353. A major legal development was the expansion, in 2004 of the Employment of Women Law (Temporary Provision) of 1998, granting men the privilege to share maternity leave with their wives and the eligibility for maternity leave allowance, provided their wife waives the privilege for the remainder of the maternity leave and returns to work. This amendment was recently extended and is in force until the end of April 2007.
354. The Employment of Women Law underwent substantial modifications since our previous report, as detailed henceforth:
355. Amendment no. 20 excluded an employee's maternity leave and the 45 consecutive days from the dismissal notice days, therefore, an employer can only dismiss an employee following those 45 days. Amendment no. 21 added protection to an employee (men and women) undergoing IVF and fertility treatments for their first and second child, during their absence and the following 150 days. Amendment no. 22 stipulated that an employee's absence due to maternity leave should not affect social benefits dependent upon seniority. Amendment no. 24 anchors the employer's duty to continue allotment of employees' pension, pension fund or directors insurance and savings plan during a pregnancy observation period, provided the employee maintains allotment of her share. Also, the employer is obligated to maintain allotment of his ratio in the pension fund or directors insurance during maternity leave. Amendment no. 25 adds that a woman can extend her maternity leave when the newborn is hospitalized for a period of over 12 weeks. This extension does not coincide with the remaining periods of extension, to a maximum period of 4 weeks.

356. Amendment no. 26 restricts the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor's ability to grant an employer with a retroactive permit to dismiss a pregnant employee. Among the exceptions enabling such retroactive dismissal are: lack of knowledge of the pregnancy at the time of the dismissal, proven severe circumstances, bankruptcy or liquidation, or ceasing of operation due to unexpected circumstances.

Social Benefits and the Welfare State

Social Benefits

357. Israel has an advanced social insurance system, protecting against major contingencies of income loss prevalent in a modern society. This includes long-term payments, guaranteeing resilience to those permanently unemployed due to old age or disability, to dependents and to families struggling with the economic burden of raising children, and short-term payments substituting the wages of those temporarily unemployed (on account of dismissal, work injury, child bearing or military reserve service). The National Insurance Institute (NII) is the governmental body responsible for the administration of the social insurance programs.
358. Women in Israel have a high presence among social benefits recipients; a figure mostly derived from women's longer life span and their employment patterns.
359. The following will present developments and changes in social benefits affecting women that occurred since the submission of our previous report.

Maternity Insurance

360. Women are entitled to maternity insurance, which includes a hospitalization grant, a maternity grant, a birth allowance and a maternity leave allowance. Until July 2002, the rate of a maternity grant was 20% of the average wage, independent of prior births. In August 2003, there was a change in maternity grants payable for the second child and onwards and it was set as 6% of the average wage. In January 2004, the grant payable for the second child only was increased to 9% of the average wage.
361. In 2003, 142,000 women received maternity grants, a 6% increase from the 2002 figures. In recent years, the rate of women receiving this payment has decreased moderately, mostly due to changes in the rate of women's participation in the labor market whilst in their fertility phase. It is notable that the average age of women who received the maternity leave allowance, in 2002-2003, is 30. Also, 95.5% of those women were salaried employees, a figure resulting from the nature of women's participation in the labour market. In 2003, maternity insurance's portion of all national insurance payments was 6.1% - compared to 5.9% in the years 2001-2002.

Old Age and Survivors' Benefits

362. In 2003, approximately 604,000 received old age and survivors' benefits, with 104,000 monthly recipients. Old age and survivors' benefits comprise the largest insurance branch at the NII and the numbers are rising, with a 3.8% increase in the number of old age benefit recipients. There was a slight decrease in the number of survivor benefits recipients (-0.1%). These changes mainly reflect the growing number of elderly population, as the population gentrifies.
363. As of December 2003, the majority of those eligible to both old age and survivors' benefits were women – 95% of the 76,597 eligible to these two benefits. The high rate of women is mainly because more men than women were insured so their wives had survivors' benefits, and women usually marry older men and have a longer life expectancy. There is a difference between the genders in the rank of the two benefits: the average level of benefits that men are eligible to receive is higher due to seniority increments and postponed retirement increments. At the end of 2002, 166,000 widows received survivors' benefit: 95,000 received this benefit alone and another 71,000 were given the combined benefit. There were only 7,000 widowers receiving survivors' benefit - half of them receiving the regular benefit and the other half, the combined benefit.
364. In 2004, the Government adopted the recommendations of a public committee, which examined the issue of retirement age. In its final report, the committee recommended setting the same retirement age for women and men, which grants the right to old age benefit, at the age of 67. The retirement age for women and men will be raised gradually from 60 and 65, respectively, to 67. Another recommendation is the establishment of a committee to monitor the process and examine whether there are any improvements in women's position in the labor market, from the aspects of employment rate and wages. Throughout this process, in different phases, the committee will examine the effects of these changes on women. Consequently, the Knesset enacted the Retirement Age Law, 5763-2004 ("Retirement Age Law").

Alimony Payments

365. In 2003, 26,000 women received monthly alimony payments from the NII - an 8% decrease from the previous year. Between 1998-2002, there was a 7.5% increase in the rate of women receiving alimonies from the NII. The increase derived, usually, from the greater numbers of divorces and the higher rate of unemployment. The recent decrease stems from amendments to the Income Assurance Law, 5741-1980 ("Income Assurance Law") and the Alimony Law (Assurance of Payment), 5732-1972 ("Alimony Law").

(Assurance of Payment"), conditioning the entitlement to alimony to instances whereby the debtor does not reside with the recipient.

Single-Parent Families

366. The number of single-parent families in Israel is at a constant ascent in recent years - mostly due to the changes in family patterns and the rise in the rate of divorce. In 2003, single-parent families comprised approximately 12% of all the families with children – compared to 9.3% in 1995. Women head 97% of these families and in close to a third of them, the parent is a new immigrant. It should be noted that single-parent families also constitute 36% of all income guarantee recipients.
367. Although the Government has recently reduced some of the privileges given to single parent families, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor initiated a special program to integrate them into the labor market, specifically those receiving income guarantees and alimony payments. The program intends to increase single parents' earning capabilities, while raising their employment qualifications. The program grants its participants with the following benefits: a 9,600 NIS grant to those who increase their income by at least 1,200 NIS compared to their income in May-July 2003; single parents' full time employers are entitled to a financial grant of up to 12,000 NIS, travel expenses refund, vocational and professional training, and participation in fees for children in kindergarten and day-care centers. The program began in August 2003, and by March 2004, 30,000 single parents approached the Bureaus, 13,000 of them were referred to positions and 5,100 were placed accordingly. The dropout rate is about 30%. Also, 630 single parents are currently attending vocational courses, and 372 of them placed their children in day-care centers.

Financial Credit

368. Women in Israel make use of bank loans, mortgages and other forms of financial credit in a manner equal to men.

Recreational Activities

369. Women participate in all aspects of recreational activities, including sports and cultural life, as detailed in Article 10 above.

Article 14 - Rural Women

General

370. A very high percentage of the Israeli population lives in urban localities – 91.5%. Rural population makes up 8.5% of the general population. The majority of this population lives in “Moshavim” (cooperative settlements) (39.2%), Kibbutzim (communal settlements) (20.9%), and institutional settlements (15.5%), totaling 75.7% of the rural localities. In these aforementioned settlements, 99.6% of the population is Jewish. The rest of the rural population is Muslim, Christian, Bedouin, Druze and Circassian living in various forms of rural localities. This Article will focus on Bedouin women.

Bedouin Women

371. The following data refers mostly to the Bedouin community in the southern Israeli Negev desert. There are approximately 145,000 Bedouins living in the Negev, approximately 83,000 of them in seven Bedouin towns and the rest in illegal villages throughout the Negev.

Education

372. Bedouins enjoy all the rights and opportunities of Israeli citizens, including the privilege to receive formal education at all levels, in accordance with the laws of Israel.

373. In recent years, there has been a substantial rise in the percentage of pupils in the Bedouin sector taking matriculations exams (up from 19.7% in the year 1998 to 53.8% in the year 2002), as well as a huge leap in the percentage of pupils entitled to a matriculation certificate (from 15.5% in the year 1998 to 42.8% in the year 2002).

374. The high school dropout rate in the Bedouin sector is 11.58% (compared to a 4.53% in the Jewish sector). The highest dropout numbers are of female-minors in the illegal villages, mostly due to early marital age and the desire to protect family honor. It should be noted that the situation is quite different in the Bedouin towns where female-minors graduate after 12 years of schooling, usually continuing with higher education as detailed below.

375. A recent survey held by the Van Leer Jerusalem Institute examined the issue of Bedouin female-minors dropout rates and concluded that the educational system has to consider the special needs of the traditional Bedouin society. The major requisite adjustments are separate schools/classes for male-minors and female-minors, as in the Jewish-religious school system, and adaptation of the curriculum to the cultural background of the Bedouin pupil.

Higher Education

376. With regards to higher education, there are currently more Bedouin women studying for their first degree than men. Statistics indicate that most of the Bedouin women who turn to higher/academic education are unmarried. Once married, they may abandon their studies.

377. There are three colleges in Be'er Sheva where the majority of students are Bedouins. Most of the women students are single. Married women study, for example, in the Negev

College, where classes are separate, and in Ben – Gurion University where there is a Student Body Association that accompanies the Bedouin women students. Also, the faculty of medicine accepts, on a trial basis, a number of qualified Bedouin women who failed the formal entry exams.

378. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has recently granted 18 Bedouin students full scholarships in order to pursue higher studies at the Ben-Gurion University in Beer-Sheva during the academic year 2004/5. The scholarships were granted on the basis of academic excellence and financial situation. Among the 18 students' recipients of the scholarship, 12 were women. Additional scholarships are granted by various NGOs.

Employment and Welfare

379. The Bedouin population has a high rate of unemployment and low socio-economic state. Several measures are being implemented to change these statistics. One example is a business entrepreneurship course for Bedouin women in cooperation with the Center for Fostering Entrepreneurship and the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women.
380. A Center for the Welfare of the Bedouin Family was recently established in Be'er Sheva, manned by a specialized social worker. The Center serves as a place for discrete conflict resolution and a place of transit for Bedouin women seeking refuge due to domestic violence.

Health

Infant Mortality

381. In 2003, the overall infant mortality rate was 5.1 (compared to 5.5 in 2001). Pursuant to specific data for 2002, the rate was 4.0 in the Jewish population, 9.1 among Muslims, 2.8 among Christians and 7.0 in the Druze Population.
382. There has been a remarkable 81% decrease in the infant mortality rate in the Bedouin population over the last three decades, from 33.9 per thousand to the current 15.3 per thousand. Nonetheless, the mortality rates remain high. This is due to rough living conditions in the illegal villages and the high rate of consanguineous marriage (60% overall, with 40% being of the first degree). Another element impacting upon mortality rate is the religious prohibition against abortion among Muslims even in medically recommended cases, as well as the high rate of births among elderly women.
383. The Ministry of Health's Public Health Services initiated a project to reduce infant mortality in the Bedouin sector. The project operates through Arabic-speaking female instructors who educate prospective mothers on the importance of regular visits to the doctor during pregnancy. These instructors address the importance of medical examinations to detect birth defects during pregnancy, and awareness of the consequences of consanguineous marriage.

Other Health Indicators

384. Bedouins, like all Israeli citizens and residents, are entitled to health insurance under the National Health Insurance Law. All Bedouins are fully covered, whether they reside in Bedouin towns or in illegal villages. Various health funds (i.e., privately owned health care providers subsidized by the government) build and run community clinics in permanent towns, as well in the illegal villages (the result of the High Court of Justice ruling in H.C.J. 4540/00 Abu Apash v. The Minister of Health, petitioning for clinics in the illegal villages).
385. The improvement of the relevant health indicators among the Bedouin community continues, yet gaps remain, especially among those living in the illegal villages. This is so mainly due to the physical conditions in those villages.
386. In addition, the illegal villages are provided with Mother and Child Health Clinics (Tipat Halav), Health Fund medical clinics, family care mobile units, mobile immunization teams, and a special mobile eye medicine unit. Recent data indicates that the rate of vaccinations (for children up to the age of two), in the Bedouin sector is 90%, almost identical to the rate in the Jewish sector (93%).

Ritual Female Genital Operation (Female Circumcision)

387. Recent data indicates over the last few years there were no reports of women who underwent female genital mutilation in Israel.

Marital Status

388. There is a high percentage of married women in Bedouin society, indicating the importance of this institution. The status of cohabitation has also been prevalent due to the prohibition of polygamy in the Israeli law.

Article 15 - Equality before the Law and in Civil Matters

General

389. The Israeli Judiciary provides equality to men and women in all areas of law, including all aspects of civil matters, as detailed throughout this report.
390. In civil matters, women enjoy an identical capacity to that of men, including the right to conclude contracts, administer property and equal treatment in all stages of procedure in courts and tribunals. Women also have the same benefits regarding the movement of persons and the freedom to choose their residence and domicile, as detailed in Article 9 above.

Religious Courts

391. Overall, religious Courts have an exclusive jurisdiction over all matters of marriage and divorce, except when the couple is not affiliated to any religion or of different religions. Regarding these exceptions, in matters relating to divorce, the jurisdiction is granted to the Family Courts or to the Religious Courts, upon the decision of the President of the Supreme Court. In Matters concerning women's and children's alimony, property issues, child maintenance, guardianship, violence and in the case of Muslims, also parental matters, Family Courts and the Religious Courts have a parallel jurisdiction, with certain differences between the various religious communities.
392. Inheritance and adoption – the Family Courts have the main jurisdiction, the Religious Courts jurisdiction is subject to the consent of all relevant parties and certain limitations stipulated in the Law. Child abduction, marriage approvals under the Marital Age Law, name changing, determination of age, surrogacy, parenthood (except for Muslims) and other disputes among family members, in matters not mentioned above – are all subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Family Courts.
393. In reference to certain aspects of personal status laws, Israel has entered a reservation due to commitments to various religious communities in Israel. Further details regarding this reservation are provided in Article 16, below.

Article 16 - Equality in Marriage and Family Life

General

394. Israel upholds its reservation to article 16 regarding personal status laws due to commitments to religious communities in Israel. This reservation stems from Israel's constitutional system and respect for religious pluralism, as well as its granting autonomy to religious communities in matters of personal status.
395. The personal religious law limits the marriage option for a number of groups in Israel. Moreover, certain couples prefer to forego the imposed religious marriage because it contradicts their perceptions of marriage and marry abroad.

Legal Developments

396. The legislator has recently extended the powers granted to the Rabbinical Court when dealing with a husband reluctant to give his wife a “Get” (divorce decree), thus preventing her from re-marrying. The Rabbinical Courts Law (Upholding a Divorce Decree), 5755-1995 (“Rabbinical Courts Law (Upholding a Divorce Decree)”)

(Amendment no. 5 from 2004) enables the Court to order the reluctant husband to remain in isolation for an initial period of 14 days (previously 5 days) and for continuous periods thereafter, pursuant to certain limitations.

The Family in Israel: Some Demographic Data

397. As discussed in our previous reports, Israel is a family-oriented society. The Central Bureau of Statistics' data indicates that in 2002, only 3% of Israeli couples (35,000) cohabitated without marriage. Approximately 60% of those cohabitating are single, 25% are divorced, 12% widowed and 3% married (to others).

Marriages

398. There is a high rate of marriages, and nearly every Israeli adult marries at least once - 97% of the men and 95% of the women among the population over 45. The status of married persons is illustrated by the following table:

Table 20 - Persons Marrying, By Age, Previous Marital Status and Religion, 2002

399. In 2002, the average age of first marriages in Israel was 27.3 for Jewish men, 26.4 for Muslim men, 25.0 for Jewish women and 21.7 for Muslim women. It should be noted that since 1970, the average marital age has risen by three years, mostly due to the increase in cohabitation and women's participation in the labor market and in higher education.

400. Recent data provided by the Israeli Police reveals very low numbers of polygamy cases - 10 in 2003 and 15 in 2004.

Divorces

401. Israel's divorce rate has been increasing in recent years, as demonstrated by the following table:

Table 21 – Persons Divorcing, 15+, By Sex and Religion, 2002

Minimum Marital Age

402. Young brides are significantly more common than young grooms, especially in certain sectors of the population such as the Ultra orthodox Jews, Georgians Jews, Muslims, Druze and Bedouins.
403. The Knesset Research and Information Center, in a survey held at the end of June 2004, estimated that hundreds of female - minors annually marry in Israel. The survey claims that the Marital Age Law is seldom enforced and when a petition is filed for an under-age marriage, it is almost always granted, usually explained by the fact that these marriages usually occur in populations that are experiencing changes and are only recently coming to grips with a new social context that has a different approach to public policy norms. In the year 2001, 15 Jewish and 20 Muslim grooms under the age of 17 were registered for marriage, and 24 Jewish and 113 Muslim brides under the age of 16.

404. Usually under-age marriages take place in closed communities, and do not become public knowledge, therefore the likelihood of acquiring evidence of the marriage or proving their very existence, is quite low. Furthermore, violations of this law do not come to the knowledge of the Police or other relevant bodies.
405. There are some specific State programs in towns in the northern part of Israel, aimed at educating the population with regard to the implications of under aged marriages.

Same-Sex Couples

406. Since 2000, the Ministry of the Interior adopted an equivalent policy towards same-sex couples and heterosexual non-marital cohabitants, awarding same-sex foreign partners of Israeli citizens with resident status. As mentioned in Article 9, the Ministry of the Interior is currently in the process of examining and completing a more flexible policy to both same-sex couples and heterosexual non-marital cohabitants to be implemented over a seven-year period. Under the new policy, foreign partners will be entitled to temporary resident status after 12 months of cohabitation and permanent residency after 7 years of cohabitation.
407. Our previous report mentioned the case of legally recognized mutual parenthood for a lesbian couple. Since then, each woman maintains guardian status over the biological children of her partner. However, their petition for joint second-parent adoptions was rejected by the Family Court and the District Court (FAA. 10/99 Jane Doe v. The Attorney General (10.05.01)). The District Court determined that in light of the purpose and language of the Children Adoption Law, same sex couples do not fulfill the provisions or the purpose of the law. The Court ruled that the issue was controversial and, thus, there is need for legislative involvement.

408. In a landmark decision from January 2005, the Supreme Court accepted the appeal of two women, a same-sex couple, to adopt each other's children. The Court ruled that under the Adoption Law, each case should be examined on its own merits and all the relevant circumstances need to be taken into consideration. The Court emphasized that the decision solely concerns this couple and is not a principled one, thus leaving the question of same-sex relationships for another time. The Court recommended that the Knesset amend the law to provide a solution to a real problem, and attempt to bypass ideological controversial problems that the issue presents. (C.A. 10280/01 Yaros-Hakak v. The Attorney General (10.01.05)).
409. The state has recently (June, 2004) informed the Supreme Court that it is willing to provide same-sex couples with equal privileges to heterosexual couples regarding taxation over shared registered accommodation.
410. In November 2004, the Nazareth District Court determined in a precedent setting judgment that the term "man and woman" in the Inheritance Law, 5725-1965, ("Inheritance Law") applies to same-sex spouse. The judgment was based upon the general inclination to broaden the interpretation of the term "spouse", as evidenced in decisions on other legal spheres, and applying it to the Inheritance Law. Here, the applicant and his late partner, both Jewish, lived together as a couple, they jointly managed a household and shared a romantic relationship. (C.A. 3245/03 A.M. v. the Attorney General in the Office of the General Custodian (11.11.04)).

New Reproductive Technology and Surrogacy

411. As discussed in our previous report, the Surrogacy Agreements Law (Approval of Agreement and Status of Newborn Child), 5756-1996 ("Surrogacy Agreements Law (Approval of Agreement and Status of Newborn Child)"), regulates the approval of surrogacy agreements and the status of the unborn children.
412. Recent data (March, 2004) indicates that since the enactment of the law, 210 application for approval of surrogacy agreements were received. 169 were approved, resulting in the birth of 80 children from 62 childbirths (due to the prevalence of multi-fetus pregnancies). Seven other surrogate mothers were pregnant at that date. 15 couples whose agreements had been approved decided not to continue the process and turned to adoption.

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women

Distr.: General
22 July 2005

Original: English

Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women
Thirty-third session
5-22 July 2005

Concluding comments: Israel

1. The Committee considered the third periodic report of Israel (CEDAW/C/ISR/3) at its 685th and 686th meetings, on 6 July 2005.

Introduction by the State party

2. In introducing the report and up-to-date information, the representative indicated that these were the result of a collaborative effort by various government bodies, together with inputs from non-governmental organizations. Equality and the promotion of women's rights were of the utmost importance to the Government and society. The representative emphasized that Israeli women were a vibrant, vocal, integral part of every aspect of society, which they shape and take part in as members of every profession. Drawing attention to progress in many areas, the representative noted remaining gaps still to be addressed. Since the submission of the previous report, concerted efforts had been made, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, to promote equality between men and women, Jews and non-Jews of all ethnic and religious backgrounds alike. The representative emphasized that Israeli women awaited the day when they and Palestinian women, especially under the new Palestinian leadership, will no longer know the grief of loss but only the joy of equality, building and progress.

3. Efforts to eliminate discrimination against women in the legislative arena had been wide-ranging. Recent laws complemented one another, representing a new approach of "women's legislation". These laws covered a variety of issues including women's equal rights, sexual harassment, stalking, governmental responsibility for gender equality, the rights of women victims and prevention of discrimination in the private sector. They provided a broad vision of social change and complete transformation of gender power and relations. Measures had also been taken to guarantee implementation.

4. The Government had taken steps, including affirmative action, to eliminate discrimination against women, for example in supporting the integration of single mothers into the labour market. The courts continued to play a crucial role in promoting women's rights. Recent decisions approved governmental affirmative action measures in funding women's sports activities; secured women's equal retirement rights and granted a battered wife punitive damages for abuse suffered.

5. The representative stressed that combined efforts were necessary to eliminate discrimination against women as demonstrated through action taken by the legislative, judicial and executive branches, in cooperation with civil society, to combat trafficking in women for sexual exploitation. These included the amendment of the Penal Code to include a prohibition against trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution, followed by the establishment of a Parliamentary Investigative Committee on Trafficking in Persons. That Committee interacted with victims and exercised oversight function over government agencies. Its work had resulted in further legislative progress, including mandatory minimum imprisonment for violations of the law and expansion of victims' rights. Additionally, an Intra-ministerial Committee had been established to recommend measures, which have been adopted and implemented, to combat trafficking more effectively. Law enforcement and prosecution of traffickers had been enhanced, and courts had been issuing more severe sentences and interpreted the law in accordance with the spirit of relevant international treaties. Operational guidelines issued by the Attorney General on combating trafficking had been implemented. Shelters provided medical and psychosocial treatment and free legal aid to trafficking victims. Cooperative arrangements were in place, including with the International Organization for Migration and non-governmental organizations, to arrange for victims' safe return to countries of origin and to initiate rehabilitation processes.

6. Turning to measures taken in response to some of the Committee's concerns expressed in its previous concluding comments, the representative noted the growing number of women in prestigious positions within the Israel Defense Forces and the establishment, in 1998, of the statutory Authority for the Advancement of Women. The Knesset Committee on the Status of Women had also played a pivotal role in women's issues. Women's representation in political life had progressed with 18 members, or 15 per cent, in the Knesset — the highest rate ever, 3 ministers, 4 deputy ministers, and 5 director-generals of Ministries.

7. Addressing another of the Committee's concerns, the representative drew attention to the substantial rise in Bedouin students taking matriculation exams and receiving baccalaureates. More Bedouin women were studying for Bachelor's degrees than men. Steps were being taken to increase the number of Bedouin women admitted to the faculty of medicine, while the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sports granted scholarships to Bedouin students and had taken steps to increase attendance and prevent dropouts.

8. In conclusion, the representative stressed that the delegation, consisting of high-ranking officials from the relevant ministries, was prepared to engage in a constructive and fruitful dialogue with the Committee on the implementation of the Convention.

Concluding comments of the Committee

Introduction

9. The Committee expresses its appreciation to the State party for its third periodic report, which is in compliance with the Committee's guidelines for the preparation of the periodic reports. It commends the State party for the written replies to the list of issues and questions raised by the pre-session working group and for the oral presentation.

10. The Committee commends the State party for its delegation, made up of representatives of different ministries with responsibility for several areas of the Convention.

11. The Committee notes that Israel continues to retain its reservations to articles 7 (b) and 16 of the Convention.

Positive aspects

12. The Committee notes with appreciation the significant law reform undertaken since the consideration of its combined initial and second reports (CEDAW/C/ISR/1-2) in 1997, aimed at the promotion of gender equality and elimination of discrimination against women and at achieving compliance with the obligations under the Convention, including amendments to the Women's Equal Rights Law, the Employment of Women Law (Amendment 19), the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law and the Civil Service Law (Appointments) and enactment of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law (1998), the Victims of Offences Rights Law (2001), the Prevention of Stalking Law (2001) and the Local Councils Law (Adviser on the Status of Women) (2000).

13. The Committee welcomes the establishment of the Authority for the Advancement of Women in 1998.

Principal areas of concern and recommendations

14. The Committee notes the State party's obligation for the systematic and continuing implementation of all the provisions of the Convention. At the same time, it is the Committee's view that the concerns and recommendations identified in the present concluding comments require the State party's priority attention between now and the submission of the next periodic report. Consequently, the Committee calls upon the State party to focus on those areas in its implementation activities and to report on action taken and results achieved in its next periodic report. It calls on the State party to submit the present concluding comments to all relevant ministries and to the Knesset so as to ensure their full implementation.

15. The Committee is concerned that the State party has not taken adequate steps to implement the recommendations in regard to some concerns raised in its previous concluding comments adopted in 1997 (A/52/38/Rev.1). In particular, the Committee finds that its concerns reflected in paragraphs 170, 171 and 173 have been insufficiently addressed.

16. The Committee reiterates these concerns and recommendations and urges the State party to proceed without delay with their implementation.

17. The Committee is concerned that the right to equality between women and men and the prohibition of both direct and indirect discrimination against women has not been reflected in the Constitution or in a basic law.

18. The Committee recommends that a definition of discrimination in line with article 1 of the Convention, as well as provisions on the equal rights of women in line with article 2 (a) of the Convention, be included in the new Constitution that is in the process of being drafted, or in a basic law.

19. The Committee is concerned that only some provisions of the Convention have been incorporated into the domestic legal order. The Committee is also concerned about the lack of mechanisms to monitor and ensure the compatibility of domestic laws with the State party's obligations under the Convention.

20. The Committee urges the State party to fully incorporate the provisions of the Convention into its legal order and regularly assess the compatibility of its domestic laws with its obligations under the Convention. The Committee recommends that the State party implement training and awareness-raising programmes to familiarize judges, prosecutors and other members of the legal profession with the provisions of the Convention.

21. The Committee is aware that the persistence of conflict and violence hinders the full implementation of the Convention and notes that recently, steps have been taken towards its resolution. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the draft law on women in peacemaking, which will require 25 per cent participation of women in the peacemaking process.

22. The Committee encourages the State party to continue its efforts towards conflict resolution and to fully involve all women concerned in all stages of the peace process.

23. The Committee regrets the State party's position that the Convention does not apply beyond its own territory and, for that reason, the State party refuses to report on the status of implementation of the Convention in the Occupied Territories, although the delegation acknowledged that the State party had certain responsibilities. The Committee further regrets that the delegation did not respond to questions by the Committee concerning the situation of women in the Occupied Territories. The Committee notes that the State party's view that the Convention is not applicable in the Occupied Territories is contrary to the views of the Committee and of other treaty bodies, including the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Committee against Torture and also of the International Court of Justice, which have all noted that obligations under international human rights conventions as well as humanitarian law apply to all persons brought under the jurisdiction or effective control of a State party and have stressed the applicability of the State party's obligations under international human rights conventions to the Occupied Territories.

24. The Committee urges the State party to reconsider its position and to give full effect to the implementation of its obligations under the Convention in regard to all persons under its jurisdiction, including women in the Occupied Territories, and to provide in its next periodic report detailed information on the enjoyment by all women, including if still relevant, women living in the Occupied Territories, of their rights under the Convention.

25. The Committee remains concerned that the State party continues to retain its reservations to articles 7 (b) and 16 of the Convention. The Committee is particularly concerned at the State party's statement that such reservations are "unavoidable at this point in time" and its position that laws based on religious values cannot be reformed.

26. The Committee urges the State party to consider withdrawing its reservations to articles 7 (b) and 16, which are contrary to the object and purpose of the Convention.

27. While welcoming the establishment of the Authority for the Advancement of Women as an important measure towards strengthening the national mechanism for the advancement of women, the Committee is concerned that the Authority may not have sufficient power, visibility, and human and financial resources for the effective promotion of the advancement of women and gender equality.

28. The Committee calls on the State party to strengthen the Authority for the Advancement of Women. In particular, it calls on the State party to ensure that the Authority is provided with the power, location within the executive branch of Government and necessary human and financial resources so as to enable it to carry out effectively the promotion of the advancement of women and gender equality throughout all sectors of Government.

29. While appreciating the State party's efforts to address the issue of trafficking in women and girls, including ratification of the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime in 2000 and its Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, in 2001, the establishment of a Parliamentary Investigative Committee on trafficking of women and an amendment to the Penal Law prohibiting trafficking, the Committee is concerned that domestic legislation has not been brought into conformity with international obligations. While noting that a bill to broaden the definition of trafficking is under preparation, the Committee is concerned that the current definition of trafficking in the Penal Law addresses trafficking only for prostitution and bondage and does not cover trafficking for other forms of exploitation. The Committee also expresses concern about the lack of a comprehensive plan to prevent and eliminate trafficking in women and to protect victims, as well as the lack of systematic data collection on this phenomenon.

30. The Committee urges the State party to intensify its efforts to combat all forms of trafficking in women and girls, including by expanding the provisions in the Penal Code to bring it into line with the definition contained in the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children. The Committee also urges the State party to increase its efforts at international, regional and bilateral cooperation with countries of origin and transit so as to address more effectively the causes of trafficking, and improve prevention of trafficking through information exchange. The Committee urges the State party to continue to collect and analyse data from the police and international sources, prosecute and punish traffickers, and ensure the protection of the human rights of trafficked women and girls. The Committee further calls on the State party to take all appropriate measures to suppress exploitation of prostitution of women, including discouraging the male demand for prostitution. The Committee calls on the State party to ensure that trafficked women and girls have adequate support to be in a position to provide testimony against their traffickers.

31. While noting the increase in the number of women in the Knesset, the Committee remains concerned about the low level of representation of women in decision-making positions in local authorities. It is also concerned that the number of women in high-level positions in the civil service and foreign service remains low. The Committee is further concerned about the low level of representation of Israeli Arab women in these areas.

32. The Committee encourages the State party to take sustained measures, including temporary special measures in accordance with article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention and the Committee's general recommendation 25, and to establish concrete goals and timetables so as to accelerate the increase in the representation of women, including Israeli Arab women, in elected and appointed bodies in all areas of public life.

33. The Committee is concerned about the State party's temporary suspension order of May 2002, enacted into law as the Nationality and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) of 31 July 2003, which suspends the possibility, subject to limited and subjective exceptions, of family reunification, especially in cases of marriages between an Israeli citizen and a person residing in the Occupied Territories. The Committee notes with concern that the suspension order, which has currently been extended through August 2005, has already adversely affected the marriages and family life of Israeli Arab women citizens and Palestinian women from the Occupied Territories.

34. The Committee calls on the State party to balance its security interests with the human rights of persons affected by such policies, and to reconsider them with a view to facilitating family reunification of all citizens and permanent residents. It calls on the State party to bring the Nationality and Entry into Israel law (Temporary Order) of 31 July 2003 into line with articles 9 and 16 of the Convention. It requests the State party to provide, in its next periodic report, detailed statistical information and analysis of the short- and long-term impact of this Order on affected women.

35. While appreciating the progress made in the fields of women's education and health, the Committee is concerned that Israeli Arab women remain in a vulnerable and marginalized situation, especially in regard to education and health. While efforts have been made to eliminate gender stereotypes from textbooks, the Committee is concerned that these persist in the Arab education system.

36. The Committee recommends that the State party take urgent measures to reduce the drop-out rates of Israeli Arab girls and increase the number of Israeli Arab women at institutions of higher education, including temporary special measures in accordance with article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention and the Committee's general recommendation 25. The Committee also urges the State party to review and revise textbooks in the Arab education system in order to eradicate gender stereotypes. The Committee recommends that the State party allocate adequate resources to improve the status of Israeli Arab women's health, in particular with regard to infant mortality, and to provide in its next periodic report a comprehensive picture of the situation of Israeli Arab women.

37. The Committee is concerned about the number of incidents at Israeli checkpoints which have a negative impact on the rights of Palestinian women, including the right of access to health-care services for pregnant women.

38. The Committee calls upon the State party to ensure that the Israeli authorities at the checkpoints are instructed to ensure the access to health-care services for pregnant women, while protecting the security of Israel.

39. The Committee is concerned that Bedouin women living in the Negev desert remain in a vulnerable and marginalized situation, especially in regard to education, employment and health. The Committee is especially concerned with the situation of Bedouin women who live in unrecognized villages with poor housing conditions and limited or no access to water, electricity and sanitation.

40. The Committee requests the State party to take effective measures to eliminate discrimination against Bedouin women and to enhance respect for their human rights through effective and proactive measures, including temporary special measures in accordance with article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention and the Committee's general recommendation 25 in the fields of education, employment and health. The Committee calls upon the State party to provide, in its next periodic report, a comprehensive picture of the situation of Bedouin women and girls in regard to their educational opportunities and achievements, and access to employment and health-care services, and to provide an assessment of the impact of policies in those areas that directly affect them.

41. The Committee is concerned by the State party's assertion that it is not in a position to implement the law prohibiting polygamy and enforce the minimum age of marriage due to respect for the privacy rights of persons engaging in such practices. The Committee is further concerned that petitions for under-age marriage of girls are regularly granted.

42. The Committee urges the State party to take active measures to enforce the prohibition of polygamy and adherence to the minimum age of marriage. The Committee recommends that the State party take comprehensive and effective measures, including public awareness-raising campaigns, aimed at eliminating the practices of polygamy and early-age marriage.

43. The Committee encourages the State party to ratify the Optional Protocol to the Convention and to accept, as soon as possible, the amendment to article 20, paragraph 1, of the Convention concerning the meeting time of the Committee.

44. The Committee urges the State party to utilize fully in its implementation of its obligations under the Convention, the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, which reinforce the provisions of the Convention, and requests the State party to include information thereon in its next periodic report.

45. The Committee also emphasizes that a full and effective implementation of the Convention is indispensable for achieving the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). It calls for the integration of a gender perspective and the explicit reflection of the provisions of the Convention in all efforts aimed at the achievement of the MDGs and requests the State party to include information thereon in its next periodic report.

46. The Committee notes that States' adherence to the seven major international human rights instruments¹ enhances the enjoyment by women of their human rights and fundamental freedoms in all aspects of life. Therefore, the Committee encourages the Government of Israel to consider ratifying the treaty to which it is not yet a party, namely, the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families.

47. The Committee requests the wide dissemination of the present concluding comments in order to make all people, including government officials, politicians, parliamentarians and women's and human rights organizations, aware of the steps that have been taken to ensure de jure and de facto equality for women and the future steps required in that regard. It also requests the State party to continue to disseminate widely, in particular to women's and human rights organizations, the Convention and its Optional Protocol, the Committee's general recommendations and the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, as well as the outcome of the twenty-third special session of the General Assembly, entitled "Women 2000: gender equality, development and peace for the twenty-first century".

48. The Committee requests the State party to respond to the concerns expressed in the present concluding comments in its next periodic report submitted under article 18 of the Convention, which is due in November 2008.

Introduction

1. The Government of Israel is pleased to submit its Fifth Periodic Report Concerning the Implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women (hereinafter: “the Convention” or “CEDAW”). This report describes the developments that took place since the submission of the Fourth Report on June 2, 2005 (UN Document - CEDAW C/ISR/4), taking into account the Concluding Comments adopted by the CEDAW Committee on July 22, 2005 (UN Document - CEDAW/C/ISR/3/CO). In accordance with the reporting guidelines, this report builds upon Israel’s previous reports. Accordingly, information and explanations that are included in previous reports from the Government of Israel are not repeated in this report, except when necessary.
2. All Israeli Government Ministries and institutions relevant to this report were requested to supply data and information concerning their areas of operation. Israeli Non-Governmental Organizations (“NGOs”) were also invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of this report, both through direct application and a general invitation to submit remarks posted on the Ministry of Justice web site. Their contributions were given substantial consideration.
3. This report was compiled by the Human Rights and Foreign Relations Department at the Ministry of Justice, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and other governmental bodies.
4. The Government of Israel has been conscious and aware of the issue of gender equality from its infancy. The Equal Rights for Women Law 5711- 1951 (the “Equal Rights for Women Law”) was enacted only three years after the State was founded, and is a testimony to the emphasis given to gender-related issues.
5. As will be demonstrated throughout this report, the level of implementation of CEDAW in Israel continues to improve. The Knesset continues to advance legislation regarding women’s rights, and in accordance with such legislation, society as a whole is progressing at an impressive rate. There are many legislative developments and court decisions that further illustrate Israel’s willingness and aspiration to fully implement the provisions set in CEDAW in good faith.

Legislative Measures

6. The main legislation enacted since the submission of Israel’s previous report concerning the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women is:
7. On April 10, 2008, the Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Workplaces to Women’s Needs Law 5768 -2008 (the “Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Workplaces to Women’s Needs Law”) was enacted by the Israeli Knesset. The purpose of this law is to generate a change in the business culture in Israel and promote public awareness of women rights in order to encourage employers to advance and integrate women in the workplace. Under this law, substantial monetary incentives and grants will be provided annually by the Minister of Industry Trade and Labor (ITL hereinafter) to employers in the private sector who endeavor to integrate and promote women in their business, and who initiate programs to that end. Such grants will also be given to employers who modify their workplace and work conditions to the needs of women and parents. The employers are required to show that they actually integrated women into their businesses, promoted women and instituted programs to adapt the work environment to women.

8. On November 20, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments) 5676–2007 (the “Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments)”), which imposes a duty to systematically examine the gender implications of any primary and secondary legislation before it is enacted by the Knesset. The Law’s aim is to expose any hidden inequalities between men and women that might be present in different bills, in order to advance the status of equality between men and women. According to this law, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women will submit an opinion to the relevant Knesset committee concerning the gender implications of any bill or secondary legislation when it is brought for consideration or approval. These opinions will allow Knesset members participating in committee hearings to become acquainted with any possible gender implications inherent in legislation. In addition, the submission of these opinions will be anchored in the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law 5758-1998, (the “Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law”) as one of the official functions of the Authority.
9. The Statistics Ordinance [New Version] 5372-1972 was amended in 2008. Section 4(d) of the Ordinance requires that in appointing the Public Council for Statistics, appropriate expression shall be given to the representation of both genders, to the extent that circumstances permit. Furthermore, Section 7A requires that the collection and processing of statistics relating to individuals, and the publication of the results by the Bureau in accordance with Section 7, shall include statistics by gender unless the National Statistician determines that there are circumstances regarding a specific matter that justify deviation from the general rule.
10. The National Statistician may determine that the collection and processing of statistics and the publication of the results shall include statistics by gender, even if they do not pertain to matters that have gender related implications. The Bureau shall publish, at least once a year, results deriving from the collection and processing of statistics that include statistics by gender. The National Statistician shall appoint, following consultation with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, as defined in the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law, an employee who shall be responsible for the implementation of this section, including preparation of programs for the collection and processing of statistics, the development of statistical classifications and cooperation with state agencies in matters relating to the collection and processing of statistics by gender. The amendment entered into force on January 1st, 2009.
11. An additional significant law enacted is the Public Protection from Sex Offenders Law 5766-2006, (the “Public Protection from Sex Offenders Law”), which entered into force on October 1, 2006. The objectives of this law are to protect the general public from sex offenders and prevent sex offenders from repeating their crimes. According to this law, certain restrictions may be imposed upon sex offenders following the completion of their sentence, upon their return to life in the community. This law, through several mechanisms, seeks to strike a balance between the restrictions that may limit sex offenders' freedom, and the level of threat they pose toward the general public.

Judicial Measures

12. The main judicial measures taken since Israel's previous report concerning the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women are:
13. On March 26, 2008, the National Labor Court ruled in the sexual harassment case in which an executive in a High Tech company had sexual intercourse with an employee that worked under his authority. The relationship between the two lasted nearly one year and was not reported to the company's director, contrary to internal directives. During the period of relationship, both of them were undergoing marital crises, and the executive was even aware that the employee took anti-depression pills. The relationship ended on the initiative of the executive, and only later, did the employee find courage to complain to the person in charge of sexual harassment complaints in the company.

The Court found that the relationship in fact constituted exploitation of authority relations, and therefore constituted sexual harassment. The Court further declared that in this kind of relationship, expressing a lack of consent is not a requisite to determine the relationship as sexual harassment. Furthermore, in order for the superior to prove that he did not exploit the authority relations, he needs to take affirmative steps, including a notification to his superiors about the relationship and requesting to transfer to a different position where he will no longer be in direct charge of the employee with whom he was involved. Since these steps were not taken in this case, the Court concluded that the relationship constituted sexual harassment via exploitation of authority relations, and ordered the compensation of the employee in the amount of 35,000 NIS ($8,750) (La.A. 274/06 Anonymous v. Anonymous (26.3.2008)).

14. On April 3, 2008, the Tel Aviv District Court determined that expenses paid for childcare services such as nursery and after-school programs are expenses made for the purpose of creating an income, and therefore can be deducted from the taxable income of a mother each tax year (I.T.A. (Tel-Aviv) 1213/04 Vered Peri v. The Income Tax Assessor of the Dan Agglomeration (03.04.2008)). The Court determined that such costs are essential in allowing the integration of mothers of young children into the labor market.
15. On July 21, 2008, the Jerusalem Family Matters Court compensated a woman in the amount of 550,000 NIS ($137,500) due to her husband's lack of compliance to the order of the Rabbinical Court, stipulating the need for a divorce between the couple (F.M.C. (Jerusalem) 6743/02 K. v. K. (21.6.08)). The woman filed for divorce at the Rabbinical Court in 1998, and in 2006 that court ordered the husband to grant a divorce to his wife. The Family Matters Court determined that due to the lingering of the divorce process, the husband inflicted extensive emotional suffering upon his wife, even more so after his refusal to comply with the order of the Rabbinical Court.
16. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court handed down a landmark decision concerning the rights of same-sex couples. The Court held that a wedding certificate from a foreign country in which same-sex marriages are recognized could allow the couple to be registered as married by the Ministry of the Interior in Israel. The case came about because five gay couples that held wedding ceremonies abroad petitioned to the Supreme Court following the Ministry of the Interior's refusal to register them as married (H.C.J. 3045/05 Ben-Ari v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J. 3046/05 Bar-Lev v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J. 10218/05 Herland v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J. 10468/05 Lord v. The Ministry of the Interior and H.C.J. 10597/05 Remez v. The Ministry of the Interior).

Administrative Measures

17. Several major additional measures taken by the Government concerning the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women are:
18. In 2008, the Department for Advancement and Integration of Women within the Civil Service continued its activities regarding affirmative action for women. Inter alia, on November 23, 2008, towards the International Day for the Fight against Violence towards Women, the Department issued a circular (pamphlet) in which the supervisors were required to hold activities providing education on various forms of violence against women. The circular further required to notify Civil Service employees on the establishment of an exceptional committee that provides financial assistance for women in shelters for battered women. Also during 2008, the Department published several academic training programs and other courses aimed at raising awareness for the advancement of the status of women in Israel. The Department emphasized that women and gender studies were recognized as favored courses of study in all Government Ministries and auxiliary units.
19. As detailed in Israel's previous report, between the years 2003 and 2005, the Ministry of ITL operated a program intended for single parents receiving allowances or alimony payments from the National Insurance Institute (NII) in order to integrate them into the work force. The program was launched as a pilot and was then incorporated into the regular long term program of the Ministry. The program, which continues to be operated, is aimed to ease the implications of three main obstacles single parents face: the care of children at the ages of 0-11, their lack of advanced education, experience and employment, and the limitations on physical mobility due to child care concerns. In order to deal with care for young children, the program subsidizes the payment for afternoon programs and day-care centers. Financial assistance is also given for care of children during non-conventional hours and during the summer vacation.

In order to assist in professional training, the program operates a voucher system for courses recognized by the Manpower Training and Development Unit in the Ministry of ITL. In August 2008, the Manpower Training and Development Unit began to make professional consultants available to help identify appropriate training courses and job placement services according to the individual needs and qualifications of the participants in the program. During 2008-09, a program will be launched to encourage single parents participating in the program who have entrepreneurship skills to establish small businesses. An additional pilot program established by the Ministry of ITL was launched on September 1, 2008, in which centers were set up to teach single parents receiving allowances or alimony, skills that will enable them to enter or re-enter the job market. Following the two month course, the participants will be directed to specific training courses or jobs to suit their individual qualifications.

The Current Situation

20. The following data reflects the current situation of women in Israel and the advancements achieved in the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.
21. The Judiciary is one of the professional arenas in which women have closed the gap as will be illustrated in the following figures.
22. The number of female judges continues to climb in conjunction with the rising number of judges in general. In August 2008, there were 291 female judges out of a total of 584 judges, (49.8% of the judiciary in Israel). The number of female justices on the Supreme Court has slightly decreased to five out of 13 (38.5%), however, it should be mentioned that the current President of the Supreme Court is a woman, Justice Dorit Beinisch. Women continue to compose the majority of professional labor judges (67.3% of the judges), nearly half of the District Courts judges (44%), more than half of the Magistrate Courts Judges (50.5%) and more than half of the registrars (58.5%). Women have also increased their role as public representatives in the Labor Courts (constituting 18.9%) representing employees and employers' unions side by side with professional judges.
23. The Legal Profession - As detailed in Israel's previous report, in the public sector, women remain a majority of the legal professionals. As of June 2008, 1,898 women were employed by the Ministry of Justice (69.4%). 149 of the 225 legal advisors in the Ministry of Justice were women (66.2%), and a similar percentage of women were working in the Offices of the State Attorney and the Attorney General (68%, 501 women compared to 235 men), and the Public Defender's Office (69.2%, 54 women compared to 24 men). There were also 305 female legal interns (64.6%), as compared to 167 male legal interns, and 22 women in the senior judge equivalent rank (64.7%), as compared to only 12 men.
24. On March 11, 2007, the Government resolved to obligate Ministers to appoint women to directorates of Government Corporations until they achieve a 50% representation of women within two years from the date of the Government Resolution (Government Resolution No. 1362). Consequently, female representation on boards of government corporations has increased, and on February 2008, 38.5% of all directors in Governmental Corporations were women (compared to 37% in the previous report and to 33.5% in February 2007).
25. Higher Education - In 2007, women constituted a majority among all students in higher education institutions in Israel, comprising 55.1% of the student population. Although there was a minor decline in first and second degrees earned by women in 2007, women still represented the lion's share of students. Women comprised 54.6%, 57.1% and 53% in attaining first, second and third degrees, respectively. Women represented the majority in many disciplines such as Humanities and Education Studies (70.3%), Social Studies (65.2%), Medicine (53.3%) and Biological Sciences (61.6%).
26. Ministry of Health - As of 2007, women still composed a majority among all ranks in the Ministry of Health. Among the top three ranks, women hold a significant majority. Women represent 10 out of 15 positions in the top rank, 33 out of 51 in the second rank and 56 out of 111 in the third rank.

Article 1 - Definition of Discrimination against Women

The Constitutional Level

27. As explained in Israel's previous report, although the right to equality is not explicitly included in the two Basic Laws enacted in 1992 and 1994 (Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (the "Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty") and Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation (the "Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation")), it is encompassed within the basic right to human dignity. This interpretation was repeatedly upheld by the Supreme Court (H.C.J. 6845/00 Eitana Niv v. the Klalit Sick Fund (09.10.02)), as well as by many jurists in Israel, led by the former President of the Supreme Court, Justice Aharon Barak.
28. The Constitution, Law and Justice Committee of the Knesset is in the process of preparing a consensual-based constitution, and since the submission of Israel's previous report, has held more than 60 sessions on drafting its text. Among the topics discussed are: freedom of occupation, freedom of movement, freedom of association, freedom of assembly and demonstration, welfare rights, and the right of thought, opinion and expression.

Equal Rights Legislation

29. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, several significant developments took place on the legislative level with regard to women's representation in public bodies.
30. The Equal Rights for Women Law was amended in 2005. The fourth Amendment to the Law (July 20, 2005), determined that any task force appointed by the Government for the creation of foreign and/or interior national policies, including negotiation teams working toward a peace agreement, must include an appropriate number of women. In order to effectively implement and enforce the provision, the appointing body must report the composition of the appointed body to the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, which will in turn examine the details. Ultimately, such information will be compiled in an annual report concerning the adequate representation of women in national policy task forces, to be submitted to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women. Current data indicate that 37% of all representatives in Governmental Committees and work-teams are women.
31. The Equal Rights for Women Law was amended again in 2008, adding two important sections relating to the collection and processing of information: Section 3A says that any a person or entity that requires a person to note, in a form or other document, the names of his or her parents, should require the names of both parents, as long as the person has that knowledge. Section 6C3 requires a public body that regularly collects and processes information regarding individuals, and that publishes that information for statistical purposes, shall include statistics relating to gender in its report. The relevant Minister or person in charge may determine that certain circumstances justify said public body not to publish statistical information on gender. The person in charge may determine that the collection and processing of statistics and the publication of the results shall include statistics by gender, even if the information does not pertain to individuals on matters relating to gender. The Amendment entered into force on January 1st, 2009.

32. In 2005, the Local Municipalities' Ordinance was amended, so that proper representation would be granted for both genders in corporations, associations and cooperative associations of local municipalities.
33. In July 2007, Amendment No. 11 to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5748-1988 (the "Equal Employment Opportunities Law") added fertility treatments and In Vitro Fertilization treatments as additional two grounds of prohibited discrimination in the workplace, both as a job applicant and as an employee.
34. Further elaboration concerning these laws and others will be provided throughout this report.

35. Over the years, the judiciary has contributed significantly to the development of the right to equality in general, and to gender equality in particular. Israeli courts continue to prohibit discrimination of any sort, which includes gender discrimination. In the wording of the Tel Aviv Labor Court in La.A. 8704/06 Nadav Fitusi v. N&B Bogin Sports Center Ltd, "Any discrimination based on gender is a negative social phenomenon that is to be uprooted completely. The prohibition on discrimination derives not only from the provisions of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, but also from the general principle of equality which is part of our legal system and anchored in Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity."

In Nadav Fitusi v. N&B Bogin Sports Center Ltd, the plaintiff was employed by the respondent as a gym instructor and was dismissed from work following the respondent's desire to replace him with a female instructor. There was no disagreement among the parties that the dismissal was due solely to the plaintiff's gender. The Court held that in order to prove discrimination, the worker needs only to convince the court that such prohibited consideration was actually a factor for the employer's decision, even if it was not the main reason. Based on Section 10 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Court ordered the respondent to pay 30,000 NIS ($7,500) compensation to the plaintiff, considering the specific circumstances of the case.

The Elimination of Discrimination in the Private Sphere

36. As mentioned earlier, on April 10, 2008, the Knesset enacted the Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Workplaces to Women's Needs Law. The purpose of the Law is to generate change in the business culture in Israel and promote public awareness in order to encourage employers to advance and integrate women into the workplace and, inter alia, adjust the workplace to the needs of women and parents. According to the Law, monetary incentives will be granted by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Labor to employers in the private sector who endeavor to integrate and promote women in their business, as well as employers who modify the workplace and work conditions to the needs of women and parents.
37. The Law requires the Minister of ITL to establish a Public Council for the Integration and Advancement of Women in the Workplace, which will have an advisory function to the Minister on the issue of women in the workplace, including measures to implement the provisions of the Law. The Public Council is made up of 11 members including representatives of Government Ministries, experts in gender studies, representatives of women's NGOs, representatives of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status Women, representatives of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission and representatives of trade unions and employers' associations. A retired female judge will head the Public Council.

38. The Minister of ITL is required to submit an annual report on the implementation of the Law to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women and to the Knesset Committee on Labor, Welfare and Health.
39. This Law has the potential of serving as an incentive to employ more women, promote women to senior positions and to modify the work conditions to the unique needs of women, thus increasing women's economic independence.

Article 2 - Obligations to Eliminate Discrimination

Legal Provisions

Basic Laws

40. The Israeli legal system is multilayered and consists of several legislative instruments in hierarchal order. One of the fundamental legislative avenues for entrenching the rule of law and human rights are the Basic Laws. The Israeli Basic Laws, read together, comprise a "constitution-in-the-making." The Basic Laws deal with topics such as the structure of government and focus on human rights issues. Basic Laws enjoy a unique status and are usually superior to other laws.
41. As detailed above, the Israeli Constitution, Law and Justice Committee in the Knesset is in the process of preparing a consensual-based constitution.

Ordinary Laws

42. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, Israel has enacted several pieces of legislation aimed at eliminating discrimination against women. Among the most important laws recently enacted is the 2007 Amendment No. 11 to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. This law prohibits discrimination against an employee during acceptance for employment, in working conditions and on dismissal for various reasons, including pregnancy or parenthood. Amendment No. 11 added provisions to the Law that prohibit discrimination due to parenthood to include situations such as fertility treatment and In Vitro Fertilization treatments.

Legal Recourse Available for the Pursuit of Women's Rights

The Public Complaints Commissioner and State Comptroller

43. As stated in Israel's previous report, the Public Complaints Commissioner remains responsible for handling complaints and grievances from the public, including complaints from women. According to the Commissioner's records, between the years 2005 and 2007 the Commissioner received a total of 28,731 complaints. Of the 28,731 complaints, 211 of them concerned women's issues in matters such as social benefits, including maternity grant and birth allowances, as well as marriage registration and sexual harassment complaints. Of these 211 complaints concerning women's issues, 135 were deemed admissible and were examined through the relevant channels, and 25 of them were found to be justified complaints.

44. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, the State Comptroller, in his yearly report for 2006, has addressed several related issues. One such issue is Female service in the Israeli Defense Force (IDF), allowing women to make the best of their military service, in which the Comptroller found that the IDF took significant steps to amend faults he found in his 2001 inspection. The State Comptroller found that proper procedures were implemented for opening military professions for women. Also, physiological research was carried out in order to examine women's capabilities to serve in technological and combat positions, and women were integrated according to these researches.
45. Also in his 2006 report, the State Comptroller addressed the issue of Handling of sexual harassment complaints by the IDF. The State Comptroller opined that in a large number of cases, the handling of sexual harassment complaints by the Investigative Military Police, IDF Advocate General's office and Military Courts was taking longer than the 45 days set by the Military Police as the proper amount of time to handle these cases. The State Comptroller indicated additional flaws including cases that were heard by officers who were unauthorized to reside in sexual harassment cases, some flaws regarding judicial procedure etc.

Other Governmental Bodies

46. Additional legal resources are available throughout the Israeli judicial system to help women advance their case for equality and fight discrimination. In addition, governmental bodies such as the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor's Division for Equal Employment Opportunities, the Legal Aid Department in the Ministry of Justice, the Discipline Superintendent in the Civil Service, and the Department for the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Civil Service can also provide adequate remedies, within their spheres of competence and responsibility, such as disciplinary measures, etc.

Governmental Mechanisms and Measures Established to Promote the Status of Women

Investigative and Study Initiatives by the Government

47. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in Israel conducted several surveys regarding women in Israel. These surveys examined issues regarding prostitution in Israel, public views on violence toward women, and specifically violence toward Arab women and related stereotypes. The surveys are conducted, inter alia, to examine public views so that the Authority can be better prepared to handle such issues, and aim its efforts toward prevention and raising public awareness in the most needed parts of society.

The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in Israel

48. Since Israel's previous report, the Authority has taken several steps to achieve advancement of women's rights, including:
- 48.1. In 2008, the Authority began production and distribution of a training kit designed for employers and workplaces, which include explanations regarding sexual harassment, statistical data and relevant legislation. The kit was designed to raise awareness for this important issue and fight sexual harassment.
 - 48.2. In October 2007, the Authority, in conjunction with the Enforcement and Regulatory Administration within the Ministry of ITL launched an enforcement and awareness promotion campaign. During the campaign, model codes of practice were distributed in work places throughout the country, data on the implementation of the provisions of the relevant laws were collected and inspections were performed in 163 workplaces, in which 15,000 workers are employed altogether.
 - 48.3. The Authority attaches great importance to making data related to women's rights more accessible. To that end, in March 2008, in honor of International Women's Day, the Authority launched its new web site, which includes information on the varied activities taking place in Israel relating to the promotion of the status of women by both private and public institutions. The web site also allows the Authority to present data and information and implement the principle of data transparency.
 - 48.4. In March 2008, the Authority published the booklet, "Women – Institutions and Organizations in Israel", which provides detailed information on hundreds of organizations operating in Israel in the various fields relating to women's status in society. The booklet is distributed nationally free of charge.
 - 48.5. The Authority is offering courses aimed at training and providing professional guidance to advisors on women's status, holding annual meetings for graduates of these courses, conducting professional tours among the advisors, distribution of updated professional information and holding regular conferences and seminars for residing advisors.
 - 48.6. Promoting issues relating to women's health and well-being in all sectors of society through periodic conferences and seminars, and providing tools to assist local advisors on the status of women in activating local projects on women's health.
 - 48.7. The Authority devotes special efforts and resources to the advancement of Arab women such as mapping women's associations, working together with steering committees on all relevant factors and conducting surveys and conferences for women and policymakers regarding employment, education, health and violence, as related to Arab women.
 - 48.8. The Authority, together with the Authority's relevant steering committee, established a work plan for promoting the status of Bedouin women in southern Israel on issues pertaining to entrepreneurship, raising awareness to the issue of women's health, empowerment courses and prevention of family violence.

- 48.9. The Authority conducts a range of activities aimed at the financial empowerment of women in all aspects of life. This includes promotion of women's entrepreneurship under the guidance of a special women's entrepreneurship think tank.
49. The Authority also receives regular complaints from the public following their various publications, triggering women to approach them with complaints. As the Authority has no individual legal counseling, it refers the complainants to appropriate venues, such as the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, the Ministry of Justice, shelters, etc.

50. The Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women continued its activities toward the advancement of the status of women. The current committee is headed by a woman, MK Lia Shem-tov, and consists of 15 members, eight women and seven men, from a wide range of political parties.
51. Recent legislation enacted with the support of the Committee include, inter alia, Amendments No. 33-41 of 2007 and amendments 42-44 of 2008 to the Women's Employment Law 5714-1954 (the "Women's Employment Law"); Amendment No. 11 of 2007 to the Equal Employment Opportunities law, regarding prohibition of discrimination due to parenthood including fertility treatment or IVF; Amendment No. 4 of 2007 to the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law 5758-1998 (the "Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law"), which expands the exemption to apply to minors; Amendment No. 9 of 2007 to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law 5751-1991 (the "Prevention of Violence in the Family Law") regarding protection order against a minor and Amendment No. 11 of 2008 to the Law regarding the requirement for a hearing before dismissal of a request for a protection order and Amendment No. 6 of 2007 to the Rabbinical Courts Law (Upholding a Divorce Decree) 5755-1995 (the "Rabbinical Courts Law (Upholding a Divorce Decree)").
52. Since Israel's previous report, the Committee also advanced and improved the status of women through the following measures:
- 52.1. Initiation of special parliamentary discussions on International Woman's Day, as well as on the National Day for the Fight against Violence toward Women, in which issues such as the levels of punishment in violence against women offences, victims of sexual assault and the legal system, equal opportunities in the workplace and advancement of the status of women were discussed; Holding regular sessions with members of the Civil Service Commission regarding sexual harassment claims and women's representation in the Civil Service.
- 52.2. The Committee invited the Prime Minister to learn about issues such as shortage of treatment centers for victims of sexual assault and prostitution. As a result, in 2007, the Prime Minister approved two inter-ministerial plans, the first for the treatment of sexual assault victims and the second for the rehabilitation and treatment of women and girls engaged in prostitution in order to assist them in breaking the vicious cycle of prostitution.

The implementation of the plans, each allocated with 10 million NIS ($2,500,000), began in 2008.

The Plan for the Rehabilitation and Treatment of Women and Girls Engaged in Prostitution in order to Assist Them in Breaking the Vicious Cycle of Prostitution is aimed toward reducing and preventing prostitution throughout Israeli society as well as rehabilitating and assisting women who survived prostitution. The plan further aims to break the cycle of exploitation and social exclusion of these women, to assist them in regaining self esteem, trust and control over their lives. In addition, the plan provides emergency and continuous treatment to women who engage in prostitution.

The plan integrates several elements: measures to provide immediate assistance including a national hotline to provide initial relief for these women's distress, mobile health clinics and emergency apartments to provide women engaged in prostitution with temporary shelter; treatment and rehabilitation centers; reinforcing existing programs; initiating preventative and educational campaigns for youth as well as the general public; training professionals and volunteers; initiating required legislation; conducting relevant surveys and research.

During 2008, the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services developed the organizational framework required for the operation of the plan. National and local steering committees were established and the cities in which the plan will be implemented were determined - Haifa, Tel Aviv and Be'er Sheva.

Moreover, the National Insurance Institute recognized the plan as a rehabilitation framework that entitles the participants to income support. In addition, the National Insurance Institute's Fund for the Development of Services for Children and Youth, and the Elem association cooperated to form programs regarding the treatment of girls engaged in prostitution.

The implementation of these programs has commenced in Tel Aviv and Haifa. In the city of Haifa, an emergency apartment and a treatment center opened. In addition, the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services operates patrols to approach the women engaged in prostitution in the areas they frequent. Currently, 40 women receive treatment through the program.

Advancement and Integration of Women in the Civil Service

53. The Department for the Advancement and Integration of Women within the Civil Service has been active on a wide range of topics, all aimed at promoting women in the civil service.
54. The Department heads the training and professional guidance of supervisors on the status of women in Government Ministries and the auxiliary units (currently there are 70 such supervisors – 100%), interviews all new supervisors, conducts regular training courses, sessions and conferences, and provides ongoing updates of relevant information and material to deal with issues relating to the status of women. An example of such an update is the distribution of 21 circulars (pamphlets) to the supervisors by the Department in 2007. In addition, all supervisors must report to the Department biannually, and these reports are further discussed in biannual meetings that take place with each supervisor.

55. In 2008, the Department continued its activities regarding affirmative action for women. Inter alia, on November 23, 2008, just before the International Day for the Fight against Violence towards Women, the Department issued a circular (pamphlet) in which the supervisors were required to hold explanatory activities on various forms of violence against women. The circular further required the various units to notify Civil Service employees on the Exceptions Committee, which provides financial assistance to female civil servants in shelters for battered women. In addition, during 2008, the Department published several academic training programs and other courses aimed at raising awareness for the advancement of the status of women. The Department emphasized that women and gender studies were recognized as favored courses of study in all Government Ministries and auxiliary units.
56. The Department continues to serve as a place for women civil servants to submit complaints regarding discrimination, injustice and grievance in their status and working conditions. More than one hundred such complaints are received annually, concerning a wide variety of subjects. In 2008, the Department received 80 complaints regarding sexual harassment allegations, in which 49 discipline procedures were opened. Eleven of the 49 cases were transferred to the disciplinary instance of the civil service.
57. The Department grants special attention to the implementation of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law in the Civil Service through training of the supervisors on the status of women in the Governmental Ministries, conducting seminars and conferences, along with regular follow up and supervision as to the Law's implementation in the ministries and auxiliary units, establishing clear procedures for the treatment of sexual harassment complaints, and filing regular reports to the Knesset regarding sexual harassment cases in the civil service.

58. In accordance with the Local Authorities Law (Advisor on the Status of Women) 5760-2000 (the "Local Authorities Law (Advisor on the Status of Women)"), as of 2008, 221 of the 253 local authorities had appointed such an advisor, 40 of whom, in Arab local municipalities. These advisors are closely guided by the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, keeping them informed as to the latest updates, distributing relevant material and statistics, conducting conferences and guidance sessions, as well as training courses. These advisors ensure the advancement of policy for enhancing the status of women within the purview of the local authority, in addition to ensuring that the necessary resources are provided to this end.
59. In December 2004, the Municipalities Ordinance [New version] and the Local Municipalities Ordinance [New version] were amended so that appropriate representation shall be given to both genders when a municipality or local authority is establishing a public corporation or an association. The Amendment applies only to representatives that are not members of the local council, due to the general determination in the Equal Rights for Women Law, according to which that obligation will not apply where the representatives of the public body are chosen by the public.

60. The Union of Local Authorities in Israel is currently in the process of composing a booklet to serve as an advisory on the status of women's, their duties and responsibilities. When completed, the booklet will be an important tool for protecting women's rights.

Article 3 - The Development and Advancement of Women

61. Israel has taken a wide range of actions, in the political, social, economic and cultural fields, to enable the comprehensive development and advancement of women. These actions have taken place via legal developments, public and private awareness campaigns and social changes. These measures, detailed throughout the report, enhance the protection of women's rights and further develop their roles in Israeli society.

Effective national machinery and publicity

62. As mentioned in Israel's previous report, the Convention was translated into Hebrew and published in the "Kitvey Amana," a series containing all treaties signed and ratified by the State, which can be obtained from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or at various public libraries. Additionally, the previous report submitted to the Committee, along with other reports, are available on the Ministry of Justice's web site.
63. Following a 2006 amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, an Equal Employment Opportunities Commission has been established within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor. A National Commissioner was appointed in January 2008, and three regional commissioners are currently in the process of being appointed. The Commission's role is to promote the recognition and the exercise of rights pursuant to the equality legislation and the promotion thereof. For this purpose, the Commission acts to increase public awareness through education and training to the extent that this function is not delegated to another public authority operating by law. The Commission carries out the following functions: encouraging programs and activities; cooperating with persons or other bodies including employers and employees; conducting research and collecting information; intervening by permission of the court in legal proceedings; handling complaints and filing petitions for injunctions. At the end of each year the Commissioner is required to submit an annual report to the Minister of ITL who in turn, is required to forward the report, with comments, to the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women and to the Knesset Committee for Labor, Welfare and Health.
64. Various Government Ministries held seminars and conferences regarding the status of women, as well as discussions on the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women in Israel, in their relevant fields of operations. For example, "Sexual Harassment in the Academic Sphere," "Gender and Nationality", "Gender - the Future" and other related conferences were held by the Ministry of Justice. Some of those discussions were held in joint cooperation with other organizations such as universities. The supervisor of the Ministry of Justice for advancement of the status of women also distributes various materials on a regular basis aimed at raising awareness. These materials include, inter alia, information on a preparation course for women who want to serve as directors, conferences aimed at the empowerment of women who participated in the election for local authorities in November 2008, and more.

Women with Disabilities

General and Legal Framework

65. In 2007, Israel signed the International Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, and began the process of ratifying the convention.
66. In general, the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law requires that the victim express his or her lack of interest in order for the situation to constitute as an act of sexual harassment. Nevertheless, a number of important exceptions were made to this rule. Under the circumstances of those exceptions, even though the victim did not show a lack of interest, a “sexual harassment presumption” is applied. These exceptions can be divided in to two main categories, the first are acts that constitute serious criminal offenses regardless of the sexual harassment offense, such as indecent actions or blackmail; the second category consists of cases in which an individual exploits a position of authority, which can occur in educational, medical, employment and other contexts. In 2007, the Law was amended in order to broaden the “sexual harassment presumption” to include a rehabilitated person, as specified under the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed During Rehabilitation Law (Temporary Order), 5767- 2007 (the “Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed During Rehabilitation Law (Temporary Order)”) while employed, and by exploiting a position of authority as a victim.
67. In 2005, the Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Suitability to Persons with Mental or Physical Disability) 5766-2005 (the “Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Suitability to Persons with Mental or Physical Disability)”), was enacted. This is an unprecedented law that regulates methods adjusted to investigate people with mental or intellectual disabilities and also adjusted methods for their testimonies. The Law applies to every disabled suspect, victim and witness, and to specific offences enumerated in the Law which are violence offences, sexual assaults and prostitution. The application of the Law to victims and witnesses will move forward gradually until the year 2010.
68. In December 2007, the Prohibition of Slander Law 5726-1965 (the “Prohibition of Slander Law”) was amended by the Israeli Knesset. According to the revised law, making a mockery of, or humiliating, persons with disabilities because of their disability shall be considered unlawful and prohibited slander, regardless of whether the disability is psychological, mental (including cognitive) or physical, and whether it is permanent or temporary,.
69. Since the submission of Israel’s previous report, several regulations that further advance the right to equality and human dignity for people with disabilities were amended and promulgated. Among these regulations are:
70. Regulation on Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (State Participation in Financing Adjustments) 5766-2006. According to the regulation, employers are entitled to a refund from the Government on expenses made in order to adjust the workplace to the disability, work and daily needs of disabled employees, subject to a maximal sum per employee. The Equal Rights for People with Disability (Licensed Building, Infrastructure and Environment Accessibility Experts) Regulations, 5767-2007 and the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Licensed Service Accessibility Experts) Regulations, 5767-2007, promulgate the prerequisites for the registration of licensed building, infrastructure and environment accessibility experts and licensed service accessibility experts respectively.

71. In 2005, the Ministry of ITL established the Department for Integration of Persons with Disabilities in the Work Force. The Department is charged with promoting the integration of persons with disabilities in the open labor market as opposed to sheltered employment, through, inter alia, the implementation of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (State Participation in Financing Adjustments) Regulations and the Minimum Wage (Adjusted Wage for Employees with Disabilities Having Reduced Ability to Work) Regulations.

72. Information regarding people with disabilities originates from details on various disability benefits given to the six main categories of disabled people. These categories determine the source and type of support provided and they are based on: general disability pension, employment disability pension, IDF (Israel Defense Force) disability pension, hostile operations disability pensions, Holocaust and anti-Nazi operations disability pensions, and children receiving disabled child pensions. Men are the major recipients of disability pensions in most categories, except for a slightly higher number of women among those receiving hostile operations and Holocaust and anti-Nazi operations disability pensions. The men's rate of pensions received is particularly higher among the IDF disability pension recipients and the employment disability pension recipients. It is worth mentioning two additional pensions for persons with disabilities: the Nursing Pension and the Mobility Pension. The Nursing Pension is given mainly to elderly people. In 2008, 38,800 men and 94,100 women received the Nursing Pension. Mobility Pension is given to persons with mobility disabilities. The total number of disabled persons receiving this pension in 2008, and not receiving the general disability pension, was 17,000.
73. According to the data of the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, based on a social survey that was conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics in 2007, the majority of all persons with disabilities in Israel are women, particularly among persons with severe disabilities. In 2007, 238,000 women reported having severe disabilities (55% of all persons with severe disabilities) and 387,000 women reported having moderate disabilities (55%). Women make up the majority of persons with disabilities in all age groups, as detailed by the following table:

Severity	Age	Total	Men	Women	% of Women
Severe disability	Total	417,222	179,668	237,554	57%
	20-64	253,290	118,840	134,450	53%
	65+	163,932	60,828	103,104	63%
Moderate disability	Total	700,512	313,275	387,237	55%
	20-64	477,575	218,195	259,380	54%
	65+	222,937	95,080	127,857	57%

74. For further details and updated figures regarding recipients of general disability pension, please see discussion below under Article 13 (General Disability Pension).

Special Health Concerns of Women with Disabilities

75. Amendment No. 2 to the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 (the “Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law”) added a chapter regarding accessibility of health services which makes comprehensive provisions regarding accessibility to health and medical services for persons with disabilities, both in relation to the infrastructure and health services. The Ministry of Health together with the Israel Center for Technology and Accessibility have begun to map out, and to promote the accessibility of, women’s health clinics. Currently there are 10 accessible women health clinics: most of them are adapted for women with physical disabilities. Unique in nature is the ‘Maayaney Ha’yeshua’ Hospital in which the personnel is trained to give health services for persons with mental, emotional and cognitive disabilities.

Accessibility

76. Several regulations were enacted in accordance with the Equal Rights for People with Disability Law since Israel’s previous report:
77. As mentioned above, the Equal Rights for People with Disability (Licensed Building, Infrastructure and Environment Accessibility Experts) Regulations, 5767-2007 and the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Licensed Service Accessibility Experts) Regulations, 5767-2007. These regulations promulgate the prerequisites for the registration of licensed building, infrastructure and environment accessibility experts and licensed service accessibility experts respectively.
78. The Welfare (Treatment of Persons with Mental Disabilities) Law, 5729-1969, provides that when determining the type of housing framework, priority should be given to community housing. The Department for the Treatment of Persons with Intellectual Disability within the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services acts to implement this priority. Furthermore, there is a tendency to remove people from the residential facilities and place them in community housing in the form of hostels.

79. In September 2008, new regulations were promulgated, obligating the adjustment of various public sites to the needs of persons with disabilities. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Site Accessibility Adjustments) Regulations, 5768-2008, determine accessibility requirements for archeological sites, national parks and nature reserves, as well as other areas, mainly forests, managed by the Jewish National Fund or on its behalf. According to the regulations, new sites will not open for public use unless the accessibility requirements are met. Existing sites are compelled to gradually fulfill the requirements within 10 years.

Accessibility to Media

80. On July 2005, the Knesset enacted the Broadcasting Television Law (Subtitles and Signing), 5765-2005 (the “Subtitles and Signing Law”). The new Law institutes a comprehensive statutory scheme in this field, thereby replacing its predecessor, the far narrower Deaf Persons Relief Law of 1992. The new Law applies broader responsibilities and restrictions on broadcasters in order to enhance, to the fullest extent, disabled persons’ accessibility to television broadcastings.
81. In 2008, the Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting, a public body established under the Telecommunications Law, 5742- 1982, decided on a separate definition of “prime time” for children’s channels, so that the requirement for subtitles will coincide with the relevant viewing hours for children with hearing impairments. The council also decided on a list of children’s programs of major interest that will be subtitled.

82. With respect to employment opportunities for persons with disabilities, a law enacted in 2007 is dedicated to the promotion of the integration of persons with disabilities into the workforce and to the improvement of their rehabilitation process. The Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed During Rehabilitation Law (Temporary Order) defines a rehabilitating person, for the purposes of the Law, as a person whose employment capability, due to his or her disability, is at least 81% less than regular employment capability of a similar employee without disabilities. The Law stipulates that employer-employee relations cannot be established with regard to a rehabilitating employee, and grants the rehabilitating employee similar rights to those granted under Israel’s labor laws.
83. According to the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, most adults with disabilities are of employment age, yet make up roughly one fifth of the total population of working age in the state of Israel. The rate of employment among persons with disabilities is lower than that of the rest of the population, especially among those with severe disabilities, thus contributing to increased levels of poverty and social exclusion. Furthermore, the rate of unemployment among the disabled population is very high, especially for persons with severe disabilities. Nevertheless, recent data indicates a moderate improvement in the rate of persons with disabilities participating in the workforce, especially among those with severe disabilities (42% in 2005, compared to 36% in 2002).

84. Employment of Persons with Disabilities by Gender. Examination of the relative employment status of men and women with disabilities shows no significant difference between the two genders. The rate of employment of women between the ages of 20 and 64 stands at about 80% of the rate of men, for persons with and without disabilities.
85. The National Insurance Institute is in charge of payment of pensions to certain populations, as defined by law and regulations. The General Disability Pension is designed to act as minimum income to provide for the daily life of persons with disabilities.
86. In two precedents given in 2006, the Tel Aviv and the Haifa Labor District Courts ruled that people with intellectual and/or mental disabilities who work for private employers are not to be regarded as “volunteers,” but as “workers” entitled to an employer-employee relationship and the applicability of all relevant labor laws. In both court rulings, the employers were obligated to retroactively compensate the disabled employees and provide them with their inherent rights as employees (La.C. (Tel-Aviv) 10973/04 Goldstein v. Na’amat; La.C. (Haifa) 3327/01 Roth v. Ram Buildings Ltd).
87. On July 10, 2005, the Nazareth District Labor Court ruled that the phrase “accommodation” as intended by Section 8 to the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law is not limited to the physical adjustment of structures, equipment or accessories, but extends to making accommodations of an economic nature. Thus, an employer is obligated to continue employing an employee who became disabled, and pay him or her the same salary, even if there is a decrease in his/her productivity due to the disability, unless the employer can prove that this imposes an unreasonable burden on his/her business. In this case, the Court held that an employee with cancer constitutes a person with a disability for the purposes of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law (La.C. (Nazareth) 1732/04 De Castro Dekel v. M.B.A Hazore'a (10.07.05)).

88. As a result of these decisions, and with a view of encouraging the employment of persons with intellectual and/or mental disabilities in supported employment in the open labor market, a law was enacted in 2007 called the Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed as Rehabilitated Persons (Temporary Provision) Law 5767-2007 (the "Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed as Rehabilitated Persons (Temporary Provision) Law"). According to this law, a person whose work capacity is less than 19% shall not be considered an employee, but rather a rehabilitated person. As such the entire body of labor laws does not apply, but at the same time the new law gives a rehabilitated person the right to remuneration for work and decent work conditions concerning matters such as leave, sick pay, hours of work and travel expenses. This law supplements the Minimum Wage (Adjusted Wage for Employees with Disabilities Having Reduced Ability to Work) Regulations 5762-2002, promulgated on February 21, 2002, concerning adjustments to the minimum wage for persons who are at various levels of diminished work capacity as the result of a disability. The objective of the Regulations is to encourage employers to hire employees whose work capacity is diminished due to disability by enabling them to pay such employees less than the minimum wage.
89. The Regulations set a reduced minimum wage scale which corresponds with work capacity. Thus an employee whose work capacity is reduced by between 25-50% is entitled to 75% of the minimum wage; an employee whose work capacity is reduced by between 50-70% is entitled to 50% of the minimum wage; and an employee whose work capacity is reduced by over 70% is entitled to a third of the minimum wage. According to the Regulations, the person with disability is required to apply to the Ministry of ITL requesting a determination of his/her reduced work capacity, resulting in the entitlement to a reduced minimum wage. The Regulations apply to employment in the open labor market, as opposed to sheltered employment. In the first 20 months of the implementation of the Regulations, 1,600 persons with disabilities have applied to have their minimum wage adjusted, and in 1,255 of these cases the wage was, in fact, adjusted.
90. On July 27, 2008, the National Insurance (Consolidated Version) Law 5755-1995, (the "National Insurance Law") was amended (Amendment No. 109) in order to further facilitate the integration of persons with disabilities into the labor force. The Amendment is the result of a process designed to sever the linkage between disability, social security and unemployment. Prior to the Amendment, a person with disability entitled to the National Insurance Disability Benefit had little if no incentive to take himself/herself off social security and enter the labor market, since a salary exceeding the level of Disability Benefit would disqualify him/her from receiving the benefit, even where he/she lost his/her job thereafter. Eliminating the Disability Benefit "trap" was a centerpiece of the Report issued by the Public Commission for the Consideration of Disabled Persons' Issues and The Promotion of their Integration into the Community. The commission, appointed by the Government following a major strike of persons with disabilities in 2002, and headed by retired Justice Laron, presented its report on April 21, 2005. The recent Amendment to the National Insurance Law, which is the outcome of the Government's adoption of the Laron Commission's Report, enables a person with disability to earn a relatively high monthly salary (7,000 NIS – $1,750) without having to forgo his/her National Insurance Disability Benefit entitlement.

Advancement of Arab women

91. In August 2006, the Government resolved to commence two additional multi-year plans for the advancement of Arab women. Resolution No. 412 for the development of the Druze and Circassian population in the amount of 447 million NIS ($111,750,000) for the years 2006-2009, and Resolution 413 for the development of the Bedouin population in the North in the amount of 318 million NIS ($79,500,000) for the years 2006-2009. The preparations of the plans took several months to develop and involved participation from the relevant Government Ministries, representatives from the Arab population, including the heads of the Druze, Circassian and Bedouin municipalities.
92. In addition to empowerment of women, the new development plans focuses on two other main issues: investment in human resources, including a special focus on the economic development; and employment, including tourism development as a source of income. The budget sources of the plan primarily come from the relevant Government Ministries and a special budget of the Prime Minister's Office designated to the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations.
93. The activities set in Government Resolutions No. 412 and 413 include encouraging women to acquire education and professional training by providing special scholarships and one-day seminars on various issues related to the advancement of women, such as raising awareness. Additional activities include training courses on women empowerment and business entrepreneurship. In 2007, 75 scholarships were granted to Arab female students populations, and in July 2008, the process of awarding scholarships began for the second year.
94. The massive investment in education will result, according to the shared vision of the Prime Minister's Office and the heads of the municipalities, in a growing number of educated persons who will attend universities and acquire academic education, and will eventually become "the engine that will carry others."
95. Government Resolution No. 881 of September 2003, resolved to commence a multi-year plan for the years 2004-2008, which includes a special program for the advancement of the status of women in the Bedouin localities in the Negev (Southern Israel). The program, which provides training in fields such as parental authority, first aid and prevention of household accidents, is already implemented in cooperation with the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. Furthermore, an additional program was prepared that includes training regarding employment of Bedouin women, women's health, empowerment courses and activities for prevention of domestic violence.

Article 4 - Acceleration of Equality between Men and Women

Affirmative Action

Expanding Affirmative Action to Public Institutions and in the Civil Service

96. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's previous report.

Affirmative Action in Governmental Corporations

97. According to current data from the Governmental Corporations Authority, as of August 2008, women constitute 38.5% of the governmental corporations' directorates. Currently there is one woman serving as head of a board of directors, and four women are serving as CEO's of Governmental Corporations.

Affirmative Action in Public Corporations

98. Women still lack sufficient representation in the managerial levels in boards of directors of public corporations when compared to men. Section 239(d) of the Corporations Law 5759-1999 (the "Corporations Law") requires that in a company in which, on the date of appointment of an outside director, all members of the board of directors of the company are of the same gender, the outside director appointed shall be of the other gender. According to data gathered in 2007, out of 754 public corporations, 165 did not uphold this law and did not have any women on their board of directors. The rate of female directors in public corporations stood at 15.7% in 2007, and of the directors representing the public, the rate of women that year was 23%.

Affirmative Action in Other Areas

99. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, together with the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, have designed a unique training course for women, educating them on ways to become active and committed members of local and national Councils for the Advancement and Administration of Sports in Israel.

Special Measures Aimed at Protecting Maternity

100. For an extensive review of this matter please see Articles 11 and 13 below.

Article 5 - Sex Role Stereotyping and Prejudice

101. In this Article, various issues reflecting women's gender roles and stereotypes will be addressed. Firstly, we shall address women's representation in Israeli media, including pornography and the recent innovations in this sphere. Secondly, this Article will provide a detailed review of the phenomenon of violence against women, and note the measures taken to further address it.

Women and the Media

102. The Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting is a public council established under the Telecommunications Law 5742-1982 (the “Telecommunications Law”). Its fundamental task is to regulate the Israeli Cable and Satellite multi-channel subscriber television by representing, protecting and promoting the public interests in this field. During the year 2007, the council was headed by a chairwoman. During the years 2004-2008, 3-5 out of 8-10 members of the council were women (37.5%-50%). In the council’s professional body, currently eight out of 11 employees are women, and two of them are in managerial positions.
103. In the Israeli Cable Broadcasting Company (HOT) 55% of approximately 5,000 employees are women, 182 out of 255 managers are women (71.3%) and four out of ten senior management officials are women (40%). In the Satellite Broadcasting Company (YES) 1,346 out of 2,402 employees are women (56%), 18 out of 36 department managers are women (50%) and 3 out of 8 senior management officials are women (37.5%). In the production companies that produce and provide programs for the various local channels (family, sports etc.), numerous women are involved in the creative process as well as in the business management and on-screen performances.
104. Through an elaborate and lengthy process of deliberations over the issue of allowing pornographic content in the Israeli multi-channel television, the Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting has given great consideration to the issue of preventing broadcasting that may be degrading and derogatory toward women, and that creates social perceptions of women as sexual objects. After many efforts, including several petitions to the Israeli Supreme Court residing as the High Court of Justice by a coalition of women and feminist organizations, the private broadcasters and Knesset members, the outcome was a balance of various civil rights including protection of children and women’s rights. The Council’s final decision, which the High Court of Justice found no reason to dispute, was that the broadcasters may only offer channels presenting “soft” erotic content that does not present sexual relations with violence, abuse, coercion, exploitation or humiliation, and does not breach the Telecommunications Law that prohibits exhibiting a human being or his/her body part as an object available for sexual use. The Council also limited pornographic broadcasting with measures such as making it solely available on demand, for a fee, to adults over the age of 18, only during late-night hours, or coded by a personal code, in order to prevent children from viewing the content.
105. Three of the seven members (43%) on the Management Committee of the Israel Broadcast Authority (IBA), which is in charge of public broadcasting, are women. In the IBA Council, women compose 37.5% of the 24-member Council, and out of the 1,784 total employees of the IBA, 42% are women. Data from 2008 indicates progress in employing women in high-ranking positions within the IBA. There are currently 19 women (22%) in high-ranking positions in Israeli television, compared to 14 in 2004, and ten women in high-ranking positions in Israeli and Arabic radio, compared to 7 in 2004. Of the 25 department managers 9 are women (36%) and out of 111 news correspondents and journalists, 31 are women (27%).

Pornography

106. In recent months, the Israeli Police Investigation Department has led a number of national enforcement activities in conjunction with the “Lahav 433” unit, and with the help of Interpol, which provided useful information. All police districts in Israel participated in these activities, which were carried out in order to collect evidence regarding possession and/or distribution of obscene materials with pedophilic content. During the procedures, about 100 cases were opened for investigation, and to date, 17 indictments have been filed. All photographs of minors seized from suspects’ computers have originated from Internet web sites based abroad. A phenomenon of sexual exploitation of minors is not familiar in Israel.
107. According to data from the Ministry of Public Security, between 2005 and 2007, 208 investigations were opened by the Police regarding obscene materials, 92 of which involved minors. In 2007 alone, 100 cases were opened, 41 of them relating to minors. According to information from the Police Prosecution Department, no indictments were served regarding these offences.

Prostitution

108. In 2005, four cases regarding offences of publication of prostitution services were opened. In 2006, 13 such cases were opened, and in 2007, 30 cases were handled by the Police regarding this offence. The Police also strengthened its fight against prostitution services of minors; between the years 2005 and 2007, five cases were handled regarding this offence. No indictments were served.
109. Between January and November 2008, the Police opened 244 cases for managing a place for the purpose of prostitution, and arrested 46 suspects. In the same time frame, 56 cases of mediation for prostitution were opened by the Police, and nine cases were opened for trafficking in women. In addition, 50 brothels were closed, and 78 suspects were arrested on account of trafficking or related offences, 11 of which are awaiting the completion of proceedings.

Women and Religion

110. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel’s previous report.

Violence against Women

Sexual Violence - Legal Aspects

Prevention of Sexual Harassment

111. Recently, several provisions of the Penal Law 5737-1977 (the “Penal Law”) were amended to add specific provisions regarding sexual abuse by a psychotherapist and consensual unlawful sexual relations with a minor.
112. Section 346 of the Penal Law, concerning consensual, unlawful sexual relations, stipulates that an adult individual who engages in sexual intercourse with a minor who is between the ages of

14 and 18, and who is not married to said adult, or an individual who engages in sexual intercourse with a minor who has reached the age of 16 but has not yet reached the age of 18 by exploiting relations of dependence, authority, education or supervision, or by making a false promise of marriage, acting as being unmarried while in actuality being married, is subject to five years imprisonment.

113. Amendment No. 77 to the Penal Law, issued in November 2003, supplements Section 346 to include sexual intercourse between a psychotherapist and a female minor between the ages of 16 and 18 as exploitation of dependency, unless the sexual intercourse occurred before the commencing of the psychotherapy, and in the course of an intimate relationship (Section 346(2)). The same applies to sodomy committed by a psychotherapist against a minor who is between the ages of 16 and 18, unless the sodomy occurred before the commencing of the psychotherapy in the course of an intimate relationship (Section 347(a)(2)).
114. The above Amendment supplements Section 347 to the Penal Law with the definition of sexual intercourse with a psychotherapist. Section 347A(a) defines psychotherapy as any diagnosis, evaluation, consultation, treatment, rehabilitation, or conversations performed over a continuous period of time through in-person meetings, in order to aid a person suffering from distress, disturbance, illness, or a different problem, stemming from a mental or emotional basis. A psychotherapist is defined as a person who engages professionally in providing psychotherapy as an occupation or a position, and is a psychologist, psychiatrist or social worker, or a person acting as one of these professions. Section 347A(b) stipulates that a psychotherapist who has sexual intercourse with a woman or sodomizes a person who has reached the age of 18, during treatment or in the period of three years of after the treatment, while obtaining consent through exploiting actual mental dependency resulting from the treatment given, is subject to four years' imprisonment. This will not apply if the acts were committed prior to the commencement of the psychotherapy.
115. According to section 348(d)(1) of the Law, a person committing an indecent act with a minor who is between the ages of 14 and 18, exploiting relations of dependence, authority, education or supervision is subject to four years' imprisonment. Amendment No. 77 supplements Section 348(d)(2) stipulating that a psychotherapist committing an indecent act with a minor between the ages of 14 and 18 during the psychotherapy will be regarded as committing the act while exploiting relations of dependence. This will not apply if the minor has reached the age of 16, and the acts were committed prior to commencing psychotherapy, and while engaged in an intimate relationship.
116. The Amendment also supplements Section 350 to the Law, stipulating that with regard to acts committed under the sub-section on sexual offences, the same penalty shall be imposed upon a person committing these offences in person, and to a person who caused these acts to be performed upon him/herself or upon another person.
117. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law was amended (Amendment No. 4 of 2007) in order to broaden the scope of the Law. According to the Amendment, a minor under the age of 15 is not required to indicate that sexual proposals or sexual attention is unwelcome in order for these actions to be considered sexual harassment, even without exploitation of a special relationship between the minor and the harasser, i.e. - without relating to the conditions previously set down by the Law, of dependence or authority. The Amendment will apply only if the harasser is an adult (over the age of 18).

118. Current data indicates that between 2005 and 2007, 509 investigations were opened by the Police due to sexual harassment complaints as indicated by the following table:

119. In addition, between January and October 2008, 2,762 cases were opened due to complaints filed by women regarding sexual offences. Of these cases, 614 were filed for rape or threats, 157 for rape or sexual intercourse, 1,365 for forced obscene assaults, 425 for indecent acts and 199 for sexual harassment.
120. Also between January and October 2008, the Israeli Police made 937 arrests for sexual offences, compared to 915 arrests in 2007 and 846 arrests in 2006. The following table indicates the amount and status of cases filed between 2006 and 2008 due to complaints by women:

Stalking

121. Amendment No. 11 (2008) to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law (Requirement for a Hearing before Dismissal of a Request) determines that a court may not dismiss a request for a protective injunction, or a request for an injunction against threatening harassment, according to the Prevention of Stalking Law 5762-2001 (the “Prevention of Stalking Law”), unless the petitioner or his/her representative has been given the opportunity to bring his/her claims before the court, unless there are exceptional circumstances and reasons, which must be recorded.

Extent of the Phenomenon of Sexual Violence against Women

Minimum Punishments

122. As stated in Israel's previous report, the 1998 Amendment to the Penal Law instituted a minimum punishment for severe sexual offences, constituting 25% of the maximum that may be imposed. Another Amendment, added in 2002, prohibits imposition of suspended sentences, except in special circumstances, that must be specified by a Court decision.
123. Recently, the Haifa District Court sentenced a defendant to nine years' imprisonment and two years' suspended imprisonment on the condition that he does not commit sexual offenses for a period of three years after his release. The defendant was convicted upon his confession of committing an indecent act under aggravated circumstances, attempted rape and sodomy, in three different cases against three different women.

The Court determined that the defendant abused the trust of the women to whom he offered to drive somewhere, and that the public was entitled to protection from the defendant and others like him. However, the Court looked favorably upon the defendant's confession, which saved judicial time and prevented additional emotional difficulties for the victim, the defendant wished to receive medical treatment intended for sexual offenders. Therefore, in addition to the imprisonment term imposed, the Court ordered the defendant to compensate two of the victims with 20,000 NIS ($5,000) and the third with 15,000 NIS ($3,750), and recommended that the defendant be medically treated during his imprisonment (S.Cr.C. 5020/08 The State of Israel v. Shay Alkayem (07.09.2008)).

Raising Awareness

124. As mentioned above, in March 2008, in honor of the International Women's Day, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women launched its new Internet web site, which includes information on varied activities taking place in Israel relating to the promotion of the status of women and information regarding violence and sexual violence toward women.
125. Also in March 2008, the Authority published the booklet "Women – Institutions and Organizations in Israel," which provides detailed information on hundreds of organizations operating in Israel in the various fields relating to women's status, including aid organizations. The guide is distributed nationally free of charge.
126. Various Governmental Ministries held seminars and conferences regarding violence against women. The Ministry of Justice, for example, held several conferences regarding "Sexual Harassment in the Academic Sphere," and other related lectures. Some of the lectures were held in cooperation with other organizations, such as universities.
127. The Courts Administration holds annual seminars and workshops on women's status issues such as violence against women, women's status, and the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law. In addition, the Administration held a special training course geared toward training women to be group facilitators for matters regarding women's status.

Administrative measures

128. In the last two years, special assistance units were established in all District Attorneys' Offices and special attorneys were appointed to be in charge of the implementation of the Crime Victims' Rights Law 5761-2001 (the "Crime Victims' Rights Law"). The attorneys are in direct contact with the victims and ensure the implementation of their rights according to the Law.

Police Handling of Sex Crimes against Women

129. In comparison to Israel's previous report, in the years 2004-2008, there has been a decrease in the number of sexual violence cases filed and investigated by the Police. The figures for 2008, which indicate the number of investigations until October 29, 2008, shows a comparative decrease of 13% in the Arab localities, and a 3% decrease in the total number of investigations.

130. In 2007, 3,424 criminal investigations were opened following complaints by women of sexual violence involving women as victims. 19.5% of the complaints were filed by new immigrants, 14.3% by women from the former Soviet Union, 7% by Arab women and 2% by Ethiopian women. Of the total number of investigations opened, 740 pertained to sexual violence against women in the family, though not necessarily incest. Of those 740 cases, 316 were committed by a spouse, and of those 316 cases, 267 cases were for rape, compared to 294 in 2003.

Limitation and restriction on Sex Offenders

131. In 2006, the Knesset added another layer of protection against sex offenders by enacting the Public Protection of Sex Offenders Law, which entered into force on October 1, 2006. The objectives of this law are to protect the general public from sex offenders and prevent sex offenders from repeating their crimes. According to the Law, certain restriction may be imposed upon sex offenders after they conclude their sentence, and are returning to live in the community. The Law also established a registry of sex offenders who are under supervision. The registry assists supervision officers, police and military police personnel in performing threat assessments. The Law, through several mechanisms, establishes a balance between the restrictions that may limit sex offenders' freedom and the level of threat they pose toward the general public. The main two mechanisms are:
- 131.1. The duty to receive the updated and accurate assessment of the level of threat posed by the offender before reaching certain decisions relevant to his/her matter (such as sentencing, considering a parole or a pardon etc.).
 - 131.2. Supervision of an offender following his/her release by a special supervision unit. If the court does not sentence a period of incarceration, the supervision begins immediately after the verdict is given. The supervision is carried out according to a Court Order that may include restrictions such as limiting permissible workplaces, places of residence, Internet use and more.
132. The Division for the Supervision of Sex Offenders is an integral part of the Israeli Prisons Service (IPS) and was established pursuant to the Public Protection of Sex Offenders Law. The division operates on a national level, and consists of eight officers and staff employees. In the application of the Law, the Division is working together with the District and the State Attorneys' Offices in the Ministry of Justice and other relevant bodies in the Ministries of Health and Social Affairs and Social Services. At present, after nearly two years of operation since its establishment, the division handles 220 supervision orders issued by the different District and Magistrate Courts.
- Immediately after receiving a Court Supervision Order, an officer meets with the sex offender in order to receive relevant details and a clear and updated picture of the person in question. According to the circumstances of each case, and as a deterrent, the officer carries out stealth and open surveillance activities. The Division staff underwent specific training for this line of work, which includes legal aspects as well as practical field aspects.
133. In 2005, the Prevention of Employment of Sex Offenders in Certain Institutions Law 5761-2001 (the "Prevention of Employment of Sex Offenders in Certain Institutions Law") was amended and it now applies also to institutions servicing persons with mental disabilities. The Law formerly only applied to institutions servicing minors, such as schools. An additional Amendment, issued in 2007, stated that the Law will apply to every person convicted of sex offence as an adult, whereas previously the Law only applied to persons sentenced to at least one year imprisonment for a sex offence.

Police Treatment of Victims of Sexual Violence

134. The Police Special Task Force for Treatment of Domestic Violence Offences is specifically trained to provide improved treatment of sex offences. The Task Force training educates those involved with an overview of legal and judicial aspects, rape trauma, theoretical aspects of the rape offence, sexual harassment, events analysis, collaboration techniques with treatment bodies within the community; the training also includes special seminars discussing techniques for encouraging victims to come forward, and for making preliminary inquiries of suspects.
135. In addition, to make sure that an appropriate number of investigators will be available to provide a suitable response to sex offences from all Police units, an annual special training course is conducted for investigators, which includes the following subjects: legislation, legal aspects of domestic violence, the various Police guidelines in this field, rape trauma, theoretical and practical knowledge regarding sexual offenses and sexual harassment, cooperation with treatment organizations in the community and training courses on questioning victims and suspects of sex offences. As of 2004, training and enrichment programs consisting of twelve meetings each are given to investigators of sexual offences in all the Police districts. These programs cover issues such as: legislation, post-trauma, incest, male victims of crime, information regarding certain sectors in the community etc. The seminars are designed to train investigators specializing in the treatment of sex offences, and also to develop their ability to provide emotional support and different ways of coping with this sensitive issue.
136. The following are the main guiding principles of Police Procedure No. 03.300.310, "Police treatment regarding a person filing a complaint on sexual offences":
- Only a trained investigator is authorized to investigate sex offences.
 - Every complaint concerning a sexual offence is investigated to the full extent possible, by an investigator of the same gender of the victim. Furthermore, to the extent that it is possible, the victim will be in contact with only one investigator during the entire course of the investigation.
 - Only relevant and essential questions are to be introduced in consideration of the victim and his/her privacy.
 - Excluding persons not directly related to the investigation. The collection of proclamation is done, as far as possible, in a separate room without the presence of other investigators or investigatees.
 - As the collection of the proclamation ends, the investigator shall give his/her name to the victim, along with details of the registration of the complaint and the ways in which the victim can receive information concerning the progress of the case and ways in which he/she may deliver any further information.
 - Notifying the complainant of the possibility of receiving support from a volunteer working with one of the rape crisis centers, and providing assistance in contacting such a center.
 - If the victim specifically requests to be accompanied by a relative or friend, it shall be permitted, keeping in mind the needs of the investigation.

- Also, a representative from one of the rape crisis centers is to be made available at the explicit request of the victim.
- At the victim's request, and where reasonable to do so having considered the needs of the specific investigation, the investigation is to be delayed until the arrival of the abovementioned persons.
- Minors under the age of 14 will be questioned by a children investigator authorized to handle and investigate sex offences. Similarly, minors over the age of 14 are to be questioned by a youth investigator authorized to handle and investigate sexual offences.
- The Procedure provides advice on conducting victim/suspect confrontations, where they are deemed necessary and the victim's explicit consent is attained.
- The Procedure also provides information and details as to the referral of victims to medical care, including the collection of related evidence.

Crisis Centers

137. There are eleven rape crisis centers throughout the country working to provide emotional support, practical advice, and other support for victims including the maintenance of hotlines, and the provision of educational services. All centers are staffed by volunteers and are contacted by an average of 9,000 individuals annually.
138. Israel has also developed a unique model of multidisciplinary centers that provide interrelated services to women who have suffered abuse and violence. These centers combine psycho-social and psychological treatment with medical and legal services. Until 2007, there were such three centers in Israel, and in 2008 three additional centers were opened, designed to treat 600 persons simultaneously. As of October 2008, 428 victims were treated in these centers, compared to 280 in 2007 and 171 in 2005.

The Social Affairs and Social Services Ministry's Treatment of Victims of Sexual Violence

139. On January 1, 2007, the Israeli Prime Minister informed the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women that a program submitted by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services for the appropriate treatment of young women and teen victims of sexual assault had been approved. The special program included designating 25 social workers to identify and treat young women, teenagers, and victims of sexual assault, six regional multidisciplinary centers for treatment of sexual assault victims, six places of residence for sexual assault victims, a special hostel for treatment of sexual assault victims as an alternative to hospitalization, and seminars and training sessions for the identification and treatment of sexual assault victims.
140. An inter-ministerial committee, headed by the director of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, was established to examine the implementation of the program. The committee appointed a special task force which prepared a list of high priority initiatives to be implemented during 2008, in accordance with the approved budget. Implementation of additional initiatives of less urgency has begun gradually in 2008 and will continue in 2009.

141. The Government's program for treatment of sexual assault victims includes the following features:

141.1. Training and Seminars for Identification and Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims: As public servants work in many different environments, such as clinics, hospitals, social services departments and the education system, they are often in a position to encounter sexual assault victims. Nevertheless, many have difficulty in identifying such victims. In order to better enable them to do so, special training for social workers and psychologists within the health and welfare systems, physicians, nurses, educational advisors and psychologists within the education system began in 2008. The trainings will vary, highlighting relevant issues in accordance with the profession of the participants, in order to achieve maximum expertise.

141.2. Regional Multidisciplinary Centers for Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims: Following up on the focused treatment provided in crises centers in hospitals, regional multidisciplinary treatment centers provide the physical necessities of life, in conjunction with psychological treatment for sexual assault victims. In addition, the centers identify and rehabilitate women and girls who were sexually abused at different stages of their lives, and have not yet received any treatment. The centers conduct professional schooling on the treatment of sexual assault victims, and serve as teaching and training centers for different professions in the community who deal directly with sexual assault victims.

Currently, there are two regional multidisciplinary treatment centers operated by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, based in Rishon-Lezion and Haifa. Another center, operated by the Ministry of Health in the Tel-Aviv Soraski Medical Center, provides psycho-therapeutic and psychiatric treatments for victims of incest. Government programs for treatment of sexual assault victims include upgrading the capacity of these centers for simultaneous treatment of up to 100 victims. In addition the establishment of another three centers in Nazareth, Jerusalem, and Beer-Sheva that will also be equipped to effectively treat the Arab, Bedouin and Jewish Ultra-Orthodox populations. The three new centers are in advanced stages of development. Communities of a unique culture will receive treatment by members of the same community, who speak the same language.

141.3. Hostel for Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims, alternative to hospitalization: Currently, no 24-hour service for sexual assault victims is in operation, and the routine treatment of victims in existing hospitals might worsen their situation or even revive their trauma. The Government program includes the establishment of a hostel geared toward meeting the special needs of sexual assault victims. The hostel is designed for 12 women, for a stay period of 3 months per person. The victims are to be referred to the hostel by therapists in the community, and are to return to these therapists at the end of their stay in the hostel. The hostel's staff will include a psychiatrist and a nurse, in addition to therapists specializing in the treatment of sexual assault victims. A tender for this hostel was issued, but in June 2008, after examination of all the offers submitted, it was declared that there was no winner, and a new tender will be issued in the near future.

- 141.4. Treatment of Children and Victims of Sexual Assault, in the Education System: Since 2005, the Ministry of Education has allocated 1,000,000 NIS ($250,000) a year for a program in 22 local education systems, designated for the treatment of child victims of sexual assault. In 2007, an additional sum of 180,000 NIS ($45,000) was allocated to this program. In 2008, an additional budget was also allocated for this program.
- 141.5. Establishment of Places of Residence for Sexual Assault Victims: A vast amount of the sexual assault victims treated in the regional multidisciplinary treatment centers suffer from severe economic distress. Many are attempting to find places of residence, and suitable employment, whilst lacking basic life skills. Some victims return to their homes following treatment in the centers, and continue to suffer from physical and mental abuse. Since all victims need a secure home, the Government program includes the establishment of six residence apartments for sexual assault victims to be constructed next to each of the present and future regional multidisciplinary treatment centers. The residence apartments will serve as a secure home for the victims for a period of six months to one year, and will assist them in acquiring the life skills needed before returning to independent life.
- 141.6. Additional Social Workers Specializing in Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims: The Government program includes the addition of further 25 social workers into welfare services provided by local municipalities. These social workers will specialize in the identification and treatment of sexual assault victims.

Sex Offenders in the Penitentiary System

142. The Israeli Prisons Service activates psychological-educational groups for sexual offenders in a number of prisons aimed to enrich the offenders' knowledge and provide them with tools and skills for daily living. The Prisons Service also activates therapeutical groups for sexual offenders through the Mental Health Center in Ramla, targeted at reducing the risks of sexual violence nationwide.
143. Early release and vacations for prisoners sentenced for domestic violence are discussed in joint committees held in four districts. The Committees' members are from the Prisons Service and the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. The Committees receive the social services reports of the status of the family (e.g. the victims) and the prisoner treatment in prison.

The Sexual Assault Help Centers Data

144. The Israeli Sexual Assault Victim's Help Centers Union is a parent organization to all help centers operating in Israel, working as an agent of social change on a national level, lobbying legislation amendments, and issuing annual reports on sexual assaults.
145. Currently there are two major legislative amendments initiated by the Union awaiting the approval of the relevant ministerial committee. One pending amendment addresses the need to freeze the limitation period in civil proceedings while a criminal procedure is being held regarding sexual offences. The second pending amendment prohibits the deduction of a third of an incarceration period for prisoners serving sentences for sexual offences.

146. On November 16, 2008, there entered into force the Witness Protection Law 5769 – 2008, which allows for enhanced protection of witnesses who conform to certain criteria. It includes the establishment of a Witness Protection Authority which will be responsible for developing programs to protect witnesses who are deemed appropriate. Among the criteria for accepting witnesses to this program, are the nature of his/her or the cooperation with law enforcement authorities, and the nature of the risk he faces. A witness who is accepted into the program may subject to change of identity, changing his/her place of residence, whether in Israel or outside its borders, and other security measures. The program may also encompass family members of the witness.

Domestic Violence - Legal Aspects

147. As mentioned above, Amendment No. 11 (2008) to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law, (Requirement for a Hearing before Dismissal of a Request), determines that a Court may not dismiss a request for a protection order, or a request for an injunction against threatening harassment, according to the Prevention of Stalking Law, unless the petitioner or his/her representative has been given the opportunity to bring his/her claims before the Court, unless there are exceptional circumstances for reasons that must be recorded. The Amendment implements the recommendation of the Inter-governmental Committee for Prevention of Domestic Violence that was set up by a Government Resolution in February 1998, to amend the Law and to determine procedures to avoid the dismissal of requests for protection orders without the petitioner being given the opportunity to voice his/her claims before the Court. Given that in most cases, the victim is a woman, the instruction prescribed by law facilitates women in receiving their personal liberty and by doing so, assists them in better integrating into society.
148. Amendment No. 9 (2007) to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law is titled Protection Order against a Minor. Before the Amendment, according to Section 3, the Court was authorized to issue a protection order, in specific circumstances, against a person for protection of a member of his/her family. However, there was no special provision for a situation where the protection order has been requested against a member of the family who is a minor and not for his/her protection. Amendment No. 9 added Section 3A to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law, which determines the procedure for issuing a protection order against a minor. Accordingly, a request for a protection order against a minor can only be presented to the Family Matters Court. The Family Matters Court Auxiliary Unit will be asked to report to the Court with regard to the conflict and the possibilities of reaching a solution outside the Court, and to give its recommendation. The Unit is also responsible to inform the minor of his/her rights regarding representation by a lawyer. Before issuing the protection order, the Court must consider the circumstances and the welfare of the minor and must also give the minor the opportunity to voice his/her position before the Court. A protection order that includes removing the minor from his/her home may not be issued unless the Court has received a written report from the welfare officer appointed under the provisions of the Youth Law (Care and Supervision) 5720-1960 (the “Youth Law (Care and Supervision)”) approving of the order, and a suitable out-of-home arrangement was located for the minor.

Other Legislative Developments

149. On July 12, 2007, the Limitation Law 5718-1958 (the “Limitation Law”), was amended (Amendment No. 4) in order to extend the limitation period for civil suits concerning sexual assault or abuse of minors. The Amendment relates to a civil suit concerning sexual assault of a minor, or child abuse by a family member or a person responsible for the child, as well as the sexual assault of a person between the ages of 18 and 21, while exploiting relations of dependence, authority, trust or treatment, or if the sexual assault was committed by a family member. In these cases, the limitation period will not commence before the victim reaches the age of 28. The Law further stipulates that if an indictment was filed, the civil limitation period will not end until one year after a conclusive verdict has passed.

Extent of the Phenomenon of Domestic Violence

Domestic Violence – General Data

150. Recent data from the Ministry of Public Security that was prepared for the Knesset Committee for Advancement of the Status of Women for the International Day for the Elimination of Violence against Women in 2008, indicates that between January and October 2008, 12,777 investigations were opened following reports of domestic violence. In this period, 24.3% of the complaints filed were made by new immigrants. 19.2% were filed by new immigrants from the former Soviet Union, 2.2% by new immigrants from Ethiopia and the rest by new immigrants from other countries. 11.8% of the complaints filed were made by Arab women. The following table indicates the number and status of cases opened regarding women complaints filed for domestic violence:

Table 6 - Cases Opened for Complaints filed by Women for Domestic Violence, 2006-2008
(by Status)

Year	Number of cases opened	Open cases	Cases processed by the Police Prosecution/ Attorney General offices	Cases in deliberation	Cases sentenced	Reason of closure

2007	14,748	663	3,681	1,860	8,507	559	4,685	3,012	251

151. Between January and October 2008, the Israeli Police made 3,679 arrests in cases of family violence, compared to 3,467 arrests between January and October 2007.

152. The Ministry of Health operates a special staff unit assigned with identifying women who are victims of violence when they are seeking medical treatment, and to improve and advance the medical treatment they are given. The unit is responsible for the distribution of circulars from the Director General and also for the guidance of medical personnel regarding domestic violence. The Ministry of Health also trains social workers who specialize in treating infants in various hospitals and Health Funds (HMOs), in order for them to be able to identify female victims of violence and give the needed assistance as quickly as possible.
153. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women conducted a survey aimed at exploring the public's awareness and views of domestic violence and violence against women in the population in general, and in the Arab population. The survey showed that the public accepts that a women suffering violence from their spouse should turn to seek help in the form of counseling and support (97% of the women and 87% of the men agreed with that phrase) and 80% of the general public believes that it is possible to break the cycle of violence. According to the survey, 70% of the people interviewed were aware of the issue of violence against women.

154. Recently, the Tel Aviv District Court sentenced a defendant to 16 years imprisonment, and 2 years' suspended imprisonment. The court further ordered that the defendant pay compensation to his wife and children. The defendant was convicted of committing multiple offenses including two rape offenses, two offenses of assault under aggravated circumstances, as well as assault that causes actual bodily harm and abuse of minors.

The defendant married the complainant when she was 15 years old in Georgia and at some point the family moved to Israel. The complainant and her children were subjected to severe violence, threats, insults and humiliations. The domestic atmosphere was described to be fearful and terrorized, and the defendant acted toward his family members as he deemed fit. The complainant and the children were terrorized by the defendant so much that at one point, the complainant tried to commit suicide. The complainant and her children are still fearful of the defendant, and suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder. The Court determined that the defendant should be subjected to a prison sentence that would convey the loathing and the disgust the Court has towards his behavior, as well as serve the retaliation principle and deter the defendant and the public in general from committing similar offenses (S.Cr.C. 1148/06 The State of Israel v. Anonymous (09.08.2008)).

Police Handling of Domestic Violence

155. Police records show a decrease in the number of complaints of domestic violence compared to the previous reporting period. In 2007, 18,910 cases of domestic violence were recorded, a 6.7% decrease compared to the number of cases recorded in 2005 (20,185) and a 4.6% decrease compared to 2006 (19,793). Of the total number of complaints, 14,719 were filed by women. The following diagram illustrates offences upon which spousal cases were recorded.

156. Domestic violence remains a threat to women's safety and well being. In 2008, ten women were murdered by their spouses. The following chart demonstrates further information regarding spousal murder.

157. Domestic violence is an alarming social phenomenon that requires special treatment by the Police' Victims of Crime unit, from both a societal and criminal point of view. Police recognition of the need to attach special attention to the status of victims of crime in police procedures, especially with regards to victims of domestic violence, led to a new Victims of Crime Section being established in 1996 within the Investigations Department of the Police. New procedures were subsequently issued for the treatment of domestic violence offences, violations of protection and prevention orders, and stalking and sex offences. These procedures are occasionally updated. In addition, special training has been introduced focusing specifically on the issue of domestic violence. Collaboration between Police, welfare and community bodies is also being developed in accordance with legislative amendments and other developments. The Victims of Crime unit is intimately involved in manifesting societal change in this area, and takes part in all the relevant social processes, including that of creating legislation, steering committees and inter-ministerial committees.

158. Owing to their special characteristics, domestic violence offences require special treatment. For example, an effective response to offences of this kind may require an immediate reaction to prevent possible abuse, risk assessments throughout the treatment, full utilization of Police procedures including prohibition to carry weapons, collaboration between all treatment bodies, and awareness of the difficulty in collecting evidence.
159. Due to these unique characteristics, a special task force of 200 investigators specializing in the treatment of domestic violence and sex offences was formed, and has been operating since the beginning of 1998. As detailed in Israel's previous report, the task force consists of specially trained investigators specializing in domestic violence cases. Fifty other investigators handle these cases in smaller police stations in addition to their usual workload. Nine of the investigators are female Arabic speaking investigators who were appointed for treatment of Arab women in stations that serve the Arab community. There are currently 18 Arabic-speaking investigators, 14 Russian-speaking and 3 Amharic-speaking officers. In every police station there are at least two investigators who are specially trained for dealing with domestic violence cases as well as sex offences and in police stations where the extent of such complaints is insignificant, investigators are trained for this function in addition to their ordinary functions.
160. Furthermore, in 2003, the Police designated six district offence victims' officers in charge of contact with victims of crimes (VOC) in each district. These officers conduct professional supervision regarding the implementation of the law and regulations in their respective districts, provide assistance and conduct training programs to field units such as patrol units, and create models for cooperation with non-police units such as treatment elements. In addition, the Israeli police districts also appointed district officers in charged on domestic violence issues. This appointment was made in order to provide professional, efficient and immediate treatment in the field of domestic violence and sex offences and also due to demands and needs rising from police field units.
161. As mentioned above, as of 2004, 12 training and enrichment program sessions are given to investigators of sexual offences in all the police districts.
162. Police investigators must be specially trained in order to treat cases of domestic violence. The training introduces Police guidelines on the issue and includes focused studies on the specific aspects of domestic violence, providing theoretical and practical information as to the social, legislative and judicial aspects of the phenomenon. For example, the participants are to take part in lectures and discussions regarding risk assessment, prevention of access to weapons, certain aspects of legislation, treatment of battering men, special characteristics of child - witness of domestic violence, models for collaboration with different welfare bodies, protection orders and their violations. In addition, the participants take part in a workshop aimed at encouraging victims of violence to come forward, during which they visit a shelter for battered women and watch a special film/theatre play on this issue. All persons who currently work as domestic violence investigators took part in this training, and were subsequently approved to treat cases of domestic violence.

163. The Crime Victims' Rights Law, which entered into force in 2005, requires providing relevant information to a victim of crime on every stage of the criminal procedure. As required, the Police established a new computerized system designated for this purpose. The system gathers the necessary information from other systems including Police systems, the Israeli Prisons Service and the State Attorney's Office. Victims of crime may receive the information by calling a designated phone number or by text or voice messages initiated by the computerized system. The information is also accessible through the internet. The system became operational in May 2005.
164. In 2007, a manned phone service center was established in order to assist persons who find it hard to receive information via voice messages or through the internet. The following table describes the number of applications for information received by the system:

Table 7 - Requests for Information according to the Crime Victims' Rights Law, 2005-2007

2007	4,544	37,217

Source: Ministry of Public security, August 2008

165. Prior to 2005, 250 delegates from all Police units received special training regarding the Crime Victims' Rights Law. Special training kits were distributed to all Police investigators and additional training material was distributed through the Police intranet. This important issue was also included in the training program of the Investigations and Intelligence Department, and accordingly, from 2005 to 2006, 90 educational programs were carried out. In addition, the Police issued procedure No. 03.300.219 titled "Police Treatment of Crime Victims", as well as signs and informative materials in all relevant languages related to the criminal procedure and to crime victims' rights, were distributed to all police units.
166. In recent years, the Police has been operating a computerized threat assessment system that assists in evaluating and assessing the threat posed by suspects in domestic violence cases. The system receives information from various sources, and by combining these sources and evaluating certain parameters, the system performs a risk assessment and assembles a profile of each suspect. The Police has also created specialized risk assessment squads in several police stations. These teams include a social worker, a clinical criminologist, and a police officer. The squads help to assess the threat posed by suspects, and initiate enforcement and treatment procedures. Additionally, in several police stations, social workers are employed to provide instant assistance when a domestic violence complaint is being filed. The social workers make an initial assessment of the problem at hand, and also ascertain the willingness of the victim and/or the suspect, to receive treatment in help centers. The project operates at 11 police stations around the country.

167. Distress buttons are issued to women at high risk, once they have received a court order for their protection.

Additional Data on Police Practices Regarding Domestic Violence Cases

168. The use of the computerized assessment system and the risk assessment of a suspect in cases of domestic violence is conducted immediately at the beginning of any domestic violence investigation, and afterwards at the beginning of each step of the investigation. This way, police investigators can better manage their actions regarding the suspect and can also better protect the victim.

169. The number of centers for the treatment and prevention of domestic violence is consistently rising. In 2008, 66 centers and units for the prevention of domestic violence and treatment of domestic violence victims were operating in Israel, compared to 64 in 2007. Seventeen of those centers were designated for the Arab population, one for the Bedouin population and two for the Jewish ultra-orthodox population. The centers treat victims of domestic violence through group therapy and personal empowerment within the community.
170. The centers operate within the framework of the local authorities' social services departments. In 2007, a total of 10,000 people received treatment in these centers, of which 6,649 were women. Also in 2007, the centers treated 8,600 families, of which 1,619 were families of new immigrants and 578 were families of elderly persons. Of those treated, 27% were men, 66% were women and 7% were child witnesses of domestic violence. In total the centers held 377 therapeutic groups, compared to 266 in 2004, a 41% increase.

171. The Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services provides battered women with three phases of shelter care. All shelters are operated by women associations and organizations, but are fully funded by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services and the local authorities.
172. Protection from violence is provided by 13 shelters for battered women and their children, established in different locations throughout the country. Due to their distinct cultural and religious needs, two shelters have been specially designated for Arab women, and one for ultra-Orthodox Jewish women. One of the shelters is designated for both Jewish and Arab women and, two shelters are accessible to the physically disabled, one of those also serving the Arab population. In 2007, these shelters provided emergency intervention for nearly 1,700 women and children.

The shelters provide professional counseling and legal advice and assistance, as well as childcare and rehabilitation. Several shelters also have multi-lingual staff and volunteers in order to better assist immigrant women. Children continue in community-based day-care or elementary school frameworks, whilst residing in the shelter.

173. In addition, there are 3 “reception apartments,” which are designated for women of all sectors of society, and are also adapted for women with disabilities. In 2007, these apartments housed 31 women and 75 children. There are also ten “transitional apartments,” which provide women with additional support and options when they are deemed ready to leave the shelters. In 2007, these apartments housed 46 women and 77 children for a length of stay ranging from six to 12 months.

Hotlines

174. Currently there is one national hotline for battered women and children. The line is operated by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services in association with Women’s International Zionist Organization (WIZO). The service is available in Hebrew, Arabic, Russian and Amharic. In 2007, the national hotline received 3,483 calls, 70% of them regarding violence against women. Details on local hotlines are also available on the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services website and so are two additional hotlines, one is designated for ultra orthodox women and is operated by the Ministry, and the other is for victims of sexual assault operated by the Association of Rape Crisis Centers in Israel. There are several additional hotlines operated by NGOs, receiving roughly the same number of calls. The Association of Rape Crisis Centers in Israel reported that during 2007, it received 7,419 calls from women, 2,796 of these calls were reports of rape, attempted rape and sexual abuse of a minor, 1,630 were reports of incest and 386 were report of gang rape and sexual attacks.
175. In 2006, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women focused its efforts on fighting violence that leaves no visible signs. During various activities, and after conducting a survey regarding public views on this matter, the Authority held a campaign under the slogan, “Don’t Let the Violence Kill You from the Inside – Even Words Can Be Violent”. Following the campaign, there was a 300% increase in the number of calls compared to the same period in 2005.
176. There is growing cooperation between Government Agencies and between them and non governmental organizations. This cooperation is particularly notable between NGOs and representatives of the Ministry of ITR, the Immigration Administration, the Police and the National Coordinator on the Battle against Trafficking in Persons.

Treatment of Battering Men

177. As of November 2008, there were 1,826 prisoners jailed for domestic violence offences in the IPS facilities. There are several programs developed for the treatment of battering men. The Beit Noam Association, together with the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, operates Beit Noam, an educational hostel designed for the treatment of battered men. The association also operates a hotline for battering men and their families. As mentioned in Israel’s previous report, the IPS established various treatment frameworks for domestic violators. One such program is Beit Hatikvah, which means house of hope, aimed at lowering the inmates’ level of violence, operating at the Hermon prison. Two similar programs are conducted in the Tzalmon and the Carmel Prisons. Additionally, domestic violators' treatment groups are active in all prisons, offering help in acknowledging and managing the problem.

178. In addition, the Family Matters Court Auxiliary Units employ social workers and offer immediate assistance to families mitigating in the Family Matters Courts. In 2007, 14 units were operating in which 993 families were treated for domestic violence.

Violence against Women within the Arab Population

179. In 2008, out of 66 Regional Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Violence against Women, 17 were designated for the Arab population and one was designated for the Bedouin population. The centers treat victims of domestic violence through group therapy and personal empowerment within the community.

180. Recent Police figures show that murder in the name of so-called "family honor" has decreased dramatically in recent years among the Arab population. According to the data, in 2005, seven Arab women were murdered in the name of "family honor," in 2006, six Arab women were murdered for that reason, in 2007 one Arab woman was murdered for "family honor," and that was also the figure for 2008. Murder is a severe crime in Israel, punishable by life imprisonment. The Police, as well as the Israeli legal system, regard any murder as such, and investigate it vigorously, regardless of the murderer's motives. Israeli law does not recognize any mitigating circumstances in such cases, and prosecutes, indicts and punishes the perpetrators in all severity.

181. Social Services. In May 2004, the Center for the Welfare of the Bedouin Family was established in Beer Sheva by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. The Center has two main goals:

181.1. To provide assistance to the Bedouin community in matters related to conflict and tension resolution in the family, as well as to provide therapeutic interventions.

181.2. To be a center for the prevention of, and education on, domestic violence.

The center is financed and supervised by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services and is operated by the Bedouin association Elwaha, which is staffed by specialized social workers.

The center provides many uniquely adapted services. For example, assistance is given in locating Bedouin families willing to take in female Bedouin victims of violence, allowing those women to remain within the Bedouin community whilst protecting them from further violence. These women's stay in the foster family is financed by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. Following its establishment, the Center has become an integral part of the community, and an essential tool at the disposal of the Courts, which may refer battering men to be treated in the Center.

182. Social Services operate in the Bedouin towns, as well as in illegal Bedouin villages. There are approximately 30 monthly appeals to Social Services from Bedouin women. Each woman receives individual care. There are also several Bedouin couples undergoing couple therapy. Note that the operation of the abovementioned Center has improved the treatment of domestic violence in the Bedouin population, enabling focused and efficient care to be provided, free from community and family pressures.

183. In 2008, the Service for Girls and Young Women handles about 380 young Bedouin women annually, about 300 in the South and about 80 in the North, providing both individual and group treatment.

Article 6 - Suppression of the Exploitation of Women

General

184. In recent years, there has been a sharp decline in the number of women trafficked to Israel for prostitution. This decline is evident in the number of trafficking victims located by law enforcement agencies, as well as reports issued by the Knesset Subcommittee on Trafficking in Women and NGOs. Only 12 trafficking victims for prostitution were transferred by the Police to the “Maagan” shelter for Victims of Trafficking in Persons in 2008, most of them were trafficked several years ago.
185. Note that in 2008, there were very few cases of trafficking for prostitution handled by the State Attorney’s Office, indicating the success of the massive enforcement efforts by the law enforcement agencies, as well as the severe punishments imposed by the courts. Note that “classic” trafficking, as was found in the earlier years, including purchase and sale of a person, violence, incarceration, withholding of passports, threats, objectification, coercion and blunt and cruel enslavement, was rarely found, and mostly relates to cases that took place in 2005.
186. According to Police estimates, between 2007 and 2008, there has been a dramatic decrease in the number of cases and indictments served regarding trafficking in persons for prostitution. Since 2005 more than 40 people were convicted for trafficking in persons, and received punishments of eight to 18 years imprisonment.
187. The main countries of origin from which past victims of trafficking in persons have arrived are Ukraine, Russia, Moldova, Belarus and Uzbekistan. The major trafficking route was mainly through Russia, and illegal smuggling via the Israeli border with Egypt. Due to strict supervision, entry via the official sea and air ports is insignificant.
188. The Government of Israel does not tolerate the phenomenon of trafficking in persons. Israel has combated this phenomenon in the past, and continues to do so with increased vigor during the reporting period. This issue is a priority for the Government. In the past five years in particular, Israel has undertaken increased efforts to prevent trafficking, to protect its victims and to prosecute the perpetrators.

The Parliamentary Subcommittee of the Trafficking in Women

189. The Parliamentary Subcommittee on Trafficking in Women, whose chairperson is MK Zehava Gallon, is a Subcommittee of the Committee on the Status of Women, designed to focus on the battle against trafficking in women. This Subcommittee continues to be active in the control, monitoring and overall supervision of trafficking for prostitution, through legislation, regular meetings, advocacy of relevant causes and inviting high-ranking government officials to its meetings to be questioned regarding the activity of their governmental bodies. In addition, this Subcommittee holds an annual session following the publication of the U.S. State Department's Report on Trafficking in Persons (hereinafter: TIP) during which the issues raised in the report are discussed.

190. During its meetings in the reporting period, the Subcommittee dealt with the following issues: the delay in establishing a special forfeiture fund; the institutionalization of prostitution and its impact on combating trafficking in women for prostitution; methods of fighting brothels operating through the internet; the U.S. State Department TIP Report; follow up on the implementation of a trafficking awareness-raising campaign in the education system concerning trafficking; discussion whether labor relations apply to the relations between trafficking victims and panderers, following the National Labor Court decision determining that a victim of trafficking for prostitution is entitled to the minimum wage on account of her "work"; changes in trafficking patterns such as the increase in the number of Israeli women trafficked for prostitution in servitude conditions.
191. The Subcommittee continues promoting the following bills: the Penal Law (Amendment – Prohibition of the Publication of Ads Publishing Prostitution Services); the Prohibition of the Use of Paid Sexual Services Law.
192. The Subcommittee attaches great importance to the cooperation with NGOs, and therefore maintains close professional ties with these organizations, which serve as a firsthand source for studying problems related to the treatment of victims of trafficking and promoting protection of the victims. The activities of these organizations have led to public awareness of the problems faced by female trafficking victims, and the need to view them as victims.

Prevention

Information Campaigns

193. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in the Prime Minister's Office has been increasingly active in the area of promoting awareness of the issue of combating trafficking in women. The Authority's target audiences are the Civil Service, the Local Authorities, the Education System, the Kibbutzim Movement and the IDF. Annual activities conducted toward achievement of those goals include the following:
 - 193.1. The Authority conducted a survey designed to examine the public's positions regarding trafficking in women and prostitution. According to the survey, 50% of the public is of the opinion that legislation criminalizing the purchase of sexual services is required. 66% of the population believes that the panderer is the sole offender in the prostitution cycle. 68% of the public believes that prostitution derives from the hardships of life, whereas 18% believes that it derives from a personal choice. 41% of the population perceives prostitution as a profession, while only 57% is aware of the fact that most women in prostitution enter the cycle of prostitution as children.

- 193.2. On December 16, 2008, the Authority held a one day seminar titled, "Trafficking in Women" in cooperation with the Be'er Sheva Municipality. The seminar was attended by the Mayor, the Director General of the city, the municipality's Advisor on the Advancement of the Status of Women, and other leading women. The seminar included lectures from Police and NGO representatives and a lecture by the National Coordinator.
- 193.3. On December 15, 2008, a one-day seminar on trafficking in women was held in the Prime Minister's Office. During the seminar, the Director of the Authority presented up to date data regarding the scope of trafficking in women in Israel and measures taken to combat the phenomenon. An NGO representative also gave a lecture on the issue, and the film "Lilia 4ever" was screened.
- 193.4. In December 2008, the Authority, in cooperation with the Tel Aviv Municipality and the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, held a one day seminar under the title, "My Body Is Here, but I Am Somewhere Else - Women and Girls in the Prostitution Cycle." The seminar was attended by the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services and by MK Zehava Gallon, chair of the Parliamentary Subcommittee on Trafficking in Women, who also discussed the use of legislation to promote changes in perceptions regarding the prostitution phenomenon.
- The seminar also served as a platform to launch and present the inter-ministerial Plan for the Rehabilitation and Treatment of Women and Girls Engaged in Prostitution in order to Assist Them in Breaking the Vicious Cycle of Prostitution.
- The seminar was advertised to the general public and was attended by various Government Ministries' representatives, including the National Coordinator and local authorities' officials, as well as professionals in related fields and other interested persons. The seminar received wide media coverage and gave rise to discussions in various public media outlets such as radio and newspapers. All of this contributed greatly to raising awareness of the prostitution phenomenon.
- 193.5. This year, the educational activities and awareness campaigns regarding trafficking in women in the various frameworks of the IDF, Civil Service and of the Kibbutzim Movement were conducted separately from the activities of the Authority. Nonetheless, as the International Day for the Abolishment of Slavery neared, the Authority sent letters to the IDF, the Civil Service and the Kibbutzim Movement, recommending that they hold informational activities concerning trafficking in women. In addition, the Authority invited the officials of these bodies to participate in the activities and seminars held by the Authority.
- 193.6. In addition, the Authority conducted promotional activities within the education system in cooperation with the Department for Gender Equality in the Ministry of Education. Such activities included conferences with senior education workers, inspectors and school headmasters, and also special lectures and presentations for teachers.
- 193.7. The Authority also holds conferences and publishes information concerning the International Day for the Abolishment of Slavery.

194. National Award. In the wake of Government Resolution No. 2670, dated December 2, 2007, the Government approved an annual National Award for individuals and bodies that have made outstanding contributions to the battle against trafficking in persons. This award is aimed at providing support to those who do this trying work, and encourages others to increase efforts to wage in the battle. The 2008 award recipients have been chosen and announced, and the awards was given in an annual ceremony that was held in March 2009, at the President's Residence, and presented by the President.
195. The National Coordinator. During the reporting period the Coordinator participated in training and educational initiatives geared toward the general public.
196. The Coordinator also distributes information on trafficking, both on the web site of the Office of the Coordinator and by means of a weekly digest of information from the Internet, sent to actors inside and outside the Government. Each year, she prepares a general document on trafficking and the Government's battle against it, which appears on the web site.
197. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Ministry is at the finalization stage of an anti-trafficking campaign to be carried out in countries from which many trafficked women originate. To that end, an inter-governmental team was established with a representative of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs sitting as a chairperson. The team is working on broadening the scope of the information campaign to other countries of origin. The campaign will be conducted, as in the past, in cooperation with Israeli and non-Israeli NGOs.
198. The Ministry of Education. The Ministry acts vigorously to promote information campaigns intended to raise awareness both among the ministry's staff and among pupils.
199. Raising awareness among members of the education system - A booklet on trafficking in women and prostitution was prepared by the Ministry of Education and is scheduled for distribution to the personnel of the secondary education system. The booklet includes comprehensive information on prostitution and trafficking in women in general and in Israel in particular, the "clients" and victims of the "sex industry", legislation, enforcement and other measures of combating trafficking and prostitution, educational activities and lesson plans regarding these issues, methods to raise parents' and the community's awareness and involvement, as well as information on the various bodies and organizations dealing with these issues within the education system.
200. During 2008, the Ministry continued to increase its efforts in raising awareness of the general issue of trafficking in persons, and more specifically of trafficking for the purpose of prostitution. The Ministry held four conferences for members of the education system under the title, "Human Dignity – Man and Woman, Conference on Trafficking in Persons, Particularly in Women". Five hundred seventeen members of the education system participated in these conferences.
201. Raising awareness among pupils - The issue of trafficking was integrated into the education program concerning gender equality. As part of the 14-session gender equality program, two sessions were dedicated to issues relating to trafficking in women. 4,072 pupils and 258 teachers participated in this program during 2008. This program was complemented by training for the relevant members of the education system, as well as activities involving the pupils' parents.

202. Also during 2008, the Ministry held three educational conferences on trafficking in women for pupils in the 11th and 12th grades in Nahariya, Ashdod and Kiryat-Gat, in which a total of 1,500 pupils and 104 members of the education system took part. These conferences were the highlight of a comprehensive educational program in the framework of the International Women's Day. As part of this program and prior to the pupils' conferences, the teachers and other education personnel in the participating high schools underwent training on the issues, received lesson plans dealing with human dignity and trafficking in persons in general, and in women in particular. The conferences were also followed by complementing educational activities dealing with human dignity, equality and gender issues.
203. Furthermore, approximately 200 lectures were given in schools throughout the country on the prevention of violence toward women and the prevention of prostitution and trafficking in women. These lectures were funded by the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women.
204. On December 2, 2008, the International Day Commemorating the Abolition of Slavery, the Ministry circulated a lesson plan titled, "Prostitution and Trafficking in Women as a Form of Slavery in the 21st Century". The lesson focused on the proximity of these phenomena to our doorstep, and the possibility that a girl engaging in prostitution could also be a girl in class or from a nearby neighborhood.
205. The Israel Broadcasting Authority extensively covers the issue of trafficking in women for prostitution, encompassing topics such as sessions held by the Knesset Trafficking in Women Subcommittee, the extent of trafficking in women for prostitution in Israel, and investigative reports on pandering practices.
206. The Israel Broadcasting Authority's radio channels also address the issue of trafficking in women, including ongoing reports on Police raids on brothels and the Police treatment of the women on the premises, as well as an interview with a former prostitute who has recently been engaging in assistance and rehabilitation of women and girls in order to break the vicious cycle of prostitution. Furthermore, the Israel Broadcasting Authority radio channel Kol Israel (the voice of Israel) dedicated a broadcast to the issue as part of a one-day seminar initiated by the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women and the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, under the title, "My Body is Here, But I Am Somewhere Else."

The Legal Framework

Ratification of Key Conventions

207. In June and July 2008, respectively, Israel ratified the two major international treaties on trafficking: the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, and the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime.

Legislation

208. The Anti Trafficking Law 5767–2006 (the “Anti Trafficking Law”) that came into force on October 29, 2006, applies a broad trafficking crime to a number of illegal practices such as prostitution, sexual crimes, slavery or forced labor, removal of organs, pornography, and using a person’s body to give birth to a baby who is then taken from her (section 377A(a) of the Penal Law). The crime is addressed with a punishment of 16 years of imprisonment, and 20 years of imprisonment if the offence is committed against a minor. The Law includes a full spectrum of crimes in order to address gradations of exploitation: Slavery (section 375A of the Penal Law) - 16 years of incarceration; trafficking for the purpose of slavery or forced labor (section 377A(a) of the Penal Law) - 16 years of incarceration; forced labor (section 376 of the Penal Law) - 7 years of incarceration; exploitation of vulnerable populations (section 431 of the Penal Law) - 3 years of incarceration. For the first time, Israel has a slavery offense, a broad forced labor offence with heightened sentencing and heightened punishment for exploitation of vulnerable populations.
209. In addition, the abduction offence has been broadened to include two new offences: (1) abduction for the purpose of slavery or forced labor and conveying a person beyond the boundaries of a state (sections 374A and 370 of the Penal Law) and (2) causing a person to leave a state for the purposes of prostitution or slavery (section 376B of the Penal Law).
210. The Limiting Use of Premises in order to Prevent the Commission of Crime Law 5765-2005 (the “Limiting Use of Premises in order to Prevent the Commission of Crime Law”), authorizes the Police and the courts to limit the use of an area, or to close it completely, if those premises have served in the commission of prostitution offences or trafficking for the purpose of prostitution offences, in circumstances where the authorities involved are convinced that the premises will continue to be so used. Courts have the authority to issue such orders for a period of 90 days, with the possibility of extension. Police may issue such orders for a period of 30 days, during which time they may request a further pronouncement from the Courts.

Minimum Punishments

211. The 2006 Amendment No. 91 to the Penal Law instituted a minimum punishment for slavery and trafficking in human beings offences, constituting 25% of the maximum that may be imposed. The Amendment also prohibits imposition of suspended sentences except in special circumstances, which must be specified in the Court’s decision.

Criminal and Administrative Proceedings

212. Law enforcement agencies such as the Police, the Immigration Administration and the Enforcement Department in the Ministry of ITL have greatly intensified their efforts to combat trafficking. Prosecution initiatives are undertaken on three planes. Firstly, police prosecutions are initiated against traffickers and their accomplices in trafficking and trafficking related offences. Secondly, prosecutions and revocation of licenses may be initiated according to the provisions of various regulations and supplementary laws. Thirdly, prosecutions according to criminal laws other than trafficking such as pandering, causing a person to engage in prostitution, soliciting prostitution, kidnapping etc., may be initiated, as well as prosecutions for fraudulent activity, forgery, or exploitation of vulnerable populations.

Investigation and Prosecution

Police Activities

213. Cooperation between Israeli Police and Police forces in countries of origin is maintained, thus laying the groundwork for the extradition of traffickers. Between 2007 and 2008, joint investigations were held by the Israeli Police in cooperation with the Police forces of Russia, Belarus, Ukraine and Germany, in which several cases of trafficking in persons were solved and several offenders were extradited to Israel.
214. The Minister of Public Security and the Police Commissioner have guided the investigation units to strengthen and enhance Police enforcement regarding offences of publication of prostitution services. The Police has shown a growing awareness of the rights of victims and have issued guidelines to protect these rights. The Anti Trafficking Law was distributed to all the Police units and a Police procedure regarding treatment of trafficking offences, slavery and forced labor was created (Police procedure No. 03.300.120). The abovementioned procedure elaborates on the new legislative amendments and their significance, the procedure for treatment of trafficking victims and foreign witnesses, and also allocates responsibility to various Police units.
215. In June 2007, the head of the Investigations and Intelligence Department of the Israeli Police issued a guideline, according to which enforcement of the trafficking offence must be included in the various units' work plans. Following the implementation of this guideline, a significant increase in handling of pimping, management of brothels and publication of prostitution services offences was noticeable.

The Prosecution

216. During 2008, five persons were convicted of trafficking for the purpose of prostitution, and/or related offences.
217. Six indictments were filed in 2008 for the abovementioned offences, in addition to 12 ongoing cases that are pending before the courts. Another seven appeals were submitted to the Supreme Court by defendants convicted of trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, and/or related offences, several of which appealed against their conviction. These appeals are pending before the Supreme Court. The sentences appealed vary from six months to 13 years of imprisonment, in addition to compensation to victims, depending on the severity of the offences. An appeal submitted by the State against a lenient sentence is also pending before the Supreme Court.
218. Furthermore, during 2008, the Supreme Court dismissed 11 appeals submitted by defendants against the severity of their sentence. Several defendants appealed the conviction itself. The sentences appealed have varied from one and a half to 18 years of imprisonment, as well as additional compensation to victims, depending on the severity of the offences. In one case the Supreme Court reduced a sentence to 15 years of imprisonment and in another case the sentence was reduced from 13 to 12 years of imprisonment.

Courts

219. The Courts have interpreted the relevant legislation in a broad manner, thus enabling the conviction of traffickers despite the efforts of defense counsel to stress the letter of the law at the expense of its spirit. Courts have also shown enhanced understanding and awareness of the gravity of this offence and of the need for more severe sanctions. The Courts have explicitly and repeatedly stressed the severity of trafficking offences and expressed the view that it is their obligation to impose strict sentences in order to reflect the severe maximal penalty imposed by law. For further elaboration on severe sentencing please see below.

The Actual Situation

Sentencing

Severe Sentences

220. On January 14, 2008, the Jerusalem District Court convicted three defendants for Trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, inducement to engage in prostitution under aggravated circumstances and other related charges. The first defendant was sentenced to 12 years of imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, a 20,000 NIS ($5,000) fine, and 10,000 NIS ($2,500) compensation to each of the victims. The second defendant was sentenced to nine years of imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, a 20,000 NIS ($5,000) fine, and 10,000 NIS ($2,500) compensation to each of the victims. The third defendant was sentenced to six years of imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, and a 20,000 NIS ($5,000) fine. Both the State and the defendant filed an appeal. The Supreme Court denied both the appeals (S.Cr.C 708/04 The State of Israel v. Braditzevski et. al. and Cr.A. 10592/05, The State of Israel v. Braditzevski (14.1.2008)).
221. In the case of Cr.A. 1652/07 Yan Normatov et. al. v. The State of Israel (08.10.2007), seven defendants were convicted in multiple offenses of trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, pandering, inducement to engage in prostitution under aggravated circumstances, rape under aggravated circumstances, threats, violations of the Entry into Israel Law 5712 -1952 (the "Entry into Israel Law"), false imprisonment, obstruction of justice, and indecent acts.

The first defendant was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment and was ordered to pay compensation of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) to each of the four victims. The second defendant was sentenced to five years' imprisonment, to pay compensation of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) to one victim. The third defendant was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment and to pay compensation of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) to three victims. The fourth defendant was sentenced to six years' imprisonment and to pay compensation of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) to three victims. The fifth defendant was sentenced to four years' imprisonment and to pay compensation of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) to two victims. The sixth defendant was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and to pay compensation of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) to one victim. The seventh defendant was not sentenced to imprisonment other than the detention already served, however he was ordered to pay compensation of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) one victim.

Both the defendants and the State filed appeals. The Supreme Court denied the appeals of defendants 3-7 on the sentence and punishment. The Court accepted the State's appeal in the cases of defendants three and four and added another year to their imprisonment sentence. The state's appeals regarding defendants 5-7 were denied. With regard to defendant 1, his appeal was accepted with regard to two counts of rape, but was rejected with regard to the sentence and punishment. The Court accepted the State's appeal and raised the sentence of defendant 1 from ten to 11 years' imprisonment. The appeal of defendant 2 was accepted and his conviction in rape was altered to forbidden sexual intercourse and his sentence was mitigated from five years' imprisonment to four.

222. In the case of Cr.A. 3078, 2842/06, The State of Israel v. Smalashvily (7.7.07), the defendant was charged with conspiracy to commit a crime, attempt to induce a person to engage in prostitution under aggravated circumstances, inducement to engage in prostitution under aggravated circumstances and inducing a minor to engage in prostitution under aggravated circumstances. The defendant was initially sentenced to seven years of imprisonment, suspended imprisonment and 2,500 NIS ($625) compensation for each of the victims. Both the defendant and the State appealed the sentence to the Supreme Court, which rejected the defendant's appeal and accepted the State's appeal, and the punishment was raised from seven to nine years of imprisonment.
223. In yet another case the defendant was charged with trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, inducement to engage in prostitution under aggravated circumstances, pandering and violation of lawful order. The defendant was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment, suspended imprisonment and 30,000 NIS ($7,500) compensations for the victims (Cr.A. 8235/05, Tyomkin v. The State of Israel (25.9.07)).
224. In another case, two defendants were charged with trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, pandering and violations of the Entry into Israel Law. The first defendant was sentenced to 12 years of imprisonment, suspended imprisonment and 30,000 NIS ($7,500) compensation. The second defendant was sentenced to nine years of imprisonment (following an appeal), suspended imprisonment and 50,000 NIS ($12,500) compensation. Following an appeal filed by the defendants, the Supreme Court acquitted both defendants of pandering, but approved all other convictions. The Court accepted the State's appeal and raised the punishment of the second defendant from eight to nine years of imprisonment (Cr.A. 4183, 5940, 5983/04, The State of Israel v. Salomon and Bass (9.10.07)).

Compensation for the Victim of the Crime

225. As mentioned in Israel's previous report, in addition to imposing strict punishment, according to section 77 of the Penal Law, courts are authorized to rule upon compensation to victims of up to the sum of 228,000 NIS ($57,000) per crime. There is a growing tendency by the Courts to award compensation for victims of trafficking. It is noteworthy that the strict attitude of the courts is explicitly stated in cases of related offences as well. The majority of the cases decided by the courts included compensation for the victims. In addition, recent sums ruled upon have been relatively substantial. For example:

226. Two defendants were charged with trafficking in persons (TIP) for the purpose of prostitution, conspiracy, inducement to engage in prostitution under aggravated circumstances, pandering under aggravated circumstances and subornation in connection with investigation. On December 11, 2007, both defendants were convicted for conspiracy to commit a felony, TIP, inducement to engage in prostitution managing a place for the purpose of prostitution, publication of prostitution services, indecent act, subornation in connection with investigation and violations of the Entry into Israel Law. The first defendant was sentenced to seven years of imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, 10,000 NIS ($2,500) fine and 25,000 NIS ($6,250) compensation for the victim. The second defendant was sentenced to five years of imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, 7,500 NIS ($1,875) fine and 15,000 NIS ($3,750) compensation for the victim (S.Cr.C. 1137/06 The State of Israel v. Leonid Braun and Yevgeny Radoslasky (Be'er-Sheva District Court, 19.2.08).
227. In a more recent case, the defendant was convicted in trafficking in persons for the purpose of engaging in prostitution, rape, sodomy and conspiracy to commit a crime. The defendant was sentenced to 13 years imprisonment and compensation of 25,000 NIS ($6,250) to each of the victims. The defendant, along with two other persons, mediated the “sale” of two young sisters from Russia, who were coerced to come to Israel under the promise that they would work as hostesses in bars. Instead, the sisters were sold to brothels or escort services for the purpose of engaging in prostitution, all for a mediation fee. The defendant appealed his sentence, and the Supreme Court accepted the appeal and mitigated his sentence from 13 to 12 years. The rest of the sentence remained the same (Cr.A. 2589/05 Mekyevsky v. the State of Israel (2.4.2008)).

Protection of Victims and the Humane Dimension

Shelter

228. The Maagan shelter for victims of trafficking for prostitution began operating on February 15, 2004. The shelter’s capacity is up to 50 victims. It has succeeded in creating a supportive climate for victims and provides access to psychological, social, medical and legal assistance. In addition, the shelter has developed procedures to allow for the safe return of victims of trafficking to their countries of origin. It should be noted that the shelter also finds jobs for women who are deemed ready to work.
229. Since its establishment, the shelter has housed 263 women. During 2008, 12 victims of trafficking for prostitution were directed to the shelter, in comparison to 34 women during 2007, and 46 women during 2006. Also in 2008, 44 women and seven children resided in the shelter with the average time of residence being 12.3 months (ranging from 11 days to three years). Twenty-four women left the shelter during 2008, of which ten women received a one-year visa and left for residence outside the shelter, eight women left the shelter on their own accord and six returned to their country of origin. As of January 2009, there are 25 women and five children residing in the shelter.

230. Most of the women currently residing in the shelter come from the Ukraine (28%), China (20%), Moldova (8%), Uzbekistan (8%) and India (8%). The remaining women arrived from Russia, Sri Lanka, Belarus, Nepal and Brazil. More than half of the women referred during 2008 were between ages of 20 and 26. The youngest woman referred to the shelter was 20 years old and the oldest was 34.
231. Of the women who resided in the shelter during 2008, six were victims of trafficking for forced labor and/or servitude; 15 were victims of trafficking for prostitution and the remaining women were accepted on humanitarian grounds.

Assistance to Victims outside the Shelter's Framework

232. Medical care - victims who do not reside in the shelter, but rather in detention facilities (if they are not identified as victims or do not wish to go to the shelter) are provided with their basic necessities and medical care in the framework of the facilities of the Immigration Administration and the Israel Prisons Service (IPS). Physicians employed by the IPS examine the women when necessary. In addition, Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv and Shaarei Tzedek Hospital in Jerusalem provide the women with basic medical services, and the women receive unconditional emergency medical care at any of the emergency rooms in the country. These women are also eligible for free medical services related to the treatment of sexually transmitted diseases in two clinics of the Lewinsky Medical Center in Tel Aviv and Haifa.
233. In the cases of women who have received visas from the Minister of the Interior, no longer reside in the shelter, and are employed, medical insurance is provided by the employer according to the Foreign Workers Law 5751-1991 (the "Foreign Workers Law"), which requires employers to arrange broad medical insurance for employees who are foreign workers, including victims of trafficking who are employed. Employers who violate this obligation may be criminally prosecuted.
234. Legal Aid - As detailed below, legal aid is provided to every trafficking victim by the Legal Aid Branch of the Ministry of Justice, regardless of her place of residence.

Coordination

235. Directors Generals Committee. A Government Resolution of May 21, 2006, established a Directors Generals Committee that convened on July 10, 2006, and decided on the creation of two Subcommittees, to recommend operative steps to combat trafficking for the purpose of prostitution and labor.
236. National Plans for combating trafficking. National Plans have been approved to combat slavery and trafficking for slavery, forced labor and trafficking for the purpose of prostitution. These National Plans were approved by the Directors Generals' Committee on January 10, 2007, and July 11, 2007, and by Government Resolution No. 2670 dated December 2, 2007.
237. The appointment of a National Coordinator who assists policy making in this area, particularly with regard to protection of victims, she works to identify trouble spots and bring about solutions before they burgeon, maintains communication with international actors and learns from comparative materials, promotes education and training, encourages research and develops established channels of communications between governmental and NGO actors in an effort to strengthen cooperation.

Visas

238. All victims in the Maagan shelter for victims of trafficking for prostitution receive temporary visas plus work visas if requested, whether they choose to testify or not. Women who choose to testify receive a visa for the duration of the court procedures, which on average, takes one year. After they finish the procedures they are entitled to request a temporary visa for another year like all the other victims who chose not to testify. These visas are valid for one year, though in some cases, the duration may vary. In addition, victims who do not stay in the shelter receive temporary visas. In 2008, five women received a B1 visa allowing them to stay and work in Israel for six months; one woman received a B2 visa allowing her to stay for three months, but not work; five women received an extension of their visa following their testimony; three women received an inter-visa allowing its holder to leave the country during their testimonies and return within a designated time period without needing to reapply; eleven women received a one-year visa for humanitarian reasons; two women received a visa for an additional year.

Legal Aid

239. All victims of trafficking are entitled by law to receive free legal aid in order to institute civil suits arising from the trafficking offences committed against them or administrative procedures relating to the Entry into Israel Law. According to the Courts (Fees) Regulations 5767-2007 (the “Courts (Fees) Regulations”), victims of trafficking and slavery given legal aid are exempt from paying court fees, thus expediting the process of submitting claims and making it more efficient.
240. In addition, on November 16, 2008, Amendment No. 9 to the Legal Aid Law 5769-2008 (the “Legal Aid Law”) entered into force. The Amendment established a permanent arrangement of free legal aid for all victims of trafficking and slavery. Previously, according to the Anti Trafficking Law, free legal aid for victims of trafficking other than trafficking for prostitution and slavery was given on a temporary basis.
241. In 2008, Legal Aid lawyers assisted 30 victims. Additionally, seven women were assisted with requests for a one year working visa (four women received positive responses, and an additional three for shorter periods), and eight women were aided in applications for additional one-year visas (six women received positive responses for shorter periods). Four women received assistance in requests for a visa based on humanitarian grounds, and four for additional visas. Furthermore, four women were aided in initiating tort claims against their traffickers, two suits were filed, one is in preparation and another case is under review. Nineteen additional tort claims are currently pending before the courts.

Police

242. In 2005, four cases were opened regarding offences of publication of prostitution services. In 2006, 13 cases were opened and in 2007, 30 cases were handled by the Police regarding this offence. The police also strengthened its fight against prostitution services of minors. Between the years 2005 and 2007, five cases were handled regarding this offence. No indictments have been served regarding this offence. In 2008, the Police conducted nine criminal investigations on trafficking in persons for the purpose of engaging them in prostitution. In the course of these cases, nine persons were arrested. Most of those arrested remained in custody until the conclusion of proceedings in their case. In addition, the Police opened 240 cases of managing a property for the purpose of engaging in prostitution and 56 pandering cases, some of which were originally trafficking cases, but lack of evidence led to the filing of pandering cases instead. The Police also closed 50 brothels according to an administrative court order.

243. Risk Assessments - The Police aids in the protection of victims by performing risk assessments in cases where the victim claims he/she or his/her family will be endangered if he/she is returned to his/her country of origin. Police Intelligence, with the assistance of Interpol and the Israeli Police delegate abroad, prepare a risk assessment that relates to the victim's risk status in Israel and in his/her country of origin

Study and training

244. Police - In 2008, the issue of trafficking in persons remained an integral part of most of the training courses taking place in the Investigations and Intelligence Training School, including lectures by members of the relevant NGOs, State Attorney's representatives and the National Coordinator. In addition, two weekly training courses on trafficking in persons were held during 2008. Trafficking training also takes place in combating organized crime training, courses for heads of Investigations and Intelligence offices, coordinators courses and similar courses.
245. In addition, as a part of the regular training of the School of Continuing Education for the Police, lectures and training regarding the Anti Trafficking Law and handling of trafficking offences were given to all of the Police personnel.
246. The Police works closely with Interpol in the area of trafficking and maintain direct cooperation with several countries of origin and other countries, through its representatives abroad, inter alia, as mentioned above with foreign Police forces regarding issues of threat assessments.
247. Israeli Police representatives have also participated in an international conference of the European Union in Budapest, where they presented methods and ways of operation used by the Israeli Police for handling trafficking offences.
248. The Ministry of Justice - Since the submission of Israel's previous report, the Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the Ministry of Justice continued to hold lectures, seminars and courses intended to raise the awareness of attorneys and legal advisors of issues such as trafficking in persons, treatment of victims of sexual offences, family violence etc. The various seminars and courses focus, inter alia, on issues such as: creating a humane and efficient contact with a victim of sexual offence, and Police work in regard of trafficking in persons etc.

249. At the beginning of 2007, a special seminar was held for all the lawyers in the Legal Aid Department concerning innovations in the Anti Trafficking Law. In November 2007, another training course took place for all the Department's lawyers concerning the salient aspects of the new Anti Trafficking Law and the recommendations of the inter-ministerial team for developing an action plan for identification of victims of trafficking and slavery.
250. In 2009, the institute is planning additional lectures and seminars that will include, inter alia, lectures on gender, society and justice, human rights in international law, social rights and a special course on the treatment of female victims of sexual assault.
251. The Institute of Advanced Judicial Studies - The Institute holds lectures, seminars and courses on the various forms of discrimination. For example, in 2005, the Institute held a course titled, "Equality and Discrimination", chaired by Professor Daphna Barak-Erez. In addition, various forms of discrimination are also discussed in lectures presented by the Institute regarding trafficking in women.
252. The Ministry of the Interior - On January 25, 2007, the Ministry of the Interior held a one-day seminar on trafficking geared toward employees who potentially encounter victims of trafficking for prostitution, including passport control officers at borders, employees in the visa departments, and high ranking officials from the Population Administration Office. The purpose was to familiarize the participants with the principles of relevant laws, and train relevant officials to identify victims and perpetrators, giving them tools to operate according to the specific procedures pertaining to them.

Cooperation with NGOs

253. The Government attaches great importance to maintaining an ongoing channel of communication with NGOs and civil society at large on the issue of trafficking. To this end, the Government cooperates with many NGOs in various fields such as prevention and protection of victims of trafficking. There is a constant dialogue between branches of Government and NGOs on the trafficking issue. This exchange has borne fruit in both legislative initiatives and common action.
254. Israeli NGOs organize events for raising awareness to the issue of trafficking in persons and various meetings are held between Government and NGOs representatives.

International Conferences and Cooperation

255. The Government of Israel gives great importance to its participation in relevant initiatives in the international arena. The Government coordinates and participates in several international working groups and efforts to prevent, monitor and control trafficking.
256. Mutual cooperation between Israel and other countries was fostered during recent years by two visits of delegations from Moldova and the Ukraine. These delegations met with their Israeli counterparts, both in government bodies and NGOs and exchanged perspectives while discussing common problems. In addition, representatives of the International Organization of Migration (IOM) visited Israel and conducted conferences and round table meetings with government representatives and NGOs.

257. In recognition of the need to promote international cooperation with countries of origin in order to prevent and combat human trafficking, Israel's Center for International Cooperation (Mashav) launched, in partnership with the Golda Meir Mount Carmel International Training Center and the Center for International Migration and Integration (CIMI), a comprehensive counter-trafficking program. The program includes study visits, trainings, workshops and internships that will address prevention, protection and prosecution aspects of the fight against human trafficking. An overlapping theme of all of the activities will be international collaboration between professionals in Israel and their respective counterparts from other countries, specifically Belarus, Moldova, the Ukraine and Uzbekistan. Indeed the program's activities are all based on the proposition that effective action against trafficking requires measures at the national level to be supplemented with bilateral and multi-lateral measures.
258. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs - On January 31, 2007, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs held a one-day seminar for the heads of the consular departments of eight countries of origin. The idea for the seminar originated with the NGO Isha L'Isha (Woman to Woman), and it was organized in cooperation with the National Coordinator and Isha L'Isha, as part of an Israeli effort to enhance the cooperation between countries of origin, transit, and destination. The speakers – a member of the Knesset, representatives of the Government, the Police and NGOs – shared the Israeli experience regarding the battle against trafficking with the participants.

259. Section 214 of the Penal Law was amended in 2007 (Amendment No. 93) and the short two-year limitation period for submission of indictments concerning pornographic advertisements of minors was annulled. It was additionally made illegal to use minors in pornographic advertisements (Sections 214b-214 b(3)). The Penal Law was amended in 2006, so that Section 15 now applies the principal of extraterritoriality to pornography and prostitution offences committed against minors. It is currently possible to try offenders in Israel for such offences, even though the act might not constitute a criminal offence in the country in which it was allegedly committed (no double criminality is required).
260. Trafficking in minors is not a major problem in Israel. However, in some cases of trafficking, victims were under the age of 18. In these cases, adolescents rather than children were involved. Victims of trafficking under 18 years old are automatically transferred to the Maagan shelter, which is well equipped to treat minor victims.

261. Rehabilitation and treatment of women engaged in prostitution - In January 2007, substantial government funds were earmarked, for the first time, for the rehabilitation and treatment of women engaged in prostitution. An inter-ministerial committee was established, headed by the Director of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women. The inter-ministerial committee, charged with consolidating a work plan for rehabilitation and treatment of women who engage in prostitution, outlined a number of actions designed to address rehabilitation and treatment needs, including: providing emergency living accommodations, upgrading a mobile health clinic for treating young women engaged in prostitution and providing an additional mobile health clinic, operating a national hotline, establishment of a rehabilitative shelter providing long-term physical and mental health care, setting up centers for mental and occupational rehabilitation and implementation of a program for increasing awareness and prevention among the public in general and in schools in particular. Necessary preparations and infrastructure development for the execution of the work plan has begun in Tel Aviv and Haifa.

262. Special Fund – Law and Regulations. The. The Anti Trafficking Law establishes a special fund for fines and forfeited property of criminals convicted of trafficking and slavery crimes. This Fund will allocate money for the purposes of protection, prosecution and prevention of trafficking crimes. At least 50% of the money in the Fund each year will be allotted to the rehabilitation and protection of trafficking victims each year. In addition, the Fund will reimburse trafficking victims, by means of a full or partial sum, who have received a court judgment for compensation by traffickers in criminal or civil proceedings, and can establish that they have used all reasonable means to collect the compensation but have failed.

On February 9, 2009, the Minister of Justice signed Regulations regarding the operation of this Fund, which will allow it to begin operating once the Regulations are officially published. The Regulations were previously approved by the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee of the Knesset on January 26, 2009. They are titled Penal Regulations (Means of Managing the Special Fund Dealing with Forfeited Property and Fines Imposed in Cases of Trafficking in Persons and Holding under Conditions of Slavery), 5769-2009. With the publishing of these regulations, it will be possible to appoint a committee to distribute forfeited property and fines to victims, NGOs and government agencies in order to further rehabilitation programs for victims, enforcement and prevention activities. It will also be possible for victims who were unable to collect compensation awarded by courts by reasonable means, to receive these sums, whether partially or in full, from the Fund.

Among the salient features of the regulations: A Committee chaired by a former District Court Judge, deals with requests from victims and bodies, both governmental and non governmental to receive financing from the Fund, and submits recommendations to the Administrator General. The Committee includes representatives from Government Ministries, including the National Coordinator and in addition, three public representatives, two of whom have experience or knowledge in the field of trafficking and one of whom has experience or knowledge in the field of human rights. Public representatives who have experience in the field of trafficking are to be appointed from lists submitted by NGOs. The Public representative with experience in human rights is to be appointed after consultation with the National Coordinator. NGOs have the right to appear before the Committee in order to contribute to the deliberations. Victims, including those who have returned to their countries of origin have the right to submit requests and have the right to appear before the Committee themselves or by means of a representative. The Regulations include ways of publicizing the existence of the Fund so that victims know they have the right to apply. The Protocol of the Committee deliberations will be publicized. Payment of Compensation to victims and rehabilitation programs for victims have priority over other requests to the Committee.

Article 7 - Political and Public Life

Women in Political life in Israel

263. Women in Israel are eligible to vote in all elections and to be elected to every public office, as well as to serve in publicly elected positions, partake in the formulation of all aspects of Government policies and their implementation, as detailed throughout this Article.
264. Women's representation in Israeli political life has progressed in all fields, although gaps remain between men and women's representation in certain areas of the political life.

Women's Representation in the Knesset

265. As of January, 2009, there were 18 female Knesset members in the previous 17th Knesset, comprising 15% of the Knesset members. The previous Knesset had a woman serving as the Knesset Speaker and three women as head of Knesset Committees.
266. According to the results of the National Election held on February 10, 2009, the number of women in the 18th Knesset is 21, comprising 17.5% of the Knesset members.

Women in the Government

267. The former 31st Government was headed by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert with MK Tzipi Livni as Acting Prime Minister. Three female ministers served in the Government: MK Tzipi Livni served as the Foreign Affairs Minister, MK Yuli Tamir, the Education Minister, and MK Ruhama Avraham-Balila served as the Minister of Tourism. In addition, there were five women serving as Director Generals in various Governmental Ministries.

Women in Local Authorities

268. Although women make up about 60% of the employees in the local authorities, only 4% of them serve in high ranking positions.
269. As of January 2007, out of 253 possible appointments, there were only six women actively employed as mayors or heads of local councils/authorities. Local Authorities employ 2,934 publicly elected persons in total, of which only 13.2% are women.
270. In order to further enhance the status of women, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women has engaged in activities aimed at deepening the knowledge and commitment of council women with regards to the status of women in their localities. These plans have long-term benefits in addition to the short-term ones. These activities were meant to assist in preparing a cadre of women to run for office in the local elections held in November 2008, and in providing them with knowledge and skills, personal and institutional empowerment, and the opportunity for widespread networking that they needed to run effective campaigns.

271. The Authority also sponsors ongoing courses and workshops for persons advising mayors and heads of local councils. In these courses, the Authority emphasizes personal skills, inculcates values relating to gender equality and provides the participants with further academic and practical skills. As part of this course, for example, the participants are required to analyze the municipal budgets from a gender perspective and are provided with expert guidance and mentoring to enable them to do so. In cooperation with the Advisor on the Status of Women in the Civil Service, the Authority has actively promoted the interests of supervisors for the status of women in Governmental Ministries. This support has included workshops, conferences, preparation and distribution of informational materials and more.
272. The Local Authorities (Advisor on the Status of Women) Law mandates that every local council must actively promote the status of women. To that end, each council must appoint an Advisor on the Status of Women who is to report directly to the mayor and/or head of the local council on pertinent matters. As a direct subordinate to the head of the local council, the Advisor is dedicated to ensuring ongoing communication between the head of the council and the local women's council, where such a women's council exists) and to initiating policies for the advancement of the status of women within the local authority. As an additional safeguard, the Law further empowers the Minister of the Interior to order that local councils follow the law's directives, and in the event that local councils should fail to comply, to personally appoint an Advisor on the Status of Women on the councils' behalf.
273. The Law was amended in May 2008, stipulating the employment requirements for the position of advisors on the status of women, the advisors' authorities, the duty to undergo special training, the duty to award an advisor a rank parallel to department manager and ways of action in cases where the local authority have failed to appoint an advisor. In order to ensure that the advisors will be free of pressure, without fear of being transferred to a different position or dismissal, the Amendment also determines that in any case of dismissal of an advisor, prior notice must be given to the Authority, thus the Authority is able to investigate and act where the dismissal is unlawful. Furthermore, in order to ensure transparency, according to the Amendment, the budget for the activities of the advisors must be clearly noted in every municipality budget and be separate from other budget clauses. As of 2008, 221 of the 253 local authorities had appointed such an advisor.
274. The Authority disseminated personal communications to all 253 mayors and heads of municipalities in Israel, concerning appropriate representation of women in municipal corporations and companies. The Authority supervises appointments made to counsels, commissions, and state committees, and decisively warns the appointing bodies of the consequences, if provisions of the Law on appropriate representation of women are not implemented. In addition to this activity, and at the initiative of the Authority, the Attorney General and the Secretary of Government informed all government bodies of the unequivocal duty to include women within their ranks.
275. Arab Women in Local Authorities. Whilst the representation of elected women in Jewish local councils' constitutes 14.2%, Arab women comprise only 0.5% of those elected. This gap is usually explained as being the result of various socio-cultural factors, such as the impact of religion and local tradition on certain communities of persons belonging to minorities, which can restrict women from considering running into or being elected to these positions.

276. To assist in remedying this situation, 221 female Advisors on the Status of Women in local municipalities are currently employed, 40 of whom work in Arab localities. These advisors ensure the advancement of policy for enhancing the status of women within the purview of the local authority, in addition to ensuring that the necessary resources are provided to this end.

277. The Civil Service has four main classifications that comprise the main sources in which administration managers may be ranked. The number of women featured among the top three ranking senior staff positions is slowly improving. In 1997, women comprised 61% of all civil servants, yet women held only 15% of high ranking civil servant positions. As of December 31, 2007, 46% of the top four ranking positions, and 41% of the top three ranking positions were held by women. It should be noted that these figures do not include women in the security forces, but does include all other ranks such as nurses and advocates, in which the representation of women is very high.
278. In 2007, women maintained an absolute majority in the following professions in the Civil Service: nursing (84% - 9,575 women), biochemists (85% - 677 women), social workers (85% - 1,109), advocates (68% - 485 women), jurists (70% - 908 women) and administration (64% - 15,543 women). The following tables further illustrates the rates of women and men in the civil service, in all ranks:

279. The method of appointment to the Civil Service is through both internal and external tenders. While the rise of female participation in internal job tenders within the Civil Service, both as candidates and as appointees, is quite constant, the situation in public tenders is less positive. In 2004, 45% of the candidates for public tenders were women. Of these tenders, women constituted 58% of the appointees.

280. On September 23, 2007, the Tel Aviv District Labor Court annulled a tender for employment with the Investigations Department of the Tel Aviv Customs Division, as the Examiners Committee had not paid sufficient attention to the requirement for proper representation by women, and had not taken affirmative action, as required by law, in giving preference to women possessing the same qualifications as men (La.C. 3888/03 Ruth Zuaetz v. The State of Israel – The Civil Service Commissioner et. al.). In this case there were 26 candidates vying for only a few positions, and the claimant was the only woman.

The Court held that the duty to take action for proper representation of women in public entities is anchored in legislation; such as the Equal Rights for Women Law: (Section 6(c)), the Civil Service Law (Appointments): (Section 15(a)); and also in case law, especially that handed down in the case of H.C.J. 2671/98 Israel Women’s Network v. The Minister of Labor and Welfare (11.8.98) and in H.C.J. 453/454/94 Israel Women’s Network v. The Government of Israel et. al. (01.11.94). In the latter case, the Court indicated that in 2003, the Attorney General had issued special guidelines obligating the implementation of the proper representation principle when making appointments in the Civil Service.

The Court held that the Examiners Committee failed to consider, or did not give proper weight to, the issue of affirmative action when choosing between the claimant - the only female candidate - and the successful male candidate whose qualifications were evidentially inferior to those of the claimant. The Court held that the extreme lack of reasonableness displayed in making the decision, justified the Court’s intervention in the Examiners Committee’s decision, which had been approved by the Civil Service Commissioner. As the fact that the claimant was the only woman of the 27 applicants had not been properly considered by the Committee, the Court decided to annul the decision to appoint a different candidate.

281. On November 26, 2008, the Jerusalem District Labor Court issued an interim injunction order regarding a tender for legal assistant positions in the Rabbinical Courts. The District Court determined that a note in the qualifications section, regarding the preference of people with the qualification of “Dayan,” a religious judge, is discriminatory by nature. This is due to the fact that according to religious laws, only men can serve as a “Dayan”. Thus, the tender violates the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, as it discriminates between men and women, and gives an unjust preference to male applicants. The District Court therefore ordered the Administration of the Rabbinical Courts and the Civil Service Commission to reissue the tender without the note, to allow an equal opportunity to those who do not have the “Dayan” qualifications, and may have been deterred from presenting their application (La.C. 003252/08 The Center for Justice for Women Association v. The Administration of the Rabbinical Courts et. al. (26.11.2008)).

The Prevention of Sexual Harassment within the Civil Service

282. The Department for the Advancement and Integration of Women within the Civil Service has been involved on several levels with regard to the implementation of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, and reinforcement of awareness to this important subject. Among the steps taken were the dissemination of information and explanations of the Law that were made available to more than 50,000 workers in 2005 and providing tools to Supervisors on the Status of Women so that they might better receive the workers' complaints.

283. There were 82 complaints regarding sexual harassment in 2005 and 64 complaints in 2006. In 2007, there were 65 complaints, 40 of which had disciplinary proceedings opened, and 10 in which legal actions were initiated against the offenders. These complaints are handled in cooperation with the Discipline and the Investigations Department within the Civil Service Commission. Generally, women who submit complaints of sexual harassment to the department are provided with legal advice, and are accompanied and supported throughout the investigative process up until completion of any ensuing trial. In certain cases administrative measures are also taken to separate the alleged assailant from the victim. In 2006, 11 disciplinary administrative measures resulted in court proceedings. Of those instances, five workers were fired, and five others retired from the Civil Service following the initiation of procedures against them.

The Judiciary

284. The number of female judges continues to climb in conjunction with the rising number of judges in general. In August 2008, there were 291 female judges out of a total of 584 judges, making up 49.8% of the judiciary in Israel. The number of female Justices on the Supreme Court has slightly decreased to 38.5% (five out of 13 Supreme Court Judges). Note that the current President of the Supreme Court is a woman, Justice Dorit Beinisch. Women continue to compose the majority of professional labor judges (67.3% of the judges), nearly half of the District Courts judges (44%), more than half of the Magistrate Courts Judges (50.5%) and more than half of the registrars (58.5%). Women have also increased their representation as public representatives in the Labor Courts (constituting 18.9%) representing employee and employer unions side by side with professional judges.
285. The legal Profession - As detailed in Israel's previous report, in the public sector, women remain a majority of the legal profession. As of June 2008, 1,898 women were employed by the Ministry of Justice (69.4%). 149 of the 225 legal advisors in the Ministry were women (66.2%), and a similar percentage of women were working in the State Attorney and the Attorney General's Offices (68%, 501 women to 235 men) and the Public Defenders office (69.2%, 54 women to 24 men). In the Ministry of Justice, there were also 305 (64.6%) female legal interns to 167 male legal interns, and 22 (64.7%) women in the senior judge equivalent rank, to only 12 men. Of the total number of women, 1,820 were Jewish, 48 were Muslim Arabs, 14 were Christian Arabs, six were Christians (Non-Arabs) and five were Druze.

Government Corporations

286. On March 11, 2007, the Government resolved to obligate Ministers to appoint women to directorates of Government Corporations until they achieve a 50% representation of women within two years from the date of Resolution (Government Resolution No. 1362). Subsequently, women representation on the Boards of Government Corporations had increased. In February 2008, 38.5% of all directors in Governmental Corporations were women, compared to 37% in the previous report and to 33.5% in February 2007. Currently there is one woman serving as head of a board of directors, and four women serving as CEOs of Governmental Corporations.

287. The Governmental Corporations Authority supervises closely and effectively any appointments made to directorates of Government Corporations. If the appointments do not adhere to the obligating standards, the Authority suspends them until the appointing Minister proposes an alternative female nominee or can justify why he/she can not propose any alternative nominee under these circumstances.
288. According to recent data, 71 Governmental Corporations meet the requirements for appropriate representation, nine corporations will meet these requirements if the candidates currently being reviewed or found as right for the position will be appointed. Thirteen corporations are one woman short of meeting the requirements for appropriate representation, nine corporations lack two women, and in two corporations three women are needed in order to meet the requirements. Six of the 11 special designated corporations who deal with security issues also meet the requirements for appropriate representation.
289. The Governmental Corporations Authority, in cooperation with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, has requested that all Governmental Corporations address the issue of appropriate female representation in their annual reports.

The Legal Framework

290. According to Section 16A(c) of the Defense Service Law (Consolidated Version) 5746-1986 (the “Defense Service Law”), the same law shall apply to men and women who completed their compulsory service and volunteer to serve in one of the Israeli Defense Force (IDF) positions determined by the Minister of Defense, despite the difference in the duration of women compulsory service compared to men’s. The Defense Service (Determination of Positions for Voluntary Service of Women) Regulations 5761-2001, following Amendments in 2002, 2005 and 2007, lists 29 military professions in which women are entitled to the same rights as men. The IDF from time to time examines the possibility of adding additional military professions to the list and makes recommendations to the Minister of Defense accordingly.

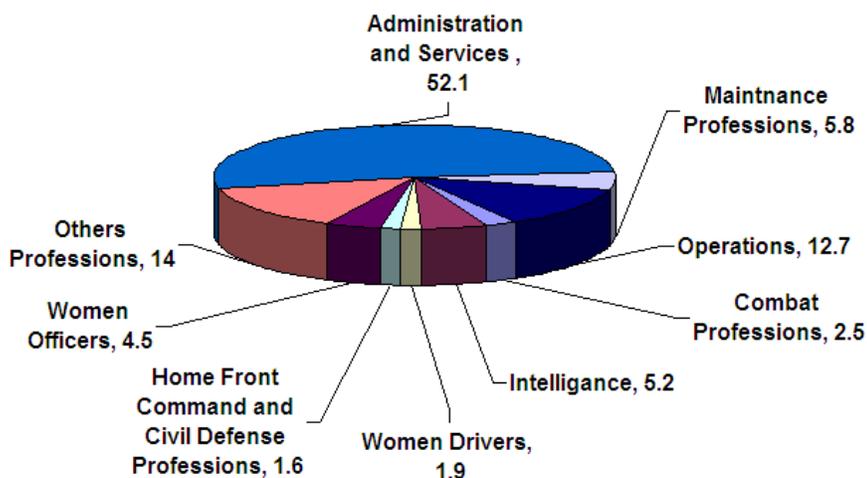

Policy

291. In 2007, the head of the Human Resources Division of the IDF appointed the Women’s Military Service Committee, aimed at outlining the vision and making recommendations concerning structural aspects of the military service of women. The Committee is headed by a former General and consists of several senior officers, public officials and academic specialists. The committee handed its recommendations to the Head of Human Resources Division in September 2007, and the last discussion regarding its work before the Chief of Staff forum, was held in September 2008.
292. Following the abolition of the women’s corps, the Chief of Staff nominated, on August 1, 2001, a special body, headed by the Advisor on Women’s Issues, a Brigadier General. This body is assigned to create an atmosphere where women can better utilize their abilities in the IDF, advance equal opportunities, and empower women in the IDF and in Israeli society. According to the advisor's vision, as approved by the IDF's Chief of Staff in September 2008, the IDF as a leading organization in the Israeli society will shape the service of its personnel, men and women alike, for the advancement of the goals of the IDF and the State of Israel while providing equal opportunities according to qualifications and abilities for a significant and honorable service.

293. The number of women serving in clerical positions out of the total number of soldiers in compulsory service has decreased in recent years from 26% in 1998 to 14% in 2007, leading to a growing number of female soldiers assigned to "quality" jobs. In addition, the number of women in combat professions out of the total number of women in the IDF has increased from 0.6% in 2000 to 2.5% in 2007.

Women and Men in the Military

294. The Chief of Staff's Advisor on Women's Issues has recently promoted three major projects:
- 294.1. Promotion of the establishment of the abovementioned Women Military Service Committee aimed to outline the vision and make recommendations concerning structural aspects of military service of women.
 - 294.2. Consolidation of a military behavioral code on gender issues that will constitute obligating norms and standards for soldiers and officers and influence the cultural environment and army daily life concerning gender issues.
 - 294.3. Setting goals for a progressive improvement of women representation in the army and promoting a plan for increasing the representation of women in senior leadership positions, which includes specific targets for each of the corps and is based on the percent of women qualified for promotion within each rank.

Distribution of Men and Women in the Military

295. Eighty-eight percent of the military professions in Israel, including combat positions, are open to both men and women. The military leadership is committed to placing women in higher ranks and positions. The following details indicate the integration of women in compulsory service in combat positions: 2.5 % of all the women serving in the military are in combat units (updated May 2008); women account for 4% of all combat soldiers (updated May 2008); women comprise 20% of the soldiers in joint units. In 2008, women comprised 34% of all soldiers in compulsory service. Most female combat soldiers serve in field units: the percent of women in the light infantry is 68%; Border Police 10%; artillery 16%; atomic, biological and chemical units of the engineering corps 21%; anti-aircraft 20% and search and rescue 30%. In addition, there are more than 16 women serving today as air crew personnel.
296. It is important to emphasize that the process of opening additional military positions to women requires a comprehensive assessment and consideration of all physical aspects of the additional positions, including the adaptation of the relevant equipment, preparation of the staff and additional activities.

297. Female officers make up 40% of compulsory service officers, 24% of the officers in the regular forces, 21% of the career service officers and 10% of the officers in senior ranks.
298. The IDF is obligated to advance women who serve in the army beyond their compulsory military service. In 2008, the figures for women officers were as follows: up to First Lieutenant – 21%; Captain- 25%; Major – 23%; Lieutenant Colonel- 12%; Colonel and above- 4%.

Reserve service

299. Women comprise 10.2% of the reserve personnel according to the following segmentation: of that 10.2%, 24.2% serve as officers, 1.2% in combat positions and 74.6% serve in combat support professions.
300. In 2007, 100% of the women officers who completed their compulsory service continued to serve in the IDF reserves, and 30% of women in non-officers ranks also continued to serve in the IDF reserves. In 2008, 46% of non-officers women are expected to join the army reserves.

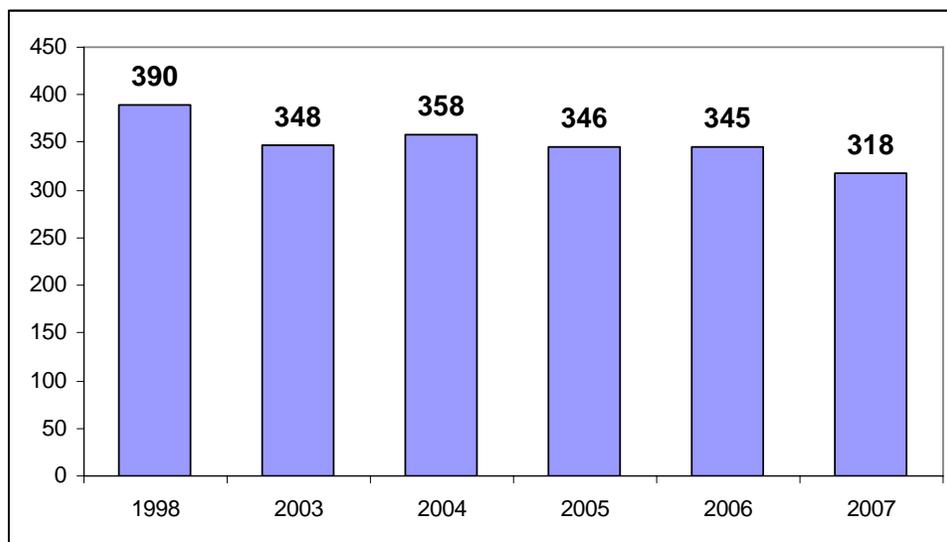

Women Scientists and Engineers in the IDF

301. In recent years, the IDF has been operating a number of projects aimed at encouraging women to draft to technical and technological professions. With these projects, the IDF offers designated special training for women in order to be better able to serve in these technological professions.

Sexual Harassment in the Military

302. The number of sexual harassment complaints in the IDF has been relatively stable in recent years, with around 350 complaints a year. The next chart details the number of annual complaints of sexual harassment, showing a significant decrease since 1998 of 19% and a decrease of 12% in 2007 compared to 2004.

303. The IDF's standard order regarding prevention of sexual harassment obligates all units to conduct biannual training sessions and lectures regarding prevention of sexual harassment. These lectures are supervised by a representative of the office of the Chief of Staff's Advisor on Women's Issues.
304. The Military Police, the Military General Advocate's Office and the Office of the Chief of Staff's Advisor of Women's Issues gather data regarding sexual harassment complaints in the IDF. The Office of the Chief of Staff's Advisor of Women's Issues also keeps records of sexual harassment cases in which the soldier decided not to file a complaint.
305. Since 2002, the Office of the Chief of Staff's Advisor on Women Issues has conducted a wide-range survey on sexual harassment in the military, as well as an extensive study of sexual harassment itself. The survey is conducted every two years; the last survey, which has yet to be published, was conducted in 2008. The results of previous surveys show a slight improvement regarding sexual harassment in the IDF, as indicated by the following table:

Table 10 - Number of Sexual Harassments Reports by Women Soldiers, 2002-2006 (Percents)

Female representation in IDF delegations abroad

306. The Committee on Women in the NATO Forces holds an annual conference, which Israel is regularly invited to attend, even though it is not a NATO member. The Office of the Chief of Staff's Advisor on Women's Issues has been taking part in this gathering for several years.
307. In 2008, the Chief of Staff's Advisor on Women's Issues visited the Chilean army in order to study the matter of female service among its ranks.
308. In September 2008, an international conference on gender and military service was organized by the Office of the Chief of Staff's Advisor on Women's Issues, and was attended by representatives of foreign countries.

Women in the Police and in the Prisons Service

The Legal Framework

309. The Police strive to raise the number of women in the Police force via affirmative action measures like more flexible working conditions for mothers, and lenient policies for pregnant women.

Women in the Police – Field Data

310. Currently, women constitute 21.34% of the general Police force, as compared to 21% in Israel's previous report. Female officers comprise 23.13% of the total officers, a higher percentage than their representation in the general Police force.
311. As of March 2005, there were 73 Arab women in the police force - 24 Christians, 13 Muslims, one Druze, one Samaritan, 32 others and two of unknown faith, an increase of 37%.

312. The Police have taken several measures to combat sexual harassment among its ranks. Between 2005 and 2007, lectures and courses regarding many aspects of sexual harassment were given to the Police personnel. Currently, the Discipline Department of the Police is preparing a comprehensive pamphlet on sexual harassment, which will be distributed throughout Police Force training courses.
313. Between 2005 and 2007, 33 cases of sexual harassment were handled by the Police Disciplinary Department after being referred by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice. Seven cases were presented in 2005, 14 in 2006 and 12 in 2007. In the same time period, 42 cases were handled by the Division for Administrative Measures: 12 in 2005, 11 in 2006 and 19 in 2007.

Women in the Israeli Prisons Service – Field Data

314. Currently, there are 1,417 women serving in the Israeli Prisons Service (IPS). Women constitute 18.28% of the general force, an increase of 23.3% compared to 2006. Women comprise a higher percentage amongst officers than their representation in the prisons service as a whole, with 35.9% of IPS officers being female. Sixty-two of those female officers have senior ranks.

Sexual Harassment within the IPS

315. The IPS treats sexual harassment cases very seriously. In cases where criminal procedures have been opened against prison personnel, their employment in the service is terminated.
316. Each division in the IPS goes through biannual training regarding sexual harassment in the workplace, additional instruction and training on the matter is given as an integral part of female wardens' training courses. Social affairs and welfare officers are accessible to all female wardens, and if required, they are directed to female social workers in the Israeli Defense Force. As of August 2008, eight complaints have been filed regarding sexual harassment in the IPS.

Women's Organizations

317. Women's non governmental organizations continue to play an active and valuable role in the promotion of gender equality in Israel. These organizations remain dynamic and representative of women of all sectors, enabling a lively civil society.
318. Women's organizations have a substantial impact on many areas of life in Israel. Some of their major fields of operation are: promoting legislation; assisting women with legal representation and counseling; leading information campaigns on women's rights; organizing conferences and seminars; managing sexual assault help centers and hotlines; leading the battle against trafficking in persons and more.
319. Prior to the recent election for the 18th Knesset, a group of prominent women's organizations - among them, the Association of Rape Crisis Centers in Israel, the Women Parliament, the Israeli Women's Lobby, and others - submitted a list of legislative amendments to the leading candidates for the Prime Minister Office. The list was presented as a lever to promote women's status in Israel, and was given to the candidates in order to receive a public pledge by them to enact these amendments upon taking office. Among the suggested amendments is the proposal that a person convicted of performing sexual offences in the framework of a public position, or convicted of offences relating to the breach of the public trust, breach of faith, bribery in public administration or to the purity of the elections, is prevented from becoming a member of the Knesset, and that limitation or clemency shall not apply in such situations. Other suggestions include extending maternity leave to six months to be equally distributed between the parents and many more.

Article 8 - International Representation and Participation

Women's Representation in the Foreign Service

320. From 2005 to 2009, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was headed by a woman, Minister Tzipi Livni. As mentioned in Israel's previous report, Israel's Foreign Service is routinely working at increasing the number of women amongst its ranks.
321. In July 2008, Professor Gabriela Shalev was appointed as Israel's Ambassador to the United Nations. Professor Shalev is Israel's first woman to serve in this senior position.

322. Out of 998 employees in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 433 are women (43%), and of the 401 employees on the diplomatic staff, 97 are women (24%). In the administrative staff, 128 employees are women (52%).
323. In 2008, three women were appointed as ambassador or head of missions (the same figure as in 2007), bringing the general number of women serving in these ranks to 12. During the same period, 24 men were appointed; however, an effort is made to appoint women as heads of central missions. The new ambassador to Canada and the new Consul General to Chicago are both women, after three years of no female representation as head of missions in the area.
324. The following table further details the percentage of women within the diplomatic wing of the Foreign Service, by ranks:

Table 13 - Representation of Women in the Foreign Service - Diplomatic Wing, 2008

	Diplomatic		Administrative
	Women	Men	Women	Men

Advisor	30	58	58	36
First Secretary	12	20	28	19

Source: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, December 2008

325. The representation of women in senior managerial positions is still relatively limited. On the diplomatic staff there are 95 directors of departments, 28 of which are women (29%). On the administrative staff, there are 18 female directors of departments, out of a total of 41 (44%). Out of 185 employees in managerial positions (head of department and above), 51 are women. The number of women in managerial positions has increased since 2006, mainly at the level of department directors. In 2006 there were 41 women in managerial positions, there were 49 in 2007 and 51 in 2008. The number of female Deputy Director Generals (DDG) decreased in 2008 from four to three, due to the appointment of one of the DDG's as the ambassador to Canada.
326. The number of women posted at Israeli diplomatic missions abroad continues to increase. There were 51 women posted at Israeli diplomatic missions abroad in 2008, compared to 49 in 2007. Still, out of 314 employees posted abroad, 87 are women (28%). Thirty-three women currently serve as consuls and administration officers, compared to 42 men.
327. One third of the candidates for the diplomatic training course were women, and the same percentage of women was accepted to the course. Note that, for the most part, all cadets who attend the course complete it.

328. It should be emphasized in this regard that the participation of women in this diplomatic training course is highly encouraged by the Supervisor on the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Civil Service, and the Supervisors in all Government Ministries. In January 2009, the supervisors issued a circular to all civil service personnel in which they emphasized the importance of proper representation of women in the course, and the importance of this course for advancement of the status of women in general.
329. There is currently one woman representing the minorities (a Christian-Arab) at the Ministry.
330. The former Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mrs. Livni, had a leading role in the negotiations that led to the adoption of resolution 1701, which terminated the second Lebanese war. The Minister expressed in 2007, a full endorsement of Security Council Resolution 1325 that specifically addresses the impact of war on women, and women's contributions to conflict resolution and sustainable peace.
331. The Head of Carmel Training Center, which holds numerous courses for women, is a permanent member of the Executive Committee of the International Women's Mediterranean Forum. She is also member of the Executive Committee of the International Research and Training Institute for Advancement of Women (INSTRAW).

Women Representatives and independent experts in International Organizations

332. Israel includes women in most of its delegations to multilateral forums, as well as a five-to-six-woman delegation to the Commission on the Status of Women. At the Israeli mission to the UN headquarters in New York there are two women, one being the Ambassador.
333. Several additional examples include Professor Ruth Halperin-Kaddari, the director of the Rackman Center for the Advancement of the Status of Women at Bar Ilan University, who is currently applying for a second term as an expert to the United Nations Commission of the Status of Women (CSW) after completing a successful first term. In February 2007, an Israeli expert, Dr. Michal Komem, participated in the professional panel of the 51st session of the CSW that focused on the issue of the fight against discrimination and violence of women.
334. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs encourages and assists Israeli women's issues NGOs to apply for accreditation at the United Nations and in fundraising both in Israel and abroad.

Article 9 - Nationality

335. No notable changes have occurred regarding this issue since the submission of Israel's previous report.

Article 10 – Education

Legal Developments

336. In July 2007, The Compulsory Education Law 5709-1949 (the "Compulsory Education Law") was amended in order to broaden its scope and apply compulsory education to youth between the ages of 15 and 17 (inclusive) attending 11th and 12th grades. Prior to the Amendment, education for 11th and 12th grades was free, but not compulsory. The Amendment strives to protect youth in this vulnerable stage from negative influences, and to prepare them and provide them with better tools for successful integration as productive adults in society. Thus, the Government found it necessary to provide an obligatory educational framework rather than an optional one. Another desired effect of the Law is a decrease in dropout and removal of pupils rates, by compelling the provision of solutions within the education system to all pupils in this age group. The Law is to be fully implemented for those attending 11th grade until 2009, and until 2010 for those attending the 12th grade.

337. On January 6, 2005, the Knesset enacted the Daily Meal for the Pupil Law 5765-2005 (the “Daily Meal for the Pupil Law”), with the goal of creating a nutrition service to provide warm meals to pupils in primary schools where the long school day is applied, according to the Long School Day and Enrichment Studies Law 5757-1997 (the “Long School Day and Enrichment Studies Law”). On April 28, 2008, the Law was amended to include children attending pre-school, where the long school day is applied. According to the Amendment, the Law also applies to other pre-school frameworks where 41 hours of education per week are provided. In these frameworks, a warm meal will be provided to pupils on days they attend pre-school for at least 8 hours.

Section 3 to the Law stipulates that each pupil will receive one warm meal per day, according to a well balanced and varied menu that will be determined by the Ministry of Health, and will take into consideration the age and needs of the pupils.

The Law is to be gradually implemented. The Minister of Education, in conjunction with the Minister of Finance, will determine the population of pupils to which the Law will be applied each year.

The nutrition service is co-funded by the Ministry of Education and the local municipalities. The Law permits the local municipality to collect participation payments from parents, yet the Law requires the Minister of Education’s consent to do so. The parental participation payment will be determined by the Minister, according to socioeconomic standards and in the framework of payments stipulated in the Compulsory Education Law.

Administrative Developments

338. The former Minister of Education and her Director General were both women, and feminists themselves. The Minister of Education has repeatedly and explicitly declared that gender equality is not merely a “program” or a “project”, but a lifestyle. To that end, all schools are instructed to create and maintain an educational climate conducive to gender equality and mutual respect.
339. The Ministry of Education offers numerous In-Service Training Programs for teachers, pupils and parents in order to increase their awareness of, and skills in promotion of, gender equality. Nationwide programs such as “Women circles” and “Girls and boys leading a change” empower high school pupils, while the school curriculum formally addresses issues such as gender, government, and politics.

340. Recently, the Ministry of Education instituted a full matriculation program in gender studies. The program includes 180 teaching hours of gender studies, 180 teaching hours of psychology and a requirement to prepare a theoretical report regarding gender equality. The program introduces gender studies, which so far has only been studied in universities and colleges, to high school pupils and exposes them to this important field of study.
341. The Department for Gender Equality. The Ministry of Education has established a special department dedicated to the promotion of gender equality within the School System. The Department for Gender Equality is in charge of the promoting and assimilation of both values of equality and dignity and their practical application in everyday life. The Department for Gender Equality promotes different programs for gender equality: empowerment of girls and women, integrating gender values with in the education curriculum, advancing girls in science and technology, prevention of violence against women and prevention of trafficking in women. The Department works within a holistic approach where its clients are pupils, teachers, parents and the general public. The values above are translated into a wide range of activities such as: short and long term programs for pupils during the school year, in-service training for teachers and conferences and short seminars for parents.
342. The Ministry of Education maintains an active, useful, and user-friendly web site that not only provides information about the Ministry's programs and projects, but also provides visitors with perspectives on the meaning of gender equality and women's empowerment. The language of the web site, and of directives issued by the Ministry of Education, reveals a clear commitment to gender equality and provides definitive guidelines for teachers and all school officials. Among the information published on the Department for Gender Equality's web site, there is an explanation of, and data regarding, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW).
343. The Department for Gender Equality has held several seminars and conferences for teachers regarding empowerment of female pupils in mathematics and science, blocking elements and the ways of removing them.
344. The Department for Gender Equality has also prepared a booklet for young women joining the Israeli Defense Force (IDF) that provides information specifically relevant to women in the Army, emphasizing women's needs and opportunities in the army service.
345. Equality within Minority Populations: the Arab-Israeli population - The programs mentioned above are aimed at the whole range of communities in Israel, especially groups belonging to minorities such as the Arab population. This issue is applied by generating a variety of differential programs that are given by professionals from the specific group belonging to minorities. As for the Arab-Israeli community in Israel, the Ministry of Education assigned four different organizations that come from the Arab-Israeli community. This type of strategy ensures that on one hand, the universal values of equality and dignity are strengthened, while on the other hand, the programs are carried out with respect to the special needs and cultural heritage of the Arab-Israeli community.
346. Another course of action of the Ministry of Education is raising awareness for the prevention of prostitution and trafficking in women by:

- 346.1. Preparing a guidance booklet for the Ministry's teaching staff, which includes information and ways to deal with the issue of prostitution and trafficking in women; information on victims of the sex industry; legislation and data regarding law enforcement; implementation of educational programs in the fields of trafficking in persons, trafficking in women and prostitution; involvement of parents and the community regarding education in these fields and other important information.
- 346.2. Holding a special conference for the Ministry's teaching staff and for pupils regarding human dignity. The conference deals with aspects of trafficking in persons, and specifically in women
- 346.3. Around the International Women's Day on March 8, 2008, the Ministry held focused local activities for pupils on 11th and 12th grades. The activities took place in the cities of Ashdod, Kiryat Gat and Nahariya, and encompassed about 1,500 pupils and more than 110 members of the teaching staff.
- 346.4. The Ministry has integrated the issue of prevention of prostitution and trafficking in women into existing gender and quality education programs as a special module in these programs. This module consists of one or two sessions (two hours each, out of ten or 14 sessions of the entire program), and includes subjects such as: empowerment of girls, data regarding trafficking in women, respect and equality between genders, and more. In 2008, more than 4,070 pupils and more than 250 teachers participated in gender and equality programs using this module.
347. The following table indicates the participation of pupils and teaching staff in conferences and conventions in the field of gender equality:

General and Technological / Vocational Tracks

348. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's previous report.

Matriculation Levels

349. The percentage of entitlement to matriculation certificate continues to be higher among female pupils. In 2006, in the Hebrew education system, 85.7% of the female minors within the 12th grade age group took matriculation exams (84.3% in 2002), compared with only 80.4% of the male minors (75.1% in 2002). Female minors' entitlement to a matriculation degree was also higher and stood at 61%, compared with 49.5% of the male minors.
350. Among the Arab education system, 91.2% of the female minors within the 12th grade age group took the matriculation exams (91.7% in 2002), compared to 86.1% of the male minors (84% in 2002). Female minors' entitlement to a matriculation degree also was higher than male minors (56.3% and 36.5%, respectively).

351. In 2007, the percentage of Jewish females that never attended school was 2.5% compared to 1.2% of the men. The percentage of Arab females that never attended school was 9.7%, compared to 2.8% of the men.
352. In 2007, 91.4% of adolescents aged 15 to 17 attended school, 1.4% worked and did not study and 7.2% neither worked nor studied (a decline in comparison to 7.8% in 2006). Ninety-two percent of the girls aged 15 to 17 attended schools in comparison to 91% of the boys. Among the Jewish population, 5.4% of the youth aged 15 to 17 neither worked nor studied (5.5% male and 5.4% female), in comparison to 12.5% among the Arab population (12.7% male and 12.1% female).

353. Another important indicator of school performance is the rate of attendance. In 2007-2008, in the Hebrew Education system, the dropout rates of female minors in the 9th to 11th grades stood around 1.7%-2.9% (3.1%-3.6% in 2003-2004), and in the 12th grade the rate of dropout was just 0.7% (equal to the dropout rate in 2003-2004). The dropout rates of male minors were higher, especially in the 11th grade (4.8% in the in the 9th grade and 9.5% in the 11th grade). Among the Arab education system, the gap between the genders was also in favor of the male minors, although the dropout rates of Arab female minors exceeded those of Jewish female minors. The following table presents data on dropout rates, according to grade, gender and population group.

Activities and Educational Programs to Prevent Discrimination against Women

Educational Programs

354. In 2005, the Ministry of Education instituted several educational programs designed to further enhance equal opportunity between the genders within the education system. The abovementioned program, “Girls Leading a Change”, was initiated by the Women’s Association in Israel to encourage empowerment and leadership amongst young women in high schools. The program was later broadened to include young men, and is now called “Girls and Boys Leading a Change”. In 2007, the program was operating in more than 60 high schools in Israel, including Arab schools, and involved more than 2,500 young women and men. Also in 2005, the Ministry of Education together with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women held ten one-day seminars, in which more than 1,500 school principals participated, on the subject of encouraging girls in the fields of mathematics and exact sciences (for more details please see below subsection: Science and Technology Education for Women, initiatives aimed at encouraging Female-Minors to enter the fields of Science and Technology).
355. Additional activities targeting gender issues include:
- 355.1. Promotion of a pluralistic view, enabling pupils to learn to deal with and criticize gender based dilemmas, emerging in society as a whole and in school life in particular.
 - 355.2. Facilitating the equal acknowledgement of the role of both genders in all the cultural aspects, including literature, science, history and arts, whilst emphasizing the equal role of female figures.
 - 355.3. Presenting educational material and texts which includes gender stereotypes, implied or apparent, in order to raise awareness to the stereotypes and challenge them.
356. “Bnot Mitzvah,” the Jewish ritual when a girl reaches 12 years of age, is used as a school event for the 6th graders, and as a tool to highlight female strength and different educational materials regarding women leaders, influential women that changed society, women combatants, pioneers and others. This includes extracurricular activities as well as in-school activities. The pupils examine the status of women in Israel and in other countries, and search for disciplines promoting women and allowing them to progress.

357. Empowering female pupils in the general school system is done with the aim of promoting leadership and empowerment of pupils in the 7th through 9th grades, which includes themes promoting awareness of gender equality and its influence on all aspects of life. The program includes raising awareness to the possibilities available to the pupils to help them fulfill their personal potential, skill advancement and social and personal awareness of changes needed in the social and personal aspects of the family, the society, and the education system. The program also includes raising appreciation and recognition of the ability and potential of women to integrate in the economy, politics, technology and military, and the importance of such integration. The program also includes activities with the male pupils aimed at changing their gender perceptions.
358. Empowering female Arab pupils is aimed at promoting and changing personal and social perspectives while emphasizing the positive role of women in the family, the society and in the workplace. The program targets 7th through 9th graders, and includes themes promoting awareness of stereotypes regarding both genders in the Arab society, and their perception of their abilities and dreams. The program includes corresponding activities with the male pupils aimed at changing their gender-based perceptions.
359. Empowering female pupils in religious schools while considering the changes in society in general and the religious society in particular. Coping with these developments requires religious women to re-evaluate their definition of the fulfillment of the roles in their homes, families and societies. This program includes ten meetings and is targeted at pupils in the 7th through 9th grades.
360. Promotion of equality as part of the value of human dignity. The basis of the program is that gender equality also means equality between the genders as part of the concept of human dignity. Among the goals of the program is raising the personal capability of teenagers to deal with changing social circumstances with the peer group (peer pressure, social struggles, friendship relations etc.), and with the relationship with the adult world (authority, requesting help etc.). Through the program, the pupils study social perceptions and equality on the basis of human dignity of men and women. The program is introduced to pupils in the 7th - 10th grades.

Gender Stereotypes within School Books

361. The Minister of Education appointed a special committee to examine the extent to which gender stereotypes may still remain in educational textbooks. After receiving the findings, the Minister decided not to incorporate books imbued with gender stereotypes into the education system, and those books already in use in the school system which promoted gender stereotypes would be gradually replaced.

Gender and Family Life Education

362. The Department of Sexuality and Family Life in the Ministry of Education is in charge of developing educational materials and programs regarding, inter alia, sexuality, gender, non-violent couplehood, self image, couples relations, sexual identity and sexual tendency, sexuality and media (pornography), pregnancy prevention, AIDS prevention, acceptance of others even when different, and more. The Department trains guidance counselors, psychologists and the Ministry's general personnel. Currently the Department is working on conducting a survey regarding sexual behavior of adolescents in cooperation with the Ministry of Health. In addition, the Department is currently working on the development of several educational programs regarding responsible sexual behavior and AIDS prevention, sex and family life education program for pupils with special needs, sexual education for the intermediate schools etc.
363. The curriculum is to be given in the state-religious and the Arab education systems. The curriculum is identical for female-minors and male-minors, though some schools conduct the lessons separately.

Teachers

364. In 2007-2008, the rate of Jewish men in teachers' training colleges, stood at 17.5%, compared to 18.6% in 2006-2007. The rate of Arab men in teachers' training colleges was 7.0%, compared to 7.8% in 2006-2007.

Higher Education

Female Students

365. In 2006, the rate of women with a matriculation certificate or a higher diploma (58.7%) was higher than that of men (51.2%), among the general population aged 15 and over. Fifty-nine percent of recipients of degrees of higher education were women. In 2006, 59.1% of the first degree graduates were women, and 57.7% of the second degree graduates were women. Furthermore, the proportion of women among Ph.D. graduates in Israel has risen in recent years, and in 2004, women reached 50% of Ph.D graduates for the first time. In 2006, 51% of the Ph.D. graduates were women.

366. In 2007, the rate of women with a matriculation certificate both in Jewish (70.5%) and Arab (54.1%) education systems was higher than that of the men (61.1% in the Hebrew education system and 39.5% in the Arab education system). 58.6% of the women and 47.4% of the men who concluded their high school studies in 1999 enrolled in academic education programs within eight years of graduating high school.
367. In 2007, women still constituted a majority among the first (54.6%), second (57.1%) and the third (53%) degree students. There are no dramatic changes in the general figure when compared to previous years. However, women continue to cluster in the humanities and are less likely to enter fields such as Mathematics, Sciences, and Engineering. In Engineering, Mathematics, Statistics and Computers, a little more than one quarter of the students were women. Women comprised a majority in other fields such as Humanities (60.4%), Social Studies (65.2%), Medicine (53.3%), and Biological Sciences (61.6%).

368. In 2006-2007 a total of 20,942 people received first degrees from non-university higher education institutions and teachers' training colleges: 2,095 from the Open University, 12,206 from various academic colleges and 5,433 teachers' training colleges.

Education and Higher Education of Minorities

369. In its latest campaign, the Department for Gender Equality in the Ministry of Education, has been working to reach all of the Arab-Israeli population in Israel, including the people of Rajar, an Arab village divided between Israel and Lebanon. In addition, the Department is providing all the programs mentioned above free of charge. In 2008, more than 150 schools took part in such activities, in 2009, it is estimated that more than 200 Arab-Israeli schools will be part of the different programs.
370. In the last decade there was a significant increase in the number of Arab women entering higher education frameworks, thus, the total participation of Arab students in higher education has increased. A main factor that brought about this advancement was the quick and substantial increase in the number of female Arab students, especially in the regional colleges located near their places of residence. In the 1990's, about 40% of the Arab students in the universities in the first degree were women, and in 2006 this rate reached about 60%. For comparison, the number of women among the total students in the universities was previously 55%. Last year, 56.1% of the Druze students studying for their first degree were women. Moreover, the gender gaps have increased within various age groups. For example, 9.2% of Arab women ages 20-21 were students in 2007, compared with 4.5% of Arab men of the same age.
371. These achievements indicate further progress after the significant increase in high school graduates among Arab female pupils. In 1985, 45% of the matriculation examinees and those entitled to a certificate among Arab pupils were women, and in recent years, this number rose to 62%. Comparatively, this proportion among the Jewish population has been fixed at about 56%.
372. The Regional Council of Abu-Basma is responsible for the education of the Bedouin population in southern Israel. In the Council's school system there are 25 elementary schools with an average of 700 pupils per school and three high schools with 100 pupils each. Recent data indicates that immediately after the establishment of regional schools in the Council's towns and villages, the dropout rate due to the transfer from elementary schools to high schools had been eliminated completely. The dropout rate due to the transfer from elementary schools to high schools previously stood at 50% with a majority of the dropouts being female.
373. Furthermore, about 50% of all Bedouin students graduating with a degree in chemical engineering in the technological college in Be'er Sheva were women. It should be noted that the Regional Council of Abu-Basma encourages and supports courses designated specially for women, such as: goldsmith course in Darijat, sewing course in Kaser-Alsar etc.
374. On November 23, 2008, the Appointments Committee of the Higher Education Council bestowed the title of professor on Haula Abu-Bakar, a teacher and lecturer at Izrael Valley College, making her the first ever female Israeli-Arab professor in Israel. Dr. Abu Bakar, is seen as a trailblazing figure in the study of mental health in the Arab population, focusing on how the issues of gender, mental health and sexual violence affect the community. Abu Bakar also authored the book "On an unpaved path", dealing with the female Arab political leaders.
375. In 2008, the Ministry of Education announced its intention to grant Bedouin students studying engineering, technology and science in universities with tuition grants and scholarships of 5,000

NIS ($1,250) each for the 2008-2009 academic year. The scholarships are intended to encourage Bedouin students to achieve higher education

Women on the Academic Personnel

376. In 2006, 26% of the senior academic personnel in universities were women, an increase of 30% in comparison to the early 1990's. Accordingly, there were 184 women compared to 1,267 men, in positions of full professors among the academic personnel, a position granting not only higher income, but also influential status within the Academia, a share of 12.7%. Today there are 5 female presidents in all Higher Education Institutions, and at least one woman has served as a rector.
377. Although there are more women than men in all levels of higher education, they comprised only 26% of the total academic staff in 2006. For example, in Humanities, women were 66.1% of the students and only 39.4% of the staff, and in Social Sciences, they comprised 60.2% of the students and 29% of the staff.

Science and Technology Education for Women

Initiatives aimed at encouraging Female Minors to enter the fields of Science and Technology

378. In 2005, the Ministry of Education, together with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women held ten one-day seminars in which more than 1,500 school principals participated on the subject of encouraging girls in the fields of mathematics and exact sciences. The seminars dealt with the following issues: raising awareness of professional and management teams for this matter, illustrating the perceived barriers to female participation in this field, illustrating the actual ability of female pupils and methods of deconstructing these barriers, development of an intervention program encouraging female participation in these fields from an early age, and other relevant issues.

Initiatives to encourage women to study Science and Technology

379. In 2007, the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport initiated a program for advancement of women in the fields of science for the years 2007 and 2008. According to the program, scholarships of 30,000 NIS ($7,500) will be distributed to female students in order to increase the number of women in science and technology fields and in exact sciences and engineering in which women have low representation rates.

380. In 2008, the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport offered 11 scholarships to women who will complete their third degree in 2009 in fields of science and technology, exact sciences and engineering. The scholarships of 30,000 NIS ($7,500) each will be distributed to female students earning their third degree who perform research with faculty of exact sciences (chemistry, physics, math, and computer science) or the engineering faculty. The scholarships' purpose is to increase the number of women in the fields of science and technology.

381. The Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport gives great importance to the inclusion of women scientists in every delegation for international conferences held both abroad and in Israel. In November 2007, a joint British-Israeli convention titled "Biomolecular Self-Assembly", was held in Britain and was attended by five Israeli scientists, two of which were women. In October 2007, a joint French-Israeli convention titled, "Trends in Soft Matter and Micro Fluidics", was held in France, and was attended by a delegation of four Israeli scientists, two of which were women. In addition, the Ministry is very meticulous of the inclusion of women in various international committees and international programs.

Physical Education and Sports

Legal Developments

382. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's previous report.

Governmental Machineries for the Promotion of Women in Sports

383. On March 21, 2005, the Government decided on the establishment of the Public Council for Women's Sports (Resolution No. 3416). Also that year, a national program for women's sports was presented by the Sport Administration and was approved by the Ministry of Education. A budget of 80 million NIS ($20,000,000) was allocated for the program's operation by the Council for Sports' Gambling Arrangement for a period of eight years, and additional 1.8 million NIS ($450,000) per year was allocated by the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, also for a period of eight years.

384. In 2007 the Department for Women Sports was established at the 'Wingate' Sports institute, the Department is responsible for the operation and execution of the national program, including all its goals and targets, such as: increasing the number of the female athletes in Israel, development of excellence and leadership among women in the various sports, and in the fields of management, coaching and refereeing.

385. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, together with the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, have designed a unique training course for women, educating them on ways to become active and committed members of local and national Councils for the advancement and administration of sports in Israel.

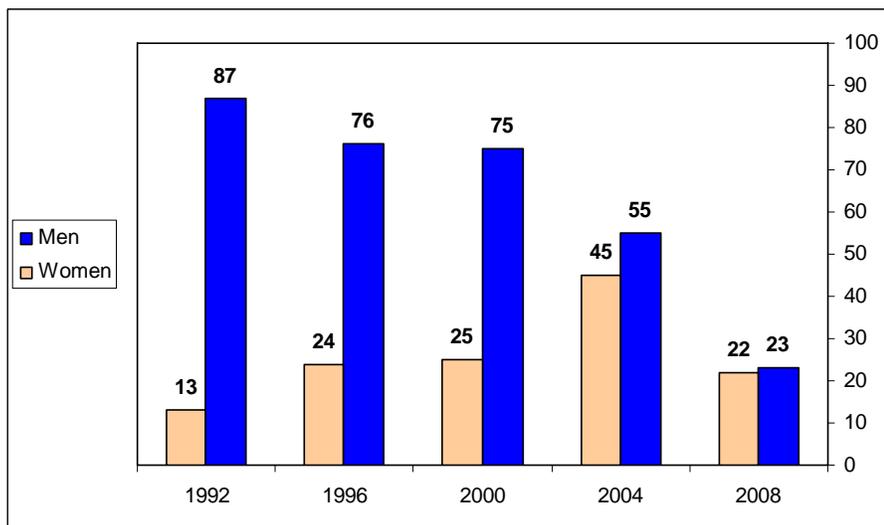

Female –Minors Sport in the School System

386. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the Fourth periodic report.

Current Data – Women in Sports

387. Since the 1992 Olympic Games, women's participation in the Olympic Games has dramatically increased. In the 2008 Olympic Games in Beijing, there was a decrease in the number of Israeli athletes, both male and female, compared to the previous Olympic Games, however the tendency for equalizing between the numbers of male and female athletes is clearly visible as indicated by the chart below.

Article 11 - Employment

Legal Protection from Discrimination within the Workplace

388. In accordance with an Amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, dated January 3, 2006, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission was established, within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (ITL). The Commission is charged with the promotion, implementation and civil enforcement of the following laws and statutory provisions: Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 5748-1988; Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law 5756-1996 (the “Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law”); Women’s Employment Law; Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law (in relation to employment) and other statutory provisions relating to: discrimination on religious grounds and army reserve duty service, discrimination on the part of public and private employment agencies, affirmative action for women, people with disabilities, Israeli Arabs and persons of Ethiopian origin in the public sector and legislation protecting workers who “blow the whistle” on violations of the above laws and statutory provisions.
389. The Commission is also charged, inter alia, with a wide range of duties, including fostering public awareness through education, training and information; encouraging programs and activities; cooperation with relevant persons and bodies; conducting research and gathering information; intervention, with the courts approval, in ongoing legal proceedings; handling complaints regarding the violation of equal employment legislation; submission of requests for general orders; and instructing employers to take general measures regarding all or part of their workforce or employment applicants, designed to ensure compliance with duties imposed by employment equality legislation or to prevent violations of such duties.

390. Structure of the Commission - The Commission is headed by a National Commissioner, who is appointed by the Government, upon the recommendation of the Minister of ITL, following consultation with the Minister of Justice. The National Commissioner is appointed for a term of four years which may be renewed only once; the National Commissioner has to have a law degree and at least seven years of proven experience in the areas within which the Commission operates.
391. The Equal Employment Opportunities Commission commenced operation at the beginning of 2008, following the Government's Resolution in November 2007, to appoint Adv. Tziona Koenig-Yair, as the first National Commissioner (Government Resolution No. 2578). This position is the first of its kind to be established in Israel. The Commissioner is responsible for collecting information and hearing complaints from workers concerning instances of sexual harassment, and/or discrimination based on gender, sexual orientation, parenthood, religion and race. Where necessary, the Commissioner is also responsible for initiating legal action on behalf of any adversely affected workers. The commissioner also has the authority to request that Courts issue special orders prohibiting sexual harassment in the workplace. Violation of these orders is considered a criminal offence. In addition, the commissioner is responsible for encouraging special programs relating to equality in employment as well as other educational and promotional activities in the workplace.
392. At the end of each year the Commissioner is required to submit an annual report to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Labor, who shall forward the report with his/her comments to the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women, and to the Knesset Committee for Labor, Welfare and Health.
393. Since her appointment, the National Commissioner manned three additional positions, published a pamphlet dealing with employment rights that was distributed to 300,000 employers and employees, and is now being translated into Arabic.
394. In late 2008, the advisory committee to the Commission has been appointed. Under the Amendment to the Law, the 21-member committee is comprised of representatives of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Government Ministries, NGOs, trade unions and employers' associations. Appropriate representation is given, insofar as is possible, to women, Israeli Arabs and persons with disabilities.
395. Since September 2008, the services provided by the Commission include the handling of 150 specific applications, 3 law suits currently being prepared and many preliminary measures taken regarding discrimination by employers.
396. Recently the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission filed its first law-suit against "Rami-Lee", a company which manufactures pregnancy clothes, on account of their refusal to accept a pregnant woman to work in one of its stores. The Commission requested that the court reward the complainant with 87,425 NIS ($21,856) compensation for the loss of income, lack of advance notice, as well as for non pecuniary damages.

In addition, the Commission requested the Court to order the company to implement a policy of affirmative preference for pregnant women, as the company discriminated against them in job acceptance, while making its profit from targeting pregnant women as its designated clientele. The case is still pending before the court.

Legal Developments

397. As mentioned above, on April 10, 2008, The Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Workplaces to Women's Needs Law was enacted by the Israeli Knesset. The purpose of the new Law is to generate a change in the business culture in Israel and promote public awareness in order to encourage employers to advance and integrate women in the workplace. Under the Law, substantial monetary incentives and grants will be granted annually by the Minister of ITL to employers in the private sector who endeavor to integrate and promote women in their business, and who initiate programs to that end, as well as employers who modify the workplace and work conditions to the needs of women and parents. The employers must show that they actually integrated women in their businesses, promoted women and instituted programs to adapt the work environment to women. The Ministry of ITL is presently determining the specific criteria upon which the businesses will be chosen.

According to the Law, the Minister of ITL shall establish a Public Council for Integration and Advancement of Women in The Workplace, which will function as an advisor to the Minister on the issue of women in the workplace, including measures to implement the provisions of the Law. The Public Council will consist of 11 members – from relevant Government Ministries, as well as experts in gender studies, women's NGO representatives, representatives of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission and representatives of employers and employees unions. A retired female Judge will head the Public Council.

The Minister of ITL is required to submit an annual report on the implementation of the Law to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women and the Committee of Labor Welfare and Health.

This Law has the potential of serving as an incentive to employ more women and to advance women to senior positions within the workplace and to modify working condition to the unique needs of women, which will result in the broadening of women's economic independence.

398. Several recent rulings of Labor Courts have further reinforced the protection granted by law to women in the workforce. On July 26, 2007, the National Labor Court rejected an appeal from a former female employee of the Knesset, who claimed that she was discriminated against in salary and retirement benefits in comparison to her male counterparts (La.A. 222/06 Shoshana Kerem v. The State of Israel). The Court found that the appellant failed to prove that she experienced discrimination in comparison to her male colleagues, neither on the basis of the Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law nor on the basis of Equal Employment Opportunities Law.

In its decision, the Court held that “the principle of equality is one of the basic principles of every democratic state. The principle of equality is a cornerstone in our legal regime. The principle of equality derives from the basic rights of every person and the natural desire of human beings to live side by side in harmony, fraternity and peace". The Court concluded that the prohibition of discrimination derives from the principle of equality and is anchored in the Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law and the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. Here, however, the Court held that the former employee of the Knesset did not prove any connection between the claimed discrimination and her being a woman.

399. On July 22, 2008, the Tel Aviv Labor District Court awarded a woman 85,690 NIS ($21,422) in compensation for the pecuniary damage caused by her illegal dismissal and the violation of several constitutional rights (La.C. (Tel-Aviv) 5043/04 Ronit Shmuel v. Bravo Engineering Inc. (22.6.2008)). The Court determined that the dismissal of a woman undergoing fertility treatment constitutes a violation of the Women's Employment Law, which grants protection to the employee undergoing such treatment if she is absent from her workplace due to the treatment, on the condition that she presents her employer with a written affirmation from the physician in charge that the treatment requires absence from work and provided that she informs her employer in advance of her future absence. In this case, the Court determined that since the woman failed to present the written affirmation prior to her dismissal, she could not benefit from the protection of the Women's Employment Law.

However, the Court found the dismissal as violating the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, as it constitutes prohibited discrimination according to the Law. The dismissal was prior to the enactment of Amendment No. 11 to the Law adding the prohibition of dismissal of an employee due to fertility treatment and in vitro fertilization. Nevertheless, the Court found that in the explanatory notes to the original draft law on Equal Employment Opportunities the legislator wished to extend the protection to employee's fertility related rights, therefore found the dismissal to constitute prohibited discrimination as defined by the Law and awarded the plaintiff with compensation in accordance with the Law.

400. On November 5, 2008, the Tel-Aviv District Labor Court ordered the compensation of a woman who was forced to resign from her employment due to obstacles imposed by the employer after she notified him of her pregnancy. The Court determined that the woman is entitled to 50,000 NIS ($12,500) non pecuniary damages due to the breach of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, as well as to 32,000 NIS ($8,000) pecuniary damage due to loss of employment, unlawful deductions, loss of accumulated rights etc. The deterioration and obstacles placed included the obligation to report her whereabouts, cancellation of her computer password needed to perform her duties, cancellation of the possibility to make outgoing calls on the cellular phone, etc. These obstacles subsequently forced the women to resign. As these obstacles were imposed by the manager and primary shareholder, the Court ordered the piercing of the corporate veil and ordered that the compensation be paid by the company and manager jointly (La.C. 5524/03 Annette Kirsch v. Zehohit Bidodit Inc. et. al. (5.11.2008)).
401. On March 16, 2008, the National Labor Court determined that failing to accept a woman back to work after her maternity leave violates the Women's Employment Law, as well as the Equal Employment Opportunities Law (La.A. (National) 627/06 Orly Morey v. M.D.P Yellow Inc. et. al. (16.3.2008)). The Women's Employment Law prohibits the dismissal of an employee during her maternity leave, as well as 45 (currently 60) days after the leave, in order to allow an employee to return to the workplace, prove her ability and continue her employment. The Law stipulates that such terminations of employment are prohibited unless it receives the preliminary approval of the Minister of ITL who must be convinced that the dismissal is not related to the pregnancy or if the employer is announced as bankrupt and the workplace ceases to function.

Here, the employee was summoned to a meeting during her maternity leave, in which she was informed of her dismissal at the end of her maternity leave, which did not receive the approvals required according to the Law. She was told not to return to work after her leave and instead to receive payment for the 45 days during which her dismissal is prohibited. It should be noted that the redemption of the period of time in which the dismissal is prohibited and when the employee is interested in returning back to work, also constitutes a violation of the Law which is subject to compensation, and that the dismissal also violates the Equal Employment Opportunities Law as it prohibits discrimination on the ground of pregnancy or parenting. Due to the violation of both laws, the Court awarded compensation in the amount of 50,000 NIS ($12,500) to the employee. The National Labor Court President, Judge Steve Adler, recommended that in the future, any case where principle issues in the field of equality arises, the Labor Courts will bring these issues to the attention of the Equal Opportunities Commission in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor.

402. In La.C. (Jerusalem) 2260/06 Biazly Mali v. Partner Communications Ltd. (18.9.2008), a dedicated employee, who worked for 6 years for Partner Communications and was very highly regarded, was forced to take nearly 5 months of unpaid leave following her maternity leave, although it included the period the employer is compelled to receive the employee back after the maternity leave. The conditions of the positions offered to her on her return after the maternity leave were inferior to those she enjoyed in her previous position, and were only temporary by nature. Efforts made on her behalf to find proper positions in the company failed, and therefore she was left with no alternative but to resign. The employee claimed she was discriminated against due to her pregnancy and transferred from her position, as well as unlawful dismissal after her maternity leave due to parenting.

The Court determined that subjecting an employee to deterioration in the working conditions and dismissal due to pregnancy and parenting violates the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. The Court ordered Partner Communications to pay non-pecuniary damage in the amount of 40,000 NIS ($10,000) according to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. In addition, the Court ordered the company to compensate the employee for violation of the Women's Employment Law, since she was not employed during the mandatory period after her maternity leave, as well as to compensate her for the period the company forced her to take an unpaid leave and compensation for dismissal without due notice according to the Women's Employment Law. Additionally, the Court ordered compensation for the dismissal itself. In total the employee received a total compensation of 110,800 NIS ($27,700).

403. According to the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, an employer who employs more than 25 employees is obligated to prescribe a code of practice detailing the principle provisions of the Law concerning sexual harassment and adverse treatment in the labor relations sphere, and the procedures for filing complaints in respect of sexual harassment or adverse treatment and for dealing with such complaints by the employer. The employer must publish the code of practice among his/her employees. The Law further obligates the employer to appoint a supervisor of sexual harassment issues, which is responsible, inter alia, for handling sexual harassment and adverse treatment complaints, and to take measures aimed at raising his/her employees' awareness of the issue. Furthermore, the Law applies to employers both from the public and private sectors.

404. During 2007, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women also sent out letters, to which a model code of practice was attached, to 500 employers in the private sector. The Authority receives responses to hundreds of requests for the model code of practice in different languages and responds to all by distribution of the model code. These model codes of practice are available in various languages (Hebrew, Arabic, Russian, Amharic and English) and are easily accessible on the Authority's website.
405. An enforcement and awareness promotion campaign of the Authority in conjunction with the Enforcement and Regulatory Administration within the Ministry of ITL, was launched in October 2007. During the joint campaign, model codes of practice were distributed in workplaces throughout the country and data on the implementation of the provisions of the Law were collected. Inspections were performed in 163 workplaces, in which 15,000 workers are employed altogether. The inspections revealed that the majority of employers comply with the obligation to publish a code of practice, yet 34% of the employers did not do so in violation of the Law.
406. During 2007, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women began collecting data on the implementation of the obligation to appoint a supervisor, in local municipalities and in governmental corporations. By the end of 2008, 900 out of 2,600 employers examined in the private sector, 172 out of 250 local municipalities and 48 out of 65 governmental corporations, have appointed a supervisor. In the Kibbutzim movement there were 140 supervisors and in the Civil Service, 70 supervisors (100%) were appointed in Governmental Ministries and auxiliary units. At the end of 2007, the first training course for supervisors was launched in cooperation with the Union for Local Authorities in Israel.
407. In 2008, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women began the production and distribution of a training kit designed for employers and workplaces, which include explanations regarding sexual harassment, statistical data and relevant legislation. The kit was designed to raise awareness for this important issue and fight sexual harassment.
408. Israel is a party to the following International Labor Organization (ILO) conventions regarding equality and prohibition of gender discrimination: Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100, since 1965) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111, since 1959). Since its previous report, Israel submitted the following reports regarding the abovementioned ILO conventions:
- The Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) - relating to the years 2005-2006.
 - The Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) - relating to the years 2005-2006.

409. On November 13, 2008, the Tel-Aviv District Labor Court ordered the compensation of an employee in the amount of 50,000 NIS ($12,500) due to its employer's failure to address her complaint regarding sexual harassment in the workplace. Although the employer appointed a person responsible to receive complaints according to the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, the employee's complaint was not handled properly, as she was shifted to a different location in the office, in a way that appeared to be as if she was being punished for complaining. In addition, a workers' gathering was held, with the absence of the employee, in which the details of the complaint were publicly exposed. The harassment which included sexual comments and jokes, including the correction of the employee's pronunciation of words to words with sexual connotations, and questions regarding her sexual relationship with her husband, continued for nearly a year, despite the change in seating arrangements, in the end of which the employee was fired.

The Court determined that the termination of employment did not result from cutbacks or even preformed on a seniority basis. The Court held that the employee was fired solely on account of her complaint, thus the company violated the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, as well. The Court ordered the compensation based on the age of the employee, the emotional damage inflicted upon her, and her chances of finding alternative employment (La.C. 2271/04 Bella Krezner v. Ort Israel (13.11.2008)).

410. On July 16, 2008, The Nazareth Labor District Court ruled that constant request for friendship in the framework of work relations and authority which imposes an increased duty of care upon the employer, amounts to sexual harassment, and ordered on compensation of the plaintiff in the amount of 15,000 NIS ($3,750). In this case a female employee of the Israel Antiquities Authority was fired, and claimed it was done due to her lack of compliance with her supervisor's constant request to 'be friends'. Since both the supervisor and the employee were from traditional Arab background, the employee found the request improper, which led her not to feel at ease around him, even though it did not amount to explicit sexual requests. After rejecting his requests several times, the supervisor changed his attitude towards her and even avoided directing her and answering her calls regarding work related issues. Eventually, the employee was fired due to lack of satisfaction regarding her work. The employee claimed the termination of employment was a result of her filing a complaint regarding the sexual harassment.

The Court found that the constant request from the employer could in itself be subject to several interpretations. However, due to the fact they were in the framework of relations of authority which imposes an increased duty of care upon the employer, they amounted to sexual harassment. The Court did not find any misconduct in the proceedings taken by the Israel Antiquities Authority, who received the employee complaint and agreed to allow her to work in a different region, where she will not be in direct contact with the supervisor until conclusions will be reached regarding her complaint (La.C. 1452/04 Janet Abas v. The Israel Antiquities Authority et. al. (16.6.2008)).

411. In another decision concerning sexual harassment in the workplace, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal from the nursing deputy director in the Mental Health Center in Beer-Sheva, who had been convicted of harassing nurses during a training course (C.S.A. 11976/05 Ruchi Halil v. The Civil Service Commission (11.04.07)). The Court found that the appellant had repeatedly spoken to his subordinates in a manner that contained sexual content, which is considered to constitute sexual harassment according to the Law. The Disciplinary Court sentenced the appellant to severe reprimand, a rank reduction of one level for a period of two years, removal to a different governmental hospital and disqualification from service in the training of nurses for a period of three years.

412. In the case of Civil Service Appeal 2192/06 Moshe Rahmani v. Civil Service Commission (5.4.07), the Supreme Court rejected an appeal from an employee of the Ministry of Finance. He was found to have sexually harassed (verbally) an 18.5 year old worker, was convicted and sentenced to dismissal and disqualification from working in the Civil Service for a period of 5 years. The Court held that the appellant's repeated offers to the complainant, which were of a sexual nature, and which she repeatedly and clearly rejected, could be considered sexual harassment under the terms of the Law.

Child-care services expenditures

413. On April 3, 2008 the Tel-Aviv District Court determined that expenses paid for childcare services, such as nursery and after-school programs, are expenses made for the purpose of generating an income, therefore can be deducted from the taxable income of a mother each tax year. The Court determined that these costs are essential in allowing the integration of mothers to young children in the labor market.

Here, the Court determined that a mother of two children, a lawyer with a private practice, needs to work long hours in order to succeed in her profession, and therefore must find a solution for the care and supervision of her children during her working hours. However, the Tax Authorities did not agree to deduct the expenses paid for childcare from the taxable income. The Court held that distinction shall be made between the component of care and supervision (including the amount of money necessary to operate a childcare institution) to the component of education and enrichment the children receive while in those childcare institutions.

The Court emphasized the fact that the premise is the right of the two spouses to fulfill their career aspirations, their right to realize their will to practice their occupation and create a livelihood for themselves and their family-members. The placement of children who need adult supervision in childcare institutions is done for the purpose of allowing both parents to work. Therefore, the Court ordered that the Tax Authorities deduct 2/3 of the expenses paid in the years in dispute (I.T.A. (Tel-Aviv) 1213/04 Vered Peri v. The Income Tax Assessor of the Dan Metropolitan Area (03.04.2008)).

414. On May 12, 2008, the State of Israel appealed to the Supreme Court, and the proceedings are still pending (C.A. 4248/08 The Income Tax Assessor of the Dan Metropolitan Area v. Vered Peri).

Pregnancy and Maternity Protection

415. Between the years 2006 and 2008, a number of significant amendments were made to the Women's Employment Law, which further elaborate and enhance the importance of maternity protection for women:
- 415.1. Amendment No. 33, February 2007 - Extended the period in which a woman returning to work after a maternity leave may not be dismissed from her place of employment from 45 days to 60 days.
 - 415.2. Amendment No. 34, March 2007 - Prior to the Amendment, a woman (or her child) who were hospitalized during the mother's maternity leave for at least two consecutive weeks, was entitled to extend the maternity leave for the period of her hospitalization, up to four weeks. The Amendment allows the extension of the maternity leave even if the period of hospitalization was not consecutive.
 - 415.3. Amendment No. 35, March 2007 - Prior to the Amendment, the punishment for unauthorized dismissal of a pregnant woman, a woman on maternity leave, a woman staying in a shelter for battered women or an employee undergoing fertility treatment, was one month's imprisonment or a fine of 67,300 NIS ($16,825) or both, while the period of limitation for the offence was one year. The short period of limitation significantly reduced the ability to enforce the Law. The Amendment sets the maximum punishment for the offence at six months imprisonment and doubles the current fine. As a result of the increased severity of the sentencing, the period of limitation is automatically extended to a period of five years from the time the offence is committed.
 - 415.4. Amendment No. 36, March 2007 - Extended the period in which a woman absent from work due to her stay in a shelter for battered women may not be dismissed upon her return to work, from 60 to 90 days. The purpose of these provisions is to allow the employee to return and reintegrate in her workplace after the period of absence while at the shelter, thus giving her a real chance to prove herself again in her place of work. This protection also encourages the independence of the battered woman and serves as a negative incentive, discouraging her from returning to continued dependency on the person who injured her.
 - 415.5. Amendment No. 37, May 2007 - The maternity leave was extended from 12 to 14 weeks, thus bringing Israel inline with the minimum requirement from member states of the European Union.
 - 415.6. Amendment No. 38, June 2007 - The temporary provision allowing for paternity leave in the case of a mother conceding her rights to a leave to her spouse, has become final.
 - 415.7. Amendment No. 39, August 2007 - addresses several issues:
 - 415.7.1. It allows for a woman to shorten her maternity leave in the case of her giving the infant up for adoption or in the case of a surrogate mother.
 - 415.7.2. It also allows for a man whose spouse has given birth and can not care for the infant due to a handicap or illness to take a paternity leave for the full period in which she is unable to care for the infant for further elaboration on this issue please see section regarding parenthood below.

- 415.7.3. A woman may be absent from work due to her pregnancy upon approval of a doctor. If she is not entitled to payment from the Health Insurance Institute nor from her employer, her absence will be considered as sick leave.
- 415.7.4. When a pregnant woman, due to the nature or conditions of her work or workplace, is unable to continue her work, she may be absent upon doctor approval. Her absence without pay will be permitted only if her employer can not find an alternative suitable position for her. Her seniority will not be affected by her absence.
- 415.7.5. A nursing mother who is not allowed by law to work in certain jobs due to her nursing condition and is not entitled to vacation days after her maternity leave, may be absent from work. Her absence will be considered vacation without pay and her seniority will be maintained.
- 415.7.6. Upon fulfillment of certain conditions specified in the law, the termination of a limited term contract, will be considered a dismissal when concerning circumstances such as pregnancy, maternity leave, fertility leave etc.
- 415.7.7. A direct right of appeal has been granted to an employee regarding decisions made by the Government official in charge of allowing dismissals or cutting back of a post during pregnancy.
- 415.8. Amendment No. 40, August 2007 - Imposition of responsibility on employers who have caused the dismissal of a pregnant woman employed as a contract worker in violation of the Law.
- 415.9. Amendment No. 41, October 2007 - The Amendment determines that the provision prohibiting dismissal during fertility treatment for a first or second child will also apply to an employee who has a child or children from a previous relationship, and who is undergoing fertility treatment for a first or second child with the current partner or spouse.
- 415.10. Amendment No. 42, February 2008 - An employer is prohibited, for a period of four months following maternity leave, to require a female employee to work night hours (of which two hours, at least, are between the hours of 22:00 and 06:00), or to require her to work on the weekly rest days even if this is permitted according to the Work and Rest Hours Law, 5711-1951, unless the employee has agreed to do so in writing (Certain jobs are not included such as hospital work etc.).
- 415.11. Amendment No. 43, February 2008 – Legislation prior to the Amendment prohibited dismissal of a female employee who is on maternity leave and for a period of 60 days following the maternity leave, and also did not allow an overlap between the period of notice for dismissal and the period when dismissal is prohibited. Although the Law did prohibit dismissal of a female employee for a period of 60 days following a period of unpaid leave after maternity leave, it did not explicitly prohibit an overlap between the period of notice for dismissal and the period of the unpaid leave and the following sixty days. The Amendment prevents the possibility of overlap between the period of notice for dismissal and the periods during which it is prohibited to dismiss an employee on unpaid leave following maternity leave, or a female employee who is on such leave from her employment with dangerous substances because she is nursing, such overlap effectively cancels the intension of the provision against dismissal during this period.

415.12. Amendment No. 44, March 2008 - Prior to the Amendment, the Law allowed for an unpaid vacation after the maternity leave, up to a year from the day of the birth, on the condition that the employee worked for at least 24 months prior to the birth. The Amendment allows this right after only 12 months of employment prior to the birth.

416. In 2007, the Equal Employment Opportunities Law was also amended. The Law prohibits discrimination against an employee during acceptance for employment, in working conditions and on dismissal for various reasons, including being pregnant or parenthood. Amendment No. 11 adds provisions to the Law that prohibit discrimination due to parenthood to include pre-parenthood situations, such as fertility treatment or IVF.

Parenthood

417. Amendment No. 39, dated August 2007 allows for a man whose spouse has given birth and can not care for the infant due to a handicap or illness to take a paternity leave for the full period in which she is unable to care for the infant. Prior to the Amendment, in such case the father was not able to take the full period of leave. According to the Amendments, his paternity leave does not cancel the mother's right to her leave. A parallel Amendment was made to the National Insurance Law to allow the father on leave to collect a birth allowance in addition to the allowance paid to the mother.

418. As of September 2007, a man can replace his wife on maternity leave if she is not capable of caring for the newborn due to her health condition, even if 6 weeks have not yet elapsed since the birth as usually required – if the infant is in the father's custody and in his sole care. This Maternity Leave for the father includes extension of the leave due to a multiple birth or hospitalization of the infant.

419. Amendment No. 8 of 2008, to the Sick Pay Law (Absence from Work due to a Child's Sickness) 5753-1993 (the "Sick Pay Law (Absence from Work due to a Child's Sickness)"), extended the number of days available for a single parent or to a parent who has sole care of his/her child, granting a 16-day leave to tend to a sick child (compared to the standard 12 days).

420. On September 1, 2008, the Women Employment Regulations (Times and Rules for Payment to Pension Fund) 5768-2008, entered into force and annulled the previous Regulations. These Regulations stipulate that during an employee's (male or female) maternity leave, the employer must transfer payments to his/her pension funds on his/her own, in the same amount as previous to his/her maternity leave. The employee is required to pay his/her part of the payment by deduction from the last salary or the first salary after he/she returns from the Maternity leave. If the employer and the employee transfer payments to the pension fund separately, during the time the employee is entitled to pregnancy protection benefit, then the employer shall transfer the payments applying on him/her, no later than 7 days after the employee transfers his/her share of the payment to the employer. The employer is required to inform the employee regarding these regulations, in reasonable time after learning of her pregnancy or after learning that a male employee intends to take maternity leave. Moreover, these regulations come to add rights to the employees and shall not subtract from any law, collective agreement, work contract, or practice.

423. In 2007, the Israeli civil workforce totaled 1.546 million men and 1.347 million women. Compared to 2003, the workforce grew by 146,400 men and 137,400 women, hence women accounted for roughly 49% of the increase.

424. In 2007, women's proportion of the civilian labor force of the total population aged 15+ increased to 51.1%, compared to 49.1% in 2003 and 48.2% in 2001. Men's proportion increased to 61.8%, from 60.1% in 2003 and 60.7% in 2001.

425. In 2007, 31.0% of the women in the labor force had 16 years of schooling or more, compared to 24.5% of the men. The level of education is a conclusive factor in female participation rates in the labor force and the rates go up as the level of education rises. The general education level of women in the labor force is higher than that of men.

Work Patterns

426. In 2007, 88.2% of men and 66.3% of women worked full-time. Most of the usually part-time employed persons in the labor market were women (453,400 women compared to 181,300 men). 15.9% of the women stated that the motivation for part-time employment was care for their children and/or household.

427. Temporary absence from work is higher for women when compared to men. In 2007, 115,900 women were temporary absent from work compared to 70,100 men. 20,900 women were absent due to maternity leave while in the same period, the number of absent men due to army reserve duty was 4,600.

428. In 2007, 1,240,100 women were employed (compared to 1,441,900 men), of that, 1,138,400 women were salaried employees (91.8%), while only 5.1% of the women were self-employed. At the same time, most of the employed men (83.5%) were salaried employees and 9% were self-employed. Of the total employed persons 1,129,200 were Jewish women and 74,100 were Arab women. Of the Jewish women 1,033,900 were salaried employees.

Unemployment

429. From 2003 until 2006, there has been a decrease in the number of unemployed women (defined as women who have not worked at all and have actively sought work in the month prior to the survey, and could have begun work during the week of the survey had they been offered a job). The unemployment rate decreased from 132.5 thousands in 2003 to 112.9 thousands in 2006. The unemployment rate for women which was 11.2% in 2003 decreased to 8.8% in 2006 (compared to 10.1% among men in 2003 and 7.8% in 2006). These statistics refer to the 18-67 age group which is the relevant group for participation in the labor force. The rate of participation of women in the labor force ages 18-67 was 59.7% in 2003 and increased to 61.4% in 2006. The rate of participation of men in the labor force increased only slightly from 70.2% in 2003 to 71.3% in 2006.
430. In 2007, 199,236 employment seekers applied to the Employment Service Labor Bureaus. 116,882 were women (compared to 127,979 women in 2004) and the remaining 82,353 were men (compared to 102,391 men in 2004).
431. The means for seeking employment amongst unemployed women is divided as follows: Employment Bureau of the Employment Service - 48.6%, manpower agencies - 48%, newspaper advertisements - 71.8%, personal applications to potential employers - 57.8%, friends and relatives - 71%, attempts to establish ones' own private business - 3.6%. A similar breakdown may be found amongst men (Note: The percentages do not add up to 100% since the same person may use various means for seeking employment).

Careers of Women: Levels and Salaries

Women's Occupational Distribution and Gender Segregation

432. As detailed in Israel's previous report, women maintain their considerable representation in "feminine professions", with the highest percentages of women employees in the education, health services, welfare and social work. However, women's soaring representation in the legal profession continued, as detailed in Article 7, above.

Salary and Earning Gaps

433. Gaps remain between male and female salaries. According to recent data (2006) in average, men earned 57% higher income than women. One explanation for this gap is shorter working hours (or lower availability for work) for women - In 2006, employed men worked an average of 45.5 hours a week, compared to employed women, who worked 34.8 hours a week - a 30.7% difference. Yet, in 2006, women's average income per hour was 38.3 NIS ($9.575) and men's - 45.8 NIS ($11.45), a 19.5% gap, indicating that the difference cannot be solely attributed to the number of working hours.
434. In 2006, women's average hourly wages were 80.5% of the men's. By occupation, their hourly wages are highest, relative to men, in the category "other professional and technicians" (86.5%). Women earn the least, relative to men, among skilled industrial and construction workers, but this ratio has improved from 63% in 1998 to 92.3% in 2006.

435. Arab women employees earned 8% more per hour, than Arab men. In terms of gross monthly salary, Arab men's salaries were 35% higher than the Arab women's salaries. The difference in the monthly salary is due to the gap in men's working hours compared to the women's - a difference of an average of 15 monthly hours.

436. 35% of Arab employed women are employed in academic, independent and technical professions, 27% in clerical work and up to 25% in sales and agencies as compared to Arab men - 27% employed in academic, independent and technical professions and 35% as professionals and non professionals.

Women's Entrepreneurship

437. A 2006 survey indicates that 33.7% of the self-employed are women, compared to 66.3% men. Women entrepreneurs face inherent obstacles such as insufficient administrative skills, difficulties in financing and low self-esteem. Consequently, several programs were developed by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor through the Israel Small and Medium Size Enterprises Authority (SME Authority) and in the Centers for Fostering Entrepreneurship for every woman, including Arabs, Druze and Bedouin, new immigrants, and ultra-orthodox women. These programs include assistance in funding for small businesses, women empowerment courses, establishment of "women only" business clubs and other activities and special assistance for single mothers. In 2007, Israel's SME Authority, through its Centers for the Promotion of Entrepreneurship handled 6,909 new applications from women and 10,276 from men (compared to 6,689 applications from women and 11,119 from men in 2006). In 2007, 96.5% of the women applicants participated in guidance courses run by the Centers. 25% of the women received coaching and trainers to assist them. As part of the Ministry of ITL's policy to foster entrepreneurship among challenged segments of the population, the SME Authority runs several programs, described below, with an emphasis on the women population:

- 437.1. Initiating business - a program in cooperation with Israel's Employment Bureau, Joint Distribution Committee and the Ministry of immigrant Absorption to locate unemployed in all parts of the country with entrepreneurship potential for women who are given coaching for the start-up period of the business. This project which started this year has 79 women participants - 85% of all participants.
- 437.2. Project for single parent women in Ramla-Lod - a long term project for single parent women giving them the necessary tools for the starting up of a business through a coaching and determining the proper financing tools for the business. Currently there are 20 women participants in the program.
- 437.3. Economic Initiative for Women in Kseife - a three year program developed with "Joint-Israel", for creating and marketing authentic products made by women through a central body owned by them. The women become business owners exempt from V.A.T. In 2007, 20 women participated in the program. At the end of the three year project, 100 Bedouin women will have participated in the program.
- 437.4. Female Horizon Project - in cooperation with the Forum for Civil Agreement and "Joint-Israel" for the Arab population. The project's aim is to develop and empower 60 business owners and includes, inter alia, the writing by women of their own independent business development plans.
- 437.5. Innovators Association - courses are given to qualified women for running a business event (birthdays and other parties). Every year 70 women participate in the program.
- 437.6. Project in the Western Galilee for training of Arab women in the field of alternative medicine in cooperation with the Albaum Institute. The 25 women who participate in the program receive training in alternative medicine and in business management.
- 437.7. Another project is the creation of a joint marketing body for women businesses in the Bedouin village Hussniya in the Galilee. Currently there are 20 women participating in the project.

Vocational and Professional Training for Women

438. As detailed in Israel's previous report, with regard to female participation in the labor force, two groups – Ultra-Orthodox Jewish women and Arab women – require special programs and measures, due to the religious-cultural factors affecting their potential entry into the labor market.
439. In the field of vocational training, the policy of devoting special budgets to training women continues. Some of the special programs target women in general, while others specifically target vulnerable groups of women.

440. The Department for the Advancement of Women within the Ministry of ITL endeavors to increase the employability of women and, consequently, their economic independence. Several of the Department's initiatives are as follows:

440.1. Self-empowerment workshops and entrepreneurship workshops, including new immigrants, Arab women and ultra-orthodox women. These workshops also focus on work skills and additional retraining courses.

Between the years 2002 and 2007, 370 workshops were provided to some 6,500 participants. The participants report improved self-image, personal and professional empowerment and better assessment of the job market. Participants in the Entrepreneurship Workshops report a better understanding and knowledge of the various aspects of small business establishment. Participants in the workshops usually enjoy continued professional assistance. These women undertake various activities at the end of the workshops such as acquiring education, Hebrew classes, vocational training, employment or some form of voluntary activity.

440.2. Programs for integrating single parents into the work force: between the years 2003 and 2005, the Ministry of ITL operated a program intended for single parents receiving allowances or alimony from the National Insurance Institute, in order to integrate them into the work force. The program was launched as a pilot and then incorporated into the regular long term program of the Ministry. The program provides assistance in financing child care by subsidizing payments for afternoon programs and day-care centers. Financial assistance is also provided for babysitting during non-conventional hours and during summer vacation. The program also addresses professional training aspects, through a voucher system to courses recognized by the Manpower Training and Development Unit.

In August 2008, the Unit began to offer professional consultants to help identify appropriate training courses and job placement services according to the individual needs and qualifications of the participants in the program. During 2008, an additional program will be launched to encourage single parents to participate in the program to encourage the development of entrepreneurship skills, and thus, the ability to establish small businesses.

An additional pilot program established by the Ministry of ITL was launched on September 1, 2008. As part of the new program, training centers for single parents, receiving allowances or alimony, will be established. Through courses operated in these centers, the participants will acquire skills to enable them to enter or re-enter the labor force. Following a two months course, the participants will be directed to specific training courses or jobs to suit their individual qualifications.

440.3. Courses for entrepreneurship and small business: courses for women with entrepreneurial spirit and/or plans, but without access to training because of economic, geographical or cultural obstacles. The training enhances their prospects of establishing a viable business and improving their economic status. The courses are provided by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor and the Israel Small and Medium Enterprises Authority, through Centers for the Promotion of Entrepreneurship (CPEs). Currently, 24 CPEs are located throughout the country. In addition to training, these centers also provide assistance and counseling in the process towards the establishment of a small business.

441. The Division for Training and Development in the Ministry of ITL takes specific measures to raise the number of women participants in the courses via the establishment of separate courses for women in the ultra orthodox and Arab populations. This, through directing the Acceptance Committees to perform their role with the utmost equality, and supporting female participants in all courses, especially those previously considered “masculine”.
442. The following table depicts the distribution of men and women trainees within the various types of courses offered in the year 2007.

Occupational safety

443. The issue of occupational safety and hygiene in workplaces relating to women employment was inspected 58 times by the Ministry of ITL during 2007-2008. No deficiencies were found during the inspections. The following table describes some of the issues inspected as well as other occupational safety data.

Child-care

444. The availability of day-care centers that provide an educational framework to children is one of the most important factors to women participation in the labor market. Alongside those centers, which are supervised by the Ministry of ITL (ages 0-3) and the Ministry of Education (ages 3 and older), there are also private child-care centers as well as home care through nursemaids.
445. According to recent data there are approximately 542,000 children ages 0-3 in Israel. 246,400 children (45.8%) are integrated in paid group frameworks and 294,000 children (54.2%) are integrated in group frameworks free of charge. Of the children who are integrated in paid group frameworks 28.3% are taken care of in day-care centers, 26.2% are in kindergartens, 24.6% are in nursery schools, 17.4% are taken care of by nannies or caretakers and 1.9% are in religious Torah schools. Of the children who are integrated in group frameworks free of charge, 83.8% are taken care of by one of the parents and 16.2% are taken care of by a nanny, a caretaker or a family relative.
446. According to the Day-Care Department in the Ministry of ITL there are currently 1,600 day-care centers and 2,600 nursery schools, attended by 76,000 working mother's children (ages 0-4) and 15,000 children to mothers in distress referred by the welfare authorities.

447. Following a Government Resolution of June 2005, 150 million NIS ($37,500,000) were allocated to the Day-Care Department in the Ministry of ITL, and the Ministry began operating a plan intended to encourage mothers to integrate and enter the employment market. The plan's main goals are:
- 447.1. Providing further subsidization of monthly payments to day-care centers and nurseries for working mothers with low income and giving further discounts for children attending subsidized day-care centers and nurseries.
 - 447.2. New child care frameworks - for the first time, afternoon child care facilities will be recognized by the Ministry of ITL, and the children attending them will be subsidized by the State (according to parents' income). In addition, 1,000 new positions will be created, by opening new frameworks for 5,000 children.
 - 447.3. Improvement of service – inter alia by prolonging the activity hours of the child care facilities according to the demand and working parents' needs.
448. According to Government Resolution No. 1134, (February 4, 2007), titled “Steps for Reducing Social Gaps and Increasing the Participation in the Labor Force”, the Government resolved, inter alia, on integration of mothers back to the work force. It was decided to enlarge the budget of the day-care division in the ministry of ITL by 67 Million NIS ($16,750,000) in each of the next school years (67 Million NIS ($16,750,000) in 2008, 134 Million NIS ($33,500,000) in 2009 and 200 Million NIS ($50,000,000) in 2010) in order to fund the following services: meals for children of working mother with children up to the age of 6 and day-care centers for children of working mothers with children up to the age of 3. The coupon system according to which the funds will be allocated, will be implemented in day-care centers and nursery schools which will receive special permits, and after a pilot in which the efficiency of the program will be tested.
449. In the Jewish population, 59.2% of the mothers take advantage of day-care centers. 8.3% of the women are supported by family members, friends or require no assistance and in 32.5% of the cases the child is taken care of by one of the parents. In the Arab population, which in general is considered more traditional, 76.3% of the women remain at home, 14% of the women turn to day-care centers and 9.7% use other free of charge arrangements.

Enforcement of Employment Legislation

The Department of Labor Law Enforcement in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor

450. The responsibility for the enforcement of the Women's Employment Law is of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor. In 2004 a new Department was established in the Ministry – the Enforcement and Licensing Administration. The authorities of the Department are divided into two sections: issuing permits required by the Law to employers upon request (e.g. in case of dismissal of pregnant employee or employee undergoing fertility treatment or for a woman in a shelter for battered women) and the other for enforcement issues including carrying out of criminal investigations in accordance with the Law.

451. The Administration is responsible for enforcing and regulating 17 labor laws protecting workers in Israel, including the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. The data below therefore relates to the period from 2004-2007.
452. The criminal investigation begins with the lodging of a complaint as further detailed below, while the licensing procedure begins with the filing of a request to dismiss a female employee or a request to cut down her work hours or her salary, when such steps are prohibited by the Law without a permit to do so.
453. A criminal offense in accordance with the Women's Employment Law, only applies to a pregnant woman employed for over six months. Upon receipt of a complaint by a woman, concerning a dismissal while pregnant, a supervisor must first verify whether a permit has been requested or issued under the Law. If a permit has been issued allowing for the dismissal of the employee, no criminal investigation may be initiated. If the employer notified the employee of being dismissed and only subsequently the employee informed the employer of her pregnancy, no criminal investigation will be opened. The investigation is handled in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Law 5742-1982 (the "Criminal Procedure Law").
454. The statistics of the Enforcement and Licensing Administration show that in 2006, 200 complaints were made by women who were fired from their jobs due to pregnancy and/or fertility treatments, without the employer having a permit to do so. 100 of the complaints resulted in the initiation of investigations. One indictment was filed. In 2007- 300 complaints were made. 120 investigations were initiated which resulted in 3 indictments filed.
455. The following table indicates figures concerning applications for the dismissals of pregnant women for the years 2004 - 2008 (June).

456. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, applications concerning dismissals of pregnant women have decreased. In 2007, 1,248 applications were received concerning dismissal of pregnant employees, a significant reduction of 24.7% compared to 1,657 applications in 2003 and to 1,407 applications in 2002. In 58.6% of the cases, the Enforcement and Licensing Administration granted permits for dismissal while 41.4% of the requests were either refused or the cases were closed. The main reasons for consent were, inter alia, the closing of businesses, cut-down of manpower, termination of contract and reasons regarding work interactions such as inappropriate behavior at work, etc.

457. The decision to approve dismissal is an administrative one, subject to judicial review. Both parties can petition this decision to a Labor Court. However, generally, the courts do not intercede in the competent authority's considerations and do not reverse those decisions, provided the competent authority performed its function in good faith, and in a manner relevant to its capacity.

Women's Employment among the Arab Population

General

458. During the last two decades, there has been an increase in Arab women's participation in the labor force, from 11% in 1980 to 14.8% in 2002 to 22.2% in 2006. In 2006, Arab women constitute about 4% of all women in the civil labor force in Israel. In 2006, there were 328,900 Arabs employed in the labor force, 250,350 (76.1%) were men and 78,600 (23.9%) were women. 37,500 of the Arab population were listed as unemployed, 13,200 (35.2%) of them were women.
459. Out of the Arab women in the civil labor force in 2006, 53,900 (68.0%) were Muslim women, 17,100 (21.6%) were Christian women and 7,000 (8.8%) were Druze women.
460. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor is aware of the inherent difficulties faced by entrepreneurs from the Bedouin population, such as limited financial capability, and is therefore taking affirmative action to bridge the gaps. In addition to the current centers, the Small and Medium Size Enterprises Authority is currently working to establish a designated Center for Nurturing Entrepreneurship in the Arab and Bedouin localities, which will be better equipped to serve these populations' needs.
461. Furthermore, the Encouragement of Capital Investments Order (Development Areas), 5763-2002, was amended in order to strengthen the Bedouins position by including several Bedouin towns in the updated list of industrial areas. There are currently seventeen planned industrial areas in the Southern district, three (17%), of which are in the Bedouin towns – Rahat, Segev Shalom and Hura. Additionally, two new industrial areas currently in advanced stages of planning also service the Bedouin population – Shoket, (for Hura, Lakia, Meitar and Bney Shimon), and Lehavim, (for Rahat, Lehavim and Bney Shimon). Development of all these areas is uniform and subject to the same general criteria.

Day-care centers – Arab and Bedouin Localities

462. The participation rate of married Arab women in the civil labor force stands at 14%, while the participation rate of single Arab women is 46.8%. As demonstrated by the following table, there is an opposite ratio between the number of children and the participation rate in the work force.

Table 30 - Participation Rate of Arab Women in the Work Force by Number of Children, 2008

463. In the traditional Arab population, women are considered the primary caretakers for children; this is one of the factors that explain the low percentage of women participating in the work force. The Israeli Government, through the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, has invested great efforts in enhancing the awareness among women for their own careers and self-fulfillment. Recent years' growing participation of Arab, including Bedouin, women in the work force created a need for day-care centers and nurseries. The Government has moved to meet these growing needs.
464. As a matter of Policy, the Ministry of Construction and Housing works on the construction of day-care centers throughout the country on the basis of one day-care center for every 1,600 house units. Two centers have been recently built, in the Bedouin town of Rahat. Fourteen additional centers are under construction: nine in the northern area, four in the Central area and one in Jerusalem.
465. There are 900 nurseries in Arab localities, providing a solution for 1,500 children of working mothers and 3,000 children to mothers on social welfare. In addition, day-care centers operating in these localities provide a solution for another 1,000 children. Such nurseries and day-care centers allow mothers to work, as well as provide a source of income for the women operating them.
466. Recently the Government allocated funding for the establishment of 150 buildings designated for day-care centers, 17 of which in Arab localities.

Arab, Druze and Circassians employees in the state's Civil Service

467. On March 12, 2006, the Government decided, based on Section 15A of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law, to designate 337 employment positions promoting the integration of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassian minorities, in the Civil Service between the years 2006-2008. In addition, the Government decided to establish an Inter-Ministerial Team for

“The Examination of other Ways for Advancing Appropriate Representation of Arabs in the Civil Service”. On July 16, 2006, the Inter-Ministerial Team submitted its recommendations.

468. On August 31, 2006, the Government adopted Resolution No. 414 adopting most of the Inter-Ministerial Team’s recommendations, including: determination of new objectives for advancing appropriate representation of Arab-Israelis in the Civil Service: Arabs shall constitute 8% of all Civil Service employees by the end of 2008, and 10% by the end of 2010. In addition, 20% of all new positions shall be allocated for members of the Arab population until the end of 2008; consolidation of annual work plans on this issue shall take place in each Ministry; more positions for the Arab population shall be designated; the duty to give priority to Arab-Israelis in appointments and promotions shall be extended by another 4 years; a supervisor on the advancement of Arab representation shall be appointed in each Government Ministry and an Inter-Ministerial Team to follow-up on the implementation of the Resolution shall be established.
469. On November 11, 2007, the Government adopted Resolution No. 2579 amending the previous Resolution No. 414. According to the new Resolution, Arabs, including Druze and Circassians, are to consist of 12% of all Civil Service employees by the end of the year 2012. In addition, all Government Ministries must consolidate a five-year working plan for advancement of the objectives of the resolution, for example; by the end of 2012, 30% of all new positions shall be allocated for Arab-Israelis; there shall be a duty to prioritize to members of the Arab population for appointments and promotions until the end of 2012; more positions in Government Ministries shall be designated for members of the Arab population subject to the implementation of the five-year work plans and an Inter-Ministerial Team headed by the Director General of the Ministry of Justice shall be established to follow-up on the implementation of the provisions detailed above by every Government Ministry.
470. In addition, on March 12, 2006, the Government of Israel adopted a resolution, at the request of the Ministry of Justice, in the matter of suitable representation among interns in the Ministry of Justice. The Government decided, inter alia, as follows:
- “A. In accordance with the provisions of section 15A(b)(2) of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law, 5719-1959, to designate, insofar as possible, some ten percent of the annual class of interns in the Ministry of Justice solely for the employment of candidates who qualify for an internship in the Ministry of Justice and fulfill one of these:
- 1) the candidate is a member of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassians;
 - 2) the candidate or one of his/her parents was born in Ethiopia;
 - 3) the candidate is a “person with a severe disability” within its meaning in section 35.252 of the Civil Service Regulations...”
471. In accordance with the aforesaid resolution, it was decided to compile a directory of candidates that will effectuate the aforesaid Government Resolution with respect to “suitable representation” and will include candidates who meet the criteria set forth in the Government’s Resolution and whose particulars and qualifications make them extremely suitable for internship. Accordingly, in 2008, the Ministry of Justice announced, for the second year, the creation of such a directory of candidates for internship positions for September 2008 and March 2009.

472. As of November 2008, the rate of Arabs, Druze and Circassians employees in the Civil Service stood at 6.5% (in comparison to 6.17% in 2007), an increase of more than 27.8% compared to 2003. In 2007, 392 Arab and Druze citizens were hired by the Civil Service, of which 156 were women. The total rate of Arab and Druze women has increased by more than 44% between the years 2003-2007 as detailed in the following tables.

473. In 2007 a small but significant increase was observed in the number of Arabs and Druze employees within high ranks in the Civil Service, especially in the Society and Humanities and Engineers rankings.

474. As mentioned above, according to the current Civil Service work plan for the years 2008-2012 it was decided to increase the percentage of Arab and Druze employees in Ministries and divisions with high absorption potential. Among these Ministries and units are the Ministry of Health and others.

Article 12 - Equality in Access to Health Care

General

475. Under the National Health Insurance Law 5754-1994 (the “National Health Insurance Law”), every resident is entitled to comprehensive health care services. The services are to be provided in reasonable quality and within a reasonable time, and at a fair distance from one’s place of residence. Among these services are personal preventive medicine, health education, medical diagnosis, ambulatory medical care, mental care, hospitalization, medical rehabilitation, medicine supply, medical devices and accessories, and first aid medicine.
476. The annual National Quality Indicators for Community Health Care Report was first published in 2004. The current report (2008) presents data for 2005-2007. The data presented in the 2008 report relates to six fields of community health care – flu vaccination, screening for detection of colorectal cancer and mammography for detection of breast cancer, asthma treatment, treatment of diabetes, treatment of children and cardiology treatment. According to the Report, continued improvement has been recorded in most of the indicators examined. National performance was rated as high for most indicators, also when compared to international standards. The annual reports are available on the NIHP website: <http://www.israelhpr.org.il>.

477. In 2006, there were 0.097 beds in gynecology wards per 1,000 residents, compared to 0.099 in 2001. Bed occupancy increased from 94.6% in 2004 to 100.6% in 2006. In 2006, the number of beds in maternity wards decreased to 0.195 per 1,000 residents (from 0.200 in 2005) and bed occupancy decreased from 101.0% in 2004 to 99.8% in 2006.

478. Israel has preventative health service treatment for pregnant women through Mother and Child Health Clinics (“Tipat Halav”) for a certain minimum fee. Women, whose financial state is weak, may be exempt from this fee, under certain conditions.

Osteoporosis

479. In March 2008, two new medications for the treatment of osteoporosis were included the basic health service basket: Forteo Teriparatide which stimulates the formation of new bone by increasing the number and action of bone-forming cells, and Zoledronic acid which has the ability to prevent the bone damage caused by Osteoporosis.

Family Planning

480. Directive 4/08 of the General Director of the Ministry of Health deals with the expansion of services provided in the basket of services for the year 2008. Prior to this expansion, entitlement to free abortion was given to female minors under the age of 18. However, due to the expansion beginning on March 3, 2008 the entitlement to free abortion is now given to all females until the age of 19.
481. In 2007, 20,803 applications for termination of pregnancies were submitted to the Commission for Pregnancy Terminations, 20,392 (98.0%) approvals were given and 19,478 (93.6%) actually occurred. As of 2005, the majority of applicants to the Commission are single women (previously – it was mostly married women) 14,384 were Jewish, 1,514 Muslim, and 194 were Druze women. In recent years, the main reason for pregnancy terminations was out of wedlock pregnancy (51.7% in 2006). The following data refers to pregnancy terminations in hospitals.

Fertility Rates, Treatments and Services

Legal Developments

482. In a recent decision by the National Labor Court it was determined that a Health Fund (HMO) is obligated to cover the medical fertility treatments performed on the wife of an infertile man, despite the fact that she is not an Israeli resident and therefore is not covered by the National Health Insurance Law. The Court determined that since the fertility problem was a physical problem of the man, an Israeli resident who was covered by the abovementioned law, his Health Fund should cover the treatments performed on his wife. This, until the treatments result in pregnancy, as the right to parenting is a fundamental human right that is part of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. Moreover, due to the infertility problem, the couple was considered as one for the purpose of treatment, as their consent and participation are needed for the success of the treatment. The Court determined however, that the Health Fund is not obligated to cover the expenses of medical treatments and examinations of the women after the beginning of her pregnancy, as she was not covered by the Law (La.A.141/07 Anonymous v. The Klalit Health Fund et. al. (04.11.2008)).

483. The Jerusalem District Court decided to allow a single woman to receive fertility treatments involving sperm donation from a married man, although not in accordance with the current regulations. The Court considered the rights of all parties involved, including those of the wife and children of the married man. The Court determined that becoming a parent is a fundamental right, and the couple made an agreement regarding the child as required by the Regulations of the Ministry of Health.

Moreover, the Court held that the rights of the child, including the unborn, to know both his parents, take priority over the property rights of the wife and children in this case. The rights of the child include the right to dignity, the right to know both parents, to receive emotional and financial support from both, and the right not to be considered a “Sh’tooki” - a Jewish term meaning the illegitimate child of an unknown father, that according to Jewish “Halacha” in some rabbinical circles, cannot marry a Jewish person and may only marry a converted person. Therefore, the Court issued a declaration allowing the woman to receive fertility treatments with sperm donated by a married man (O.M. 5222/06 Anonymous v. The Minister of Health et. al. (26.07.2006)).

Birth Rates and Fertility Rates

484. In 2007, the rate of fertility among the total population was 2.9 births per woman (compared to 2.88 in 2006 and 2.84 in 2005). For Jewish women the rate was 2.75, for Muslims 3.97, for Christians 2.14 and for Druze 2.64. The increase in 2007 is attributed to the increase in the fertility rate among the Jewish population – from 2.75 children per women in 2006 to 2.8 in 2007, and despite decrease in the fertility rates of women of other religions.
485. In the last decade the biggest decrease in fertility rates was observed among Druze women (from 3.18 in 1997 to 2.49 in 2007). In addition, among the Muslim population the decrease in fertility rates is continuing (from 4.74 children per woman in 2000 to 3.9 in 2007). A similar decrease is also found among the Christian population (from 2.68 in 1997 to 2.18 in 2007).
486. During the last decade, the amount of births by single women continued to increase. In 2005, 3.3 births from 100 were by never-married women, in comparison to an average of 2.3 between the years 1995-1999. It is also notable that the increase was mainly among women above the age of 30.

487. Another noticeable trend is the ascent in the age of women bearing children, mostly due to the rise in the age of marriage. In the 1980’s the average age of women giving birth was 27.4, in 2007 that age had risen to 29.7. Also in 2007, the age of mothers giving birth for the first time was 27.0, a year and a half older compared to 1997.

488. Furthermore, the segment of women over 35 bearing a child went up from 9% in the 1980's to 19.7% in 2006, with a parallel decrease in the ratio of women under 20 giving birth, from 6% to 1.3% in 2006.

489. In 2007, 6,084 babies (5.6%) were born to unwed Jewish mothers. The fertility rate of unmarried women is significantly low compared to married women. In 2006, the fertility rate of unmarried women stood at 10 children per 1,000 births compared to 150 children per 1,000 births among married women.

490. In 2006, 4.6% of the total number of children born in Israel was born in multiple births (compared to 4.3% in 1997). 96% of all the babies born in multiple births were born as twins and 3.8% were born as triplets.

Fertility Treatments and Services

491. As detailed in Israel's previous report, fertility treatments in Israel remain highly developed and well subsidized. Each woman is entitled to IVF treatment until she gives birth to two children from her current relationship, regardless of children from previous marriages. This applies to unmarried women, as well as to spouseless women. There are 24 fertility departments in Israel, 9 in governmental hospitals, 11 in public hospitals and 4 in private hospitals. In 2006, 25,552 cycles of IVF treatment were performed, with some women receiving more than one cycle of treatment, resulting in 6,473 pregnancies and 4,298 live births (5,229 children).

Life Expectancy

492. In 2007, life expectancy for Israeli women was 82.5 years and 78.8 for Israeli men. That year elderly people (65+) comprised 9.8% of the population (11.6% among the Jewish population, 8.9% in the Christian population, 4.3% among the Druze population and 3.4% among the population). In 2007, 11.1% of the female population was over the age of 65 compared to 8.5% of the male population.

493. In the last two decades (1985-2006), life expectancy for Israeli women has increased by 5.5 years, compared to 5.3 among men. As of 2006, almost half of the elderly women over the age of 65 are widows (49.2%), compared to only 14.3% of the men, mostly due to women's longer life span and their tendency to marry older men.

494. Between 2003 and 2007, women had a lower mortality rate than men in all age groups: 20-24 men – 0.8 per thousand, women – 0.3 per thousand; 50-54 – 4.1, 2.3 respectively; 80-84 – 77.1, 62.4 respectively.

495. Maternal mortality in Israel is relatively rare and in recent years the rate of maternal mortality remained generally low. The following table displays the number of maternal deaths in Israel in the recent years.

Cancer among Women and Mammograms

496. Cancer is the major cause of death among women (136 per 100,000 residents in 2005), followed by ischemic heart illness and cerebrovascular disease. As of 2006, breast cancer is the most common malignant illness, constituting 15.3% of all annual cancer instances, and 32.5% of the cases of cancer among women.
497. In 2006, 3,075 new cases of breast cancer were discovered among Jewish women and 241 new cases were discovered among Arab women (52 new cases were discovered among men), 87.2% of the patients were over 45 and 385 cases were found among the 35-44 age group. In the 45-54 age group, the average rate of breast cancer per 100,000 women is 223, and in the 55-64 age group the rate was 387. The rate of breast cancer among the Jewish population was 84 per 100,000 persons and 58 per 100,000 among the Arab population. Colon and rectum cancer are the second most common cancers among women, with 31 per 100,000 persons in the Jewish population and 21 per 100,000 in the Arab population.
498. According to data of the Israeli Cancer Association, 80% of the women in Israel had a mammography screening at least once, but only 65% perform the test every two years as required. In order to raise further awareness to this important matter and to allow early detection of breast cancer, the Association initiated the national screening plan for breast cancer which is operated at the present together with the Ministry of Health and the Health Funds (HMO's). The Association purchased in recent years a mobile mammography unit in order to increase the numbers and rates of the mammography screening test in rural areas, among women in low socio-economic level, among women residing in Arab localities, among new immigrants etc.
499. According to a report of the Israel National Cancer Registrar of October 2008, the number of people diagnosed with cancer in Israel has decreased in recent years. The decrease can be attributed specifically to declining numbers of women contracting breast cancer and a reduction in the number of intestinal cancer cases in both Genders as well as a decrease in throat and lung cancer-related deaths. There has been a rise in the early detection of breast cancer due to increased public awareness resulting in early diagnosis and treatment of the disease.

500. Although the rates of breast cancer among Arab women are lower than those among Jewish women, there is an increase in rate of the illness among Arab women. Possible explanations for this tendency include an improvement in the socio-economic status of the Arab population, nutrition changes, the number of births and others.

Smoking

501. According to a report of the Minister of Health regarding smoking in Israel (published in May 2008), the total rate of smokers in Israel in 2006 was 23.2%; 28.9% among men and 17.8% among women.

502. The report further indicates that between 1996 and 2006 the rates of smokers among Jewish men had dropped from 32% to 26.7% (a decrease of 16.6%). The rates of smokers among Jewish women dropped from 24.5% to 19.7% (a decrease of 19.6%) and from 12% to 6.8% among Arab women (a decrease of 43.3%).

503. The Ministry of Health has taken in the recent years several important steps aimed at reducing smoking rates in Israel which include, inter alia, the issue of a computerized educational software for the prevention of smoking (2007); the preparation of a unique educational program intended for prevention of smoking among teenagers and providing assistance to local municipalities in the implementation of the “city free of smoking” policy.

Mental Health

504. As of the end of 2005, there were 50,891 people treated as outpatients in state owned mental health clinics, 27,576 were men and 23,315 were women. The number of women is higher in the 45-64 and 65+ age groups.

505. In 2005, 14,649 people were admitted to inpatient care and day hospitalization, 5,969 (40.7%) of them were women. This data reflects an increase compared to 2002, when 13,295 persons were admitted to inpatient care and day hospitalization, 5,490 (42.1%) of them were women. Hereinafter are additional data regarding mental health in Israel.

506. According to data of the Mental Health Communal Center in the city of Sderot, in 2007 alone, more than 652 new cases of stress and trauma victims due to the rockets launched by terrorists, were reported in Sderot and the western Negev (a 200% increase compared to 2006), and more than 4,860 persons received Psychiatric, psychological or mental treatment for symptoms of stress, anxiety and trauma following rockets explosions (a 400% increase compared to 2006)¹. A large percentage of those effected are women.

507. According to the Mental Health Communal Center in the city of Sderot, about 30% of the trauma victims were diagnosed as suffering from severe anxiety and trauma. The severe cases include uncontrolled crying, fainting, temporary lose of the ability to speak, and other symptoms. In many cases the situation is so severe that medications are necessary as treatment. The number of anxiety, stress and trauma injuries is very difficult to assess and is considered to be even higher, since not all those suffering from it, turn to seek immediate medical help. Furthermore, the affects of anxiety, trauma and stress may appear in later stages (post-trauma) and not necessarily at the moment of the traumatic event². Therefore, the number of anxiety, stress and trauma victims is estimated at thousands of people.
508. A recent study that was conducted in 2007 found that 28.4% of the adult population in the city of Sderot reported symptoms of post-traumatic syndrome. That is 3 times higher then that of the control group - a city outside the range of the rockets. Moreover, the frequency and severity of the psychiatric symptoms among Sderot residents are much higher then those who live in cities outside the range of the rockets.

AIDS

509. The cumulative number of AIDS patients up to 2006 was 1,092 (808 male and 284 female). The cumulative number of HIV-positive cases up to 2006 was 3,907 (2,337 male, 1,465 female and 105 of unknown gender). The percentage of women diagnosed as HIV-positive have slightly decreased, from 39.2% in 2004 to 37.4% in 2006.

510. HIV examinations are available to each person, anonymously and free of charge. Every Israeli citizen who is HIV-positive is entitled to virtually free of charge treatment in any one of the nine regional AIDS centers.

511. The Ministry of Health has initiated various projects to increase awareness to HIV, especially among more traditional populations, such as the new immigrants from Sub-Saharan countries. The ministry developed a program adapted to these populations, incorporating both HIV health education and an individual support and follow-up by health educators originating from the same communities. Further programs target youth, as well as soldiers, educating them on HIV and AIDS, through direct counseling, radio and TV broadcasts. Relevant information is also accessible through the Ministry's website.

Women in Health Care

Women in Medical Schools

512. Women make more than half of the Medicine students in all degrees (53.3%). In 2007, there were 2,247 women students among total of 4,217 students, which studied Medicine. In the Para-Medicine field the share of women was especially high and reached to 80.1%.

Women as Medical Personnel

513. The majority of medical personal are women. In 2007, there were 169,000 persons employed in health services, of which 123,100 (72.9%) were women. 65,400 of the women worked in hospitals and 36,400 in clinics and medical institutions. Also that year, there were 113,900 salaried women employees, compared to 37,600 men.

514. In 2007, 546 licenses to practice medicine were issued, 48.5% to women. That year, 614 licenses for specialists physicians were issued, 51% of which were issued to women. Also, 331 new pharmaceutical licenses were issued, 55.2% to women.

Infant Mortality

515. In 2007, the overall infant mortality rate was 4.1 per 1,000 births (compared to 5.5 in 2001). Among the Jewish population the rate was 3.0, and among the Arab population the rate was 7.2. The trend in infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births has been as follows:

516. A large part of the decrease in infant mortality rates is attributed to the decrease in mortality caused by infectious diseases, decrease in prenatal mortality and pneumonia. Death from congenital disorders is also showing a downward trend.

517. Among the Arab population, despite the continuing decrease, the child mortality rate is still relatively high and stands at a rate of 7.2 deaths per every 1,000 live births. The gap between the populations stems from a number of factors, among them the high rate of consanguineous marriage - approx. 35% among the Arab population and approx. 60% among the Bedouin population, religious prohibition against abortion even in medically recommended cases, as well as socio economic differences.

Health Care for Women in the Arab Population

518. In 2005, a report regarding the Health condition of the Arab population in Israel was published by the Israeli Center for Disease Control (ICDC). The report shows positive changes in the health conditions of the Arab population. According to the report, infant death rate decreased, and so did the death rate of heart and vascular diseases. The rate of population vaccination coverage had increased and so did the use of mammography for early detection of breast cancer.

519. According to the report, there is a noticeable improvement of the level of healthcare services and accessibility to these services among the Arab population. As of 2005, there is at least one primary medical clinic and at least one family healthcare station in every Arab locality. On the other hand, the report shows an increase of illnesses such as diabetes, and obesity, especially among older Arab women. An additional increase is found in the numbers of malignant neoplasms (note that except lung cancer, the rates of malignant neoplasms among the Arab population is lower than that of the Jewish population).

Article 13 - Social and Economic Benefits

Legal Developments

520. In January 2004, The Knesset approved the Retirement Age Law, 5763-2004 (the “Retirement Age Law”), implementing more equitable norms regarding retirement age. The enactment of the new Law, which replaced the Equal Age of Retirement for Men and Women Law 5747- 1987 (the “Equal Age of Retirement for Men and Women Law”), following a thorough examination of the social and economical implications of retirement age determination, and of the equalization of men’s and women’s retirement age. The examination was carried out by a public committee appointed in September 1997 by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labor and Welfare at the time.
521. The new Law equalizes the mandatory retirement age (67) and the early retirement age (60) for both men and women. As for the retirement age which grants the right to Old Age Benefit - commencing on April 1, 2004, the retirement age is gradually raised until it will eventually reach 67 for men and 62 for women. Regarding women who were born in 1950 and onwards, the Law orders the Minister of Finance to appoint a public committee, comprised of Government, employees’ and employers’ representatives, for the examination of the retirement age for women. The Law stipulates that the public committee must submit its recommendations until 30 June, 2011.
522. As mentioned above, in 2006 and 2007, a number of significant amendments were made to the Women’s Employment Law. Inter alia, these changes prohibit the employment of women during their maternity leave; prolong the period of leave permitted after hospitalization; prolong the period during which an employer is prohibited from dismissing an employee returning from maternity leave to 60 days; prolong the period during which dismissal of a female employee staying in a battered women’s shelter is not permitted, to 90 days (also requiring the consent of the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services); extends maternity leave from 12 to 14 weeks; and notably alters the pre-existing conditions so that after 6 weeks maternity leave should a new mother decide to return to work, or otherwise waive her remaining leave, the father will be permitted permanent (previously temporary) leave in her stead, for the duration of the maternity leave.
523. On August 24, 2006, the Jerusalem District Labor Court ordered compensation to be paid by the ISS Ashmoret Company Ltd. to their employee, who was illegally dismissed from her job when 7 months pregnant, without the approval of the Women Labor Supervisor in the Ministry of ITL (La.C. 001452/04 Ayenalem Ababito v. ISS Ashmoret Company Ltd). The Court accepted all of the plaintiff’s claims, and determined that the respondents had illegally dismissed her from her job when they discovered she was pregnant. In accordance with the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Court imposed personal responsibility on both the branch director, and the regional director of the employee.

The Court also ordered that the ISS Company pay the employee approximately 300,000 NIS ($75,000), in compensation for dismissal, mental anguish, loss of earnings and loss of maternity allowance.

524. On November 20, 2007, the State Labor Court ruled that “freedom of contract” does not justify discrimination such as that evidenced by paying different salaries to men and women performing the same tasks. The court stated that in these circumstances, the principle of equality prevails over freedom of contract: (La.A. 1156/04 Orit Goren v. Home Center (Do It Yourself) Ltd.). The plaintiff resigned after 4 months of work, after her employer denied her claim that she was being discriminated against in salary. She had compared her salary to that of another male worker who received 1,500 NIS ($375) more than she did, even though they both performed the same duties. In response, the respondent claimed that the difference in salary was the end result of negotiations held with all workers before they were hired to work, and during which the plaintiff had demanded less money than the other worker. The Lower Court ruled that there was no justification for the distinction in salaries paid to the plaintiff and her colleague, and stated that the plaintiff was being discriminated against based solely on her gender.

The State Labor Court rejected the position that “freedom of contract” justified discrimination between salaries, and unanimously approved the Lower Court’s decision, granting 7,000 NIS ($1,750) compensation to the plaintiff for her 4 months of work, based on the Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law. However, the majority opinion ruled that as the difference in salary was the result of negotiations made prior to employment, the plaintiff had not been discriminated against based on the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, and therefore had no right to compensation for non-pecuniary damage in contrast to the Lower Court’s ruling. Nevertheless, the dissenting opinion of the State Labor Court’s President, argued that there was no difference in the level of proof required for granting compensation for violations of both laws, and accepted the Lower Court’s ruling, granting additional compensation to the plaintiff based on the Equal Employment Opportunities Law.

525. In La.C. 8704/06 Nadav Fitusi v. N&B Bogin Sports Center Ltd., (27.12.07) the plaintiff was employed by the respondent as a gym instructor and was dismissed from work following the respondent’s desire to replace him with a female instructor. There was no disagreement among parties that the dismissal was due solely to the plaintiff’s gender.

In its decision, the Tel-Aviv Labor Court held that “any discrimination based on gender is a negative social phenomenon that is to be uprooted completely. The prohibition on discrimination derives not only from the provisions of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, but also from the general principle of equality which is part of our legal system and anchored in Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity”.

The Court held that in order to prove discrimination, the worker needs only to convince the Court that such prohibited consideration was actually a factor for the employer’s decision, even if it was not the main reason. Based on Section 10 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Court ordered the respondent to pay compensation in the amount of 30,000 NIS ($7,500) to the plaintiff, considering the specific circumstances of the case.

526. Section 135 to the National Insurance Law stipulates that once a widow remarries, she is entitled to receive two benefit payments, but forfeits her claim to the monthly dependence allowance. The Law defines a wife to include what is referred to as a cohabitating one who cohabitates with a man and is jointly responsible for the household.
527. In Na.In.A. 1407/04, The National Insurance Institute v. Nehama Freeman (8.11.06), the National Labor Court debated whether a widow who became a cohabitor, did not remarry, and attained a higher economic status than other widows, shall continue to enjoy the dependence allowance granted to widows. The Court held that although the economic status of a cohabitor is better than that of a widow, it is still not a relationship as stable as marriage - since the parties may separate at any given moment, the woman may be suddenly returned to the economic status of a widow. According to the decision, the equalization tendency found in the legislation and in the rulings of courts is aimed at equalizing the rights and benefits received by a cohabitor to those received by married women. However, the issue raised was the negation of a benefit; the Court found that such negation needs to be interpreted narrowly and that therefore, if the legislator wishes to negate a right or a benefit it must be explicitly written in the Law.

Social Benefits and the Welfare State

Social Benefits

528. As stated in Israel's previous report, Israel has an advanced social insurance system, protecting against major contingencies of income loss prevalent in a modern society. This includes long-term payments, guaranteeing resilience to those permanently unemployed due to old age or disability, to dependents and to families struggling with the economic burden of raising children, and short-term payments substituting the wages of those temporarily unemployed (on account of dismissal, work injury, child bearing or military reserve service). The National Insurance Institute (NII) is the governmental body responsible for the administration of the social insurance programs.
529. A large percentage of Israeli women are among the social benefits recipients; a figure mostly derived from women's longer life span and their employment patterns.
530. The following will present developments and changes in social benefits affecting women that occurred since the submission of Israel's previous report.

Social security branches in Israel

531. Commencing on 2006, all social security benefits are indexed to the Consumer Prices Index, and not the average wage.

Maternity Allowance

532. The ceiling of payment of maternity allowance to mothers and fathers has been raised to five times the average wage, from twice the average wage previously.
533. Both employed and self-employed women are entitled, upon giving birth, to a Maternity Allowance from the NII for the period of their Maternity Leave from work. As of January 1, 2006, thanks to the linking of the maternity file of the NII with that of the insured population, self-employed women receive the allowance automatically, without having to submit a claim.
534. As mentioned above, under Amendment No. 37 to the Women's Employment Law, the Maternity Leave was lengthened from 12 to 14 weeks, out of which 7 weeks or less may be taken before the birth. The change is relevant to women who began their Maternity Leave on May 8, 2007 or thereafter.
535. A woman who gives birth to more than one child in the same birth is entitled to extend her maternity leave for an additional period for every child born in the same birth, beginning with the second child. Under Amendment No. 37 to the Women's Employment Law, this additional period was extended from two weeks to three weeks. The National Insurance Law was amended accordingly, and an additional Maternity Allowance is paid to a woman who extends her maternity leave due to her giving birth to more than one child in the same birth – for an additional three weeks, if she is entitled to the full maternity allowance, and for an additional two weeks, if she is entitled to the partial maternity allowance. This change too is in effect regarding women who began their maternity leave on May 8, 2007 or thereafter.

Extended maternity leave due to hospitalization of mother or child

536. Under a change in effect as of April 1, 2004, aimed at compensating women for a particularly long hospitalization of their newborn child, a woman whose infant must be hospitalized for at least 12 consecutive weeks in the course of her maternity leave may extend her maternity leave for 4 additional weeks, and is entitled to additional Maternity Allowance accordingly.
537. A mother who gives birth, and she or her newborn baby is hospitalized during the period of her maternity leave for a period of more than two weeks, may extend her maternity leave and in such a case, is entitled to Maternity Allowance for a longer period (up to four weeks, but not longer than the period of her hospitalization). Under Amendment No. 34 to the Women's Employment Law, the above also applies to mothers whose period of hospitalization (for themselves or their babies) is not consecutive. The change applies to women whose Maternity Allowance began on June 5, 2007 or thereafter. Previous to the change, a hospitalization period of at least 15 consecutive days had been considered necessary for permitting an extension of the maternity leave.

Special payment of Maternity Allowance for fathers

538. Under Amendment No. 39 to the Women's Employment Law, a man can replace his wife on maternity leave if his wife is not capable of caring for their infant due to her health condition (in accordance with a physician's written authorization), even if six weeks have not yet elapsed since the birth – if the infant is in the father's custody and in his sole care. This maternity leave for the father includes extension of the leave due to a multiple birth or hospitalization of the infant, but does not include extension of the leave due to hospitalization of the mother.
539. Section 49 of the National Insurance Law was amended accordingly, and Maternity Allowance will be paid for this leave, in accordance with the qualifying period of the father, to the mother's bank account. The change applies to parents whose infants were born on September 6, 2007, or thereafter.
540. Previous to the change, a father could replace his wife on maternity leave only if six weeks had elapsed since the birth – even if she was not capable of caring for their infant due to her health condition. It should be noted that the other conditions of entitlement to Maternity Allowance for fathers – completion of a qualifying period for both parents and the father's actual maternity leave of at least 21 consecutive days – remain unchanged.
541. Data indicate a steady moderate rise in the number of men receiving maternity allowance. In 2005, the number of men receiving maternity allowance was 157, in 2006 the number of male recipients was 199 and in 2007 the number was 246.

Changes in risk pregnancy benefit - Sick pay for women with risk pregnancy

542. A woman who must cease work due to the need for precautionary rest – for at least 30 days – as a result of a high-risk pregnancy is eligible for a Risk Pregnancy Benefit from the National Insurance Institute (NII). One of the conditions of entitlement to this benefit is non-receipt of payment for the period of absence from work (due to the risk pregnancy) from any other source, such as sick pay from the employer.
543. Under an Amendment to the Women's Employment Law, employers are now obligated to pay sick pay for periods of absence from work of less than 30 days due to high-risk pregnancy, since the woman in such cases is not entitled to the Risk Pregnancy Benefit from the NII.
544. Also commencing on January 1, 2006, women who are unable to work owing to their high-risk pregnancy are to receive a Maternity Allowance for a period of at least 30 days. The amount per day is the lower of the following: the basic amount divided by 30 - 232 NIS, ($58); or the woman's salary divided by 90. Following the Emergency Economic Plan and the Recovery Plan for the years 2002-2006, the sum of Maternity Allowance was reduced by 4%.

Work that endangers a pregnant woman or her fetus

545. Section 58 of the National Insurance Law pertaining to the Risk Pregnancy Benefit was amended so as to expand the definition of risk pregnancy. Under the Amendment, the former definition – “a medical situation stemming from the pregnancy and endangering the woman or her fetus” – has been expanded to include also “a type, place or method of work endangering the pregnant woman or her fetus [...] if no alternative suitable work has been found for her”. A written authorization of a physician remains a basic condition of entitlement to the Risk Pregnancy Benefit.
546. Both of the above changes are in effect regarding women who submit a claim for benefit after September 6, 2007.
547. In 2007, 147,767 women received Maternity Grants, a 4% increase compared to 2003 figures. The average age of women who received the Maternity Leave Allowance, in 2007, was 31. Also, 96% of these women were salaried employees, a figure resulting from the nature of women’s participation in the labor market. In 2007, maternity insurance’s portion of all National Insurance payments was 6.8% - compared to 6.1% in 2003. The increase in Maternity Allowance payments is attributed to the increase in number of women receiving these allowances, the increase in Hospitalization Allowance and the longer Maternity Leave.

Maternity Grants

548. As of January 1, 2005, the NII pays a Maternity Grant, which is provided to post-natal new mothers in order to help cover the cost of a layette for the newborn child, directly into the mother’s bank account and granted approximately one month after the date on which she gave birth. The Maternity Grant was previously paid by means of a check given to the mothers in the hospital where the birth took place.

549. As of January 1, 2008, a Maternity Grant given to a new mother upon the birth of her first baby, or to the adoptive parents upon adoption, will equal 1,489 NIS, ($372). The Maternity Grant for a second child will be equivalent to 670 NIS, ($167), and for every third and additional child to the family it will be the equivalent of 447 NIS, ($112).
550. The NII pays a benefit to a mother who has given birth to three or more children in one birth, and again at the end of a 30-day period after the date of birth, if at least three of these children have survived. The Childbirth Allowance is paid, in addition to the Maternity Grant, for the period from the first day of the month following the birth, up until 20 months from this date.

Old Age and Survivors' Benefits

551. As of August 2006, the Survivor's Pension is paid automatically to the following groups: widows to whom a dependant's increment had been paid to their husbands' Old-Age Pension; and widows who receive an Old-Age Pension by virtue of their having accumulated a qualifying period, at the same bank account as their husbands.
552. Applications for Old-Age Pensions are initiated by the NII. Every man and woman, approximately two months before reaching pension age, receives a claims form for Old-Age pension from the NII, together with an accompanying explanatory letter.
553. In 2007, approximately 623,700 persons received Old-Age Pension (compared to 617,800 in 2004), of which 58.2% were women. That year 105,200 persons received Survivors' (remaining relatives) Benefits (compared to 104,400 in 2004), of which 93.1% were women. These changes mainly reflect the growing number of elderly population, as the population gentrifies.
554. As of December 2007, the majority of those eligible to both Old-Age and Survivors Benefits were women – 94.5% of the 83,200 persons eligible to these two benefits. The high rate of women is mainly because more men than women were insured so their wives had Survivors' Benefits, and women usually marry older men and have a longer life expectancy. There is a difference between the genders in the rank of the two benefits: the average level of benefits that men are eligible to receive is higher due to seniority increments and postponed retirement increments. Also in 2007, of the 125,000 people who received Nursing Pension, 71% were women.

555. On March 19, 2007, the Electricity Economy Law 5756-1996 (the “Electricity Economy Law”), was amended and Section 31A was added. According to the new section, women and men who reach the retirement age and are entitled to Income Support are entitled to a 50% discount on the first 400 KWH for domestic monthly use. The new section further invests the Minister of National Infrastructure with the authority to determine, in consultation with the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services, other populations who may also be entitled to the reduced payment benefit.

Alimony Payments

556. In 2007, 21,771 women received monthly Alimony Payments from the NII - a 4.2% decrease compared to the previous year. In 2008 (3rd quarter) the number further decrease to 21,129. Since 2003, there was a sharp decrease of 17.9% in the rate of women receiving alimonies from the NII. As of the 3rd quarter of 2008, the average amount of the Alimony Payment paid by the NII was 1,464 NIS ($366). Divorced women with no children received 919 NIS ($230), divorced, separated or single women with one children received 1,076 NIS ($269), and with two children - 1,824 NIS ($456). Divorced women with one child who remarried received 1,002 NIS ($250) and 1,719 NIS ($430) if they have two children.

Single-Parent Families

557. The number of single-parent families in Israel has slightly increased in the recent years. In 2007, there were 128,322 single-parent families in Israel, approximately 13.0% of all the families (compared to 12.3% in 2004 and to 9.3% in 1995). In 2006, the rate of single-parent families with children up to the age of 17 was 6.0% - about 99,600 families with a total of 170,000 children. Women head 90.5% of single-parent families with children aged up to 17 and in 30.9% of them the parent is a new immigrant.

General Disability Pension

558. Disability insurance provides entitlement to a Disability Pension, meant to guarantee a minimum income for subsistence to persons with disabilities. The Disability Pension is paid to residents of Israel between the ages of 18 and retirement age who meet all the conditions of entitlement. There are two main groups of entitled persons, according to the entitlement test: disabled persons whose earning capacity has been lost or reduced as a result of their impairment (henceforth: “earners”) and disabled housewives whose capacity to function in their household has been lost or reduced (henceforth: “housewives”).

558.1. Earner: an insured person who, as a result of a physical, mental or emotional impairment stemming from an illness, accident or birth defect, meets one of the following conditions: a) he/she is unable to support him/herself from work or occupation, and does not earn a sum equivalent to 25% of the average wage; b) his/her capacity to earn a living from work or occupation, as well as his/her actual earnings, were reduced as a result of his/her impairment by 50% or more.

558.2. Housewife: a married woman who has not worked outside her household for a period determined by law and who, due to a physical, mental or emotional impairment stemming from an illness, accident or birth defect, does not have the capacity to function and carry out regular household chores, or her such capacity has been reduced by at least 50%.

559. There are two stages in the process of determining entitlement to a Disability Pension for an earner or housewife. In the first stage, a physician on behalf of the NII determines the medical disability percentage. Entitlement to pension is examined only for earners for whom a medical disability percentage of at least 60% has been determined (or 40%, if at least 25% is determined for him/her from a single impairment) and for housewives for whom a medical disability percentage of at least 50% is determined.

560. After the medical disability percentage is determined, the claims officer determines the degree of incapacity to earn/function after consultation with an authorized physician and a rehabilitation clerk. The determination of the incapacity degree is based mainly on the earner’s personal characteristics, such as his/her ability to return to his/her previous job (on a full-time or a part-time basis), or to work at a different job, or to learn a new profession (taking into account his/her education level, physical capacity and health condition). Under certain conditions the opinion of the rehabilitation clerk regarding the incapacity degree may be influenced by other variables such as the labor market situation in the disabled person's area of residence. Regarding housewives, the examination of capacity loss is based on functioning in the home.

561. The rate of the pension paid to a disabled person stems from the degree of incapacity that was determined for him/her. A disabled person is entitled to a pension and to a dependent's increment for his/her spouse and for up to two children. A "housewife" is not entitled to an increment for his/her spouse.
562. As of December 2007, 189,000 disabled persons received General Disability Pension, of which 17,000 were housewives and 64,000 were women "earners" – a total of 43% of all those who receive the pension. This rate has remained stable since 2004 as demonstrated by the following table:

Financial Credit

563. As stated in Israel's previous report, women in Israel make use of bank loans, mortgages and other forms of financial credit in a manner equal to men.

Recreational Activities

564. As stated in Israel's previous report, women participate in all aspects of recreational activities, including sports and cultural life, as detailed in Article 10 above.

Article 14 - Rural Women

General

565. A very high percentage of the Israeli population lives in urban localities – 91.7%. Rural population makes up 8.2% of the general population. The majority of this population lives in "Moshavim" (cooperative localities) (41.7%), Kibbutzim (20.5%), and communal localities (12.6%). In these aforementioned localities, 99.6% of the population is Jewish. The rest of the rural population is Muslim, Christian, Bedouin, Druze and Circassian living in various forms of rural localities.

Bedouin Women

566. There are more than 170,000 Bedouins living in the Negev desert area. Most of them live in urban and suburban centers which have been legally planned and constructed. All existing towns have approved plans and include infrastructure such as schools, clinics, running water, electricity, etc.
567. There are 6 existing Bedouin towns in the Negev: Laqiya, Hura, Kseife, Arara, Tel-Sheva and Segev Shalom, in addition to the city of Rahat. Although the seven existing towns can effectively provide a proper solution to the Bedouin population's needs, subject to their expansion, the Government decided that another 9 new towns for Bedouins should be established. The Government did so in order to accommodate the needs of the Bedouin population and in consideration of their special needs, including their desire to settle according to a tribal format.
568. Of those nine new planned towns, Tarabin is now being populated and 100 new houses have been built, Abu Krinat and Bir Hadaj are under construction, and Kasar A-Sir, Marit (Makhol), Darjat, Um Batin, Mulada and El Seid are all undergoing planning procedures. Further three towns are undergoing statutory approval procedures: Ovdar, Abu Tlul, and El-Foraa. A regional council called "Abu Basma" was founded for the new towns. It was officially declared on February 3, 2004.

Education

569. Bedouins enjoy all the rights and opportunities of Israeli citizens, including the privilege to receive formal education at all levels, in accordance with the laws of Israel.
570. As mentioned above, in July 2007, The Compulsory Education Law was amended in order to broaden its scope and apply compulsory education to youth between the ages of 15 - 17 (inclusive) attending the 11th -12th grades. Prior to the Amendment, education for the 11th-12th grades was free, yet not compulsory. The Amendment's aim is to protect the youth in this vulnerable stage from negative influences, and to prepare them and provide better tools for their successful integration as productive adults in the future by providing an obligating educational framework rather than an optional one. Another desired effect to the Law, is a decrease in dropout and removal of pupils rates, by compelling the provision of solutions within the education system to all pupils in this age group. The Law is to be fully implemented until 2009 to pupils attending the 11th grade and until 2010 to those attending the 12th grade.
571. The Amendment to the Compulsory Education Law is gradually implemented, and a high priority was given to the Bedouin towns, which are characterized by a high dropout rates compared to the Jewish population. This priority was given to the towns of Rahat, Arara, Abu-Basma and others. One of the most important goals of this Amendment is to drastically reduce the dropout rates among female pupils.

572. In July 2005, the Government resolved to establish the Regional Council of Abu-Basma, which was assigned with attending to the Bedouin population's needs in areas such as education, infrastructures, employment, transportation, agriculture etc. Abu-Basma Regional Council is responsible for 10 Arab villages, of which 6 are Bedouin villages. The resolution further states that the Ministry of Education will build 300 classrooms and kindergartens which will be operated by the Abu-Basma Regional Council.

573. Since 2004, three high schools were established for the first time in the illegal villages of Abu-Krinat, Al-Huashlla and Bir-Hadge. These schools were connected to the main electricity network, and access roads were paved towards them, a major improvement compared to the other illegal villages. The schools established contributed greatly to the prevention of dropout rates, especially among Bedouin girls, who previously were not sent to school by their parents, due to the distance of the school from the village and on account of religion and Bedouin tradition. In addition, since 2004, 14 inspectors position were added including general and vocational inspectors for schools in Bedouin localities, in order to improve the quality of education in them.

574. Following the Ministry of Education multi-year plan to reinforce the education system in Bedouin localities and several Government Resolutions on the matter, funding was allocated to fund new education facilities in Bedouin localities (including kindergarten, schools and special education institutions). Funding was also allocated towards establishing and upgrading of science and computer laboratories. Furthermore, pedagogic counsels provided assistance to school principals in preparing the school's work plan and funding were allocated for reinforcement hours for pupils in need in all levels of education, in order to diminish pedagogic gaps, including improving entitlement to matriculation certificate rates.

575. As of 2006, every first and second grade classes in Bedouin localities which consisted of more than 28 pupils, were divided in to two classes and received additional 10 reinforcement hours per week.

576. The 'New Horizon' (Ofek-Hadash) reform - in 2007/8 school year, 9 schools in the north and 31 in the south were included in the reform, followed by 6 schools in the north and 17 in the south in the 2008/9 school year. This reform is intended to give pupils with poor performance an opportunity to improve their accomplishments and to fulfill their potential.

New Special Education Frameworks

577. Currently there are four special education schools (in Kseife, Arara, Rahat and Segev-Shalom), three regional support centers (in Rahat, Abu-Basma and Hura), as well as 25 treatment kindergartens for special education serving the Bedouin population in the southern part of Israel. In 2008, two additional regional support centers were opened, as well as 10 classes in primary schools. In addition, all primary and intermediate schools received additional reinforcement teaching hours.

578. In the northern part of Israel - a new school for pupils with severe mental deficiencies was opened, as well as 6 special education kindergartens. In addition, 4 advancement classes in secondary schools were added, as well as 3,000 hours of integration.

New Educational Programs

579. A new program to provide Arabic language skills in primary schools began in 2008 and will continue until 2011. In addition, new educational programs of culture and heritage were added as well as a program to teach the Hebrew language and literature in primary and secondary institutions. Furthermore, the education program in history was adjusted in order to be suitable for primary, intermediate and secondary schools.

580. The 'Daroma' (South) program – in 2004, the Ministry of Education commenced a program to improve educational achievements among exceptional pupils in the 10-12 grades. The program now operates in 5 High-Schools (approximately 300 pupils). The purpose of the program is to advance these pupils in Mathematics and English, and to develop their learning skills. The pupils participate in courses in academic institutions such as the Ben-Gurion University.

581. The Ministry of Education will fund a similar program, "Atidim", in the two local authorities beginning in 2008. In the north, a similar program entitled "Atidim Launch" operates in two local authorities. During 2009, another program for achievement of excellence will be opened in Kaabia High school, also funded by the Ministry of Education.

582. In addition, two classes of diagnostic learning skills were opened, one in the college of Sakhnin (north), and the second in Be'er-Sheva (south) in the framework of the Open University funded by the Ministry of Education.

583. Psychologists - additional positions for psychologists in both regions were added but there is still a shortage of position per pupils and a shortage of educational psychologists.

584. Guidance Council - since 2004, 3 frameworks for training guidance councils were opened - 2 in the north and one in the south. There has also been an addition of visitation officers in some of the authorities; however, there is still a shortage.

Higher Education

585. In 2008, the Ministry of Education announced its intention to grant Bedouin students studying engineering, technology and science with tuition grants and scholarships in the amount of 5,000 NIS ($1,250) each for 2008/9 academic year. The scholarships are intended to continue encourage Bedouin students to achieve higher education.

586. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women issued an announcement regarding the distribution of scholarships for female Bedouin students from north, as well as for female students from the Druze and Circassian populations. These scholarships are granted in accordance with Government Resolution No. 412 and 413 issued on August 15, 2006. These scholarships are intended for the 2008-2009 academic school year in recognized academic institutions, in the fields of medicine, pharmaceuticals, nursing, law, engineering, and other medical related professions. The total budget allocation for this purpose for 2009 is 500,000 NIS ($125,000), with each scholarship amounting up to 6,000 NIS ($1,500).

Employment and Welfare

587. The Bedouin population has a high rate of unemployment and low socio-economic state. Several measures are being implemented to change these statistics. One example, mentioned above is a business entrepreneurship course for Bedouin women in cooperation with the Center for Fostering Entrepreneurship.

588. Employment for persons belonging to minorities in the Negev - According to Government Resolution No. 1591 (April 22, 2007) regarding encouragement to rural areas, it was determined that enterprises in the fields of services or tourism that will admit 4 new local employees from the Bedouin or Ultra-orthodox populations in the Negev, will receive a 20% benefit for men and women from the cost of the monthly wage of these employees for a period of 5 years.

589. On November 20, 2005 the Government adopted Resolution No. 4415 according to which a national strategically program was created for the development of the Negev. In order to promote the realization of the program's goals in the economic and employment aspects, the Headquarters for Development and Employment in the Negev developed chosen projects in cooperation with Governmental Ministries, local authorities and Israel's Small and Medium Enterprises Authority. Below are the projects descriptions and the benefits which Bedouin women may enjoy as part of the Negev program.
590. Vocational Training – Over the course of the past few years, there has been an increase in the rates of employment among Arab women, yet these rates remain relatively low. Academic education and vocational training are the key components for the integration of Arab women into the work force, yet various barriers are inhibiting their integration into these educational and training systems: Education - traditional professions are substituted with professions that require specific know-how; the study of many technological professions requires knowledge in mathematics and English. Social/Cultural Barriers - The traditional stands and cultural stigmas among the Arab population define the acceptable limits to traveling alone to school and work. Arab women are often reluctant to attend courses that require traveling to other towns. Not all vocational courses are available in the women's residential towns, often because of lack of proper framework, candidates, and future job opportunities.
591. Due to the above, many Arab women attend "traditional" courses that are local, and are likely to enable them to meet the requirements of local job opportunities, whether full or part time. This is not the case with regard to education, computers, graphics or technical assistants/engineering. Additionally, the employment opportunities in these fields, in some of the residential towns, are very limited.
592. Special vocational training and unique programs for the Bedouin population were developed, in order to enhance the numbers of employed Bedouin - men and women, develop the human capital and enlarge the number of students, both male and female, enrolled in higher education courses. The unique training for women include: accredited assistants, care givers for young children, designing and manufacturing of furniture, hair design and fitness trainers. In addition, classes for practical engineering were opened in the technological center in Be'er Sheva, in the fields of chemistry and air condition and about 30% of the candidates that were accepted were women.
593. Employment Centers for the Bedouin population - In the framework of cooperation between the Ministry of Industry, Trade, and Labor and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee it was decided to create unique employment centers in the Bedouin towns. These centers will handle the variety of issues relating to solving the employment problems that exist solely in the Bedouin localities: to enhance the numbers of employed persons, to aid in the creation of small businesses and enterprises, to enlarge the income of individuals and families in the Bedouin localities, to change the employment related perceptions and norms in the Bedouin population and encourage the employment of women while supplying them with unique training for that purpose.

594. Small Businesses - In order to enhance the exposure of businesses in the Negev to the services of the Center for the Nurturing Entrepreneurship (a body of Israel's Small and Medium Enterprises Authority), in order to overcome the large distances between the localities and the operating centers, and to allow larger accessibility of business owners to the services of the center, it was decided to establish 3 extensions which will be subordinate to the Center in Be'er-Sheva. One of these extensions operates solely in Bedouin localities and as such it serves as a central address accessible to the entrepreneur to receive the verity of services of the Center, including reply to the unique needs of the Bedouin population. The uniqueness of these extensions is the fact that they can assist women that tend to remain in the localities (due to cultural and social norms).

Creation of employment places for those who report to the Israeli Employment Service and are about to terminate their right to unemployment benefits. The focus of this project is the Bedouin population.

Creation of an economic model for independent employment of women from Bedouin localities in weaving, needlework and cooking, where the women market their products in special fairs and abroad. The women will be prepared for the process that includes building a business organization model, creation of a unique product line and the proper means of marketing. The project will last three years, during which the women will open independent businesses. Currently, the project runs in the village of Kseife and 20 women operate in it.

595. In order to complement the revised Encouragement of Capital Investments Law 5719-1959 (the "Encouragement of Capital Investments Law"), the Government decided to establish an additional program to increase employment in the remote areas of Israel and other areas of high unemployment. Eligibility requires that the participating companies employ a minimum number of workers earning at least minimum wage. Among the areas affected are the "Furthest Periphery", and designated towns of minority populations (such as Arab, Druze, Circassians), as well as the Ultra-Orthodox Jewish population.

596. As mentioned in Israel's previous report, in May 2004, the Center for the Welfare of the Bedouin Family was established in Be'er-Sheva by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. The Center has two main goals: to provide assistance to the Bedouin community in matters related to conflict and tension resolution in the family, as well as to provide therapeutic interventions; to serve as a center for the prevention of, and education on, domestic violence. The center is financed and supervised by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services and is operated by the Bedouin association of "Elwaha" which is manned by specialized social workers.

597. Social Services operate in the Bedouin towns, as well as in illegally constructed Bedouin villages. There are around 30 monthly appeals to social services from Bedouin women. Each receives individual care. There are also several Bedouin couples undergoing couple therapy. Note that the operation of the abovementioned center has improved the treatment of domestic violence in the Bedouin population, enabling matter-of-fact, focused and efficient care to be provided, free from community and family pressures.

598. The Service for Girls and Young Women handles about 250 Bedouin young women annually, providing both individual and group treatment.

Health

Infant Mortality

599. According to a report of the Ministry of Health, that was published in February 2009, the infant mortality rate of Bedouin infants in 2008 was 11.5:1000, representing a decline from the rate in 2005 (15:1000). The high rate is mostly attributed to high rates of congenital anomalies and hereditary illnesses due to the high rate of consanguineous marriages. Another element impacting upon mortality rate is the religious prohibition against abortion among Muslims even in medically recommended cases, as well as the high rate of births among elderly women. It should be noted that the infant mortality rate among Bedouin infants living in illegal villages was actually lower than that among Bedouin infants living in established towns. The Government is continuing to open Mather and Child Health Clinics in illegally constructed villages and new Clinics are being built to serve the population.

600. Furthermore, the Government has been funding several special projects to improve the health and expand the health-care services provided to Bedouin living in illegally constructed villages. One of these programs is a special long-term intervention program to decrease infant mortality among the Bedouin. The program is community-based and boasts a wide-consortium of participants, including representatives from the Bedouin community leadership and the educational system, along with providers of curative and preventative health care services, the Department of Health in the Community and the Epidemiology Department in the Faculty of Health Sciences of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

601. Free genetic testing is also funded by the Government, along with genetic counseling, for any member of a Bedouin tribe in which the prevalence of a serious inherited disease for which an available genetic test is above 1:1000.

602. On December 2005, the Population Registry Law 5725-1965 (the “Population Registry Law”) was amended for the regulation of births occurring outside a medical institution. The purpose of the Amendment was to ensure that illegal adoptions, exploitation of women and trafficking in babies would not be possible. All requirements set by the Law for the registration of newborns are meant for the prevention of deception with regard to the mother’s identity. Nothing in the Law is designed to create delay or deprive women of rights to which they are entitled after the registration of their child in the population registry; in this regard, although it is true that some Bedouin women give birth at home, these women constitute about 2% of all Arab women in the Negev. No Bedouin woman resident of the Negev had given birth at home due to lack of access to modern maternity services.

Other Health Indicators

603. Clinics in illegal Bedouin villages located throughout the Negev are all computerized, air conditioned, and are all equipped according to the standards upheld by all the Health Funds (HMOs) in the country. In addition to the thirty-two Health Fund medical clinics already existing in the Bedouin towns, 9 Health Fund medical clinics have been built to provide for the medical needs of Bedouins living in illegal villages. These clinics are also fully equipped according to the standards that exist in all other Health Funds in the country.
604. The General Health Services Department operates a special health service for the Bedouin population that includes an ambulance service for Bedouins, run by a Bedouin employee. This ambulance ensures constant access between the hospital and the community. This enables a talented professional staff to evaluate the living conditions of patients prior to their release from hospitalization. Additionally, the ambulance transports patients to the hospital and back when they are in need of emergency care. The cost of a visit to the clinic is identical throughout the country. That is, a visit will generally be cost-free.
605. In addition to the existing stations, the eighteen Mother and Child Health Clinics (“Tipat Halav”) located in Bedouin towns, and a mobile family care unit, six new Mother and Child Health Clinics, fully equipped, have recently been constructed in the illegal villages. These Clinics are equipped in the same manner as any other Mother and Child Health Clinics in the country.
606. The Government, as well as the main Health Fund serving the Bedouin population, undertake major efforts to train and recruit Bedouin physicians and nurses. The Government provided all the funding required for three classes of Bedouin students to complete their training as registered nurses, including funding their transportation to the nursing school, a meal allowance during their studies, and special remedial lessons to assist those who needed it. The Government has similarly provided special funding to hire Arab physicians and nurses.
607. A course for qualified Bedouin nurses was opened in 1994. Currently there are 32 students that are undertaking nursing studies. It should be noted that students participating in the third course are committed to serving their first three years of practice after graduation wherever the Ministry of Health decides their services are needed. This will guarantee that the trained nurses serve the target population, the Bedouins. In addition, the first female Bedouin physician in Israel, Rania al-Oqbi, has recently completed her degree. She was part of the special “Cultivating Medicine in the Desert” program aimed at incorporating more Bedouin into the health sector. Currently, six Bedouin women are studying medicine; 35 Bedouin women have completed degrees in various health professions; and 45 additional women are studying health sciences.

compared to a rate of 27% in 1981. Two mobile immunization teams managed by the Ministry of Health also provide home immunizations to infants in Bedouin families living outside of permanent towns, whose families do not bring them to one of the Mother and Child Health Clinics for treatment. A computerized tracking system allows the Ministry of Health to identify infants who are behind on their immunization schedule and to send one of the mobile immunization teams to immunize them.

609. There has also been an important improvement in the growth of Bedouin infants and toddlers over the past two decades, indicating improved nutrition. Moreover, there has been increased compliance with recommendations for supplemental folic acid among Bedouin women in their fertile years, and a decrease in the incidence of open neural tube defects (NTD's) among Bedouin fetuses and infants. Unfortunately there are still high rates of congenital malformations and inherited diseases among Bedouin infants, due to multiple factors including the tradition of first-cousin marriages, as well as cultural-religious-social barriers to pre-marital and pre-natal screening for inherited diseases.
610. There has been a decline in the incidence of infectious disease among Bedouin infants over the past decades. There is, however, generally a higher rate of infectious disease among Bedouin infants than among Jewish infants of the same age. Bedouin infants and children have lower rates of pertussis, tuberculosis and HIV infection. Furthermore, due to high immunization coverage among Bedouin infants, indicating good access and utilization of preventive health care services, there have been no cases of measles since 1994 and no cases of polimyelitis, diphtheria, congenital rubella, neonatal tetanus or tetanus in Bedouin children of the Negev since 1990.
611. Specialty physician services are being provided to the Bedouin community in the Negev, including: Gynecology and Obstetrics, Pediatrics, General Internal Medicine, Neurology, Family Medicine, Dermatology, Ear, Nose and Throat, Ophthalmology, Orthopedics, Gastroenterology, Cardiology, Surgery and Trauma, Pediatric Surgery and Pediatric Pulmonary Medicine. In addition, every resident has equal access to all the specialty clinics at the Soroka University Medical Center, with no discrimination between Bedouin or Jewish patients.
612. On July 2008, Physicians for Human Rights-Israel, an Israeli NGO - published a report titled: "Ana Huna (I am here) – Gender and Health in the Unrecognized Villages of the Negev". The report is critical of the healthcare services granted to Bedouin women in the Negev, as well as the problems on providing of infrastructure and public transportation, making it difficult for Bedouin women to reach distant healthcare centers in cases where the villages has no clinic or has one that lacks full services. The report also stipulates that the communication between the medical staff and some of the women is problematic due to language barriers. An issue that is being promoted, as detailed throughout this Article.

Ritual Female Genital Operation (Female Circumcision)

613. In 2007, a new study examined whether the practice of female genital mutilation still exists in Israel. Approved by Helsinki Ethics Committee of Ben Gurion University and after receiving consent of each patient, young Bedouin women who underwent prenatal genital physical examinations, were asked about having experienced female genital mutilation. In addition, the gynecologists looked for any signs indicating that such operation took place. Over 150 women from different Bedouin tribes, that were previously reported to perform ritual female genital mutilation, were examined, and no woman under the age of 30 was found to have any evidence of female genital mutilation, not even minor scars.
614. Although the existence of rare sporadic cases can not be ruled out, it seems that the practice of female genital mutilation have been eradicated in Israel. The causes for this change include increased education of the Bedouin population, increased medical care, increased standard of living and other positive developments.
615. Recent data indicates that over the last few years, except for one case of ritual female circumcision that occurred in 2008, in one of the southern Bedouin villages, there were no other reports of women who underwent female genital mutilation in Israel.

Article 15 - Equality before the Law and in Civil MattersGeneral

616. The Israeli Judiciary provides equality to men and women in all areas of law, including all aspects of civil matters, as detailed throughout this report.
617. In civil matters, women enjoy an identical capacity to that of men, including the right to conclude contracts, administer property and equal treatment in all stages of procedure in courts and tribunals. Women also enjoy the same benefits regarding the movement of persons and the freedom to choose their residence and domicile, as detailed throughout this report.

Religious Courts

618. Overall, Religious Courts have an exclusive jurisdiction over all matters of marriage and divorce, except when the couple is not affiliated to any religion or of different religions. Regarding these exceptions, in matters relating to divorce, the jurisdiction is granted to the Family Matters Courts or to the Religious Courts. In Matters concerning women's and children's alimony, property issues, child maintenance, guardianship, violence and in the case of Muslims, also parental matters, Family Matters Courts and the Religious Courts have a parallel jurisdiction, with certain differences between the various religious communities.
619. Inheritance, guardianship and adoption – the Family Matters Courts have the main jurisdiction, the Religious Courts jurisdiction is subject to the consent of all relevant parties and certain limitations stipulated in the Law. Child abduction, marriage approvals under the Marital Age

Law 5710-1950 (the “Marital Age Law”) name changing, determination of age, surrogacy, parenthood (except for Muslims) and other disputes among family members, in matters not mentioned above – are all subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Family Matters Courts.

620. In reference to certain aspects of personal status laws, Israel has entered a reservation due to commitments to various religious communities in Israel. Further details regarding this reservation are provided in Article 16, below.

Article 16 - Equality in Marriage and Family Life

General

621. Israel’s reservation to Article 16 regarding personal status is reviewed periodically. At present, Israel has not changed its position in this matter. This reservation stems from Israel’s constitutional system and respect for religious pluralism, as well as its granting autonomy to religious communities in matters of personal status.
622. The religious law limits the marriage option for a number of groups in Israel. This issue remains in the heart of the Israeli discourse and remains a major challenge before the Israeli society. Consequently, certain couples prefer to forego the imposed religious marriage because it contradicts their perceptions of marriage and marry abroad, as detailed below.

Legal Developments

623. The Knesset recently amended the Division of Property between Spouses Law 5733-1973 (the “Division of Property between Spouses Law”) (Amendment No. 4 of 2008) in order to allow the division of property prior to the divorce or end of marriage. According to Jewish “Halacha”, both spouses must consent to the divorce. The purpose of the Amendment is to prevent the possibility of one spouse to require the other spouse to relinquish his/her property rights, as a condition for his/her consent to divorce.

Section 2(d) to the Law was amended to further broaden the incidence of the Law, to include marriage annulment, declaration that the marriage was void and separation according to religious law that does not allow divorce, in addition to divorce.

Section 5(a), dealing with the right of each spouse to half of the couple’s entire property, was amended to allow the Court to grant the right not only after divorce or after the death of a spouse as previously, but also immediately after the annulment of the marriage. The total property includes future pension rights, retirement benefits, savings, providence funds etc.

The Amendment added Section 5A(a), according to which, the Court may allow, under certain circumstances, the realization of the right to division of property, namely the right of each spouse to half of the couple’s total property, prior to the divorce or the marriage annulment in each of the aforementioned forms.

According to Section 5A(b), the Court may shorten the periods stipulated in Section 5A(a), if it deems it appropriate. Furthermore, in certain circumstances, namely the involvement of violent elements, the court may order the division of property even if the situation does not comply with the terms stipulated in Section 5A(a).

According to Section 5A(c) the Court may condition the execution of a division of property request, in the deposition of a written letter of consent to receive or give a 'Get' from the applicant.

624. In a recent decision by the Tel-Aviv Family Matters Court, the Court awarded the plaintiff the amount of 700,000 NIS ($175,000) as non-pecuniary damage for over 10 years she was held in marriage against her will, since her husband refused to give her the divorce (also known as, 'Get'). The plaintiff and the defendant were married by an arranged marriage, however, they lived together for only three months after the marriage, after which the plaintiff fled from the house due to the severe violence inflicted upon her. Since then, the plaintiff filed for a divorce, and tried to receive her 'Get', but due to her husband reluctance, the imposition of different conditions by him, including the waiver of alimony support, and his lack of appearance in court hearings, the divorce was not granted. The plaintiff immense suffering is based on the fact that she is a religious woman, therefore, until receiving her 'Get', cannot rehabilitate her life and find a new partner for the creation of a family. The Court stressed the importance of the ability of each individual to enter or terminate a relationship, including the creation of a family, and emphasized this ability as part of the human dignity and liberty for all. This is especially important for religious women, as their social status is affected of their marital status, therefore refusal to give a 'Get' to such women, humiliates them and injures their sense of value. The Court refused however, to issue pecuniary damage since in its opinion they are to be determined in the divorce proceedings before the Rabbinical Court (F.M.C. 24782/98 Anonymous v. Anonymous (14.12.2008)).
625. On July 25, 2007, the legislator extended the powers granted to the Rabbinical Court when dealing with a husband reluctant to give his wife a 'Get', thus preventing her from re-marrying. Amendment No. 6 to the Rabbinical Courts (Upholding a Divorce Decree) Law, enables the Rabbinical Courts, in certain circumstances, to foreclose or withhold pensions and other allowances in a progressive manner as stipulated in the Law, as well as possessions including personal effects and real estate.
626. On July 21, 2008, the Jerusalem Family Matters Court, compensated a woman in the amount of 550,000 NIS ($137,500) due to her husband lack of compliance to the order of the Rabbinical Court, stipulating the need for a divorce between the couple. The woman filed for divorce at the Rabbinical Court in 1998, and in 2006 that Court ordered the husband to grant a divorce to his wife. The Family Matters Court determined that due to the lingering of the divorce process the husband inflicted extensive emotional suffering upon his wife, even more so after his refusal to comply with the order of the Rabbinical Court. The Family Matters Court determined that in his refusal to grant a divorce the husband violated Section 287(a) to the Penal Law which stipulates that a person failing to comply with a Court Order is subject to two years imprisonment, as well as Section 63 to the Torts Ordinance (New Version) stipulating that breach of an obligation inscribed in a law establish a right of compensation. The Court also found that the husband acted in negligence after the Rabbinical Court ordered the divorce, as he must have been aware at that point of the suffering his refusal inflicts on his wife. Therefore, the Family Matters Court decided to compensate the woman for the emotional pain she suffered. However, this decision does not cancel the need to receive the husband's consent to the divorce in order for it to become valid (F.M.C. (Jerusalem) 6743/02 K. v. K. (21.6.08))

627. As discussed in Israel's previous reports, Israel is a family-oriented society. The Central Bureau of Statistics' data indicates that in 2006, only 3.2% of Israeli couples (47,000) cohabitated without marriage (44,800 of those are Jewish couples). The age composition of couples cohabitated without marriage is relatively younger than in married couples, in more than half (55%) of the cases the woman's age is up to 34 years old, compared to only 27% among married women.

Marriages

628. The status of married persons in Israel is illustrated by the following table:

Source: Central Bureau of Statistics, Statistical Abstract of Israel, 2008

629. In 2006, the average age of first marriages in Israel was 27.7 for Jewish men, 27.2 for Muslim men, 27 for Druze men and 29.4 for Christian men. Among women the average age of first marriages was 25.5 for Jewish women, 22.1 for Muslim women, 22.6 among Druze women and 24.4 among Christian women. It should be noted that since 1970, the average marital age has risen by three years, mostly due to the increase in cohabitation and women's participation in the labor market and in higher education.

Polygamy

630. Section 176 of the Penal Law prohibits Polygamy in Israel. According to this section, polygamy is punishable by 5 years imprisonment. According to Section 179, a Jewish person shall not be convicted of polygamy if the second marriage is conducted after receiving a marriage permit according to a final verdict of a Rabbinical Court and after the final verdict receives the approval of the High Rabbinical Court. According to Section 180 of the Law, Polygamy among people of other religions is “permitted” only in two situations: the spouse from the first marriage is unable, for reasons of mental illness, to agree to a divorce or to the cancellation of the marriage or to participate in such procedure; the spouse from the first marriage is missing in circumstances which give rise to fear for his life and he can not be traced for 7 years. The Penal law also stipulates that a woman can not be forced to annul the marriage without the consent of the relevant court.

Polygamy among the Arab and Bedouin population in Israel

631. On November 11, 2006, the Knesset Committee on the Status of women held a discussion with regard to polygamy among the Bedouin population. A report, which had been prepared for the Committee by the Research and Information Center of the Knesset reveals, that estimating the scope of the phenomenon is rather impossible due to the fact that most polygamous marriages are not registered. Nevertheless, during the discussion, MK Jamal Zchalka had explained that the polygamy phenomenon is being gradually reduced, and already been decreased from 17% of the Bedouin marriages several years ago, to 12% today.

632. According to the Israeli Knesset Research and Information Center the number of polygamy cases decreased significantly in the past few years. In 2005, the total number of registered Muslim polygamy marriages was 24 (18 in Israel and 6 conducted abroad) in comparison to 40 cases in 2004 (of which 34 were conducted in Israel) and to 54 cases in 2003 (of which 47 were conducted in Israel). In 2006, 15 police investigations were opened regarding polygamy marriages, 11 of them in the Arab population and two of those cases in the Bedouin population.

Divorces

633. Israel’s divorce rate in the years 2004-2005 has been relatively steady, as indicated by the following table:

Minimum Marital and Parenthood Age

634. The phenomenon of underage marriage still takes place in certain segments of Israeli society, including those of the ultra-orthodox Jews, Jews originating from Georgia and Arabs. According to the Central Bureau of Statistics, in 2006, more than 1,500 girls, younger than 17, were married (3.4% of the total women married that year), of which 78% were Muslim girls. Additionally, 40.8% of single Arab women were married before the age of 19. In 2005, the rate of marriage for Muslim girls was more than 2.5 times higher than that of Jewish girls. Also in 2005, 30 requests to allow the marriage of minors were submitted to Family Matters Courts – 17 were approved. During the years 1997-2005, more than a half of the 251 requests for marriage of minors were approved. During the years 2000-2006, 41 complaints were submitted to the Police due to violations of the Marital Age Law. In half of these cases criminal files were opened and in all other cases it was decided not to prosecute.

635. In 2007, 549 young women up to the age of 17 gave birth, of which 444 were Muslim and 71 were Jewish. To about 8% of them it was not the first birth. Also in 2007, 1,226 young women

(up to 17), applied to the Commission for Pregnancy Terminations, 81% of them were Jewish, 13% were without religious classification and only 3% were Muslim. 98% of them were single and almost all the applications were approved.

* Including marital status widower/widow and unknown

636. Usually under-age marriages take place in closed communities, and are not published, therefore the likelihood of acquiring evidence of the marriage or proving their very existence, is quite low. Furthermore, for the reason mentioned above, violations of this Law do not come to the knowledge of the Police or other relevant bodies.

637. In a recent case, the Krayot Family Matters Court denied a request to grant a marriage permit for a 16 years old girl to marry a 28 years old man, determining that the reason presented does not relate to the girl's best interest according to the Marital Age Law and therefore is not a sufficient reason for granting a marriage permit. Here, the request was based on the fact that the expected groom's mother was diagnosed with a terminal illness, and the parties involved wished her to be present at the wedding. The petitioners informed the Court that prior to the diagnosis, their intention was to wed the couple when the girl will turn 18. The Court held that the reason presented in this case, however unfortunate, does not give rise to the issuing of such permit, as it is not a reason relating to the young girl in question and her best interest (F.M.C. 6980/08 Anonymous et. al. v. The Haifa District Attorney (17.07.08)).

Dissolving of Marriage

638. The Dissolving of Marriage Jurisdiction (Special Cases and International Jurisdiction) Law 5729-1969 (the “Dissolving of Marriage Jurisdiction Law”), concerning the dissolution of marriage of persons with no religious affiliations or different religions was amended in July 2005 to allow for either spouse to apply directly to a Family Matters Court in matters of marriage dissolution, instead of applying first to the president of the Supreme Court. In suitable cases, the Family Matters Court may seek consultation from the relevant religious court to determine whether it is necessary to dissolve the marriage according to the religious law of either spouse in order to allow him or her to remarry. The amended law also includes international jurisdiction provisions of Family Matters Courts.

Civil Marriages

639. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court took a significant step of recognizing civil marriages which had taken place between Jewish Israeli residents and citizens outside of Israel. A Jewish man, who wanted to divorce his wife after having been civilly married outside of the State, turned to the Rabbinical Court which stated that the marriage should not be recognized and are therefore dissolved. The wife, who did not want to divorce her husband, petitioned the decision to the High Court of Justice based on her fear of losing her right to alimony. The Court determined that the Rabbinical Court could not dissolve the marriage based on the fact that the marriage was not performed according to Jewish religious law. It further noted that civil marriages are indeed valid in Israel and created a status which could not only be considered as for the purpose of registration. (H.C.J. 2232/03 Anonymous v. The Rabbinical Court of Appeals)

The Supreme Court decided that the Rabbinical Court may dissolve such a marriage and grant a divorce verdict, if it is convinced that it is unfeasible to accomplish domestic peace between the spouses, but it can not do so based on the religious causes for divorce. This sort of divorce can be defined as “divorce with no blame” (not owing to religious causes of blame), and is considered to be rather like a civil divorce. The Supreme Court raised the concern that “divorce with no blame” may damage the right of women to receive alimony, but emphasized that the solution can not be found through retaining the institution of formal marriage. Instead the economic aspects of the relationship should be resolved in a Family Matters Court, rather than as part of a divorce procedure in the Rabbinical Court.

Spouses

640. On April 15, 2007, the Nazareth Family Matters Court rejected a lawsuit brought by the two children of a deceased man against his second wife. In the claim, the children requested the rights to a property of their father’s that the second widow had inherited. The plaintiffs claimed that their father’s widow had a new spouse and that according to a condition in their father’s testament, she lost the right to the property under those circumstances and the children were subsequently to inherit it (Nazareth F.M.C. 1180/04 A.Z and P.Z v. V.Z and the Land Registry).

The Court held that the meaning of the word “spouse” as it appeared in the aforementioned testament should be interpreted as a relationship characterized by economic management of a family unit, stemming from a joint family life. This meaning complied with the testimony’s objective that the children would inherit the property only if the wife developed a serious and permanent relationship with her new partner, similar to the one she had with the deceased. The Court decided that in this case, the relationship between the respondent and her partner was based on friendship and intimacy, but could not be characterized as incorporating the economic management of a joint family unit. Therefore, the new couple could not be considered as ‘spouses’ according to the terms of the testament, and the lawsuit was rejected.

Same-Sex Couples

641. In recent years, there were many judgments and decisions promoting the rights of same-sex couples in Israel, some of them are detailed below.

642. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court handed down a landmark decision concerning the rights of same-sex couples. It held that a wedding certificate from a foreign country in which same-sex marriages are recognized, could allow the couple to be registered as married by the Ministry of the Interior. Five gay couples who held wedding ceremonies abroad petitioned to the Supreme Court following the Ministry of the Interior’s refusal to register them as married (H.C.J. 3045/05 Ben-Ari v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J. 3046/05 Bar-Lev v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J. 10218/05 Herland v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J. 10468/05 Lord v. The Ministry of the Interior and H.C.J. 10597/05 Remez v. The Ministry of the Interior).

The Supreme Court based its decision on a previous Supreme Court ruling (H.C.J. 143/62 Fonk Shlezinger v. The Minister of the Interior) in which a distinction was made between the duty to register marriages, and the question of recognition of their status. The Supreme Court determined that the Ministry of the Interior must not discriminate against same-sex couples who hold a wedding certificate from a foreign country that permits same-sex marriages. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court notes that by doing so, it does not grant a new status to same-sex marriages, and reiterated that it is the role of the Knesset to endow as much.

643. On April 19, 2007, The Haifa Labor District Court accepted a claim against the “Mivtachim” pension fund, and determined that a surviving partner of a lesbian relationship was eligible to the legal rights of an “insured widow”, and not of an “insured widower”. Following this decision, the plaintiff is to be paid a survivors’ pension of 40% as opposed to only 20% (La.C. (Haifa) 1758/06 Moyal-Lefler v. Mivtachim).

The Court concluded that in this instance, the plaintiff was the deceased’s spouse, and was publicly recognized as her cohabitor. Therefore, she was eligible to a survivors’ pension, according to the rules of the pension fund. The Court stated that “the distinction between men and women in the rules of the respondent and the National Insurance Law derives from a similar rationale - a reflection of the economic situation in which we live, where women’s incomes are lower than men’s, and their promotion in the labor market is more difficult.

Therefore there is a justification for the preference of female widows as it narrows the existing gap between men and women”. The Court held that the plaintiff should be classified as a female widow, and not as a male widower. She was therefore eligible for the rights of an “insured widow”, and the pension as stated in the rules of the pension fund.

644. On March 3, 2008 the Court of Family Matters in Tel-Aviv issued an adoption order regarding a minor to the petitioner. The petitioner is the same-sex spouse of the minor’s parent. The Court determined that according to the examination conducted by the welfare officer, the minor is a happy child and sees both males as his parents, therefore there is no prevention from granting the adoption order, and it is in the child’s best interest to do so. The Court further stipulated that granting the adoption order does not negate any rights of the father and his extended family (Ad.C. (Tel-Aviv) 58/07 Giora Shavit Shadiv et. al. v. The Attorney General (20.03.2008)).
645. On December 20, 2006, the Tel-Aviv Family Matters Court determined that a prenuptial financial agreement between a same-sex female-couple is valid regarding its property distribution between the couple; however its signature does not affect the personal status of the couple, and may not be seen as changing their status to married. The Court emphasized that significant changes in public opinions regarding women issues occurred in the last century, including same-sex relations, and therefore the public morality changed and now recognizes the right of same-sex couples to enjoy the same rights as married couples, i.e. recognizes their right to equality and equal treatment. However, the definition of marriage depends on the legislator and it is not in a hurry to change the current definition (F.M.C. 47720/06 Anonymous et. al. v. Anonymous (20.12.2006)).
646. In a decision dated January 23, 2005, the Attorney General established a new precedent in which the State is willing to grant legal status to same-sex adoptions of the birth-child or adopted child of the other spouse. Furthermore, it states that the State is willing to allow the adoption of a non-biological child by same-sex couples, while considering the best interest of the child. This position regards the legal aspects of same-sex adoptions; however the decision regarding a specific case shall remain in the hands of the relevant social service.

New Reproductive Technology and Surrogacy

647. The accumulative number of applications for surrogate motherhood, as of December 2007, is 450, resulting with 194 children in 160 successful child births (due to 32 labors of twins and one triplet). Out of the 450 applications some were made by couples for the second time after a success or a failure to conceive on the first application. Some of the applications never reached the stage of signing an agreement. At least two of the prospective parents gave birth to children unaided by a surrogate after approval of their surrogacy agreement.

Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women

Forty-eighth session

17 January – 4 February 2011

Concluding observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women

Israel

1. The Committee considered the fourth and fifth reports of Israel (CEDAW/C/ISR/4 and CEDAW/C/ISR/5) at its 961st and 962nd meetings, on 18 January 2011 (see CEDAW/C/SR.961 and 962). The Committee's list of issues and questions is contained in CEDAW/C/ISR/Q/5, and the responses of Israel are contained in CEDAW/C/ISR/Q/5/Add.1.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee expresses its appreciation to the State party for its fourth and fifth periodic reports, which were well structured and in general followed the Committee's guidelines for the preparation of reports, with references to the previous concluding observations, although they lacked references to the Committee's general recommendations. The Committee regrets that the reports did not provide information on the enjoyment by all women, including women living in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, of their rights under the Convention. The Committee expresses its appreciation to the State party for its oral presentation, the written replies to the list of issues and questions raised by the Committee's pre-session working group, as well as the supplementary written information.

3. The Committee commends the State party for its multi-sectoral delegation which included a high number of women and men representing ministries and other governmental bodies with responsibilities for the implementation of measures in the areas covered by the Convention. The Committee appreciates the constructive dialogue that took place between the delegation and the members of the Committee, but it regrets that a significant number of its oral questions were left unanswered.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee notes with appreciation the significant law reform undertaken since the consideration of its third periodic report (CEDAW/C/ISR/3) in 2005, aimed at the promotion of gender equality and elimination of discrimination against women and at achieving compliance with the obligations under the Convention. Specific reference is made to:

- (a) Anti-Trafficking Law (Legislative Amendments), in 2006;
- (b) Public Protection from Sex Offenders Law, in 2006;
- (c) Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments), in 2007, which imposes the duty to systematically examine the gender implications of any primary and secondary legislation before it is enacted by the Knesset;
- (d) Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Workforce and the Adjustment of Workplaces to Women's Needs Law, in 2008; and
- (e) Amendment of the Statistics Ordinance, in 2008, including the requirement in Section 7A that the collection, processing and publication of statistical data relating to individuals shall include statistics segregated by gender, unless certain circumstances justify a deviation from the general rule.

5. The Committee also notes with satisfaction that, in the period since the consideration of the previous report, the State party has ratified or acceded to the following international instruments:

- (a) The Optional Protocols to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict, in 2005, and on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, in 2008; and
- (b) The United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, in 2006, and the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the Convention, in 2008.

C. Principal areas of concern and recommendations

6. The Committee recalls the obligation of the State party to systematically and continuously implement all the provisions of the Convention and views the concerns and recommendations identified in the present concluding observations as requiring the priority attention of the State party between now and the submission of the next periodic report. Consequently, the Committee urges the State party to focus on those areas in its implementation activities and to report on actions taken and results achieved in its next periodic report. The Committee calls upon the State party to submit the present concluding observations to all relevant ministries, to the Knesset, and to the judiciary, so as to ensure their full implementation.

Parliament

7. While reaffirming that the Government has the primary responsibility and is particularly accountable for the full implementation of the obligations of the State party under the Convention, the Committee stresses that the Convention is binding on all branches of Government, and it invites the State party to encourage the Knesset, in line with its procedures, where appropriate, to take the necessary steps with regard to the implementation of the present concluding observations and the Government's next reporting process under the Convention.

Reservations

8. The Committee remains concerned that the State party continues to retain its reservations to articles 7 (b) and 16 of the Convention. The Committee is of the view that the reservation to article 16 is impermissible as it is contrary to the object and purpose of the Convention. It also impinges on other fundamental articles of the Convention, including article 2, and implementation of the principle of substantive equality between women and men in all matters relating to marriage and family relations.

9. Recalling its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 26), the Committee urges the State party to consider withdrawing its reservations to article 7 (b) and especially to article 16 of the Convention in order to eliminate discrimination against women in all matters relating to marriage and family relations in line with articles 2 and 16 of the Convention.

Definition of equality and non-discrimination

10. While noting that the principle of non-discrimination is incorporated in several pieces of legislation, the Committee remains concerned that the State party's Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (1992), which serves as Israel's bill of rights, does not contain a general provision on equality between women and men and the prohibition of both direct and indirect discrimination against women. The Committee notes, however, that the State party continues the process of preparing a consensus-based constitution.

11. The Committee recalls its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 18) and urges the State party to:

(a) Include in the new Constitution, or in a basic law or other appropriate legislation, a specific right of non-discrimination on the grounds of sex, and a definition of discrimination that encompasses both direct and indirect discrimination and discrimination in the public and private spheres, in conformity with article 1 of the Convention; and

(b) Develop, in accordance with article 2 of the Convention, a principle of gender equality in the appropriate national law in order to fulfil the necessary internal procedures for the incorporation and implementation of the provisions of the Convention.

Applicability of the Convention

12. Recalling its previous concluding observations (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 23), the Committee regrets the State party's position that the Convention does not apply beyond its own territory and, for that reason, the fourth and fifth periodic reports did not provide any information on the status of implementation of the Convention in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. The Committee notes, however, that the delegation acknowledged that the State party had certain responsibilities, including in the context of humanitarian law, and that the delegation, while maintaining its position, provided responses to some of the questions raised by the Committee concerning the situation of women in the Occupied Territories. The Committee reiterates that the State party's view that the Convention is not applicable in the Occupied Territories is contrary to the views of the Committee and of other treaty bodies, including the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Committee against Torture and also of the International Court of Justice in its Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, which have all noted that obligations under international human rights conventions as well as humanitarian law apply to all persons brought under the jurisdiction or effective control of a State party and have stressed the applicability of the State party's obligations under international human rights conventions to the Occupied Territories.

13. With reference to paragraph 12 of its general recommendation No. 28 on the core obligations of States parties under article 2 of the Convention, the Committee urges the State party to reconsider its position and to give full effect to the implementation of its obligations under the Convention as well as its obligations under humanitarian law with regard to all persons under its jurisdiction or effective control, and to provide in its next periodic report detailed information on the enjoyment by all women, including, if still relevant, women living in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, of their rights under the Convention. The Committee encourages the State party to strengthen its dialogue with the Palestinian authorities in respect of the implementation of the provisions of the Convention.

Participation of women in the peace process

14. The Committee is aware that the persistence of conflict and violence hinders the full implementation of the Convention. In this regard, it welcomes the fact that the State party has recognized the importance of United Nations Security Council resolution 1325 (2000) on women and peace and security in various domestic and international forums, and that the 1951 Equal Rights for Women Law was amended in 2005 following this resolution to include section 6C1, mandating that there must be equal representation for women in bodies that shape national policy, including peacebuilding negotiations.

15. With reference to its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 22), the Committee calls on the State party to strengthen its efforts towards conflict resolution, in line with relevant United Nations resolutions, and to fully involve all women concerned in all stages of the peace process, including through their equal opportunity and participation in the decision-making processes.

Visibility of the Convention

16. The Committee notes with concern that there is inadequate knowledge in society in general, including among all branches of Government, of the rights of women under the Convention, the Convention's concept of substantive equality of women and men and the Committee's general recommendations. The Committee is also concerned that the State party did not provide information on cases in which the provisions of the Convention had been directly invoked in court. It is further concerned that women themselves, including those in the Occupied Territories and women belonging to minority groups, are not aware of their rights under the Convention and thus lack the necessary information to claim them.

17. The Committee recommends that the State party take all appropriate measures to:

(a) Ensure that the Convention is sufficiently known and applied by all branches of Government, including the judiciary, as a framework for all laws, court decisions and policies on gender equality and the advancement of women;

(b) Ensure that the Convention and related domestic legislation be made an integral part of the legal education and training of judges, magistrates, lawyers and prosecutors so that a legal culture supportive of the equality of women with men and non-discrimination on the basis of sex is firmly established in the country;

(c) Enhance the awareness of all women, including Israeli Arab women and women belonging to other minority groups, of their rights through, inter alia, legal literacy programmes and legal assistance; and

(d) Ensure that information on the Convention is provided to women, especially Palestinian women in the Occupied Territories and those from minority communities, through the use of all appropriate measures, including the translation of the Convention and the present concluding observations into Arabic.

National machinery for the advancement of women

18. The Committee welcomes the continued activities of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, including training activities, surveys and awareness-raising campaigns, the recent strengthening of the Authority as well as the doubling of its budget for 2011. However, the Committee remains concerned that the Authority, which has multiple functions, may not have sufficient power, visibility, and human and financial resources for the effective promotion of the advancement of women and gender equality. It also notes with concern that the State has not adopted a national plan of action for the advancement of women.

19. The Committee calls on the State party to:

(a) Continue to strengthen the Authority and ensure that it is provided with the power, location within the executive branch of Government and necessary human and financial resources to enable it to carry out effectively the promotion of the advancement of women and gender equality throughout all sectors of Government; and

(b) Develop and adopt a comprehensive national plan of action for the advancement of women in line with the Convention and take due consideration of the Committee's recommendations in the formulation of this action plan, ensure its effective implementation, including monitoring and regular evaluation of strategies and measures used in its implementation, and establish a regular reporting system to the Government and the Knesset.

Violence against women

20. The Committee acknowledges the efforts by the State party to combat violence against women, including the adoption of new legislation on sexual offences and the ongoing activities of the special task force of 220 investigators specializing in gender-based violence. However, the Committee expresses its concern at the prevalence of domestic and sexual violence against women and girls, particularly against women belonging to the minority communities.

21. The Committee urges the State party to continue to give priority attention to combating violence against women and girls and to adopt comprehensive measures to address such violence, in accordance with its general recommendation No. 19. To this end, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Ensure the effective implementation of existing legislation as well as prosecution and punishment of perpetrators of such violence; and

(b) Provide the police, public prosecutors, the judiciary and other relevant Government bodies with the necessary training on domestic and sexual violence.

Violence against and harassment of women in the Occupied Palestinian Territories

22. While noting the complexity of the local administration, the Committee notes with deep concern that Palestinian women and girls continue to suffer from violent attacks from both State (Israeli soldiers) and non-State (inter alia settlers) actors, as well as all other forms of violence within their communities, including violations of the right to life, physical, psychological and verbal abuse, and sexual harassment. The Committee also notes with serious concern that such cases are rarely documented, prosecuted and punished. The Committee welcomes the establishment of an exceptional committee within the State party that provides financial assistance for battered women who wish to leave the shelters and start independent lives, but it regrets that Palestinian women do not have access to financial assistance from this committee. Furthermore, the Committee notes with concern that the restrictions on movement in the Occupied Territories as well as regular harassment by settlers of both children and teachers on their way to and from school have had a negative impact on Palestinian women and girls' access to education and to their health.

23. The Committee urges the State party to:

(a) Take immediate action to prevent human rights abuses and violations against women and girls in the Occupied Palestinian Territories and to protect them against such acts, including at checkpoints;

(b) Provide these women with effective access to legal remedies and ensure that such cases are fully and promptly investigated and that perpetrators are brought to justice, regardless of whether they are State or non-State actors;

(c) Ensure the provision of adequate compensation and, where appropriate, reparation to the surviving victims;

(d) Ensure that Palestinian women who are victims of violence have access to a sufficient number of shelters as well as financial and legal assistance, where necessary;

(e) Take the necessary measures to ensure that Palestinian women and girls can enjoy their right to education and their right to health, including safe and unhindered access to schools and to health facilities and resources; and

(f) Establish a constructive dialogue with the Palestinian authorities on the issues relating to violence against women under their responsibility.

Family reunification

24. The Committee notes with concern that the 2003 Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order), as amended in 2005 and 2007, remains in force and has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court. The Committee reiterates its concern that this Law, which suspends the possibility, subject to limited and subjective exceptions, of family reunification, especially in cases of marriages between an Israeli citizen and a person residing in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, has recently been extended for another six months and thus continues to adversely affect the marriages and right to family life of Israeli Arab women citizens and Palestinian women from the Occupied Territories.

25. Recalling its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 34), the Committee calls on the State party to balance its security interests with the human rights of persons affected by such policies, and to reconsider them with a view to facilitating family reunification of all citizens and permanent residents. To this end, it calls on the State party to bring the 2003 Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) of 31 July 2003 into line with articles 9 and 16 of the Convention.

Freedom of movement

26. The Committee is deeply concerned that the severe restrictions on the freedom of movement in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, especially through the wall, checkpoints, restricted roads and permit system, create hardship and have a detrimental impact on the enjoyment of human rights by Palestinian women, in particular their rights to freedom of movement, family life, work, education and health.

27. The Committee urges the State party to:

(a) Review these measures to ensure that restrictions on freedom of movement are not systematic, are not applied in a discriminatory manner, and do not lead to segregation of communities; and

(b) Ensure that Palestinian women enjoy their human rights, in particular their rights to freedom of movement, family life, work, education and health.

House demolitions

28. While noting that the State party delegation referred in the dialogue to national security concerns, the Committee is seriously concerned that continued demolitions of property, homes and schools as well as forced evictions in the Occupied Palestinian Territories and in East Jerusalem have a serious impact on the development and advancement of Palestinian women, including refugee women, as well as Israeli Arab women, and on their enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

29. The Committee urges the State Party to:

(a) Revoke its policies allowing for and refrain from the practice of forced eviction and house demolitions, which negatively impact on the physical and psychological well-being as well as the development and advancement of Palestinian and Israeli Arab women; and

(b) Review its housing policy and issuance of construction permits to Palestinians to ensure that Palestinian and Israeli Arab women can enjoy all their fundamental rights and freedoms, particularly their right to adequate housing and to family and private life.

Trafficking and exploitation of prostitution

30. The Committee underlines the State party's continuous efforts to address the issue of trafficking in women and girls, including the enactment of the Anti-Trafficking Law, which has broadened the definition of trafficking, as well as the adoption of the two National Plans to combat trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution, and trafficking in persons for purposes of slavery and forced labour. While noting the extensive information provided in the fifth report and the State party's replies to the list of issues, including that there has been a sharp decline in the number of women trafficked to Israel for purposes of prostitution, the Committee remains concerned at the prevalence of trafficking in the State party as a destination country, as well as reports of internal trafficking. In addition, it is concerned at the limited information provided on the existence and implementation of regional and bilateral memorandums of understanding and/or agreements with other countries on trafficking. Furthermore, the Committee is concerned that female asylum seekers and migrants entering Israel through the Sinai desert are at high risk of becoming victims of trafficking.

31. The Committee urges the State party to fully implement article 6 of the Convention, including through:

(a) Effective implementation of its anti-trafficking legislation as well as its two national plans on trafficking, in order to ensure that perpetrators are punished and victims adequately protected and assisted;

(b) Strengthening of its efforts at international, regional and bilateral cooperation with countries of origin and transit so as to address more effectively the causes of trafficking, and improve prevention of trafficking through information exchange; and

(c) Provision of information and training on the anti-trafficking legislation to the judiciary, law enforcement officials, border guards and social workers in all parts of the country; and

(d) Provision of immediate and effective treatment, including medical, psycho-social and legal assistance for women in need of international protection, who are victims of trafficking and sexual slavery, in transit to Israel.

Participation in political and public life

32. The Committee notes the measures taken by the State party to enhance women's participation in political and public life, including Government Resolution No. 1362 (2007) determining that equal gender representation shall be achieved in the boards of Government corporations, within two years of the Resolution, as well as the creation of a list of women qualified to serve as directors in Government corporations and other public bodies, including Israeli Arab women. While welcoming the increase in the number of women in the Knesset and the fact that women now constitute the majority of judges in the judiciary, the Committee is concerned that gaps remain between women's and men's representation in certain areas of political and public life, including in local councils/authorities, academia and the foreign service. Furthermore, the Committee is concerned at the continued low level of representation of Israeli Arab women in these areas. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest the two bills on the funding of political parties and on local authorities (elections).

33. The Committee recommends that the State party pursue sustained policies aimed at the promotion of the full and equal participation of women in decision-making in all areas of public, political and professional life. It recommends that the State party fully utilize the Committee's general recommendation No. 23 and calls upon the State party to adopt temporary special measures, in accordance with article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention and the Committee's general recommendation No. 25, in order to accelerate the full and equal participation of women in public and political life. To this end, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Establish concrete goals and timetables so as to accelerate the increase in the representation of women, including Israeli Arab women, in elected and appointed bodies in all areas of public life, where parity has not yet been reached;

(b) Implement awareness-raising activities on the importance of the participation of women in decision-making for society as a whole and develop targeted training and mentoring programmes for women candidates and women elected to public office, as well as programmes on leadership and negotiation skills for current and future women leaders;

(c) Carefully monitor the effectiveness of measures taken and results achieved and that it inform the Committee thereof; and

(d) Provide information, in its next report, on the status and content of the two Bills on the funding of political parties and on local authorities (elections).

Education

34. The Committee acknowledges the progress made in the field of education for women and girls. However, the Committee is concerned that Israeli Arab and Bedouin women and girls remain in a disadvantaged and marginalized situation, including with regard to drop-out rates and access to institutions of higher education. It is also concerned about women's disproportionately low presence in engineering and technical fields in higher education. While noting some efforts made, the Committee is further concerned that elimination of gender stereotypes from textbooks has not been prioritized, including in the Arab education system.

35. The Committee calls on the State party to enhance its compliance with article 10 of the Convention and to raise awareness of the importance of education as a human right and as the basis for the empowerment of women. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Take the necessary measures, including the use of temporary special measures, in accordance with article 4 and the Committee's general recommendation No. 25, to reduce the drop-out rates of Israeli Arab and Bedouin girls and increase the number of Israeli Arab and Bedouin women at institutions of higher education, inter alia through the provision of scholarships;

(b) Take effective measures to actively overcome the de facto segregation in the fields of education, to encourage the diversification of educational and professional choices for women and men and to offer incentives for women to enter traditionally male dominated fields of study; and

(c) Review and revise textbooks, including in the Arab education system, through the special committee appointed for this purpose, in a speedy manner, in order to eradicate gender stereotypes.

Employment

36. The Committee welcomes the establishment, in 2008, of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission with a mandate to receive and handle complaints regarding employment discrimination as well as the amendment to the Women's Employment Law on the extension of maternity leave to 26 weeks. However, the Committee notes with concern the segregation of the labour market as well as the wide gender pay gap, with the average income of women being 63 per cent of the average income of men across the country. While noting efforts by the State party to combat sexual harassment, including the activities of the Authority in this respect, the Committee is concerned at the persistence of sexual harassment, including in the military.

37. The Committee requests the State party to ensure equal opportunities for women in the labour market, in accordance with article 11 of the Convention. To this end, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Ensure the effective implementation of its labour legislation to combat the segregation of the labour market and the gender pay gap; and

(b) Continue its efforts to combat sexual harassment, including in the military, through the enforcement of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law and other concrete measures.

Health

38. The Committee appreciates the efforts made by the State party in the area of health care as well as the continuing decline in the child mortality rate. However, it is concerned that discrepancies remain in the infant and maternal mortality rates of Jewish, Israeli Arab and Bedouin women and children. The Committee also notes with concern that the restrictions on movement in the Occupied Territories have had a negative impact on the health of women, including older women and disabled women, and in particular their access to adequate health services, such as hospitals, clinics, urgent care and specialized treatment not available in the Occupied Territories. In addition, the Committee remains concerned about the number of incidents at Israeli checkpoints which have a negative impact on the rights of Palestinian women, including the right of access to health-care services for all women, including pregnant women.

39. The Committee calls upon the State party to take all necessary measures to ensure women's access to health care and health-related services, within the framework of the Committee's general recommendation No. 24. To this end, the Committee calls upon the State party to:

- (a) Refrain from any action that would prevent Palestinian women from accessing adequate health services and treatment;
- (b) Strengthen its efforts to close the gaps in the infant and maternal mortality rates of Jewish, Israeli Arab, and Bedouin women and children; and
- (c) Ensure that the Israeli authorities at the checkpoints are instructed to ensure safe and unhindered access to health-care services for all women, including pregnant women.

Palestinian female prisoners

40. The Committee is seriously concerned at the situation of Palestinian women in detention. In this respect, the Committee expresses its concern with respect to the harsh detention conditions of Palestinian female prisoners as well as their treatment during detention. It also expresses its concern at reports that approximately 25 per cent of Palestinian female prisoners suffer from treatable diseases, but that many have little or no access to medical attention, and it notes with concern the lack of adequate services provided to pregnant Palestinian prisoners. Furthermore, the Committee notes with concern that the detention of Palestinian female prisoners outside the Occupied Territories obstructs regular family visits.

41. The Committee urges the State Party to:

- (a) Ensure humane detention conditions and treatment of Palestinian women during their arrest, interrogation and detention;
- (b) Ensure that Palestinian female prisoners, including pregnant prisoners, have access to adequate health services and treatment and that the gender-specific medical needs of these prisoners are met; and
- (c) Ensure that Palestinian female prisoners are allowed to receive family visits as often as other female prisoners.

Female migrant workers

42. The Committee expresses its particular concern at the disadvantaged situation of female migrant workers in the country. In this respect, the Committee is concerned at the difficult working conditions of female migrant workers, who are employed primarily as in-home caregivers, and that they work on a round-the-clock basis with mandatory live-in arrangements. The Committee also notes with concern the 2009 Supreme Court decision in the matter of Yolanda Gloten vs. the National Labour Court, which held that migrant home caregivers are excluded from the Hours of Work and Rest Law, which provides basic labour law protections to workers in the State party generally. Furthermore, the Committee is seriously concerned at the State party's existing policy that migrant workers who give birth must leave the State party with their babies within three months of giving birth or send their babies out of the State party's borders so as to safeguard their work permits. The Committee is equally concerned that marriage and intimate relationships between migrant workers under an existing State party policy constitute grounds to revoke the couple's work permits.

43. The Committee urges the State party to:

- (a) Extend and enforce all labour law protections, including health and safety standards, for all female migrant workers, including migrant home-care workers, ensure their access to legal remedies, and allow them to negotiate freely with their employer whether to reside in the employer's household or not; and

(b) Revoke its policies with regard to cancellation of work permits for migrant workers in cases of childbirth, marriage and intimate relationships, in accordance with the State party's obligations under the Convention and the Committee's general recommendation No. 26 on women migrant workers.

Bedouin women

44. The Committee notes the establishment, in 2007, of the Advisory Committee on the Policy regarding Bedouin Towns as well as the detailed information provided in the State party's reports on the situation of Bedouin women and girls in the Negev desert, including the increase in school enrolment rates and decline in infant mortality. Nevertheless, the Committee reiterates its concern that Bedouin women remain in a disadvantaged and marginalized situation, especially with regard to education, employment and health, and their access to land. The Committee also reiterates its concern at the situation of Bedouin women who live in unrecognized villages with poor housing conditions and limited or no access to water, electricity and sanitation.

45. The Committee urges the State party to:

(a) Continue to take effective measures to eliminate discrimination against Bedouin women and to enhance respect for their human rights through effective and proactive measures, including in the fields of education, employment and health;

(b) In its planning efforts in the Negev area, respect the Bedouin population's right to their ancestral land and their traditional livelihood; and

(c) Include, in its next report, detailed information on any national policy, strategy or programme carried out by the State party to improve the situation of Bedouin women and girls, including their access to health care, education and employment, as well as the impact and achievements of such government initiatives.

Other disadvantaged groups of women

46. While noting the information provided in the fifth report in respect of women with disabilities and women belonging to ethnic minorities, especially Israeli Arab women, the Committee is concerned at the very limited information provided regarding certain other disadvantaged groups of women and girls, including asylum-seeking women, refugee women, internally displaced women, stateless women and older women. The Committee is also concerned that those women and girls often suffer from multiple forms of discrimination, especially with regard to access to education, employment and health care, protection from violence and access to justice. The Committee is further concerned that gender-based persecution is not recognized by the State party as a ground for refugee status.

47. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Provide, in its next report, comprehensive information, including sex-disaggregated data and trends over time, on the de facto situation of these disadvantaged groups of women and girls in all areas covered by the Convention, as well as on the impact of measures taken and results achieved in the implementation of policies and programmes for these women and girls; and

(b) Consider including gender-based persecution as a ground for refugee status, in accordance with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) Guidelines on International Protection relating to gender-related persecution.

Discrimination in marriage and family relations

48. Noting that all Jews in Israel can be married and divorced only in the rabbinical courts, which are male dominated and completely governed by religious law, the Committee is concerned about discrimination against women in the context of divorce in such courts, in that only the husband has the right to grant his wife divorce (the “get”) of his own free will. The Committee also expresses its concern at recent cases of retroactive invalidation of divorce, to the detriment of Jewish women. The Committee is further concerned about the continuing practices of polygamy and under-age marriage of girls that are legitimized under different religious laws governing personal status.

49. The Committee calls upon the State party to:

(a) Introduce an optional system of civil marriage and divorce available to all;

(b) Harmonize religious laws currently governing marriage and divorce with the Convention and eliminate provisions that are discriminatory against women, including by prohibiting the man’s unilateral power to grant the “get”, prohibiting the possibility of extorting concessions from women in return for the “get” as well as the practice of retroactive invalidation of divorces, and by further limiting the scope of rabbinical courts’ jurisdiction to matters of marriage and divorce alone;

(c) Ensure that rabbinical court judges are provided with training on the Convention, with special emphasis on article 16 as well as domestic violence;

(d) Take active measures to enforce the prohibition of bigamy and current exceptions under which it is allowed and polygamous marriages, as called for in the Committee’s general recommendation No. 21; and

(e) Take effective measures to enforce adherence to the minimum age of marriage, and, in this respect, take measures to raise the minimum age of marriage to 18 years for both women and men.

Cooperation with civil society

50. While acknowledging the State party’s emphasis on working in cooperation with civil society organizations, including women’s non-governmental organizations, and the fact that some of these organizations have participated in the preparation of the State party’s reports, the Committee notes with concern the recent decision of the Knesset to form a parliamentary inquiry committee with respect to the work and funding of civil society organizations, some of which are providing essential services, and are working to promote equality, for women and girls.

51. The Committee calls upon the State party to:

(a) Ensure that civil society organizations and women’s non-governmental organizations are not restricted with respect to their establishment and operations and that they are able to function independently of the Government; and

(b) Provide an enabling environment for the establishment and active functioning and involvement of women’s and human rights organizations in promoting the implementation of the Convention.

National Human Rights Institution

52. The Committee recommends that the State party consider establishing a national human rights institution in accordance with the principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (the Paris Principles, General Assembly resolution 48/134, annex).

Optional Protocol and amendment to article 20, paragraph 1, of the Convention

53. The Committee encourages the State party to ratify the Optional Protocol to the Convention and to accept, as soon as possible, the amendment to article 20, paragraph 1, of the Convention concerning the meeting time of the Committee.

D. Final paragraphs

Dissemination

54. The Committee requests the wide dissemination in Israel of the present concluding observations in order to make the people, including Government officials, politicians, parliamentarians and women's and human rights organizations, aware of the steps that have been taken to ensure the de jure and de facto equality of women, as well as the further steps that are required in that regard. The Committee recommends that the dissemination include the local community level. The State party is encouraged to organize a series of meetings to discuss progress achieved in the implementation of the present observations. The Committee requests the State party to continue to disseminate widely, in particular to women's and human rights organizations, the Committee's general recommendations, the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action and the outcome of the twenty-third special session of the General Assembly on the theme "Women 2000: gender equality, development and peace for the twenty-first century".

Ratification of other treaties

55. The Committee notes that the adherence of the State party to the nine major international human rights instruments¹ would enhance the enjoyment by women of their human rights and fundamental freedoms in all aspects of life. The Committee therefore encourages the Government of Israel to consider ratifying the treaties to which it is not yet a party: the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families; the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities; and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance.

Follow-up to concluding observations

56. The Committee requests the State party to provide, within two years, written information on the steps undertaken to implement the recommendations contained in paragraphs 23 and 49 above.

¹ The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination; the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment; the Convention on the Rights of the Child; the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families; the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance; and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

Preparation and date of next report

57. The Committee requests the State party to ensure the wide participation of all ministries and public bodies in the preparation of its next report, as well as to consult a variety of women's and human rights organizations during that phase.

58. The Committee requests the State party to respond to the concerns expressed in the present concluding observations in its next periodic report under article 18 of the Convention. The Committee invites the State party to submit its sixth periodic report in February 2015.

59. The Committee invites the State party to follow the harmonized guidelines on reporting under the international human rights treaties, including guidelines on a common core document and treaty-specific documents, approved at the fifth inter-committee meeting of the human rights treaty bodies, in June 2006 (HRI/MC/2006/3 and Corr.1). The treaty-specific reporting guidelines adopted by the Committee at its fortieth session, in January 2008, must be applied in conjunction with the harmonized reporting guidelines on a common core document. Together, they constitute the harmonized guidelines on reporting under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. The treaty-specific document should be limited to 40 pages, while the updated common core document should not exceed 80 pages.

I. Introduction

1. The State of Palestine acceded to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women on 1 April 2014, without submitting reservations to any of its articles. This is the official report of the State of Palestine, submitted under article 18 of the Convention. It surveys and details national legislative provisions and regulatory measures relating to implementation of the Convention and the ways those provisions affect the rights of Palestinian women and girls. The report contains data and information on the ongoing national effort to implement the Convention and bring about both de jure and de facto equality between men and women. It lays out the challenges facing the State of Palestine in implementing the Convention. It also describes the situation of Palestinian women under colonial Israeli occupation and the effects of illegal Israeli policies that are part of an institutionalized regime founded on settlement, systematic oppression and discrimination. All levels of the Israeli political and military apparatus, including the Israeli occupation army and the terrorist settler militias, are implicated in the systematic and wide-ranging crimes and violations being perpetrated against Palestinian women and the entire Palestinian people wherever they are suffering.

2. The present report has been prepared by a joint committee composed of the relevant government agencies and civil society institutions, with a view to providing relevant information and data. The report has been presented to relevant government agencies and civil society institutions at intensive workshops and consultations that covered all its aspects and provided opportunities to discuss it prior to adoption of the final version and submission to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women.

3. The report addresses the Convention's provisions one by one, and deals with articles in the order in which they appear in parts I, II, III and IV of the Convention. In preparing its report, the State of Palestine has been mindful of the reporting guidelines and general recommendations annexed to the Convention; the Compilation of Guidelines on the Form and Content of Reports to be Submitted by States Parties to the International Human Rights Treaties published on 3 June 2009; the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action; and the Sustainable Development Goals, in particular Goal 5 on achieving gender equality and empowering all women and girls. The State of Palestine stresses that this report in no way relieves Israel, the occupying Power, of its obligation under international law — in particular under international humanitarian law, international human rights law, and the 2004 advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory — to honour and implement the provisions of the Convention with respect to Palestinian women and girls. Neither does the report in any way affect the right of Palestinians, wherever they may be, to exercise their historical and inalienable rights, including the right to self-determination and the right of return. Lastly, it must be stressed that the present report should be read within the overall context of the common core document.

II. Information relating to the substantive articles of the Convention

The definition of discrimination against women

4. Legislation currently in force in occupied Palestine does not provide for an explicit definition of the term “discrimination against women”. However, the 1988 Palestinian Declaration of Independence, our most important national historical document, guarantees full equality without discrimination to all Palestinians, men and women, in the exercise of their rights and freedoms. It states explicitly that “the State of Palestine shall be for Palestinians, wherever they may be therein to develop their national and cultural identity and therein to enjoy full equality of rights. Their religious and political beliefs and human dignity shall therein be safeguarded under a democratic parliamentary system based on freedom of opinion and the freedom to form parties, on the respect of the majority for minority rights and the respect of minorities for majority decisions, on social justice and equality, and on non-discrimination in civil rights on grounds of race, religion or colour, or between men and women, under a constitution ensuring the rule of law and an independent judiciary and on the basis of true fidelity to the age-old spiritual and cultural heritage of Palestine with respect to mutual tolerance and coexistence among religions”. That document also declares the commitment of the State of Palestine to “the purposes and principles of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights”.

5. Both the legal framework and the preamble of the 2003 Amended Basic Law prohibit discrimination against women. The provisions of that Basic Law enshrine the equality of all Palestinians before the law and the judiciary without discrimination. Article 9 states explicitly that “Palestinians shall be equal before the law and the judiciary, without distinction based upon race, sex, colour, religion, political views or disability”. That makes gender equality and non-discrimination against women legal principles of the highest order. Any legislation that does not comply with those principles is subject to nullification by the Constitutional Court on the basis of general principles. Article 10 of the Basic Law provides that “basic human rights and liberties shall be protected and respected” and that Palestine “shall work without delay to become a party to regional and international declarations and covenants that protect human rights”.

6. The accession of the State of Palestine without reservations to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, and to other international human rights instruments that provide for equality and non-discrimination on the basis of gender, means that Palestine has declared its recognition at the highest political level of the definition of gender discrimination contained in those instruments and its commitment to taking all measures necessary to prohibit such discrimination in all its forms.

7. On 7 May 2014, immediately following Palestine’s accession to the Convention, as part of the overall national effort to integrate human rights standards into its national legislation, the Palestinian President issued a decision forming a Standing National Ministerial Committee for Follow-up on the Accession of the State of Palestine to International Treaties and Instruments. That Committee’s membership includes the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (as chair), a number of other ministries and national agencies, and the Independent Commission for Human Rights (as an observer). That Committee has a subcommittee called the Committee of Experts, which is charged with the following tasks: ensuring that the State of Palestine complies with and honours the agreements to which it is a party; preparing and submitting the initial and periodic reports of the State of Palestine to convention bodies; and reviewing legislation with a view to proposing amendments to bring it into line with international standards. That has given a fresh impetus to the incorporation into legislation of the definition of discrimination against women and other provisions of the Convention. The Committee of Experts is also responsible for submitting official reports to human rights treaty bodies and following up on concluding observations issued by those bodies.

8. With a view to combating discrimination, including de facto discrimination, the 2011 proposed draft Palestinian penal code prohibits acts of discrimination, including discrimination on the basis of gender. Article 546 defines discrimination as follows: “any differentiation among natural persons on the basis of national origin, social origin, colour, sex, family status, health condition, disability ...” It penalizes anyone who commits the crime of discrimination with imprisonment for a period of no more than two years and/or a fine of no more than $1500. That draft code has figured prominently in ongoing reviews of legislation in force. Government agencies, in conjunction with civil society organizations, have begun to review its provisions with a view to harmonizing them with international standards and amending those that do not conform to those standards.

Embodying the principle of equality and prohibiting discrimination against women

9. The Amended Basic Law incorporates the right of women to equality, non-discrimination and equality of opportunity by virtue of its guarantee, in article 9, that they should enjoy all human rights and freedoms. The Basic Law also establishes numerous general legal safeguards that contribute to ensuring the right of women to equality. They include the principles of the rule of law and separation of powers, which are stated to be the basis of governance in Palestine, and which are among the most important guarantees of all rights — including those of women — against violations by any individuals or parties. In particular, those two principles serve as a safeguard against arbitrary abuses of power by the authorities, and guarantee recourse to independent judicial bodies in cases of violation.

10. Palestine first adopted the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women with a 2005 Cabinet decision. In 2009, Palestine ratified the Convention with a unilateral declaration contained in Presidential Decree No. 19 of 2009. On 1 April 2014, less than a year and a half after Palestine was granted observer State status by the United Nations, Palestine acceded to the Convention without reservations. That was a concrete expression of political will and a qualitative step forward in national efforts to protect the rights of Palestinian women, rid national laws and policies of provisions that discriminate against women, and combat de facto discrimination in all areas.

11. During the 2014-2016 period, Palestine substantially expanded the number of international agreements to which it is a party. It has acceded to 55 international agreements and treaties, which has solidified the status of the State and its institutions regionally and internationally, contributed to international protection for the Palestinian people under Israeli occupation, and affirmed Palestine’s commitment to international human rights standards, democracy, personal and public freedoms, pluralism, transparency and accountability. Palestine is currently considering accession to the Optional Protocol to the Convention, but no decision has yet been issued.

12. On the regional level, Palestine joined the Arab Women's Organization of the League of Arab States on 18 March 2003. In 2013, Palestine acceded to the Basic Statute of the Women's Development Organization of the Organization of Islamic Cooperation.

13. The Palestinian Government has adopted a number of national policies that commit it to transparency, accountability and respect for human rights, including first and foremost women's rights. The most important of those are contained in the Palestinian National Development Plan 2014-2016: State-building to Sovereignty, which makes greater protection for Palestinian women a national priority. It guarantees greater participation in the labour market, facilitated access to all essential services and the right to equality and equal opportunity without discrimination. The Plan calls for finalizing reviews of legislation in force to ensure the integration of women's rights; integrating gender into national, sectoral and budget policies; enhancing accountability and oversight mechanisms; providing employment opportunities on an equal footing with men; protecting women from all forms of violence and facilitating access to justice, especially for the most vulnerable women in rural areas, refugee camps, areas adjacent to the illegal annexationist and expansionist wall, East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip; creating a social environment conducive to increased women's participation in political, community and cultural life and a greater role in decision-making; and working to protect women from the crimes of the Israeli occupation.

National women's rights mechanisms

14. Efforts to realize women's rights and gender equality are being made across various sectors and by a number of national mechanisms established for that purpose. We mention the following by way of example; unfortunately, space constraints prevent us from including all of them.

I. Palestine Liberation Organization mechanisms

The General Union of Palestinian Women

15. The Union was founded in 1965 as a democratic mass organization and a pillar of the Palestine Liberation Organization. It works to organize Palestinian women, include them into national liberation movement against the Israeli occupation, raise their awareness about the importance of participation in decision-making positions within political frameworks, and integrate them into the labour force.

II. Government mechanisms

The Ministry of Women's Affairs

16. The Ministry of Women's Affairs was established in 2003 to improve the overall situation of women and expand the Government's commitment to formulating and implementing policies, strategies and measures to eliminate discrimination. The Ministry adopted the relevant international agreements and the Beijing Platform for Action at its inception. The Ministry's effort towards the adoption of measures to enhance gender equality include the following: proposing and drafting laws and amendments; setting forth economic, cultural, social and media strategies to promote women's equality and raise awareness of women's rights across sectors; institutionalizing gender diversity within ministries and within the relevant institutions in the principal sectors; promoting national consolidation and coordination of efforts among major institutions; and promoting dialogue towards a consensus on priorities for action on women's issues.

The Ministry of Social Development

17. In its capacity as the lead official agency in the social protection sector, the Ministry works to provide social protection and eliminate all forms of marginalization, violence and social exclusion; to strengthen social cohesion through a set of policies, measures, and relief, protection and development interventions that, taken as a whole, help to combat poverty and unemployment, and promote social justice.

Gender units

18. Gender units within Government agencies have been reorganized to ensure that gender issues are integrated institutionally across sectors and that drafting and follow-up of Government programmes and policies is informed by a gender perspective. There are 22 such units to date. They face certain challenges posed by gender disparities in functions, hierarchies and staff, and the absence of consolidated budgeting, despite a ministerial decision mandating consolidation of hierarchies and functions.

Women's development offices

19. Starting in 2007, such offices were established in all the governorates with a view to improving the situation of women, empowering them and mainstreaming gender into the provision of services.

III. Civil society mechanisms

Non-governmental women's institutions

20. These institutions work to support and empower women in all areas and raise awareness within the community about the rights and status of women. They play an important role in putting an end to customs and practices that discriminate against women. They provide a range of services, in particular for women victims of violence, including hotlines and safe houses. They also take part in discussions about amending legislation to promote women's rights and ensure their exercise in practice.

Non-governmental development institutions

21. Many non-governmental institutions working to combat poverty and promote development and empowerment help to respond to the needs of women, in particular in rural and marginalized areas. That includes non-governmental organizations that offer lending services to micro-enterprises with a view to promoting sustainable development.

The national judicial system

22. The national judicial system, which has jurisdiction over issues relating to the Convention, is an additional safeguard that strengthens the protection of women and gender equality. Article 30, paragraph 1, of the Basic Law provides that the right to litigation is sacrosanct and guaranteed to all people, that every Palestinian has the right of recourse to his natural judge, and that litigation procedures shall be regulated by law to ensure prompt settlement of cases. Article 32 of the Basic Law provides that any violation of personal freedoms, the sanctity of human life, or any other public rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Basic Law or laws in force is a crime not subject to any statute of limitations with respect to civil or criminal proceedings, and that the National Authority shall provide just compensation to anyone who suffers damages thereby.

23. The judiciary is regulated by peremptory norms and general principles that provide women with legal protection against discriminatory acts. Any judicial ruling or decision that departs from such norms and principles is considered null and void. The most important of those principles include the following: the independence of the judiciary; non-intervention in the judiciary or in matters of justice, with no authority over a judge other than the law; the rule of law; equality before the law and the courts; the right to a fair trial; the right to a speedy judgment; and the principles of good governance.

24. Under the Amended Basic Law, court judgments are binding. Refraining from or obstructing their enforcement in any way is a crime punishable by imprisonment and dismissal from post if the accused is a public official or anyone charged with public service. The prevailing party has the right to appeal directly to the competent court, and the Government is responsible for guaranteeing compensation.

25. The Supreme Constitutional Court has jurisdiction for constitutional oversight of legislation. Any woman affected by any legislative provision that contravenes the Basic Law may file an appeal before that court. Where the Court hands down a ruling of unconstitutionality, all parties are prohibited from implementing the overturned provision until it is amended to conform to the Basic Law. The woman victim receives her due, and is compensated for any damages.

26. The Supreme Constitutional Court has the authority to establish legal protection for any individual — man or woman — who is the victim of an act of discrimination committed by a Government agency, and to reverse that act and restore the status quo ante. It does so on the basis of its authority to review and adjudicate disputes stemming from administrative decisions, including disputes relating to public posts, and even issues that are not per se court cases or legal proceedings, but merely petitions or claims, if they are outside the purview of any other court and must be ruled on in the interests of justice.

27. The sharia courts and ecclesiastical courts have the authority to rule on cases involving personal status and marital disputes that relate to marriage contracts, including divorce, separation, alimony, child support and custody. Unfortunately, rulings are often made on the basis of personal status codes that are still discriminatory against women. Each sharia court has a family counselling unit that tries to strengthen family bonds and resolve disputes between spouses. Such units help to minimize marital disputes and divorce. Periodic workshops are held to discuss and develop standard operating procedures for those units, with sharia judges in attendance.

28. During the 2014-2016 period, several training sessions were held for Government and sharia judges, prosecutors and family protection units in the Civil Police. Those sessions dealt with human rights principles in general and women's rights in particular. They covered the Convention and mechanisms for intervening in cases of gender-based violence, including the role of forensic medicine in detecting such violence.

Responsibility for the actions of public authorities

29. Women benefit from the general guarantees established by legislation in force that protect the rights of both men and women equally against potential violations by the State or its agencies. Existing legislation allows any individual to sue judges and prosecutors for fraud, avoidable gross negligence and other types of misconduct, and to be awarded compensation.

30. Further protection is provided for both women and men against any violations stemming from abuse of authority by public officials — including health professionals — and any attempts to conceal such crimes. A public official is any civil servant in administrative or judicial service, any member of the civilian or military authority, and any State employee or person hired by the State.

31. Under the Amended Basic Law, homes are inviolable. No one, not even a public official, may put under surveillance, enter or search a home without a valid court order. Any effects stemming from a violation of that provision are null and void, and anyone suffering damage as a result of such violation has the right to fair compensation guaranteed by the public authorities. That provides a safeguard against women being forcibly uncovered and having their privacy violated.

32. The codes of criminal, civil and commercial procedure provide for confidentiality of hearings that involve family matters. That protects women against exploitation, distortion or public exposure of their private lives and personal affairs. Those codes also make a point of protecting women against sexual exploitation during criminal procedures, including by allowing women to be searched only by duly deputized female officers.

33. The Personal Status Code and the Penal Code require marriage contracts to be registered in accordance with legal procedures. Failure by a sharia officiant to register a marriage contract or follow the above rules is punishable by a fine and dismissal. That is in order to protect all a woman's rights under her marriage contract and to verify the provenance of offspring.

34. Lastly, in 2013, the Cabinet approved the National Referral System for Women Victims of Violence (“Takamul”). That document sets forth principles that, taken as a whole, form the basis for a kind of national contract that clarifies the rights and obligations governing the relationship between providers of medical, social and police services on the one hand, and women victims of violence on the other. Service providers are prohibited from exploiting women victims in any way. They are forbidden from encouraging those women to become psychologically or emotionally attached to them, entering into any relationship with them outside of their professional relationship, or withholding service in order to pressure them for illicit purposes. Those service providers are also obligated to respect and value women victims of violence. They must honour those women's right to make their own decisions, must provide services without discrimination, and must keep all information confidential.

Responsibility for the acts of third parties

35. The Government is intent on adopting measures to protect women from attacks and discriminatory acts by individuals or private parties, and to ensure that they are compensated in such cases. For example, the Palestinian Government disburses monthly payments from its budget through the relevant agencies to the families of martyrs, injured persons and prisoners. That is in order to alleviate the impact of crimes perpetrated by the Israeli occupation. It is usually women who are the most affected by those crimes, notably when income is cut off because a family member or the breadwinner is killed, imprisoned or injured.

36. An Alimony Fund was set up by Law No. 6 (2005) in order to help marginalized families maintain their human dignity in cases where the husband or relatives fail to carry out their financial support obligations. That Fund pays regular monthly court-ordered alimony and any arrears to wives, women observing the prescribed post-divorce waiting period, children, parents and dependent relatives in cases where there is a problem collecting alimony from the legally responsible party because he is absent, his place of residence is unknown, he does not have sufficient funds to comply with the judgment, or for any other reason. Both residents and non-residents of the State of Palestine are eligible to benefit from the Fund. All Palestinian women are entitled to benefit from the Fund regardless of their husband's nationality or religion, or their own place of residence. That includes Palestinian women who live in the State of Palestine, who stayed inside the Green Line after the 1948 Nakba, or who live abroad. Foreign women residing in Palestine who married Palestinians are also eligible. Alimony is disbursed within 15 days from the date of the completion of the application and required legal procedures. There is an allocation for the Fund in the annual State budget.

37. The Labour Inspection Board, which was established by the Labour Law and is subsidiary to the Ministry of Labour, protects men and women workers in both the private and public sectors. That Board is responsible for monitoring workplaces, terms of employment and working conditions. It receives, follows up and investigates complaints from men and women workers. Any woman worker may inform the Board of any violation, act of discrimination or punitive measure taken against her by an employer. It is prohibited to discontinue or terminate a woman's — or man's — employment for submitting such a complaint. The Board has judicial police status. It has the right to conduct workplace inspections without advance notice and to ask employers or workers to turn over documents relating to working conditions. Penalties are imposed on an employer in accordance with the law where that employer is proven to have committed a violation, including an act of discrimination against women.

Punitive legislation

38. Laws previously in force granted exonerating or mitigating factors to a man murdering a woman in what is known as an "honour killing". That was applied in cases where a man catches his wife or one of his close female relatives in an adulterous situation with another person and kills, injures or harms both or one of them. It also applies where a man catches his wife or one of his ascendants, descendants or sisters in an illicit sexual situation with another man. (Article 340 of the Jordanian Penal Code (No. 16 of 1960), which is applicable in the West Bank, and article 18 of the Mandate-era Penal Code (No. 74 of 1936), which is applicable in the Gaza Strip).

39. Murders of women have been on the rise in recent years. Every time, the perpetrators use the pretext that they were driven to murder by an "offence against honour". In most cases, the legal system is lax about imposing penalties, a thorough investigation is not conducted, and the elements and conditions for exonerating factors are granted. In May 2011, Decree Law No. 7 repealed the exonerating and mitigating factors provisions for so-called honour killings. Unfortunately, that repeal has not stopped murderers of women from using other provisions, including the following: general provisions on exonerating and mitigating circumstances contained in penal codes; the provision for mitigating circumstances when a person commits a crime in a fit of rage (1960 Penal Code, article 98); waiver by relatives (the family of the woman victim) of their personal rights against the perpetrator; and other provisions on mitigating factors (articles 99 and 100). Any of those factors can ultimately result in a reduced sentence, either by law or at the judge's discretion, which tends to favour the perpetrator.

40. In the light of all these factors, and pursuant to Palestine's accession to the Convention, our President issued a decree law on 11 May 2014 that expressly excludes perpetrators of honour killings from the benefit of the mitigating factors provided for in article 98 concerning the commission of a crime in a fit of rage. While that decree law was a positive step towards eliminating discrimination against women in penal legislation, it did not abolish the other articles that are habitually invoked before a judge to reduce sentences — such as the one on waiver of personal rights against the perpetrator — and the other legal grounds that grant judges the discretion to hand down reduced sentences.

41. The proposed draft penal code would do away completely with exonerating factors in cases of honour killings of women, and would grant same right to the wife as the husband to claim mitigating factors if she kills or injures him or his partner after catching them in an adulterous or illicit sexual situation. However, widening the scope of mitigating factors to include the woman — as opposed to abolishing them altogether — violates the rights of the man or woman in question to life, personal and physical safety, and a fair trial, as well as the principle of proportionality between crime and punishment.

42. Legislation in force discriminates between men and women by providing for different penalties for the same crime, which is a breach of legal principles. For example, women are punished for an adulterous act by a prison term of between six months and two years, regardless of marital status. However, her adulterous male partner is punished by the same penalty if he is married, but only half as long if he is not married. The proposed draft Palestinian penal code does not discriminate between men and women with regard to the crime of adultery. It includes identical provisions for both with respect to both the elements of the crime and the sentence.

43. Penal legislation in force criminalizes rape and other coercive sexual acts committed against women, such as indecent assault, seduction, indecent fondling, abduction, proposing indecent acts or using indecent language. However, it does not impose deterrent penalties commensurate with the severity of the offences. The penalty for rape is a sentence of only five to seven years if the victim is under 15. If the victim is between the ages of 15 and 18, and the rapist is one of her legitimate or illegitimate ancestors, he is punished by a sentence of 3 to 15 years. In the event that a valid marriage is contracted between the rapist and the victim, the prosecution or the sentence, as the case may be, is suspended. That ends up being a double punishment for the victim, not to mention the psychological effect on the woman and the fact that it leaves the door to impunity wide open for the perpetrator. The Public Prosecutor has the right to resume prosecution or reimpose the sentence if the marriage ends in the victim being divorced for no legitimate reason within three years of a misdemeanour assault or five years of a felony assault. In addition, that legislation places coercion of a wife outside the scope of criminalization. In other words, it permits marital rape, which is among the worst types of domestic violence against women and yet another dimension of the violation of women's rights, the inviolability of their persons, and their dignity.

44. By contrast, the proposed draft penal code raises the penalty for rapists to 20 years, and life imprisonment if the victim was under 18 or unable to resist due to impairment or disability. The draft code also does not exempt a perpetrator from prosecution if he marries the victim. However, the draft's provisions still exclude marital rape from the scope of criminalization, except in cases of intercourse that goes against nature without the wife's consent. In such cases, the husband is penalized by imprisonment or a fine.

45. In general, the draft code expands the scope of criminalization of gender-based violence. It also strengthens the characterization of crimes against women and the penalties for perpetrators, including incest, indecent assault, indecent fondling, proposing acts contrary to public decency, seduction and corruption of marital bonds. For example, penal codes in force punish both parties involved in the crime of incest with imprisonment for 2 to 3 years, and treat it as a misdemeanour in all cases, with no consideration to whether one party had de jure or de facto control over the other. By contrast, the proposed draft code distinguishes between two varieties of that crime. The first is incest where one of the parties has sharia, legal or de facto control over the victim, in which case the former is punished by imprisonment for at least 7 years (with the act treated as a felony) and the latter by imprisonment for at least 3 years (with the act treated as a misdemeanour). The second case is where incest occurs without any relationship of control between the two parties, in which case both are imprisoned for at least 5 years (with the act of both treated as a felony).

46. The proposed draft penal code goes even further. It treats the commission of any crime against a woman as an aggravating factor in and of itself regardless of the sentence.

Challenges

47. Palestinian women suffer from a system that is discriminatory at every turn. The worst aspect is the colonial Israeli occupation and its major violations of international law in general and of international human rights law in particular. Those violations are committed by both the armed forces and the settlers who have infiltrated the West Bank, including Jerusalem, and surround the Gaza Strip. The consequences of those violations are felt directly by Palestinian women. There is scarcely a single Palestinian woman who has not been touched — directly or indirectly — by the crimes of the Israeli occupation. Those crimes include, inter alia: extrajudicial murder and execution; attacks on civilians, including prominent citizens; arbitrary arrest, including administrative detention; torture and inhumane abuse; settlement expansion; continued construction of the annexationist expansionist wall, and perpetuation of the racist regime that it exemplifies through military roadblocks, checkpoints, permits, identity papers, land appropriation and destruction of property; destruction and theft of crops; closures; ongoing crimes committed with impunity by terrorist settler militias; the illegal blockade of the Gaza Strip; continued military incursions into the Gaza Strip that destroy infrastructure and civilian homes and result in mass displacement; casualties suffered by women, families and children; and suspension of the right to health, education, work and numerous other necessities of life. The occupation forces also use excessive force. They invade and search homes and businesses. They destroy houses as part of collective punishment. They use various means to make life — or at least a decent life — difficult. They block the delivery of public services such as education and health, which has resulted in women being forced to give birth at checkpoints. They forcibly displace Palestinian Bedouin. They implement discriminatory policies and laws in East Jerusalem. They separate family members and prevent them from being reunited, using every means possible to break Palestinian families apart. We stress that the information and statistics in this report cannot do justice to the severity of the human suffering being undergone by Palestinian women and men a result of the Israeli occupation. Space constraints do not allow the report give a full picture of the effects of crimes committed by the Israeli occupation against Palestinian women. The relevant parties will continue to keep the Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women informed of those crimes.

48. On 15 January 2015, Rashida Manjoo, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on violence against women, was forced to cancel a scheduled visit to Palestine at the invitation of the State of Palestine because of obstruction by Israel, the occupying Power. The decision by the occupying forces to block her entry into Palestine was just one instance of Israel's systematic policy of preventing the State of Palestine from exercising rights and fulfilling obligations pursuant to its accession to international agreements, and depriving the Palestinian people of its rights in general, especially its right to self-determination. Prior to the most recent obstruction, other investigative commissions had been blocked from entering Palestine to investigate violations of international law committed since June 2014. Such obstruction violates the obligations of Israel as the occupying Power, and goes against the recommendations of the Human Rights Council that occupying powers should cooperate with special rapporteurs to improve the human rights situation on the ground.

49. Palestinian women also suffer from inherited customs and traditions that assign them subordinate status and focus on their reproductive role. Palestine has also inherited legislation that is prejudicial to certain women's rights, particularly as regards penal provisions and personal status.

50. Palestinian women are also paying the price of political divisions. The Hamas movement continues to put forward a series of illegitimate laws that are not in conformity with obligations under the Convention, but are enforced in the Gaza Strip.

51. Moreover, there are two different sets of inherited legislation in in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and the two have not been consolidated. The lack of consistency has a negative impact on the legal status of women. That is not to mention the fact that Palestinian women in Jerusalem are subject to racist Israeli law, which deprives them, of many of their political, civil, economic, social and cultural rights for no reason other than that they are Palestinian.

52. There is also the fact that the legal status of international agreements acceded to by Palestine, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, is not defined. Nor are there any constitutional procedures specifying the hierarchy of different types of legislation or regulating the incorporation of the provisions of international agreements into national legislation.

Progress achieved

Legislative amendments

53. Not much time has elapsed between Palestine's accession to the Convention and the writing of this first report. There have been only a few amendments to existing legislation. The most important was the decree law of May 2014 abolishing mitigating factors in crimes committed against women in a fit of rage in the name of "honour". Legislative development in Palestine, and in particular the work being done on draft laws to incorporate international human rights standards, including women's rights, demonstrates our national political will to eliminate legal and de facto discrimination against women and achieve gender equality.

54. A decree law on the protection of juveniles was issued in February 2016. It was informed by a new conception of juvenile justice in Palestine that takes into account an offender's age group, motivations and privacy. It provides for procedures that are in the best interests of juveniles, as well as for rehabilitation and speedy reintegration into society. That decree law is another example of efforts by Palestine to carry out its international obligations, in this case those arising from accession to the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child. The decree law's provisions are consistent with international standards for juvenile justice. It is mindful of the juvenile's best interests from the preliminary investigation stage through all the other stages of investigation and trial, and continuing through enforcement of the sentence. A completely separate criminal justice system has been introduced to handle juveniles and children at risk of delinquency. It includes special police units, a prosecutor's office, a court of first instance, an appeals department, a child protection office with child protection counsellors from the Ministry of Development, and child welfare units. Priority is given to prevention, education and rehabilitation. Penalties involving deprivation of liberty are used only as a last resort and for the shortest possible duration. Gender equality is ensured in the exercise of rights and guarantees to a fair trial.

55. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in partnership with the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and the Independent Commission for Human Rights, distributes to both official agencies and non-governmental bodies pamphlets containing the Palestinian Declaration of Independence, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the international human rights conventions to which the State of Palestine acceded in 2014, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. That helps to raise awareness of those agreements among government officials and members of society.

56. Also in partnership with OHCHR, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has implemented a training plan for employees of government agencies, the Independent Commission and civil society, to raise awareness of the major human rights conventions, the mechanism for preparing reports, and the roles of agencies responsible for international agreements.

57. Civil society organizations are playing a major role in raising awareness of women's rights and organizing assistance campaigns on gender equality issues. Women's organizations in particular function as an oversight mechanism for official agencies. Women are able to use those organizations as a means of approaching such agencies directly to defend their rights or to as a means of contacting the relevant authorities.

General measures and policies

58. Since the 1990s, the Government has embarked on a process of legislative reform, out of its commitment to human rights principles and its firm will to continue to promote women's rights. Those reforms have aimed not only to eliminate discriminatory legislative provisions, but also to ensure the enjoyment by women of their rights in practice in private and public life, despite the limited nature of natural and material resources at the local level and the continuing Israeli occupation, which seriously hinders any opportunities for sustainable development in occupied Palestine.

59. In terms of national planning, the Palestinian Government adopted the National Policy Agenda 2017-2022: Putting Citizens First. That agenda defines national strategic orientations; sets out the overarching vision, priorities and policies; and places the citizen at the centre of its activities. It contains sectoral and cross-sectoral strategies, and a medium-term budget for the 2017-2022 period that complement the national policy agenda as laid out in the fourth Palestinian National Development Plan. The various components of that National Development Plan are based upon international standards, including those contained in the international instruments to which the State of Palestine has committed itself, such as the United Nations 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, which the State of Palestine will be striving to implement during that period.

60. The national policy agenda is based upon three pillars, namely, the path to independence, reforming and improving the quality of services, and sustainable development. Specific national priorities and policies will be implemented to that end. Priority areas include strengthening gender equality, empowering women and girls, eliminating all forms of discrimination and violence against them, and eliminating all obstacles to their full participation in social and economic development and public life. In that connection, the 2017-2022 Cross-Sectoral National Gender Strategy: Promote Gender Equality and Equity, which has been ratified by the Council of Ministers, is organized around five strategic objectives, namely, halving the incidence of all forms of violence against Palestinian women; increasing women's participation in governmental and non-governmental decision-making positions that have the greatest impact on the lives of men and women so that no fewer than 10 per cent of those positions are filled by women; integrating gender equality and equity and the empowerment of women into official institutions; promoting women's participation in the economic sector; and improving the quality of life of poor and marginalized families.

61. In 1996, the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics starting taking gender into account and disaggregating data by sex in its published surveys. A gender-sensitive general census on population and establishments was formulated and conducted in 2007. The Central Bureau of Statistics also began work on a national plan to monitor the 2030 Sustainable Development Goal indicators.

62. In 2009, the Council of Ministers approved the formulation of gender-responsive plans and budgets, thereby requiring all government departments to draw up gender-sensitive annual budgets. The National Committee on Gender-Responsive Budgets was established in 2012 to direct the integration of gender into public budgets and train officials to adopt a gender perspective when preparing budgets.

63. International Women's Day, celebrated on 8 March, is a Palestinian national holiday. On that day, Palestinian women organize a number of events, including peaceful marches in protest of occupation crimes against Palestinian women and the Palestinian people. No sooner had these marches been inaugurated than occupation forces began to suppress them and attack women taking part with percussion bombs, tear gas and rubber bullets.

64. The Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act (1999) and its implementing regulations provide a legislative framework that governs the fundamental rights of men and women with disabilities on an equal footing in all areas of life. That Act charges the Ministry of Social Development, as the lead regulatory body in social protection sector, with primary responsibility for integrating persons with disabilities and attending to their needs. That Ministry, in coordination with the competent agencies, is committed to providing care and rehabilitation services to persons with disabilities, particularly in the social, educational, health, professional and recreational aspects of life. It also raises public awareness, provides suitable facilities and environments, and promotes the use of sign language.

65. The Supreme Council for Persons with Disabilities was reconfigured pursuant to a presidential decree adopted in 2012. That decree provided for following up the implementation by the State of Palestine of its obligations under the treaties on persons with disabilities to which it has acceded; improving government efforts to enable persons with disabilities to lead their lives with dignity; formulating the necessary strategies and policies; and proposing relevant legislative amendments.

66. Israeli occupation crimes against Palestinians have brought about a rapid rise in the number of persons with physical, mental, psychological and sensory disabilities. Those crimes include shooting and beating civilians; mistreating and denying medical care to the injured; torture and harsh treatment in the course of arbitrary arrests; and negligent medical treatment. Successive wars in the Gaza Strip have left thousands of Palestinians — men and women alike — with a variety of disabilities and lost limbs. Their suffering has been compounded by the blockade on the Gaza Strip, the prohibition on needed medical supplies, deteriorating humanitarian conditions and restrictions on travel to receive medical treatment.

67. With regard to the elderly, the Ministry of Social Development provides protection, care and rehabilitation services to elderly women and men under its National Strategy for the Care of the Elderly in Palestine 2010-2015, which informs the Ministry's structure, programmes and activities. It also offers social protection services (regular and emergency cash assistance, health insurance, welfare services, and rehabilitative and residential services) to some 45,000 elderly men and women. Established under the supervision of the Ministry of Social Affairs, the Grandparents' Home specializes in caring for and rehabilitating elderly persons aged 60 and older who are unable to care for themselves, lack family care and live in difficult economic conditions.

Temporary special measures

68. In order to facilitate women's access to decision-making positions and promote their right to political participation, Decree Law No. 1 (2007) concerning a general election quota system for women, and Law No. 10 (2005) concerning local council elections and its amendments were adopted as temporary special measures. The election of Palestinian Legislative Council members is based on a party-list proportional representation system.

69. Decree Law No. 1 (2007) stipulates that every electoral list shall include at least one woman candidate in the first three names on the list, the following four names, and every five names thereafter.

70. The law concerning local councils stipulates the following:

1. For local bodies with up to 13 seats, at least two of those seats must be held by women as follows:
 - (a) One woman candidate must be among the top five names;
 - (b) One woman candidate must be among the following five names.
2. On local bodies with more than 13 seats, one seat shall be set aside for a woman candidate from the five names following the group mentioned in article 1 (b) above.
3. Local bodies with fewer than 1,000 voters according to the final table of voters are exempt from the provisions of paragraph 1 above. In such cases, there shall be freedom on electoral lists to choose the positions to be set aside for women candidates.
4. If a woman vacates a seat on a local council, that seat shall be filled by the woman directly following her in the sequence of seats set aside for other women on her list.

71. In 2010, most of the political parties signed a charter pledging to promote Palestinian women's participation in political decision-making by ensuring that women held a minimum of 30 per cent of overall positions; increasing the number of decision-making positions held by women in political parties and organizations as well as the number of women on the electoral lists of local and legislative bodies; and nominating women for inclusion on electoral lists in order to increase their chances of success. However, some parties did not commit to enforcing that minimum level of participation.

72. Official efforts to create a legal environment conducive to women's participation in political life include the drafting in 2014 of a law on local council elections. The law raises the minimum proportion of representation of women in elections from 20 to 30 per cent, in line with international resolutions and Millennium Development Goal indicators. The Central Elections Commission was requested to take the appropriate steps to that end. Article 3 of the law stipulates that “women shall account for no fewer than 30 per cent of candidates and elected officials, and the Commission shall take measures to that end.”

73. The Government is working to integrate the concept of gender into legislative and development plans and to allocate the necessary national resources, as outlined below:

- In the Palestinian Development Plan for the years 2014 to 2016, the Government allocated $9 million to finalize the legislative review process and to ensure that women’s rights were taken into consideration and that discriminatory provisions were abrogated in order to ensure compliance with international agreements. Funds were also allocated to carry out capacity-building programmes on gender and studies on gender gaps; provide women with services, protect them from violence and guarantee their recourse to justice; and raise societal awareness of the need to oppose violence against women. A portion of the resources will be spent in support of the process of formulating gender-responsive policies and budgets.
- The allocation for the Ministry of Women’s Affairs from the regular annual budget is being increased annually are part of a broader effort to empower women and achieve gender equality, particularly after the accession by the State of Palestine to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. The Ministry’s budget in 2007 totalled $1,079,254; that amount rose to $2,253,576 and $1,861,672 in 2015 and 2016, respectively.
- Budget allocations have been made for the work of gender units and ministries whose work relates to women and women’s empowerment at various levels.

Protection of motherhood

74. Article 29 of the Basic Law provides for the highest level of legal protection of maternity as a national duty. The recognition of motherhood as a social function is a principle that underpins civil service laws and the work of women civil servants and workers, affording them specific social protection and rights, such as paid maternity leave and paid breastfeeding breaks.

75. In addition, integrating reproductive health services, prenatal care and family planning into primary healthcare centres throughout Palestine and operating under the auspices of the Ministry of Health amounts to a form of positive discrimination in favour of women.

76. Law No. 6 (1998) on correction and rehabilitation centres provides for measures to protect mothers who are inmates in those facilities. Article 27 stipulates that pregnant inmates are to receive special treatment from the onset of the first signs of pregnancy until sixty days after childbirth in terms of meal and sleep times and work. Medical care and attention shall be provided as recommended by a doctor, and the necessary measures shall be taken to ensure that the pregnant inmate is able to give birth in hospital. The law also protects the privacy of the woman inmate and her child. Article 28 stipulates that if the inmate gives birth to her child in the facility, that fact shall not be noted in official records or on the birth certificate. Rather, the hospital shall be considered the place of birth, the child shall remain in the mother’s care until the age of two, and the director shall offer the nursing mother a place separate from the other inmates.

Stereotypical roles of women

77. The prevailing social and cultural patterns in Palestine are among the main obstacles preventing women from exercising their rights on an equal basis with men. As in all patriarchal cultures, those patterns play a crucial role in the consolidation of prejudices and practices that promote women's inferior, secondary standing and restrict their role to the private, family sphere. More often than not, mothers are responsible for caring for the family and raising children, and their role remains intangible and unremunerated.

Stereotypical roles of women in the public and private spheres

- In the home: Palestinian descriptive studies show that the roles that women are traditionally expected to perform usually involve obedience, care, running the household and getting things done, whereas men are typically associated with headship of the household and decision-making. These values tend to carry over into the areas of parenting and family education, where they are transmitted and taught to children from an early age within the family, with girls taking on roles resembling those of their mothers, especially with regard to educating and caring for their siblings and taking on household chores. In contrast, boys are prepared from an early age to bear the burden of securing the family livelihood and taking financial and life decisions.
- At school: Despite the recent development of Palestinian educational curricula and the relative evolution of perspectives on women, women rarely emerge as leaders or decision-makers and are seldom entrusted with managerial or business matters.
- At work: Duties that require leadership skills or physical effort are typically assigned to men, while those that are considered women's work first and foremost, such as caretaking, social communication, childrearing, education, health, media, tourism and management are typically assigned to women.
- In the media: Local media devote space to discussion of women's affairs, but most discussion focuses on such aspects of the traditional role of women as cooking, health, the family, children and fashion. Most media attention is granted to specific categories of women, namely, women who work in elite and professional positions, instead of on the most vulnerable women, such as rural women, women in refugee camps and women in Bedouin villages. Although there has been a significant increase in women's involvement in the media sector, particularly in visual media, that quantitative increase has more to do with media-related variables and requirements than with a fundamental change in the status of women. In terms of content, women essentially continue to be used as advertising material or seen as consumers.

Challenges

79. Most discriminatory practices that target women as women are so entrenched in social traditions and customs that they are invisible. The fact that such practices appear instinctive and natural complicates the process of exposing and identifying them as discriminatory and working to alter and eliminate them. Counter-efforts to reinforce stereotypical, traditional roles and entrench a culture of women's subordination take various forms. They include calls to hold on to certain interpretations of religious teachings and reject demands to eliminate discrimination against women as Western cultural imports that violate customs and traditions. Moreover, attempts are made to downplay the importance of and postpone achieving justice for women, dismissing it as not an immediate priority given the need to join forces to end the Israeli occupation and gain independence of the State of Palestine.

Violence against women

80. Palestinian women are doubly vulnerable to violence amidst the ongoing Israeli occupation, which threatens their security from a humanitarian standpoint and adds an additional layer of restrictions on the exercise of their fundamental rights. The results of a 2011 survey on violence in Palestinian society showed that roughly half of Palestinian families were directly exposed to violence perpetrated by occupation forces and terrorist settler militias during the period leading up to July 2011. The highest incidence of such violence was found in the Gaza Strip, where 49.1 per cent of families were victims of violence, compared to 47.8 per cent of West Bank families.

81. The occupation contributes to the rise in violence against women and helps to consolidate the concept of patriarchal control over women. It also has an impact on the frequency of domestic violence, in particular, family violence. The forms of family violence perpetrated against women in Palestinian society include physical abuse committed by their husbands, their husbands' families or their families; death threats; rape committed by a member of a woman's family or that of her husband; forced flight from the family as a result of physical, sexual or verbal violence or neglect; and distribution of social roles within the family in a preferential manner that favours men.

82. The statistical survey cited above indicates that 37 per cent of women who had been married previously had had some form of violence inflicted on them by their husbands; 29.9 per cent in the West Bank and 51 per cent in the Gaza Strip. Of those women, the percentage subjected to psychological violence "on at least one occasion" was 57.6 per cent, while 55.1 per cent had been targets of economic violence, 54.8 per cent had been subjected to social violence, 23.5 per cent had been targets of physical violence, and 11.8 per cent had been subjected to sexual violence. Meanwhile, the percentage of women committing violent acts against their husbands rose to 17.3 per cent in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip; 35.1 per cent of those husbands were exposed to psychological violence, 20.3 per cent to physical violence, 4.5 per cent to social violence and 4.9 per cent to economic violence at the hands of their wives.

83. The survey indicated that 16.1 per cent of unmarried women between the ages of 18 and 64 had been exposed to violence perpetrated by family members: 12.4 per cent in the West Bank and 21.8 in the Gaza Strip.

84. According to 2014 statistics, 25 Palestinian women were murdered. In some cases, the perpetrators used the pretext that they were driven to murder by an offence against honour, while the reasons surrounding other murders were unclear and recorded as unknown. Of those women, 14 were from the West Bank and 11 were from the Gaza Strip. Without a doubt, the so-called honour killings of women continue as a result of the almost total immunity granted to offenders by the law, the judiciary and the fact that offenders receive the lightest punishments. The penalty imposed on perpetrators of honour killings rarely exceeds a three-year prison term and has sometimes been reduced to a term of a year or six months. Studies have shown that in most cases, the real reason for these crimes is not the woman's behaviour, which the offender cites as a pretext, but rather family disputes, the husband's violence, theft or suicide motivated by molestation by one of her relatives. It is possible that the main women are murdered has to do with their shares of an inheritance.

85. In April 2014, the Council of Ministers adopted a decision on temporarily placing children, girls and boys, in two-spouse foster families, if those children were found to be in danger of falling prey to violence or exploitation in their families of origin. The Ministry of Social Development investigates the family that requests to care for the child in order to confirm that it complies with the requirements in place to meet the child's needs. The Ministry may place the child in a woman's care if she meets those requirements. The Ministry is supposed to visit on a regular basis to monitor how the child is faring in the foster family, and to move him or her to a different foster family if need be.

86. In 2008, family protection units were established within the Civil Police to address cases of family violence and sex crimes committed within or outside the family. In 2014, the Family Protection Unit in the West Bank dealt with 3,480 cases and took the necessary legal measures to provide protection to victims of violence and refer them to the competent courts.

87. In the Gaza Strip, in the continued absence of family protection units, the police field complaints submitted by women victims of violence and help to resolve some minor conflicts, with the assistance of reconciliation committees. In 2014, police in the Gaza Strip received some 50 complaints from women monthly. The number of complaints rose after the most recent hostilities in the Gaza Strip. Some 80 per cent of them were attributed to family and spousal disputes. The police resolved approximately 60 per cent of those cases. In 2014 only about 5 per cent of complaints were forwarded to the prosecutor's office. As has been explained above, cases of violence against women tend to be dealt with in a manner informed by customary and societal perceptions of violence against women as an intra-familial dispute, rather than a crime for which perpetrators must be held accountable and punished. Furthermore, there is no referral system for women victims of violence to various sectors as is the case in the West Bank.

88. The Public Prosecutor's Office is responsible for initiating and investigating cases, instituting criminal proceedings, prosecuting them before the courts and monitoring enforcement of sentences. The work of the Public Prosecutor's Office to strengthen protection for women victims of violence has been in evidence since 2012, when the gender unit in the Attorney General's office. That unit's strategies include the following:

89. Specialized services for women victims of violence are being developed, with a view to strengthening their protection and ensuring that offenders are held accountable. In 2014, 15 deputy prosecutors were appointed. Their areas of competence are investigating and bringing to court cases of family violence and violence against women and children. Gender was integrated into the work of the Public Prosecutor, including the adoption of annual plans of action to that end. In addition, steps were taken to ensure that the facilities in the Public Prosecutor's office complied with specific standards in order to meet the needs of women visiting the office, especially when they have their children with them, thereby preserving their dignity and promoting the principle of confidential handling of their cases. Efforts are underway to develop a database on cases of violence against women and children brought before the Public Prosecutor, with care taken to preserve confidentiality.

90. The Ministry of Women's Affairs adopted a Strategic Plan for Combating Violence against Women: 2011-2019. That plan aims to strengthen mechanisms in place to protect and empower women victims of occupation-related violations; to bolster the legal and institutional framework for the protection of women from violence; to develop administrative procedures and codes of conduct that define roles and how various actors are to deal with women victims of violence; to improve social protection and medical services provided to women victims of violence; to rehabilitate survivors of violence and reintegrate them into society; and to improve the protection, defence, judicial and legal system in that regard. The National Committee to Combat Violence against Women was established to carry out and follow up on the plan, and a technical committee was set up to review serious cases of femicide and protect women from violence. The Committee on Legislation for Gender Equity is competent to review existing legislation relating to violence against women and submit recommendations for amending it and adopting new legislation. The Ministry of Social Development has also mandated that women victims of violence should be admitted to its relief and development programmes as exceptional, urgent cases.

91. The Ministry of Social Development also meets with women victims of violence, provides them with social, legal and psychological counselling services free of charge and refers them to centres that provide protection and shelter to women victims of violence, either under Ministry supervision or not, if need be. These centres, in turn, provide the women with the necessary overnight accommodation, shelter, protection, rehabilitation and counselling.

92. In the West Bank, there are four protection centres providing such services, spread out geographically so that they are accessible to women from all governorates. The centres are as follows: the Mehwar Centre, the Girls' Welfare Home, the Safe House and the Women's Emergency Protection Home. There are two such centres in the Gaza Strip, the Safe House for women's care and the Hayat Centre for the protection of women. Only one of them provides shelter, which makes it impossible to handle every case in which a woman might request protection.

93. The Ministry of Social Development is incorporating the issues facing women victims of violence into relief and development programmes as exceptional, urgent matters. The Ministry runs programmes in conjunction with non-governmental organizations to foster a culture of opposition to violence against women and works to integrate programmes, activities and services for women victims of violence.

94. Non-governmental organizations are also making every effort to spread cultural awareness of and provide training on the need to oppose violence against women. They have published and distributed a host of pamphlets, publications and reports on the subject and organized campaigns in favour of women's rights and against violence. Those organizations also provide women victims of violence with psychological support, legal and social guidance and rehabilitation, in addition to placing a media spotlight on the issue and its impact on Palestinian society.

Progress achieved

95. In February 2016, a special prosecutor's office was established to protect families from violence and to strengthen the role of the Public Prosecutor's Office in protecting women victims of violence and acting as a deterrent. That office is headed by a woman chief prosecutor, and 15 deputy prosecutors have been appointed to prosecute family violence in the country's northern governorates. The office is competent to investigate, prosecute, plead, appeal and follow up on the execution of sentences for offences committed within the family by any of its members, including offences committed against women, children, the elderly and persons with disabilities; offences committed against women and children outside the family; sexual offences committed by women; and threats made against women using telecommunications technologies and electronic means of communication. Representatives of this prosecutor's office conduct regular visits to rehabilitation centres to monitor the conditions in which women detainees are kept.

In early 2015, work resumed on a 2015 draft decree law concerning protection of the family from violence. Its provisions are being reviewed with reference to international women's rights principles, particularly those relating to the protection of women from violence. The draft defines violence against the family as any act that inflicts material or psychological harm, including sexual or economic abuse or exploitation; forced labour; preventing a person from or forcing a person to work; exerting control over a person's earnings, possessions or inheritance rights; or threatening to commit such acts, whether the act or threat to commit the act occurred within or outside the family. The family is understood to include individual family members with blood or marriage ties to the fourth degree of consanguinity, or the equivalent thereto, and every person related by ties arising from marriage. The draft identifies a number mechanisms to guarantee victims of violence, particularly women, access to effective means of recourse to justice, prevention, protection, rehabilitation, punishment of offenders and prevention of impunity. Those mechanisms include the following:

- Special police units, prosecutor's offices and a court have been set up to address family violence cases.
- All forms of family violence set out in the definition have been criminalized and the penalties prescribed are specified and tightened.
- Victims of family violence are exempted from all legal fees and the costs of medical examinations.
- Any person has standing to file a complaint concerning such offences against any person whatsoever, regardless of his or her relationship with the victim or the family.
- Waiver of personal right is discounted in many cases.
- The protection counsellors from the Ministry of Social Development, the police family protection unit, the family violence prosecutor and the competent court have all been granted the authority to issue protection and restraining orders, either on their own initiative or at the request of the victim.

96. The National Referral System for Women Victims of Violence ("Takamul") is an effective integrated multisectoral support network for women and girl victims of gender-based violence. It can refer them to other relevant institutions and provide them with protection, care and rehabilitation. The system operates on the basis of three protocols. The first protocol relates to addressing the needs of women victims of violence in the health sector, and defines the obligations of medical service providers. The second protocol relates to addressing the needs of women victims of violence in the social sector. It outlines the obligations of social service providers to women victims of violence who request assistance in to regain control of their lives. Those obligations include the provision of protection, care and social, psychological and legal rehabilitation, as well as services aimed at promoting personal and economic empowerment. The third protocol relates to addressing the needs of women victims of violence in the police sector. It sets out the responsibilities of family protection unit staff within the Palestinian police in providing protection services to women victims of violence. It also outlines intervention and referral procedures and mechanisms for making women victims aware of the legal measures available to them to protect themselves and safeguard their right to take the appropriate decision for themselves. The system also includes a form for documenting cases of violence and a guide to institutions that provide services to women victims of violence. The Ministry of Women's Affairs is developing a system of procedures for all entities involved in the referral system.

97. A number of training sessions for service providers were organized, with the aim of situating the National Referral System for Women Victims of Violence within the framework of the various services provided by health, police and social institutions. Service providers were also instructed on how to make use of the system's mechanisms when performing their duties. Several training sessions were also held to familiarize judges, legislators, staff of the Public Prosecutor's office and Palestinian civilian police officers with the Referral System's procedures and improve follow-up mechanisms to promote women's rights and combat violence against women.

98. As of January 2017, women victims of violence have been exempted from fees in all Government-run hospitals pursuant to a decision adopted by the Ministry of Health and in line with the Palestinian Government's overall policy of supporting and empowering women. In addition, the Ministry of Health has adopted a number of measures to expedite all procedures involving women and follow up on health, psychological and legal issues related to women's health and safety.

Combating trafficking and exploitation of women

99. Under penal legislation in force, prostitution is an illegal act. Inciting, coercing, practicing or abetting prostitution, or living off the proceeds thereof, is penalized in legal codes under the heading of incitement to debauchery and putting public morals and decency at risk. Those provisions penalize anyone who induces or attempts to induce a woman under the age of 20 to engage in prostitution in Palestine or abroad, or any person under the age of 15 to engage in sodomy, with imprisonment for 1 month to 3 years. The penalty of imprisonment for 2 years is imposed on any person, male or female, who knowingly lives off the earnings of any woman engaging in prostitution.

100. That legislation prohibits the opening of brothels. Preparing, renting or acquiring any location to be used for prostitution, or contributing to the use of such location for the purposes of prostitution on a regular basis, is punishable by imprisonment of up to six months. Those laws also penalize trafficking in women. Forcing a woman to stay against her will in any location in order to engage in prostitution, or in a brothel, is punishable by up to two years in prison. Using threats, terror, deception or drugs to induce or attempt to induce a female to engage in illicit sexual intercourse in Palestine or abroad is punishable by up to 3 years in prison.

101. Palestine has no laws on child prostitution. However, sexually assaulting a child is severely punished. Legislation in force penalizes anyone who marries or conducts a marriage ceremony for a girl under 15 years of age, or abets the conduct of such a marriage ceremony, with imprisonment of up to 2 years.

102. Palestine's commitment to strengthening and protecting human rights in general, and the rights of women in particular, is reflected by the increased penalties for the above-mentioned crimes against women proposed in the draft penal code. The draft devotes a full chapter to crimes against human dignity, which include the crime of human trafficking, especially the trafficking of women, which is punishable by a sentence of up to life imprisonment depending on the circumstances and a fine of up to $60,000 or the equivalent of the proceeds, whichever is higher. The penalty is even more severe in the following cases: if the perpetrator established an organized criminal group; if threats or physical harm were used to commit the act; if the perpetrator was related to or in a power relationship with the victim; if the perpetrator was a public official; if the crime resulted in the victim's death, disability or disease; or if the victim was impaired or disabled.

103. Decree Law No. 9 (2007) on combating money-laundering provides that funds obtained from the sexual exploitation of women and children are illicit and covered under the offence of money-laundering. The perpetrator is punished by up to 15 years imprisonment and must pay large fines.

Difficulties

104. Detailed studies or statistics on trafficking in women in Palestine are lacking. The topic is a sensitive one in the Palestinian social context. However, research suggests that human trafficking is rare and not organized. In addition, the illegitimate hegemony of Israel, the occupying power, over the territory and borders of Palestine, and the various ways that Israel undermines Palestinian geographical integrity, make national efforts to combat trafficking in women weak to the point of ineffectiveness. The occupying forces prevent the relevant Palestinian parties from moving between the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip in order to carry out their functions and reach women victims. There is also insufficient oversight by the occupation authorities of working conditions at facilities and workplaces that hire Palestinian workers — men and women — inside the Green Line and in the illegal settlements.

Progress achieved

105. In 2014, Palestine acceded to a number of relevant international conventions, including the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. Palestine is also a State party to the 1904 International Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic and the 1921 International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children.

106. The Minister of Labour issued a decision on domestic workers which regulates the nature, hours, tasks and employer obligations for domestic work. In particular, it requires that domestic workers should be treated with respect and granted decent working conditions and the right to privacy. Employers of domestic workers are obligated to pay cash salaries equivalent to the applicable minimum wage. The Ministry of Labour is responsible for overseeing domestic labour contracts, and has the authority to take the necessary measures and impose penalties on employers in violation.

107. The Palestinian Government's National Referral System for Women Victims of Violence ("Takamul"), which has been described above, provides protection for victims of human trafficking. The Ministry of Social Development, while not directly involved in assisting victims of trafficking and prostitution per se, provides services, counselling and cost-free shelters for women victims of violence and others. The proposed draft penal code does assign the Ministry of Social Development a specific role in caring for victims of human trafficking, with the necessary allocations to be earmarked in that Ministry's budget.

108. The sharia justice system has taken a number of measures to prevent women from being exploited for prostitution. Those measures include Circular No. 40/2004 which was issued to protect women from falling victim to sexual exploitation after marrying men residing abroad. In such cases, judges and marriage officiants must verify that the bride has given her consent without coercion and is over the age of 18. The groom must obtain a certificate of good conduct from the region where he resides, and the location where the couple will live after the wedding must be verified. The man must also certify that he has undergone the necessary medical exams prior to marriage and is free of communicable diseases, especially HIV/AIDS. Conclusion of a wedding contract without complying with these rules is subject to large fines.

Articles 7 and 8

Equal participation in public life

109. In 2014, Palestine acceded without reservations to the 1954 Convention on the Political Rights of Women. The preamble and articles 9 and 26 of the Amended Basic Law provide for full equality among all Palestinians in rights and obligations, including full political rights and the right to hold public office. Article 26 states that Palestinians have the right to participate in political life both as individuals and in groups; to form and join political parties; to form unions, associations, federations and popular organizations; to vote and run in elections for representatives elected through universal suffrage; to hold public office on the basis of equal opportunity; to hold private meeting without the police present; and to hold public meetings and gatherings within the confines of the law. The Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act provides for the right of such persons to form associations, organizations and federations to advocate for their needs.

110. Decree Law No. 1 (2007) on public elections provides for the right of women to stand for election on an equal footing with men without discrimination. The same provisions appear in Law No. 10 (2005) on local council elections. Those laws also guarantee the right of women to run for president, for the Palestinian Legislative Council and for local councils under the same conditions that apply to men. The laws have adopted a female quota as a temporary proactive measure — as called for in article 4 of the Convention — to ensure women's access to national and local decision-making positions.

111. The decree law on general elections also grants foreigners married to Palestinian women or men (with the exception of those bearing Israeli nationality) the right to vote in elections even if they do not have Palestinian identity papers at the time that they register to vote or cast their ballot.

112. Some 8 per cent of the members of the Palestinian National Council, that is, 56 out of 744 members, are women. That Council is the supreme body of the Palestine Liberation Organization, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, and functions as the Parliament of the State of Palestine. Some 10 out of 124 members of the Palestinian Central Council are women. The Central Council is the link between the Palestinian National Council and the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization. There is 1 woman out of 18 members of the Executive Committee, which is the highest executive authority of the Palestine Liberation Organization. She is the first woman to be elected to the Executive Committee since the founding of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

113. Palestinian women took part in the first Palestinian legislative and presidential elections in 1996. Although 49 per cent of registered voters were women, they were only 32 percent of actual voters, while 58 per cent were men. Those elections were conducted on the basis of a majority system, which naturally hindered the chances for women to be nominated and win seats in the Legislative Council. Only 28 women were nominated for the Legislative Council, as opposed to 676 men. Only 5 women won, as opposed to 83 men. There was one woman presidential nominee in those elections.

114. As the second legislative election approached in 2006, the Palestinian legislature was mindful of the gender gap in the first election. The 2005 election law established a mixed electoral system that combined the majority system with proportional representation. A female quota was also adopted. That law was subsequently replaced by Decree Law No. 1 (2007) concerning elections, which retained the female quota. The effects of the legislative changes were felt in most recent Legislative Council elections, in which women won 17 out of 132 seats. While women were still underrepresented, those numbers are cause for optimism about a change for the better in women's electoral prospects in general.

115. Data on local councils indicate that there were more female candidates in the 2012 elections than the elections conducted in 2004 and 2005. That is attributable to the proportional representation and quota system adopted by the 2005 local council elections law. Some 738 women won seats on local councils out of a total of 3505. Moreover, the proportion of women who voted was greater than in the previous election, as can be seen from the following table:

Women's participation in local council elections for the years 2004 -2005 and 2012-2013¹

	2004-2005	2012-2013
Percentage of women candidates	19.2	24.8
Percentage of women on voting rolls	48.7	47.8
Percentage of women council members	13.7	21
Percentage of ballots	47.8	42

116. For political parties, the number of women declines the higher we go in the party hierarchy. We rarely find women in the highest leadership circles, especially of the biggest parties on the Palestinian political scene. Their role within parties is generally limited to stereotypical community and humanitarian activities. The parties have no policies or mechanisms to promote women's participation. Law No. 15 (1955) concerning the right of citizens to form political parties, which is in force in the West Bank, has no provisions excluding or restricting women, or differentiating between them and men with respect to exercising such rights or taking part in party activities.

117. According to the latest statistics published in 2011, the levels of women's participation in Palestinian political parties were as follows:

- The Palestine Liberation Movement: Women accounted for 5 per cent of the membership of the Central Committee (a single member) and 9.2 per cent of the membership of Revolutionary Council.
- The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine: Women accounted for 20 per cent of the membership of leadership bodies and 15 per cent of overall party membership.
- The Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine: Women accounted for 20 per cent of the membership of leadership bodies and 25 per cent of overall party membership.
- The Democratic Palestinian Union: The Secretariat had one woman member, and women accounted for about 39 per cent of the membership of leadership bodies.
- The Palestinian People's Party: Women accounted for about 25-30 per cent of the membership of leadership bodies, and the same percentage of overall party membership.

¹ 2012-2013 election results are only for local council elections in the West Bank; no local elections were conducted in the Gaza Strip owing to the political schism.

- The Popular Struggle Front: Women accounted for 20 per cent of the membership of both leadership bodies and the party base.
- The Palestinian Arab Front: Women accounted for 20-25 per cent of the membership leadership bodies and about 50 per cent of the base.

Information on the female membership of Hamas and Islamic Jihad or the representation of women in the highest leadership levels of those two parties was not available.

118. In March 2015, the Palestine Liberation Organization Central Council issued a decision mandating full equality for women and an increase in their representation in that Organization and all other institutions of the State of Palestine to at least 30 per cent.

119. Women's participation in trade unions, trade councils, subcommittees and specialized committees remains low, with the exception of organizations — such as doctors' and lawyers' associations — that require membership and payment of annual dues as a condition for practicing the profession. Statistics from the Palestinian General Federation of Trade Unions for 2013 indicate that the percentage of women in labour unions was no more than 8.5 per cent. The Palestinian General Federation of Trade Unions has set up a women's division within its organizational structure to promote and expand women's participation in the union movement.

120. One of the most important reasons for the low percentage of women in unions, especially in leadership posts, is that the unions are politicized, with parties controlling their operation and structure. The political rivalries within unions are a microcosm of the legislative elections, with the same dynamics that prevent women from enjoying the same opportunities as men.

121. Recent years have seen an increase in the number of women in public posts at government ministries and agencies. In 2010, 37 per cent of public sector employees were women while 63 per cent were men, whereas in 2015, 42.6 per cent were women while 57.4 per cent were men. As of 2014, women occupied 46 per cent of public posts designated for persons with disabilities, while men occupied 54 per cent.

Women and men working in the public sector by region, 2015

122. There are four women ministers — at the Ministry of the National Economy, the Ministry of Women's Affairs, the Ministry of Tourism and Antiquities and the Environment Quality Authority. That is out of the 24 ministers make up the 2014

Government of National Accord after recent adjustments. The head of the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, who has the rank of minister, is also a woman.

123. Even though legislation does not discriminate between men and women with respect to public posts, the proportion of women holding such posts tends to down as one goes higher in the administrative hierarchy. That is especially the case for the highest posts. In 2015, only 11.7 per cent of public sector employees at the director-general (A4) grade and up were women, while 88.3 per cent were men.

124. The judiciary has seen relative progress in the number of women judges in both sharia and government courts, and of women notaries. The percentage of women judges was 11.7 per cent in 2008, but that had risen to 16.7 per cent as of 2014. There are more women judges in the magistrate courts and the courts of first instance than in the higher courts. There is one woman judge on the Supreme Court in the West Bank, and two on the Supreme Court in the Gaza Strip. Despite an increase in the percentage of women in the judiciary, the system overall has been remiss about encouraging women and giving them opportunities to occupy decision-making posts.

125. Legislation in force contains no discriminatory provisions with respect to a woman's right to serve as a sharia judge, and there are three women judges in the Palestinian sharia courts. The year 2015 also saw the appointment of the first two women marriage officiants in Palestine. They have all the same authorities to conclude marriages contracts as male marriage officiants.

126. The Office of the Public Prosecutor has seen an increase in the proportion of women employees relative to other sectors. That is especially the case in the West bank, where, in 2013, about 16.4 per cent of prosecutors were women, while 83.6 per cent were men. In 2008, those percentages were 5 per cent women and 95 per cent men.

127. In 2014, there were 306 female Palestinian police officers and 7660 male police officers, or about 4 per cent. Although that was an increase from 2011, when there were only 256 female police officers, the number still falls short of hoped-for levels.

128. Some 20.9 per cent of practicing lawyers are women. However, the gap with respect to female lawyers between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip has increased. As of 2014, some 24.5 percent of lawyers in the West Bank were women, but only 18.2 per cent of lawyers in the Gaza Strip were women.

129. Palestinian women have the right to represent the Palestinian Government at the international level and to be involved in the work of international organizations on an equal footing with men, on the basis of the equality granted to women in the Palestinian Basic Law. There were 66 Palestinian women among the 366 members of the negotiating team at the 1996 Madrid Conference.

130. There has recently been a notable increase in the number of women entering the diplomatic and consular corps, and international work in general. As of 2013, some 28 per cent of the staff of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs were women. Some 4 per cent of diplomats were women. There were 44 women working in embassies and missions of the State of Palestine. There were two female ambassadors at the headquarters of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Palestine, and four female ambassadors stationed abroad. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs organizes training programmes on diplomatic work that target women as well as men. It encourages women to join the diplomatic corps and become involved in international organizations.

131. Women account for 42 per cent of employees in the civil sector, which is close to double their share of the labour market overall. That is probably owing to the nature of work in that sector, which is largely involved in addressing the needs of society. Statistics for the year 2011 show that women accounted for 26.8 per cent of student council members at Palestinian universities.

132. In the wake of the adoption of Security Council resolution 1325 (2000) on women, peace and security, Presidential Decree No. 24 (2005) committed the Government to supporting full and equal participation by Palestinian women in all efforts to maintain and enhance peace and security, and to increase their participation in United Nations good offices efforts and negotiations towards a genuine, just and lasting peace that resolves the issues stemming from the Israeli occupation. In 2012, the Cabinet approved the formation of a Higher National Committee for the Implementation of Security Council Resolution 1325 (2000). That Committee is trying to draw up mechanisms for implementing that resolution, which contributes to the protection of women in armed conflict and areas under occupation and directly affects Palestinian women and girls under Israeli occupation. That Committee's membership includes the Ministry of Women's Affairs (as chair), the other relevant ministries and government agencies, and civil society organizations.

133. In 2014, the Committee approved a strategic national framework for resolution 1325 (2000) that aims to provide security and protection for Palestinian women and girls against the crimes of the Israeli occupation. In August 2016, the Committee approved the National Action Plan for the Implementation of Security Council Resolution 1325 (2000), which set forth a strategic national framework for achieving three strategic objectives during the initial 2017-2019 period. The objectives were as follows: increase protection for Palestinian women and girls in the face of violations by the Israeli occupation; hold the Israeli occupation accountable, end the impunity it enjoys, and force it to make reparations through international and national mechanisms for the harm it has inflicted on Palestinian women and girls; and increase the representation of Palestinian women in decision-making processes at the local and international levels.

Challenges

134. Despite legislation adopting a number of proactive temporary measures to accelerate de facto gender equality and guarantee that women are represented in public life, women's participation falls short of minimum international standards. That is especially the case for trade unions and federations. The primary obstacle to women enjoying their rights, and in particular their political rights, is a heritage of customs and traditions based on a patriarchal mindset. Other obstacles include the following:

- Inconsistencies in electoral politics in Palestine at the local, union, party and federal levels;
- Low levels of community awareness about women's roles, especially in political life;
- Failure to use competence and professionalism as criteria in accepting and choosing candidates in political campaigns, especially in elections;
- The inability of most women to bear the expense of running for election, and lack of interest in women candidates on the part of financiers;
- Failure to give women confidence and their right to advancement, and lack of solidarity among women themselves.

135. Various government agencies and non-governmental organizations, especially women's organizations, have taken measures to address these obstacles. Those measures include training courses and workshops targeting women of all classes, and the distribution of pamphlets to increase the awareness of the community and in particular of women about their rights, status and potential to play an important role in political life.

Palestinian women prisoners held in Israeli occupation prisons, and the families of detainees

136. Palestinian women prisoners are an important part of the liberation movement and the national struggle for an end to the Israeli occupation and Palestinian independence, and the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination. Since 1967, Israel, the occupying Power, has arrested about a million Palestinians, or around 22 per cent of the population. The occupation makes use of legislation, military orders and arbitrary measures that openly violate international principles, especially those prohibiting arbitrary detention. About 10,000 of those prisoners have been women, and 68 of them remain imprisoned to date, that is to say, as of May 2016. Those women are being held illegally in occupation prisons that, with one exception, are located outside of the Occupied Palestinian Territory, and which do not meet the minimum standards for gender equality, not to mention basic humanity.

137. The Israeli occupation forces are intent on infringing on Palestinian political life in every way possible, and illegally suppressing citizens and their political leaders. Those forces have arrested 16 members of the Palestinian Legislative Council, including one woman, Khalidah Jarrar, who was sentenced by an Israeli court in December 2015 to 15 months, suspended for a five year period, and the equivalent of a $2800 fine.

138. Palestinian women can be arrested at any time and place. Usually, they are bound with plastic handcuffs and blindfolds. That applies during interrogations, at police stations and prisons, and when being transported in buses. Throughout the process, they are subjected to all manner of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment by the occupying forces. That includes both physical and psychological violence. They are beaten, kicked, slapped in the face, verbally threatened and mentally abused. There are also flagrant sexual assaults against women, in the form of threats or rape directed against them or a female family member. Women are also subjected throughout their incarceration to illegal strip searches conducted by soldiers or members of the occupation prison authority, often as a form of punishment. Such searches involve women being stripped of most of their clothes, and in some cases of their underclothes as well, which is severely traumatic for the female prisoners.

139. During imprisonment, and especially during the interrogation stage, various means are used to weaken Palestinian female prisoners and apply psychological pressure. They are threatened with death or the arrest of their families, husbands and parents. They are deprived of sleep and not allowed to see a lawyer for up to a month. They are deprived of their right to communicate with their families, even just to inform them that they have been arrested or are being moved from one interrogation centre or prison to another.

140. Female Palestinian prisoners are not allowed to visit with their families in occupation prisons, or even call them to comfort them or be comforted by them. That direct violation of the rights of female prisoners and their families amounts to collective punishment. The Israeli authorities arbitrarily control family visits through a racist system that requires special permits and security procedures to enter

Israel, which is where the prisons are located. That allows them to prevent hundreds of families from visiting, either on security pretexts or no pretext at all. The occupation authorities often cancel family visits or arbitrarily cut them short. Many female prisoners are barred from visiting with their families at all.

141. The Israeli prison authorities also deny the right of female Palestinian prisoners to education, reading, and recreational or mental activities. Although Palestinian prisoners gained the right to sit for high school exams in 2014 — after having been denied it for five years — Israeli forces are still not allowing university correspondence courses for the fifth straight year. They have also increased limitations on bringing in books and newspapers.

142. Like any other Palestinians, Palestinian women are subject to arbitrary administrative detention by the Israeli occupation forces. Some Palestinian women prisoners are currently being held in occupation prisons under arbitrary administrative detention orders. That is to say, they were arrested without any charges or trial, on the basis of secret files and secret evidence that neither the prisoner nor her attorney is allowed to see. Illegal Israeli military orders allow administrative arrests to be extended and renewed an unlimited number of times.

143. Even where the arbitrary arrest policies and other practices are not inflicted on Palestinian women directly, women are affected. Around one fifth of Palestinians living in occupied Palestine have been arrested at some point in their lives. That means around 40 per cent of all males. In most cases, that leaves Palestinian women to bear the burden of supporting and raising children after their fathers or brothers have been arrested. That is not to mention the psychological suffering that comes with the arrest of a family member. As the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Palestinian territories occupied since 1967 stated in his 2013 report: “Israel’s detention regime, in particular, seems designed to disrupt Palestinian society, producing an atmosphere of arbitrariness, instability and powerlessness”.

144. According to a 2011 study prepared by the Treatment and Rehabilitation Center for Victims of Torture, some 70 per cent of the families of Palestinian detainees and prisoners lost their source of income because the person detained was the family’s sole breadwinner. Some 50 per cent of those families of prisoners suffer from extremely difficult economic conditions. Some 88.8 per cent became dependent on the monthly stipends allocated by the Palestinian Government to the families of prisoners, which are paid from the moment of incarceration.

145. In an attempt to alleviate the impact of the crimes of the occupation and restore dignity to the prisoners, the State of Palestine enacted the Prisoners and Ex-prisoners Act (No. 19, 2004), as amended. That law provides for all the legal needs of male and female prisoners during their incarceration. It provides for a full or partial waiver of fees for primary school, university education, health insurance and rehabilitation programmes for male and female prisoners, their spouses and their children. The State also tries to secure jobs for released prisoners — male and female — and give them priority in annual hiring in State institutions. The disbursal system for stipends, bonuses and compensation for prisoners in occupation prisons treats male and female prisoners equally.

Equal citizenship

146. The ability to exercise rights deriving from Palestinian citizenship is contingent on ending the occupation. Article 7 of the Amended Basic Law stipulates that Palestinian nationality is to be regulated by law. As long as that Basic Law remains provisional — as explained in the common core document — Palestinian citizenship continues to be governed by a patchwork of legislation that includes the following: the Personal Status Act (1999); military orders issued by the occupation authorities; certain provisions of Palestinian citizenship decrees issued in 1925 under the British Mandate; the Jordanian Citizenship Act (1954), as amended; certain circulars recently issued by the Palestinian Ministry of the Interior (which concern Palestinian women living in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip or who have the right to reside there); and racist Israeli laws on women residing in East Jerusalem.

Palestinian women living in the occupied State of Palestine, excluding East Jerusalem

147. Under the aforementioned laws, such women enjoy the same rights as men to acquire, retain or change right of residence regardless of their marital status. Ministry of the Interior Circular No. 42 (2010), which takes precedence over any legislation to the contrary, affirms those rights. Females born in occupied Palestine have the right of residence if one or both of her parents are Palestinians, as do males born there. Any person born abroad to Palestinian parents who have the right to reside in occupied Palestine also has the right of residence if that individual returns to Palestine before the legal age of majority. A female Palestinian retains that right even if she marries a non-Palestinian. Her children also have the right to a Palestinian passport, the right of residence and the right to a Palestinian identity card before they reach 16 years of age, as is also the case with a Palestinian man married to a non-Palestinian woman.

148. Article 12 of the third revised draft of the constitution of the State of Palestine stipulates that Palestinian nationality and the attendant rights, including the right of return for those who left Palestine before 15 May 1948, is transferred from both mothers and fathers to their children.

149. Although Palestinian women in some parts of occupied Palestine enjoy that right on an equal footing with men, Israel, the occupying Power, continues to deprive all other Palestinian women of that right and its consequent benefits and effects, because some of them are subject to racist and discriminatory Israeli laws, preventing millions of women from returning to their home country. Those women include the following:

Palestinian women living in occupied East Jerusalem

150. Palestinian men and women in East Jerusalem hold permanent residence cards issued by the Israeli Ministry of the Interior that entitle them to some piecemeal rights but impose countless obstacles on them with respect to acquiring, retaining or changing their status or passing it on to spouses and children. In 1967, immediately after the illegal occupation of Jerusalem, the occupation authorities decided to annex that city illegally to Israel and impose Israeli law. The annexation and application of Israeli law to the occupied city was a tool to reinforce discrimination against the Palestinians of Jerusalem and to break apart even more Palestinian families. The laws applied by the occupation authorities are characterized by a racist double standard with respect to Palestinians. Jews are treated in accordance with laws that expanded the definition of “Jew” in the 1970s to include children, grandchildren and relatives. It grants Jews the right to immigrate to Israel and automatically acquire citizenship upon arrival. That allows any Jew to acquire Israeli citizenship and residence, while the racist provisions of the Nationality Act (1952) and its 1974 regulations apply to all non-Jews, namely the Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem, who are considered permanent residents.

151. Unlike citizens, permanent residents must show proof — again and again over the course of their lives — of their “centre of life”, that is, proof that they reside in Jerusalem, before they may receive State services such as identity cards (the practical embodiment of permanent residence), travel documents or registrations of marriages, births and deaths of spouses. They must produce documents such as tax receipts, water and electricity bills and leases. Birth certificates must be shown to prove that their children were born in Jerusalem, and certificates must be shown to prove that their children are attending Jerusalem schools. That applies to Palestinian women and men. Anyone who fails to establish residence in Jerusalem forfeits his right and the right of his family to stay or work in Jerusalem, and is denied all social rights. That is pursuant to the Nationality Act and its illegal regulations, which give the Israeli Minister of the Interior the power to revoke permanent residence. Under article 11 (a) of that Act, permanent residence may be revoked if an individual has left the country for over seven years, has acquired permanent residence outside the country or has become a naturalized citizen of another State. That provision has been invoked in Jerusalem by successive Governments of the occupation State with the aim of emptying Jerusalem of its Palestinian residents, especially those who live on the outskirts of Jerusalem or in the West Bank, have studied or worked abroad or have obtained foreign citizenship.

152. According to the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs office in the Palestinian Territory, East Jerusalem Palestinians lack safe legal residence. The Israeli authorities revoked the residence of at least 14,000 Palestinians in East Jerusalem between 1967 and the middle of 2010. Only a few hundred of those people succeeded in regaining their residence status.

153. In another example of discrimination, under illegal Israeli laws, both female and male Jerusalem residents with spouses who are not Israeli citizens or permanent residents of Jerusalem must request “reunification” so that they can live in the city as a family. In the very common case where a Palestinian woman resident of Jerusalem has married a Palestinian man with a Palestinian identity card, she must petition to be reunified with her husband and embark on a long series of degrading procedures that take many years. When the petition is submitted, the wife must provide documents, as described above, to the Israeli Ministry of the Interior to prove she is a permanent resident of Jerusalem. She must also provide a certified marriage contract and photographs of the wedding celebration. These photographs must show her wearing a white wedding dress and gold jewellery, and must also show the groom and the guests in order to confirm that a marriage has in fact taken place. However, even under this procedure before it was abolished, applications for family reunification were ignored. This was also the case when a Palestinian male resident of Jerusalem married a Palestinian woman with a Palestinian identity card.

154. After the outbreak of the second intifada in October 2000, the occupation authorities froze reunification petitions. In May 2002, they officially halted all procedures related to reunification applications in accordance with Decision 1813. In July 2003, the Israeli Parliament approved the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Act as a one-year provisional law. That Act prohibits Palestinians — women and men — married to Israeli citizens from obtaining Israeli citizenship or permanent residence. It thus prevents them from living in Israel or Jerusalem with their families. The Act has been applied retroactively to spouses who married before the law was adopted and to their children, who have been forcibly expelled from Israel as a result. To date, the racist Act has been renewed every year, making it permanent for all practical purposes.

155. In 2005, amendments were made to that Act that allowed women over the age of 25 who are married to residents of Jerusalem or Palestinian holders of Israeli citizenship to obtain a permit to stay with their husbands. The amendments also allowed men over the age of 35 who are married to residents of Jerusalem or Palestinian citizens of Israel to stay with their spouses. Children over the age of 14 may have a residence permit, which may only be renewed if they are able to demonstrate that they live in Jerusalem on a regular basis. All those who do not fall within these age groups are automatically rejected. Even those who do fall within this category usually see their applications rejected. Long delays in processing ultimately give way to rejection under various pretexts, such as ostensible security reasons.

156. In sum, most women married to residents of Jerusalem are prohibited by law from obtaining permanent residence in Jerusalem, as are children who cannot be registered on their Jerusalemite father's identity card or in the population registry if the mother is a holder of a Palestinian identity card.

157. Conversely, women residents of Jerusalem have for all practical purposes lost their right to retain their residence in Jerusalem or have been stripped of it because they were forced to live outside Jerusalem in order to keep their families together. Even in the latter case, a woman resident of Jerusalem loses the right to renew her identity card if she has lived outside the city for several years, if she has lost the identity card or if her appearance has changed with time or because she has either begun wearing or stopped wearing the hijab. Similarly, if she decides to return to Jerusalem after divorce or the death of her spouse, she cannot reside legally in Jerusalem until she submits a petition for personal reunification, which takes several years.

Palestinian women married to Palestinians who stayed inside the Green Line, and vice versa

158. The prohibition on reunification, as described in the previous paragraph, also applies to Palestinians, both men and women, who hold Palestinian identity cards and who marry Palestinians who remained inside the Green Line after the Nakba in 1948 and acquired Israeli citizenship under the Israeli Nationality Act (1952).

159. In 2007, the Israeli Parliament expanded the scope of the racist Act, denying reunification to citizens of Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Iran and Libya who were married to Palestinian citizens of Israel or Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem. In 2008, another amendment to the Nationality Act was made whereby citizenship could be revoked in the case of a "breach of trust" or "disloyalty to the State", even in the absence of a criminal conviction. That compounded the threat of discriminatory expulsion against Palestinian men and women, who are in fact the primary targets of these amendments.

160. There is no doubt that this racist policy is designed to prevent the reunification of Palestinian families and violates fundamental human rights to equality, freedom, privacy, citizenship and family life. It blatantly discriminates against Palestinians wherever they live. Women are the primary victims of these racist policies, as they find themselves forced to choose between two unjust options: either to live in their homeland and abandon their families and husbands, or to build a family life with their husbands and give up life in their homeland.

Palestinian women refugees in the diaspora

161. As of mid-2015, there were some 6,134,003 Palestinian refugees in the diaspora, comprising 49.7 per cent of the entire Palestinian population, according to the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics. These figures include citizens of other countries and the stateless. Those who have acquired citizenship of another country are subject to the laws of that country, including citizenship laws that are not necessarily consistent with the principles of human rights, particularly the rights of women. Stateless persons are subject to a special system governing residence in the host country. In some cases, such persons are granted status equal to that of citizens of that country but do not have political rights, or are deprived of fundamental rights. Palestinian refugee women in particular are affected by prolonged refugee status, which deprives them of, among other things, their fundamental right to reside in their country and to pass this right on to their children.

162. Israel, the occupying Power, is the party primarily responsible for the creation of the Palestinian refugee problem, through its crimes against the Palestinians, such as killings and forced expulsion and displacement. It continues to bear primary responsibility for the continued exile and suffering of Palestinian refugees and their inability to return to their homeland. It has done everything in its power to make it impossible for them to return even from a practical point of view, by building Israeli cities and settlements on the ruins of abandoned Palestinian villages and Palestinian land, by accepting tens of thousands of Jews every year, by controlling Palestinian borders, border crossings and ports, by controlling Palestinian civil affairs, and by depriving refugees and their children of their right to live in their countries.

Equality in education

163. Existing legislation guarantees the right to education for all, without discrimination, at all levels: kindergarten, primary and secondary school (academic and vocational) and university. Educational policies and programmes do not discriminate against women. The Amended Basic Law guarantees the right of every citizen to an education. Education is compulsory through primary school, and schools, educational institutes and public institutions are free of charge. The Education Act (1964) explicitly stipulates gender equality with respect to school enrolment, curricula, examinations and grade levels. This is also the case with regard to the Higher Education Act (1998), which explicitly states that every citizen has the right to higher education. It also states that fulfilment of objective educational requirements shall be the exclusive criterion for determining admissions and for awarding diplomas.

164. The Palestinian Child Act (2004) guarantees the right to a free, State school education for every child through secondary school. It provides for all appropriate and effective measures to eliminate various forms of discrimination in the right to education and guarantees equal opportunities for all children. It prohibits children from dropping out of school. Along with the Palestinian Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act, the Act affirms the right of children with disabilities to education and training at the same schools and at special centres, without discrimination.

165. The Palestinian Prisoners and Ex-prisoners Act (2004) also guarantees the educational rights of Palestinian prisoners and freedom fighters in occupation prisons, regardless of sex. It exempts them wholly or in part from university tuition fees.

166. The Reform and Rehabilitation Centres Act (No. 6, 1998) guarantees the right of every male and female inmate to an education, and states that inmates must be provided with the necessary resources to continue his or her education, whether at school or university. It allows them to be excused from daily work duties, and to sit for examinations.

167. The Palestinian Ministry of Education and Higher Education supervises Government and private schools as well as schools operated by the United Nations

Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA). Education in Palestine is divided into the following stages: preschool (kindergarten); primary education, which is compulsory and free for ten years, until the end of the tenth grade; secondary education, which is free in Government schools and includes sciences and humanities (literature) as well as vocational education, which is divided into industry, commerce, agriculture, nursing and hospitality; higher education; and parallel education and literacy.

168. In Jerusalem, all Palestinian schools are subject to discriminatory Israeli terms and conditions, which prompts many students, male and female, to drop out of school, or which deprives students of access to decent or appropriate education, as will be explained below.

169. The Ministry's Sectoral and Cross-sectoral Gender Strategy (2011-2013) has incorporated Palestinian educational mechanisms and conditions aimed at combating gender discrimination and ensuring justice and gender equality with respect to universal access to education, prevention of attrition and reducing illiteracy rates. It has turned education into a tool for raising awareness of human rights and gender equality. The Ministry conducted a comprehensive review of school curricula during the period from 2003 to 2006 and subsequently adopted new curricula at all educational levels. Despite improvements in those curricula, they still contain stereotypical portrayals of women's roles.

170. Laws in force in the West Bank do not prohibit co-educational schools, of which there are some 686. By contrast, in the Gaza Strip, the illegal Education Act (No. 1, 2013) enacted by Hamas prohibits co-educational institutions after nine years of age, and the Ministry of Education there is working to "feminize" girls' schools.

171. Sport is a compulsory subject in Palestinian school curricula throughout primary and secondary education, and female students are entitled to physical education and sport on an equal basis with male students at all schools.

172. Statistics from the Ministry of Education and Higher Education for 2014 and 2015 show a marked improvement in enrolment for both girls and boys. There are 2,856 schools of various types in Palestine, attended by 1,171,596 students (590,501 female and 581,095 male). Total enrolment of girls in primary education stood at 96.5 per cent as compared with 94.2 per cent for boys, while enrolment in secondary education stood at 80.1 per cent for girls as compared with 61.2 per cent for boys.

173. The Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act guarantees the right to education for persons with disabilities. That Act charges the Ministry of Education and Higher Education with creating a positive environment and addressing the needs of such students at schools, colleges and universities. Since 1997, the Ministry has worked to integrate both male and female students with disabilities, and for the 2014-2015 academic year, 7,552 students with disabilities were enrolled (3,998 male students and 3,554 female). Ministry data shows that approximately 63.6 per cent of Government schools accommodate special needs, providing toilets and ramps for persons with disabilities. The Ministry is working on providing more facilities for these students, and is modifying school buildings to fit their needs.

174. The following table shows the distribution of male and female students across various secondary school subjects for the 2014-2015 academic year, according to the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics:

Distribution of males and females across various secondary school fields for the 2014-2015 academic year

Field of study	Both Sexes	Males	Females
Humanities	65.0	60.6	68.5
Science	24.4	25.9	23.2
Commerce	4.5	5.4	3.9
Agriculture	0.2	0.4	0.0
Industry	1.7	3.6	0.3
Sharia	4.0	4.0	4.0
Hospitality	0.1	0.1	0.0

175. Both male and female secondary school students still largely enrol in sciences and the humanities as opposed to vocational disciplines, and girls in general incline to the humanities more than boys.

176. The Ministry of Education has adopted several professional guidance projects and programmes, including an awareness-raising programme and vocational guidance, as well as the “From School to Work” project, which is designed to guide students in identifying disciplines and professions and the necessary skills, and help them choose fields that match their interests and abilities. To that end, the Ministry has adopted a vocational and technical guide aimed at male and female students in the eighth, ninth and tenth grades, and their families. It provides them with guidance in the areas of organizational skills, how to select the right field of study, interpersonal relations and lifelong learning.

177. Legislation and policies guarantee the right of students to freely choose their field of study at all educational levels according to their interests and abilities and in line with the principle of equality of opportunity, without gender discrimination. There is no educational discrimination between men and women at any level. Curricula and official secondary school examinations are standardized at all schools in occupied Palestine. That is also the case at Palestinian universities, where curricula are standardized by specialization at each university and students within each specialization at each university sit for standardized examinations, without discrimination.

178. With regard to dropouts and failures, Ministry statistics for the 2013-2014 period show that the failure rate at all levels of education was lower among girls. The failure rate was 1.1 per cent among girls, compared to 1.7 per cent among boys. That was also the case with dropout rates. The overall dropout rate among girls at all levels was 0.9 per cent, compared with 1.6 per cent among boys during the same years.

179. In order to combat attrition and the concomitant increase in child labour, the flowing ministries have developed the following measures:

The Ministry of Labour

180. The Ministry of Labour monitors the implementation of labour and child protection laws, which prohibit the employment of children under 15 years of age. Those laws impose penalties on employers who are in violation. The Ministry also regulates and supervises labour by children over the age of 15 years. In all cases, it is prohibited to hire children to do any work which would conflict with their schooling.

The Ministry of Education and Higher Education

181. The Ministry has developed various plans to fight student dropout.

182. It buses male and female students to school from Bedouin settlements. Since 2012, the Ministry has provided 21 buses and five automobiles to ensure that students from Bedouin settlements have transportation to Government schools in Area C of the West Bank, and to ensure protection from recurring terrorist settler militia attacks that are a threat to their physical safety, not to mention an obstacle to education. Those buses currently serve approximately 1400 male and female students from 53 Bedouin settlements.

Other activities

183. These include the following: helping dropouts return to school, particularly female students who dropped out to get married; assisting men and women who are beyond school age to enrol in adult education; building new schools to reduce overcrowding and accommodate more students; providing teacher training and qualification; developing guidance programmes to help students overcome psychological and social problems and encourage them to continue their studies; and developing extracurricular activities to promote school spirit and enthusiasm for study and learning.

Ministry of Social Development and other institutions

184. The Ministry plays a pivotal role in mitigating attrition and developing programmes to address the causes of school dropout and early entry into the labour force, such as programmes to combat poverty and to offer cash and in-kind assistance, health insurance and employment opportunities for fathers and mothers.

185. Other social protection institutions, and certain non-governmental organizations, charities and UNRWA (where Palestinian refugees are concerned) play a complementary role to that of the Ministry of Social Development, providing cash assistance to poor families and job opportunities. These initiatives have mitigated — albeit partially — the phenomenon of students dropping out of school to work so they can help their families.

Illiteracy

186. There has been a clear decline in the prevalence of illiteracy in occupied Palestine, particularly among women. In 1997, the overall illiteracy rate among individuals 15 years of age and older was 13.9 per cent (7.8 per cent of men and 20.3 percent of women). Figures issued by the Central Bureau for 2014 indicate that the illiteracy rate in Palestine was among lowest in the world. The overall illiteracy rate in Palestine declined among individuals 15 years of age and older to 3.6 per cent (or 97,921 individuals). However, these figures show that there is still a significant discrepancy between males and females, as the illiteracy rate among males was 1.6 per cent (or 22,161 individuals), while the rate among females was 5.6 per cent (or 75,760 individuals) for the same year. The female illiteracy rate in rural areas increased to 8.4 per cent, as compared to 1.7 per cent for males. In urban areas the rate was 5 per cent among females as compared to 1.6 per cent for males. In the camps, the rate among females was 4.9 per cent as opposed to 1.6 per cent among males.

Adult education

187. The Education Act (No. 16, 1964) stipulates that the State is responsible for providing adult education to those who are interested by establishing centres with organized classes, for the purpose of self-improvement. Women are afforded the same opportunities as men to enrol in such centres. The Ministry of Education and Higher Education is implementing programmes to eradicate adult illiteracy and provide adult education and parallel education.

Post-secondary education

188. For the 2014-2015 academic year, female registrations and actual enrolments at 52 institutions of higher education (universities, colleges, community colleges or distance learning) stood at 133,362 students, or approximately 60.3 per cent of the total student enrolment of 221,395. Female graduates of higher education institutions for the 2013-2014 academic year numbered 24,111, or approximately 60 per cent of the 40,043 total graduates for that year.

189. The following shows the number of students enrolled in universities and community colleges for the specified academic year by sex (in thousands):

14/15	209.1	81.6	127.5	1.56	12.3	6.4	5.9	0.92

190. Figures from the Ministry of Education and Higher Education indicate that female enrolment increased significantly in the fields of education, humanities, social sciences, commerce, law and fine arts. Enrolment rates declined slightly in medicine-related disciplines such as pharmacy and nursing, and also declined in the sciences, medicine and engineering.

191. With respect to education loans and grants, Decree Law No. 5 (2013) concerning a loan fund for students at institutions of higher education in Palestine affirms the right of female Palestinian university students to obtain loans to cover a bachelor's degree or diploma, in accordance with certain criteria, on the same terms that apply to male students. According to Ministry regulations, the conditions that must be met by candidates for scholarships at Palestinian universities or abroad are the same for all, without gender discrimination.

192. Women working in the pre-university education sector are approximately 59.8 per cent of the total number of education staff (excluding support staff) at government and private schools and UNRWA schools in Palestine. However, that percentage declines as education level increases, especially at the university level. Women were only 25 per cent of the total number of employees of institutions of higher education.

Challenges

193. The Israeli occupation's continued control over Palestinian territory and the behaviour of its soldiers and settlers, particularly in East Jerusalem and Area C of the West Bank, play a major role in the deterioration of Palestinian education. That behaviour includes attacks on school buildings and facilities and the consequent infliction of physical and mental harm on students and teachers, murder, injury, detention, frisking, harassment, denial of safe access by students and teachers to schools, the threat of confiscation of school land, denial of licenses for electricity and water at schools, intermittent closures and raids of schools, repeated closure of military checkpoints, and many other violations that lead to lost hours of education and disruptions of the school day. Students are prevented from receiving a decent education in safe conditions, which has prompted many students, especially female students, to leave school and enter the labour force, or to marry at young ages and start families.

194. In 2013 alone, some 12,071 students, 547 teachers, and six staff of Palestinian schools were targeted by occupation soldiers with results ranging from death, injury, detention, arrest, house arrest, fines, delays at military checkpoints and denial of access to schools. Some 89 schools were subject to 344 attacks, most notably demolitions and raids, as well as vandalism of property and facilities, the firing of gas canisters, rubber bullets and live ammunition by occupation soldiers in schoolyards and classrooms, partial or total disruption of the school day, or closure of school operations entirely.

195. The situation is worse in East Jerusalem, where schools are under the full control of the occupation and its racist policies. Those schools are overseen by five different bodies, namely the Ministry of Information and the municipality of Jerusalem (which report to the Israeli occupation authorities), as well as the Islamic waqf (through the Palestinian Ministry of Education), UNRWA schools and the private and civil society sectors. Students at these schools are subject to numerous violations of their right to education, notably:

- They are denied easy and safe access to their schools because of the annexationist expansionist wall and the military roadblocks around Jerusalem that prevent thousands of students and teachers coming in and out of the city and accessing its schools;
- They are denied access to education in decent school buildings due to the moratorium on new school buildings, orders to demolish existing schools, refusal to improve deteriorating infrastructure and lack of any budget oversight mechanisms for such improvements, the imposition of complicated procedures for procurement of furniture and textbooks and the inadequate response to the huge current numbers of students and lack of planning to accommodate new students, which shuts thousands of Palestinian children out of the free governmental education system;
- According to the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, there is a chronic shortage of classrooms in East Jerusalem which would require the construction of 2,200 additional classrooms to accommodate Palestinian children. Many existing facilities are inadequate and do not meet standards;

- East Jerusalem schools do not have schoolyards and playgrounds. Many do not have libraries or science or computer laboratories. Classrooms are unsanitary, and half of the buildings are rented, at a cost of more than $750,000 a year, because it is too difficult to obtain permits to build schools due to the racist policy of the municipality of Jerusalem;
- Substantial monetary fines are imposed on schools arbitrarily. Citations are issued for acts such as placing canopies on school roofs to protect students from rain and sun. They might also be issued because a school building was not authorized pursuant to racist Israeli laws and the permit was denied, or because a classroom was expanded. Often the occupation authorities will impose these violations and fines on the school's principal and will prosecute him personally.
- Palestinian textbooks and curricula are bowdlerized with the intent of obliterating Palestinian identity among students. Anything that refers to the Palestinian cause, the right of return or other national issues is removed, which violates the right of parents and students to receive an education that is in line with their particular beliefs.

196. All these issues, in addition to the racist policies and the economic challenges imposed by the occupation authorities on Palestinian residents of Jerusalem, have led to extremely high dropout rates, especially among girls in secondary school.

197. In the Gaza Strip, the illegal blockade constitutes a grave threat to both primary and university education. The occupying forces continue to deny the import of materials to build new schools or to repair schools that have been impacted by the continuing wars against the Gaza Strip. The Ministry needs to build 139 new schools to accommodate students and provide them with a decent education. UNRWA needs to build 104 new schools in order to avoid a double- or triple-shift system.

198. The occupation authorities also impose severe restrictions on the import of many educational necessities, creating shortages of stationery, books and laboratory materials and other materials necessary for educational services. Recurring and lengthy electricity cuts negatively impact the entire education sector in the Gaza Strip. Occupation forces destroyed the only power plant in Gaza in late June 2006, and since then have not allowed it to be rebuilt and equipped so that it can return to its former power-generating capacity. The plant has been prevented from bringing in the amounts of industrial diesel fuel that it needs. The high cost of diesel generator fuel places a heavy burden on educational institutions in the context of the severe financial crisis they face. Electricity cuts have caused numerous problems, including computer crashes during lectures; disruptive lighting outages that cause problems particularly in the evening, and blocked access to electronic references and study materials on the Internet, all of which prevents students from access to adequate education and disrupts study.

199. The illegal blockade is accompanied by persistent Israeli attacks against the Gaza Strip and its civilian population and its cultural and educational institutions, which disrupts education and prevents hundreds of thousands of students from attending school or university. We cite the following examples of the impact on education of the 2014 aggression against the Gaza Strip:

- Of 235 damaged schools, 24 were not operational at the beginning of the subsequent academic year.
- Some 115 schools were used as shelters for displaced civilians, which led to the postponement of the start of the academic year.

- Six schools that had been used as shelters for internally displaced persons were targeted, even though UNRWA had informed the occupation authorities of the coordinates of those schools. Forty-four persons were killed inside these schools or in their vicinity, and 222 were injured.
- Higher education institutions suffered various types of damage, including six cases of major damage.
- Nineteen Ministry staff were killed and several others injured.
- Thousands of children of various ages were killed or injured.
- Those injuries left many students with disabilities, which makes it harder for educational institutions to accommodate them.
- Students suffered significant psychological problems, which inevitably affected their capacity to learn.
- Overcrowding in classrooms increased, and the number of schools employing the double-shift system rose, especially after the destruction that accompanied the aggression. Families were displaced from areas that saw massive destruction and gathered in city centres, which will increase student numbers at those cities' schools.

Article 11

Labour equality

200. The labour sector in Palestine is regulated by two key laws: the Civil Service Act (No. 4, 1998), which covers public officials and employees of State institutions; and the Labour Act (No. 7, 2000), which covers all workers in the private and civil sectors, with the exception the employer's immediate family members, and also of domestic workers, who are covered by a special regulation issued by the Minister of Labour. Like the Amended Basic Law, those laws do not discriminate between women and men with respect to the right to work, employment opportunities, wages, or any other rights related public, private or civil-sector employment. On the contrary, every citizen able to work has the right to employment, which the State of Palestine enforces on the basis of equal opportunity and without discrimination. Appointment to public posts is on the basis of equality of opportunity.

201. The Civil Service Act does not differentiate between male and female employees with regard to wages and benefits for public posts. That is true for base salaries, bonuses and any other compensation. Female employees have the right to equal pay for equal work. The same applies to the Labour Law, which explicitly prohibits discrimination between men and women as regards working conditions and terms of employment, including all financial benefits including wages, allowances, bonuses and reimbursements.

202. Women working in the private and civil sectors have the right to the minimum wage set by the Cabinet in 2012, which is about $365, without discrimination between them and men. It should be noted that in 2011, the poverty line was $600 and the extreme poverty line was $490. Remuneration above minimum wage can be set by contract between the employee and employer. Such a contract may under no circumstances contain provisions that discriminate against women. Any such contract would be deemed null and void because it would violate the Labour Act. Such contracts are in all cases subject to oversight by the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of the Interior or the Ministry of the National Economy.

203. The Labour Act does differentiate between women and men with respect to the nature of work and working hours. That has an impact on the right of women choose their work. Women may not be employed in dangerous or strenuous work involving machines, chemicals or manual labour. They may also not be employed on night shifts, with the exception of work in the fields of medicine, social work, tourism or media, or in case of necessity, on condition that their safety and safe travel is guaranteed.

204. Women private and public employees are subject to the same evaluation guidelines and procedures as men. They are evaluated on the basis of performance and the degree to which they carry out the duties that would be expected of anyone occupying their particular job in terms of quantity and quality. Their job performance is assessed based on the work ethic, behaviour and personal qualities they exhibit in the course of carrying out their responsibilities and taking decisions.

205. The Civil Service Act and the Labour Act also guarantee the right of women to career advancement and job security. Promotions are to be based on evaluation of job performance. All things being equal, it is seniority that determines which of two deserving candidates is given priority. Working women are guaranteed job security. They may not be discriminated against because they are married or have children. They may not be singled out or penalized for either of those two reasons.

206. There are no legal provisions that discriminate against women with respect to professional training. For example, the Labour Act requires the Ministry of Labour to set forth and implement policies to continuously develop the skills, aptitudes and capacities of both male and female workers on the basis of equality of opportunity and freedom of choice.

207. With regard to maternity protection and childcare during work, legislation respects the reproductive role of women and guarantees them the right not to be discriminated against at work because of that role. The above-mentioned acts provide for the right of public and private employees to fully paid maternity leave both before and after childbirth. They prohibit discontinuing a woman's employment during maternity leave, provided she does not engage in other work during that time. A woman may not lose seniority or any raises or promotions she has coming to her because she takes maternity leave. Public and private employees who are nursing have the right to paid nursing breaks during the workday.

208. The Labour Act requires workplaces and employers to provide reasonable accommodations for women workers. The rules for the employment of women must be displayed in the workplace to make sure that women workers are aware of their rights, obligations, and available remedies, and that they are in a position to demand their rights.

209. Legislation prohibits pregnant or nursing women from working extra hours in any job whatsoever during pregnancy and for six months after giving birth. They may not be employed in dangerous work that might affect their health or the health of their foetus or infants. Employers are obligated to take measures to protect workers against workplace risks and illnesses. They must provide suitable health conditions, means of medical evacuation and periodic medical exams for both male and female workers. The cost of providing such workplace health and safety protection may not be passed on to the worker.

210. Legislation in force allocates 5 per cent of posts in all governmental and non-governmental institutions to persons with disabilities, depending on the nature of the work of such institutions. The Ministry of Labour is committed to develop occupational training programmes designed to adapt work to the needs of persons with disabilities.

The right to social security

211. Legislation regulating social security varies, depending on whether the worker in questions is working in the government, private or civil sector. Overall, the legal framework provides a range of insurance schemes, guarantees and compensation for working women, on an equal footing with men, in situations where they are unable to work and lose their income. Legislation on the right to social security for employees in the government sector covers the following risks, emergencies and social circumstances:

- Ageing: Retirement legislation in force in the government civilian and security sectors has the same qualifications for retirement benefits for men and women. That applies to compulsory retirement age, years of service needed for retirement benefits, and contributions required. Retirement pensions are calculated the same way for women as for men. The same applies to conditions for early retirement.
- Death: Male and female children of a deceased female retiree from the government sector are eligible to receive the deceased's retirement pension under the same conditions that would apply to a father who was a government retiree.
- Illness: Legislation grants women paid sick leave on an equal footing with men. Women working in the government sector receive government health insurance just as men do.
- Full medical disability/workplace accidents/occupational illnesses: Legislation has increased the various types of compensation and medical expenses that a male or female worker incapacitated for any of the above reasons is entitled to, and requires employers to insure all workers against workplace accidents.
- Family benefits: The Civil Service Act regulates the family allowances to which a male or female employee in the government sector is entitled. They are considered part of the salary, and can come in the form of allowances for housing, the nature of work, hazards, or any other incentive payments for performance, services rendered or research to increase efficiency and sound fiscal management. Such allowances also include social allowances for male or female spouses who are not employees, and male or female children under the age of 18. In certain cases, those allowances continue to be disbursed even after the age of 18. If both spouses are staff members of the civil service, the social allowance is paid to only one of them.
- Maternity leave and nursing breaks: Female employees receive leave with full pay for a period of 10 consecutive weeks before and after giving birth. An employee who is nursing has the right to leave work one hour before closing for a year following the birth of the child.
- Paid leave: Women civil servants, like men, have the right to various other kinds of paid leave. That includes weekend leave, religious and government holidays, regular annual vacation, emergency leave, educational leave and leave to perform the hajj pilgrimage.
- Unpaid leave: Female civil servants have the right to leave without pay to take care of a child for up to a year, accompany a husband going abroad for work or study for the entire time he remains abroad, or for other reasons that she may communicate to management.

212. The State of Palestine has made significant progress on the right to social security. In March of the year 2016, a decree law was issued on social security. It was the first social security legislation ever enacted in Palestine. However, the Palestinian President suspended enforcement of the legislation in response to demands from civil society for the amendment of some of its provisions to ensure maximum protection and social justice, particularly for the poor and marginalized. In October 2016, the Palestinian President reissued the amended decree law. The amended text was agreed to by all the relevant government and civil society parties.

213. In keeping with relevant international standards to which the State of Palestine has committed itself, the decree law covers several types of basic social insurance. They include the following: old age, congenital disability and death, workplace injuries, maternity, illness, health insurance, unemployment, family allowances, and compulsory or optional retirement. The decree law's provisions are applicable to the following classes of workers: all workers covered under the Labour Act in force; workers not covered by retirement provisions for government civilian and security personnel; Palestinian employees of international and regional organizations or foreign diplomatic or political missions operating in Palestine; workers and employees at local agencies previously not covered by retirement regulations; and domestic workers and persons in comparable positions. The Social Security Agency will monitor and collect payments on behalf of Palestinian workers abroad, including back payments and deductions. However, workers who have informal arrangements with their employers will not be covered under the decree law. That leaves a substantial segment of women workers outside the scope of the law, since a majority of informal workers are women.

214. The decree law guarantees the right to social security and access to benefits to men and women on an equal footing without discrimination between. That includes the same retirement age, which is 60, for both men and women. Some classes of worker do not make adequate contributions. That includes women, because they are often in the labour force only intermittently owing to family responsibilities and also because their wages are often inadequate. The decree law addresses that problem by granting early retirement to beneficiaries who stop working at the age of 55, provided that they have made at least 240 payments, for women, and 300 payments, for men. In contrast to the government retirement legislation currently in force, the decree law on social security does not require a husband to be incapacitated and unable to earn and income in order to be eligible to be one of the beneficiaries of a deceased wife's retirement pension.

215. The decree law on social security of women grants women 12 weeks of paid maternity leave, not to exceed five consecutive weeks before and seven weeks after giving birth.

Oversight and accountability mechanisms

216. Under the Labour Act, female workers, like males, can appeal to the Labour Inspectorate if an employer violates any provisions of that Act. If the violation is proven, the Inspectorate imposes financial penalties on the employer, which double with each recurring violation. The Inspectorate may also require the employer to pay back wages to the female worker, and may completely or partially shutter the workplace. Working women may also appeal to the courts to claim their employee rights and worker compensation. Court fees are waived for all workers in cases involving disputes over wages, vacations, severance pay, workplace injury compensation or arbitrary termination. In the government sector, female civil servants may file a complaint about administrative decisions that violate their rights. They also have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court to challenge such decision have them overturned.

Sexual harassment

217. The Civil Service Act and the Labour Act do not address sexual harassment in the workplace. Nor is it criminalized under the Penal Code. Consequently, it is handled with reference to the underlying principles and penalties for crimes against honour. Those crimes include rape, sexual assault, indecent fondling, proposing acts contrary to public decency, and the use of indecent language. The punishment for such crimes is imprisonment for a period of no less than 10 years if the perpetrator is a personnel manager who committed the act by using his authority or facilities deriving therefrom. The draft penal code criminalizes sexual harassment and defines it as follows: "any deliberate harassment of another person through repeated acts, words or gestures offensive to that person's dignity or modesty for the purpose of inducing that person to respond to sexual advances; or the application of pressure to undermine that person's will to resist such advances". A perpetrator is punished by no less than 6 months in prison, which is increased to 2 years if the perpetrator has formal or de facto power over the victim.

218. The percentage of women 15 years and older in the labour force in Palestine had seen a marked improvement as of 2015. According to statistics from the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, that percentage was 19.1 per cent, as against 71.9 for men. That is an improvement and signals a decline in the gender gap in women's participation in the labour force compared to 2000, when those percentages were 10.3 per cent for women compared to 66.8 per cent for men. Nevertheless, there were still more than four times as many men as women in the labour force as of 2015.

Labour force broken down by age group and sex in 2015

Age group	Total	Male	Female
15-24	32.7	52.9	11.6
25-34	61.4	90.5	31.1
35-44	59.0	92.5	24.4
55-64	35.6	58.3	12.3
65+	9.0	17.6	2.5
All age groups	45.8	71.9	19.1

220. Statistics from 2015 indicate that 66.8 per cent of working women were wage workers, compared to 69.1 per cent of men. The proportion of self-employed women was 14.0 per cent compared to 19.1 per cent for men. The proportion of women business owners was 2.1 per cent versus 7.1 per cent for men.

221. The following tables show the breakdown of the labour force by occupation, economic activity and gender:

The relative distribution of male and female workers aged 15 and over by occupation in Palestine, 2015 (percentage)

Occupation	Males	Females
Legislators, senior managers	3.3	3.0
Technicians, specialists, assistants, clerical workers	21.5	52.9
Services and sales staff in markets	20.1	16.3
Skilled agricultural and fishery workers	3.9	10.4
Craftspeople and related occupations	20.7	7.7
Machine operators and assemblers	10.7	4.0
Elementary occupations	19.8	5.7

The relative distribution of male and female workers aged 15 and over by economic activity in Palestine, 2015 (percentage)

Economic activity	Males	Females
Agriculture, hunting and forestry	8.3	14.9
Mining, quarrying and manufacturing	16.4	13.9
Building and construction	24.2	0.7
Commerce, restaurants and hospitality	22.4	13.0
Transportation and communications	6.1	1.2
Other services and sectors	22.6	56.3

222. It is clear from the preceding tables the distribution of working women still skews largely towards traditional occupations and the services and agricultural sectors. More than half of women work in the services sector. About one fifth work in agricultural occupations. There is a notable scarcity of women in upper management.

223. According to data from the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics for the year 2014, it is clear that there are few women engineers and doctors. On the other hand, the proportion of women in medicine-related professions such as pharmacy and nursing saw an increase. The figures are as follows:

- Some 22.2 per cent of registered members of the Union of Palestinian Engineers were women, while 77.8 per cent were men.
- Some 15.2 per cent of registered members of the Palestinian Medical Association were women, while 84.8 per cent are men.
- Almost one third of registered members of the Palestinian Dental Association were women, while about 70.5 per cent are men.
- Some 50.5 per cent of registered members of the Palestinian Nursing Association were women, while 49.5 per cent are men.
- Some 55.8 of the members of the Palestinian Pharmacists Association were women, while 44.2 per cent are men.

224. A survey of the labour force in Palestine conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics showed that the overall unemployment rate for 2015 was about 25.9 per cent. That broke down to 39.2 per cent for women versus 22.5 per cent for men. The unemployment rate for women breadwinners was 17.8 per cent, as opposed to 14.3 per cent for male breadwinners. Even though these figures show a wide gap in unemployment rates between women and men, they do not reflect the true proportion of women who are unemployed. They do not include women who refrain from seeking work outside the home because of the difficulty of juggling family responsibilities and work.

225. The Labour Act does not cover informal work such as domestic service, or employees who are the employer's immediate family members. Cabinet Decision No. 42 (2004) contains special provisions that cover working hours and vacations for workers in the seasonal agriculture sector. However, data and statistics are not available for Palestine for informal workers, because they do not fit into any of the official job classifications, even though they are of qualitative productive value to both their families and to national development. A significant proportion of that sector's numerous activities are engaged in by women, the most notable being light manufacturing such as sewing and weaving, seasonal agriculture, and running informal family enterprises. Those working women are not covered by legal guarantees protecting workers' rights, such as access to social insurance. In addition, the overall contribution of women to work and to the economy is miscalculated and undervalued, since domestic activities carried out by women without pay is not accounted for in GNP. Excluding agriculture, the proportions of workers in the informal sector in 2015 were about 14.2 per cent for females, 29.3 per cent for males.

Challenges

226.

- Despite efforts that have produced draft laws on social affairs, health insurance, domestic violence and other social issues, it remains difficult to speak of social development or social protection. The financial crisis is worsening owing to recession, a decline in economic growth rates and the lack of sustainable programmes. Things are only made more difficult by the continued Israeli occupation and Israel's illegal de facto hegemony over Palestinian life, resources and capacities.
- Mechanisms for follow-up and oversight of workplaces in the private sector are inadequate. The actual conditions of female and male workers do not match up with the rights provided for by legislation.
- The Ministry of Labour has an acute shortage of labour inspection teams to inspect registered and unregistered workplaces. It lacks the necessary financial and technical capacities.

Working conditions in Israeli workplaces

227. Without a doubt, Israeli policies and practices contrary to the rules of international law have affected the Palestinian economy in general and the labour sector in particular, bringing about a decline in living standards for Palestinian families and a dangerous rise in unemployment in occupied Palestine. That has forced some Palestinians to accept work in illegal Israeli settlements under harsh conditions and at low wages. In 2015, there were about 26,300 male and female Palestinians working in illegal Israeli settlements, spread over the construction, building, manufacturing, agricultural, services, mining and hospitality sectors. That is according to statistics from the workforce survey conducted by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics for 2015.

228. Studies have demonstrated the oppressive working conditions faced by Palestinians in the settlements. Palestinian child labourers are exploited in dangerous environments for long hours. In general, Palestinian labourers are discriminated against. They are not paid the same wages as Israeli workers doing the same jobs, and do not receive the bare minimum of wages, basic social rights and promotions. Palestinian workers who go to work in Israeli settlements face all manner of abuse at Israeli checkpoints. They are forced to wait long hours. They are barred from using public transportation and Israel drivers refuse to drive them to their workplaces. Their work permits are arbitrarily cancelled by the civilian administration. Male and female workers are forced to work extra hours in the hope of receiving extra pay, but many of them never receive it. A large number of them are not registered, so they are barred from receiving benefits. Many male and female workers are subject to being fired because they are unable to get to their workplaces on a regular basis as a result of Israeli practices and security measures, or because they try to demand their rights.

229. Israeli employers do not comply with the provisions of the Labour Law when dealing with Palestinian workers. They exploit those workers' desperation for work and use all sorts of methods to swindle Palestinian workers out of their rights. There is virtually no supervision or oversight by the Israeli Government of such workplaces and working conditions. Palestinian workers in the settlements are also subjected to physical and psychological violence, racial discrimination, and threats to confiscate their work permits, whether from the occupation army or the employers.

230. Female Palestinian workers in the settlements suffer from an additional layer of discrimination based on gender. They get paid only half the daily wages that men get, which are well below the minimum wage in Israel to begin with. They work longer hours than the male workers in the services and agricultural sectors, without the additional hours being taken into account.

231. Palestinian workers in the illegal Israeli settlements do not to not have the benefit of health and occupational safety requirements. Most of them work in workplaces that do not provide protective uniforms and equipment. They are exposed to the sun, smoke, chemical fumes, insecticides and flammable materials.

232. Palestine is making a national effort to boycott illegal Israeli settlements on Palestinian territory occupied in 1967. The President issued Decree Law No. 4 (2010) banning products produced in the settlements, in order to give compulsory effect to that national effort. Under that Decree Law, it is unlawful for any person to deal in products from the Israeli settlements in the Palestinian market in any way whatsoever. It is also unlawful for any person to provide any services to those settlements or to work in them. Since that time, the Government has put forward a number of plans and programmes to enforce the provisions of that Decree Law, to find replacements for those products and support the national economy.

Equal right to health

233. The law does not discriminate between women and men when it comes to the right to health. The law regulating the health sector in Palestine, the Public Health Act (No. 20) of 2004, prioritizes women's health as an integral part of the Palestine development strategy. The Ministry of Health is mandated to provide preventive, diagnostic, treatment and rehabilitative health services for women and children. Women do not have to ask for permission from a legal guardian or spouse in order to have access to health care, including family planning services. On the contrary, the law grants all persons, including women, right of access to essential care, primary care and emergency care and the right to have proposed treatment plans clearly explained to them. Patients also have the right to consent to care or refuse it. In all these matters, the specific circumstances, dignity and religious and cultural beliefs of the patients must be respected.

234. The law prohibits termination of pregnancy except on medical grounds and under a specific set of conditions. It is an offence to deliberately terminate a pregnancy, whether with or without the mother's consent. The penalty in cases where a woman dies as the result of having a termination or a termination procedure will vary depending on the circumstances. A woman who terminates her own pregnancy or has a termination performed by a third party faces a penalty of from 6 months to 3 years in prison. Mitigating factors will be taken into account if the woman was motivated by the desire to protect her honour. The same applies to descendants or relatives up to the third degree of kinship who perform the procedure. The penalty is higher if the termination is performed by a doctor, surgeon, pharmacist or midwife.

235. A therapeutic termination may only be performed legally when given conditions obtain, namely, the procedure is necessary in order to save the woman's life and an attestation to this effect is provided by two doctors, at least one of whom must be a gynaecologist. A woman must also give prior written consent. If she is unable to do so, the husband or legal guardian must give consent and the procedure must be carried out in a health facility.

236. The Ministry of Health of Palestine is responsible for overseeing and organizing the work of the health sector. It is also responsible for: delivering the vast majority of medical services at different levels; making proposals on legislation; and formulating and implementing policies to ensure equal and equitable access to high-quality services for women, persons with disabilities and the poor. It does this in partnership with health service providers, including the private and voluntary sectors, military health services, the UNRWA and the Palestinian Red Crescent.

237. In 1995, the General Department for Women's Health and Development and the Community Health Division were established within the Ministry to improve access to a full package of high-quality reproductive health services in mother and child centres at primary health care facilities, with a focus on persons in deprived areas and in localities where mobility is restricted owing to the unlawful construction of the annexationist and expansionist separation wall and settlements. Those departments also ensure the delivery of quality services in hospitals, particularly in delivery wards and postnatal wards.

238. There are six different kinds of government health insurance in Palestine: compulsory health insurance (government and municipal employees and contractors); voluntary insurance; insurance for workers at the Green Line; contractual insurance; social security insurance; and insurance for Palestinian prisoners and their families. In 2015, 175,248 families in the West Bank were included in all these insurance schemes and 13,817 families were receiving free health insurance. Since 2000, moreover, the Government has been providing free insurance for the unemployed, indigent families and those earning less than the minimum wage. Some 215,000 families benefit from this form of insurance. Pursuant to a presidential decree of 26 June 2007, all those who live in the Gaza Strip are exempted from paying fees for health services provided at government health facilities. This includes one-off services, meaning that health coverage for the population is completely free of charge. Wives and husbands have an equal right to benefit from a package of health services that was established under a government health insurance scheme in 2014, as do their dependents, including children, parents and siblings.

239. The Ministry of Health is mindful of the health care needs of women and has taken steps to meet them. It has made sure that reproductive health services, prenatal care and family planning services are an integral part of the work of primary health care centres and has set up mother and child units in these centres.

240. The Ministry, together with the Ministry of Education, organizes regular talks in schools on reproductive health and has devised protocols (guidelines) such as a consolidated national guide to reproductive health services, a consolidated national guide on safe births in hospital and a system for referrals between primary health care facilities, hospitals and ancillary services departments. It has also designed and developed staff training programmes on women's health and individual and group consultations as well as other health education services.

241. Non-governmental organizations contribute to the delivery of health services, particularly women's health services, such as screening, family planning, health education, prenatal and perinatal care, diagnosis and treatment of reproductive and sexually transmitted diseases, and other services that cover the needs of women at all stages of life.

242. In the context of primary health care delivery, the Ministry of Health provides a full range of free health services for mothers, expectant mothers and children up to the age of 6.

Safe motherhood

243. The Ministry of Health offers prenatal care, care for women whose pregnancies are at risk, and postnatal care. It provides education and information about breastfeeding, child nutrition, hygiene and vaccinations. Its centres deliver free services to expectant mothers, even if they have no health insurance, for general tests, laboratory tests and sonograms. However, admission to hospital for the birth of a child or any other procedure is free of charge only for those with government health insurance. The Ministry of Health has set up safe birth facilities in the governorates, notably in deprived areas.

244. The Ministry's statistics for 2014-2015 point to a marked improvement in reproductive health, an increase in the number of women receiving prenatal care and a drop in the number of home births. In fact, 95.5 per cent of women between the ages of 15 and 49 received health treatment from a caregiver at least four times during the course of their pregnancies: 95.7 per cent in the West Bank and 95.3 per cent in Gaza.

245. The Ministry also provides prenatal care, including vitamin supplements (iron and folic acid) for expectant mothers. For example, an average of 2.9 units of iron and folic acid were administered to each pregnant woman registered at health-care centres in 2015. Prenatal and perinatal care is also delivered in the home. Midwives visit families and each time they monitor the state of hygiene and the level of awareness of good nutrition practices and the needs of mother and child.

Fertility

246. The total fertility ratio in the State fell to 4.1 children per woman in 2014 (3.7 in the West Bank and 4.5 in the Gaza Strip) from 6.0 in 1997.

Family planning

247. The Ministry of Health introduced family planning in primary health centres in 1996-1997. Contraceptives and other family planning methods are offered to women at a nominal charge. Family planning services are provided at 306 centres in Palestine, and a total of 82,115 visits were paid to family planning centres in the West Bank in 2015. Contraceptive pills are the first method of choice, followed by condoms and intrauterine devices.

Life expectancy and mortality rate

248. Life expectancy for women in 2015 was 75 years, compared with 72 years for men. In 2009, a national committee on maternal mortality was set up, with members representing all those who provide health services to women, to establish a mechanism specifically designed to contain and reduce the maternal mortality rate. In 2015, the maternal mortality rate was 15.7 per 100,000 births, representing 20 cases of death that year.

Breast cancer and reproductive diseases

249. Primary health care centres run by the Ministry of Health offer free mammograms as part of their early detection services. The reproductive health protocol calls for women in the 40-49 age group to be screened every two years and women aged 50 and above to be screened every year. Where there is a family history of breast cancer, screening is to take place every 6 to 12 months. The Ministry offers free cervical smears, and the necessary equipment to allow for continuity of this service has been purchased. Hundreds of nurses have been trained to carry out cervical smears.

AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases

250. The Ministry of Health offers free health services at government hospitals to all those who are suffering from these diseases. The services include diagnosis and treatment. If need be, the Ministry will pay for private hospital treatment. Through the National Anti-AIDS Committee, the Ministry runs programmes designed to curb the spread of these diseases by disseminating health information and providing support to sufferers and their families. Between 1998 and 2016 there were a total of 94 AIDS cases, 16 of them women, in Palestine.

Female genital mutilation

251. Female genital mutilation and other traditional practices that are harmful to women's health are not carried out in Palestine.

Disabilities

252. Around 113,000 persons in Palestine, or 2.7 per cent of the population, have a disability, according to a survey on disabilities conducted in 2011. The incidence of disability in the male population was 2.9 per cent, as against 2.5 per cent in the female population. Impaired mobility is the most common form of disability among women and men alike. The Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act was enacted to ensure the delivery of care and rehabilitation services, particularly in the areas of health, determination of the degree of disability and the delivery of comprehensive services under the government's free health insurance scheme to persons with disabilities and their families. Medication and medical equipment are provided, together with treatment and surgery. The Ministry of Health will pay for services delivered in the private sector in Palestine or abroad when they cannot be provided in the government sector.

253. One of the main obstacles that persons with disabilities face in getting access to health and rehabilitation services is the budget and the funding constraints of the Ministry. Those constraints usually mean that those persons have to wait a long time to receive these services.

Challenges

Violations of the right to freedom of movement and travel to access health services

254. The Israeli occupation Government has imposed a comprehensive security cordon on Occupied Palestine, which has had a profound impact on the ability to deliver comprehensive care to women and access to health centres and hospitals. In 2013, 68 Palestinian women were obliged to give birth at Israeli military checkpoints. Five of them died and 35 miscarried. Women take hours, sometimes more than four hours, to get to health centres in the West Bank.

Health status of Palestinian women prisoners who are arbitrarily detained on the basis of discriminatory factors that have to do with nationality and gender

255. Palestinian women prisoners in occupation jails are living in extraordinary conditions as far as health is concerned. They are subjected not just to systematic physical and mental torture, but also to a policy of deliberate medical neglect on grounds of their nationality and gender. They are denied the most basic medical and health services, including the right to decent food and to treatment. They are given medicines that have passed their sell-by dates and those with chronic diseases are denied medication. They are also denied necessary surgery. Volunteer doctors are not allowed into the prisons, women prisoners with infectious diseases are not separated from other inmates and they have no access to specialists. Some of the prisoners are pregnant and need medical monitoring. These women give birth with their hands still in restraints, no heed being paid to their labour pains. They do not even receive postnatal care, which means that both they and their babies are placed at risk. In addition to all of this, Palestinian women prisoners are denied the right to receive health services respectful of their background and cultural beliefs, or even of their gender, leaving them exposed and weakened over and above any diseases they may suffer.

256. Israeli prisons and intelligence services exploit the injuries and poor health of women prisoners — and male prisoners — to put them under pressure and extract confessions and information from them in exchange for treatment or other advantage.

257. Palestinian women live in harsh and inhumane conditions. Most prisons are not in conformity with international standards relating to space and building codes. There are insects and vermin everywhere, accompanied by poor ventilation, severe damp, overcrowding, very high ambient temperatures and a lack of cooling devices. Women prisoners are not allowed to bring in winter clothing, other forms of covering or sanitary products. They are denied the human right to hygiene and the right to change their clothes. There is a severe shortage of cleaning materials and insecticides in the prisons.

Violations of the rights of medical teams

258. In 2014, the Palestinian Red Crescent recorded 1,246 violations of the rights of medical teams in the West Bank who were carrying out humanitarian assistance work such as surgical procedures and the transportation and delivery of emergency care to the wounded and sick. Ambulances with patients on board were prevented from passing and emergency personnel were assaulted and subjected to gas canister attacks.

Aggression against the Gaza Strip in 2014

259. The most recent assault on the Gaza Strip did untold damage to the fundamental rights of Palestinian women, notably their right to life, survival, physical integrity, health, protection as civilians during an armed conflict and the right not to be used as targets. The unlawful and protracted Israeli aggression made no distinction between military and civilian targets and constituted a grave breach of the principles of proportionality, necessity and humanity. It led to the killing of around 489 women, 22 per cent of the total number of victims, including 16 pregnant women. A total of 3,532 women were injured, accounting for 31 per cent of all those injured. The assault left an indelible mark on women's reproductive health. Because they were not able to get to hospital and delivery of care was delayed, 4 pregnant women died and 18 had to have their babies at home. The number of premature births increased because of anxiety and stress felt by expectant mothers. The neonatal mortality rate doubled during the assault, rising to 14 per cent from 7 per cent in the preceding months. This was due to the use of gas, the shortage of medicines and medical equipment and the direct injuries inflicted on women.

260. Work in the six hospital birth wards was interrupted and some 117 hospitals, clinics, primary health centres and pharmacies were damaged. Prenatal services became more scarce, as the wards were used to treat the wounded, and women who had had Caesarean sections were discharged early from hospital. Prenatal services were cut by more than 70 per cent during the assault and family planning services were reduced by between 60 and 90 per cent during the same period.

The illegal blockade

261. The illegal blockade imposed by Israel, the occupying power, is undermining the functioning of the health-care system, thereby affecting the health and endangering the lives of 1.8 million Palestinian women and men in Gaza. The capacity of the health system in Gaza had been severely curtailed due to the impossibility of modernizing, reconstructing or renovating infrastructure damaged by ongoing Israeli military aggression.

262. Medical services, including life-saving procedures, are at risk of collapse as the fuel used to run backup generators is in short supply due to the illegal blockade and the racist policies applied in allowing the importation of fuel. Continual power cuts very often result in damage to delicate medical equipment. Moreover, the occupying power applies unlawful restrictions to the importation of medicines, treatment devices, medical equipment and spare parts, while the fact that thousands of Palestinian women and men who suffer from serious illness are being prevented from travelling to the West Bank or abroad to receive treatment is resulting in the deaths of hundreds of them.

Equality of economic, social and cultural rights

263. In 2004, Palestine acceded to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The preamble to the Amended Basic Law has affirmed Palestine's commitment to guarantee and respect all basic human rights and fundamental freedoms. Palestine does all it can to enforce these rights and to focus on issues affecting women as essential and active partners in building the economy and society.

The right to adequate housing

264. The Amended Basic Law affirms that adequate housing is the right of every citizen, and stipulates that the State shall secure housing for those who are without shelter. The relevant laws, such as Law No. 1 (1996) on ownership of flats, apartments and shops, do not discriminate between men and women.

265. As part of its strategic plans in recent years, the Palestinian Ministry of Public Works and Housing has developed and implemented a number of housing projects to provide decent, sanitary and affordable housing for all citizens, particularly families earning less than the average income, which include poor households headed by women and widows. Under the plan, the Ministry prioritizes the building of such housing projects within cities and on their immediate outskirts in order to keep transportation costs low and ensure easy access.

266. In 1991, the Palestinian Housing Council was established to alleviate housing problems faced by families on limited incomes, to provide long-term housing loans for those families and to improve housing for poor and marginalized groups, particularly women, divorcées, widows, the elderly and persons with special needs. Over 7,000 Palestinian families, or more than 40,000 individuals, have benefited from Council programmes. Some 1,976 marginalized and poor families and families with members with special needs are able to exercise their right to decent housing through grants and the ability to adapt their homes to their needs.

Challenges

The home demolition policy of the occupation authorities

267. In various parts of occupied Palestine, women bear the brunt of Israeli occupation violations and the policy of home demolition. These women face multiple challenges, particularly as it often is their responsibility to carry out the roles expected of them and to provide shelter, and, by extension, safety and security, for the family, in physically and psychologically demanding circumstances.

268. In addition to the psychological suffering experienced by women when their homes are destroyed, economic conditions have worsened for Palestinian households due to the demolition of homes, the loss of their possessions, lost opportunities to work, boys and girls being forced to drop out of school, the increase in the rate of early marriage and the increase in economic burdens on the family and women in particular. Statistics provided below shed some light on the magnitude of the suffering of Palestinian women as a result of the Israeli occupation authorities' policy of demolishing homes that do not in fact pose any significant security threat.

269. Various pretexts are used by the Israeli occupation authorities for home demolitions in occupied Palestine. The reasons given in the Gaza Strip differ from those in the West Bank, including Jerusalem. Since 1967, the occupation authorities, pursuant to the British mandate Defence (Emergency) Regulations of 1945, have always demolished Palestinian homes on illegal pretexts, such as ostensible security reasons; failure to obtain permits based on racist laws; violation of racist Israel housing policies; or the proximity of those homes to illegal settlements, borders or bypass roads. The Israeli occupation forces have also employed various methods to demolish homes, using bulldozers, heavy artillery, air-to-ground missiles, ground-to-ground missiles and explosives.

270. In the Gaza Strip, houses and other civilian buildings have been destroyed by missiles and artillery shells, without prior warning to the occupants. When warnings are issued, they are pro forma and serve only to sow fear. They do not meet international legal standards, as these “early warnings” do not allow sufficient time for people to evacuate their homes safely — in most cases, only one to three minutes. In any case, even if residents are able to evacuate safely, there is no other safe place for them to go, as all civilian buildings, even schools and shelters, are targeted by artillery or Israeli aircraft.

271. Statistics show that Israeli attacks on the Gaza Strip in 2014 led to the destruction of some 13,217 homes, 1,742 of which were totally destroyed. Approximately 100,000 Palestinians were displaced as a result. In earlier Israeli military attacks and operations in the Gaza Strip during the period from 1 January 2008 to 1 August 2013, Israeli occupying forces demolished some 14,086 homes, 2,836 of which were totally destroyed. The housing crisis in the Gaza Strip is exacerbated by the Israeli blockade that has been in place since 2006, the denial of import of necessary materials for housing and infrastructure reconstruction and the policy of preventing Palestinians from using large areas of land close to the border.

272. In Jerusalem, Israel pursues a policy of Judaizing the city and divorcing it from its Palestinian reality. It employs all manner of illegal methods available to remove the city’s Palestinian population by force. One of the most important methods is the confiscation of land and the destruction of property and houses. According to the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in occupied Palestinian territory, 35 per cent of land in East Jerusalem has been confiscated for the development of illegal Israeli settlements. Only 13 per cent of East Jerusalem land has been allocated for Palestinian construction, most of which is already in use. At least one third of Palestinian homes in East Jerusalem do not have building permits, as they are difficult to obtain due to racist laws imposed by the Israeli authorities. Therefore, more than 90,000 citizens live under the constant threat of home demolition and expulsion, with the accompanying psychological repercussions.

273. As noted by the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, the Israeli occupying forces in East Jerusalem destroyed 2,000 houses between 1967 and 2014, resulting in the displacement of approximately 5,419 people, including 2,832 children and 1,423 women. Houses are often demolished using bulldozers. The occupation authorities attack the occupants when they try to protect their homes and prevent them from being destroyed. In recent years, the Israeli occupation authorities have begun to force the Palestinian population to demolish their homes themselves and at their own expense. Criminal occupation demolitions of Palestinian homes have increased of late, with approximately 550 houses destroyed by the occupying forces in the West Bank in 2015, 1,094 houses destroyed in 2016, and 177 houses destroyed in January and February of 2017.

274. The full control exercised by Israel over Area C, an area which represents approximately 60 per cent of the West Bank, has led to severe restrictions on the right of Palestinians to housing and natural expansion. Most of that land is allocated to Israeli settlements, which are privileged over Palestinian communities in terms of access to land, resources, planning and infrastructure development. Seventy per cent of the land is located within the boundaries of the regional councils of the settlements. Palestinians are prohibited from using or developing it and the Israeli civil administration, according to the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, allows Palestinians to build in less than 1 per cent of Area C, which no longer has any space available for construction.

275. Five thousand Palestinians live in 38 compounds that are partly located in parts of Area C that have been declared as military training “firing zones”, which has increased the population’s exposure to danger and risk of expulsion. Approximately 540 Palestinian buildings were demolished in 2012, including 165 homes that were claimed to lack Israeli building permits. This led to the displacement of 815 people, more than half of them children. Those Palestinian compounds already suffered from a total lack of decent services or infrastructure.

276. Thousands of Palestinians from Bedouin settlements and herder communities in the West Bank and East Jerusalem are at risk of forcible displacement under illegal and racist plans. Israel, the occupying Power, wants to give these plans a veneer of legality by describing them as resettlement programmes aimed at serving the Bedouin communities and improving their living conditions. However, these are merely settler schemes designed to empty the territory of its Palestinian inhabitants and set up outposts that would undermine the geographical continuity of the occupied State of Palestine. These plans aim to normalize the confiscation and destruction of private Bedouin property such as homes, shelters and livestock pens, as well as the destruction of basic services and infrastructure.

277. Israel currently intends to forcibly move some 46 Bedouin communities of 5,000 to 11,000 individuals, over two thirds of them women and children, to areas that do not meet minimum living standards. The dire living conditions and limited areas for grazing or other sustenance will lead to the loss of tribal continuity and will undermine their traditional lifestyle. One of these settlements is located near a municipal landfill that would pose a health risk to this population. Even though it claims to recognize "Bedouin law", Israel has since the 1990s forcibly displaced over 200 Palestinian Bedouin families from these communities, and continually demolishes hundreds of tents, agricultural and livestock facilities, and water and sanitation installations on the pretext that they are unauthorized and have been illegally set up in Area C.

278. In addition to this particular racist plan, Israel, the occupying Power, pursues a variety of other illegal policies and practices to shore up its plans to displace Palestinian Bedouin by creating a climate of coercion and unacceptable living conditions. It denies repeated requests for building permits, destroys houses, tents and schools. It restricts access to pasture and markets. It confiscates and destroys, or restricts delivery of, humanitarian assistance and restricts its delivery. All these practices have the ultimate effect of forcing these communities to leave the areas where they live.

279. Undoubtedly, depriving Bedouin families of their fundamental rights, especially the right to adequate housing, primarily impacts Bedouin women, as the home is their basic shelter and source of security. It also affects their right to basic services and a decent standard of living.

Family benefits

280. The Civil Service Act grants female civil servants the right to receive family allowances for non-State employee husbands and children up to the age of 18. In certain cases, this allowance might be continued even after the children reach the age of 18. With respect to other benefits, the Act makes no distinction between entitlements for female and male civil service employees.

281. With respect to other family benefits such as retirement pensions, either spouse may leave entitlements such as pensions and compensation to their heirs in accordance with the provisions of the Public Pension Act, without any discrimination on the basis of sex. A widow may also inherit such benefits and compensation from her deceased pensioner husband. A husband may inherit them if at the time of his wife's death he is unable to earn an income for health or other reasons. This regulation entails unequal pension rights for women, as she is obliged to pay into her pension fund on the same basis as men. It is also assumed that women are always dependent and that men are always the breadwinners and never dependent on their spouses. However, a female employee who has reached retirement age and earns a pension for her service will not lose her pension because she is married.

282. There are disparities in poverty rates between male-headed households and female-headed households (the latter accounted for 9.3 per cent of all Palestinian households in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in 2011). However, those disparities are not great, with a poverty rate of 29.8 per cent for male-headed households and 25.5 per cent for female-headed households. A study shows that female-headed households are not necessarily the poorest, as the factors contributing to poverty, such as marital status, level of education and type of employment, impact all families and are the same whether a man or a woman is the breadwinner.

283. As part of the efforts by the State of Palestine to provide a decent standard of living and promote equality and justice for all individuals without discrimination, the Government has strived over recent years to improve and reform the social safety net in order to ensure that it helps those in need. For example, the State has streamlined cash assistance programmes into a single programme, namely the Cash Transfers Programme (CTP), which in 2013 assisted some 104,203 families, or 586,024 individuals, at a cost of $128 million. Households headed by women accounted for 43.6 per cent of all beneficiary families.

284. The Ministry of Social Development is charged with supporting vulnerable populations, such as poor families, persons with disabilities, orphans, children and the elderly. That entails positive discrimination in favour women, especially with respect to access to assistance and streamlining of procedures. The Ministry offers these groups assistance and social insurance such as cash, in-kind assistance, food, clothing, health insurance, auxiliary aids for persons with disabilities, customs exemptions, school fees, economic empowerment services and shelter and health care services.

Bank loans and mortgages

285. The law does not discriminate between women and men with respect to bank loans and mortgages. Under such laws, men and women have equal legal capacity to perform bank transactions, open bank accounts, make deposits, borrow, and obtain mortgages, credit facilities and various other types of credit. Women are subject to the same restrictions, conditions and interest rates that are set for men, and do not have to meet any special requirements.

286. Legislation governing the financial sector outside of the banks in Palestine treats women and men equally. That is the case with regard to the activities of securities markets and companies as well as the underwriting, trading, deposit, transfer and settlement of securities. Statistics issued by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics for 2014 indicate that 41.1 per cent of account holders in the Palestinian securities exchange (the Palestine Exchange) were women, while 58.9 per cent were men.

Women's sports

287. Policies in the area of recreational and sporting games do not discriminate against women and girls. In the education system, physical education is compulsory in all schools. Female students participate in sporting activities on an equal basis with their male counterparts.

288. In 2004, the first Palestinian women's football team was formed and participated in several Arab and Asian championships. In 2008, a Palestinian women's football league, composed of several women's football clubs, was established.

289. With regard to sport for women with disabilities, it should be noted that the law on sport attaches particular importance to developing the potential of persons with disabilities and providing them with opportunities to engage in sporting activities at high levels. The Supreme Council on Youth and Sport is carrying out a project to empower children with disabilities and strengthen their leadership skills through sporting activities.

Rural women

290. The proportion of the Palestinian population living in rural areas amounts to 16.8 per cent of the total population in Palestine, or approximately 4.6 million people, compared with the 73.8 per cent who live in urban areas and the 9.4 per cent of them in refugee camps. The second Palestinian Population, Housing and Establishment Census, conducted in 2007, defines rural areas as population centres with fewer than 4,000 inhabitants. Population centres with 4,000 to 9,999 inhabitants are counted as rural if they lack the following four facilities: a public electricity grid, a post office, a healthcare centre with a full-time practitioner on staff five days a week, and a secondary school that grants a general secondary school diploma.

291. The economic activity of rural women remains low overall. Economically active women account for 18.9 per cent of the total labour force, of which 47.2 per cent are located in the Palestinian countryside. Women accounted for 25.6 per cent of agricultural workers, which is relatively significant given that agriculture is the primary economic activity and major source of income for families, providing jobs for approximately 9.5 per cent of the labour force in the West Bank and 6.6 per cent in the Gaza Strip. The agricultural sector accounts for 5.6 per cent of GDP and 21 per cent of total exports, and enables local populations to achieve food security and self-sufficiency through local agricultural products. Agriculture is also a key factor in protecting Palestinian land from confiscation by occupation authorities and settlement expansion.

292. Agricultural sector workers are not exempt from the scope of application of the Labour Law, even if the agricultural work they do is temporary or seasonal. The provisions of the Labour Law stipulate that workers engaging in short-term, temporary or seasonal work have the same rights and responsibilities as permanent workers. Working hours and leave for seasonal agricultural workers provided for in Council of Ministers decision No. 42 (2004).

293. The Disaster Risk Reduction and Insurance Fund is a non-profit fund established pursuant to Decree Law No. 12 (2013). It works to put in place precautionary measures to minimize the impacts of natural disasters, and other risks to the agricultural sector, chief among them violations perpetrated by the Israeli occupation. The Fund compensates farmers and insured persons for agricultural damages and losses.

294. The strategic objectives of the Palestinian National Development Plan 2014 to 2016 pay special attention to rural women, as well as to women in Area C, marginalized areas, refugee camps and areas affected by the annexationist expansionist wall and the Israeli settlements. Areas of particular concern include enhancing guarantees of fair access to public services, improving the effectiveness of those services and working to bridge the development gaps between different geographical regions.

Challenges

The fragmentation of Palestinian land

295. Israel, the occupying Power, is responsible for widespread illegal practices intended to create facts on the ground and make its illegitimate presence on occupied Palestinian land permanent, thereby fragmenting its geographic unity and violating Palestinians' right to self-determination, in flagrant contravention of international norms. Those measures include the destruction of property and the seizure and de facto annexation of Palestinian lands by force, the construction of settlements on contiguous blocks of land that Palestinians cannot enter, the annexationist expansionist wall that separates the Israeli and Palestinian populations, while also separating Palestinian towns and villages and maintaining the corridors that link Palestinian areas under Israeli control.

296. Israeli settlements are one of the most important elements of the illegitimate colonialist occupation regime installed by Israel, the occupying Power, immediately following its occupation of Palestine. Israel exercises security and administrative control over the entire illegal settlement area, which it is working to fortify and support through the construction of infrastructure, naturally leading to the creeping annexation of land, preventing the establishment of a contiguous Palestinian state and undermining the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination. Israel also effectively dominates the remainder of occupied Palestine through security measures of which the least that can be said is that they are racist against Palestinians. Those measures entail consistent and daily violations of the rights of Palestinians that most certainly do not discriminate between women and men. They violate the rights to personal safety, freedom of movement, work, education, health, fair trial, freedom of access to places of worship and effective remedies.

297. Since 2002, Israel has continued to build and maintain the annexationist expansionist wall that is a gross violation of the provisions of international law and of the 2004 advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. Some 351,000 Palestinian citizens live in isolated and besieged areas in the "seam zone" between the wall and the Green Line, largely isolated from the main Palestinian cities and towns. Those citizens are required to obtain special permits to enter and exit, sometimes only at specific times, and to continue to reside in their homes which they have to cross numerous gates and military checkpoints to reach. That undermines their right to freedom of movement, denying them regular, easy access to their homes and hindering their access to institutions and facilities that provide basic public services, such as education and health. Anyone who owns land within that area must obtain a special permit, which is often subject to repeated refusal, in order to access their agricultural lands and water resources through agricultural gates that are not opened at regular hours for Palestinian farmers, as is described in the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee regarding Israel in 2010, in which the Committee expressed its concern at the non-compliance by Israel with its obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. This situation reduces the time available to gain access to land and perform agricultural work, adversely affecting life in the Palestinian countryside and the sources of income of its population.

298. This situation has a major impact on women in those areas. The wall, illegal settlements and accompanying system of barriers and permits violate women's fundamental rights. In terms of the right to adequate housing, Israeli practices include the destruction, confiscation and removal of Palestinian private property from homes, land, orchards and fields. That undermines the right of Palestinian families, including women, to secure ownership, and deny them the right to inhabit and enjoy their homes without fear of losing them, also preventing them from improving their housing and living conditions. Palestinian women in those areas live in poverty in inadequate, overcrowded and dangerous housing with zinc and asbestos roofing. Palestinians in the seam zone cannot obtain licences to build, expand or renovate houses. Since most Palestinian women in those areas do not work outside the home, their lives are the most affected by the poor, overcrowded housing conditions. They stay inside longer and shoulder the responsibility for caring for children and the elderly, in addition to performing household tasks and some minor income-earning activities at home.

299. The wall also violates the right of women to sustainable access to natural and public resources. For example, women, as well as their families, are prohibited from bringing heating and cooking gas home through checkpoints along the wall. They have also been barred from bringing home some food products, such as meat and eggs. They cannot dispose of waste because sanitation trucks are not allowed to reach their homes.

300. The wall and settlements impede women's freedom of movement, transportation and access to their homes and lands. That situation is aggravated by a lack of transportation that impacts Palestinians in those areas disproportionately. Palestinian buses and other forms of public transport do not have access to areas under Israeli control. Alternative means of transport are cost-prohibitive. The poorest families cannot afford and private cars.

301. Women in the safe zone are also barred from access to basic services. In particular, most health services are provided in the West Bank on the eastern side of the wall. Those women are therefore forced to pass through the barriers and undergo searches, harassment and confrontations with armed Israeli soldiers. That can be on an almost daily basis for women in need of regular access to medical services for routine examinations during and after pregnancy, as well as other medical services.

302. Women are also being denied their right to education. The wall and settlements separate students and teachers from their schools. The daily journey can take two hours each way because of bypass roads, military checkpoints and gates. Enrolment numbers, especially for girl students, have plummeted at many schools. Palestinian families living in those areas have been forced to urge their daughters to give up their spots in school and remain at home, or to marry them off at an early age in order to spare them the daily checkpoint crossings and hostile encounters with Israeli soldiers that they would have to face if attending school. Those same obstacles created by the wall have also led to a decline in enrolment rates at Palestinian universities.

303. The wall and settlements also have an impact on the rights of women, particularly rural women, to work and earn a livelihood. They prohibit the passage of equipment needed to harvest crops in the fields. Transporting products, crops and fodder through checkpoints and gates is also prohibited. Palestinian women and men are not permitted to transfer more than two kilogrammes of anything to their villages without coordination, especially in most villages located in the seam zone. The lives of women are especially affected by that situation. It deprives them of the ability to be economically self-sufficient, which in many cases forces them into dependency on male relatives, costing them not only their economic autonomy but also their social status.

304. Without a doubt, the wall and the regime associated with it are intended to drive male and female Palestinian farmers to despair and get them to give up cultivating their lands west of the wall. In particular, the widespread threats to not renew permits could result in fields being shut down and lying fallow, as a result of which they could be declared State land and their owners should be stripped of ownership.

305. The reality of life in the areas adjacent to the wall is frustrating for women in terms of their family life, as only those who live in those areas are allowed to enter. This means that women, who have moved to the area to live with their husbands, are cut off from their families and surroundings. The construction of the wall and the imposition of numerous policies barring Palestinian women - whether Muslim or Christian - and Palestinian men from entering Jerusalem from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip violate their freedom to access holy sites in East Jerusalem.

Attacks on women farmers and destruction and theft of agricultural crops

306. The racist measures imposed by occupation authorities against male and female Palestinian farmers prevent farmers from getting to their fields to cultivate them, especially fields adjacent to the wall. They also open the door to attacks by terrorist settler militias that invade, destroy and burn agricultural land, uproot fruit trees, and destroy, poison, burn and steal crops, mainly olive trees. It is not only the terrorist settlers who perpetrate such attacks; they are also carried out by the Israeli occupation forces.

307. Statistics show that some 850,000 olive trees were destroyed by the occupying forces and terrorist settlers in the West Bank between 1967 and 2014, with 11,000 trees uprooted in 2014 alone. That is according to the department of the Palestinian Ministry of Agriculture responsible for documenting such damages. As a result, olive oil production has decreased by an average of 2,200 tons per year. Some 9 million olive trees in the West Bank have fallen prey to such crimes. In addition to the symbolism of the olive tree as the emblem of Palestinian national steadfastness and resistance, it is a strategic crop in terms of its economic, nutritional and medicinal value. Some 80,000 families rely on olive tree cultivation as their main or secondary source of income, and the crop accounts for 15 to 20 per cent of gross agricultural income in Palestine.

308. Terrorist settler militias and Israeli occupation forces have razed large areas of agricultural land and destroyed infrastructure, attacked and stolen livestock, demolished livestock sheds and agricultural installations, hindered the movement of citizens and products and exerted control over crossings, borders and waste burial. All this has visited ever greater devastation upon the already besieged agricultural sector and upon men and women farmers, even without taking into account the rise in poverty and unemployment. The persons and the dignity of Palestinian farmers, especially women, are not spared by terrorist settler militias and Israeli occupation forces, which beat, humiliate, threaten and fire tear gas on them daily in order to force farmers to evacuate their land.

309. The Ministry of Agriculture has identified some 4,690 Israeli violations against Palestinian farmers and agricultural land over the past five years, with losses estimated at $48.32 million. The Ministry of Agriculture documents these violations and the resulting damages in order to prosecute the perpetrators and demand compensation. However, most of these complaints, like others, are often closed without any indictment being brought by the Israeli law enforcement agencies or the judiciary, which function basically as tools for maintaining the occupation, protecting its interests, and rendering the political and military echelons the terrorist settler militias immune to any accountability, thereby ensuring their total impunity for the violations they commit against Palestinians, both women and men.

Equality before the law and the judiciary

310. The Amended Basic Law treats Palestinian men and women equally before the law and the courts. The same is true for most legislation in force, including the commercial and civil codes, the law on landlords and tenants, the law on the rights of persons with disabilities, the law on prisons, the laws governing professions and the law on the environment. There are still provisions prejudicial to gender equality in certain laws inherited from previous eras. That applies particularly to the Penal Code and the Personal Status Code.

Equality of legal capacity

311. As a rule, there nothing in the laws in force to prevent women from possessing legal capacity to carry out legal procedures on an equal footing with men. However, there are some exceptions. Like men, women in Palestine are considered to have full legal capacity at the age of 18, regardless of social status, with respect both to eligibility to act and eligibility to take on obligations. Women have the same legal capacity as men to carry out civil and commercial transactions on behalf of themselves and others. That includes signing contracts or managing property, businesses or companies. Women have full capacity to impose and take on obligations, and to conclude credit and real estate contracts under the same terms as men.

312. The matrimonial property system used in Palestine is a separate property regime. Each spouse retains ownership of property previously owned or accumulated during married life. The wife's property is separate from that of the husband. She has the right to dispose of it independently of without her husband's authorization. There are two cases in which legislation places restrictions on a wife's assets because of a husband's actions. The first is if he declares bankruptcy. In such cases, the wife considered subsidiary to the husband under the Commercial Code. It is assumed that property acquired during the marriage was purchased with the husband's money and is included among assets to be liquidated unless the wife proves otherwise. The second case is if her husband is a fugitive accused of an offence related to public funds under the Code of Criminal Procedures. In such a case, the wife's assets and property may be considered, on the basis of evidence, to be the proceeds of the crime under investigation and may be confiscated.

313. The Amended Basic Law and the codes of civil, criminal and administrative procedure contain provisions guaranteeing the equality of citizens before the courts. Women have the same standing as men to litigate. They have the right to file suit, defend themselves, present evidence, make accusations, claim compensation or seek enforcement in any other court proceeding in any court at any level. A woman also has the right without discrimination to seek to have an attorney appointed at State expense if she is accused of a crime and her financial circumstances make her unable to pay legal fees. The proposed 2014 draft law on a Palestinian legal aid fund grants indigent persons the right to seek legal assistance at any stage of a legal proceeding. Under such conditions, women, children and persons with disabilities are given special priority. That constitutes an effective strategic tool to ensure that women in particular have recourse to justice.

314. The codes of civil, criminal and administrative procedure treat the court testimony of a woman no differently from that of a man and give both the same weight. The circumstances in which testimony is accepted or taken under advisement or rejected by a court are the same for men and women without discrimination. That is not the case in the sharia courts, where the testimony of a woman is treated differently from that of a man. The same applies to testimony relating to marriage contracts. The testimony of a man is equivalent to that of two women. One woman by herself cannot act as a witness. There must be either two male witnesses or one man and two women. The same applies to land sale transactions conducted at land registration bureaus.

315. The Amended Basic Law guarantees freedom of residence and movement to both men and women. No Palestinian may be forced to leave the homeland or prevented from returning to it or leaving it. Other laws in force do not contain any provisions restricting the right of a woman to travel or choose her place of residence. An exception to that is to be found in personal status legislation that requires a married woman to move with her husband and reside in her husband's home, provided that the woman has been paid her advance dowry and the home in question is legal, secure and furnished with all the necessities of life. However, that legislation gives a woman the right to stipulate in the marriage contract that her husband will not force her to change residence. She may also stipulate that he may not take her out of the country or force her to live in a particular country. Such stipulations are binding. If the husband fails to fulfil them, the marriage contract may be dissolved at the wife's request, without prejudice to the rest of her marital rights.

316. Women have the same freedom of movement and travel as a man. A wife or daughter has the right to obtain a passport without the approval of the husband or father. As long as a woman is over 18 years of age, there is no legal basis for a man to prevent his wife or daughter from travelling, even if she is travelling without his permission and without a close relative accompanying her. A widowed mother may have passports issued in her children's name provided she has a certificate of guardianship from a sharia court.

Challenges

317. Israel, the occupying Power, practices a policy of apartheid characterized by racist policies and procedures that violate the rights of Palestinian women — and men — to move freely and choose their place of residence. It has set up physical and administrative obstacles that prevent Palestinians from using many roads in the territory of the State of Palestine. At the same time, Israelis have the right to move about with complete freedom in all areas with no obstacles whatsoever. In the very heart of the West Bank, Israeli settlements located inside the Green Line are linked by a network of roads that Palestinians are prohibited from using. There are hundreds of military checkpoints and other physical obstacles set up between cities and towns that make movement difficult, particularly for sick persons, the elderly, pregnant women and children. In addition, Israeli enforces a policy of roadblocks, street closures and curfews, and has built bypass roads that not only violate Palestinians' right to movement but also have the effect of isolating Palestinian communities and fragmenting the State of Palestine by cutting of natural geographic contiguity.

318. Four million Palestinian men and women from the rest of the territory of the State of Palestine are prohibited from residing in East Jerusalem, the capital of the State of Palestine and an integral part thereof. They may not even enter East Jerusalem without temporary permits that are difficult to obtain. The right of Palestinians to move around and gain access to Jerusalem has been violated even more severely in the wake of the construction of the illegal annexationist and expansionist wall around the city, which, combined with the system of checkpoints and permits, constitutes the greatest violation of all of Palestinians' right to freedom of movement.

319. For the ten years now, Israel, the occupying Power, has imposed an illegal blockade on the inhabitants of the Gaza Strip. Some 2 million Palestinian men and women who live in the Strip continue to be deprived of their right to freedom of movement in and out of the Strip. They cannot travel even just to the West Bank because of the closure of the Bayt Hanun crossing, which is the only way to get from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank. The same is true for people who live in the West Bank, including Jerusalem, who are barred from entering the Gaza Strip.

320. Israeli restrictions on freedom of movement are not just confined to the movement Palestinians inside Occupied Palestine. They extend to the international border crossings, which have been controlled by Israel since it occupied the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, allowing it to exert complete control of the entry and exit of Palestinians.

321. These racist Israeli policies have serious implications for the economic, commercial and agricultural sectors, as well as education and health. They also have the effect of undermining family relations, which affect all Palestinians, but most especially women.

The Israeli court system

322. The Israeli judiciary is the cornerstone of the racist colonial occupation regime. In particular, the composition and procedures of the military courts violate international law and the rights of Palestinian victims — women and men — by depriving them of their right to a just remedy for the violations and crimes committed against them by the occupation army and the terrorist settler militias. Cases to which an Israeli is a party can only be brought before Israeli courts, even if all the other parties are Palestinian and the incidents under dispute occurred on Palestinian territory. Palestinians who file suit before Israeli courts, even in civil and criminal cases, face racist procedural hurdles and exorbitant court bonds and fees that make it impossible for them to exercise their right to just redress. Palestinians are also denied compensation by the Israeli authorities for actions perpetrated by Israeli officials, which is their right under the law on civil liability (liability of the State) (2005), amended in 2012. For their part, the Israeli occupation forces prevent Palestinian victims from physically going to Israeli courts with their racist policies and measures that obstruct the movement of Palestinians and make it impossible for them to get to courts in Jerusalem or inside Israel. Taken as a whole, all this deprives Palestinian victims — women and men alike — of their right to justice and compensation, insulates the crimes and violations of the occupation from accountability, provides impunity to the Israeli perpetrators (whether they are members of the terrorist settler militias or the occupation army forces), and gives them licence to continue committing all manner of acts of violence and terrorism against the property and persons of Palestinian men and women, wherever they may be.

Article 16

Women's rights under personal status laws

323. Muslims in Palestine do not have a uniform, modern and fair legislative framework for personal status matters. In the West Bank, the applicable codes are the Jordanian Personal Status Code (No. 61, 1976) and the Code of Sharia Legal Procedure (No. 31, 1959), as amended. In the Gaza Strip the applicable codes are the Ottoman-era Palestinian Code from 1917 and the Family Rights Code (Order 202, 1954), followed by the Code of Sharia Legal Procedure (No. 12, 1965) issued by the governor of the Gaza Strip, with supplementary provisions from the Majalla al-Ahkam al-Adaliyah. Meanwhile, the Sharia Court of East Jerusalem operates under the personal status laws applicable in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, because that Court is still administratively part of that Kingdom's sharia justice system. Any amendments to the that Kingdom's personal status codes are instantly put into force by that Court, which is currently enforcing the 2010 Jordanian Personal Status Code (No. 36, 2010).

324. In general, these various codes regulate matters pertaining to marriage and family relations, including betrothal, children, divorce, guardianship and inheritance. Their provisions are based on the Islamic sharia, that is to say, the Holy Quran, the Sunnah of the Prophet, and certain schools of Islamic jurisprudence, primarily the Hanafi school. Certain of those codes defer to what is predominant practice in the Hanafi school where there is no explicit text. The Office of the Chief Qadi has jurisdiction over personal status matters pertaining to Muslims. The sharia courts hear and rule on personal status cases among Muslims. The Christian communities have their own personal status codes which are enforced by their ecclesiastical courts.

325. The personal status codes in force among both Muslims and Christians share several general principles that are applicable when it comes marriage issues. The most important are as follows:

- Marriage may be contracted only between a man and a woman.
- Relations between men and women outside of the institution of marriage are illegitimate.
- The full and free consent of both the man and the woman is an essential condition for a valid marriage.
- Personal status documents — and most particularly marriage and divorce certificates — must be registered with the sharia or ecclesiastical courts. That protects the rights of both spouses and their children with respect to inheritance, parentage, dowries and alimony.

The right to contract marriage

326. The law guarantees a woman's freedom to become engaged and break off an engagement, and to conclude a marriage contract of her own free will, without anything detracting from that free will. A coerced marriage is considered invalid, and the spouses are not permitted to stay together. If they do not separate of their own accord, a judge will separate them. If the marriage was not consummated, it has no effect. If the marriage was consummated, then the rules for dowry, post-marital waiting period and parentage apply, but the rules for inheritance and upkeep before and after the separation do not apply. A woman has the right to insert into the marriage contract any condition in her interest that is not prohibited under sharia law and does not prejudice the right of a third party. If the husband fails to comply with such a condition, the marriage contract may be annulled at the request of the wife, without prejudice to her marital rights.

327. However, there do exist provisions that restrict and limit a women's freedom to contract marriage. A marriage contract for a virgin daughter requires the approval of a guardian, who is always a male. Males do not need the approval of a guardian. Where there is no guardian, or if the guardian withholds approval (that is, if he refuses to allow the daughter to get married for no legal reason), a judge becomes the guardian of the daughter and has the right to approve the marriage. A widow or divorcee over the age of 18 does not need the approval of a guardian to get married.

328. Personal status laws in force discriminate between women and men with respect to marriage age. The minimum marriage age in the West Bank is 16 Islamic calendar years for males and 15 Islamic calendar years for females. In the Gaza Strip, the marriage age is 18 for males and 17 for females. However, a judge may allow a girl over 9 years of age to get married if she is ruled to be sufficiently mature and her physical constitution is equal to it. The same applies to a boy over 12 years of age if he is ruled to be sufficiently mature and his physical constitution is equal to it, even if his guardian does not give permission for him to get married. The bride and groom must both have reached the aforementioned marriage ages in order to conclude a valid marriage contract. Otherwise, the marriage is considered invalid.

329. The marriage age for the Eastern Christian churches is 16 for a boy and 14 for a girl. The same applies to the Roman Church. The Syriac Orthodox Church requires a boy to be 18 years old and a girl to be 16. In general, the Christian communities regard marriage as a sacrament. Marriage may be contracted if the conditions for free will, capacity and legal guardianship are fulfilled, and there is no other obstacle or impediment.

330. There are several respects in which the Muslim personal status codes in force restrict women's freedom to choose a husband. The guardian of a legally adult woman has the right to protest and sue before a judge for annulment if she marries a man without enough money for her — that is, who is unable to pay her advance dowry and afford her upkeep. However, the right of a guardian to lodge such a protest is revoked if the wife has become pregnant by her husband, or if her husband has acquired sufficient money by the time the suit is heard. Additionally, a Muslim man has the right to marry an adherent of one of the other recognized religions even if she continues to adhere to that religion, whereas a marriage between a Muslim woman with a non-Muslim man — even if he is an adherent of one of the recognized religions — is considered null and void. The rules for parentage, alimony, the post-marital waiting period, forbidden relationships and inheritance do not apply in such a case.

Rights and responsibilities when concluding or dissolving a marriage contract

331. Personal status laws in force enshrine traditional roles for the various members of a family. While the man is the head of the family and has guardianship and decision-making authority, the woman is supposed to be obedient and take care of the home. The marital relationship is based on reciprocity of rights and obligations rather than equality. The woman has rights that correspond to the man's duties and the man has rights that correspond to the woman's duties. Personal status laws require a man to maintain a good relationship with his wife and treat her with kindness, while a woman is required to obey her husband in all legally permitted matters. If the wife disobeys her husband by abandoning the marital home without just cause — which under the sharia would be if the husband harms his wife by beating or mistreating her — or by refusing to allow her husband to enter her home without having requested to be moved to another home, she loses her right to marital upkeep for as long as her disobedience persists. If she ends up being divorced for reason of that disobedience, she also loses her right to alimony.

332. A man can have up to four wives, on condition that he provides them with fair and equal treatment, upkeep and living conditions. He may not house them all under the same roof unless they agree. A wife does have the right to stipulate in the marriage contract that her husband may not marry anyone else and that if he does, the marriage contract may be annulled at her request without prejudice to any of her marital rights. The first wife must be informed that the husband intends to marry a second wife prior to concluding that second marriage contract, and the second wife must be informed that he is already married. Polygamy is prohibited by all of the Christian denominations.

333. Under Muslim personal status laws, a husband must provide his wife with upkeep regardless of how burdensome that is for him. She is not required to support even just herself with her own money. Required marital upkeep includes food, clothing and shelter, as well as adequate medical care, servants (if he provides his other wives with servants), and burial arrangements upon her death. A woman observing the waiting period after a separation, annulment or divorce, whether revocable or irrevocable, has the right to upkeep throughout the waiting period. Upkeep during the waiting period must be the same as marital upkeep. A woman whose husband dies does not receive upkeep during the waiting period whether she is pregnant or not. The same is the case for the Christian communities. Maintaining the wife is a husband's duty, regardless of how burdensome it is. She loses that right if she displays disobedience.

334. A father must also support his children if they do not have enough money of their own. A male child must be supported until he is old enough to work, unless they he is a student. A female child must be supported until she is able to work or gets married. A father is also obligated to provide for his male and female children's medical care and for their education through the undergraduate university level. The obligation to provide for education and health care passes to the mother, if she is able, in the event that the father is unable or absent. She is entitled to be paid back by the father when he becomes able or returns. The amount is treated as a debt for which he is liable.

335. If the husband refused to pay marital expenses or maintain his children, his wife or the children he is supposed to be supporting may sue for those expenses in sharia courts. Any judgment is executed by the sharia court enforcement agencies. A wife may have her husband imprisoned if he refuses to pay the expenses he has been judged liable for. There is no need to demonstrate that he has the capacity when seeking his imprisonment. She may also have his wages or the equivalent garnished by 25 per cent. Where there are several debts, the debt for family upkeep takes priority. She may also have her husband's property impounded and sold at public auction. In addition, debt owed for the upkeep of wives and children is considered to be preferred debt. It must be paid before other debts out of the movable and immovable assets of the debtor. In the event that the judgment rendered on family upkeep is impossible to enforce, the Alimony Fund pays the wife and children as described earlier.

336. The rights and responsibilities of parents include the obligations to educate children and manage their assets under they reach the age of majority. That is to say, they have guardianship of the children and their assets. Both responsibilities fall primarily on the father, even where the mother or other relatives have custody of the children in question. Trusteeship of assets belongs only to the father, then to a trustee chosen by the father, then the trustee of that trustee, and then to the grandfather. If the father dies intestate, trusteeship of the children's assets reverts to the grandfather, then to a trustee chosen by him and then the trustee of that trustee. If there is no grandfather or trustee, then trusteeship goes to the court or a court-appointed trustee. A father may choose his wife as trustee for his children's assets after his death. The court may also appoint the mother as trustee for her children under rules and conditions specified by law. Guardianship over a person operates in the same way as guardianship for marriage. It reverts to the closest male relatives of the boy or girl, in accordance with the predominant practice in the Hanafi school.

337. The Islamic sharia favours a foster care system over adoption. There is no legal bar to a woman being a foster parent. In most cases, foster children are related to their foster parent, whether a man or a woman, but they keep their original names. The foster care system approved by the Cabinet in 2013 treats men and women the same. It stipulates that the foster family seeking the right to care for and raise the child should be stable and contain two spouses living together. The foster care situation only ends if both parents die. That is to say that the mother retains the right to care for the child even if her fellow foster parent husband dies.

Divorce and separation

338. A man has the right to divorce his wife of his own free will for any reason, even without her consent. He also has the right to delegate another person to divorce his wife for him and register the divorce with the sharia court. The court then notifies the wife of the in-absentia divorce within a week of the registration.

339. There are two types of divorce. One is revocable divorce, which does not dissolve the marriage immediately. During the waiting period, the husband has the right to reinstate his wife by word or deed, even without her permission, and no new dowry is required. The second is irrevocable divorce. That dissolves the marriage on the spot. There are two types of irrevocable divorce. One is irrevocable divorce with minor separation, which occurs without three declarations of divorce, where the husband is allowed to remarry the divorced wife with a new marriage contract and dowry, with her consent. The second type is irrevocable divorce with major separation. In that case, the man may only remarry the divorced wife after she has married someone else in the meantime and then become divorced or widowed and completed the post-marital waiting period.

340. In principle, women may not divorce themselves on their own. However, there are a number of ways to seek an end to the marital relationship. They include the following:

- A woman may insert a clause in the marriage contract stating that she retains the right to divorce herself.
- A woman may seek annulment of the marriage contract on the grounds that the husband is not fulfilling his matrimonial duties under the law and under the marriage contract. She may sue for separation before a sharia court, but only through a long process with difficult requirements and in very specific cases. Those cases include the following: harm stemming from ongoing fighting between the spouses; harm stemming from the husband emigrating or abandoning her; insanity; illness or defect; failure to pay upkeep or the advance dowry; incarceration of the husband; failure by the husband to fulfil one of the conditions of the marriage contract.
- A woman may seek divorce by mutual consent, in which she requests a divorce in exchange for total or partial waiver of her financial rights.
- A wife may seek a court-ordered dissolution of the marriage if she has not yet consummated the marriage or been alone in complete seclusion with her husband. She may do so even without his consent by suing for dissolution of the marriage before a sharia court, on condition that she feels a revulsion against her husband that prevents her from consummating the marriage and embarking on married life, and that she pay a sum of money that she herself guarantees. That is in accordance with Circular No. 59 (2012) issued by the Office of the Chief Qadi.

341. A woman may go before a judge to seek compensation for being divorced by her husband arbitrarily for no acceptable reason. Such compensation is calculated in accordance with what the judge deems suitable, up to the equivalent of one year of upkeep. An award of compensation does not prejudice the other marital rights of the divorcee, including the right to alimony.

Custody

342. Personal status laws in force among Muslims grant a woman the right to custody of her children, provided she is capable and regardless whether the woman is married or divorced and or whether the children are male or female. The father's guardianship over his children continues throughout the custody period. He is also obligated to support them and to pay the cost of their dwelling and other costs associated with custody to the custodial parent (except to the mother during the marriage or during the waiting period after a revocable divorce).

343. After the mother, custody reverts to the next woman in the line of succession provided for in the Hanafi school, that is to say, the maternal grandmother, then the paternal grandmother, then the child's adult sister, and so on. If there are several people with custody rights at equal degrees of kinship, a judge may choose between them in the best interests of the child.

344. The period of custody is different in the West Bank than in the Gaza Strip. It also differs for male and female children. In the West Bank, the custody of a mother over her children lasts until natural or legal adulthood, which by law is 15 Islamic calendar years old. Custody for women other than the mother lasts until the age of 9 for a male child and the age of 11 for a female child. In the Gaza Strip, the custody of both a mother and other relatives lasts until the age of 7 for a boy and until the age of 9 for a girl, but a judge may extend custody to the age of 9 for a boy and the age of 11 for a girl if it is clearly in the child's best interest.

345. The right to custody is invalidated (for the mother or anyone else) if she marries a man who is not a close relative of the child. She can regain her right to custody if she gets divorced or the new husband dies, after the mandatory waiting period. Under the personal status code of the Syriac Orthodox Church, the custody period lasts until the age of 9 for a boy and the age of 11 for a girl. Custody belongs to the mother, but she loses custody if she marries someone else, whereupon custody reverts to the father.

346. When the period of custody ends, the female with custody hands the children over to the father. If the father is dead or does not have the capacity to assume custody, they are handed over to the grandfather, uncle or brother, and so on. If the father (or one of his close relatives) requests a female child to live with him after the custodial period is over and she rejects the request without justification, he may cut off support for her on the ground that she is rebellious. If a male child chooses between the mother and father when deciding where to live, his upkeep is not cut off if he chooses to stay with the mother.

347. The mother, like the father, has the right to see and host her children when they are living with the other custodial parent. She has the right to see and host her children once a week for a period of at least 24 hours, but she must return them to the male custodial parent when the period is over. A mother who is ruled in favour of may request speedy implementation without bail of judgments to hand over a male child or see him and to request imprisonment of the male custodial parent, even if it happens to be the father, until he complies.

348. A wife may keep her original family name and use it for all official transactions. Children are considered descendants of the father, and are required to bear his family name, because of the implications for inheritance and consanguineal relationships. The exception is in the case that the child is of unknown paternity, in which case he is regarded as the mother's descendant and bears her name.

349. With regard to work and the freedom to choose a profession, work is considered a right rather than a duty for women under the personal status codes. The wife has the right to work provided that her husband approves. She retains her right to marital upkeep and may compel her husband to provide for it even if she has a successful career. She loses her right to upkeep if she works without her husband's consent. Legislation in force does not restrict a woman's right to decide how many children to have and determine the spacing between births. A woman does not need her husband's approval to use family planning means.

350. A woman has the right to own assets and property, and to manage and oversee them independently without interference by her husband. In case of divorce, both spouses retain their assets, even what was accumulated during the marriage. The sharia and ecclesiastical courts do not have jurisdiction to hear and rule on marital disputes over movable or immovable assets, whether they occur during a marriage or after it is dissolved. That jurisdiction belongs only to the civil courts.

Inheritance

351. The rules for distributing inheritance are detailed in the Holy Quran. They depend on marriage and kinship. Contrary to widespread belief, it is not the case that under Islamic inheritance rules the principle of a man inheriting twice what a female inherits is applied in all cases where inheritance shares are distributed between men and women. There are actually more than 30 situations in which the woman gets a share equal to or greater than that of a man, or where she inherits but the male counterpart does not. On the other hand, there are four cases where a woman inherits half the share of a man. In addition, a wife has a fixed share of her deceased husband's inheritance, which is one eighth if she there are children or grandchildren by the son. (Children are considered to include sons, daughters and children of a son.) If there are no children, the wife gets one fourth of the inheritance. The wife is entitled to take her dowry and all debts out of the inheritance prior to it being distributed to any of the other heirs, even if that debt absorbs the entire inheritance.

352. In 2011, with a view to preventing women from being exploited in times of hardship and grief, the Office of the Chief Qadi issued a circular intended to eliminate certain social attitudes, customs and traditions that pressure women to sign over their inheritances to their brothers. That circular prohibits the registration of any such arrangement with sharia courts until four months after the date of death, after a thorough accounting has been made of all the heritable assets, signed by all the heirs and certified by the relevant local agency. It also requires a signed declaration from three experts determining what is truly one eighth of the inheritance shares being divided up. Prior to being registered, the division agreement must also be published in the form of an advertisement or annex to a local newspaper for the period of at least a week.

353. The law requires marriages and divorces to be registered with a sharia court in the case of Muslims and a church in the case of Christians. A marriage contract must be drawn up by an authorized marriage officiant in an official document. If a marriage is concluded without an official document, the officiant, the spouses and the witnesses are liable to imprisonment and a fine. Anyone who fails to register a divorce with a sharia court within 15 days is also liable to imprisonment or a fine. Unfortunately, the penalties imposed are somewhat light and do not constitute a strong deterrent. They are not proportionate to the potential impact of failure to register a divorce on the rights of the woman. The parties involved in processing marriage contracts and divorce certificates must send copies to the Personal Status Directorate. Likewise, the competent courts are required to notify the Civil Status Directorate of any rulings concerning marriage, divorce or inheritance. The Directorate must enter certificates and rulings in the relevant files and keep copies of them.

Question 1 – Information and Statistics

1. See Annex II.

Question 2 – Case Law

2. Many of the provisions of the CEDAW are enshrined in Israeli national legislation; in addition, the CEDAW as well as the Committee's General Comments are referenced by different courts in a variety of cases such as those relating to eliminating polygamy, protection on foreign workers (see for example Question 20), women in the public sphere and more.
3. For recent case law see Annex III.
4. With regard to efforts taken to give sufficient visibility to the Convention, the CEDAW is published in English, Hebrew and Arabic on the websites of both the Ministry of Justice (MOJ) and the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (AAW).
5. Furthermore, in July 2014, a summary of the provisions of the CEDAW was circulated by the Director of the Institute of Advanced Judicial Studies, among the Institute's members, including rabbinical court judges. The text that was circulated noted how important it is to increase awareness of varying forms of discrimination against women and disseminate the Convention's principles and values to the judges in Israel, whose work is crucial both in regard to human rights in general and women's rights in particular.

Question 3 – Reservations

6. Israel's reservation to Article 16 regarding personal status is reviewed periodically. At present, Israel maintains its position on this matter. This reservation stems from Israel's constitutional system and respect for religious pluralism, and the autonomy of Israel's religious communities in matters of personal status. This issue remains at the heart of the Israeli discourse and constitutes a major challenge to the Israeli society.

Question 4 - Developments in Legislation

7. For recent developments in legislation, policy and institutional frameworks, see the information provided in the relevant sub-paragraphs.

Question 5 – Extraterritorial Obligations

Non-application of the Covenant in the "Occupied Palestinian Territory" (OPT)

8. It is Israel's position that the CEDAW is not applicable beyond a State's national territory. For an elaboration of this position, see Follow up to the oral presentation by the State of Israel before the committee (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5/ADD.1), May 2013, p. 2-3.

Demolition of Illegal Structures in the Eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem

9. Illegal construction harms the local population, as it does not take into consideration planning policies and parameters that are needed to ensure quality of life, the welfare of the population and public needs. Enforcement measures against illegal structures are adopted in accordance with legal guarantees and following due process, subject to judicial review and the right to appeal.
10. The authorities exercise discretion in the execution of demolition orders and give priority to the demolition of illegal structures that pose an obstacle to city development, for example, an illegal structure that blocks a sewer pipe system, a planned school, access to roads, etc.

Recent Statistics

11. In 2016, 119 illegal structures were demolished by the municipality. Eighteen (18) of them were residential structures. Out of these, nine (9) were residence structures in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, and nine (9) of them were in the western neighbourhoods of Jerusalem.

12. In 2015, 94 illegal structures were demolished. Twenty (20) of them were residential structures. Out of these, six (6) were residential structures in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, and fourteen (14) of them were in the western neighbourhoods of Jerusalem.

13. Construction permits: In 2016, 217 construction permits were granted in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem.

Question 6 - Access to Justice

14. Under Israel's domestic legal system, every person has full access to effective redress and judicial review in Israeli courts, as well as in many other venues, as detailed in Israel's Core Document, (HRI/CORE/ISR/2015). Free legal aid is offered in Israel, under certain circumstances, in both civil and criminal proceedings, as follows:

Legal Assistance to Women

Criminal Sphere - The Public Defender's Office (PDO)

15. The PDO is part of the MOJ. It provides legal representation throughout criminal proceedings, from consultation for suspects during police investigation to representation during sentencing, hearings before parole committees, etc. The PDO plays a crucial role in the representation of individuals who cannot afford to retain a lawyer and in maintaining justice in criminal legal proceedings. Recently, the PDO launched a website in Hebrew, English, Arabic and Russian.

16. Only a small proportion of accused persons or suspects in the criminal justice system in Israel are women. Accordingly, out of 135,415 people whom the PDO represented between 2014 and 2016, only 3,274 were women. In 2016, the PDO represented nineteen (19) Palestinian women, and ten (10) foreign residents.

Civil Sphere - The Legal Aid Administration (LAA)

17. The LAA is part of the MOJ. It provides legal assistance to persons who cannot afford legal representation to help them exercise their constitutional right to access judicial forums. The LAA provides legal representation according to the Legal Aid Law 5732–1972 (hereinafter: LAA Law) and the Legal Aid Regulations 5733–1973 (hereinafter: Legal Aid Regulations). While it is a governmental organ, the LAA enjoys independence and has the ability to file suits against the Government on behalf of its clients, when necessary. The right and extent of legal assistance provided by the LAA is subject to an eligibility test according to the subject-matter of the case, the financial ability of the applicant, and the likelihood of success of the legal proceeding.

Challenges and Accomplishments

18. In recent years, the Southern District of the LAA identified some challenges, primarily cultural and economic ones, regarding the ability of women, including women from the Bedouin population, to access the courts.

19. The LAA took several steps to address these issues, including: establishing a Legal Aid Branch in Rahat (the largest Bedouin city in the Negev) in June 2016; strengthening cooperation between the LAA and NGOs as well as with the Authority for Development and Housing of the Bedouins in the Negev (hereinafter: the ADBN) in order to make legal aid more accessible to Bedouin women; enhancing the accessibility of legal aid for women who are victims of prostitution – a joint project of the Southern District of the LAA with “Bishvilech” (For You) NGO; providing legal assistance to women who are victims of domestic violence; arranging for legal assistance for victims of trafficking; presenting "Access to Justice Stand"- an LAA counter which is located inside the court and aims to provide ad hoc legal aid (at the first stage). This counter provides access to preliminary legal counsel to unrepresented people from different populations; legal assistance to victims of sexual offences - according to a recent amendment, free legal representation is to be provided by the LAA to victims of sex offenses according to the Limitations on the Return of a Sex Offender to the Surroundings of the Victim of the Offence Law 5765-2004 (hereinafter: The Limitations on the Return of a Sex Offender to the Surroundings of the Victim Law), which stipulates that these victims are exempted from the economic eligibility test laid out in the Legal Aid Law; guidance and representation for victims of fatal offences.

20. For more information on this issue, see Annex I.

Access of women to judicial courts regarding child support and custody

21. The eligibility tests under the LAA Law and LAA Regulations distinguish between civil legal proceedings and family matters proceedings, so that in matters of personal status, the financial eligibility test depends only on the financial state of the person applying for legal aid, and not according to the income of the family unit as a whole as is the case in civil proceedings. As a result, many single parent women are eligible for legal assistance by the LAA in such proceedings.

Community Courts

22. The Community Courts, which are a type of "Problem Solving Courts", began to operate in Israel within the framework of a pilot programme in November 2014. The first Community Court was established in Be'er-Sheva and the second Community Court was established in Ramle in September 2015. The Community Court serves various populations, and according to recent statistics, many are women.

23. These courts use a judicial and rehabilitative approach. This framework provides the perpetrators of crimes with an incentive for change and rehabilitation through personal assistance during the process, with the assistance of the community in appropriate cases, and aims to reduce incarceration and prevent recidivism.

24. For more information on this issue, see Annex I.

With regard to the Committee's question about persons who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian Border

25. Note that every person may be eligible for full representation by the PDO in criminal proceedings, if she/he meets the criterion stipulated in the Public Defender Law 5766-1995 (hereinafter: Public Defender Law), which are mainly based on the probable punishment for the offence and the economic situation of the defendant. The Law does not distinguish between Israelis and non-Israelis, in relation to this criterion. Accordingly, the PDO does not handle matters of asylum applications, unless it is necessary for the adequate representation of the defendant, and as part of the criminal procedure. In practice, a very small number of women asylum seekers were indicted.

26. With regard to legal assistance in civil matters to persons who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian border, which is provided by the LAA, a petition on this issue is currently pending before the Supreme Court (H.C.J. 5262/16).

Question 7 – Women, Peace and Security

Implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1325

27. The AAW continues to enhance the implementation the UNSC Resolution, inter alia, through Government Resolution No. 2331 which includes a full policy plan for the promotion of gender equality; the issuance of the Gender Mainstreaming Guide; an Inter-ministerial Team for National Action Plan and more.

28. For more information see Annex I.

Women Representation in Security Forces

The Israel Defense Forces (IDF)

29. Military service in the IDF has been obligatory for women since the IDF was founded. Over the years, and especially in recent times, there has been major progress in the status of women in the IDF. The most prominent example of this is the infantry, where the number of women is steadily rising, and accordingly, new goals and frameworks are becoming available for women. This is true also with respect to technologically-oriented professions. In addition, new gender-equal professions are being added, in which there is full equality between men and women. Additionally, the IDF maintains a multiannual programme for the expansion of women's integration.

30. As part of the process of integrating ultra-Orthodox men to serve in the IDF, and due to the negative implications this process might have on the exclusion of women in the IDF environment, an Amendment to the Defense Service Law [Consolidated Version] 5746-1986 (hereinafter: the Defense Service Law) was legislated in 2014. The Amendment (No. 19), stipulates that “The status and integration of a veteran woman in the defense service will not be prejudiced on account of the service of graduates of yeshivas and ultra-Orthodox religious institutions in the defense service under this chapter”. Furthermore, the Amendment obliges the Minister of Defense to annually report on the effect of the implementation of this Amendment to the Knesset Committee of Foreign Affairs and Defense and the Committee for Advancement of the Status of Women and Gender Equality.

The Police

31. In 2013 the Police established a Gender Equality Unit with the objective of creating appropriate conditions and policies for the full utilization of the capabilities of women serving in the Police and enhancing a new gender mainstreaming reality. The AAW was involved in the process of establishing the Unit. Currently, women account for 26 per cent of the Police force.

The Israeli Prison Service (IPS)

32. Women constitute about 20 per cent of the IPS personnel, serving in various roles of command, security, treatment and administration. The IPS encourages the integration of women in all of the organization's roles. The organization is headed by a female Commissioner and has, in senior positions in the unit level and in General Brigadier rank, four (4) female officers commanding the fields of logistics, manpower, legal counselling and prisoner treatment.

Zero Tolerance Policy to Sexual Exploitation by Security Officials

The IDF

33. In accordance with General Staff Order 33.0145, entitled "Prohibition of Sexual Violence," commanders must act to maintain a respectful atmosphere within their unit, and follow the order and the norms enshrined therein amongst their subordinates. In addition, the Chief of the General Staff issued a circular emphasizing the harmful effects of behaviour amounting to sexual violence.

34. In recent years, the IDF adopted a strategy plan for eliminating sexual harassment. This plan includes four (4) pillars: Information; Enforcement and Monitoring; Command reaction; Adjudication, and Sanctions; Victim Support ("Mahut").

For more information, see Annex I.

35. Recent data shows that there has been an increase in the rate of sexual violence cases reported in the IDF. This is an indication that the legitimacy of reporting and filing complaints has increased, which is given due to various factors, including public discourse, media exposure and efforts within the IDF and outside, to eliminate this phenomenon, and the establishment of the Mahut Centre.

36. For recent statistics regarding sexual harassment cases in the IDF, see Table No. 1, Annex II.

The Police

37. Generally, every criminal offence committed by a police officer which is punishable by a year of imprisonment and above, including a sexual offence, is handled by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers (hereinafter: DIPO), which is under the auspices of the MOJ, thereby maintaining its professional independence. The DIPO makes efforts to ensure that incidents of sexual exploitation by police officers towards civilians or co-workers are handled without compromise. These include:

- Training of police units and lecturing on sexual abuse and sexual harassment; greater sensitivity towards victims of sexual offences: The DIPO is working in cooperation with the NGO Association of Rape Crisis Centres in Israel (ARCCI). As part of this cooperation, the DIPO receives instructions on the necessary sensitivity required for handling victims of sexual assaults. In addition, the DIPO and the ARCCI work closely in accompanying victims of crime during the investigation and court proceedings.
- Designated guidelines which stipulate that prior to closing a sexual assault case, an attorney representing DIPO will meet the victim personally, and will explain to her/him the decision, and the reasons behind it, in a personal and sensitive manner. The guidelines focus significantly on the victim's ability to understand the reasons behind the decision to close the case, and underscore the importance of the victim feeling that she/he is seen and taken into consideration.
- An information leaflet is provided to victims of crimes (both civilian and police officers' victims) at the investigation. The leaflet includes information on the assistance that is available for victims of sexual offences at ARCCI.

38. Events over the past few years have shown that the DIPO does not spare high-ranking police officers or those who have strong "ties" and connections who allegedly committed sexual offences against their subordinates.

39. The DIPO submits many indictments on charges of sexual exploitation of women and demands the courts to issue severe sanctions. The DIPO's aim through all these situations is to deliver a message that sexual offences, especially when committed through an abuse of authority, and police authority in particular, is taken seriously and that it is crucial to eliminate wrongful norms and perceptions. In cases where senior police officers, committed sexual offences towards their subordinates' or had sexual relationships with them, while exploiting a relationship of authority, the DIPO believes that beyond the significance of handling each individual case, lays the importance of abolishing wrongful norms, and changing the way that women are perceived within the working environment.

40. For Police prevention efforts and recent statistics see Annex I and Table No. 2 in Annex II.

The IPS

41. The IPS maintains a strict policy of enforcing the legislative provisions dealing with the prohibition of all forms of sexual offences to women within the IPS system, in both disciplinary and criminal level.

42. For statistic information concerning sexual harassment in the IPS between 2012-2016 see Table 3 in Annex II.

Question 8 – National Machinery for the Advancement of Women

The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (AAW)

43. In 2016, the AAW has become an important unit in the Ministry of Social Equality. In recent years, the AAW's budget has been dramatically amplified: In the year 2011, the annual budget was 3,903,000 NIS (1,054,864 USD), 2012 – 4,153,000 NIS (1,122,432 USD), 2013 – 1,134,000 NIS (306,486 USD), 2014 – 2,134,000 NIS (576,756 USD), 2015 - 1,750,000 NIS (317,567 USD), 2016 - 1,864,000 NIS (503,783 USD), and in 2017 – 17,000,000 NIS (4,594,594 USD). i.e., the AAW annual budget was multiplied by 4.35 since 2011.

44. For more information see Annex I.

Establishing a Ministerial Committee on Gender Equality

45. Under Government Resolution No. 36 (May 26, 2015), the GOI established a designated Ministerial Committee on Social Equality. The Chair of Committee is the Minister of Social Equality, and its members are: the Ministers of Justice, Labour, Social Affairs and Social Services (MOLSASS), Industry and Economy, Religious Services, Culture and Sport and Science, Technology and Space. The Committee is charged with promoting gender equality in various aspects of life.

46. For recent examples see Annex I.

National Action Plan

47. See Government Resolution No. 2331 in Question 7.

48. In 2016 the AAW established a plan to promote gender equality and assimilation of gender mainstreaming through local municipalities. See in Question 15.

Gender Budgeting

49. In July 2014, the Committee for Evaluating Gender Aspects of the State Budget, appointed by the Minister of Finance, published its concluding report. The Committee's panel examined developments in developed countries around the world in the area of gender analysis of the budget, heard the positions of different relevant bodies and NGOs, and examined the current situation of this issue in the different Government Ministries. Following its conclusions, the Committee recommended that the GOI would perform a gradual gender analysis of the State budget. This process will be performed through several years and would be complemented by a process of gender mainstreaming in the Government Ministries. In the Committee's view, this analysis would draw a "gender glasses" image that would enable the policy makers to improve the budget allocation and create a gender responsive budget.

50. Government Resolution No. 2084 (October 7, 2014) adopted the conclusions of the Committee. It was decided on a gradual duty of gender evaluation of the State budget, by each Government Ministry and auxiliary unit - 10 per cent in 2015, 40 per cent in 2016, 70 per cent in 2017 and 100 per cent in 2018. The gender analysis is to be published alongside the State budget proposal and the explanatory note submitted to the Knesset. This evaluation process will be supervised by a Governmental steering committee and a governmental guide for gender evaluation that will be published. The AAW will offer scholarships for researchers exploring gender analysis and the best means to promote this process.

51. The first publication of gender analysis was made available on the Ministry of Finance website at the end of 2014. The implementation of gender budgeting analysis has exceeded expectations and already in 2016, gender analysis was performed for 70 per cent of Government Ministries.

Cooperation with Civil Society Organizations

52. The AAW conducts its activities in cooperation with the Civil Society in general, and women's organizations, in particular, including organizations promoting the rights of women from minority populations.

53. For recent examples, including on the UNSC 1325 Resolution, see Annex I. For other examples of cooperation with NGOs in a variety of fields, see Questions 10, 12, 19 and 22.

Question 9 – Stereotypes and Harmful Practices

Amendment to the Marital Age Law 5710-1950 (hereinafter: the Marital Age Law)

54. In December 2013, the Knesset amended the Marital Age Law (Amendment No. 6), raising the minimum marital age from 17 to 18. The Law prescribes that a Family Matters Court is authorized to permit the marriage of a minor if they are above the age of 16 and if there are unique reasons linked to the minors' best interest to do so. The Court must hear the minor before deciding on this matter. With regard to the marriage of a minor over the age of 16 but below the age of 17, the Court must request a social worker assessment in accordance with the Law. Accordingly, Section 2 of the Law provides that a person that officiates, assists in the marriage ceremony, or marries a minor who is her/his child or under her/his guardianship, is committing a criminal offence, punishable by two (2) years imprisonment or a fine, according to the Penal Law 5737-1977 (hereinafter: the Penal Law).

55. For updated data regarding the marital age in Israel, see Table No. 4 in Annex II.

Eliminating Polygamy

56. In recent years the GOI has been enhancing its efforts to eliminate polygamy. The issue has been highly prioritized and accordingly, many efforts are invested in this field. These efforts include a comprehensive Government Resolution, followed by the establishment of an inter-ministerial committee, and a notable Attorney General Guideline, in addition to continued enforcement efforts by the Police.

Government Resolution - "Coping with the polygamy Offence"

57. On January 29, 2017, the GOI accepted Resolution No. 2345, which established an Inter-Ministerial Committee designated for the issue of polygamy. The Committee includes the following Ministries: Education, Justice, Labour, Social Affairs and Social Services, Interior, Health, Agriculture and Rural development, and Public Security. The Resolution further calls for the establishment of a wide-ranging inter-ministerial team tasked with forming a strategic plan to encounter this phenomenon, and accordingly the Government will allocate the appropriate budget in the annual state budget of 2019-2020. The inter-ministerial committee included representatives of several NGOs, men and women.

State Attorney's Guideline on the Prosecution policy in the marriage of a minor's offence

58. On 9 May 2016, the State Attorney's Office published State Attorney's Guideline No. 2.20 titled "The Prosecution Policy regarding the marriage of a minor's offence", which regulates the Prosecution policy in respect to this offence. For more information, see Annex I.

Attorney General Guideline - Eliminating Polygamy

59. The Attorney General Guideline No. 41112 titled "The polygamy offence" was published on January 23, 2017. The purpose of this Guideline is to enhance effective enforcement of the polygamy offence, according to Section 176 of the Penal Law and to augment its appropriate punishment. The rationale, as described in the Guideline, refers to the destructive implications polygamy has on women and children, inter alia, due to the impact on the child's well-being and her/his development, the economic and emotional implications on women and the negative impact that it has on the status of women in society in general. Furthermore, the Guideline includes a reference to the CEDAW Committee's previous concluding observations on this issue, and clarifies that it was formed according to the commitments that Israel has taken upon itself according to international law.

60. For more information, see Annex I.

61. According to recent findings of the National Insurance Institute (NII), in 2016, there were 1,762 polygamy families in Israel, most of them within the Bedouin population in the South of Israel.

Implementation and control over means to eliminate early marriage, underage marriage, coerced marriage and polygamy by the Police

62. See Annex I.

63. For recent case law see Annex III.

Question 10 – Gender Based Violence against Women

Gender based violence - recent legislation amendments

- Amendment No. 122 of 2016 to the Penal Law, added Section 347B to the Law, which prohibits consented sexual relations between a clergyman and a person, above the age of eighteen (18), who received consultation from her/him, when the consent was achieved through exploiting substantial mental dependence of the person upon the clergyman. Consultation or guidance is defined as continuous consultation or guidance through face-to-face meetings. According to the Amendment, a clergyman who engages in intercourse with a woman or performs an act of sodomy on a person in these circumstances will be liable to imprisonment for four (4) years. The amendment also added Section 348(D2), stating that a clergyman who commits indecent acts with or on a person above the age of eighteen (18) under the circumstances detailed in Section 347B (b), is liable to three (3) years of imprisonment.
- Amendment No. 14 of 2015 to the Legal Aid Law provides that legal aid, including representation in court proceedings will be provided without a financial eligibility test to a victim of sexual offence, in civil proceedings according to the Limitations on the Return of a Sex Offender to the Victim's Vicinity Law.

- Amendment No. 5 of 2015 the Statute of Limitations Law 5718-1958 allows for the possibility of extending the statute of limitations if the defendant, or her/his representative, knowingly misled the plaintiff, abused her/his power, threatened or exploited the plaintiff. This amendment allows more women to file claims due to an infringement of their rights in such circumstances, for example, women who were subject to sexual abuse.
- Amendment no. 11 of 2014 to the Crime Victims' Rights Law 5761-2001, provides that a victim of a sexual offence is entitled to choose the gender of her/his investigator (under certain restrictions). The investigator must inform the victim on this option at the beginning of the investigation (entry into force: 1.1.2018).

Countering Sexual Harassment – Recent Amendments

64. Several recent amendments were made to the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law 5758-1998 (hereinafter: Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law):

- Amendment No. 8: The Amendment raises the damages for sexual harassment from 50,000 NIS (13,513 USD) to 120,000 NIS (32,432 USD), without the need to prove damage.
- Amendment No. 10: this 2014 amendment provides that publishing a photograph, film or recording of a person that focuses on a person's sexuality, in circumstances in which the publication is likely to humiliate or degrade a person, and against that person's consent, constitutes a sexual harassment offence, punished by five (5) years of imprisonment.
- Amendment No. 12: according to this amendment, when an employee's complaint regarding adverse treatment is submitted, the burden of proof is shifted on the employer to prove that the said treatment was not committed due to a sexual harassment complaint which was submitted by the employee, provided that no more than three (3) years has elapsed from the day the sexual harassment complaint was submitted.
- Amendment No. 13: Sheltered employment enterprises (which employ persons with disabilities) have been included in the definition of work relations for the purpose of sexual harassment, thus ensuring better protection of employees with disabilities.
- In July 2014 the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Regulations (hereinafter: the Sexual Harassment Regulations) were amended. according to the amendment, higher education institutions, including academic institutes, are obligated to conduct several steps in order to prevent sexual harassment, such as: annual informational activities; informing students and employees about the regulations and ways of filing a complaint; institutions with 2,000 students or more are also obligated to appoint two (2) sexual harassment prevention officers and to provide them with the relevant training. Note that the persons that are elected to serve as a sexual harassment officer, must be from different sectors in the higher education institution (for example, student sector, professor sector, administrative staff), in order to enhance their accessibility. These institutions are also obligated to file an annual report to the AAW, to the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women and Gender Equality (2014), and to the relevant regulator (for example, the MOE, MOEI or the Council for Higher Education). Note that these steps are complementary to the relevant obligations that apply to these institutes as a general employer (see below).

- In addition, in November 2013, following deliberations held with the Ministerial Committee on the Status of Women and Gender Equality, the Ministry of Finance, issued a binding procedure whereby insurance companies shall not cover sexual harassment liability and shall not indemnify the insured person for sexual harassment costs, even in cases where she/he has reached a settlement with the complainant. In a letter to all insurance companies CEOs, the Ministry of Finance required them to examine the insurance policies they offer and amend them accordingly.

Enforcement Efforts

65. Under the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Regulations, every employer must appoint a sexual harassment prevention officer, to serve as an address for complaints on sexual harassment. Other duties of the officer include providing recommendations to the employer on how to handle a case of sexual harassment in the workplace, and providing the employees with consultation, information and guidance. Employers must issue a code of conduct for the prevention of sexual harassment; allow instruction and explanatory sessions on the subject for the employees; demand that all employees refrain from sexual harassment; establish an efficient way for lodging a complaint in respect of sexual harassment; deal effectively with all cases of sexual harassment; etc. The regulations determine that if possible, the appointed officer should be a woman.

66. New-Year Campaign against Date Rape Drug (Predator Drug) - in the 2016 New Years' celebrations, the Police conducted a broad operation for increasing public awareness regarding the date rape drug. The operation included a wide-ranging public campaign, with videos broadcasted, leaflets distributed, posters and television interviews on this subject. In addition, approximately 20,000 date rape drug detection kits were distributed to the public for free.

Sexual Harassment- Enforcement Statistics

67. For statistical information by the Office of the State Attorney, see Table No. 5 and Table No. 6, Annex II.

68. For information regarding prevention of sexual harassment in security forces see Question 7.

69. For information regarding prevention of sexual harassment in the Civil Service see Question 19.

Countering Domestic Violence

70. According to recent data by the MOLSASS, during 2016, 11 women were murdered by their spouses; between the years 2004-2016, 147 women were murdered by their spouses. This issue continues to present a challenge and in recent years, the GOI has been enhancing its efforts to combat this phenomenon. Hereinafter are several prominent examples:

71. Israel is currently examining the ratification of the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence (the Istanbul Convention), a process that entails an in-depth examination of all aspects relating to combatting gender-based violence.

72. The Joint Review Team (established in 2003) continues to conduct periodic meetings to examine cases of femicide in order to prevent their recurrence. The team includes participants from the Police, the MOLSASS, and the State Attorney's Office.

73. "Police Social Worker Model" - this is a joint project operated by the MOLSASS and the Police with the object of placing a social worker in police stations. in order to strengthen the cooperation with the Police, making sure that the Police referrals to the welfare authorities were addressed and vice versa, meet with victims who came to file a complaint (if they are interested) in order to provide initial assistance, and to prepare an appropriate intervention and assistance programme in advance, including a possible risk assessment following identification of the alleged perpetrator. In 2016 this programme was operated in 25 towns. 58 per cent of the men and women who had an "intake" conversation with a social worker were referred to the Centres for Prevention and Assistance (for information on the Centres, see below).

74. A Joint Inter-ministerial Committee on Preventing Domestic Violence was established in 2014. The Committee included representatives from all Ministries. In February 2016, the Committee published its final recommendations. Subsequently on May 2016 a designated sub-committee for implementing the recommendations was established, headed by the Minister of MOLSASS. The Implementation Committee included ten (10) teams; each one focused on different issues: research, protection, information, vulnerable populations, legislation etc. The Implementation Committee recommendations were presented to the Minister of Public Security in October 2016. The recommendations include both aspects of strengthening the current protection and prevention systems, and developing new ones.

Enhanced efforts within the Police

75. The Police fully recognize the importance of this issue and are prepared to provide unique and adjusted responses to these offences. The Police have a unique apparatus of investigators and investigating officers to handle domestic violence and sexual offences. In addition, designated training courses on domestic violence and sexual offences are regularly conducted on this issue for all investigators and patrol officers, including gender-sensitive courses.

76. In order to enhance reporting, the Police emphasize the need for better cooperation with a variety of actors relevant to the fight against domestic and sexual offences. For example, recently a protocol for "efficient data sharing" was created by the Police and the welfare authorities. It regulates the manner of cooperation and reporting in each of the stages of treatment of domestic violence cases. In addition, in order to raise awareness and enhance reporting, an ongoing discourse and collaboration was formed between the Police and leaders of minority groups; mainly concerning improving accessibility and encouraging women to approach the Police and file complaints.

Control and supervision

77. The Police conduct several periodic reviews of the treatment of domestic violence offences each year, in every police district and in several stations, through both initiated and surprise inspections.

Public Information

78. Each police station contains informational signs and leaflets for victims of offences and information sheets detailing the possibilities for assistance and treatment of victims in the station's vicinity.

Raising Awareness, Education and Training

Question 11 - Gender-Based violence in the "Occupied Palestinian Territory"

Non-application of the Covenant in the "Occupied Palestinian Territory"

82. As has been previously clarified, it is Israel's position that the CEDAW is not applicable beyond its national territory. For an elaboration of this position, see sections 44-48 of Israel's 4th Periodic Report (CEDAW/C/ISR/4).

Question 12 - Measures to Protect Disadvantaged Groups of Women against Violence

Gender Sensitivity in Request for Asylum

83. In February 26, 2017, the GOI Regulation processing Asylum Requests (PIBA Regulation No.5.2.0012) was updated (hereinafter: the "Regulation") as follows. A designated section entitled "Gender Sensitivity in the process of refugee status determination (RSD)" (hereinafter: the Gender Sensitivity Section) was added, with the aim of highlighting gender sensitivities. The underlying idea of the Gender Sensitivity Section is the acknowledgement that gender is an important attribute in asylum requests and their processing, and thus, the PIBA's policy must be adjusted accordingly. Still, note that the Gender Sensitivity Section does not create an additional form of persecution under the 1951 Convention.

84. The Gender Sensitivity Section provides that RSD interviews will be conducted with sensitivity to gender issues that might affect the interviewee's feelings or behaviour, or impact on her/his testimony. Furthermore, the Section stipulates that victims of gender-based violence, including sexual violence, must be treated with the utmost respect and sensitivity.

85. The Section further requires the following: (1) The training programme of RSD Unit employees must include training regarding gender issues such as: the psychological effect of traumatic experiences (unwillingness to provide all details, difficulties in remembering past events and in providing testimony, etc.); cultural perceptions of women in countries of origin and their influence on asylum seekers. Note that a full day seminar was held on February 16, 2017, entailing these issues. (2) Guidelines for the interview process: (a) The interviewer must inform the interviewee at the beginning of the interview of her/his right to request an interviewer of the same gender, subject to personnel availability at the RSD Unit. (b) Family members, including spouses should not be present at the interview, and each interview should be held individually. (c) The interviewee shall be given a proper opportunity to share her/his experience of any gender-based persecution or gender-based violence that she/he has suffered. Respectively, this testimony shall be taken into consideration in the deliberation of her/his asylum application. (d) Additional caution should be taken in order to prevent repeated trauma to the interviewee; the interviewer must abstain from any request for extensive description of the traumatic event which is unnecessary for the final decision. (e) An interviewee that has difficulty in completing her/his testimony shall be given an opportunity to complete the interview at another time.

Identifying Victims of trafficking -The Inter-Governmental Protocol

86. Israel dedicates great resources towards identifying victims of trafficking among its immigrant population in order to provide them with the appropriate assistance and protection. The Inter-Governmental Protocol is a procedure that includes a comprehensive list of indicators for recognizing a victim of trafficking. Once a victim is identified (or a suspicion rose), every government official is obliged to inform the Police Anti-trafficking Coordinating Officer (hereinafter: the "PTC"). Once a victim was identified, she/he is properly referred to a shelter for victims of trafficking. Numerous trainings are conducted to all relevant governmental staff and officials on this issue, and information leaflets are distributed by the National Anti-Trafficking Unit (NATU) to the relevant authorities.

87. For more information, see Annex I.

Immigration 'Gradual Procedure' with regard to victims of domestic violence

88. In October 2013, the PIBA published procedure No. 5.2.0019 regarding the gradual process of acquiring civil status in cases of immigrants who are victims of violence inflicted by their Israeli spouse, thus ending the relationship.

89. The procedure allows the victim to part from her/his violent partner and still acquire civil status in Israel. Its terms strive to strike a balance between, on the one hand, preventing the foreign partner from remaining in a harmful relationship just in order to acquire a civil status in Israel, and, on the other hand, the minute justification for granting civil status to foreigners who are no longer in a relationship with an Israeli spouse, and who have not yet assimilated in Israel.

Handling domestic violence among foreign nationals

90. As mentioned above, every woman, including foreign nationals, exposed to violence can be referred to a shelter. About 80 women with no legal status in Israel enter the shelters for victims of domestic violence every year. Naturally, the Police handle complaints regarding gender-based violence from all population groups, including foreign women. Relevant police stations where there are a greater number of foreign residents have regular interpretation services, and every police station may have an interpreter brought in when needed, so that every investigation is conducted in the language of the woman who is being interviewed. The Police meet with representatives of the welfare authorities on this issue on a regular basis and with "Mesila" (the social services department in the Tel Aviv-Jaffa Municipality), and are fully aware of the relevant needs and sensitivities when addressing the issue of domestic violence among foreign national women.

Protection of Women with Disabilities

91. See Annex I.

92. For activities to raise awareness see Question 10.

Question 13 – Trafficking and Exploitation of Prostitution

93. Recent years have shown that Israel has made remarkable progress in its continuing efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons. In its Trafficking in Persons Report for 2016, the United States' State Department ranked Israel as Tier 1 for a fifth consecutive year - a demonstration of the U.S. Government's recognition of Israeli practical efforts and an important external evaluation that Israel is fully meeting the minimal standards required for the eradication of TIP.

94. For more information, see Annex I.

Question 14 – Participation in Political and Public Life

The Knesset

95. In the current 20th Knesset, the proportion of women MKs has increased to 27.5 per cent (33 women MKs), compared to 22.5 per cent in the 19th Knesset. Two (2) of these women are Arab MKs. Of these 33 women, two (2) serve as deputies to the Knesset speaker; and five (5) women serve as chairpersons of Knesset Committees.

96. The issue of women's participation in political parties is regarded very seriously. For example, in the elections to the 20th Knesset, publications appeared arguing that unlawful coercion had been exerted on ultra-Orthodox women to keep them from running in the elections. According to the allegation, a rabbi had published statements in relation to women approaching any party not under the leadership of the "Great Torah Sages". According to the publication, a woman acting contrary to the rabbi's instructions would have to leave her marriage without her ketubah (the money due to her upon divorce), her livelihood would be destroyed (it would be forbidden to study in her educational institutions or to purchase any product from her) and her children will be removed from their institutions of study. In light of the severity of these comments, the Deputy Attorney General (Counselling), approached the Chairman of the Central Elections Committee that communicated this matter, together with a strong condemnation of acts of this kind to all the chairpersons of the parties running for the 20th Knesset.

The Government

97. In the current 34th Government, the percentage of women ministers has increased from 9.7 per cent to 16 per cent. Currently there are four (4) women Government Ministers: the Ministers of Justice, Culture and Sport, Aliyah and immigrant Absorption and Social Equality. The Deputy Foreign Minister is also a woman.

98. For further information on women in political life see Question 15.

Women representation in the Court System

99. The majority of judges in Israel today are women: Out of 725 Judges in total, 369 (51 per cent) are females, and 354 (49 per cent) are males. In 2017, two (2) women of Ethiopian decent were appointed as Magistrate Court judges for the first time in the judicial system.

100. In January 2015, a woman was appointed to serve as the President of the Israeli Supreme Court, the second female president of the Supreme Court.

101. In the Supreme Court of Israel currently, there are four (4) female justices and eleven (11) male justices.

102. In the District Courts, there are 94 (45 per cent) female judges, and 114 (55 per cent) male judges. All of the female judges are Jewish, while among the men there are six (6) Muslim Judges, four (4) Christian Judges and three (3) Druze Judges.

103. In the Magistrates courts, women constitute the majority of judges; 219 judges are female (53 per cent), and 195 are male (47 per cent). Out of the female judges, 206 are Jewish, nine (9) are Muslim and five (5) are Christian. Out of the male judges 172 are Jewish, twelve (12) are Muslim, seven (7) are Christian and three (3) are Druze.

104. In the Labour Courts, women also constitute the majority of judges, amounting to 62.5 per cent of the judges in the National Labour Court and 63 per cent in the Regional Labour Courts.

105. Similar findings are also evident in the Court of Traffic Offences, with a majority of 13 (59 per cent) female judges out of 22 judges in total.

The Rabbinical Courts Administration

106. The Rabbinical Courts Administration acts in accordance with the directives of the CSC and has been making efforts to increase the number of female employees in its ranks. For example, a woman was recently appointed to the position of Director of Human Resources at the Rabbinical Courts Administration, with significant consideration being given to the gender aspect of the hiring, in addition to her high professional qualifications.

The Sharia Courts

107. On April 25, 2017 the Judicial Appointments Committee appointed the first woman to serve as a judge - Qadi, in a Muslim Religious Court. The appointed Qadi received the support of all nine (9) members of the committee. This is a positive development for Muslim women and for the religious courts in Israel in general.

Senior positions in the public sphere

108. Since 2011, women have been appointed to serve in the following positions: the Chief Commander of the Ayalon Region of the Police - the first woman to be appointed to command a region; in addition, a woman was appointed for the position of Director of the thoracic surgery unit in the Soroka Medical Centre in Be'er-Sheva. Since 2014, two (2) women have been appointed for the position of Director General in Government Ministries – Director General of the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety, and a woman is a Director General at the Israel National Road Safety Authority. In addition, in November 2013, the first woman was appointed to serve as the Governor of the Central Bank of Israel. Also, in November 2015, the Minister of Public Security appointed a woman to serve as the Israeli Prisons Service Commissioner. In April 2017, a woman was appointed as the director of Yitzhak Shamir Hospital. Women have also served as directors of the Carmel Medical Centre and Ha'Emek Medical Centre, the psychiatric hospital in Mizra and the geriatric hospital "Shoham".

The Foreign Service

109. To date, there are 23 women serving as heads of diplomatic missions in one of the 100 Israeli missions worldwide. In recent years, an equal number of men and women enrolled in the diplomatic cadets' course. Three (3) Arab women are currently serving in the Israeli Foreign Service, two (2) as Deputy Ambassador in embassies abroad and a third recently joined the diplomats' cadets' course.

Government Companies (State boards)

110. There has been an increase in the rate of women in government companies – of the 437 total serving directors: 189 (43 per cent) are women. This is a 10 per cent increase since 2007 (33 per cent in 2007 and 40 per cent in 2011). Nine (9) (2 per cent) of these women are Arab, and one (1) woman is of Ethiopian decent (0.2 per cent). 67 per cent of government companies (61 out of 91) reach adequate representation (50 per cent) of women in their directorates.

111. For more information see Diagram No. 4, Annex II.

"Team of Directors"

112. Since 2013, in the framework of reforms led by the Government Companies Authority (the "GCA"), the GCA has conducted a public procedure called the "Team of Directors". In this procedure, candidates for the position of directors in government companies are identified out of the general population. The purpose of the procedure is to identify the most skilled and appropriate candidates for the role, while providing an equal opportunity to the general population. The list of recommended candidates formulated by the GCA is provided to the Ministers, who, by law, are authorized to appoint directors to government companies. The "Team of Directors" procedure sets quotas for women and members of the Arab population, enabling them to compete in the procedure, thus increasing their likelihoods of being appointed as directors.

113. A significant increase in the representation of women on boards of government companies was indicated following the establishment of "Team of Directors": 44 per cent of the directors appointed from the Team were women. However, challenges still remain regarding the representation of Arab women. For example, out of 7,100 candidates to the Team in 2015, 270 were of Arabs, and out of those, only 37 women (0.5 per cent of all candidates).

114. A public committee appointed by the head of the GCA, published its conclusions in 2016, and recommended to form an annual programme to include varied populations in the Team. Subsequently, the GCA has been formulating an action plan to increase awareness of the "Team of Directors" and encourage varied populations, including Arab women, to participate in the procedure. In order to achieve this goal, the GCA is negotiating with relevant organizations, the Chairperson of the Committee on the Status of Women and Gender Equality, etc. The GCA continues to present the importance of including varied populations in boards at different conventions and seminars, including the annual GCA convention and in the directors' course that the GCA currently leads. In 2013 the AAW conducted a training programme for supervisors on the status of women in government corporations.

Recent legislation

Development in the Companies Law and Regulation

115. Section 239(d) of the Companies Law 5759-1999 (hereinafter: the "Companies Law") requires that in a company in which, on the date of appointment of an external director, all members of the board of directors of the company (not taking into account the controller or her/his relative if they serve as directors) are of the same gender, the external director appointed shall be of the other gender. An amendment from 2016, of the Companies Regulations (Companies Which Securities are Traded Abroad) 5776-2000, stipulates that in cases where the obligation to nominate an external director will not apply regarding companies that are listed abroad, the obligation for a non-same-gender board member would still apply. Amendment No. 16 of 2011 to the Law set out, in Section 363A (b) (11), the authority of the Israel Securities Authority to impose monetary sanctions on a company that violates this provision. Amendment No. 23 of 2013 to the Companies Law, provides that a Public Benefit Foundation in which all of its Board of Directors members are of a specific gender, is obliged to appoint an Independent Director of the other gender.

Equal representation

116. In 2011, the Equal Rights for Women Law 5711- 1951 was amended. The Amendment added the duty to maintain appropriate representation of women in government examination committees. In addition, a mechanism had been set, designed to assist in exercising the duty of appropriate representation of women in government examination committees, by establishing a database, to be operated by the AAW, that shall include names of women suited to be candidates for membership in the committees; in addition the law obligates an entity that has appointed a committee and had failed to locate appropriate women candidates, the duty to request to be given names out of the database and make contact with one of them.

Women in the Public Sphere

An Inter-ministerial team to prevent the exclusion of women from the public sphere

117. On January 5, 2012 the Attorney General appointed an inter-ministerial team aimed to examine ways to tackle incidents involving exclusion of women from the public sphere. The team was established after increasing reports on various incidents of discrimination against women and their exclusion from the public sphere, sometimes with the exercise of verbal and physical violence. The team filed its recommendations with the Attorney General on March 7, 2013, which were adopted by the Attorney General in May 2013 and a team headed by the Deputy Attorney General (Consulting) was appointed to implement the recommendations.

118. Concrete steps taken to implement the Report – See Annex I.

Recent Case Law

119. In December 2015, the Supreme Court rendered a precedential decision according to which it is possible to recognize a class action as an enforcement mechanism in cases of discrimination against women and the exclusion and discrimination of women as compensable damage. This decision regarded an ultra-Orthodox radio station which refrained from broadcasting women in different capacities.

120. For further information see Rq.C.A 6897/14 Radio Kol Berama v. "Kolech" - Religious Women's Forum (9.12.2015), as well as other relevant case law on this issue, see Annex III.

Question 15 – Women in Local Authorities

Amendment No. 12 to the Municipal Council Law (Funding of Elections), 5774-2014

121. The two (2) private bills mentioned did not advance into a formal law. Nevertheless, two other private bills regarding women's representation in local authorities were legislated since Amendment No. 12 to the Municipal Council Law (Funding of Elections) 5774-2014 (hereinafter: Amendment 12). Amendment 12 provides for 15 per cent additional funding to bodies that run in the elections (e.g. political parties, independent lists etc.) thereof at least one-third (1/3) of their elected and serving members are female. The additional funding begins after the State Comptroller provides a positive audit, and it maintained during their period of service (until the next elections). The Amendment applies to elections of city and local councils, but does not apply to regional councils.

122. As for Amendment 12's impact on the acceleration of women's participation in local government, note that the last local election were held in 2013, prior to the Law's date of entry into force, and the next local elections will take place in 2018.

Gender Mainstreaming in Local Authorities

- In 2016 the AAW formulated a plan for the promotion of gender equality in general population through the municipal authorities. More than 170 local authorities have enrolled to the plan, which incorporates a wide range of activities in various fields such as work and employment; financial empowerment; advancement of women to key positions; equality in parenting; eradication of gender stereotypes; gender-related health issues; raising awareness for the prevention of violence against women; incorporating gender mainstreaming in all areas of life; The project was initiated in 2017.
- In February 2015, the Director General of the Ministry of Interior circulated a notice to the heads of local authorities emphasizing the importance of implementing Amendment 12. Also reiterating that the AAW maintains a database of women who are qualified prima facie for senior positions in the public service.
- Following Government Resolution No. 4382, titled "Increasing Women's Municipal Representation," the AAW conducted state-wide courses on municipal leadership, with the aim of creating a cadre of women with potential for integrating in key positions. The courses were held during 2013-2014 and were attended by approximately 700 women from twenty (20) communities around Israel. The AAW dedicated 2 Million NIS (540,540 USD) towards this goal through the initiation, planning and execution of plans, leadership courses and more, to promote women into positions of power, through granting them tools and abilities to compete in local elections and encourage more women to take part in local elections.

- In 2014, the AAW initiated a special programme aimed at raising the number of Arab women representatives in the local authorities, through specially tailored plans to promote women to position of leadership, enabling them the requisite tools and abilities to run for office, and encouraging women to take part in leading the local authorities. The programme took place in Nazareth and was attended by female activists on the status of women and the local authorities' advisors on the status of woman. The contents included background in gender mainstreaming, gender politics, rules and procedures in local governance, gender budgeting, election management, public relations, communication relations, daily political practicalities, social media and internet and campaign management.
- In the 2013 local elections, the AAW issues a general call to all political parties and local parties to include women on an equal basis on their list of candidates, thus giving due regard to the principle of equality. Note that although the level of women representation in local municipalities remained the same (2.3 per cent), the level of elected officials rose from 11 per cent in 2009, to 14.7 per cent in 2013 – a 30 per cent increase. The AAW further approached the elected heads of local officials, urging them to appoint women as their deputies. The AAW maintains a routine database on women's representation in local authorities, councils, board members of municipal corporations. etc.
- In 2016, a joint committee initiated by the Minister of Interior was established in order to encourage the promotion of women to senior positions in the local authorities and increase their representation. The Committee includes representatives of the Local Administration, the Ministry of Finance, MOI, MOE, and EOC.

Question 16 – Nationality

The Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003

123. Following the horrendous wave of terrorist attacks which had begun in March of 2002, when 135 Israelis were killed and another 721 were injured, and since many of the terrorists involved in those attacks had acquired Israeli civil status based on family unification, which they took advantage of to engage in those attacks, the Government decided to temporarily suspend granting family unification to individuals who reside in an enemy state or in an area from which terrorist activity was emanated against Israel. Subsequently, the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003 was enacted, limiting the possibility of granting residents of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip Israeli citizenship pursuant to the Citizenship Law 5708-1952, or permanent residency pursuant to the Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952 including by means of family unification.

124. The Law enables entry into Israel of spouses and children of Israeli residents according to the specific provisions detailed in the Law, as well as entry of non-residents for the purposes of medical treatment, employment, or other temporary grounds, for an overall period of up to six (6) months. In addition, the Law allows the granting of a temporary residence permit for humanitarian reasons or a permanent residence permit under special circumstances.

125. The Law's constitutionality was scrutinized and upheld by the majority of the Supreme Court sitting in an extended panel of eleven (11) judges for the second time in January 2012. (H.C.J. 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07 MK Zehava Galon et. al. v. The Minister of Interior et. al.). The Law was extended several times and it is currently valid until June 30, 2017.

126. The wave of terrorist attacks that began in October 2015 has shown that Israeli civil status given for the purpose of family unification is still widely taken advantage of in order to engage in terrorist activities. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has stated in a number of recent cases that there is room to consider some changes in policy, given the length of time that has passed since the enactment of the Law and the difficulties that it has caused. In light of the above, the Minister of Interior decided on a number of changes aimed at providing humanitarian relief for those that the Law applies to. Thus, the Government notified the Court that holders of temporary residency (A5) visas would be able to extend the visa for a period of two (2) years instead of one (1) year at a time. The Government also notified the Court that holders of temporary stay permits, whose family reunification applications were made before the end of 2003 (the year the Temporary Provision was enacted) would be upgraded and acquire temporary residency which includes registration in the Population Registry and social security and national health insurance benefits, alongside receiving an Israeli identity document. This decision should affect some 2,000 families. Furthermore, it was determined that the Advisory Committee to the Minister will be instructed that in relevant humanitarian circumstances, recommendations for two (2)- years-long permit may be given, as opposed to the current state of affairs whereby the recommendation is limited to one (1) year. These decisions strive to strike a balance between security concerns and humanitarian needs.

Question 17 – Education

Recent legislative amendments

127. On March 24, 2014, Amendment No. 4 to the Pupil Rights Law (hereinafter: the Pupils Rights Law) was approved by the Knesset. This amendment added sexual orientation and gender identity to the list of grounds upon which discrimination of pupils is prohibited.

128. On July 11, 2011, Amendment No. 3 to the Pupil Rights Law was approved by the Knesset. This amendment added national origin to the list of grounds upon which discrimination of pupils is prohibited.

Arab and Bedouin women and girls

129. In the last five (5) years, over 30 new schools were established for the Bedouin population in Israel, in addition to new kindergartens. Most of these schools are equipped with science and technology laboratories, computer classes, and other advanced educational tools. In 2015 approximately 91,000 Bedouin pupils attended various frameworks in the education system.

130. As part of Government Resolution No. 3708, several plans for the years 2012-2016 were approved to improve the scholastic achievements amongst pupils in the Bedouin population, entailing a total budget of 124 Million NIS (33.5 Million USD).

131. The Science and Technology Training Institute, under the auspice of the Ministry of Education (MOE), operates a special course that includes a full scholarship, a monthly income scholarship, and paid transportation fees for Bedouin pupils who meet the relevant requirements. In 2014, 48 pupils, including 13 female pupils, began their studies and an additional 100 pupils were integrated into this learning course in 2015.

132. On September 23, 2014, the Government approved Resolution No. 2025 in which it resolved, inter alia, to conduct a pilot programme of day-care centres in three (3) industrial areas in the Negev area and to expand the number of subsidized nurseries and afternoon frameworks.

133. For more information see Annex I and Tables No.14-16 in Annex II.

Equal Budgeting

134. See Annex I.

Gender Programmes

135. The MOE holds gender programmes in groups for girls from the Arab, Bedouin and Druze communities on prevention of early marriage. The purpose of those programmes is mainly: developing awareness and self-empowerment, increasing awareness to equal opportunities and freedom of choice, and providing academic and professional guidance.

136. One of the programmes for example is entitled: "preparing for family life". In 2016, 160 groups of pupils participated in the programmes, out of which 46 groups in different schools participated in the "preparing for family life" programme. In total, 1,276 Arab pupils participated in a gender programme, out of which 1,112 girls.

137. In 2015, the Department for Psychological Services for Child (SHEFI) developed a programme for Arab high schools called "friendship and intimate relations without violence", which deals with mutual, respectful intimate relations, and mutual respect. Approximately 2,500 pupils from 80 different towns participated in this programme in 2016. The programme is also intended for teachers and school counsellors.

Education on sexual and reproductive health

138. Schools all over the country operate the programme "life skills" which entails lessons on relationships, intimate relationships and reproductive health. There are also education programmes on this issue that are held together with Joint-Ashalim Organization, in the municipal level.

Seminar for teachers on preventing child marriage and polygamy

139. An annual seminar is conducted for teachers from the Bedouin community by the MOE on issues of: preventing child or early marriage, forced marriage and polygamy.

140. The "preparation for family life" programme which is mentioned above, operates in all high schools in the Bedouin population, specifically in the higher classes, since 2006 and the contents match the pupils' ages. In the higher classes, 10th-12th, the programme highlights the values of respect between genders, reducing the polygamy phenomenon, solving conflicts and preventing domestic violence. The programme is updated according to feedback from the field, for example recently the programme was updated so it now includes preparation for 'employment life' among Bedouin boys and girls, assuming that selecting an occupation and a career direction is highly effected by perception of genders.

Gender Education

141. Girls and boys in Israeli high schools today enjoy the possibility to study gender extensively, including: social science studies - sociology studies include a chapter on gender; There is an option to study two (2) units in gender and a matriculation exam on the issue and a research project may be submitted in this subject; history studies (obligatory for all pupils) - when studying of the 19th century revolutions, the pupils learn of the feminist revolution and can submit a research project about history and gender; civics studies (obligatory for all pupils) - the pupils may submit a research project about civics and gender. Expanded literature studies - there is an option of one (1) study unit in the subject of gender in literature.

142. In addition, a variety of education programmes on gender and women empowerment are performed in schools, for example: "Equal talk" programme; "Chain" programme; "Light from the east" programme and "Aliyah, identity and gender" programme – for elaborated information see Annex I.

Gender Mainstreaming in the Education System

143. On December 16, 2015, the AAW held a one-day seminar for school counsellors with the purpose of implementing gender mainstreaming in the education system, the keynote lecture was on "Gender and Sexuality".

Dropout Rate in the Jewish and Arab Populations

144. In 2014-2015, the total dropout rate in the Jewish population (grades 7 to 12) was 2.1 per cent (compared to 2.8 per cent in 2013) and in the Arab population it stood at 3.5 per cent (compared to 4.7 per cent in 2013).

145. In the Jewish education system, the dropout rate of female minors in the 9th, 10th and 11th grades was 1.1 per cent, 1.2 per cent and 1.5 per cent respectively in 2014-2015, compared to 1.9 per cent, 1.7 per cent and 2.3 per cent in 2012-2013. In the 12th grade the dropout rate of female pupils was 0.5 per cent.

146. In the Arab education system, although the dropout rates of Arab female minors exceeded those of Jewish female minors, they were still relatively low – 2.3 per cent in the 10th grade, 2.2 per cent in the 11th grade and 0.7 per cent in the 12th grade (compared to 3.1 per cent, 2.7 per cent and 1.1 per cent respectively in 2012-2013). The dropout rate of Arab male minors is higher than of female pupils.

147. The MOE operates a special department of attendance officers who regularly visit schools in order to maintain school attendance and prevent pupils from dropping-out. This department works in accordance with the Section 4 of the Compulsory Education Law 5709-1949. As of April 2016, there are 623.7 standard positions of attendance officers and in practice there are 679 attendance officers (an increase of 36 per cent compared to 2010), of which 435 operate in Jewish localities, 75 operate in the ultra-Orthodox population, 138 in Arab localities, and 25 in Bedouin localities. In addition, there are six (6) attendance officers who are designated to pupils of Ethiopian decent. Action taken in recent years has significantly reduced, in almost every grade, the dropout rate among all the populations in Israel.

Eligibility for Matriculation Certificate in Arab, Jewish and Druze Population

148. According to data from 2015, the rate of pupils taking matriculation exams, out of 12th graders within Jewish girls is 89.11, and 95.52 among Arab girls. In addition, recent information shows that 50 per cent of the girls in Arab communities are eligible to enter universities, compared to only 32 per cent of the boys.

149. For more information see Table No. 15 in Annex II.

Encouraging pupils to study science and math– see Annex I

Measures Taken to Review Textbooks

150. The Ministry of Education's Director General Guideline No. 6 titled "Teaching Methods" (May 3, 2015), provides the obligation to ensure that "teaching material will include adequate and un-stereotyped representation of both genders, and of all populations in the Israeli society, suitable to the requirements of the relevant educational programme." All textbooks undergo gender-focused editing before being approved by the MOE and it is a pre-condition for approving textbooks. In addition, all study units are developed along with the Department for Gender Equality.

Foreign Workers' Children

151. According to MOE data, 100 per cent of children of foreign workers in Israel between the ages of 3 and 18 are integrated into kindergartens and schools.

Teenage pregnancies

152. According to information by the MOLSASS, in 2016, 279 teenage girls (under age 18) had an abortion or gave a child up for adoption. 181 young women (age 18-25) had an abortion or gave a child up for adoption.

Question 18 – Higher EducationStudents

153. Statistics show that since the 1990s there is a rise in the number of women in academic studies, and currently, above 50 per cent of all bachelor to doctorate degree's students are women. A remarkable increase was indicated in the percentage of female doctorate students, which observed an increase from 41 per cent in 1990 to 53 per cent in 2015.

154. Nevertheless, challenges still remain. The gender representation in higher education institutions is characterized over time by a "scissors trend": while women constitute more than 50 per cent of bachelor, master and doctorate degree students, their representation rate drops in higher academic ladder, when at the top of the pyramid, at the rank of full professor, the representation of women totals about 15 per cent at universities and about 10 per cent in colleges. In addition, in areas of study there is still gender segregation.

155. See Diagram No. 5 and 6 in Annex II.

Legislation

156. In 2014, the Sexual Harassment Regulations (Employer Obligations) 5758-2014 were amended. This regulations provide that hierarchy relations and dependency that exist between an employer an employee, exist in higher education institutions; therefore, the same obligation that applies to an employer according to the Law, would apply to such institutions as well; the institution shall be perceived as the employer; the teacher or lecturer – as an employee or supervisor by the employer; and the student as an employee. That means, inter alia, that the academic institute will have to adapt its disciplinary law so it will provide that sexual harassment is a severe offence; publish the prevention of sexual harassment regulation; appoint a designated person charged with receiving complaints on sexual harassment and addressing them, and more.

Academic Staff

157. Though women are still under-represented in higher education staff, it is evident that between 2003 and 2015 there was an increase in the number of women in various ranks at universities, leading to an overall percentage of 30 per cent of women in the senior academic staff at universities and 42 per cent in colleges. (13 per cent and 17 per cent as full professor respectively).

158. See Table No.17 in Annex II.

The Committee for Promoting and representation of women in higher education (Arnon Committee)

159. In 2013 the Planning and Budgeting Committee (PBC) and the Council for higher Education (CHE), in conjunction with the National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology, appointed the Committee for the Promotion and Representation of Women in Institutions of Higher Education. The Committee examined the main issues and barriers regarding representation of women in the Academia. In July 2015 it published its recommendations focusing on three (3) prominent issues – encouraging women towards academic research, recruiting women into the academic staff and promoting women in the senior academic staff.

160. In July 2015, PBC and CHE approved several resolutions on the basis of these recommendations, including: gradually doubling the number of scholarships in the programme for excellent post-doctoral female students; funding allocation for the purpose of expending women in higher staff; updating the calls for proposals and statutes of the adjudicatory committees of excellence scholarships so they would assimilate gender reference in them – and indeed, in late 2016 they were updated accordingly; instructing the education institutions that with regard to "Alon" and "Maof" scholarship programmes for science and engineering, among the candidates taking the examination, at least one half (1/2) shall be women. In the event that the rate drops to below 50 per cent, the institution shall be obliged to provide a detailed explanation and specify its efforts on the matter.

161. In total, the budget allocated for the implementation of this Committee's recommendations is roughly six (6) Million NIS (1.666 Million USD) in 2017 and six (6) Million 2018 (including matching funding by the institutions).

Gender Equity Advisors

162. The PBC allocated a budget for advisors for gender equity programme in higher education institutions for 2017-2019 at a maximum annual cost of 1.1 Million NIS (305,500 USD), and to further allocate funding for an extensive activity to promote this issue for a period of three (3) years with up to 600,000 NIS (166,600 USD).

Scholarships for women

163. On June 19, 2013 the PBC launched the 2014 Scholarship Programme for excellent post-doctoral female students in order to assist excellent doctoral female students from research universities in Israel to attend post-doctoral courses in leading universities abroad. During 2014 and 2015, ten (10) scholarships were awarded each year at the sum of 20,000 USD a year for a maximum period of two (2) years. On July 1, 2015 the PBC decided to double the number of scholarships in this programme in a gradual manner. In the PBC "Perach" and "Assistance fund" scholarships the majority of scholars were women (74 per cent and 65 per cent) respectively.

164. In 2015-2016, at least 50 per cent of the applicants for the majority of scholarships were women, except in the Alon scholarships programme where the percentage of women who were considered stood between 25 per cent-35.

165. See Diagram No. 7, Annex II.

Ultra-Orthodox population

166. Within the ultra-Orthodox Society the representation of women among students is significantly greater than the representation of male students and constitutes about 80 per cent of the total number of students during the years 2015-2016. The PBC invests many efforts and resources in order to allow the ultra-Orthodox population to better integrate into higher education system and subsequently into the labour market. In addition to the 'Maharim' (see below) framework, the PBC established a programme for scholarships and loans for ultra-Orthodox students. During 2016 about 2,500 ultra-Orthodox students participated in this programme, 50 per cent of them were women.

Five (5)-Year Programme ("Maharim")

167. 2016-2017 was the concluding year for the "Five year programme" which was established by the CHE and PBC in 2012. This is a unique programme, aimed at integrating the ultra-Orthodox population in the academy.

168. For more information see Annex I.

The Arab Population

169. The Arab population in Israel constitutes approximately 20 per cent of Israel's population, and an estimated 26 per cent of the relevant age group. In recent years, the rate of Arab students among the total students studying for their first degree has been steadily increasing. According to figures from the CHE, in 2014-2015, the rate of Arab students studying for a bachelor's degree in universities stood at 14.6 per cent, compared to 9.9 per cent in 2006-2007. A further increase is also evident in master's and doctorate degrees. In 2014-2015, Arab students constituted 8.8 per cent of all students learning master's degrees (compared to 6.7 per cent in 2009-2010 and 5.9 per cent in the 2006-2007) and 5.7 per cent of the students studying for doctorate degrees (compared to 3.9 per cent in 2009-2010 and 3.5 per cent in 2006-2007). The rate of participation of Arab students has also increased considerably at academic colleges - from 5.5 per cent in 2009-2010 to 9.8 per cent in 2014-2015 with bachelor's degrees, and from 3.8 per cent in 2009-2010 to 8.1 per cent in 2014-2015 with master's degrees. These increases are attributed, among other things, to the opening of higher education institutions in peripheral areas which increased the accessibility of higher education to the Arab population.

170. Within the Arab population, there are more female students than male students, so that women constitute more than 60 per cent of the Arab students. The rate of the women who meet the university threshold is 51.2 per cent, compared to 32.6 per cent among men.

171. Accordingly, the majority of the Arab scholarship candidates since 2014 were women, 67 per cent in 2014-2015 - See Diagram No. 8, Annex II.

172. For more information see Tables No. 18-19, Annex II.

Question 19 - Employment

Women and Parents in the Labour Market

Recent Legislation

173. The following amendments indicate on an ongoing change towards a more suitable dynamic for the family unit, as a further way to promote gender equality in the labour market.

Birth and Parental Period

Extension of maternity leave

174. On March 21, 2017 the maternity leave period of which parental allowance is paid was extended from 14 to 15 weeks, according to the criteria under the Law (Amendment No. 57 of the Women's Employment Law 5714-1954 (hereinafter: Women's Employment Law)).

175. In addition, the Amendment extends the flexibility in the entitlement of a father to parental leave; inter alia, the father may go on paid parental leave for a period of one (1) or more weeks (instead of a minimum of three (3) weeks). The purpose of this amendment is to encourage the exercise of this right by fathers, thus promoting greater fathers' involvement in raising their children. Furthermore, a father can take seven (7) days of parental leave simultaneously with his wife, and will be able to utilize them at any stage of the parental leave, according to the provisions under the Law.

Absence of spouse after birth

176. Amendment No. 54 of the Women's Employment Law (Section 7(C3)), provides that an employee may be absent from work up to five (5) days after the birth by his spouse. The first three (3) days of absence counts as an annual leave (and if he has utilized all his annual leave at the time of birth, he will be entitled to an unpaid leave). The two (2) remaining days of absence are paid as sick leave, and they are regarded as the second and third sick days, meaning days in which 50 per cent of the salary is paid. Note that this is additional to the extension of maternity leave to fifteen weeks mentioned above.

Parental leave for a father whose wife is self-employed

177. Amendment No. 193 of the National Insurance Law 5755-1955 (hereinafter: "National Insurance Law") from April 20, 2016, provides that an employee whose wife is self-employed is entitled to parental leave in lieu of his wife; this Amendment compares the conditions of a spouse whose wife is an employee.

Renaming the maternity leave, representing a new perception

178. According to Amendment No. 55 of the Women's Employment Law (2016) the name of the maternity leave was amended to "birth and parental period". The former name of maternity leave in Israel was (in literal translation) "birth vacation". The aim of this amendment is to change the social perception that this is not a vacation but a period requiring adjustment and personal preparation, and to strengthen the understanding that this right is also available to the father, aimed to encourage gender equality.

Hospitalized infant

179. Amendments 49, 50 and 55 (2016) to the Women's Employment Law has broadened Section 6D(1) of the Law with respect to a female employee who has given birth and her child needs to stay in hospital or return to hospital for over two (2) weeks, and she will be entitled to extend the period of leave for up to 20 weeks, where necessary, even if the hospitalization period was not sequential.

Parental Hour

180. Amendment 56 of the Women's Employment Law of March 30, 2017 extends the number of women who are eligible to a shorter working day (an hour of absence). The law now grants this right during the first four (4) months after returning from a period of Birth and Parental Period not only to women who work full-time but also to women who work less than that, according to the criterions under the Law. Thus, the Amendment can benefit women who work less than a full time job (though many hours nonetheless), and want to pursue their parental commitments simultaneously. Amendment No. 55 to the same Law provides that the parenthood hour can be used alternately by the father and the mother, and applies on designated parent within surrogacy process or an adoptive parent. This Amendment enhances the use of parental rights by both mothers and fathers as well as encourages fathers to take an active part in child-raising. Note that in July 2015, the Civil Service Commissioner approved a shorter working day for a parent of a child up to one (1) year-old for men whose spouse is in maternity leave, in order to encourage fathers to actively participate in parenthood and equally share their family responsibilities.

Protection of pregnant women against dismissal

181. The Israeli law includes an extensive protection against the dismissal of pregnant women; the law defines relatively long periods of protection, and in most cases it will require a permit of the MOLSASS before a dismissal of a pregnant woman; other cases are not eligible for a permit request to begin with (see, for example paragraphs 415-416 in the State's previous report, CEDAW/C/ISR/4). Since the previous report, this protection has been expanded: the provisions on protection against dismissal apply now also on an adoptive parent, a designated parent (a male or female employee receiving a child into their custody) and in a foster family (Amendment No. 48 (July 11, 2011)).

Absence due to fertility treatment

182. Since 1990 the Women's Employment Law (Absence Due to Fertilization and Fertility Treatments) Regulations 5751-1990 allows for an absence of up to 12 days a year with a physician's certificate due to fertilization or fertility treatments. This regulation is in accordance to Section 7(c)(4) of the Women's Employment Law.

183. An employee enjoys protection against dismissal under the Women's Employment Law. An employer is prohibited from dismissing employees who were absent due to fertility treatments for the period of their absence and for a period of 150 days after the end of the days of absence without a permit from the MOLSASS.

184. Under Amendment No. 51 (February 24, 2014), the prohibition on dismissal of a female/male employee due to fertility treatments can apply up to two (2) births from each spouse, at the same employer, according to the provisions under the Law.

Stillbirth

185. Amendment No. 172 (2016) of the National Insurance Law, expanded the definition of stillbirth so that it will be deemed a birth which took place from the 22nd week of pregnancy. This means that a woman giving birth after the 22nd week of pregnancy to a dead fetus or the child dies after the birth, will be entitled to a hospitalization allowance, a birth allowance and maternity allowance according to the provisions of the Law.

Equal Salary

186. Amendment No. 3 (March 2014) to the Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law 5756-1996 (hereinafter: the Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law) provides that public bodies that are obligated by law to submit reports regarding employees' salaries shall include a gender account in such reports.

187. Amendment No. 5 of 2014, to the Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law, enables the compensation for violating the Law without monetary loss, at a rate set by the Court's discretion. The Amendment enables to increase the amount of compensation and thus encourages filing claims due to salary gaps.

188. In November 2013, the Regulations for Encouraging the Incorporation and Promotion of Women in Employment and Adapting Employment Positions for Women 5774-2013 were legislated, detailing the selection process that determines which employer shall be given a financial grant or achievement award and the standards for examining the measure of the gender equality within the organization.

Recent DevelopmentsWomen in the Civil Service

189. Women constitute 62 per cent of the employees in the Civil Service. 40 per cent of the high-rank positions in the Civil Service are staffed by women. As previously reported, in order to accommodate the appropriate treatment in gender equality and gender issues in general, in the early 90's, it was decided to appoint a Gender Equality Supervisor in every Government Ministry. . In October 2014, following an in-depth examination, the supervisors' authority and duties were officially defined and the term of this duty as well as its benefits were approved. In addition, the official title of this position was changed to "Gender Equality Supervisor and Director Advisor for promotion of Women" (hereinafter: Supervisor). According to recent information from the Civil Service Commission (CSC), until 2015, 80 Supervisors were appointed in various Ministries.

The Department of Gender Equality at the Civil Service Commission (CSC)

190. The Gender Equality Department in the CSC which was established in 1995 ("the Department"), continues to coordinate and enhance this issue in the Civil Service, including participating in Knesset Committees, integrating gender perspectives in decisions adopted in the CSC, holding training sessions and promoting female leadership as well as conducting courses on prevention of sexual harassment for cadets, senior staff members etc. The Department for Gender Equality in the CSC publishes an annual report, "Leading for Change", which included all the activities taken to advance gender equality in the Civil Service.

The Stauber Report and implementation progress

191. In June 2014, the Government approved Resolution No. 1697, in which it resolved that within five (5) years women shall reach a representation level of 50 per cent in all the top management ranks in the Civil Service. Currently, the representation level stands at 44 per cent with regard to top management ranks.

192. This Resolution followed the report of The Committee for the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service ("The Stauber Committee"), which was appointed in 2014 by the Civil Service Commissioner and the Supervisor on Wage and Labour Agreements in the Ministry of Finance. The Committee issued a comprehensive report, which included a full data analysis and statistics of women employment in the Civil Service, presented the main obstacles and reasons for the current status of women in the Civil Service, ways to tackle them, and more.

Certificate of an Advanced Employer

193. Following the publication of the Report, the Government requested that the CSC take action to implement the recommendations of the Committee, including, inter alia, proposing legislative amendments and awarding a "Certificate of the Advanced Employer" to a Ministry that meets the targets for appropriate representation set by the Commissioner. In January 2017 all Ministries and support units completed the questionnaire for the Advanced Employer Certificate for 2016. A judicial committee convened to choose the winning Ministries in the different categories.

194. In addition, the Government ordered the Commissioner to report every six (6) months to the Ministerial Committee for the Advancement of the status of Women, until a complete implementation of the recommendations is achieved. Government Resolution No. 2043, (October 7, 2014), approved an additional funding of 2.75 Million NIS (690,000 USD), to further implement the above recommendations.

195. The 2017 Strategic Plan for Human Resources in the CSC and the Gender Equality Department of the CSC' annual plan, include various ways to promote women in the Civil Service, and meet the objectives which were defined in the Stauber Report. For example, one of the targets that was set at rate of 50 per cent women in each year of the Civil Service's talent management programme at the Civil Service's National College of Governance, Leadership and Management. Recently the first year of this programme began, and there are more than 50 per cent women.

The Gender Equality Index

196. In recent months, an assessment report of the CSC was issued on the "Gender Equality Index" addressing a variety of parameters on the issue of gender equality in every Ministry. The report was sent to all Government Ministries and support units. As part of the process of publishing this report, each Ministry received comprehensive information on the salary gaps in their Ministry.

Work from home pilot

197. The Department of Gender Equality in the CSC is part of an inter-ministerial team which determined rules for the implementation of the “work from home” pilot programme. This pilot programme began in 2016, and enables work from home in the afternoon hours for female and male employees who are parents, serve in an intermediate level position and above, and satisfying the criteria determined in Commissioner’s Guideline 1/2016. The pilot programme currently includes over 1,000 employees.

The Commissioner Guideline on variable wage components

198. The Stauber Committee found that salary gaps between women and men in the Civil Service derives inter alia due to variable salary components. For example, gaps in standards for vehicle allowance, overtime hours, and on-call hours. In light of the foregoing, in 2014 the Commissioner issued a Guideline which includes criterions for setting salary components, under the assumption that higher transparency would narrow the possibility for discrimination in salaries of the same position. In addition, the Guideline also requires to report on varied salary components to the CSC, which would not only improve transparency but would also benefit the CSC in monitoring and narrow gender salary gaps due to these components.

The Commissioner Guideline on Short working Day in August

199. In 2016, the Commissioner published a guideline according to which in August, a time in which the majority of children are on summer vacation from the education system, every employee is entitled to work one (1) hour less than usual, or to take a day off.

Parents' Rights in the Civil Service Brochure

200. The Department of Gender Equality in the CSC issued and distributed a brochure on parental and family rights in the Civil Service, consisting of all rights on this matter, including in cases of complications of pregnancy, surrogacy, adoption, etc.

Strategic Plan

201. Guidelines for strategic planning of the CSC include, inter alia, guidelines for Government Ministries on equal parenting, including the holding of conferences, lectures and workshops on this matter. Furthermore, courses were commenced on balancing home and work and creating a workplace which supports the family. For example, on March 29, 2017, the Gender Equality Department of the CSC held a conference titled "Equal Parenting – Family and Career – Possible?". The conference hosted all the Director Generals in the Government Ministries and the HR Managers.

Gender Commissions

202. Under the Commissioner’s Guideline 1/2016 (which established the work-from-home-pilot), Gender Commissions are being established in every Government Ministry. They are instructed to examine the barriers regarding equal parenthood and create ways to tackle them.

Cooperation with NGOs

203. The Department of Gender Equality routinely collaborates with various NGOs and members of the Academia on the issue of the advancement of the status of women. Recently, the CSC published an open-call for women organizations and developed an extensive circulation list to which all senior positions in the Civil Service open for recruitment, are sent for the purpose of active recruitment and encouragement of women to submit their candidacy. This is to create awareness and to operate for the advancement of women and to increase the representation of women at the senior echelons of the Civil Service.

Enhancing the Recruitment of Women in Civil Service Tenders

204. In 2017, several ventures were initiated in this area, such as: five (5) Courses for preparing women for tenders, limiting high ranks positions tenure so to allow more women to occupy positions in the Civil Service, a conference is to be held by the Department of Gender Equality in cooperation with the Senior Department for Examinations in the Civil Service, on the issue of gender and cultural biases in human resource tenders in the Civil Service. In recent months the Department has been creating a training pack for coordinators of the examinations committees on this matter, in order to incorporate effective and practicable tools. The Department of Gender Equality is an active participant in various teams of the CSC on this issue, for example, the "Tree of Knowledge" team on active recruitment of women, The Determination of Threshold Conditions for Management in order to verify the removal of barriers to the advancement of women in high ranked positions. In addition, the Department of Gender Equality in the CSC was included in June 2016 as one of the authorizing entities for job descriptions for positions filled via the headhunting committees of the Civil Service.

Pioneering Government Ministries

The Ministry for the Development of the Negev and Galilee - Women Leadership in the Negev

205. In 2014-15 the Ministry for the Development of the Negev and Galilee began implementing a programme titled "Women's leadership in the public sector" designed for branch managers and women employed in local authorities and public institutions in the Negev, with the aim of developing and strengthening women's leadership in the development of the Negev. The Ministry also leads a project to encourage entrepreneurship in the field of tourism by Bedouin women in the Negev. Another project ("promoting excellence"), in which 85 per cent of participants are Bedouin women, aims to assist the participants to complete academic studies and find employment.

The Ministry of Justice – Promoting women leadership in the Civil service

206. In recent years, the MOJ is investing many efforts to create a diverse and equal working environment. This is the second year that the MOJ, as a leading headquarter Ministry, has decided to commence a comprehensive report regarding the level of diverse employment in the MOJ, including in gender aspects. According to the 2016 report, the majority of employees in the MOJ are women, 68 per cent, which is higher than the average amount of women in the Civil Service. Within the high ranks positions women constitute the majority - 66 per cent. Within the Arab employees, women constitute 50 per cent. Moreover, the gender wage gaps in the Ministry are lower than in the rest of the labour market, standing at 12 per cent. In higher ranks the gaps decrease and stand at 2 per cent. This is an improvement compared to the 4 per cent salary gap in 2015.

The Ministries of Transportation and Road Safety, National Infrastructure, Energy and Water Resources and Health – Changing Work-Parenthood Dynamic 207. Recently, the directors of the three above mentioned Ministries, notified their employees that on Tuesdays and Thursdays, meetings will not be convened after 15:00 in order to allow parents and grandparents a family afternoon. This is as part of an agenda to promote family-work balance.

The Ministry of Economy and Industry (MOEI) – Adjusting the annual vacation to school vacation

208. For the last two (2) years, the MOEI has been leading a pilot according to which in the last 10 (10) days of August (days in which in the education system is in its summer vacation), the Ministry is closed.

Ministry of Foreign Affairs – work from home Pilot

209. A two-year pilot programme was initiated in March 2016 permits employees to work from home up to two (2) hours a day on days that they have worked at their office.

Question 20 – Migrant Domestic Workers

General

216. The total number of foreign workers in skilled employment who arrived in Israel in the course of 2016 was 15,737. This includes 6,420 workers who arrived within the framework of bilateral agreements: Construction: 2,236; Agriculture: 4,125; Caregiving: 59.

Mechanisms to ensure the safe work environment of foreign workers

217. Foreign workers in Israel are not "bound" to a particular employer after their arrival in Israel. They may freely change employers without the need for any special permission, subject to fulfilment of the general registration requirements. The right for liberty of the worker is specified in the Entry into Israel Regulations (Determination of Geographical Areas for the Employment of Foreign Caregivers) 5774-2014 and the Entry into Israel Regulations (Supervisory Measures Concerning the Movement of Foreign Workers in the Caregiving Field) 5774-2014. The freedom to change employers, contributes towards limiting abuse or exploitation of the workers, and is widely used by foreign workers in Israel.

218. Furthermore, a foreign worker in Israel is entitled to the same work conditions as an Israeli worker. In addition employers must provide foreign workers with a written employment agreement, health insurance, and suitable lodging. These conditions are enforced by the MOEI and PIBA.

219. Note that in H.C.J. (Second Appeal) Gluten v. The National Labour court (18.3.2013) the Court interpreted an exception clause in the law in a way that the Hours of Work and Rest Law 5711-1951 does not apply on certain employees as well as to foreign workers in the caregiving field. However, it is important to emphasize that this is exceptional, while all other legal protections of Israeli labour law apply on foreign workers, including the Minimum Wage Law 5747-1987. Moreover, the possibility to change employers allows for the foreign workers to earn more than the minimum wage. Furthermore, on July 7, 2016, the National Labour Court rendered its decision on the Zeltman Case. According to this decision, foreign workers in the caregiving field are entitled to one (1) rest day in a week, 25 hours long.

220. More protection measures are, for example, a rights leaflet (translated to the relevant language), given to the foreign worker at the consulate in the country of origin, as well as by the private agency through which she/he is employed before arriving to Israel.

221. Complaints regarding employment and residence conditions of foreign workers are brought before the Police or the relevant enforcement authority; every complaint that raises suspicion for the occurrence of an offence is referred to the relevant regional or local investigating units, legal aid is provided without charge in the appropriate cases, and the State Attorney's office, together with the prosecutors, who are the referent for trafficking in the District Attorney's Offices, accompany and consult the Police from the first stages of investigation, coordinated by NATU.

Foreign workers in the nursing care field

222. Since 2011, the employment in the caregiving field regulates their employment through private agencies, who act as the sole representative in all issues concerning processing, brokering and arrival of foreign workers in this field. This employment system is designed, inter alia, to ensure proper conditions for foreign workers, including the payment of wages and fair work terms. This system is also intended to better enforce the law on those who charge foreign workers illegal fees in exchange for their arrival to Israel, and to prevent the previously existing phenomena of binding workers to particular employers. Where foreign workers' rights violations are committed by the private agencies themselves, a process of inquiry is initiated with respect to these violations, and, if required, sanctions are imposed.

223. For more information see Annex I.

Health Care for Foreign Workers

224. The Foreign Workers Order (Employee Health Benefits Package) 5761-2001, which regulates the health services legal foreign workers are entitled to, was amended in 2016. This amendment stipulates that a foreign worker in the nursing care field, will receive a compensation in the amount of 80,000 NIS (20,800 USD), if ten (10) years have passed since she/he has received its permanent working permit in Israel, she/he was found incompetent to fulfil her/his work due to a medical condition and the foreign worker had made the necessary arrangements to fly back to her/his country of origin. The compensation is given due to the fact that once the foreign worker leaves Israel, her/his medical insurance no longer applies and she/he still has medical expenses due. This amendment has been published in the official records in May 2016 and shall enter into force in November 2017.

225. For more information see Annex I.

Foreign workers in cases of childbirth

226. In April 2011 the Supreme Court rendered a decision on "The Procedure for Foreign Pregnant Workers"; this procedure required foreign workers who were at least six (6) months pregnant while living in Israel, to leave the country within three (3) months after giving birth, with the possibility to extend their stay by another three (3) months in humanitarian cases only. The High Court of Justice stated that the Procedure was unconstitutional, on the grounds that it violates women's rights under the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The Court cited International human rights Conventions, in support of its ruling. (H.C.J. 11437/05 Kav La'Oved v. The Ministry of Interior et. al. 2009(3), 1688 (13/4/2011))

227. On December 12, 2011, the Supreme Court rejected the State's request for an additional hearing to review the aforesaid ruling. The Court stated that the HCJ ruling is well founded on the internal and international law and thus, although the HCJ ruling holds significance regarding the formation and implementation of local and foreign workers' rights, it does not constitute a new rule that requires further hearing on the matter. The Court further noted that the constitutional rights for parenthood and non-discrimination on the ground of childbirth are based in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and in the labour laws. Moreover, the Court's conclusion that these rights apply equally on foreign workers is not to be reviewed by an additional instance, as the jurisdiction to form a new arrangement, balancing the interests and rights of both parties, is given to the authority responsible for the matter (Ad.h. 3860/11 The Ministry of Interior v. Kav La'oved et. al. (8.12.2011)).

228. The decision of the Court quoted a CEDAW concluding observation that recommended that Israel should “revoke its policies with regard to cancellation of work permits for migrant workers in cases of child birth, marriage and intimate relationships.” In addition, the HCJ relies in its decision on the Committee's General Recommendations 21 and 26.

229. Subsequently, in 2013, the PIBA published a procedure concerning foreign workers who are pregnant or who have given birth whilst staying in Israel (Procedure 5.3.0023). Pursuant to this procedure, a foreign worker who came into Israel for work purposes and is legally employed, and who gave birth during the time of her stay in Israel, shall be entitled to remain in Israel in accordance with the provisions of the procedure. In addition, a female worker who had a child during her first 63 months of employment while in Israel, may choose either to leave Israel with the child and then to return and continue working in Israel, or to prolong her stay in Israel, with the child, up to 63 months from having first received a B1 visiting visa.

230. With regard to intimate relations, a foreign worker is of course allowed to marry an Israeli citizen; the citizenship procedure is in accordance with PIBA Procedure 5.2.0008 and 5.2.0009 and during the procedure the foreign worker will receive a temporary staying permit (B1 visa).

Question 21 – Health

Reducing Health-care Inequality

231. In recent years, the Ministry of Health (hereinafter: MOH) has been enhancing the efforts to minimize health-care gaps and addresses inequality in health.

232. As of 2013, a designated unit for reducing health disparities was established within the Ministry's headquarters. This unit promotes policies, standards, supervision, training and awareness-raising activities on this important issue, including by hosting conferences for various professionals, the publication of an annual report that monitors such gaps, and explores activities needed for its eradication.

233. Reducing health disparities was defined as a top-priority aim in the unit's strategic plan, and between the years 2011-2015, over 6 Billion NIS (16,216,216 USD) were dedicated to this issue.

234. In the course of 2016, the MOH held a broad public consultation procedure with the purpose of co-planning with the public the formulation of the Ministry's plan for decreasing health inequality for 2017-2020. This project included an online call to the public and holding “round tables”, two (2) of which were designated for women – the first was held with women who are residents of the unauthorized villages in the Negev and the second was held with Arab women from Acre.

235. In addition, the MOH began to develop an intervention programme which is designated to eliminate all forms of discrimination; The Intervention Programme includes consultation with relevant NGOs who were also involved in the work of inter-ministerial team in charge of forming an action plan to deal with racism against persons of Ethiopian decent and aims to study and implement ways to deal with racism and discrimination and to eliminate this phenomenon from the health system.

236. In 2013 the MOH established a translation call centre manned by representatives who were trained to operate as medical translators. This call centre provides translation services 24-hours a day for medical treatment provided by physicians to their patients, in Russian, Arabic, Amharic and French. On average, 1,500 calls are handled by this call centre per month. The MOH also provides financial support for activities made by health funds aimed at reducing gaps.

237. Between 2012 and 2014, a total of 55 Million NIS (14.5 Million USD) were allocated by various health funds for such steps, mainly on Israel's peripheral areas and aimed at reducing gaps among minority populations. The criteria for such support in 2015-2016 were amended in order to put special emphasis on steps conducted in Arabic in regards to social periphery and prevention of diabetes and obesity.

238. Further examples of steps taken by the MOH in recent years to reduce inequalities in health care include: improving infrastructures in peripheral areas, including an additional 1,000 hospital beds and manpower to peripheral hospitals; establishment of a medical school in the Northern Galilee and new emergency rooms in peripheral localities, both in the north and the south of Israel; allocation of additional medical equipment to peripheral areas, including new MRIs, linear accelerators, and PET scan devices; developing financial incentives, including grants and state-sponsored salary raises for specialized doctors to move to peripheral areas; reduction of the maximum co-payments of chronic elderly patients who receive income supplements; discounts on co-payments for the purchase of generic medications, etc.

Health care for Women in the Arab and Bedouin Population

239. The MOH operates many programmes within different communities, both for minorities and for disadvantage populations. For example, based on the value of reducing differences, the District Health-care Bureau in Haifa decided to lead and participate in health promotion programmes (those financed by the public health-care services and others) which focus on certain populations - Arabs, specifically women, persons with disabilities and seniors citizens.

240. Programmes designated for Arab women include also:

Women Leadership in Health Programme within Arab Communities

241. Studies show high obesity rates among Arab women; this project aims to promote healthier lifestyle. Two (2) programmes are currently running in Um Al-Fahem and Myser. The programme includes series of workshops for a group of women who want to be leaders in their community on health and nutrition. The trainings for the women include 100 hours sessions. These groups of women, separately within every town, underwent a process of empowerment which included increasing their self-efficacy, providing information and skills to lead community health programmes. The end goal of the leading women is to hold house meetings for women concerning healthy lifestyle. So far, the programme has succeeded in recruiting and building a regular core of volunteer leaders group for the health field, which includes 20 women from the community. The leaders led 11 house meetings, each had 3-4 sessions, and included 15-20 women. Over 60 per cent of the women who participated in the house meetings made at least one change in the health habits for themselves or/also their family. In Myser, all 15 women from the group reported on at least one change in their nutrition habits. The leaders created information leaflets adjusted to the local culture; a volume of training content was created, used as basis for the leaders for training in the house meetings. This programme was funded by the MOH and supported by the local authority. The programme was able to recruit and build a regular core of volunteer leaders group which includes 15 women. In Myser, the group of leaders decided to initiate negotiating with the local council in town to create a jogging path in the locality and take an active part in the local health events.

Gaps between the Jewish and Arab Population

242. Life expectancy - A further increase may be observed in regards to life expectancy both in the Jewish and Arab populations. In 2015, the life expectancy of Jewish men and women stood at 81.1 and 84.5 respectively, while the life expectancy of Arab men and women stood at 76.9 and 81.2 respectively (compared to 78.6 and 74.9 respectively in 2005). The gaps continue to decrease.

243. Diabetes – the rates of diabetes among Jewish and Arab men are similar, however among women a slightly higher rate was found among Arab women compared to Jewish women (9.8 and 7.4 respectively).

244. Cancer – the rate of cancer cases among the Jewish population is higher than that of the Arab population in Israel, except with regard to lung cancer.

Health Services within minority groups and disadvantaged populations

245. Health care to victims of trafficking: The shelters for victims of trafficking continue to provide medical care, psycho-social care and rehabilitation services. In addition the MOH also funds an annual budget of approximately 3 Million NIS (810.810 USD) for health-care services that are given to victims of trafficking in hospitals (visits to ICU, external clinics and hospitalization, pregnancy monitoring etc.). For further details on services for victims of trafficking, see Question 13.

Regulation and Policies

- MOH Deputy Director General Circular for supervision over HMOs and additional health-care services 3/13 titled “preventing exclusion of women”: This guideline strictly prohibits HMOs to provide services separately for men and women, gradual cancellation of existing segregation within a period that would not exceed two (2) years, prohibits separate reception hours for women and men in the same clinic or any other feature or sign of segregation between men and women.
- Medicine Administration Circular 22/2016 titled “National screening plan for breast cancer detection - update”: The national screening programme for breast cancer detection has been conducted in Israel for many years, with the initiative of the Israel Cancer Association and the national centre for cancer control of Clalit HMO, with the support of the MOH. This guideline obliges all HMOs and Breast imaging clinics to report annually to the MOH on the implementation of a biannual Mammogram screening for women aged 50-74, and an annual Mammogram for women aged 40+ with a family history or with a higher risk for breast cancer for other reasons.
- MOH Deputy Director General Circular for supervision over HMOs and additional health-care services 07/2014 titled “treatment of myomas with MRI-guided focused ultrasound”: This guideline broadens the National Health Insurance Law, so that invasive and non-invasive alternative treatments may also be considered for the patient, including MRI-guided focused ultrasound (FUS) therapy. Accordingly, significant weight should be given to the recommendation of the treating physician and to the woman’s preference to refrain from hysterectomy, considering the availability of a less-radical medical alternative.
- The National Health Insurance Regulations (HMO Registration, Rights and Obligations of Stay Permit Holders by the Citizenship and Entry to Israel Law (Temporary Order) 5763-2003) entered into force on August 1, 2016. According to the regulations, stay permit holder under conditions listed in the Temporary Order Law, or for special humanitarian reasons are entitled to and must register with an HMO and will receive health services to a similar extent as a resident. Note that permit holders include Palestinians who received a permit for family unification or for special humanitarian reasons. Since the Law has entered into force, approximately 2,716 permit holders joined an HMO health insurance plan.

Question 22 – Rural Women

248. In general, Israel is highly urbanized, as roughly 92 per cent of all Israelis live in urban communities, and only 8 per cent in rural ones.

249. According to the data collected from the research of the Central Bureau of Statistics, between 2003 and 2014 a slight improvement was evident in the condition of women living in rural villages. The improvement is mainly evident in the rate of working households that increased by approximately 10 per cent and in the increase of the number of wage-earners in the family. As a result of that, there was a decrease in the poverty rate of adult women in these households by approximately 4 per cent, and there was an increase of approximately 60 per cent-70 per cent in the rate of family income and in the rate of income per capita. However, the disposable income per capita remained at a low rate compared to women in non-rural areas.

250. For more information, see Table No.26, Annex II.

Government Resolutions Regarding the Bedouin Community in the Negev

251. On February 12, 2017 the GOI approved Resolution No. 2397 titled "Government plan for the empowerment and socio-economic strengthening of the Bedouin localities in the Negev for the years 2017-2021." This is a comprehensive five (5)-year plan which regards different aspect for development within the Bedouin localities, education, infrastructures, employment, medical services and empowering local municipalities. The Resolution aims to include as much possible the representatives of local population in the implementation procedure of the programme. The Government has allocated 3 Billion NIS (11.1 Million USD) to this plan.

Access to Justice and Equality before the Law

252. See Question 6.

Housing in the Bedouin population

253. There are more than 240,000 Bedouins living in the Negev desert area. About 76 per cent of them live in urban and suburban centres which have been legally planned and constructed (25 per cent live in the city of Rahat, an additional 40 per cent live in six (6) local authorities (Hura, Kuseife, Tel-Sheva, Ar'ara, Lakiya and Segev shalom) and an additional 11 per cent reside in 11 authorized localities within the Al-Kasum and Neve Midbar Regional Councils. The remaining 24 per cent of the Bedouin population reside in hundreds of unauthorized and unregulated clusters, mainly within the Al-Kasum and Neve Midbar Regional Councils which are spread over an area of almost 500,000 dunams. This obstructs urban expansion in the greater Negev area and is not beneficial to the common good of the Bedouin population.

254. Today there are 18 Bedouin localities with approved outline plans, including the city of Rahat, Lakiya, Hura, Kuseife, Tel-Sheva, Segev Shalom and Ar'ara. All of these plans include infrastructure such as schools, health clinics, running water, electricity, roads, pavements, etc. An additional 11 localities that are under the jurisdiction of the Neve Midbar and A-Kasum Regional Councils also have approved outline plans.

Employment

255. In the past few years, significant steps were taken to promote and integrate the Bedouin population into the labour market pursuant to Government Resolution No. 3708 (see above), in which 338 Million NIS (92 Million USD) has been allocated to the MOEI.

256. In 2014, the Bedouin population employment rate was 65 per cent among men and 26 per cent among women, and the unemployment rate was 13 per cent among men and 6 per cent among women.

257. For information regarding employment programmes and special programmes, for example, Ryan employment centres, women entrepreneurship, professional training, day-care centres, industrial parks, integration in to high-tech industries, and more, see Annex I.

Centres for Teenage Bedouin Girls

258. The MOLSASS operates "Safe Space" for teenage Bedouin girls in distress. The object of these spaces is to prevent school drop-out, strengthening self-image, and empowerment.

Access to Health

259. For information on some of the main projects, including health clinics and medical services, data on immunization coverage, nurses serving the Bedouin population, Mother and Child Health-care Stations, school nurse and recent developments, see Annex I.

Question 23 – Disadvantaged Groups of Women

Female prisoners

260. Neve Tirtza is the only women's prison in Israel. Thus, the prisoner population in the complex is varied and includes detainees on remand, detainees on remand until further decision, or until the end of the proceedings, as well as minor and adult prisoners. Furthermore, the facility is equipped to include pregnant women and young mothers with their children (up to two (2) years of age). In November 2016, an official review visit by the PDO took place at Neve Tirtza. The review was significantly positive. For prominent findings see Annex I.

Palestinian women prisoners held in IPS facilities

261. As of December 1, 2016, in Neve Tirtza there were 19 prisoners who are residents of the West Bank and 18 detainees - A total of 37 women. None of these prisoners/detainees is pregnant. Palestinian prisoners in the IPS receive the same full health-care services as Israeli prisoners, including expert physician services, hospitalization and mental health services.

262. The prisoners receive regular family visits, for 45 minutes. Visitors who are Israeli citizens independently arrive to the IPS facility and visitors who are residents of the West Bank or the Gaza Strip visit through busses organized by the ICRC.

Housing for disadvantaged women

263. The Ministry of Construction and Housing has diverse assistance programmes that provide assistance in housing for disadvantaged population groups; no changes occurred in this field since the last report.

264. Currently, the total number of women who are granted a public housing apartment is 25,885 women, out of which 14,300 women who are independent/single mothers and 11,585 single women (without children or with children over the age of 21).

265. In addition, young women at risk, aged 18 to 25, who are considered to have no family support, are also provided assistance by the Ministry in rent fees in the sum of 1,000 NIS (270 USD) per month for 24 months. During 2016, 145 young women have received this type of assistance.

266. The apartment purchase procedure of August 2006, sets forth an assistance track within which the Ministry purchases an apartment for eligible persons with disabilities who are assisted by a wheelchair, selected by the eligible person, where the purchased apartment is rented out to the eligible person at public rental terms. In addition, the apartment may be adapted according to person's disability. Similar assistance is also provided in rental apartments.

267. On February 28, 2017 the Ministerial Committee on Gender Equality held a meeting addressing the topic of labour laws enforcement regarding women from disadvantage populations.

Income support for women in shelters for victims of domestic violence

268. Amendment No. 49 of the Income Support Law 5741-1980 (entry into force: June 1, 2017), provides a change in the prerequisite of receiving income support for women who reside in a shelter for victims of domestic violence. The Amendment annuls the condition that was previously required by the law, and grants income support to every woman who is eligible to it according to the law, even if she was not eligible in the month prior to their joining to the shelter. The amendment improves the conditions of women entering the shelters, whose financial situation significantly changes subsequently.

269. On November 5, 2012, the Knesset enacted the Welfare Service Law (Adaptation Grant for Women who stayed at a Shelter for Battered Women) 5773-2012 (hereinafter: the "Welfare Service Law (Adaptation Grant for Women who stayed at a Shelter for Battered Women)"). According the Law, a woman who stayed at a shelter for victims of domestic violence at least 60 days, will be entitled to an adaptation grant, provided according to a rehabilitation programme within 60 days upon her departure. This is conditional on not returning to her former permanent place of residence. The grant will be in the sum of 8,000 NIS (2,162 USD) for each woman, and for women with children, an additional 1,000 NIS (270 USD) for each child.

270. On December 2, 2013 the Knesset amended the Welfare Service Law (Adaptation Grant for Women who stayed at a Shelter for Battered Women) to ensure that the grant shall be paid no later than 60 days after the application for such a grant is submitted.

271. Programmes for disadvantaged populations by the MOLSASS - see Annex I.

Question 24 - Marriage and Family relations

General

272. Notwithstanding the status quo, recent years indicate a change in the Family Matters Courts tendency to adjudicate tort claims against spouses that refuse to grant or receive a Jewish writ of divorce ("Gett"), and the value of the compensations against the reluctant spouse are becoming higher. In the past, the Family Matters Courts allowed submission of such damages claim only when the Rabbinical Court ordered to issue a divorce, thereby limiting the relief only to these cases, at a later stage, with the development of the trend to recognize this claim cause, the Family Matters Court rulings acknowledged damages also in cases where the Rabbinical Court did not mandate a divorce. However, note that this trend is often not welcomed by the Rabbinical Court, and a rabbinical ruling determines that a divorce that is granted due to tort claim is disqualified in accordance with the Jewish law (Halacha).

273. For precedential rulings on this subject see Annex III.

Measures to prevent the phenomena of women whose husband is reluctant to give a divorce ("Agunot")

Legislation

274. In March 2012, the Rabbinical Courts Law (Implementation of Divorce Judgments) 5755-1955 was emended, and the Amendment requires the Rabbinical Courts to monitor progress in the enforcement of divorce judgments, whether by setting a deadline for the arrangement of a divorce or by examining the effectiveness of restrictions that were imposed according to the law and considering the need to increase them if necessary. The Amendment also established the duty to report to the Knesset's Constitution, Law and Justice Committee regarding the implementation of judgments. Thus, in addition to the continuous monitoring of progress in judicial proceedings by the Rabbinical Courts system, the imposition of this statutory duty makes the Knesset an active monitor, able to evaluate the effectiveness of judicial intervention to protect the liberty of women.

275. In 2017, this Law was further amended, and the possibility to impose different sanctions on prisoners who are spouses that refuse to give a divorce was added; for example preventing the option to participate in religious class, limitations on visitors, limitations on kosher food of a more stringent standard (Mehadrin), and more (Amendment No. 8).

State Attorney Guideline – "Prosecution Policy in Cases of Failing to Comply a Judicial Order for Granting a Gett"

276. On 10 November 2016, the State Attorney's Office issued State Attorney's Guideline No. 2.24 which regulates the prosecution and punishment policy in respect of failure to comply with a judicial order of the Rabbinical Court regarding granting or receiving a divorce. This is a meaningful step in the efforts to reduce the number of women who are "Agunot" (women whose husbands refuse to grant them a divorce).

277. For more information see Annex I.

The Rabbinical Court Administration

278. The Rabbinical Courts conduct trainings to the rabbinical judges on the issue of Compelling Gett Order and the available sanctions that can be applied by them according to the Rabbinical Court Law (Execution of a Divorce Verdict) 5755-1955, concerning spouses that refuses to give divorce, which can even be imprisonment.

279. In 2015, the movie "Gett", which protest the difficulties of women whose husband is refusing to grant a divorce, through a dramatic plot, was screened in the national convention of the rabbinical judges.

280. Furthermore, the Rabbinical Court Administration has a designated department that is tasked with handling the complex issue of refusal for granting divorce. The staff in this Department includes qualified personnel that have been specially trained in this area. The Department employs a variety of tools to reach the reluctant husband and persuade or force him to comply with the divorce judgment. Thus, for example, the Department uses various technological means to locate the husband, to gain information about his businesses, etc. The Department maintains regular contact with other government agencies, inter alia, for the purpose of obtaining court orders against husbands reluctant to give their wives a 'Gett', such as stay-of-exit orders.

Retroactive invalidation of divorce on Jewish women

281. In general, the Rabbinical Courts Administration is not aware of cases of retroactive annulment of divorce. Moreover, as is well known, the Rabbinical Courts rule in matters of personal status according to the Jewish Law (Halacha); In terms of Jewish Law, the retroactive annulment of a divorce is a radical procedure that is rarely implemented and only in extremely exceptional cases. According to the Jewish Law, the meaning of retroactive annulment of divorce is the invalidation of the woman's marriage to a man who is not her former husband and the continued validity of her previous marriage. As an outcome, the lineage of the offspring of the second marriage would be forever tainted. It is thus obvious that the Rabbinical Courts, which operate in accordance with Jewish Law, almost invariably avoid using this measure. Currently, there is only one (1) case in which the validity of a divorce is being considered, due to the exceptional and groundbreaking nature of the ruling by the Regional Rabbinical Court that approved the divorce. Even in this case, there has thus far been no retroactive annulment of the divorce but only preliminary proceedings before the High Court of Justice. Consequently, in this single case as well, the divorce remains in effect.

282. In a recent case law (H.C.J 9261/16), the Supreme Court approved a regional rabbinical court (in Safed) ruling which approved a divorce for a woman whose husband is in a vegetative state, and reversed a Great Rabbinical Court ruling who allowed a third party to appeal this decision. Here, the Supreme Court emphasized that an effort to try and make the woman Aguna again (after the Rabbinical Court granted her with a divorce) violates her basic right for human dignity, as enshrined in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, and takes her liberty. Such a violation, the Court concluded, is unconstitutional.

283. For further details, see Anonymous and "Dead End" (Mavoy Satum NGO) v. The Great Rabbinical Court et. al., Annex III.

Civil marriage abroad

284. No material changes were made since 2011. Note that in 2012, the precedential ruling was rendered by the Family Matters Court, that annulled the marriage of two Jews, a for same-sex couple, as the Rabbinical Court refrained from its annulment due to its refusal to acknowledge it. See 11264-09-12 Anonymous et. al. v. The Ministry of Interior (21.11.2012), Annex III.

Parental custody in divorce

285. In recent years, the recommendations of two (2) public committees were submitted to the Ministers of Justice - one regarding parental responsibility in divorce and the other regarding child support. Though the recommendations have not yet evolve to a law, in recent years there is a growing number of judicial decisions that determine joint custody for both parents, or parental arrangements with equal or shared custody at both parents.

Recent legislation to expedite the settlement of family disputes

The Family Dispute Settlement Law

286. In 2014, the Family Dispute Settlement (Temporary Order) 5775-2014 was enacted. This law determines that spouses who wish to separate are referred at the first step to a dispute resolution in one of the Family Assistance Units (FAU) of the relevant Court. The parties will not be able to turn to judicial instances before they have done so. After submitting the application, the FAU will hold up to four (4) initial meetings with the parties which will allow them to examine the possibility to turn to an alternative dispute resolution, other than litigation in court. The Law aims to reduce the complex implications of divorce litigation in court, to all family members. It also helps prevent discrimination against women in a judicial proceeding, in cases when women are in a weaker position (economically, personally) than men and need to cope with the intense conflict and feelings accompanying the separation process. This law required preparation and training of professionals and entered into effect in July 2016. The Law was enacted as a temporary order valid for three (3) years in order to inspect its advantages to resolve family disputes over their judicial resolution.

Division of Pension Savings between Separated Spouses

287. In August 2014, the Pension Savings Distribution between Separate Couples Law 5774-2014 was legislated. The Law determines arrangements regarding the distribution of pension savings between the saver and her or his former partner and inter alia enables the distribution of the pension savings among the ex-partners through a paying body (such as pension funds, employers that use seniority pension etc.) instead of direct distribution between the parties. Though this law does not deal with separated couple's children directly, the law intends to prevent further encounter between the ex-partners after the divorce, thus reduces some of the difficulties and relieve to some extent their children during the process of divorce disputes.

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women

Distr.: General
17 November 2017

Original: English

Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women

Concluding observations on the sixth periodic report of Israel*

1. The Committee considered the sixth periodic report of Israel (CEDAW/C/ISR/6), submitted pursuant to the simplified reporting procedure, at its 1542nd and 1543rd meetings (see CEDAW/C/SR.1542 and CEDAW/C/SR.1543), held on 31 October 2017.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee appreciates the submission by the State party of its sixth periodic report, which was prepared in response to the list of issues and questions prior to reporting (CEDAW/C/ISR/QPR/6), and its follow-up report (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5/Add.1). The Committee welcomes the oral presentation by the delegation and the further clarifications provided in response to the questions posed orally by the Committee during the dialogue.

3. The Committee commends the State party on its delegation, which was headed by the Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Israel to the United Nations Office at Geneva, Aviva Raz Shechter, and included representatives of the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Labour, Social Affairs and Social Services, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education, the Israel Defence Forces, the police, the Israel Prison Service and the Permanent Mission of Israel to the United Nations Office and other international organizations in Geneva.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the progress achieved since the consideration in 2011 of the State party's fifth periodic report (CEDAW/C/ISR/5) in undertaking legislative reforms, in particular the adoption of the following:

(a) Amendment No. 6 to the Marriage Age Law, raising the minimum age of marriage from 17 to 18 years, in 2013;

* Adopted by the Committee at its sixty-eighth session (23 October–17 November 2017).

(b) Amendment No. 57 to the Employment of Women Law, extending the period of maternity leave from 14 to 15 weeks, in 2017;

(c) Amendment to the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Regulations, providing for measures to combat sexual harassment in higher education institutions, in 2014;

(d) Amendment No. 26 to the Religious Judges Law, requiring that at least one of the two representatives of each body (the Government, the parliament and the Israel Bar Association) appointed to the committee responsible for the appointment of judges of the religious Jewish courts be a woman, in 2013;

(e) Amendment to the Rabbinical Courts (Enforcement of Divorce Judgments) Law, in 2012;

(f) Amendment to the National Health Insurance Law, providing for fertility preservation treatments for women and girls who are to undergo chemotherapy or radiation treatments, in 2011.

5. The Committee welcomes the State party's efforts to improve its policy and institutional framework aimed at accelerating the elimination of discrimination against women and promoting gender equality, such as the adoption or establishment of the following:

(a) Action plan for the implementation of Security Council resolution 1325 \(2000\), in 2015;

(b) Community courts, which became operational in 2014;

(c) Joint interministerial committee on preventing domestic violence, in 2014;

(d) Gender equality unit within the police, in 2013;

(e) Joint interministerial team, headed by the Deputy Attorney General, to review and implement the concluding observations of human rights treaty bodies, in 2011.

6. The Committee welcomes the fact that, in 2012, in the period since the consideration of the previous report, the State party ratified the following international instruments:

(a) Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities;

(b) Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), of the International Labour Organization.

C. Parliament

7. The Committee stresses the crucial role of the legislative power in ensuring the full implementation of the Convention (see the statement by the Committee on its relationship with parliamentarians, adopted at the forty-fifth session, in 2010). It invites the parliament, in line with its mandate, to take the necessary steps regarding the implementation of the present concluding observations between now and the next reporting period under the Convention.

D. Principal areas of concern and recommendations

Reservations

8. Notwithstanding the positive developments, including the amendment to the Rabbinical Courts (Enforcement of Divorce Judgments) Law in 2012, the Committee notes with concern that the State party maintains its reservations to articles 7 (b) and 16 of the Convention, even though it has committed itself to reviewing them. The Committee notes the State party's explanation in its follow-up report (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5/Add.1) that the reservations relate to the very fabric of Israeli society, which comprises many religions, each having varying degrees of autonomy with regard to certain religious practices. It notes, however, that the national courts have invoked article 16 of the Convention in several cases, as indicated in annex III to the State party's report, and that various issues relating to family, marriage and divorce law are dealt with by family courts, which indicates that the reservations can be withdrawn. It welcomes the indication by the delegation that internal discussions regarding the partial withdrawal of the reservation to article 16 will soon begin.

9. Considering that the age of marriage and other areas of law relating to matrimonial property within the legal framework are in line with the Convention, the Committee reiterates its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5, para. 9) that the State party review its reservations to articles 7 (b) and 16 of the Convention in order to withdraw them within an established time frame. It reiterates that the reservation to article 16 is contrary to the object and purpose of the Convention because it undermines the principle of substantive equality between women and men in all matters relating to marriage and family relations.

Definition of discrimination and non-discrimination

10. While noting that the Supreme Court has applied a progressive approach to the principle of equality, derived from the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, the Committee expresses its regret that the State party's legislation still contains no comprehensive definition of discrimination against women that covers direct and indirect discrimination. It expresses its concern about the systemic discrimination experienced by national minorities, specifically women and girls belonging to the Arab and Bedouin communities.

11. The Committee, recalling its previous recommendation (ibid., para. 11), recommends that the State party take legislative measures to adopt a comprehensive definition of discrimination against women that covers direct and indirect discrimination in the public and private spheres, in addition to intersecting forms of discrimination, in line with article 1 of the Convention. It also recommends that the State party adopt a comprehensive strategy to eliminate the systemic discrimination experienced by national minorities, specifically women and girls belonging to the Arab and Bedouin communities.

Limitation of freedom of movement, segregation and exclusion of women in relation to public spaces and commercial and educational settings

12. The Committee notes with concern that, the response by the delegation and the measures taken by the State party notwithstanding, limitations on freedom of movement continue to have an impact on women in public spaces, including transportation, and at times have led to their exclusion from educational, commercial and religious environments by some ultra-Orthodox movements, which are imposing their observance of religion in a way that contravenes the fundamental rights of women and girls. It is concerned about the recent decision by the Council for Higher Education to expand segregated campuses and introduce fully segregated classrooms within universities.

13. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Intensify its efforts to address the phenomenon of limitation of freedom of movement of women and sex-based segregation by some religious movements, so as to guarantee the access of women and girls to public spaces, including transportation and educational, commercial and religious settings, on equal terms with men, and impose sanctions on persons and institutions involved in discriminatory acts;

(b) Denounce the segregation of women and girls as an unacceptable practice, an affront to the dignity of women and girls that is incompatible with the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and a violation of the Convention;

(c) Eliminate segregation in all spheres, including public spaces and higher education.

Extraterritorial application of the Convention

14. The Committee regrets that the State party maintains its position that the Convention is not applicable beyond its own territory, such that it provided no information on the implementation of the Convention in the Occupied Palestinian Territory over which the State party exercises jurisdiction or effective control. It reiterates that the State party's position is contrary to the position of the Committee and other treaty bodies, including the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Committee against Torture and the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, and the International Court of Justice (ibid., para. 12).

15. The Committee recalls its previous recommendation (ibid., para. 13) that the State party give full effect to the provisions of the Convention and implement its obligations under international humanitarian law with regard to all persons under its jurisdiction or effective control. The Committee recommends that the State party provide comprehensive information in its seventh periodic report on the implementation of the Convention in the Occupied Palestinian Territory over which it exercises jurisdiction or effective control.

Access to justice

16. The Committee notes the State party's efforts to provide legal aid services to women and girls, including the establishment of a legal aid branch in Rahat in June 2016, and to strengthen cooperation between the Legal Aid Department and non-governmental organizations. It welcomes the recent amendment to extend free legal aid to victims of sexual offences by providing an exemption from the economic eligibility test required under the Legal Aid Law. The Committee also welcomes the implementation of the amendments to the Rabbinical Courts (Enforcement of Divorce Judgments) Law and the strengthening of the family court system to expedite the disposition of cases relating to marriage and divorce. The Committee is concerned, however, that:

(a) Women, including those belonging to minority groups, are unaware of their rights under the Convention and lack the information necessary to claim them;

(b) Women and girls, in particular those belonging to Arab and Bedouin communities, asylum seekers and migrants, experience differential access to justice owing to the physical and economic barriers that they face in bringing complaints of discrimination;

(c) Following the adoption of guidelines by the Legal Aid Department in April 2016, the number of appeals in family law matters, including child support and maintenance, funded from legal aid has fallen.

17. Recalling its general recommendation No. 33 (2015) on women's access to justice, the Committee recommends that the State party address all physical and economic barriers that impede access to justice for women, in particular those belonging to Arab and Bedouin communities, asylum seekers and migrants. It also recommends that the State party:

(a) Increase awareness among all women, including those belonging to minority groups, of their rights under the Convention and eliminate the obstacles preventing them from gaining access to justice;

(b) Ensure that the Convention and related national legislation are made an integral part of the continuing legal education of the judiciary and all actors in the justice system, so as to cultivate a culture supportive of women's rights;

(c) Assess the impact of the guidelines adopted in 2016 by the Legal Aid Department on women's access to legal aid, in particular with regard to family law matters, including child support and custody cases.

Women and peace and security

18. The Committee welcomes government resolution No. 2331, which is aimed at implementing Security Council resolution 1325 \(2000\) on women and peace and security. It notes the adoption of an associated action plan and a comprehensive policy plan for the promotion of gender equality. It also notes the representation of women in the Israel Defense Forces. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned that:

(a) The implementation of the policy plan does not address the situation of women and girls in the Occupied Palestinian Territory as part of the extraterritorial obligations of the State party;

(b) The State party's efforts to increase the participation of women in the peace process notwithstanding, women, in particular Israeli-Arab women and representatives of civil society organizations, remain underrepresented;

(c) Sexual violence in the Israel Defense Forces has increased, notwithstanding the adoption of a strategic plan to eliminate sexual harassment, which includes the establishment of a victim support section;

(d) Israeli security forces continue to use disproportionate force in response to acts of violence and protest demonstrations and in law enforcement operations in the context of counter-terrorism measures, with a disproportionate impact on women and girls.

19. The Committee recommends that the State party give due consideration to its general recommendation No. 30 (2013) on women in conflict prevention, conflict and post-conflict situations by ensuring that the policy plan on the implementation of Security Council resolution 1325 (2000) is fully implemented, including through the allocation of adequate human, technical and financial resources and enhanced cooperation with women from civil society organizations representing all perspectives. The Committee also recommends that the State party:

(a) Extend the application of the policy plan to the Occupied Palestinian Territory over which the State party exercises jurisdiction or effective control;

(b) Establish a mechanism, with set objectives, to recognize and take advantage of the strategic role of women in finding a lasting solution for peace and to promote conflict prevention and post-conflict reconstruction efforts, including through their direct role in decision-making, in line with Security Council resolution 1325 (2000), and take into consideration the full spectrum of the Council's women and peace and security agenda, as reflected in resolutions 1820 (2008), 1888 (2009), 1889 (2009), 1960 (2010), 2106 (2013), 2122 (2013) and 2242 (2015);

(c) Continue to investigate, prosecute and punish perpetrators of sexual violence in the Israel Defense Forces and ensure that a policy of zero tolerance of sexual abuse and exploitation by security officials is strictly applied;

(d) Ensure that the use of force against women and girls in response to acts of violence and protest demonstrations and in law enforcement operations in the context of counter-terrorism measures is proportionate and in compliance with the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials.

National human rights institution

20. While the Committee welcomes the fact that the State party accepted the recommendation made under the universal periodic review procedure to establish a national human rights institution in line with the principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (the Paris Principles) (A/HRC/25/15, para. 136.25, and A/HRC/25/15/Add.1, para. 9), it is concerned that no such institution has yet been established.

21. The Committee recommends that the State party establish an independent national human rights institution for the promotion and protection of human rights, with a mandate to protect and promote women's rights, and ensure parity in the representation of women and men in its composition, including leadership positions, in full compliance with the Paris Principles.

National machinery for the advancement of women and gender mainstreaming

22. The Committee commends the State party on the substantial increase in financial resources for the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women and the development of an overarching gender mainstreaming policy and plan of action that incorporates action on meeting the Sustainable Development Goals and involves governance structures at the national and local levels. The Committee also welcomes the adoption of government resolution No. 36, in May 2015, to establish a ministerial committee on social equality mandated to promote gender equality in areas covered by the Convention. The Committee notes the "gradual gender analysis" of the State budget and efforts to define the responsibilities of the gender equality supervisors assigned to each ministry, as well as the development of policies to promote the equality of women from Arab and Bedouin communities. Nevertheless, the Committee notes that the coordination of gender-mainstreaming activities undertaken by the supervisors is insufficient, as is the involvement of all actors, including judges and law enforcement personnel, necessary to reinforce the plans and strategies.

23. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Continue to strengthen coordination and the provision of adequate resources to the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women so as to enable it to carry out its activities effectively, including monitoring progress in efforts to attain the Sustainable Development Goals;

(b) Provide an evaluation in its seventh periodic report of the implementation and coordination of the gender-mainstreaming activities undertaken by the ministries following the official defining of the duties of the gender equality supervisors, which should include tracking the progress made by each ministry to ensure that activities financed from the State budget comply with set gender-budgeting evaluation criteria and ensuring that ministries not in compliance are sanctioned;

(c) Reinforce projects to increase cooperation with civil society organizations representing women's interests, in particular those representing the interests of women from minority communities and groups in disadvantaged situations, including Arab and Bedouin women.

Temporary special measures

24. The Committee commends the State party on its efforts to accelerate the achievement of substantive equality of women and men, such as the use of the "team of directors" public procedure, which sets quotas for the representation of Israeli-Arab women as directors in government companies. The Committee also commends the State party on Amendment No. 12 to the Municipal Council (Funding of Elections) Law, which provides for 15 per cent additional funding for those political parties where at least one third of their elected and serving members are women. The Committee is concerned, however, that the amendment applies only to elections for city and local councils, not regional councils. The Committee is also concerned that no temporary special measures have been adopted in some areas covered by the Convention, including higher education.

25. The Committee recommends that the State party increase the use of temporary special measures, including statutory quotas, in all areas covered by the Convention in which women are underrepresented or disadvantaged, including representation on regional councils and in decision-making positions in higher education. Such measures should include specific targets and time frames, in accordance with article 4 (1) of the Convention and the Committee's general recommendation No. 25 (2004) on temporary special measures, in order to ensure the achievement of substantive equality of women and men in all areas of the Convention in which women, especially Israeli-Arab women, are underrepresented or disadvantaged.

Stereotypes and harmful practices

26. The Committee welcomes the State party's efforts to combat discriminatory gender stereotypes and harmful practices, including the adoption of Amendment No. 6 to the Marriage Age Law, by which the minimum age of marriage was raised from 17 to 18 years. The Committee also welcomes the adoption of government resolution No. 2345 to establish an interministerial committee mandated to develop a strategic plan to eliminate polygamy. The Committee is concerned, however, that:

(a) Discriminatory stereotypes based on restrictive religious interpretations concerning the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and in society persist, in particular among ultra-Orthodox Israelis;

(b) Married women who are unable to divorce because they have not received the get continue to suffer stigma and discrimination when they bear children by men other than their husbands;

(c) Polygamous and forced marriages persist, in particular among the Arab and Bedouin communities, the State party's efforts to eliminate those harmful practices notwithstanding.

27. Recalling joint general recommendation No. 31 of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women/general comment No. 18 of the Committee on the Rights of the Child (2014) on harmful practices and in line with target 5.3 of the Sustainable Development Goals, to eliminate all harmful practices, such as child, early and forced marriage and female genital mutilation, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Adopt a comprehensive strategy to eliminate discriminatory stereotypes with regard to the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and in society, which should include a monitoring mechanism to assess the impact of the measures taken and design remedial action;

(b) Expand public education and other programmes to eliminate stereotypes and stigma with regard to women who have children out of wedlock;

(c) Take further legislative and educational measures to eliminate polygamous and forced marriages, in particular among the Arab and Bedouin communities.

Gender-based violence against women

28. The Committee commends the State party on its efforts to tackle gender-based violence against women, such as Amendment No. 11 to the Rights of Victims of Crime Law, which will enter into force in January 2018 and provides that victims of sexual violence are entitled to choose the gender of their investigator. It notes that the State party is taking steps to ratify the Council of Europe Convention on Preventing and Combating Violence against Women and Domestic Violence. The Committee remains concerned, however, at:

(a) Reports of intimate partner violence, including femicide and crimes committed in the name of so-called honour;

(b) The prevalence of sexual and domestic violence, as also noted by the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences (A/HRC/35/30/Add.1, paras. 29–32);

(c) Psychological violence and abuse by husbands against their wives during divorce proceedings through the withholding of consent to divorce (also known as get abuse);

(d) The high rate of sexual harassment experienced by women and girls in all settings.

29. Recalling its general recommendations No. 19 (1992) on violence against women and No. 35 (2017) on gender-based violence against women, updating general recommendation No. 19, and in line with target 5.2 of the Sustainable Development Goals, to eliminate all forms of violence against all women and girls in the public and private spheres, including trafficking and sexual and other types of exploitation, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Intensify efforts to combat gender-based violence against women, including femicide and domestic violence, by ensuring that such acts of violence are effectively investigated and prosecuted and adequate sentences imposed on the perpetrators;

(b) Ensure that women are protected from psychological violence and abuse exerted by their husbands during divorce proceedings, including through the imposition of appropriate sanctions by courts;

(c) Implement a policy of zero tolerance of sexual harassment, ensuring the full prosecution and punishment of all such acts perpetrated against women and girls;

(d) Expedite the ratification of the Council of Europe Convention on Preventing and Combating Violence against Women and Domestic Violence.

Violence against and harassment of women in the Occupied Palestinian Territory

30. While noting the complexity of the situation, in particular regarding the local administration, the Committee expresses concern that Palestinian women and girls continue to be subjected to excessive use of force and abuse by the State party's security forces and Israeli settlers, including physical, psychological and verbal abuse and sexual harassment and violations of their right to life. The Committee is also concerned that:

(a) Owing to restrictions on freedom of movement in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, Palestinian women and girls continue to be subjected to harassment at checkpoints and by settlers on their way to and from school and work;

(b) The practice of night raids employed by the Israeli security forces disproportionately affects women and girls.

31. The Committee reiterates its previous concluding observations (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5, para. 23) and recommends that the State party:

(a) Immediately put an end to all human rights abuses and violations perpetrated against women and girls in the Occupied Palestinian Territory and remove any restrictions on freedom of movement;

(b) Combat impunity for human rights violations and ensure remedies for victims;

(c) Ensure that the practice of night raids complies with due process guarantees and rights under the Convention.

Evictions and house demolitions

32. The Committee, recalling its previous concluding observations (ibid., para. 28), notes with concern that the State party continues to demolish property, homes and schools and undertake forced evictions, especially in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, that is under its jurisdiction or effective control.

The Committee notes that the practice of punitive demolitions affecting entire families without distinction constitutes collective punishment and is a violation of international humanitarian law. The Committee is concerned that:

(a) The State party's authorities have resumed, following its suspension in 2005, the practice of punitive house demolitions, which punishes families and disproportionately affects women and girls, in particular female-headed households;

(b) The use of discriminatory planning and zoning policies in Area C of the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, results in a lack of housing permits for Palestinians and the issuance of eviction and demolition orders.

33. The Committee reiterates its previous recommendation (ibid., para. 29) that the State party:

(a) Revoke all policies on the practice of punitive demolitions and forced evictions, which have a harmful impact on the physical and psychological well-being of Israeli-Arab women and girls, and Palestinian women and girls in the Occupied Palestinian Territory;

(b) Immediately cease the implementation of eviction and demolition orders that are based on discriminatory planning and zoning policies;

(c) Revise the discriminatory policy concerning housing permits for Palestinians.

Trafficking and exploitation of prostitution

34. The Committee notes the State party's efforts to penalize the purchase of sexual services and to combat trafficking in persons, including through the conduct of regular training sessions for government officials and the provision of free legal aid to victims of trafficking. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned that the State party remains a destination country for trafficking in women and girls for purposes of sexual and labour exploitation. It is particularly concerned at:

(a) The lack of early identification of women and girls who are victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation, who often arrive in the State party as labourers, and the inefficiencies in the identification of victims;

(b) The lack of information on mechanisms in place to inspect the agricultural sector to identify victims of trafficking;

(c) The low rate of prosecution of traffickers owing to the lack of coordination between the police and the migration services;

(d) The lack of information on sexual exploitation of women engaged in prostitution and on exit programmes for women wishing to leave prostitution.

35. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Ensure that the Office of the National Anti-Trafficking Coordinator strengthens the mechanisms for the early identification of women and girls who are victims of trafficking;

(b) Strengthen the coordination between the entities responsible for monitoring the implementation of the laws combating trafficking and exploitation of prostitution;

(c) Provide information in its seventh periodic report on the extent of exploitation of prostitution in the State party and on the mechanisms in place to identify victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation or for the exploitation of labour in the agricultural sector;

(d) Enhance bilateral, regional and international cooperation to prevent trafficking, including by exchanging information and harmonizing legal procedures to prosecute traffickers;

(e) Introduce exit programmes for women wishing to leave prostitution.

Participation in political and public life

36. The Committee notes that the State party has made commendable progress in promoting the participation of women in the judiciary and the civil service and on State boards. It welcomes the appointment of a woman as Director of Human Resources at the Rabbinical Courts Administration and of a woman judge in a Muslim religious court. Nevertheless, the Committee remains concerned at:

(a) The low number of women in the parliament and ministerial, senior academic and diplomatic positions and the fact that women cannot serve as judges in rabbinical courts;

(b) The low participation of Israeli-Arab and Bedouin women in political and public life;

(c) The lack of measures to tackle discrimination by ultra-Orthodox political parties, namely Yahadut Hatorah and Shas, whose regulations bar women from being appointed as members or from being candidates and therefore elected to the parliament or municipal and regional councils, and at the State Attorney's opinion that there is no legal basis for invalidating those regulations or for excluding those parties from participating in elections, even though party statutes should not be allowed to derogate from the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and the Basic Law: the Knesset.

37. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Continue to take targeted measures to further increase the representation of women in political and public life, especially in the parliament and ministerial, senior academic and foreign service positions, and initiate consultations with relevant stakeholders on introducing reforms regarding the participation of women as rabbinical judges;

(b) Introduce temporary special measures, such as quotas, to increase the participation of Israeli-Arab and Bedouin women in political and public life;

(c) Adopt legislation that prohibits from participating in any election any political party that has discriminatory regulations precluding women from being appointed as members of parties or from being candidates and therefore elected to the parliament or regional and municipal councils, in violation of article 7 of the Convention and of the relevant basic laws, especially the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

Human rights defenders and non-governmental organizations

38. The Committee is concerned that, following the adoption of the so-called boycott and Nakbah laws in 2011, human rights defenders, including Israeli and Palestinian women, have been subjected to severe restrictions on their activities, including through limitations on their financing.

39. The Committee recommends that the State party take specific steps, including through legal amendments, to create an enabling environment in which Israeli and Palestinian women human rights defenders and non-governmental organizations working on gender equality and women's empowerment may freely conduct their activities without undue restrictions, including on funding by foreign sources.

Nationality and family reunification

40. The Committee notes with concern that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order), which was enacted in 2003 and intended to be temporary, yet continues to be extended, prohibits the granting of status to the spouses of Palestinian Israelis or Palestinian permanent residents in Israel. The Committee notes that the ban is absolute for inhabitants from the Gaza Strip, whereas Palestinians from the West Bank have been able to obtain limited temporary resident permits since 2005. The Committee is particularly concerned that:

(a) The legislation prohibits the granting of any status (residency or citizenship) to Palestinians from the Occupied Palestinian Territory who are married to Israeli citizens or residents of East Jerusalem solely based on their nationality, whereas foreign spouses of other nationalities can obtain such permits;

(b) Owing to the legislation, couples must choose to live separately, with one spouse deprived of seeing the children grow up; live together with the spouse from the Occupied Palestinian Territory being considered illegal, deprived of basic rights and subject to deportation if found living in East Jerusalem; or live in the West Bank, in which case the Israeli spouse risks losing Israeli citizenship and the permanent residents risk losing residency status;

(c) Although the legislation now allows the granting of temporary residence permits for humanitarian reasons or a residence permit under special circumstances, the granting of temporary residence permits requires the fulfilment of strict security and age conditions, and the withdrawal of such permits can be arbitrary;

(d) Under government resolution No. 3598 of June 2008, family reunification of Palestinians who have Israeli residency or citizenship with individuals from the Gaza Strip is prohibited outright.

41. The Committee recalls its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5, para. 25) that the State party objectively balance its security concerns with the human rights of persons affected by its laws and policies and review them in order to facilitate family reunification of all citizens and permanent residents of the State party. In that regard, the State party should review the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) and government resolution No. 3598 of June 2008 to ensure that they comply with articles 9 and 16 of the Convention, for example by providing for targeted measures, applied on a case-by-case basis, while respecting the principles of equality and proportionality.

Education

42. The Committee welcomes the high level of literacy and education in the State party and the measures taken to further improve access by women and girls to good-quality education, in particular with regard to women and girls from ultra-Orthodox communities, including the five-year programme aimed at integrating them into the education system. The Committee also welcomes the amendment in 2014 to the Rights of Pupils Law to include sexual orientation and gender identity as prohibited grounds of discrimination against pupils. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned at:

- (a) Gaps in equal access to education experienced by Israeli-Arab, Bedouin and ultra-Orthodox women and girls, who, as result, continue to register higher dropout rates and poor outcomes with regard to higher education;
- (b) The fact that women remain underrepresented in high-level academic positions and in scientific fields;
- (c) Information that textbooks used in the Arab education system contain negative stereotypes concerning the roles and responsibilities of women and men, notwithstanding the adoption in 2015 of a guideline on teaching methods, which requires that all textbooks undergo “gender-focused editing” before approval by the Ministry of Education.

43. The Committee recommends that the State party:

- (a) Strengthen its strategies, including through the use of temporary special measures such as targeted scholarships, to improve education outcomes among Israeli-Arab, Bedouin and ultra-Orthodox women and girls, and use attendance officers from the Ministry of Education to prevent them from dropping out of school;
- (b) Intensify the use of measures, including temporary special measures, to address the underrepresentation of women in high-level academic positions;
- (c) Review textbooks in the Arab education system to identify and remove discriminatory stereotypes.

Employment

44. The Committee welcomes the adoption, in 2014, of Amendment No. 5 to the Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law, which provides that public bodies that have an obligation to submit reports regarding employees’ salaries should include a “gender account”. The Committee also welcomes the adoption, in 2013, of regulations for encouraging the incorporation and promotion of women in employment and adapting employment positions for women, providing for a selection process for employers who are entitled to a financial grant or achievement award for promoting gender equality. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned at:

- (a) Labour market segregation, the concentration of women in traditional career paths and the persistent gender wage gap, which, in the civil service, is partly due to variable salary components such as a vehicle allowance and overtime hours;
- (b) The limited participation of Bedouin and ultra-Orthodox women in the labour market;
- (c) Information that Israeli-Arab women continue to face barriers to gaining access to employment;
- (d) Increased reports of sexual harassment cases and insufficient sanctions within the Israel Defense Forces, which the State party attributes to increased reporting, and the lack of information on the impact on women’s career progress in the Israel Defense Forces following the integration of ultra-Orthodox men into the military.

45. The Committee, recalling its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5, para. 37), reiterates that the State party:

(a) Intensify its efforts to guarantee equal opportunities for women in the labour market by combating segregation and take specific measures to reduce the gender pay gap by enforcing the principle of equal pay for work of equal value and intensifying the use of wage surveys;

(b) Establish training and vocational courses to ensure the equal participation of women in the development of digital technology;

(c) Adopt specific measures, including temporary special measures, to improve the participation of Bedouin and ultra-Orthodox women in the labour market and remove barriers faced by Israeli-Arab women to gaining access to employment;

(d) Intensify efforts to combat sexual harassment, in particular in the Israel Defense Forces, through the enforcement of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law and assess the impact on women's career progress in the Israel Defense Forces following the integration of ultra-Orthodox men into the military.

Health

46. The Committee appreciates the efforts made by the State party to ensure that a high standard of health care is available and that advances are made in medical research, while noting that there remains discrimination in terms of access to care. It welcomes the steps taken to improve health care for women and girls and notes the development of an intervention programme and an action plan to eliminate discrimination in the health sector, in particular to address racism against persons of Ethiopian descent and to reinforce health-care infrastructure and personnel in rural areas. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned that:

(a) Women and girls of Ethiopian descent continue to face discrimination when seeking health-care services;

(b) Owing to restrictions on freedom of movement at checkpoints, Palestinian women and girls in the Occupied Palestinian Territory experience hardships in reaching health-care facilities such as hospitals and clinics and emergency care and specialized treatment;

(c) Israeli-Arab and Bedouin women and girls continue to register poor health outcomes, in particular in terms of infant and maternal mortality, and have the highest incidence within the Israeli population of obesity and lung cancer;

(d) While abortion is permitted in certain circumstances, including rape, incest, threat to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman and when fetuses have a serious mental or physical defect, as set out in the Penal Code of 1977, women must still follow complex and onerous administrative procedures to obtain approval for abortion from the Termination of Pregnancy Committee.

47. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Adopt appropriate intervention programmes and action plans, including the strict application of relevant criminal law provisions, to address discrimination in the health sector, in particular against women and girls of Ethiopian descent;

(b) Continue to strengthen efforts, such as the implementation of the national screening plan for breast cancer and the treatment of ovarian and lung cancer, in order to improve health outcomes among Israeli-Arab and Bedouin women, in particular with regard to obesity, lung cancer and infant and maternal mortality;

(c) Conduct an impact assessment study and ensure that the administrative procedures for obtaining approval for an abortion from the Termination of Pregnancy Committee do not hinder the access of women and girls to safe abortion services.

Economic empowerment of women

48. The Committee notes the State party's efforts to promote the economic empowerment and social welfare of women and welcomes the adoption, in 2015, of a transition strategy from the Millennium Development Goals to the Sustainable Development Goals. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned at:

(a) The lack of information on access to loans and credit facilities by women and girls and on efforts to enhance their capacity in entrepreneurship and the use of digital technology;

(b) The lack of information on measures taken by the State party to implement the Sustainable Development Goals and ensure the participation of women in those processes.

49. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Provide detailed information in its seventh periodic report on women's access to loans and other forms of financial credit and on efforts to enhance the capacity of women and girls in entrepreneurship and their use of digital technology;

(b) Ensure the participation of women in efforts to meet the Sustainable Development Goals.

Disadvantaged groups of women

Refugee and asylum-seeking women and girls

50. The Committee welcomes the fact that in January 2013 the Ministry of Health opened a clinic in southern Tel Aviv-Jaffa for foreign residents who were not covered by the State health insurance. Nevertheless, it remains concerned that asylum-seeking women continue to experience uncertainty owing to the low number of refugee claims that are accepted by the State party, thereby greatly hindering their full access to the education, employment, health-care and justice systems.

51. The Committee, recalling its previous recommendation (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/5, para. 47), recommends that the State party repeal the relevant provisions of the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Jurisdiction) Law, so as to facilitate the processing of claims by asylum-seeking women and ensure their access to essential services.

Women in detention

52. The Committee reiterates its concern about the increased number of Palestinian women and girls who are subjected to prolonged administrative detention and forcible transfers from the Occupied Palestinian Territory to places of detention in Israel and about reports of their limited access to justice and health-care services.

53. In line with the United Nations Rules for the Treatment of Women Prisoners and Non-custodial Measures for Women Offenders (the Bangkok Rules), the Committee recommends that the State party address prolonged administrative detention by ensuring that Palestinian women and girls who are detained are promptly brought before a judge. It also recommends that the State party improve conditions of detention and ensure access to justice and health-care services.

Rural women

Bedouin women

54. The Committee notes that the State party operates a “safe space” project for adolescent Bedouin girls in distress with a view to preventing them from dropping out of school and enhancing their economic empowerment. The Committee also notes that, in February 2017, the State party approved a five-year plan to develop Bedouin localities in the Negev, including by improving education and health infrastructure. Nevertheless, the Committee notes with concern that:

(a) The five-year plan is accompanied by forced urbanization, evictions and displacements and the State party continues to demolish homes and schools in Bedouin communities such that Bedouins are forced to relocate;

(b) The lack of information on access by Bedouin women to social services and credit facilities and their use of modern technology.

55. The Committee, recalling its previous recommendation (ibid., para. 45), recommends that the State party:

(a) Take specific measures to improve education, employment, health-care and housing outcomes for Bedouin women and girls, including by ensuring that action plans for their empowerment have clear indicators and benchmarks and their implementation is monitored and regularly evaluated;

(b) Provide information in its seventh periodic report on access by Bedouin women to social services and credit facilities and their use of modern technology.

Marriage and family relations

56. The Committee welcomes the legislative developments in the area of marriage and family relations, including the adoption, in 2012, of an amendment to the Rabbinical Courts (Enforcement of Divorce Judgments) Law, which requires rabbinical courts to monitor progress in the enforcement of divorce judgments. The Committee also notes that the legislation was further amended in 2017 to allow for sanctions to be imposed on male spouses who refuse to consent to a divorce (get). It further notes that, in 2016, the State Attorney issued a guideline to regulate the prosecution and punishment policy in respect of failure to comply with a judicial order of a rabbinical court regarding the granting or receiving of a get, in order to reduce the number of women whose husbands cannot or refuse to grant the get. The Committee notes the establishment of procedures relating to the jurisdiction of family rules in civil and religious courts and the need to take measures to combat what is known as the “race for jurisdiction”. The Committee is concerned that:

(a) Women suffer from discrimination in divorce matters because they are under the influence of discriminatory religious laws. Given that, under Jewish law, only men can grant consent for a divorce (get), women are susceptible to extortion by their husbands and concede to certain marital terms in return for a get, while Muslim women fear losing custody of their children should they embark on a new relationship;

(b) The law does not provide for civil marriages, and even spouses who contract civil marriage outside the State party are still subject to the jurisdiction of religious courts in divorce cases;

(c) Following the recommendation of the Schnitt Committee to remove the “tender years” clause under the Legal Capacity and Guardianship Law of 1962, which provides that children up to 6 years of age are to be under the custody of their mother, there has been an increase in applications for joint custody by men in order to reduce their child support payments, with this change in the interpretation of the legislation also being used as a tool to extort concessions from women and leading to an increase in family disputes before the courts;

(d) Polygamy and bigamy persist and are legitimized under religious laws governing personal status, including the possibility of retroactive annulment of a divorce even when the former spouses have remarried, which has negative consequences for women.

57. Recalling its previous recommendations (ibid., para. 49) and in line with its general recommendations No. 21 (1998) on equality in marriage and family relations and No. 29 (2013) on the economic consequences of marriage, family relations and their dissolution, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Repeal discriminatory provisions governing divorce that give men the unilateral power to grant consent to divorce (get) and, in the interim, intensify the use of criminal sanctions for husbands who deliberately withhold consent, and expand the supervisory powers of rabbinical courts in ensuring compliance with their orders in that respect;

(b) Introduce an option for individuals to contract a civil marriage and to divorce in civil courts, at least when civil marriages are contracted outside the State party;

(c) Harmonize religious laws governing marriage and divorce with the Convention;

(d) Undertake a study to assess the impact of the “tender years” clause and the introduction of joint child custody on the increase in the number of custody disputes, the increased level of poverty experienced by female-headed households and the use of joint custody or the threat of such use as a tool applied by men to extort concessions from women;

(e) Intensify efforts to enforce the prohibition of bigamy and polygamous marriages, as well as the retroactive cancellation of a divorce, through the strict imposition of sanctions, as already introduced in the civil service, and through educational and awareness-raising programmes.

Optional Protocol to the Convention and amendment to article 20 (1) of the Convention

58. The Committee encourages the State party to ratify the Optional Protocol to the Convention and to accept, as soon as possible, the amendment to article 20 (1) of the Convention concerning the meeting time of the Committee.

Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action

59. The Committee calls upon the State party to use the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action in its efforts to implement the provisions of the Convention.

2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development

60. The Committee calls for the realization of substantive gender equality, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, throughout the process of implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development.

Dissemination

61. The Committee requests the State party to ensure the timely dissemination of the present concluding observations, in the official languages of the State party, to the relevant State institutions at all levels (national, regional and local), in particular to the Government, the ministries, the parliament and the judiciary, to enable their full implementation.

Ratification of other treaties

62. The Committee notes that the adherence of the State party to the nine major international human rights instruments¹ would enhance the enjoyment by women of their human rights and fundamental freedoms in all aspects of life. The Committee therefore encourages the State party to ratify the Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families and the International Convention for the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearance, to which it is not yet a party.

Follow-up to the concluding observations

63. The Committee requests the State party to provide, within two years, written information on the steps taken to implement the recommendations contained in paragraphs 13 (a), 53 and 57 (a) and 57 (b) above.

Preparation of the next report

64. The Committee invites the State party to submit its seventh periodic report in November 2021. The report should be submitted on time and, in case of delay, should cover the entire period up to the time of its submission.

65. The Committee requests the State party to follow the harmonized guidelines on reporting under the international human rights treaties, including guidelines on a common core document and treaty-specific documents (see HRI/GEN/2/Rev.6, chap. I).

Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women

Concluding observations on the initial report of the State of Palestine*

1. The Committee considered the initial report of the State of Palestine (CEDAW/C/PSE/1) at its 1614th and 1615th meetings (see CEDAW/C/SR.1614 and CEDAW/C/SR.1615), held on 11 July 2018. The Committee's list of issues and questions is contained in CEDAW/C/PSE/Q/1 and the responses of the State of Palestine are contained in CEDAW/C/PSE/Q/1/Add.1.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee appreciates the submission by the State party of its initial report. It also appreciates the State party's written replies to the list of issues and questions raised by the pre-sessional working group and welcomes the oral presentation by the delegation and the further clarifications provided in response to the questions posed orally by the Committee during the dialogue. It further appreciates the information provided in writing following the dialogue.

3. The Committee commends the State party on its high-level delegation, which was jointly headed by the Minister of Women's Affairs, Hayfaa F. H. Alaga, and the Head of the United Nations Department of the Multilateral Affairs Sector at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, Omar A. H. Awad Ala, and included representatives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Women's Affairs, the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministry of Social Development, the Office of the Higher Presidential Committee of Church Affairs, the Central Bureau of Statistics, the Office of Public Prosecution, the Sharia High Judicial Council, the Department of Family and Minors' Protection and the Permanent Observer Mission of the State of Palestine to the United Nations Office and other international organizations in Geneva.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the progress achieved since the entry into force of the Convention for the State party in 2014 in undertaking legislative reforms, in particular the adoption of the decree law on the protection of juveniles, which takes into account the best interests of the child and promotes the rehabilitation and speedy reintegration of children in conflict with the law, in 2016.

* Adopted by the Committee at its seventieth session (2–20 July 2018).

5. The Committee welcomes the State party's efforts to improve its institutional and policy framework aimed at accelerating the elimination of discrimination against women and promoting gender equality, including the following:

(b) Adoption of the strategic plan for combating violence against women, 2011–2019;

(c) Establishment of the Special Prosecutor's Office to combat gender-based violence against women and girls.

6. The Committee welcomes the fact that, since the entry into force of the Convention for the State party in 2014, the State party has acceded to the following international instruments:

(a) International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in 2014;

(b) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, in 2014;

(c) Convention on the Rights of the Child, in 2014;

(k) Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, in 2017.

Sustainable Development Goals

7. The Committee welcomes the international support for the Sustainable Development Goals and calls for the realization of de jure and de facto (substantive) gender equality, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, throughout the process of implementing the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. The Committee recalls the importance of Goal 5 and of the mainstreaming of the principles of equality and non-discrimination throughout all 17 Goals. It urges the State party to recognize women as the driving force of the sustainable development of the State party and to adopt relevant policies and strategies to that effect.

C. Parliament

8. The Committee stresses the crucial role of the legislative power in ensuring the full implementation of the Convention (see the statement by the Committee on its relationship with parliamentarians, adopted at the forty-fifth session, in 2010). It invites the State party to take all appropriate measures to urgently convene the Palestinian Legislative Council and ensure that the Council, in line with its mandate, takes the necessary steps regarding the implementation of the present concluding observations between now and the submission of the next periodic report.

D. Principal areas of concern and recommendations

General context: occupation of Palestinian territory and implementation of obligations under the Convention

9. The Committee notes that the territory of the State party has been under occupation by Israel since 1967, which poses severe challenges for the State party in fully implementing its obligations under the Convention, given that women and girls have been subjected to, among other things, restrictions on their freedom of movement, displacement, house demolitions and illegal settlements, excessive use of force and abuse by Israeli security forces, settler violence and restrictions on gaining access to health-care services, in particular for women and girls living in the Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem. The Committee recalls that Israel, as the occupying Power, is not absolved of its obligations under international humanitarian law and international human rights law. It notes that the Convention is applicable in the entire territory of the State party and that the State party should implement it in all parts of its territory. In that regard, the Committee regrets that, notwithstanding the agreement between the Fatah and Hamas movements to end Palestinian division, signed on 12 October 2017, there has been limited progress in resolving internal political issues that negatively affect the full enjoyment by women and girls in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip of their rights under the Convention. The Committee notes that, owing to the political and geographical fragmentation of the State party's territory, women and girls continue to be subjected to multiple legal systems that greatly impede the full realization of their rights under the Convention, including their political and economic empowerment.

Definition of discrimination and legislative framework

10. The Committee notes that, following the ratification of various human rights treaties, the State party is undertaking a comprehensive review of its legislation in order to ensure compliance with international human rights norms. It also notes that discrimination is prohibited under article 9 of the Amended Basic Law and that an attempt was made to define discrimination in article 546 of the proposed draft penal code of 2011. However, the Committee remains concerned about the absence of a comprehensive definition of discrimination against women in line with article 1 of the Convention.

11. The Committee recommends that, in line with articles 1 and 2 of the Convention, the State party:

(a) Adopt, without delay, national legislation that includes a comprehensive definition of discrimination against women covering all prohibited grounds of discrimination and encompassing direct and indirect discrimination in both the public and private spheres;

(b) Ensure that the proposed draft penal code of 2011, which is aimed at prohibiting and punishing discrimination, is revised to bring it into conformity with the Convention, and to include provisions for appropriate enforcement mechanisms and sanctions.

Legal status of the Convention

12. The Committee commends the State party for ratifying the Convention without reservations. It notes that, in accordance with the interpretation of the Supreme Constitutional Court, in its decision No. 4 (2017) of 19 November 2017, that international treaties acceded to by the State party take precedence over national legislation, the provisions of the Convention must be incorporated into national law. The Committee is concerned, however, that the Convention has not been published in the Official Gazette in order to make it applicable in the State party. It is also concerned about the interpretation of the Supreme Constitutional Court, in its above-mentioned decision, that international conventions take precedence over national law only insofar as they are consistent with the national, religious and cultural identity of the Palestinian people. The Committee is further concerned about the absence of a time frame for acceding to the Optional Protocol, notwithstanding the State party's declared commitment to do so.

13. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Fully incorporate the provisions of the Convention into its national law and ensure its implementation in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, including in East Jerusalem;

(b) Ensure that the interpretation of the Supreme Constitutional Court holding that treaties acceded to by the State party take precedence over national law only insofar as they are consistent with the national, religious and cultural identity of the Palestinian people, does not absolve the State party of its obligations under the Convention;

(c) Take concrete steps to accede to the Optional Protocol and publish the Convention in the Official Gazette;

(d) Train members of the judiciary, including judges of sharia courts, legal professionals and law enforcement officers, on the Convention, the Committee's jurisprudence under the Optional Protocol and its general recommendations.

Harmonization of legislation and repeal of discriminatory laws

14. The Committee commends the State party on the establishment of a legislative harmonization committee to review all laws to, among other things, ensure that they are consistent with the human rights treaties to which the State party has acceded, including the Convention. However, the Committee is concerned about the lack of a time frame for completing the review. The Committee is particularly concerned that:

(a) The fragmentation of the legal system is such that women and girls in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank are subjected to multiple sets of laws, which afford varying levels of protection, given that some laws perpetuate customary practices and traditions that discriminate against women;

(b) Various archaic laws, including those enacted during the Ottoman period, and personal status laws, including the Egyptian Family Rights Law of 1954 and the Jordanian Personal Status Law of 1976, are applicable in the Gaza Strip and West Bank, respectively, and allow for the continued violation of women's rights in matters of marriage, divorce, child custody and inheritance;

(c) No time frame has been adopted for the review and adoption of draft laws such as the draft penal code, the draft personal status code and the draft family protection law.

15. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Reunify the legal systems in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank to ensure that all women and girls in the State party are afforded equal protection under the law, in line with the Convention;

(b) Adopt a clear time frame for the review of archaic laws by the legislative harmonization committee, in collaboration with relevant partners, including civil society organizations, to ensure their compliance with the Convention, and ensure that the review includes a thorough gender impact analysis to identify all customary and religious laws that are in conflict with the Convention;

(c) Expedite the review of draft laws to ensure their compliance with the Convention, including the draft penal code, the draft personal status code and the draft family protection law, and their adoption.

Access to justice

16. The Committee notes that, under article 30 of the Amended Basic Law, the right to litigation is guaranteed to all persons. The Committee also notes the State party's efforts to revitalize the National Legal Aid Commission and that the State party is currently preparing a strategic plan on legal aid. The Committee notes with concern, however, the lack of information on progress made towards adopting the draft law to establish a legal aid fund, proposed in 2014. The Committee also notes that, although free legal aid is recognized as a right in the State party, the provision of legal aid services for women has been largely delegated to civil society organizations in the State party.

17. Recalling its general recommendation No. 33 (2015) on women's access to justice, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Expedite efforts aimed at revitalizing the National Legal Aid Commission and the preparation of a strategic plan on legal aid so that women, including disadvantaged groups of women, have access to affordable or, if necessary, free legal aid services;

(b) Address the economic barriers that impede women's access to justice, by establishing a legal aid fund and supporting the efforts of civil society organizations providing legal aid services in the State party, and allocate adequate financial resources to the legal aid fund in order to benefit more economically disadvantaged women, in particular those in rural areas.

Women and peace and security

18. The Committee commends the State party on the adoption, in 2016, of its national action plan for the implementation of Security Council resolution 1325 \(2000\) on women and peace and security. The Committee notes that the State party has incorporated the provisions of the resolution into a cross-sectoral national gender strategy and the national policy agenda, for the period from 2017 to 2022. It also notes the State party's efforts to ensure the participation of women at the reconciliation discussions between Fatah and Hamas held in Cairo in October 2017. The Committee is concerned, however, that:

(a) Notwithstanding the State party's efforts to increase the participation of women in national and international peace processes, women remain underrepresented in conflict prevention and peacebuilding processes and are not fully involved in the implementation of the national action plan on Security Council resolution 1325 (2000);

(b) The mechanism for the implementation of the national action plan is not adequately funded, and the national observatory to collect data in this area has not been established owing to lack of funding;

(c) Women and girls, in particular in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, continue to suffer from the effects of conflict and occupation, including the blockade of the Gaza Strip, such that a large number of them are in need of humanitarian assistance, while the provision of humanitarian aid by the international community has decreased considerably.

19. The Committee recommends that the State party give due consideration to its general recommendation No. 30 (2013) on women in conflict prevention, conflict and post-conflict situations by ensuring that the national action plan is fully implemented, including through the allocation of adequate human, technical and financial resources and through enhanced cooperation with civil society organizations, the international community and relevant United Nations agencies. The Committee also recommends that the State party:

(a) Ensure the full participation of women and representatives of women's organizations in conflict prevention, peacebuilding and post-conflict reconstruction efforts, including in decision-making, in line with Security Council resolution 1325 (2000), and take into consideration the full spectrum of the women and peace and security agenda of the Security Council, as reflected in Council resolutions 1820 (2008), 1888 (2009), 1889 (2009), 1960 (2010), 2106 (2013), 2122 (2013), 2106 (2013) and 2331 (2016);

(b) Ensure the participation of women in international peace processes and national reconciliation processes, in particular with regard to the implementation of the national action plan;

(c) Expedite efforts to establish a national observatory to collect data on women and peace and security, and ensure that the national observatory and the mechanism for the implementation of the national action plan are adequately funded;

(d) Continue to engage with the international community and United Nations agencies, in particular the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, to provide the assistance needed to women and girls in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank;

(e) Continue to protect and provide humanitarian assistance to women and girls living in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank who are disproportionately affected by conflict and the excessive use of force by the occupying Power.

National machinery for the advancement of women

20. The Committee commends the State party on the adoption of the cross-sectoral national gender strategy, covering the period from 2017 to 2022, which was prepared on the basis of the 2030 Agenda. It also commends the State party for establishing a committee to follow up on the implementation of the Sustainable Development Goals, foster cooperation with partners, and for the preparation of a voluntary progress report. It also notes that, in 2009, the Council of Ministers approved the formulation of gender-responsive plans and budgets, which led to the establishment in 2012 of a national committee on gender-responsive budgets. However, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women is concerned that, notwithstanding efforts to increase resources for the Ministry of Women's Affairs, which constitutes the national machinery for the advancement of women in the State party, the Ministry's continued lack of human and financial resources impedes the effective implementation and coordination of policies and strategies, including those relating to the implementation of the Goals and the empowerment of disadvantaged groups of women, in particular older women, women with disabilities and women and girls affected by conflict.

21. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Allocate adequate human, technical and financial resources to the Ministry of Women's Affairs in order to ensure effective coordination and collaboration with various partners, including civil society organizations, in the implementation of the Convention;

(b) Ensure the allocation of necessary resources, in particular humanitarian assistance, to development activities and programmes for the benefit of women and girls in the State party;

(c) Ensure that the implementation and coordination of strategies and policies by the Ministry of Women's Affairs promote the empowerment of disadvantaged groups of women, in particular older women, women with disabilities and women and girls affected by conflict.

Temporary special measures

22. The Committee notes the decision of the Palestinian Central Council whereby it seeks to put into place mechanisms to increase the political representation of women. The Committee is concerned, however, about the lack of a comprehensive strategy to incorporate temporary special measures to achieve the substantive equality of women and men in other areas in which women are underrepresented or disadvantaged.

23. In line with article 4 (1) of the Convention and recalling its general recommendation No. 25 (2004) on temporary special measures, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Urgently adopt a strategy for the implementation of temporary special measures to achieve the substantive equality of women and men, in particular in political and public life;

(b) Undertake capacity-building programmes, targeting all relevant State officials and hiring managers, on the non-discriminatory nature and importance of temporary special measures for achieving substantive equality between women and men in all areas in which women are underrepresented or disadvantaged.

Stereotypes and harmful practices

24. The Committee notes the State party's efforts, through the gender unit of the Palestine Broadcasting Corporation, to support the production of programmes aimed at promoting positive roles for women in society. It remains concerned, however, about the persistence of discriminatory stereotypes concerning the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and in society, which perpetuate the subordination of women. The Committee recalls that such discriminatory stereotypes are a root cause of gender-based violence against women and harmful practices, such as child marriage, which are pervasive in the State party. The Committee is also concerned about the lack of a comprehensive strategy to eliminate discriminatory stereotypes.

25. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Adopt, without delay, a comprehensive strategy to eliminate discriminatory stereotypes concerning the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and in society;

(b) Regularly monitor and review the measures taken to eliminate gender stereotypes and harmful practices, such as child marriage, in order to assess their impact;

(c) Expand public education programmes on the negative impact of discriminatory stereotypes on the enjoyment by women of their rights, targeting religious and tribal leaders, who are the custodians of religious and customary values in the State party;

(d) Continue to review textbooks in order to eliminate the negative image of women and girls with regard to their roles in the family and in society, and ensure a positive reflection of that image;

(e) Intensify collaborative efforts with the media to raise public awareness of gender stereotypes that persist at all levels of society, with a view to their elimination.

Gender-based violence against women

26. The Committee welcomes the State party's measures to combat violence against women, such as the adoption of a strategic plan for combating violence against women, covering the period from 2011 to 2019, and the establishment of a national observatory to study violence against women, in 2016. It also commends the State party on its legislative efforts, including the adoption of Decree Law No. 5 in March 2018 repealing article 308 of the Penal Code of 1960, which is applicable in the West Bank and which exonerated perpetrators of the crime of rape if they married the victim, and the repeal of article 340 of the Penal Code, and the revisions to articles 98 and 99 thereof, which provided for mitigating factors in cases of homicide of women or so-called "honour killings". However, the Committee notes the following with concern:

(a) The delay in the adoption of the draft family protection law, although it has already been reviewed by the legislative harmonization committee;

(b) The high prevalence of gender-based violence against women, in particular so-called "honour killings" and domestic and sexual violence, which remain socially accepted and underreported due to the stigma suffered by victims;

(c) The fact that the definition of rape under the Penal Code of 1960 applicable in the West Bank does not include marital rape, cases of which are often settled through reconciliation by tribal committees;

(d) The lack of family protection units in the Gaza Strip, despite the high incidence of gender-based violence against women, including domestic violence;

(e) The absence of legislation and lack of data on protection orders.

27. Recalling its general recommendation No. 35 (2017) on gender-based violence against women, updating general recommendation No. 19, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Give high priority to the adoption of the draft family protection law to ensure that women and girls are protected from gender-based violence, including domestic violence, and ensure that the law provides for the issuance of protection orders and for systematic data collection on the number of protection orders issued and violated;

(b) Intensify efforts to ensure that perpetrators of gender-based violence, in particular so-called “honour killings”, are prosecuted and adequately punished and, in that context, ensure that the legislative harmonization committee takes appropriate measures to include marital rape in the definition of rape under the draft penal code and ensure that penalties for crimes involving gender-based violence against women and girls are commensurate with the gravity of the offences;

(c) Take concrete steps to establish adequately resourced family protection units in the Gaza Strip to provide services to women and girls who are victims of gender-based violence, including domestic violence;

(d) Intensify efforts to raise awareness among both men and women, including through educational and media campaigns, of the criminal nature of gender-based violence against women in order to challenge its social acceptance, and address the stigma discouraging victims from reporting;

(e) Continue to provide capacity-building for judges, prosecutors, lawyers, police officers and other law enforcement officials on the strict application of legislation criminalizing gender-based violence against women and on employing gender-sensitivity in investigation procedures and in the judicial process concerning victims of such violence.

Trafficking and exploitation of prostitution

28. The Committee commends the State party on its efforts to combat trafficking in persons, such as the establishment of the national referral mechanism for women victims of violence, which provides protection for victims of trafficking in persons. The Committee notes that the State party has joined the Arab Initiative for Building National Capacities to Combat Human Trafficking and that it intends to modernize its laws to combat trafficking in persons. The Committee notes the challenges that the State party faces with regard to combating trafficking in persons, in particular because the State party does not have control of its borders. It welcomes the commitment by the State party’s delegation to send an invitation to the Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons, especially women and children, to visit the State party. However, it notes the following with concern:

(a) That trafficking in persons for purposes of sexual exploitation and clandestine prostitution occurs in the State party;

(b) The absence of legislation criminalizing sexual exploitation of women and girls or child pornography;

(c) The lack of data on the number of women and girls who are victims of trafficking in persons and exploitation of prostitution.

29. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Ensure that the process of modernizing legislation to combat trafficking in persons incorporates a gender perspective;

(b) Adopt legislation to criminalize sexual exploitation of women and girls and pornography;

(c) Establish a mechanism for the collection and dissemination of data on trafficking in persons, disaggregated by sex and age;

(d) Intensify efforts aimed at bilateral, regional and international cooperation to prevent trafficking, including through the exchange of information and the harmonization of procedures to prosecute traffickers.

Participation in political and public life

30. The Committee notes the progress made in the State party with regard to increasing the representation of women in decision-making positions in political life, such as the adoption of Decree Law No. 1 of 2007, which provides for a quota stipulating that a minimum of 30 per cent of candidates standing for election must be women, and the Law No. 10 of 2005 on local elections, which provides for a minimum quota stipulating that 20 per cent of the candidates in local-level elections must be women. However, the Committee remains concerned that women are still underrepresented at decision-making levels, including in local government, trade unions, the foreign service and the judiciary.

31. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Ensure the implementation of temporary special measures, in line with article 4 (1) of the Convention and the Committee's general recommendation No. 25 and general recommendation No. 23 (1997) on women in political and public life, in particular the establishment of a mechanism to monitor compliance with the quota of a minimum of 30 per cent representation of women in all institutions in the State party, including in appointed and elected positions, in particular in local government, trade unions, senior leadership positions, the foreign service and the judiciary;

(b) Conduct awareness-raising campaigns for politicians, community and religious leaders, the media and the general public on the importance of the participation of women in political life and decision-making positions;

(c) Build the capacity of women candidates, including by seeking technical assistance from the international community, to enable them to compete effectively in elections, and provide incentives for political parties to nominate equal numbers of women and men to stand for election.

Nationality

32. The Committee notes that, under Palestinian law, women and men have equal rights to acquire, change or retain their nationality. It is concerned, however, that legislation concerning nationality is governed by a complex set of laws, including the Personal Status Act of 1999, the Palestinian citizenship decrees issued in 1925 under the British Mandate, the amended Jordanian Citizenship Act of 1954 and certain circulars issued by the Ministry of the Interior concerning Palestinian women in the occupied West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The Committee is concerned about the following:

(a) The lack of information on measures to adopt a comprehensive law to unify the above-mentioned provisions in order to provide clarity on nationality and reduce the risk of statelessness for women and girls;

(b) The high number of Palestinians in diaspora, including women and girls who are affected by prolonged refugee status, which deprives them of the right to reside in the State party and to pass their nationality on to their children;

(c) The high number of Palestinian women and girls living in occupied Palestinian territory, including in East Jerusalem, who cannot exercise their right to Palestinian citizenship due to the occupation.

33. The Committee recommends that the State party adopt a comprehensive law that unifies the various provisions on nationality to reduce the risk of statelessness for women and girls. The State party should also engage with the international community to address the issue of nationality for Palestinian women and girls who are deprived of citizenship owing to prolonged refugee status and to discriminatory citizenship laws affecting women and girls, in particular those living in East Jerusalem.

Education

34. The Committee notes the State party's efforts to improve access to and the quality of education for women and girls through the adoption of Act No. 6 of 2018, which explicitly provides that every citizen has the right to higher education, and through the use of tuition waivers as an incentive to increase enrolment in scientific disciplines among women and girls. It notes with appreciation the high levels of literacy among women and girls in the State party. However, the Committee notes the following with concern:

- (a) The cases of girls dropping out of school, largely due to child marriage;
- (b) The concentration of women and girls in traditionally female-dominated fields of study and their underrepresentation in science, technology, engineering and mathematics;
- (c) The fact that, notwithstanding the comprehensive review of curricula in 2006, textbooks still contain discriminatory stereotypes about the roles of women and girls in society;
- (d) The fact that the high number of women completing post-secondary education does not translate into their participation in the labour market and that vocational training courses continue to perpetuate occupational gender segregation;
- (e) The lack of comprehensive, age-appropriate education on sexuality and reproductive health and rights.

35. In line with the Convention and its general recommendation No. 36 (2017) on the right of girls and women to education, the Committee recommends that the State party:

- (a) Adopt a strategy to reduce the school dropout rate among girls due to child marriage and ensure that women and girls who have dropped out are reintegrated into the education system;
- (b) Eliminate discriminatory stereotypes and intensify the use of tuition waivers to encourage the enrolment of women and girl in non-traditional fields of education, such as science, technology, engineering and mathematics, as well as in the digital field, through career counselling for young women and girls on non-traditional career paths and awareness-raising among parents and legal guardians;
- (c) Undertake a comprehensive review of school curricula, including textbooks, to remove discriminatory stereotypes about the roles of women and girls in society and train teachers to ensure that they do not perpetuate such stereotypes in the learning environment, including in the delivery of vocational training;
- (d) Introduce comprehensive, age-appropriate education on sexual and reproductive health and rights into school curricula, including education on modern forms of contraception and the prevention of sexually transmitted infections, for adolescent girls and boys.

Employment

36. The Committee notes the efforts of the State party to improve the participation of women in the labour market, such as the adoption of Labour Act No. 7 of 2000, which governs persons employed in the private sector. The Committee also notes that the Decree Law on Social Security provides for 12 weeks of paid maternity leave. However, it notes the following with concern:

(a) The high unemployment rate among women and the lack of concrete measures to enforce the principle of equal pay for work of equal value in order to narrow the gender wage gap in the State party;

(b) The concentration of women in the informal sector, including in the agricultural sector, where women working in family enterprises are excluded from social security protection, and the fact that the Labour Act does not extend to domestic workers or to the informal sector, in which women are concentrated;

(c) The absence of legislation that prohibits, and sets out the punishment for perpetrators of, sexual harassment in the workplace;

(d) The lack of data disaggregated by sex and disability on the participation of women with disabilities in the labour force, since the implementation of the quota pursuant to which 5 per cent of posts in government and non-governmental organizations be reserved for persons with disabilities.

37. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Intensify efforts to fully implement the existing laws and regulations on gender equality in employment and reduce unemployment among women by promoting their entry into the formal economy through, among other things, vocational and technical training;

(b) Effectively enforce the principle of equal pay for work of equal value in order to narrow and close the gender pay gap by regularly reviewing wages in sectors in which women are concentrated, conducting regular labour inspections, applying gender-neutral analytical job classification and evaluation methods and conducting regular pay surveys;

(c) Extend social protection to women working in family enterprises in the agricultural sector and extend the application of the Labour Act to domestic workers and to the informal sector, in which women are concentrated;

(d) Adopt legislation to prohibit sexual harassment in the workplace and to set out the punishment for perpetrators, collect statistical data on the extent of the problem of discrimination on the basis of sex in the workplace, including cases of sexual harassment, and conduct regular labour inspections aimed at enforcing those laws;

(e) Provide, in the next periodic report, data disaggregated by sex and disability on the number of women with disabilities who have been employed since the implementation of the quota pursuant to which 5 per cent of posts in government and non-governmental organizations are reserved for persons with disabilities.

Health

38. The Committee commends the State party on its efforts to reduce maternal and infant mortality by introducing mobile clinics, which provide prenatal and postnatal services at the community level, despite the challenges to adequately funding the health sector. It also commends the State party on its efforts to ensure the physical and economic accessibility of health services by women and girls, notwithstanding the restrictions on their freedom of movement and the occupation of some parts of the State party's territory. However, the Committee is concerned that:

(a) The procurement of termination of pregnancy continues to be criminalized under the Penal Code of 1936 and the Penal Code of 1960, applicable in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, respectively;

(b) Abortion is permissible only in cases of risk to the life of the pregnant woman;

(c) There are no data on the number of women and girls who have been detained and prosecuted for illegally procuring an abortion;

(d) Women with disabilities are not included in the national strategic plan on health, and women who are considered to have a disability, which is defined as less than 60 per cent of bodily impairment, are excluded from health insurance.

39. In line with its general recommendation No. 24 (1999) on women and health, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Legalize abortion in cases of rape, incest, risk to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman and severe fetal impairment, ensure that abortion is decriminalized in all other cases and ensure that medically safe modern methods of abortion are available and accessible;

(b) Provide, in the next periodic report, data on the number of women and girls who have been detained and prosecuted for procuring an abortion;

(c) Increase and improve the provision of sexual and reproductive health information and services to women and girls, including modern methods of contraception, in particular with regard to rural women and girls;

(d) Ensure that all women with disabilities have access to health services, in particular health insurance, and take measures to include persons with disabilities in the national health strategy.

Economic empowerment of women

40. The Committee appreciates that there are no legal barriers to access for women to financial credit and that women and girls are encouraged to participate in sports and recreational activities. The Committee notes that house demolitions and forcible evictions by the occupying Power continue to impede the economic empowerment of women in the State party. It notes with concern that:

(a) The economic empowerment of women has not received appropriate attention and the economic policies pursued by the State party have had a negative impact on women, in particular women entrepreneurs whose products cannot compete with those produced by the occupying Power;

(b) Women and girls, in particular those with disabilities, do not fully participate in sports, owing to discriminatory stereotypes and prejudices;

(c) Women are required to make pension contributions equal to those made by men, when in fact women are often engaged in part-time work and experience compensation discrimination.

41. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Increase access for women to loans and other forms of finance, including by providing soft loans and improving financial literacy among women, and promote access for women to income-generating activities, such as setting up small enterprises and marketing locally produced merchandise;

(b) Adopt concrete measures to encourage women and girls, in particular those with disabilities, to engage in sports, including by eliminating discriminatory stereotypes and prejudices by raising public awareness about the benefits of participation in sports;

(c) Revise the pension contribution system to ensure that it takes into account the situation of women, including how their remuneration is affected by their concentration in part-time employment and by the gender pay gap.

Rural women

42. The Committee notes that rural women have access to agricultural services and skills development through rural development and agricultural services programmes. It also notes the disadvantaged status of rural women due to the occupation, which has resulted in the dispossession of agricultural land and has limited access for women to water, sanitation and electricity and exposed them to violent acts by settlers. The Committee notes the following with concern:

(a) The lack of information regarding land ownership by rural women in the State party;

(b) That the programmes and activities implemented by the State party for rural women are more humanitarian than developmental in nature and that there is a lack of information on the participation of women in the implementation and development of agricultural policies;

(c) The lack of information on the number of women who have benefited from the disaster risk reduction and insurance fund, which is intended to compensate farmers for agricultural damages and losses.

43. In line with general recommendation No. 34 (2016) on the rights of rural women, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Provide information, in the next periodic report, on land ownership by rural women;

(b) Ensure that programmes and activities for rural women are focused on their economic empowerment and that rural women are involved in the implementation and development of agricultural policies, in particular with regard to decisions on land use;

(c) Provide information, in the next periodic report, on the extent to which women have benefited from the disaster risk reduction and insurance fund;

(d) Continue to seek international assistance and cooperation in order to improve access for rural women to water, sanitation and electricity.

Disadvantaged groups of women

44. The Committee notes the efforts of the State party to improve the situation of disadvantaged groups of women, such as women with disabilities. However, it notes with concern the lack of data on the situation of women in detention, women with disabilities, older women and women heads of households, and in particular Bedouin women, who face forcible evictions and demolition of their houses by the occupying Power.

45. The Committee recommends that the State party provide information, in its next periodic report, on the measures taken to ensure access to, among other things, employment, health care, water, sanitation and electricity for disadvantaged groups of women, such as women with disabilities, Bedouin women, older women and women heads of households, and on the situation of women in detention. The Committee also recommends that the State party continue to provide humanitarian assistance to Bedouin women and girls.

Marriage and family relations

46. The Committee welcomes the establishment of an alimony fund under Law No. 6 of 2005, which allows women to gain access to funds in cases in which husbands or relatives fail to meet their financial support obligations. It notes the State party's commitment to reviewing all discriminatory personal status laws regarding marriage and family relations. However, the Committee is concerned that personal status laws containing provisions that discriminate against women and girls continue to be applicable. The Committee is particularly concerned that:

(a) Child marriage is perpetuated by the existence in the State party of multiple laws establishing varying minimum legal ages of marriage, such as article 5 of the Personal Status Law applicable in the West Bank, which sets the legal age of marriage at 16 years for boys and 15 years for girls, and article 5 of the Family Rights Law applicable in the Gaza Strip, which sets the legal age at 17 years for girls and 18 years for men;

(b) Under rules of evidence in family matters, the testimony of a man is considered to be equivalent to that of two women;

(c) A woman's right to child custody is invalidated if she remarries a man who is not a close relative of the child;

(d) Male guardians have the legal capacity to contract marriages on behalf of their female relatives and have the power to invalidate a marriage irrespective of the consent of the married woman;

(e) Men have the right to unilaterally divorce their spouses, which leaves many women in precarious situations;

(f) The law does not provide for an alternative legal regime that would allow women to contract civil marriages.

47. In the context of the ongoing legislative review by the legislative harmonization committee aimed at ensuring that the legislation of the State party is in conformity with the Convention, the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Review all personal status laws with a view to repealing or amending all provisions that discriminate against women and girls, in particular those relating to marriage, divorce, inheritance and the legal capacity of women, and in that regard, address family status matters by taking into account the best practices of countries with similar cultural backgrounds;

(b) Adopt a law that provides for an alternative legal regime to govern civil marriage in the State party.

Amendment to article 20 (1) of the Convention

48. The Committee encourages the State party to accept, as soon as possible, the amendment to article 20 (1) of the Convention concerning the meeting time of the Committee.

Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action

49. The Committee calls upon the State party to use the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action in its efforts to implement the provisions of the Convention.

Dissemination

50. The Committee requests the State party to ensure the timely dissemination of the present concluding observations, in the official language of the State party, to the relevant State institutions at all levels (national, regional and local), in particular to the Government, the ministries, the Palestinian Legislative Council, once convened, and the judiciary, to enable their full implementation.

Technical assistance

51. The Committee recommends that the State party consider seeking international cooperation and technical assistance in the development and implementation of a comprehensive programme aimed at implementing the above recommendations and the Convention as a whole. The Committee also calls upon the State party to continue its cooperation with specialized agencies and programmes of the United Nations system.

Ratification of other treaties

52. The Committee notes that the adherence of the State party to the nine major international human rights instruments¹ would enhance the enjoyment by women of their human rights and fundamental freedoms in all aspects of life. The Committee therefore encourages the State party to ratify the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, to which it is not yet a party.

Follow-up to the concluding observations

53. The Committee requests the State party to provide, within two years, written information on the steps taken to implement the recommendations contained in paragraphs 11 (a), 13 (c) and 15 (a) and (c) above.

Preparation of the next report

54. The Committee requests the State party to submit its second periodic report, which is due in July 2022. The report should be submitted on time and cover the entire period up to the time of its submission.

55. The Committee requests the State party to follow the harmonized guidelines on reporting under the international human rights treaties, including guidelines on a common core document and treaty-specific documents (see HRI/GEN/2/Rev.6, chap. I).

I. Introduction

1. As requested by the Committee on the Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women in its concluding observations dated 17 November 2017, the State of Israel respectfully presents the following information, according to the Committee's requests in paragraph 63 of the Concluding Observations on the Sixth Periodic Report of Israel (hereinafter: the Report).

II. Follow up information

A. Follow-up information relating to paragraph 13 (a) of the concluding observations (CEDAW/C/ISR/CO/6)

2. As mentioned in the GOI Report, In Government Resolutions No. 4052 (12.12.11), No. 1526 (30.3.14) and No. 2913 (3.8.17), the Government of Israel established that the exclusion of women from the public sphere is an offensive phenomenon and the State of Israel is committed to eliminate it. This issue is highly sensitive and thus requires a complex balance between the right to equality and the right to freedom of religion and culture in Israel.

3. The Deputy Attorney General (Public and Administrative Law) continues to address the legal aspects that arise in this regard as well as follow the implementation of the Intra-Ministerial Report which was directed by the Attorney General. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (hereinafter: AASW) continues its efforts to eradicate incidents of exclusion of women from the public sphere by monitoring and addressing different entities and developing new mechanisms to eliminate this phenomenon in general. For example, during 2019, in cooperation with the Ministry of Health, it has addressed discriminative posters which appeared in ultra-Orthodox neighbourhoods in Jerusalem.

4. In addition, the Authority has been working with different governmental bodies concerning their representation of women speakers in the events they organize. For example, it approached the Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, the mayor of Ramat-Hasharon local Authority and the Israel Intelligence Heritage and Commemoration Center (IICC) regarding the lack of women speakers in the first intelligence conference which was held in Israel.

Cultural Events in Local Authorities

5. Recently, several local authorities conducted public events in separation between men and women due to the religious beliefs of a part of the public, as well as events for men only. The Attorney General addressed this issue in the course of several petitions which were filed to the Administrative and High Court in this regard. (Ad. P. 17029-08-19 The Women's Network v. Afula Local Authority; HCJ 23791-08-19 Arbel v. Afula Local Authority; Ad.p 46461-08-19 The Women's Network v. Haifa Municipality; Ad.p.Ap 5435/19 The Women's Network v. Afula Municipality).

6. According to Section 3(d)(3) to the Law, providing a public product, a public service or entry to a public place, which entail gender separation, when non-separation shall prevent some of the public from attending the event, can be justified, considering, inter alia, the following: the characterization of the product, the public service or the public place; the essentiality of the event; whether there is a plausible alternative; the needs of the public that may be offended by the separation; and more.

7. In the course of this case, the Attorney General issued an opinion, referring to Section 3(d)(3) of the Law, stating that the general rule is that the principle of equality should be upheld, as it stands at the heart of our democracy. The municipality must take into account whether the separation is voluntary, and to what extent; whether the event includes only an adult audience and not children or families; and elements of material equality.

8. Note that the Attorney General has clarified that these parameters are temporary, and the issue would be further examined in the near future, following public consultation on the matter

9. During May, 2019 a cultural event for families was planned to be held in separation in the city of Hadera. Following the application of the Deputy Attorney General (Administrative and Public Law), the event was cancelled. Additionally, in August 2019 the Administrative Court in Haifa ordered (4646-1-08-19 The Women's Network v. Haifa Municipality) to cancel a cultural event, exclusively for men, in accordance with the Attorney General's opinion, since the local municipality did not account for the necessary considerations as described above.

Preventive Driving Course

10. Following a lawsuit filed in the Tel Aviv-Jaffa Magistrate Court under the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law 5761-2000 (hereinafter: the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products Law) (Ci.C.i 53057-08-18 Fridmann v. The Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety), the Attorney General concluded that holding separate preventive driving courses can be done only according to Section 3(d)(3) of the Law. The first of these three (3) conditions holds that separate frameworks will not be considered discriminatory provided that lack of separation would effectively prevent a portion of the public from acquiring the particular product or public service. The Court found that this condition was not fulfilled, as no evidence has been put forth to establish that the absence of separate frameworks will preclude the participation of the ultra-Orthodox community in the courses. In light of this finding, the Attorney General concluded that the Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety was unauthorized to initiate and enact separate preventative driving courses. The Attorney General clarified that the Ministry of Transportation can allow for groups of voluntarily unionized individuals to request a separate course, that may be composed of a certain gender, depending on its original composition.

Public Transportation

11. A well-established precedent in Israel is the High Court's ruling in the Ragen Case (H.C.J. 746/07) which determined that separate seating arrangements for men and women, that women would sit in the rear end of the buses and men would sit in the front, is discriminatory and humiliating to women and thus prohibited. Since the ruling, bus companies have also put a public notice in buses clarifying that every person can sit wherever she or he wishes.

12. In 2019, there has been an increase in the number of applications with regards to the exclusion of women in public transportation (which were required to sit in the back). In light of these severe events, a discussion was held with the Deputy Attorney General (Public and Administrative Law) and representatives from the Ministry of Transportation. Following this discussion it was decided to increase the criminal enforcement in accordance with the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products Law as well as to enhance enforcement operations and further clarify the guidelines on this matter before the transportation companies. These efforts include, for example: the dissemination of specific directives to be followed by public transportation operators on lines that primarily service the ultra-Orthodox community, with emphasis on the right of every person to enter the bus from any door and sit where they please. Operators were instructed to display a public notice on their buses, stating the aforementioned directive and warning that gender based harassment may constitute a criminal offense. Special inspections have taken place to ensure compliance with these protocols. Any complaint of discrimination is immediately referred to the Department of Transportation's legal team in cooperation with the relevant public transportation operators for investigation. The Department reserves the option to press criminal charges against the bus driver or workers of the relevant public transportation company, or, alternatively, to initiate administrative proceedings.

B. Follow-up information relating to paragraph 53 of the concluding observations

13. Generally, all female prisoners are held separately in a designated prison or a special wing. There is no separation between criminal prisoners, regardless of their place of residence. However, in all prisons there is a strict separation between prisoners with a drug addiction and prisoners without any narcotic background. The treatment of prisoners is individually tailored to their needs, including professional assistance from physicians, social workers, and other officials.

14. Medical Care – Every IPS detention facility employs a general physician, and the majority of the facilities employ a dentist, a narcology specialist, a psychiatrist and a professional medic providing regular services. Examinations by expert doctors are conducted in the IPS medical centre, prison infirmary and hospital clinics. Inmates are allowed to have private doctors at their own expense. Gynaecological examinations are held when necessary and upon request. A medical examination may be conducted daily and one can be examined by a physician upon request. Where a need arises for a specialist or hospitalization, the proper coordination is conducted with the relevant hospital and the Ministry of Health.

15. Training for IPS officials on domestic and sexual violence – IPS employees go through several training courses led by professionals regarding the issue of prevention of domestic and sexual violence, including: External training by specialized professionals in the field of prevention of domestic and sexual violence; A special course on the issue of prevention of domestic violence (October 2018, June 2019), in addition to routinely conducted additional training days and trainings in the various IPS districts for new employees.

C. Follow-up information relating to paragraph 57 (a) and (b) of the concluding observations

Israel's Reservation to Article 16

16. In light of the Committee Concluding Observations, issued to the GOI in November 2017, a designated team was convened to examine the possibility of withdrawing part of the conclusive reservation to Article 16. The team included representatives from both International Law Department and the Department for Constitutional Law in the Ministry of Justice. The team held consultations with the legal advisors of the religious communities in Israel, as well as asked for the legal opinion of the Department for Jewish Law in the Ministry of Justice. This issue is currently an ongoing effort, and is being considered by the relevant personal.

Positive Developments concerning appointment of women to influential positions in Rabbinical Courts

17. Over the last two years, several women have been appointed to influential positions in the Rabbinical Courts system, including legal assistants, an internal auditor, and a deputy director of the Courts' Administration.

Implementation of Divorce Decisions by the Rabbinical Courts

18. In Cr.C. 11271-09-18 The State of Israel v. Meir Gorodetzeki (30.4.19), the Court discussed Mr. Gorodetzeki's twenty (20) years refusal to grant a divorce to his spouse, in spite of spending the past eighteen (18) years in jail. The petitioner was convicted of violating a lawful order and sentenced to fifteen (15) months in jail. In its ruling the Court emphasized the long time Gorodetzeki's spouse has been trapped in her marriage, and his repeated refusal even during the criminal proceedings to grant her a divorce. The case is being appealed by the State, asking the Court to impose a harsher sentence. The case was published in the news in order to deter additional men from refusing to grant divorce to their spouse.

19. The Rabbinical Courts adhere to the timetable provided in the Rabbinical Courts Law (Implementation of Divorce Judgments) 5755-1955. In most cases in which a divorce was not granted by that the time set by the Court, the Court discussed ordering restriction orders or granted such orders based on previous proceedings in the case. In each of the years 2018 and 2019, 137 such restriction orders were granted.

Distribution of Child Support Obligations between Divorced Parents

20. On July 19, 2017 the Supreme Court delivered a precedential ruling regarding distribution of child support obligations between divorced parents.

21. Generally, the law in Israel concerning child support is religious law. According to Jewish Law only the father owes child support (in the least, with regards to the basic needs of the child). In this recent Supreme Court Decision, the Court interpreted the "classical" Jewish Law obligation differently, in so that the mother owes child support as well, depending on her financial capabilities.

22. The conclusion that stems from the judgment is that when the parents have joint (equalitarian) physical custody, both parents are equally obligated to pay child support for their children between the ages of 6–15 years, while considering each of the parent's economic capabilities. As a result, if indeed the parents have equal economic capabilities, each of the parents will bear the costs of child support independently.

23. Family Matters Courts throughout Israel interpreted the Decision as also applicable to situations where the parents do not share joint (equalitarian) physical custody. Meaning, the burden of child support will be distributed in accordance with the parents financial capabilities as well as according to the number of days a week the child stays with each parent, among others.

24. The Court relied in its decision, inter alia, on Article 27 to the CRC and stated that the principle set in this Article imposes on both parents of a child the responsibility for the child's support. In spirit of Article 27, the Court ruled that after the divorce a minor's parents continue to be obligated to care for his/her needs, to ensure an adequate standard of living, and the physical and mental development of the child.

Stay of Exit Orders

25. Regrettably, Israel is faced with parents who are reluctant to fulfil their legal obligation to pay child support to their children, leaving their previous partner to bear the heavy burden alone. In order to address this unfortunate phenomenon, the court issues Stay of Exit Orders which are used when there is fear the parent will escape the country to avail the debt enforcement agencies. In 2018, 1,159 stay of exit orders were issued in 556 cases concerning family matters.

Court Jurisdiction with regard to Child Support

26. On September 22, 2019 the High Court of Justice rendered its decision in the case of Anonymous v. Anonymous (Ap.Rq. 7628/17). The case regarded the question – which court has jurisdiction to determine child support payments: the Religious Court or Family Matters Court.

27. Generally, there are two (2) judicial systems authorized in issues relating to personal status and family matters of Jews in Israel: the Family Matters Courts, and the Religious Courts – Rabbinical Courts for Jews, sharia Courts for Muslims, Druze Courts for Druze and Christians Courts of the different Christian communities, all have a unique authority regarding matters of marriage and divorce and a parallel authority to the Family Matters Courts in matters of spousal maintenance, child support, contact and residence of children, and matrimonial property. In certain cases the jurisdiction is parallel, and in others, it requires the consent of all relevant parties.

28. The case before the Court regarded the interpretation of Section 3 of the Rabbinical Courts Jurisdiction (Marriage and Divorce) Law 5713-1953. The Court accepted the opinion presented by the Attorney General according to which, the guiding precedent in this matter – Ap.Rq.120/69 Shragay v. Shragay is still valid. According to this precedent, child support payments are not an issue that should be subjected to forum shopping and the principle of the child best interest would be best served if the jurisdiction regarding child support cannot be attached with a divorce lawsuit before the Rabbinical Court. This means that – in the event that only one of the parties' files for divorce in the Rabbinical Court, and the other party rejects the Court's jurisdiction on child support, the Court will not have jurisdiction to discuss the matter, but only the Family Matters Court.

D. Additional Information and Recent UpdatesIntensive efforts in the fight the scourge of persons in prostitution

29. A historic milestone was marked on December 31, 2018, when the Knesset legislated the Prohibition of Consumption of Prostitution Services Law (Temporary Provision) 5779-2018, which prohibits the consumption of sexual services.

30. According to the Law, the offense of consumption of prostitution services, which includes even merely the presence in a location which is used for prostitution, is an administrative offense for which one is fined for 2,000 NIS (540 USD) for first time offenders and double the sum for repeat offenders.

31. According to the Law, he/she who is present in a location which is principally used for prostitution will be seen as being there for the purpose of consumption of such services, unless proven otherwise. Nevertheless, the Law authorizes the State Attorney's Office to indict an offender, in which case the court could impose a fine of up to 75,300 NIS (20,350 USD). The Law further enables the Minister of Justice to set alternative penalties to fines within the Law's Regulations, by means of indictment. The Law will come into force in July 2020 for a period of five (5) years.

Its extension will be determined in accordance with research on its effects. In addition, the Ministers of Public Security and of Labour, Social Affairs and Social Services will conduct periodic reviews of its implementation and the overall progress of the efforts to reduce consumption of prostitution.

32. In addition, in June 2018, the Knesset legislated Amendment No. 132 to the Penal Law 5737-1977, which criminalizes a proposal to engage in prostitution to both adults and minors (Section 205D).

33. Furthermore, in March 2018, the Knesset enacted the Blocking of Telephone Numbers for the Prevention of Crimes Law 5768-2018, which authorizes police officers to block a publicized telephone number if he/she has reasonable grounds to believe that said phone number is being utilized for the commission of a crime, including via internet or by other technological applications. This further enables the blocking of telephone numbers publishing prostitution services, including that of a minor and drugs and dangerous substances offences.

34. Finally, in June 2018, Amendment No. 132 of the Penal Law entered into force, which added a new offense prohibiting the publication of proposals to engage in prostitution (e.g. direct proposals, wanted ads etc.) (Section 205D). According to this offence, the publication of such a proposal is liable to a maximum sentence of three (3) years imprisonment or a fine up to 226,000 NIS (62,700 USD), and if the proposal is aimed at a minor – a maximum sentence of five (5) years imprisonment of the abovementioned fine. If a corporation committed the offense, it shall be liable to double the said fine. This offence is also included in both Blocking of Telephone Numbers for the Prevention of Crimes Law and Authorities for Prevention of Internet Use for the Commission of Offenses Law, and it complements the offence of publication of prostitution services of 2011.

35. In July 2017, the Knesset legislated the Authorities for Prevention of Internet Use for the Commission of Offenses Law, which authorizes courts to issue an order for blocking access to a website or for its removal from the internet. Starting in 2018, the District Attorney's cyber unit has filed requests with the courts to shut down websites which advertise prostitution in accordance with Article 205 of the Penal Law. In 2018, 45 websites advertising prostitution and 83 websites advertising paedophilia were shut down.

Combating Polygamy

36. On September 19, 2019 the Be'er-Sheva District Court ruled in an appeal in the 25462-04-18 Iman Abu Sakik v. The State of Israel case, and accepted the GOI's appeal on the conviction in the first case to be prosecuted, according to the new guidelines.¹ The Magistrate Court convicted the accused of marrying a second wife and sentenced him to community service and a fine due to the defendants claim that he was unaware this was a crime, as the Sharia Religious Court issued him a permit to marry a second wife under the Sharia Law. The State appealed on both counts, claiming that the sentence, that did not include imprisonment, was too lenient and did not reflect the severity of the offence as intended, and also claiming that the confirmation of the religious court is not an authorization of the marriage, rather a technical confirmation that indeed a valid marriage has taken place. The appellate court accepted all the State's claims, and sentenced the defendant to seven (7) months in prison and a 25,000 NIS (7,098 USD) fine. The rejection of the defendant's request to appeal to the Supreme Court (6413/19 Iman Abu Sakik v. The State of Israel), along with his motion for a re-trial (7563/19 Iman Abu Sakik v. The State of Israel), demonstrates the Court's firm position on this matter. This case is the first case in Israel in which a prison sentence was set for the crime of polygamy.

The Committee for the Enacting of a National Action Plan to Combat the Phenomenon of Sexual Harassment

37. A decision of the Ministerial Committee on Gender Equality, approved by Government Resolution No. 3229 of December 7, 2017, resulted in the Authority initiating the establishment of a committee to formulate a national plan to combat sexual harassment in Israeli society. In the context of this resolution and for the implementation of the plan, 10 Million NIS (2.7 Million USD) were allocated for a period of three (3) years. The Committee consisted of the Directors-Generals of the Ministries of Social Equality, Justice, Finance, Education, and senior representatives of the Police, the IDF and NGOs. The Committee's work lasted several months and included a broad process to create a deep understanding of the core issues and the critical challenges that require a response in the field. The Committee submitted its recommendations to the Minister for Social Equality on January 28, 2019, in which it recommended that the national plan focus on the following issues: (1) raising public awareness to education to change social norms and to provide information and knowledge about the law; (2) strengthening the commitment and ability of employers and supervisors to prevent and deal with sexual harassment effectively; (3) strengthening the supervision and law enforcement for the prevention of sexual harassment at the workplace, (4) prevention of sexual harassment in the Civil Service; and (5) developing and deepening the knowledge and research infrastructure in the area of promoting policies which are based on such infrastructures.

Encouraging women to run for high-ranking-positions

38. An important initiative taken by the AASW is their "Run" Campaign, aimed at encouraging women to run for positions in municipal elections. The percentage of women running for positions in municipalities has risen significantly since the start of the campaign. A particular achievement is the 36% rise in new women candidates belonging to the Arab population.

39. Additionally, the Authority has published guidelines regarding gender equality in local authorities. Four (4) roundtable discussions were held throughout 2018 with the aim of teaching local authorities how to implement the guidelines in practice, with the hopes of advancing gender equality in this field. The program has seen much success, with a rise from 15 participating municipalities in 2017 to 98 participating municipalities in 2018.

40. The Gender Equality Department in the Civil Service Commission conducted an important research examining how to tackle the relatively small quantity of women in high-ranked or managing positions in the Civil Service; the research indicates that the reasons include mainly low self-esteem of women, who commonly do not believe they have the proper qualifications to the opening positions, and not, as commonly and mistakenly thought, because of work and family balance. The Department continues to work and develop designated seminars and courses targeting this issue.

Measures taken towards rendering victim's services more accessible

41. In May 2019, the Office of the State Attorney created a form that allows victims to access the Office's Department for Victims of Criminal Offenses' services, including police assistance or legal aid. The form was designed in order to ameliorate the accessibility and quality of assistance provided to victims of crime, and may therefore be accessed via the victim's cellular device.

Introduction

1. The present report was submitted as part of the follow-up of the State of Palestine to its international obligations under the human rights instruments to which it has acceded, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. A series of procedures, policies and measures have been put in place reflecting the fundamental principles and values on which the State of Palestine was founded. These include peace, freedom, equality, democracy, pluralism and respect for human rights. The State of Palestine has worked intensively to publish the relevant human rights instruments, including the Convention, in the Official Gazette. The necessary laws have been put in place for the elimination of all forms of violence and discrimination against women, including the Protection of the Family from Violence Act. For that purpose, appropriate national committees have been established, such as the committee on harmonizing national laws with international instruments and standards, and other technical committees. The ongoing Israeli colonial occupation and the attendant crimes and violations have affected the capacity of the State of Palestine to implement those obligations. Of particular note are the current plans to annex Palestinian land, a step that would plainly violate international law, the Charter of the United Nations and human rights principles and would have implications for the rights of the Palestinian people, particularly women, girls and children everywhere, including refugees and members of the diaspora. Foremost among those rights are the right of return, the right to self-determination and the right of the State of Palestine to independence with Jerusalem as its capital.

I. Actions taken further to the concluding observations

2. On 11 July 2018, the State of Palestine discussed its initial report concerning the Convention with the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women at its seventieth session. The Committee issued its concluding observations concerning the initial report on 25 July 2018.

3. A national team for following up implementation of the Convention was established by a presidential decree of 2018. It is chaired by the Ministry of Women's Affairs and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, and its members consist of representatives of other relevant ministries.¹ On receiving the concluding observations, the team met several times to discuss the steps that would be taken to implement the Committee's recommendations. The first step would be translating the recommendations into Arabic and having the Cabinet distribute them to all relevant national institutions, which should implement them in their respective areas of competence.

4. As a first step in addressing the recommendations, the members of the team prepared a matrix of all the recommendations, the actions needed for their implementation, the party responsible for each one, and the necessary time frame for implementation. The matrix was then developed into a comprehensive national plan to implement all the recommendations during the period 2019–2022. The plan sets out the interventions and procedures that are needed in order to implement each recommendation; the party responsible for each intervention; and the necessary time frame for implementation, ranging from 2019 to 2022. Some activities are being implemented immediately, and others on a continuous basis over the next two years. Performance benchmarks are also specified.

5. The implementation plan consists of a national plan aimed at strengthening the rights of Palestinian women by involving all relevant national bodies, including civil society organizations. The State of Palestine has therefore endeavoured to hold national consultations regarding the plan in order to gather comments and recommendations from the relevant national bodies; the plan is intended to be comprehensive and nation-wide, not merely governmental. National consultations were held on 16 September 2019. Civil society organizations in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip participated by videoconference, and the comments most consistent with the Committee's recommendations were incorporated into the national plan.

6. The plan (see annex 1) was then adopted by the national mechanism to monitor implementation of human rights instruments. For that purpose, the comments that emerged from national consultations were submitted to a committee of experts representing all Government bodies, and then to the senior ministerial committee for following up the accession of the State of Palestine to international conventions, protocols and treaties, chaired by the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Expatriates. The latter adopted it definitively in July 2020. In coordination with the Cabinet, the plan was then disseminated to all relevant national bodies for follow-up in their respective areas of competence.

7. In cooperation with relevant national bodies, the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics has developed a matrix of national and regional indicators related to the Convention with a view to monitoring and following up the situation of Palestinian women and providing the maximum available data to track the situation related to the instruments to which the State of Palestine is a party, including the Convention. The matrix is the first of its kind in the Arab world and the region.

8. The State of Palestine invited the Committee to visit Palestine and follow up implementation of its recommendations. The Committee accepted the invitation and decided to send three of its members to take part in a visit from 11 to 14 November 2019. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, the Ministry of Women's Affairs, the Office of the United Nations High Coordinator for Human Rights and the United Nations Entity for Gender Equality and the Empowerment of Women (UN-Women) coordinated to prepare for the visit, design an appropriate programme to discuss the most important procedures, measures, policies and laws introduced by the State of Palestine to follow up implementation of the consulting observations, and draw on the expertise of the members of the Committee.

II. Information to be provided within two years of receipt of the concluding observations

A. Paragraph 11 (a): Adopt, without delay, national legislation that includes a comprehensive definition of discrimination against women covering all prohibited grounds of discrimination and encompassing direct and indirect discrimination in both the public and private spheres

9. A definition consistent with the Convention and other human rights instruments has been incorporated into the draft decree-law concerning protection of the family from violence. A definition of discrimination has also been adopted as part of the work on the recommendations of the committee on harmonizing national legislation with international instruments and standards, with reference to the review of the Palestinian Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000). The Code is being amended in accordance with international standards and the recommendations of treaty bodies, including the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women. A policy paper has been prepared regarding issues entailing amendments to labour laws. Such issues include incorporating a definition of discrimination and mechanisms to establish its occurrence and procedures for litigation; removing all exceptions; providing equal employment opportunities and guaranteeing equal wages for work of equal value; and criminalizing sexual violence. Work is underway on amending the Civil Service Act to include a legal provision prohibiting and criminalizing discrimination in the workplace.

10. Action is being taken to prepare a draft decree-law regulating trade unions in order to ensure that women can participate effectively in unions without gender discrimination. A draft decree-law has been prepared raising the quota of women in general and local elections to no less than 30 per cent, in accordance with the decisions of the Palestinian National Council and the Central Council of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

11. Cabinet decision No. 06/37/18/mim -waw/mim-alif), which was adopted in 2019,² provides for the formation of a national team to review the 2011 draft Palestinian penal code. The members of the team have put in place a plan and a working mechanism to review the draft code in accordance with the international standards and instruments to which the State of Palestine is a party and with the recommendations of human rights treaty bodies including the Committee, in particular as regards criminalizing discrimination in all areas of life and adopting a comprehensive definition of discrimination.

12. The laws recently adopted with a view to eliminating discriminatory practices against women include Act No. 22 (2019), pursuant to which, in accordance with the decisions taken by the Cabinet in March 2018, mothers have the same right as fathers to open bank accounts for their minor sons.

B. Paragraph 13 (c): Take concrete steps to accede to the Optional Protocol and publish the Convention in the Official Gazette

13. The State of Palestine acceded to the Optional Protocol on 10 April 2019, the third Arab State to do so after Libya and Tunisia. It has also acceded to the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on a communications procedure. The State of Palestine has endeavoured to activate mechanisms for individual complaints under those protocols in order to ensure that all effective remedies are available.

14. The Cabinet has established a committee for the purpose of ensuring publication in the Official Gazette. The members consist of the Ministry of Women's Affairs, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Emigrants, the Supreme Constitutional Court and the secretariat of the Cabinet. The committee has met numerous times and produced a draft decree-law on publication of the Convention in the Official Gazette and on the publication of an explanatory memorandum in that regard. The draft was submitted to the Cabinet in order for the latter to consider it and take the necessary action to have it published and incorporated into the Palestinian legal system. However, efforts to ensure swift publication have been hampered by campaigns against the Convention and its provisions and its rejection by certain segments of society.

² The team is chaired by the Ministry of Justice and comprises the Office of the President, the secretariat of the Cabinet, the Supreme Judicial Council, the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministry of Women's Affairs, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, the Public Prosecutor's Office and the Independent Commission for Human Rights. The team is entitled to consult experts and specialists.

(c) Paragraph 15 (a): Reunify the legal systems in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank to ensure that all women and girls in the State party are afforded equal protection under the law, in line with the Convention

15. Implementation of that recommendation depends fundamentally on the completion of national reconciliation and the election of a legislative body for the State of Palestine. There have been a great many national endeavours to achieve reconciliation, end the division and restore national unity. That priority has been underscored by the National Council and the Central Council in numerous sessions, and by the President on many national occasions, in international forums and before United Nations entities. Those endeavours culminated in a national consensus on the holding of fresh presidential and legislative elections in accordance with the announcement made by the President in 2019. However, Israel, the occupying Power, has made every effort to hamper national reconciliation and the holding of elections. It has refused to allow voting in Jerusalem and to lift the blockade on the Gaza Strip. Such conduct is intended to entrench geographic division between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in order to advance the colonialist interests of Israel.

16. It should be noted, however, that decisions issued by the President as having force of law apply without distinction across the nation, including the West Bank, Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip.

(d) Paragraph 15 (c): Expedite the review of draft laws to ensure their compliance with the Convention, including the draft penal code, the draft personal status code and the draft family protection law, and their adoption

17. As was mentioned above, the Cabinet decided to form a national team to review the 2011 draft penal code. The team has met several times to determine a plan and working mechanism. The members of the team decided, in a timely manner, to submit the amended draft to relevant civil society organizations and national bodies and engage in the necessary consultations. That process will coincide with the opening of an online portal to receive legal comments on the draft code. The team began reviewing the draft code in early 2020. However, its work has been temporarily impeded by the Coronavirus pandemic and the declaration of a state of emergency. The Government is taking the necessary measures to ensure that the national committees and teams can continue to work effectively, with due regard for the necessary preventive measures.

18. As regards the draft decree-law concerning protection of the family from violence, after the formation of the eighteenth government, all the laws which the previous government had sent to the President for consideration were sent back to the new Government for reconsideration and resubmission to the President. Accordingly, on 29 May 2019, the Cabinet sent the draft decree law to the Ministry of Social Development, the Ministry of Women's Affairs and the Ministry of Justice for reconsideration, consultation and awareness-raising. A technical committee³ was then established to prepare a second version of the draft law. The committee is currently completing consultations and taking the necessary legal measures with a view to having the law adopted and published in the Official Gazette in accordance with the applicable procedure. The state of emergency owing to the Coronavirus pandemic has prevented the swift completion of measures to adopt the draft law.

19. Nevertheless, numerous measures have been taken to ensure prevention, protection and accountability and to reintegrate victims in the family and society. For that purpose, the competent national bodies are implementing harmonized methods for evidence and work. In practical terms, a free direct phone line has been opened in order for family protection units in the police force across the country to receive complaints from women victims of violence. A risk assessment template consistent with the Coronavirus state of emergency has been developed.⁴ Mechanisms have been elaborated to respond to violence against women, particularly deaths in unclear circumstances. When conducting investigations and broadening their scope, social and psychological reports are used as a key indicator.

20. In order to develop the services provided for victims of violence, action is being taken to review the 2013 national referral system for women victims of violence and Act No. 9 (2011) regulating centres for the protection of women victims of violence with a view to developing national referral mechanisms and providing services to women who are excluded from those systems, particularly women with severe disabilities, women who have been exploited in prostitution cases and women living with alcohol or drug addictions.

21. A guide to harmonized work procedures regarding cybercrime has been compiled. The online register maintained by the prosecutors responsible for protecting families from violence has been activated with a view to documenting all the actions taken to address cases of violence.

22. In cooperation with the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, the Ministry of Women's Affairs has carried out a survey of violence in 2019. The survey will be used to identify gaps and develop policies and mechanisms to reduce the rate of violence. In cooperation with the competent bodies, the Ministry of Women's Affairs is completing the necessary procedures to launch the National Monitoring Centre on Violence against Women with a view to adopting harmonized national statistics on violence against women and girls. For that purpose, a fully confidential online system is in place.

23. As regards the Personal Status Code: On 5 March 2018, the Cabinet established a technical committee to review the body of laws regulating personal and civil status, and to modernize those laws in accordance with international standards and best practices. The committee consists of relevant Government bodies and the General Union of Palestinian Women. It may consult any expert or specialist whom it deems appropriate in order to fulfil its functions. The committee began work in July 2019 and adopted a plan of action. However, it has not met often since then owing to a campaign launched by opponents of the Convention and because certain sectors of society reject any amendment to personal status laws in accordance with the Convention, because they are broadly based on religious precepts. Nevertheless, the national team responsible for following implementation of the Convention and the senior ministerial committee for following up the accession of Palestine to international instruments have been in continuous contact with the Cabinet with a view to reactivating the committee.

24. Decree-Law No. 21 (2019) determining the age of marriage in the State of Palestine was adopted on 3 March 2019 and amends the personal status laws governing Muslims, Christians and all citizens of the State of Palestine. The Decree-Law establishes a minimum age of marriage in the State of Palestine of 18 solar years for men and women alike, without distinction, with certain exceptions.⁵ On 11 December 2019, the Chief Qadi issued circular 2019/49 to qadis and celebrants of marriages (ma'dhun) stating that the aforementioned Decree-Law should be acted upon as of 29 December 2019. With regard to the particular exceptional circumstances, the circular provides as follows: “If a marriage is necessary for the benefit of both parties, you should verify the sharia, legal and social justifications, establish the facts and submit the matter for our consideration along with your recommendation so that it can be examined and the necessary sharia and legal actions can be taken in accordance with legal principles”.

25. It follows that marriage cannot be allowed for anyone under the age of 18 without written authorization from the Chief Qadi, who must provide clear reasons for allowing or not allowing the marriage. Before doing so, the Chief Qadi must examine the benefit at hand. The qadi to whom the marriage application is submitted shall examine the application, consider the benefit of the parties and make a recommendation to the Chief Qadi. A stringent approach is taken to marriage applications for individuals under the age of 16: they may marry only if there is a social risk. In the case of marriage applications for individuals aged between 16 and 17, the benefit considered less stringently. The benefit in marriages of individuals aged between 17 and 18 is given more flexible consideration. It should, however, be noted that standards for the benefits in question have not been defined owing to the social scandal that may befall the parties. According to the statistics of the sharia judiciary for 2020, assent was granted for less than 20 per cent of marriage applications for individuals under the age of 18; in most of those cases, the individual was over 17.

26. If the sharia judiciary ascertains, based on a psychological, social and security assessment, that there is no benefit in the marriage of an individual under the age of 18, the case file shall be transmitted to the public prosecutor with a view to prosecuting the husband, father or celebrant under the provisions of the penal code concerning marriage contrary to the law.

27. Consultations have taken place with Christian denominations in the State of Palestine with a view to amending their personal status laws in accordance with the Convention and the recommendations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women. The representatives of the denominations said they were prepared to discuss many of the issues raised. The Lutheran denomination amended its personal status code in accordance with the Convention one year after the accession of the State of Palestine to the Convention.

III. Challenges

28. Since acceding to the Convention without reservations in 2014, the State of Palestine has faced numerous difficulties and challenges when implementing the provisions of the Convention and the recommendations made by the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women in 2018. There have been campaigns against the Convention and the legal, policy and procedural measures taken to apply it at the national level. Those campaigns run counter to the position of the Palestinian leadership and the decisions taken by the National Council and the Central Council of the Palestine Liberation Organization concerning the need to implement the provisions of the Convention and harmonize national laws with it. Moreover, society at large rejects some of the provisions of the Convention.

⁵ In article 2 of the Decree-Law, it is stated as follows:

1. In order to be eligible for marriage, the parties should be of sound mind and should each have reached the age of 18 solar years. 2. By way of exception to the provisions of paragraph 1 of the present article, the competent court may, in particular circumstances, and the marriage is necessary for the benefit of both parties, allow the marriage of someone who has not reached the age of 18 solar years, upon certification by the Chief Qadi of Palestine or the religious authorities of other confessions. The spouse shall thereby be fully eligible in all matters relating to marriage, separation and the effects thereof.

29. The legislative power of the State of Palestine has found it difficult to achieve unity because Israel, the occupying Power, has hampered the reconciliation process and the holding of presidential and legislative elections for the State of Palestine. That situation hampers the issuance of many laws called for by the Committee, particularly the draft Palestinian penal code and the draft personal status code.

30. As it endeavours to implement the Committee's recommendations, the State of Palestine faces several threats and challenges. These include the ongoing illegal colonialist Israeli occupation and its violations of all the rights of the Palestinian people, including the rights of women and girls. In taking those actions, the occupation has received direct encouragement from the current United States administration. The Trump plan – the so-called deal of the century – entrenches the colonialist occupation and gives the green light to the annexation of Palestinian land, something that would flagrantly violate international law, the internationally recognized resolutions and the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, particularly the rights of return, self-determination and independence. Moreover, financial resources are limited owing to the economic downturn caused by the restrictions imposed on the Palestinian people by Israel, the occupying Power; piracy and the theft of resources; and the confiscation of Palestinian income. There has also been a considerable decline in foreign aid.

31. The violations committed by the Israeli occupation authorities against the population of the Gaza Strip have been particularly severe. The most salient example is the blockade that has been imposed since 2006, which is one of the most significant challenges faced by the State of Palestine in implementing the provisions of human rights instruments, including the Convention, in the Gaza Strip. The Palestinian Government has been unable to implement numerous programmes and activities in the Gaza Strip. The current division hinders numerous measures to implement the provisions of the Convention in the Gaza Strip.

32. Palestinians in the city of Jerusalem are subjected to clear racial discrimination by the Israeli occupation authorities. Israel, the occupying Power, imposes racial laws and policies on that population. The most significant of these are the policies of Judaizing Jerusalem; the policy of removing identity documents; the so-called reunification policies that disperse Jerusalemite families; the denial of permits to build or renew homes or facilities; the imposition of arbitrary fines; the high sums of money levied in return for permission to live in Jerusalem; and the denial of permits for Palestinian organizations to implement their programmes in Jerusalem, including programmes and activities to protect and promote the rights of Palestinian women and girls in Jerusalem.

33. The most significant obstacles facing the State of Palestine when implementing the Committee's recommendations include the state of emergency owing to the Coronavirus pandemic and the focus on health care and measures to stop the virus from spreading.

directly racist character. The Mexican Government had set about that task, for it had undertaken several reforms in favour of the indigenous inhabitants, the peasants and the least privileged social categories. In addition, the Committee expressed the hope that the Mexican Government would take the guidelines issued by the Committee more closely into account in preparing its next report. It regretted, however, that Mexico had not modified its position with regard to the interpretation of article 4 of the Convention.

Israel

364. The fifth and sixth periodic reports of Israel, submitted in one document (CERD/C/192/Add.2), were considered by the Committee at its 929th to 932nd, 935th and 936th meetings, held on 15, 16, 20 and 22 August 1991 (see CERD/C/SR.929-932, 935 and 936).

365. The reports were introduced by the representative of the State party, who said that pluralism was one of the strengths of Israeli society, as was demonstrated in the events surrounding the Gulf War. Arab Israelis, who comprise 16 per cent of the population, did not respond to Iraqi calls for Israel's destruction. The recent arrival of an additional 14,500 Ethiopian Jews and the influx of 90,000 Jews from the Soviet Union in the first six months of 1991 were further evidence of the absence of xenophobia or racism in Israel.

366. A wide range of affirmative action measures had been undertaken by the Government to reduce the social and economic differences between Jews and non-Jews in the State of Israel. Over the last two years, $US 75 million had been allocated specifically for programmes benefiting Israeli Arabs. Another programme foresaw the investment of $US 100 million over five years to improve educational facilities for the Arab population. Significant progress for the non-Jewish population of Israel had been made in the area of health care, as indicated by the fact that 85 to 90 per cent of all pregnant Israeli-Arab women were giving birth in clinics operating in 107 Arab towns and villages.

367. The representative of Israel pointed out that there were six members of the Israeli parliament who were Arabs and that their questions raised in parliament were more likely to be answered than those of their Jewish colleagues. Of 14 staff working in the Prime Minister's Office dealing with Arab affairs, four were members of the Arab community. David Ben-Gurion, the former Prime Minister of Israel, had declared that "in the long run, nations will be judged by the way in which they treat their minorities". Using this criterion, the record of Israel was a favourable one.

368. Members of the Committee thanked the delegation of Israel for the supplementary information furnished in its oral introduction and welcomed the occasion to renew its dialogue with Israel. The self-congratulatory tone of parts of the report was, however, unsatisfactory. The Committee underlined that, in accordance with article 3 of the Convention, Israel's report needed to encompass the entire population under the jurisdiction of the Government of Israel. The report under consideration, which described the situation only within the State of Israel itself, was, in that respect, incomplete. Members also wished to have specific information on the economic, social and educational conditions prevailing in the occupied territories, as well as to know whether the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Times of War was in force in the occupied territories.

369. With reference to article 2, members of the Committee drew attention to paragraph 22 of the report, in which it was stated that government-sponsored educational benefits are linked to completion of military service. Members inquired as to the equity of such an arrangement, since Israeli Arabs, for reasons of security, were disadvantaged in this respect. Further information was also requested concerning the requirements for immigration and for access to immigration benefits, especially for non-Jews. In this connection, concern was expressed over Israeli policy that, on the one hand, accorded citizenship automatically to Jewish immigrants arriving in Israel and, on the other hand, barred the return to their former homes of Arabs displaced by war.

370. In regard to article 3, members of the Committee expressed concern that Israel maintained relations with South Africa. Further information was requested on cooperation, particularly on military matters, between the two countries.

371. Concerning article 4, members observed that it was unclear how the law, referred to in paragraph 11 of the report, criminalizing incitement to racism was applied in practice and wished to know how many complaints had been made under that statute. Further information was also requested on the change in the Basic Law, referred to in paragraph 44 of the report, designed to block a person espousing racist ideas from running for elective office. Members also wished to know if Israeli legislation permitted political parties that were ethnically or racially based.

372. In regard to article 5, members of the Committee wished to have further information on multiracial, multi-ethnic or multilingual schools, in particular their number, location and how they operated. More detailed demographic information was requested concerning the ethnic composition of Israeli society and that of the occupied territories, including the Golan Heights and East Jerusalem. Precise comparative figures were requested to substantiate the claim in paragraph 21 of the report that the education system in the Arab sector in Israel had expanded dramatically. Further information was also requested on the percentage of Jewish and non-Jewish students and teachers in the educational system, including the university level, and on the average life expectancy for persons living in the occupied territories as compared to that of the population of Israel.

373. Members of the Committee inquired about the employment situation for Arabs working in Israel, and particularly if the number of work permits issued by the Israeli authorities had dropped in the wake of the Gulf War. Further information was requested concerning workers from the occupied territories, including their average wage level compared to Israelis and their right to join a union.

374. The representative of the reporting State had informed the Committee that there were six Arab members of parliament. Members of the Committee wished to know if that number was proportionate to the Arab population and how, in general, the members of parliament of the various ethnic groups compared with their percentage of the total population.

375. With reference to article 5 (d) (i) of the Convention, members of the Committee requested additional information on the application of the right to freedom of movement and residence in Israel and in the areas under its control.

376. Concerning article 6, members of the Committee wished to know how Israel ensured legal recourse for victims of discrimination. Information was also requested on what legal guarantees were in force in the occupied territories concerning the administration of justice. Concern was expressed, in this regard, over the Israeli practice of demolishing houses in the occupied territories. Members of the Committee also wished to know the extent to which Arab lands were seized for the purpose of constructing settlements in the occupied territories for immigrants arriving in Israel.

377. With reference to article 7, members of the Committee wished to be informed as to what measures were being undertaken to promote contacts and exchanges between Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs and if the number of contacts between the two communities was, in fact, decreasing.

378. Responding to the questions and comments by members of the Committee, the representative of the State party clarified that the report applied to all persons in Israel, including those working in Israel. In the areas under military administration, where Israeli law did not apply, the military administration complied strictly with the rules of international humanitarian law, as applicable to armed conflicts. Israel accepted the fourth Geneva Convention, but claimed the right to do so de facto, not de jure.

379. Concerning education, the Ministry of Education had a special department, headed by an Arab, on education for Arabs. There were no multiracial elementary or high schools in Israel, a fact that resulted from the right of students to attend schools of their own choice. The number of Arab students had risen from 11,000 in 1948 to more than 250,000 at present. There were now about 10,000 Arab teachers in the education system, some 100 of whom taught Jewish students. Class sizes in the Arab schools averaged about 31 students per teacher as compared to 27 students per teacher in the Jewish sector.

380. In regard to the employment situation for Israeli Arabs, the representative noted that, until recently, the unemployment rate among Arabs had been higher than among Jews. Presently, the rate remained between 8 and 9 per cent, whereas the rate for Jews was about 11 per cent.

381. On the subject of parliamentary representation, the representative said that, if Arabs were represented in parliament in numbers proportionate to the number of Arab voters, there would be 10 or 11 Arab members of parliament instead of the present six. Israeli citizens vote for parties, however, rather than individuals, and parties are free to choose whom to include on their lists. There was no specific provision for proportional political representation for Arabs.

382. Private racial organizations were permitted if they were not racist, since the propagation of racism was illegal in Israel. The representative was not aware of any organization based on national or racial membership, except for those established on a purely religious basis. All organizations were multiracial.

383. Regarding Israel's relations with South Africa, the representative stated that Israel had often made its abhorrence of apartheid quite clear and that it had joined in international action against apartheid. The contacts it maintained with South Africa had been for the sake of keeping up cultural ties with organizations combating racial discrimination.

384. On matters concerning immigration policy, prospective nationals had to demonstrate a knowledge of Hebrew and decide to reside permanently in Israel, having given up a foreign nationality. Additionally, all Jews had the right to enter the country, even if they constituted a potential burden because of disablement or unfitness for work. This was due to the historical situation of Jews, many of whom had been persecuted or not permitted to become nationals of other countries.

385. The representative explained that no statistics were provided in the report on the racial composition of the population because none existed. The Government of Israel viewed categorization by racial description as potentially offensive. Statistics based on the country of birth did, however, exist.

Concluding observations

386. The Committee recorded that the Government of Israel had undertaken to continue a dialogue with the Committee. It took note of the declaration made by the representative of the reporting State that Israel had ratified the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (although at the time of writing no instrument of ratification had been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations). The Committee regretted that the report did not follow the guidelines on the form and content of reports of States parties and that the demographic data provided was insufficient.

387. The Committee reiterated that the Government of Israel had implemented in the occupied territories neither the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War nor the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. The Committee expressed great concern about the situation in the occupied territories.

388. The Committee urged the Government of Israel to answer, in its seventh periodic report, all the questions asked and concerns raised during the consideration of its sixth and earlier reports.

Syrian Arab Republic

389. The ninth, tenth and eleventh periodic reports of the Syrian Arab Republic, submitted in one consolidated document (CERD/C/197/Add.6) were considered by the Committee at its 932nd meeting, on 16 August 1991 (see CERD/C/SR.932).

390. The reports were introduced by the representative of the State party, who emphasized that there was no form of racial discrimination in his country and that successive Syrian constitutions had guaranteed equality before the law of all citizens. Article 207 of the Penal Code provided that any act of racial discrimination or constituting incitement to or encouragement of such

OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES UNDER ARTICLE 9
OF THE CONVENTION

Ninth periodic report of States parties due in 1996

Addendum

Israel*

[5 August 1997]

* This document contains the seventh, eighth and ninth periodic reports, submitted in one document, due on 2 February 1992, 1994 and 1996, respectively. For the fifth and sixth periodic reports of Israel, submitted in one document, and the summary records of the meetings at which the Committee considered that report, see CERD/C/192/Add.2 and CERD/C/SR.929-932, 935, 936.

The annex and reference documentation provided by Israel may be consulted in the files of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights.

Introduction

1. This report is submitted pursuant to article 9, paragraph 1 (b), of the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination which entered into force with regard to Israel on 2 February 1979.

2. The present report supplements the initial report submitted by Israel in 1980 and the reports submitted in 1982, 1984 and 1991.

I. GENERAL

3. The Government of Israel is committed to the elimination of all forms of racism and intolerance. The Declaration of the Establishment of the State of Israel provides that "the State of Israel will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex". Racism is anathema to the raison d'être and guiding principles of the State and it is combated by a combination of legislation, administrative action and education.

4. As of June 1996, the total population of Israel numbered approximately 5,685,000. There are no statistics as to the colour or racial origin of the population. However, the statistical information available shows that of the total population 4,598,000 were Jews and 1,087,000 were non-Jews.

5. Of the Jewish population, 61.2 per cent were born in Israel, 12.8 per cent were born in Asian-African countries and 26 per cent were born in European-American countries. Of the non-Jewish population approximately 781,000 are Muslims, Bedouin Arab comprising nearly 10 per cent of the Muslim population. A further 157,000 are Christians of whom 150,000 are Christian Arabs. Some 91,000 are Druze.

Year	Total population	Arab population	Arab as % of total population
1990	4 821 700	795 800	16.5
1991	5 058 800	812 700	16
1992	5 159 900	841 500	16.1
1993	5 327 600	868 800	16.3
1994	5 471 500	899 400	16.4
1995	5 610 000	932 600	16.6
1996	5 685 000	1 022 000	17.9

6. Israel is a parliamentary democracy based on universal suffrage. The executive branch, the Government, is subject to the confidence of the parliament (the Knesset). The judiciary in Israel is independent and judges are appointed for life with mandatory retirement at age 70. The Supreme Court is the highest court of appeal on rulings of lower tribunals. The Supreme Court also functions as a High Court of Justice. In this function, the Court hears petitions against government and public bodies. The Supreme Court also has authority to determine whether a law passed by the Knesset contradicts a Basic Law of the State.

7. Israel is a multicultural, multi-religious and multilingual society. Matters of personal status of Christians, Druze, Jews, and Muslims are determined by denominational courts of the respective communities. Arabic is one of Israel's two official languages. The State has schools where Arabic is the language of instruction. Arab parents may also choose to send their children to schools where Hebrew is the language of instruction. There are well established and successful mass media, literature and theatre in the Arabic language.

II. INFORMATION RELATING TO ARTICLES 2 TO 7 OF THE CONVENTION

Articles 2 and 4

8. Traditionally, protection of human rights has been assured in Israel by the intervention of the Supreme Court acting as a High Court of Justice. In recent years this has been supplemented by the enactment of Basic Laws. A landmark effort to combat racism was the amendment to Basic Law: The Knesset that banned any Knesset party list which through its aims or by its actions, specifically or implicitly incites to racism. The enactment of this law was successful in preventing the racist Kahana (Kach) movement from running in elections.

9. Article 5 (2) of the recently enacted Political Parties Law, 1992, stipulates that a political party shall not be registered by the Registrar of Political Parties if its objectives contain explicit or implicit incitement to racism or if its behaviour reflects such incitement.

10. Since the last report, submitted in 1991, Israel has ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

11. A major legislative development in the efforts to ensure non-discrimination since the submission of the last report by Israel, was the passing of two Basic Laws: Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation and Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom, a copy of which is attached as Annex I. A further legislative act was the adoption of the 1995 Amendment to the Equal Opportunity in Employment Law, 1988. The amendment introduces a prohibition of discrimination on grounds of race, religion, nationality, country of origin, beliefs, political views, political party affiliation or age, in addition to the already existing prohibition on discrimination on grounds of sex and other factors. The impact of the new legislation is set out below in the discussion of the prohibition of racial discrimination by individuals.

Criminal prosecution of racism

12. Section 144A of the Penal Law, 1977, as amended in 1986 and 1992, provides for a penalty of up to five years' imprisonment for a person who incites to racism. Racism is defined in the Law as "persecution, humiliation, vilification, the display of enmity or violence, or the causing of animosity towards a community or parts of the population, by reason of colour, racial origin or national-ethnic origin".

13. A person who commits, out of racial motives, an offence, inter alia, against a person, a person's liberty or property, an offence involving threats or extortion: offences of hooliganism and public disorder or offences by public officials, is liable to the lesser of either double the punishment prescribed for such offence or 10 years' imprisonment.

14. The possessor of racist material, with the intention of distributing it, is liable to one year's imprisonment and the material is to be confiscated. In the case of Rabbi Ido Alba v. The State of Israel (Criminal Appeal 2831/95) the Supreme Court considered an appeal against a conviction for incitement to racism. The Appellant had written an article justifying the killing of non-Jews who did not follow accepted codes of moral behaviour. He was convicted by the District Court of incitement to racism and sentenced to four years' imprisonment (two of the years being a suspended sentence). The Supreme Court upheld the conviction and the sentence, and after quoting from the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Court stated, inter alia:

"The appearance on the scene (in the seventies) of the Kach movement which called for the creation of a Jewish State based on Jewish law and excluding non-Jews brought to a public platform a political party based on a racist ideology ...

This led to legislation intended to combat racism ...

Racism is no longer only a belief in racist theories, it is also a hatred of strangers as such on the basis of different racial or national-ethnic background. Such hatred is an ancient social malaise. The Israeli legislation is intended to eradicate such racism (Justice Matsa, paras. 11, 12, 15).

"Racism is destructive of the democratic social fabric. It violates Israel's international obligations and the need to combat racism is one of the lessons the Jewish people have learned from their history. Every democracy is therefore entitled to abrogate the principle of freedom of speech insofar as incitement to racism is involved (Justice Barak, para. 4)."

15. Persons advocating racial discrimination can be charged with incitement, in violation of articles 133, 136 (1), (2) and (4) of the Penal Law. In a recent case the Court convicted a person so charged. The Judgement states that "the values of the State of Israel include, concurrent with the freedom of expression, abhorrence at any expression of racism. Calling [by the accused] for a campaign against "Satanic Islam" violates the principles of both Judaism and democracy. It is sufficient that there existed a near possibility that the statement would reach the hearing of persons in Israel [for a conviction of incitement]". (The Attorney-General v. David Balhasan, Criminal case 3795/95).

16. In 1994, subsequent to the massacre in the city of Hebron of Muslim worshippers by a Jewish fanatic, the Attorney-General was charged with exploring options for outlawing the Kahana racist movement, which had expressed support for the massacre (although it had not been involved in it). Following the Attorney-General's report, the Cabinet, on 13 March 1994, declared that the two branches of the Kahana movement, Kach and Kahana Chai as well as any other group acting to achieve similar aims by similar means, even if they bore different names or designations, were terrorist organizations and were to be outlawed.

17. In accordance with article 46 (a) (2) of the Second Authority for Television and Radio Law, 1990, the holders of concessions for cable TV services must not transmit any broadcast which contains racial incitement. They are further bound to take any measure necessary to ensure that no broadcast is liable to incite to discrimination on grounds of religion, race, nationality, community, lifestyle or origin.

Prohibition on racial discrimination

18. The Israel Supreme Court has frequently ruled on the impermissibility of racial discrimination. The Court has stated that the prohibition of discrimination emanates "directly from the character of the State as pursuing democracy and freedom" (High Court of Justice case 243/62, Film Studios in Israel Ltd. v. N. Gery, P.D. 17, 2407, 2415)

19. The Court has ruled that "the rule prohibiting discrimination between persons on grounds of race, sex, national group, community, country of origin, religion, beliefs or social standing, is a basic constitutional principle, intertwined and interwoven into our basic legal concepts and forming an integral part of it" (High Court of Justice case 114/79 Burkan v. Minister of Finance P.D. 32 (2) 800, 806).

20. In the Ben Shalom case, the Supreme Court declared that "the principle of equality of rights and obligations of all citizens of Israel is part and parcel of the existence and character of the State of Israel" (Election Appeal case 2/88, Ben Shalom v. Central Election Committee for the Twelfth Knesset, P.D. 43 (4) 221).

21. Chief Justice Barak, in the Poraz case, stated that:

"Equality is a basic norm of democratic society ... The need to establish equality is vital to society and to the social contract on which society is built. Equality prevents arbitrary government. There is no element more destructive to a society than when its sons and daughters sense discrimination. A sense of inequality is a bitter experience, it harms those elements that unify society and hurts the self-realization of many. (High Court case 953/87, Poraz v. The Mayor of Tel-Aviv-Jaffa, P.D. 42 (2) 309, 332.)"

22. The various rulings and judgements of the High Court of Justice are now encoded in legislation. Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom of 1992, as amended in 1994, proscribes:

Article 1. Basic rights of persons in Israel are anchored in the respect of the value of persons, the sanctity of life and in the freedom of man, they are to be respected in the spirit of the principles enunciated in the Declaration of the Establishment of the State of Israel.

Article 4. Every person is entitled to protection of his life, body and dignity.

Article 11. All governmental authorities are obligated to respect the rights under this basic law."

23. Chief Justice Barak, commenting on this Law, has stated that it is based on the premise of "equality of all persons". (Barak, Legal Interpretation, p. 319.)

24. Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom has served as the authority for subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court, sitting as a High Court of Justice, regarding protection of individual rights and dignity. A number of Supreme Court decisions have explicitly stated that the principles of equality and non-discrimination now find their legal basis in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom (High Court of Justice case 5394/92 Huppert v. "Yad Vashem" Holocaust Memorial Authority, P.D. 48 (3) 353; High Court of Justice case 453/94, Israel Women's Network v. Government of Israel; High Court of Justice case 721/94; El Al Israel Airlines Ltd. v. Danilevitch P.D. 48 (5) 749).

25. In the recent Re'em case concerning the use of the Arabic language the Supreme Court ruled that:

"Freedom of expression can today be derived from the protection given to the dignity and freedom in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom. Indeed, freedom of expression 'has a wide ideological basis, at the centre of which is a recognition of the value of man, his dignity, the freedom given to him to develop his personality and the desire to have a form of democratic rule'. The need to bring about the self-fulfilment of man is at the foundation of freedom of expression. Justice Agranat considered this in the Kol Ha'am case at page 878, in holding with regard to freedom of expression that:

"... the importance of the principle also rests in the protection which it provides to a clear private interest, that is to say the interest of every person as such to give full expression to his personal qualities and virtues; to nurture and develop his individualism as far as possible; to express his opinion on any matter which he considers vital to him; in short - to say what's in his heart so that life will appear worthwhile in his eyes ... the internal need felt by every man to give open expression to his thoughts is one of the fundamental characteristics of man".

"The words 'public interest' are comprehensive, and include a wide range of interests which the general public - and hence also an organized society in the form of the State or the local authority - are concerned with. Public security and public safety are therefore included within the scope of the public interest. Also included is the public's confidence in public authorities, such as the legislature (and its members), the executive (and its ministers and officials) and the judiciary (its judges and employees). Also included is the public interest in individual rights being realized and tolerance being established and maintained between members of the society, among themselves, and between them and government. The rule of law, the independence of the Judiciary and the separation of authorities are all clear public interests. (Emphasis added) (Re'em Contracting Engineers Ltd. v. The Municipality of Upper Nazareth, and Others Civil Appeal 105/92, P.D. 47 (5) 189.)"

26. The Attorney-General has issued directives to Government Ministries concerning racial discrimination. These directives stipulate that "according to the law in force in Israel, any authority exercising any public function by virtue of law, is prohibited from discriminating on the basis of race, sex, religion, creed, political opinion or any other basis". The prohibition also applies to municipal authorities.

27. In the Re'em case, the Supreme Court ruled that a municipal by-law requiring notices on municipal billboards to be in Hebrew as well as in Arabic, was not valid. Chief Justice Barak stated that:

"My conclusion is supported by the following considerations: Firstly, an Arab minority, whose language is Arabic, lives in the State of Israel. It is its spoken language. It is the language of its religion and culture. The State of Israel respects the use of the Arabic language. As we shall see, it is an official language of the State, but more than that, it is the language of many of the State's citizens. When we are concerned with 'personal' expression, and when the State's role is limited to 'policing', the Arabic speaker should be allowed to express himself in his language, as he wishes. Secondly, tolerance is a central value of our legal system. This is the 'mutual tolerance required in a pluralistic society'. The Deputy President, Justice Elon, considered this in stating:

"... This is the doctrine of leadership and rule in the cultural heritage of Israel - that the opinions and philosophy of each and every person and each and every group should be tolerated. And this is the great secret of tolerance and paying attention to others, that is the great strength of each and every person and each and every public body expressing their opinion ...

And I also considered it in stating:

"... The democratic regime is based on tolerance ... tolerance of the acts and opinions of others and also tolerance of the intolerant. In a pluralistic society such as ours, tolerance is the force which unites us and enables us to live together ...

"Indeed, tolerance is a central value in public order. If every individual in a democratic society wished to realize all his desires, the end result would be that society would not be able to realize a minority of desires. It is in the nature of things that orderly social life is based on mutual waiver and mutual tolerance. Tolerance is the aim and the means together. It is a social aim which should be aspired to. It is a means of balancing different social aims. President Shamgar considered these two aspects, in stating:

"In my opinion, the dominant foundation is the public one, that which shapes, inter alia, rules regarding the relationship of a well-run society to the individual's personal, emotional feelings and human dignity, provided that their realization does not materially infringe the rights of others. Human beings which are part of a given society are called upon to respect the individual's personal, emotional feelings and his human dignity, through tolerance and understanding, because personal, emotional emphasis differ from person to person and because a free society does not aspire to a collective of beliefs, views or feelings. A free society minimizes the limitations it places on the individual's voluntary choices, and is patient, tolerant and even tries to understand the other, even with regard to ways which the majority do not view as acceptable or desired. Just as one must accept and respect society's right to nurture its culture, national language, historical traditions and values etc., a willingness must also prevail to live with other individuals in a society, who choose [a way of life] which is not identical to the trends and aspirations of the majority of the society. Just as one should not obstruct the progress of someone who wishes to legally advance the exclusive imposition of the Hebrew language in our lives, and even the purity of its pronunciation, and just as one should not fetter the majority or part of the public which wishes to properly foster an approach promoting a national language, tradition and culture, so one can also not prohibit an individual who has a different opinion from expressing an opposite personal or even public attitude. In a free society, there is room for many different views, and the existence of freedom in the society is, in practice, proven by the creation of the correct balance, with the assistance of which we aspire to allow everyone to personally express himself in the manner he chooses. This is the essence of tolerance: it permits a variety of views, freedom of argument and freedom of conscience, provided that they do not create a danger to the community or another individual.

"Tolerance towards the publisher of a notice requires that great weight be given to his aspiration to express himself in the language of his choice. If somebody wants to approach a limited target audience speaking his language, a democratic society which is founded on tolerance should not prevent him from so doing.

"The issue is the individual, his conscience and his freedom. Indeed, against the background of the strength of the Hebrew language on the one hand, and the need for tolerance towards the speaker of a foreign language on the other, it is clear that in balancing the individual's freedom of expression and language in his relationships with other individuals, through the medium of notice boards, and the interest of the Hebrew language, the former interest prevails.

"Before I finish, I wish to make three concluding remarks. Firstly this judgement is based on freedom of expression and language. It is based on the freedom of the publisher to choose any language he wishes as a means of expression and thought. There is therefore no need to examine the special status of Arabic as an official language. This status is recognized in Israel ... It is based on the social reality in which a significant minority of the State's citizens are Arabic speakers. However, as stated, this judgement is not based on the official nature of the language but on the right of the individual to publish in the language of his choice. Accordingly, every Arabic speaker has the right to publish a notice in Arabic or in any other language he wishes, on a municipal notice board."

Prohibition on racial discrimination by individuals

28. As regards legislative prevention of discrimination, the initial emphasis in Israel was placed on preventing discrimination by governmental or public bodies of any kind. It is believed that this has been achieved, and any discrimination by such bodies is clearly illegal. The Government, by administrative action, strictly enforces the rules against such discrimination. The Supreme Court, acting as a High Court of Justice, supervises the implementation of the prohibition against discrimination by government or public bodies. Racism is, as detailed above, an offence against the Criminal Law and racist behaviour is prosecuted.

29. The outlawing of discrimination by individuals against each other has, however, developed more slowly.

30. There is legal opinion in Israel that, following the adoption of Basic Law: Human Liberty and Honour, the norms prohibiting discrimination by public bodies now apply to all private transactions. There is however, as yet, no clear Supreme Court decision supporting this view. In his book Legal Interpretation, Israel's Chief Justice Barak has intimated that the degree to which the State should intervene to prevent discrimination by one individual against another should depend on the degree to which a service is being offered to the public at large. Chief Justice Barak brings the example that the State should intervene to prevent discrimination by a restaurant owner against different customers but should not intervene where a person is letting a room in his or her private apartment.

31. A major development in applying the rule against discrimination to individuals, as well as to public bodies, was the adoption of the 1995 Amendment to the Equal Opportunity in Employment Law, 1988. The law prohibits discrimination by any employer, who employs six persons or more. Originally, discrimination was described as "discrimination by reason of sex, family status, parentage or sexual preference". In 1995 this law was amended to include a prohibition of discrimination on grounds of "national ethnic origin, country of origin, beliefs, political views, political party affiliation or age". The law also prohibits the defining of conditions for recruitment that would have the effect of discrimination.

32. This law, as amended, has thus extended to private persons and private transactions the previously existing prohibitions against discrimination in employment by public bodies.

Affirmative action

33. In recent years there has been a change of emphasis in Israel on the issue of discrimination. In the past, the formal-technical aspect was seen as paramount, namely that the legislative framework should provide equal opportunity for all. In Israel, as in other countries, the emphasis has moved to the need for affirmative action.

34. This change is reflected in the judgement of Supreme Court Justice Theodore Orr in the Avitan case where he states:

"The principle of equality serves to achieve equitable results. It is not the 'technical' or 'formal' equality that requires protection but the substantive equality, namely equality between equals. Persons or groups of people differ in their conditions, attributes and requirements and at times there is a need to discriminate between those who are not equal in order to protect, encourage and advance the weak or needy. Equality between those who are unequal can be a travesty. (High Court of Justice case 528/88 Avitan v. Israel Lands Administration and Others P.D. 43 (4) 297, 299.)"

35. In the Israel Women's Network case, Supreme Court Justice Eliahu Matsa states:

"[Affirmative action] is an element of equality that integrally derives from the very principle of equality and is one of the major guarantees of the implementation of equality (as is the Canadian view) and it is not just a tolerated exception to the principle of equality (following the restrictive view adopted in the US) (High Court of Justice case 453/94 Israel Women's Network v. Government of Israel P.D. 44 (5) 529)."

36. Israel, being an immigrant society, inevitably suffers at times from the inherent friction that can exist between different immigrant groups. The Israel experience is that each new group of mass immigration tends to find itself, at first, at the bottom of the social-economic ladder. It can sometimes take a generation for an immigrant group to establish itself socially and economically. The growing rate of intermarriage between the different immigrant groups has however contributed to the relatively coherent homogeneity of the Israel-born population.

37. An example of a recently-immigrated society is the Ethiopian community, which today numbers some 57,000 persons.

38. The Ethiopian Jews have large families; some 60 per cent of the community are under the age of 18. In addition, there is a very high percentage (about 25 per cent) of one-parent families, about three times the rate for other Israelis.

39. The integration of Ethiopian Jews into Israeli society has raised some major challenges. Therefore the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption and the Israeli Government have adopted a number of principles, among them:

(a) The adoption of a clear policy of preferential treatment (affirmative action) for the Ethiopian community with regard to housing, education and integration into employment, a policy which has expanded and become much more comprehensive in the past three years;

(b) The allocation of special resources for the absorption of this community in Israel. The State of Israel invests an average of 3-4 times as much in the absorption of each Ethiopian immigrant as in immigrants from other countries.

40. The Ministry of Absorption initiated an unprecedented special mortgage programme for Ethiopian immigrants. The mortgages are equivalent in value to 85-90 per cent of the price of the apartment, with a ceiling of $120,000. The mortgage includes a grant of 85-90 per cent of the amount of the mortgage and the monthly payments are up to $56. An immigrant family from the former Soviet Union, in comparison, is eligible for a $32,000 governmental mortgage, of which 25 per cent is given as a grant.

41. The efforts to integrate the Ethiopian Jews into employment focused on providing basic skills, assisting them in making the transition from their traditional professions to the professions available in an industrial society.

42. A survey published by the Brookdale Institute showed that the overall rates of employment for Ethiopian men were similar to that of other Israelis. However, middle-aged and older immigrants had much lower participation rates than veteran Israelis, with the gap widening with age. The employment rate for women was significantly below that of other Israelis, but increased over time. One of the main factors that created this high rate of unemployment is the relatively high percentage of single-parent families on the one hand, and families with a large number of children on the other hand. The women are beginning to enter the labour force, their participation gradually increasing over time. The younger men (up to age 35) have achieved employment rates comparable to other Israelis.

43. According to the survey, over 50 per cent of those employed were in skilled jobs, as defined by the Central Bureau of Statistics, such as metalworkers, carpenters, electricians, bookkeepers and community workers.

44. Ethiopian children were first placed in separate classes within the school in order to provide them with basic language instruction and with the basic background they would need to integrate into regular classes. They participated in these classes for about a year and in a special survey conducted in 1993 by Brookdale, 70 per cent were found to have been integrated into regular classes.

45. In order to assist the schools in addressing the challenge, a variety of special assistance programmes were instituted. These include an allotment of extra teaching hours per child (1.7 hours per week with no time limitation for those who came after 1 January 1991). This is in comparison with the limited assistance for one to three years provided to immigrants from other countries. They also included supplementary after-school programmes.

46. There remain significant gaps in performance between Ethiopian children in elementary schools or completing high school, and other Israeli children. There are reports that there may be problems of irregular attendance among sub-groups, although these have not been documented. Reported drop-out rates are lower among the Ethiopian community than in the general Israeli population.

47. Approximately 380 Ethiopian children who have been identified as gifted studied in 1996 in the top schools throughout the country, within the framework of a special project to identify and encourage gifted children among the Ethiopians.

48. A special emphasis has been put on affirmative action policy towards Ethiopian immigrants in order to integrate them into higher education, to promote social mobility and create leadership and role models. The assistance has included:

(a) Special supplementary high school years of study to enable them to complete their high school matriculation exams, which are a prerequisite for higher education;

(b) Special scholarships to attend institutes of higher education;

(c) Special optional preparatory classes (for one or two years) in Israel's universities and post-secondary institutions to prepare the Ethiopian immigrants for the entrance exams;

(d) Auxiliary tutoring during their studies;

(e) Student housing provided at the government's expense to most students; and

(f) Living stipends provided (only to Ethiopian students) to help them devote themselves more fully to their studies.

These efforts have borne fruit. The consistent increase in the number of students is shown in the table:

Number of Ethiopians studying in post-secondary institutions and attending preparatory courses in Israel, 1992-1995

Year	Preparatory students	Degree students	Total
1991/92			145
1992/93	55	185	240
1993/94	131	219	350
1994/95	172	306	478
1995/96	411	480	891*

* Approximately 100 students who began their preparatory studies during 1996 should be added to this number.

49. The Arab community has maintained its separateness in terms of language, religion and customs. The Arab community in Israel enjoys full equality in civil and political rights. They have the right to elect and be elected in municipal and national elections. This right is exercised and all Arab cities have Arab mayors. There are Arab political parties and Arab members of the Knesset (parliament). Arabic is an official language and is used in Courts and in official documents. Arab members of the Knesset sit on parliamentary committees and have served as deputy speakers of the Knesset. There have also been Arab deputy ministers. Arabs serve as judges and there are at present Arab judges at both the Magistrate and District Court level. Arabs serve in the civil service, reaching high rank, including, for the first time, the appointment in 1996 of a head of a diplomatic mission with the rank of Ambassador. Arabs are not conscripted to military service but may volunteer to do so. Of those who have volunteered some have reached high rank in the Israel Army. Among the Druze community, the most senior rank reached was that of Brigadier-General.

50. Nevertheless there exists an undeniable gap between the Jewish majority and the Arab minority as regards the standard of living and involvement in national affairs. Part of this is a reflection of the external security situation and the fact that Arabs are not conscripted into the Army and few volunteer, the majority of the Arabs is thus denied involvement in what is still a vital element of Israeli society. Another factor is that a large proportion of Israeli Arabs live in villages where they engage only in small-scale farming.

51. The gap between the Jewish majority and the Arab minority has been considerably diminished over recent years but nevertheless, regrettably, still exists and is reflected in statistics.

52. In the ninth to twelfth grades, during 1995, 5.2 per cent of the students in Hebrew schools dropped out of the educational system while in the Arab educational system, the figure was 8.3 per cent.

53. Out of the total student population in Israel, the percentage of Arab students studying at universities for first degrees, in 1992/93, was:

Engineering and Architecture - 4.9 per cent;

Agriculture - 1.7 per cent;

Science and Mathematics - 8.2 per cent;

Medicine - 7.5 per cent;

Law - 6.0 per cent.

54. Detailed statistics for the year 1995 (the latest date for which data are available) appear in Annex II to this report, as follows:

55. The Arab school system uses Arabic as the language of instruction and the curriculum reflects Arab culture and Islamic or Christian religion or traditions, in addition to teaching Hebrew language and literature. There are teacher training colleges affiliated with the Arab school system where the language of instruction is Arabic. However, universities, post-secondary level colleges and specialized technical schools are fully integrated.

56. The Israeli Government is making a determined effort to eradicate the gap between the Jewish majority and the Arab minority. Some five years ago the Government initiated a programme of eradicating this gap by means of legislation, affirmative action and special budgetary allocations to the Arab community. The annual budget earmarked for the Arab community increased since 1992 by approximately 160 per cent. Some of the affirmative measures taken are set out in summary form below.

Government employees

57. By decisions of the Government of 21 March 1994 and 14 March 1995, the Government decided that some 189 academic civil service positions would be filled without being subject to the regular rules of public competition. The Government decisions set out explicitly that as regards these positions, preference would be given to Arab academic applicants. All notices of vacant civil service posts are published in Arabic as well as in Hebrew. As a result of the various efforts, some 300 Arab academics were recruited into the civil service in the years 1994-1995.

Public housing

58. The Ministry of Housing devotes a special budget to public housing in the Arab sector of the population. In 1995 the Ministry allocated 26,103,000 NIS in the District, the largest single allocation being to the city of Nazareth; 20,457,000 NIS in the Haifa District, the largest single allocation being to the township of Um El Faham; 8,400,000 NIS in the Central District, the largest single allocation being to the township of Taibeh, and 3,350,000 NIS in the Jerusalem District, the largest single allocation being to the village of Abu Ghosh.

Health

59. In 1995 the National Health Insurance Law came into effect thus granting compulsory health insurance to the whole population including the 4 per cent of the population who were previously uninsured. Most of the previously uninsured came from the minority communities.

60. During 1995, in addition to health services such as hospitals, that serve the whole of the population, special attention was devoted to services intended specifically for the Arab population.

61. The professional personnel of the drug rehabilitation centre in the Arab city of Nazareth are funded by the Ministry of Health. A drug rehabilitation hospitalization centre serving the Arab population of Western Galilee is partially funded by the Ministry. The professional personnel of the Mental Health Centres in the cities of Ramla and Taibeh are funded by the Ministry.

62. In 1995 a one time allocation of 1,500,000 NIS was made to the Scottish Hospital in Nazareth and a smaller grant was made for professional courses at the English Hospital in Nazareth.

63. Emphasis was placed on setting up Family Health Centres in Arab villages and townships. The Ministry of Health provided partial funding for the building of 20 new Family Health Centres in Arab settlements during 1994 and 30 during 1995. The total budget for the project is 33,600,000 NIS to be spent over a period of four years.

64. Four projects for the prevention of infant mortality in the Arab population were initiated in 1994. An emphasis was placed on the prevention of genetic defects. Such defects are more common in the Arab community than in the Jewish community because of the prevalence, in Arab communities, of marriage between relatives. The projects therefore deal with the social aspects as well as medical ones.

65. A course for qualified Bedouin nurses has been opened, with a hope that they will serve as role models for the Bedouin community in the field of primary preventive service.

66. Further programmes aimed specifically at the Arab community include health education classes in 64 Arab elementary schools; community programmes which concentrate on high risk populations; a project for prevention of child accidents; promotion of sanitary conditions.

Religious services

67. The Ministry of Religious Affairs maintains a Muslim Affairs Authority whose function is to assist in the provision of Muslim religious activities.

68. During 1992, the Ministry provided 260,000 NIS for the maintenance of Muslim religious sites. During 1993, the sum was 170,000 NIS and in 1995 it was 3,400,000 NIS.

69. The Ministry coordinates the facilitation of the pilgrimage of Israeli Muslims to Mecca.

70. In 1995, in order to provide more suitable accommodation for the Islamic Courts, three new premises were rented by the Ministry for Religious Affairs. The Ministry is in the process of computerizing the work of these Courts.

Foreign service

71. In 1996 an Israeli Muslim Arab has for the first time been appointed as an Ambassador of Israel (Ambassador to Finland). Israeli Druze have served in senior diplomatic positions, including that of Consul-General, but this is the first time an appointment as ambassador has been made.

72. Special efforts have been made by the Foreign Ministry to recruit Arab and Druze cadets to the Foreign Service. In order to increase such recruitment, recruitment notices were published in the Arabic press.

Education, culture and sport

73. In 1991 the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport initiated a five-year plan to increase the number of new classes in the Arab school system. As a result of this programme, 1,077 new classrooms were built. Of the total budget for new classrooms during the five-year period, 59 per cent was spent on the Hebrew school system, 33 per cent on the Arab school system and 8 per cent on the Druze schools.

74. In 1995/96 the total number of schoolchildren was 1,277,000. Of them 228,000 were Arab (17.9 per cent).

75. Special effort is made to encourage Arab schoolchildren to continue their studies to age 18. In 1996 a budget of 4,130,000 NIS was allocated to advisors and facilities for this purpose. Emphasis is being put on scientific-technical schooling. At present 19 per cent of Arab students participate in such schooling, the aim is to raise this to 35 per cent. During 1995, 1,260 computers were placed in Arab schoolrooms at a cost of 6.8 million NIS. In 1995, a special allocation of 27,000 funded teaching hours was made to the Arab school system, beyond the stipulated norm of teaching hours per pupil. In 1995-1996 the Ministry of Education funded 679 educational TV programmes in Arabic.

76. There are at present 1,738 Arab students at teacher training colleges. Some attend Hebrew speaking colleges while most prefer to attend Arabic speaking colleges. This number is in addition to those students attending Israeli universities and studying to be teachers.

77. In addition to Arab school teachers, the Ministry of Education employs approximately 80 Arabs in senior managerial and supervisory posts.

78. A special programme for gifted Arab children was initiated in 1993. In 1996, 1,655 Arab schoolchildren were participating in such programmes.

79. The Ministry of Science allocated, during 1995-1996, 1,800,000 NIS for Arab researchers in the field of science. This sum included scholarships for seven Arab doctoral and post doctoral students.

80. The Arab cultural scene receives government encouragement and in 1996, 12,300,000 NIS were allocated to supporting Arab cultural events.

81. In the five-six age group, 90 per cent of Arab children attend pre-school programmes. This is lower than the percentage for Jewish children (98 per cent) and efforts are being made to increase attendance of Arab children. Part of the reason for the discrepancy is explained by the fact that fewer Arab women work outside their homes and therefore there is less demand for pre-school facilities.

82. The Foreign Ministry has given financial support to various activities in the Arab sector including: the Salaam Dance Group; a municipal delegation from Nazareth to a conference in Nice; a delegation from the community centre in Kfar Yassif to a festival in Hungary; the Daburiya dance group tour to Turkey.

Agriculture

83. In 1994-1995 the Ministry of Agriculture allocated 23 million NIS for development of agriculture among the Arab population. Particular emphasis was placed on fishing, olive oil and sheep breeding. Another 11 million NIS was allocated for development of water resources in Arab settlements.

84. Due to nationwide water shortage, the allocation of water for agriculture among the Jewish population was cut during 1995 by between 10-20 per cent. There was no cut in the water allocation to Arab agriculture.

Employment

85. In 1995 the total Arab population over the age of 15 was 636,600. Of this number the potential number of workers was 264,700. The number of employed persons was 249,200 and the number of unemployed was 15,500, that is 5.8 per cent of the work force. The percentage of unemployed among the Jewish population at the same time was 6.6 per cent.

86. The Government Employment Service conducts vocational retraining programmes for unemployed workers and helps them obtain employment. National Insurance provides a minimum wage for unemployed persons. Needless to say, no distinction is made between Jews and Arabs.

Arab local government

87. In 1991 the Ministry of Interior began implementing a programme of special grants to Arab Local Councils. In 1991 the grant was 135 million NIS. Over the last five years the grant was increased annually by 20-30 per cent so that the 1995 grant was 489 million NIS.

88. The Ministry of Interior has initiated an accelerated programme for authorizing town planning programmes in Arab towns and villages. Since 1991, 36 per cent of the Arab towns and villages had their plans approved as compared to 28 per cent of Jewish towns and villages. A sum of 9.5 million NIS has been allocated for town planning of an additional 41 Arab towns and villages. During 1996 an additional grant was made of 200,000 NIS for town planning of eight Bedouin camps in the north of the country and an additional 550,000 NIS has been allocated for this purpose in 1997.

89. In June 1997, the Government designated 31 Arab towns and villages in the northern region of the country as part of a budgeted programme of town-planning whereby 13,500,000 NIS will be invested. Plans for towns and villages will be completed by the year 2020, in order to alleviate problems such as illegal construction of housing.

Encouraging manufacturing in Arab towns and villages

90. The Ministry of Industry and Trade began, in 1992, a programme to encourage the establishment of manufacturing industries in the Arab sector. The budget for the year 1992 was 2,300,000 NIS. This allocation has been increased annually and the budget for 1995 was 15,000,000 NIS.

Public works and electricity

91. In 1995-1996, a sum of 24,600,000 NIS was allocated for road works in Arab towns and villages.

92. All but 9,000 households in the Arab sector are connected to the national electricity grid. These 9,000 houses do not meet building safety standards. An effort is being made to solve this issue.

93. In 1995 the Ministry of Energy had a total budget of 5,400,000 NIS (on 28 July, the exchange rate was 3.55 NIS to $1) for connecting towns and villages to the national electricity grid; of this sum 40 per cent was earmarked exclusively for Arab settlements.

Telephone service

94. There are some 100,000 telephone lines serving customers in Arab villages and towns. This number does not include Arabs living in the mixed Arab and Jewish towns of Jerusalem, Haifa, Lod and Acre. Demand for new telephone lines can be met with no substantial delay. In 14 Bedouin villages, cellular public telephones were installed in 1995 as it was not physically feasible to install telephone lines.

Tourism

95. A concerted effort has been made to encourage the development of the tourist industry in Arab villages. In the period 1991-1996 the Ministry of Tourism gave over 32,000,000 NIS in grants for development of the necessary tourist infrastructure. The Ministry conducts professional training courses and provides expert counselling for tourist developers.

Labour and welfare

96. The Ministry of Labour and Welfare allocated, in 1995, 97 million NIS for social welfare among the Arab population. The Ministry employs 346 Arab social workers in welfare work among the Arab population (in 1992 the number was 78). A further 9,600,000 NIS were allocated in 1995 for welfare development projects in the Arab sector such as geriatric and family centres. The Ministry cares for 1,890 mentally handicapped Arab children. Government rehabilitation centres care for 612 Arab handicapped persons. There are other facilities organized by the Ministry of Welfare for the Arab population including hostels for battered women, youth centres and probation services.

Environment

97. As part of a policy of affirmative action in the Arab sector, the Ministry of Environment identified four major objectives: expansion of infrastructure; improvement of urban planning; regulation of commercial licensing - with special emphasis on prevention of land and air contamination and noise abatement; and utilizing the school system and youth movements for educating youth on environmental issues.

98. In the last three years, seven new environmental units have been established in the Arab sector, all the personnel being Arabs.

99. Since 1993 the budget for waste recovery in the Arab sector has been increased fourfold and now stands at 28 per cent of the total Israel budget for waste recovery.

Housing loans

100. In 1992, following an appeal to the High Court of Justice, the Ministry of Building and Housing changed its policy as regards granting housing loans to young couples. Previously, military service had been a condition for granting certain housing loans in development areas. This condition had the effect of discriminating against Arabs as most of them do not serve in the armed forces. This condition has been revoked.

Article 3

101. Apartheid has always been regarded as abhorrent by the Israeli Government and society and continues to be so regarded. Apartheid has never been practised in Israel. There exist in Israel no restrictions of any kind as to place of residence nor is there any segregation of any kind.

Article 5

102. Equality before the law is guaranteed under the basic tenets of Israeli law and society. The existence of an open democratic society with universal suffrage, vocal opposition parties, an independent judiciary and a free press, serve to ensure the maintenance of such equality.

103. There are no restrictions as to place of residence of members of different religious, ethnic, national or racial groups. Nevertheless Arabs and Jews tend to live in separate settlements. There is one village with a balanced Arab-Jewish population and one such mixed Arab-Jewish local council. Most cities tend however to be overwhelmingly either Arab or Jewish. Some cities, notably Jerusalem, Haifa, Acre, Ramla, and Lod have Jewish majorities with Arab minorities. In these cities lower income groups tend to live in separate suburbs, while in higher income groups, mixed suburbs are more common.

104. Government policy in the past has been to pay supplemental National Insurance payments to families of persons who had been called up at any time for military service. This policy was criticized as discriminating against the Arab population as they are not conscripted and the vast majority of them do not volunteer for military service. The Government has decided to abolish this differentiation and to equalize payments of all the population with that of families of persons who have been called up for military service. A special budget allocation was made to cover the increased cost of payments to the Arab community, thus incurred.

105. Until 1994, teachers at Arab speaking schools required security clearance. This measure was taken to ensure that persons who might exploit their position as educators to incite or promote threats to the security of the population, were not admitted into the system. Since 1994 this requirement has been abolished.

106. The main bulwark of the individual "against any acts of racial discrimination which violate his human rights and fundamental freedoms" is the court system. The court system is open to all without discrimination, including to non-citizens of Israel. The individual can sue both other individuals and the Government for any wrong or harm done to himself or his property and can claim compensation or an injunction. In addition to the normal court procedure, the Supreme Court, sitting as High Court of Justice, can and does issue writs against the Government and public bodies.

107. In addition to the court system, there exist other avenues of redress in cases of discrimination. There are members of Knesset, who frequently avail themselves of the parliamentary right to compel government ministers to answer parliamentary questions. There is a vocal press, including an Arabic press. There is an independent State Comptroller who also acts as a Public Complaints Commissioner; and in employment matters, the Ministry of Labour; the Labour Courts system; and, when the civil service is involved, the recourse available is through the Supervisor of Discipline in the civil service.

108. The Public Complaints Commissioner is a function of the State Comptroller under Basic Law: State Comptroller (enacted in 1988) and the State Comptroller Law (Consolidated Version), 1958. The Commissioner's function is to handle direct complaints from the public, investigate them, and recommend means of redress when such complaints are found justified. The Commissioner has investigatory powers, however, it has no powers of enforcement of its recommendations, and they do not carry any evidentiary weight in further legal proceedings. Nevertheless, the custom and practice that have developed over the years point to considerable deference that is accorded to the Commissioner's recommendations, similar to that accorded to the State Comptroller's recommendations. Thus, for example, past recommendations to pay damages when violations of rights were found, have always been complied with. When recommendations are not being complied with, the Commissioner is authorized to bring the matter to the relevant Minister or to the Knesset State Audit Affairs Committee. Furthermore, in cases where the complaint is the consequence of reprisal against the complaining person's former disclosure of corruption, the Commissioner is authorized to issue orders, including orders of reinstatement to office. Any person may complain against any organ that is under the supervision of the State Comptroller, namely governmental, municipal and other public institutions.

Article 7

109. Israel is a very open society with a vocal parliamentary opposition, a free press including multiple TV and radio stations and a politically active electorate. Activities in Israel have traditionally been very newsworthy and the foreign press corps stationed in Israel is larger than that in most major European countries. These elements combined with the existence of an independent judiciary and an active Ombudsman's office ensure a very full public airing of any complaint as to abuse of human rights, real or imagined.

110. There are a number of voluntary organizations in Israel monitoring human rights. Among the organizations are the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which is affiliated with the International League for Human Rights, New York and the Fédération internationale des droits de l'homme, Paris, the Arab Association for Civil Rights and Al-Tallah (Association for litigation to promote equality).

Specific activities encouraging Arab-Jewish understanding

111. In 1994 the Ministry of Education adopted a new civics studies curriculum that emphasizes human rights and universal democratic principles, including the International Declaration of Human Rights. This curriculum is identical for Arab and Hebrew schools.

112. Beit Hagefen was founded in 1963 in the city of Haifa as a meeting place for social and cultural encounters between Jews and Arabs and to encourage and promote Jewish-Arab understanding and coexistence. The centre operates as a non-partisan association and is supported and funded by the Haifa Municipality, the Ministry of Education and Culture and Sport, the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and private donors.

113. Beit Hagefen sponsors cross-cultural encounters for all age groups, courses, women's clubs, a library, an art gallery, an Arab theatre, and a training centre for education for democracy and coexistence. Special emphasis is placed on special events and activities such as the Arab Book and Culture Month and the Hanukah-Christmas-Ramadan Festival.

114. The Beit Hagefen Arab Theatre puts on theatre performances in Arab towns and villages all over Israel. It has participated in the New Generation Festival in New York and the Peace Festival in Brussels and won first award at the Acre Festival. In 1995 it received a grant of 322,000 NIS from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

115. Beit Hagefen has a visitors' centre which sets itself the goals of:

1. Enabling the visitor to reach a deeper understanding of Arab-Jewish relations in Israel;
2. Creating an awareness of the importance of neighbourly relations and coexistence;
3. Transmitting and disseminating the values of tolerance, coexistence and peace; and
4. Presenting the city of Haifa and its population as a model for how Jews and Arabs can live together as good neighbours in friendship and in peace.

116. Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salaam is a cooperative village of Jews and Arabs situated equidistant from Jerusalem and Tel-Aviv-Jaffa. It advocates coexistence between Jews and Arabs.

117. Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salaam has created a bilingual educational framework consisting of a kindergarten and school with an enrolment of 90 children. The Jewish and Arab teachers each speak exclusively in their own language to all of the children. The school and kindergarten are officially recognized by the Ministry of Education. The aim is to provide a model that will be directly imitated elsewhere in places of mixed population such as Ramla, Jaffa, Acre, Haifa etc.

118. A School for Peace has also been established at the village directed and facilitated by a joint Jewish-Arab professional staff. By 1994 some 15,000 young people had attended School for Peace encounters.

119. The Ministry for Religious Affairs arranges meetings between the heads of the Christian, Jewish and Islamic religions in Israel in order to increase interfaith cooperation.

120. The Ministry of Education supports Arab-Jewish summer youth courses at universities and scientific research centres. A special effort is made to encourage Arab youths to participate in these courses and they are advertised in the Arabic press.

121. The Ministry of Education encourages meetings between Jewish and Arab teachers. A course is held on Arab-Jewish cooperation. In 1993, 100 teachers attended such courses. In 1995 the number of teachers attending such courses was 400. In 1995, 15 seminars were held in Jerusalem for Arab high-school students. In these seminars the students visited the President's residence, the Supreme Court and the Knesset and met with officials and parliamentarians.

COMMITTEE ON THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
Fifty-second session

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES
PARTIES UNDER ARTICLE 9 OF THE CONVENTION

Concluding observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

Israel

1. The Committee considered the combined seventh, eighth and ninth periodic reports of Israel (CERD/C/294/Add.1) at its 1250th and 1251st meetings, held on 4 and 5 March 1998, and adopted, at its 1272nd meeting, held on 19 March 1998, the following concluding observations:

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the report but regrets that it does not follow the Committee's reporting guidelines.

3. The Committee regrets that the dialogue between its members and representatives of the State party was not always of a constructive nature. It nevertheless welcomes the replies of the delegation to some of the Committee's questions and their expression of willingness to contribute to a dialogue.

4. The Committee concludes that the Convention is far from fully implemented in Israel and the Occupied Palestinian Territory, and that the shortfall contributes very significantly to the dangerous escalation of tension in the region.

5. The Committee notes with regret the stalemate in the peace process in the region.

6. It takes note of the establishment of the Palestinian Authority which has certain responsibilities in parts of the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

B. Positive aspects

7. The measures taken by the State party to prohibit the activities of racist political parties such as Kahana (Kach) are welcomed.

8. The amendment of the Equal Opportunity in Employment Law, prohibiting discrimination in the labour sphere on the grounds of national ethnic origin, country of origin, beliefs, political views, political party, affiliation or age, is welcomed, as is the revision of the National Insurance Law.

9. The Government's efforts to reduce and eventually eradicate the economic and educational gap between the Jewish majority and the Arab minority are commended.

C. The Occupied Palestinian Territory

10. The Committee reiterates its view that the Israeli settlements in the Occupied Palestinian Territory are not only illegal under contemporary international law but are an obstacle to peace and to the enjoyment of human rights by the whole population in the region, without distinction as to national or ethnic origin. Actions that change the demographic composition of the Occupied Palestinian Territory evoke concern as violations of contemporary international humanitarian law.

11. Accordingly, the Committee calls for a halt to the demolition of Arab properties in East Jerusalem and for respect for property rights irrespective of the ethnic origin of the owner.

12. The Committee reiterates its opinion of 1991 that the report of Israel should "encompass the entire population under the jurisdiction of the Government of Israel" (A/46/18, para. 368). Israel is accountable for implementation of the Convention, including the reporting obligation, in all areas over which it exercises effective control.

D. Concerns and recommendations

13. With respect to articles 1 and 6 of the Convention, the Committee requests the State party to supply it with details of court decisions or other authoritative sources which make a distinction between inequality of treatment on the grounds of race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin and inequality of treatment on other grounds such as those related to public security

14. The Committee recommends that the State party extend its legislation against the promotion of racial hatred by completing its implementation of the requirements of article 4 of the Convention. The Committee has earlier held that when anyone makes threats in public against the security of persons of another ethnic origin, criminal proceedings must be initiated with due diligence and expedition. The State party should give this priority attention.

15. The Committee concludes that comprehensive legislation and accompanying measures of implementation will need to be introduced for the State party to meet all the requirements of article 5 of the Convention.

16. The Committee expresses its profound concern that detained persons of Arab ethnic origin are disproportionately subjected to inhuman and degrading interrogation under the Landau Commission rules and that the Supreme Court has failed to declare this illegal.

17. The Committee recommends that the State party reinforce its efforts to reduce the persisting gap between the living standards and the involvement in national affairs of the Jewish majority and the Arab minority, and that it does this in a manner consistent with the measures adopted for assisting the integration of Ethiopian Jews. The Committee encourages the State party to adopt new labour legislation in order to secure the protection against ethnic discrimination of the rights of Palestinians working in Israel on a daily basis; the rights of migrant workers, including undocumented workers, is also a matter of concern.

18. The right of many Palestinians to return and possess their homes in Israel is currently denied. The State party should give high priority to remedying this situation. Those who cannot repossess their homes should be entitled to compensation.

19. While noting the special budget for public housing in the Arab sector, the Committee remains concerned about ethnic inequalities, particularly those centring upon what are known as "unrecognized" Arab villages.

20. While recognizing the great diversity of opinion within the Israeli public, and the Government's actions to implement article 7 of the Convention, the Committee expresses concern about the findings of social surveys which report that very many Jewish young people believe that Arab citizens should not be accorded equal rights.

21. The Committee hopes to find in the next periodic report a comprehensive statement of the Government's vision of the future of its Arab, Bedouin and Druse citizens, together with an indication of how its objectives are to be attained and a review of the effectiveness of its measures to combat discrimination. Any statistics should show whether governmental expenditure and service provision are proportionate to the size of the different ethnic groups.

22. In order to be able to evaluate the implementation of article 6 of the Convention, the Committee requests the State party to present information on the number of complaints, judgements and compensation awards arising from racist acts, regardless of their nature. At the same time, the Committee would like to be informed about any other information, from whatever reliable source, about any inequalities suggestive of discrimination in the administration of criminal justice.

23. Since time did not permit a full exchange of views on many of the issues raised by members at the fifty-second session, the Committee requests the State party to reflect further on the remaining issues and to furnish additional information on these matters in the next report.

24. The tenth periodic report of Israel was due on 2 February 1998. In accordance with article 9 of the Convention the Committee will expect the submission of a combined tenth and eleventh periodic report by 2 February 2000. The document should constitute a comprehensive report, follow the reporting guidelines, and take account of the Committee's general recommendations.

25. The Committee recommends that the State party ratify the amendments to article 8, paragraph 6, of the Convention adopted at the Fourteenth Meeting of States Parties.

26. It is also noted that the State party has not made the declaration provided for in article 14 of the Convention, and some members of the Committee request that the possibility of making the declaration be considered.

Introduction

1. The Government of Israel welcomes the opportunity to present its 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th periodic reports to the Committee for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination in accordance with the requirements of article 9, paragraph 1 (b) of the International Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Racial Discrimination (hereinafter, the "Convention" or "CERD"). The present combined report supplements Israel's initial report and subsequent reports relating to the years 1982, 1984 and 1991 (CERD/C/192/Add.2), and 1993, 1995 and 1997 (CERD/C/294/Add.1).¹
2. This report has been prepared by the Department for International Agreements and International Litigation at the Ministry of Justice with the assistance of other ministries, departments, agencies and entities of the Government of Israel. Israeli nongovernmental organizations ("NGOs") were also invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of this report.
3. Racial discrimination is prohibited in Israel. The State of Israel condemns all forms of racial discrimination, and its government has maintained a consistent policy prohibiting such discrimination. The Israeli Government has taken constant measures to uphold the provisions of CERD since its ratification of this important instrument.
4. Since the submission of Israel's last reports to the Committee in 1997, many new significant legislative, judicial and administrative developments relevant to the Convention have occurred. This combined report provides a comprehensive account of these developments.
5. A short summary of some of the most significant policy and legislative developments that have occurred in Israel since its last report to the Committee is provided below. We would note that while it will naturally take time for some of the more recent developments to translate into concrete results, in many areas substantial new measures that give effect to the provisions of the Convention have already come into effect.

I. Legislative measures

6. Since 1998 significant new steps have been taken by the Israeli Parliament (the "Knesset") to promote tolerance and the elimination of racial discrimination in all its forms. Some noteworthy examples are included below.
7. The Knesset enacted legislation prohibiting discrimination against minority groups in the provision of public services, the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law, 5761-2000 ("The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law"). The Law prohibits discrimination by an individual operating a public place. Violation of this prohibition is both a civil wrong and a criminal offence punishable by fine. The law applies to the State as well and has been interpreted broadly as applying to a host of public places, including schools, libraries, pools, stores, and all other places serving the public. Court decisions have upheld this broad interpretation of the law.

8. The Knesset amended the Civil Service Law (Appointments), 5719-1959 ("The Civil Service Law (Appointments)"), in 1998 to institute affirmative action programs in the Civil Service hiring practices in order to ensure the adequate representation of minority groups.
9. Several amendments to the Penal Law 5739-1977 ("The Penal Law") created important tools to enable prosecution of racist incitement and "hate crimes". A 1994 amendment doubled the punishment for offences committed for a racist motive; a 2002 amendment added offences of incitement to violence and terror; and a November 2004 amendment added a section titled "Hate Offences".
10. The Pupils Rights Law, 5761-2000 ("The Pupils Rights Law") enacted in 2000, bans any form of discrimination concerning the registration of students by the governmental and local authorities or any educational institution (at Article 5 (A) (1)).
11. The 1998 enactment of the Freedom of Information Law, 5758-1998 ("The Freedom of Information Law") has given a solid legislative basis to the public's right of access to information. The main innovation of the law is in recognizing the right of an Israeli citizen or resident to receive information from public authorities, regardless of whether he or she has any personal interest in the information requested, and without having to state a reason for the request. Moreover, Article 12 applies the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law to persons who are not citizens or residents of the State of Israel, enabling them to obtain information concerning their rights in Israel.
12. Additionally, several other laws protecting specific groups in society were passed, such as the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, 5758-1998 ("The Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law") and the amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law, 5711-1951 ("The Equal Rights for Women Law") adopted by the Knesset in 2000. These laws entrench basic principles of equality and provide the means for further developing and applying the rights enshrined by CERD.

II. Judicial measures

13. The Supreme Court of Israel has played a pivotal role in the promotion of the principles enshrined in CERD through the development of jurisprudence dealing with contentious and highly charged political and security-related issues. Often, these issues also involve allegations of discrimination. As a result, the Supreme Court, led by its president, Chief Justice Aharon Barak, has issued a number of precedent setting decisions that have resulted in the modification of past practices.
14. Most notably, in its precedent-setting decision of 2000, the Supreme Court, sitting as a High Court of Justice, ruled in H.C.J 6698/95 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (08.03.2000) that in principle, the allocation of State land on the basis of any discriminatory criteria was unacceptable.

15. The principle of equality between foreign spouses of Israeli nationals, whether Jewish or Non-Jewish, was affirmed by the High Court of Justice in H.C.J 3648/97 Stamka v. The Minister of the Interior (04.05.1999), which dealt with attaining Israeli nationality by foreign spouses.

16. In the criminal context, a number of other criminal cases concerning incitement to racism and the commission of racist acts were decided by the lower courts, generally leading to a conviction. Furthermore, several indictments relating to offences committed against minorities were filed against police personnel, following independent investigations by the Department for investigation of Police Officers within the Ministry of Justice.

III. Administrative measures

17. The key program reflecting the State of Israel's commitment to comply with the basic principles enshrined in CERD in both a procedural and substantive manner is the Multiyear Development Plan for the Arab Israeli Sector. This plan reflects the government's commitment to eliminating gaps between Jews and Arabs and to promote equality and fair conditions regarding economic and social welfare throughout the Arab minority sector.

18. The goal of this Development Plan is to provide proper financial support and direction to the Arab minority sector that would promote short term growth as well as encourage long term development in education, housing, employment and economic growth. The aim of the plan is to reach out to the Arab minority in a unique manner by positively affecting all aspects of the minority sectors' relationship with the State and society. The Government attaches great importance to the granting of equal and fair conditions to Israeli Arabs in the socio-economic sphere, and views the development of the Arab-sector communities of Israel as contributing toward the growth and development of Israel's overall society and economy.

3.9 billion NIS were allocated for this program, and the Government has so far executed 88% of the plan.

19. In addition, over the past few years, the Government has made important inroads into improving the minority population's representation within the civil service and government companies. The Government instituted affirmative action programs and mandated specific target goals that would nearly double the number of minority employees within public service bodies.

20. The Government has also been active in addressing the rights of migrant workers. Changes have been implemented that more fully protect their rights, particularly vis-à-vis their employers. This has largely been instituted via the establishment of specific enforcement divisions within the relevant governmental authorities, provided with special training.

21. The following report addresses the main issues raised by the Convention since the submission of Israel's previous report, as well as the concerns raised by the Committee during the sessions. Finally, this report complies with the Committee's guidelines regarding the form and contents of reports to be submitted by States parties to the Convention (CERD/C/70/Rev.5). We trust that this report will facilitate the Committee's work and provide a more complete picture of the situation in Israel concerning the implementation of the Convention's provisions. We look forward to maintaining a constructive dialogue with the distinguished Committee.

Article 2

A. Measures to eliminate racial discrimination

1. Measures preventing discrimination by all public authorities and institutions

Overview

22. Racial discrimination is prohibited in Israel as required under Article 2 (1) (a) of the Convention. Several Basic Laws, laws, and court rulings operate together to guarantee that no public authority or public institution engage in any act or practice of racial discrimination against persons, groups of persons or institutions. These prohibitions apply with equal force at the national and local levels, and all public authorities and institutions are required to comply with their directives.

I. Judicial measures

23. As the Israeli legislature crafts and adopts both new laws and administrative measures to ensure that government agencies do not engage in any discriminatory act or practice, the country's independent judiciary serves to interpret, guide, and enforce these measures. This judicial effort is guided by the Supreme Court, which has issued a number of landmark decisions against certain discriminatory practices of both government entities and private individuals.

24. The Supreme Court has affirmed the principles of equality and non-discrimination of any kind as assured under the law such as depicted in the H.C.J 453/94 Israel Women's Network v. Government of Israel (01.11.1994), where the Supreme Court required the Port Authority Commission to include women in its list of candidates for directors positions and H.C.J 721/94 El A Israel Airlines Ltd. v. Danilovitch (30.11.1994), where the Court held that homosexual couples are to be provided with the same employee benefits given to heterosexual couples.

25. In H.C.J. 3939/99 Kibbutz Sde-Nahum et al v. Israel Land Administration et al (29.08.02) the Court held that the Israel Land Administration must administer State lands while protecting the public interest, including the protection of the land for the benefit of the larger public, and refraining from granting unjustified benefits relating to the land to others. As expected from any other administrative body, the Administration must act fairly to promote the general principle of distributive justice in allocation of public resources. The Court also noted the difference between discrimination and legitimate distinction. Consequently, the Court held that a decision to allocate lands only to a specific sector was unreasonable.

II. Administrative measures

Attorney-General guidelines regarding racial discrimination

26. As mentioned in Israel's previous periodic report to the Committee, all Government ministries are required to operate in accordance with the guidelines issued by the Attorney-General prohibiting racial discrimination. Accordingly, any authority exercising any public function by virtue of law is prohibited from discriminating on the basis of race, sex, religion, creed, political opinion or any other basis. All ministries are prohibited from engaging in any form of racial discrimination in all aspects of their activities (employment, services etc.). Furthermore, the Government is to take an active role in hiring women and minorities, especially via the imposition of affirmative action programs. All governmental bodies and government corporations are to actively pursue the hiring of women and minorities and achieve a fair representation of such groups.

2. Not sponsoring or defending discrimination by persons or organizations

27. As noted in Israel's previous report to the Committee, Amendment No. 9 to Article 7 (a) of Basic Law: The Knesset effectively bars the participation in elections of any political party advancing aims or actions that specifically or implicitly incite racism. In a recent case, A.E. 11280/02 Central Elections Committee et al v. Ahmad Tibi et al (15.05.2003), the Supreme Court held that because this Basic Law relates to a fundamental right of free expression, a narrower meaning of racial incitement would be applied. Thus, the Court upheld the participation in the elections of an individual who had previous connections to a racist party as well as that of an Arab candidate who did not fully support the existence of a Jewish State.

28. According to the Law of Associations, 5750-1980 ("The Law of Associations") (last amended on 11 June 2000) any group of two or more persons may form an association for non-profit purposes. The Registrar of Associations is bound by law to register all associations unless it fulfills one of the following:

- 28.1. The association denies the State of Israel's right of existence.
- 28.2. The association denies the democratic nature of the State.
- 28.3. There is a reasonable belief that the association will act as a guise for illegal activity.

29. Israel's Penal Law 5737-1977 ("The Penal Law") too counters discrimination by prohibiting racial incitement and other related offences and was recently amended to include additional offence related to racial hatred (See Article 4 below).

3. Measures to review, amend, rescind or nullify governmental, national and local policies that create or perpetuate racial discrimination

I. Legislative measures

Removing the nationality clause from Israel's identity cards

30. The Government has decided to delete the nationality clause from Israeli identity cards. The Minister of the Interior announced this decision in March 2002, and the Constitution and Law Committee of the Knesset subsequently approved this decision. Accordingly, Regulation 2A (5) of the Registration of the Population (Details in Identity Cards) Regulation 5750 - 1990, which stipulated that the nationality would appear in the identity card, was repealed.

Enhancing infrastructure within Israel's Arab sector

Planning in the Arab sector

31. During the last few years, the Israeli Government has placed an emphasis on improving the infrastructure and increasing the development rate in Arab villages and towns. To this end, the Government has promoted local outline plans (for the development of Arab villages and towns) and allocated funds to support their development.

32. The Government adopted a series of decisions giving priority to the preparation of outline and zone plans in the Arab sector (January 1998, March 2000, June 2004). The budget for the preparation of the outline and zone plans is approximately 56 million NIS. Furthermore, a national project to promote outline and zone plans in the Arab sector is currently executed in approximately 60% of the Arab sector localities and may be expanded in the future.

33. These plans are meant to respond to the expected population growth in the Arab sector until the year 2020 and to allocate sufficient land to this end. Where there is need for public lands, the Israel Land Administration (ILA) allocates land for the purpose of establishing public institutions and housing for residents who are not landowners. A comprehensive national outline plan, dealing with construction, development and preservation (National Outline Plan #35) is near completion and will be presented for governmental approval during 2005.

34. Naturally, the plan includes Arab towns and villages. The explanatory notes attached to this plan outline, inter alia, several guiding principles for the development of Arab communities. The rationale behind these guidelines is to tailor a response to the special needs of the Arab sector in order to close the gaps and achieve equality between the Jewish and the Arab sectors. This plan is based on the principles of affirmative action and includes preferential budget allocation, loans, and designation of certain Arab towns and villages as preferred development zones.

Recent developments

35. In March 2000, the Government promoted planning initiatives in 21 towns and villages in the Arab sector in five districts. To date, planning has commenced in two districts. The budget allocated for this project amounts to 17.7 million NIS for 2001-2003.

36. Additionally, the Planning Administration and ILA are working on outline plans for 36 Bedouin and Arab towns and villages in northern Israel. Planning has already been completed for 34 of these communities, as will be discussed in Article 5. An inter-ministerial committee headed by the Ministry of the Interior in cooperation with the Ministry of Construction and Housing is currently preparing outline plans for an additional seven Druze, Bedouin and Arab towns. Five more communities await approval of completed outline plans.

37. In addition, in order to bridge the gaps between the Arab and Jewish populations, the Government has adopted a Multi-Year Plan to Ensure Equality of the Arab population in the Social, Cultural and Economic Arena (described in detail below).

II. Judicial measures

Amending discriminatory land allocation policies

38. In H.C.J 6698/95 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (ILA) (08.03.2000), The High Court of Justice held that the State of Israel was prohibited from allocating State land to the Jewish Agency for Israel for the purpose of establishing a community which would discriminate between Jews and non-Jews. The petitioners, an Arab couple, wished to build a home in Katzir, a communal village in the Eron River region at the north of Israel. Katzir was established in 1982 by the Jewish Agency in collaboration with the Katzir Cooperative Society, on State land that was allocated to the Jewish Agency (via the Israel Lands Administration) for such a purpose.

39. The Katzir Cooperative Society only accepted Jewish members. As such, it refused to accept the petitioners and allow them to build their home in the communal village of Katzir. The petitioners claimed that the policy constituted discrimination on the basis of religion or nationality and that such discrimination with regard to State land is prohibited by law.

40. The court held in the Ka'adan case that the State may not allocate land directly to its citizens on the basis of religion or nationality. This conclusion is derived both from the values of Israel as a democratic State and from the values of Israel as a Jewish State. The Jewish character of the State does not permit Israel to discriminate between its citizens. In Israel, Jews and non-Jews are citizens with equal rights and responsibilities. The court emphasized that the State will be viewed as engaging in impermissible discrimination even if it is also willing to allocate State land for the purpose of establishing an exclusively Arab town, as long as it permits a group of Jews, without distinguishing characteristics, to establish an exclusively Jewish town on State land.

41. Moreover, the Supreme Court held that the State may not allocate land to the Jewish Agency knowing that the Agency will only permit Jews to use the land, saying that where one may not discriminate directly, one may not discriminate indirectly. If the State, through its own actions, may not discriminate on the basis of religion or nationality, it may not facilitate such discrimination by a third party. It does not change matters that the third party is the Jewish Agency. Even if the Jewish Agency may distinguish between Jews and non-Jews, it may not do so in the allocation of State land.

42. It should be noted that the Court limited its decision in the Ka'adan case to the specific facts of this case. The general issue of the use of State lands for the purposes of land development raises a wide-range of questions, which are yet to be resolved. First, Ka'adan is not directed at past allocations of State land. Second, it focuses on the particular circumstances of the communal village of Katzir. In discussing this issue, the Court did not take a position with regard to other types of settlements (such as the commune-based Kibbutz or Moshav) or to the possibility that special circumstances, beyond the type of establishment, may be relevant, stating that:

“[I]t is important to understand and remember that today we are taking the first step in a sensitive and difficult journey. It is wise to proceed slowly, so that we do not stumble and fall, and instead we will proceed cautiously at every stage, according to the circumstances of each case.”

43. The Court rendered the decision that the State of Israel must consider the petitioners' request to acquire land for themselves in the town of Katzir for the purpose of building their home. The State must make this consideration based on the principle of equality, and considering various relevant factors - including those factors affecting the Jewish Agency and the current residents of Katzir. The State of Israel must also consider the numerous legal issues. Based on these considerations, the State must determine with deliberate speed whether to allow the petitioners to make a home within the communal town of Katzir.

44. As a response to the Ka'adan ruling, the Israel Land Administration, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency for Israel, issued new admission criteria to be applied uniformly to all applicants seeking to move into small, communal settlements established on State-owned lands. These criteria stipulate that applicants must be over the age of 20, apply as an individual or a couple (including families), maintain sufficient economic resources, and maintain suitability to a small communal regime.

45. If the Committee rejects an application for admission, the reasons for rejection are to be based upon an objective, professional and independent opinion. Any criterion for admission to particular settlements is to be assessed in advance by the Administration and publicized. A decision by the Israel Land Administration also requires additional criteria to be included in the settlement's Articles of Association. The inclusion of additional criteria in the Articles of Association requires approval by the Cooperative Associations Registrar.

46. The decisions of the aforementioned committees are subject to review by a Public Appeals Committee, to be chaired by a retired judge. Application forms and rules of procedure of the Appeals Committee are to be made available to the public.

47. A similar case still pending before the High Court of Justice is H.C.J 5601/00 Ibrahim Dwiri v. Israel Land Administration et al. The issue raised in this petition is the request of the Dwiri family to acquire a piece of land in the neighborhood of Kibbutz Hasollelim's expansion area, which was dismissed by the Kibbutz. Following the filing of the petition, the parties, the Dwiri family, the Kibbutz and the State, reached an agreement that the family would undergo the same selection/screening and acceptance procedures as any other entity interested in purchasing land in this neighborhood. In the framework of these procedures, the Kibbutz acceptance committee, on the basis of the opinion of the Institute of Evaluation which examined the family, concluded that the Dwiri family does not harmonize with the Kibbutz way of life. The family issued a counter opinion.

Other

48. In 1997, The Legal Center for the Rights of Arabs in Israel petitioned the High Court of Justice, demanding that the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport apply the Education and Welfare Services reinforcement programs in the Arab municipalities, as well as the Jewish ones (H.C.J 2814/97 The High Follow-up Committee on Matters of Arab Education in Israel et al. v. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport (20.07.2000)).

49. On July 20, 2000, the High Court of Justice rejected the petition, finding that recent action by the Government to bolster the Arab sector via affirmative action and an injection of public funds specifically designated to amend admitted previous discriminatory practices, merits dismissal of the petition.

50. Similarly, Adalah, The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel petitioned the High Court of Justice in November, 2004, to compel the government to adopt regulations regarding the holy places of the non-Jewish population offering the same protections that have been established via regulations promulgated regarding the Jewish population's holy sites. The case is pending before the Court.

51. The Courts' support for affirmative action policies is demonstrated in previous Supreme Court rulings (H.C.J 528/88 Avitan v. Israel Lands Administration and Others, 25.10.1989; H.C.J 453/94 Israel Women's Network v. Government of Israel, 01.11.1994).

4. Measures to end discrimination by individuals and organizations

52. Racism, in its various manifestations is considered a criminal offence in Israel, as discussed in Article 4 below.

I. Legislative measures

(A) Increasing proportional representation in Israel's Civil Service and within governmental corporations

53. The Civil Service Law requires that the Israeli civil service maintain fair representation in terms of appointments. According to the Law, the government is entitled to apply an affirmative action policy to allocate certain positions to under-represented groups for the purpose of attaining fair representation.

54. In 2001, the Government stated in its Statement of Basic Principles that it will strive to create positions in the civil service, at the highest levels, for persons from the Arab sector. As discussed below in Article 5, there have been major improvements in the Arab representation in the civil service, with a growing increase of minority employees every year. Indeed, the Government established fixed target figures for the number of employees from the minority population, as discussed in Article 5 below.

55. The Government of Israel has also moved to boost minority representation within government-owned corporations. Under a June 2000 amendment to the Government Corporations Law, 5735-1975 ("The Government Corporations Law") (Amendment 11), the minority population must be appropriately represented on the board of directors of every governmental corporation.

56. In addition, the law prescribes that until appropriate representation is achieved, ministers must appoint as many Arab directors as possible. Article 60 (a) of the Government Corporations Law extends the application of Amendment 11 to appointments to the board of directors of statutory corporations and other statutory organizations.

57. Article 18 (a) (1) mandates the directorate of government corporations to reflect the governmental policy of fair representation. Moreover, the new amendment empowers the government to do its utmost to appoint directors from the Arab population until the goals of the amendment are met. The Attorney-General provided government ministers with guidance regarding implementation of the new standards.

58. In addition, a government sub-committee was established to monitor efforts to enforce the new affirmative action measures. Between January 2000 and 2005, Arab representation in government corporations had nearly tripled to 46 representatives (7.97%, compared to 1.7% in 2000).

59. A group of Israeli NGOs has created a database of Arab candidates who might qualify for senior government corporation positions. The information is available to the Authority for Government Corporations. There are also efforts to create an official database of qualified minority candidates for senior government corporation positions.

60. In addition to increasing representation of minority groups, the civil service sector has also taken steps to better accommodate the different lifestyles of minority employees at work. Holiday and vacation time is provided according to the minority groups' relevant religious holidays; such that Muslim employees are entitled to a day-off during the Ramadan, and Christians can choose Sunday as their day off from work. Furthermore, the civil service recognizes different mourning periods for different religious and ethnic groups. As a result, a Druze employee may observe a longer mourning period than a Jewish colleague.

(B) The Law for the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places

61. The recent enactment of the Law for the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places has substantially limited the possibility of discrimination occurring in the private sector. Under Article 3 (a) of this law, a provider of products or services to the public, or anyone engaged in the operation of a public place, is prohibited from discriminating on the basis of race, religion or religious affiliation, nationality, country of origin, sex, sexual orientation, views, political affiliation, personal status, or physical disability. Articles 5 and 9 of the law make such discrimination both a civil wrong, enforceable under the provisions of the Tort Ordinance, 5728-1968, ("The Tort Ordinance"), and a criminal offence, punishable by a fine. Article 11 applies the provisions of this law to the State as well and sets out the legal standards for assessing discriminatory acts.

(C) The Rights of the Patient Law, 5756-1996 ("The Rights of the Patient Law")

62. Article 4 to the Rights of the Patient Law provides that a health care provider may not discriminate against patients on the basis of religion, race, sex, nationality, country of origin, sexual orientation or for any other reason.

(D) 1995 Amendment to the Equal Opportunities in Employment Law, 5748-1988 ("The Equal Opportunities in Employment Law")

63. The 1995 Amendment to the Equal Opportunities in Employment Law expanded the application of anti-discrimination legislation to the private sector. The law prohibits discrimination by an employer who employs six or more employees. Originally, discrimination was defined as "discrimination by reason of sex, family status, parentage or sexual preference". In 1995, this law was amended to prohibit discrimination based on "national ethnic origin, country of origin, beliefs, political views, political party affiliation or age". The law also prohibits recruiting practices that have a discriminatory effect.

II. Judicial measures

64. Some legal commentators are of the opinion that the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, 5752-1992 ("The Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty"), which serves as a cornerstone for prohibiting discrimination, also applies to private entities. While the Supreme Court has yet to rule decisively on this matter, several lower courts have applied this Basic Law to private individuals as well.

Prohibiting discrimination by private enterprises

65. An example of a lower court barring discrimination in the private sphere prior to the enactment of the Law for the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places is the Kalia case (C.C 11258/93 Ibrahim Na'amna et al v. Kibbutz Kalia et al (01.09.1996)). There, the Magistrate Court of Jerusalem invoked the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, as well as international norms, to support its finding that a private amusement park may not discriminate with regard to its entrance policies.

5. Measures to encourage integrationist multiracial organizations

66. There are a number of multiracial organizations in Israel, principally operating with the goal of enhancing cross-cultural understanding and mutual existence. As discussed further in Article 7 below, the activities range from youth orchestras to educational centers such as Givat Haviva.

B. Social, economic, and cultural measures to ensure development and protection of racial groups

67. In line with the judicial and legislative measures and policies outlined above, the Government of Israel has turned its attention to developing proactive policies aimed at encouraging the development of racial groups, enhancing diversity, and preserving ethnic traditions and cultures.

Multi-year plan to extend equality to various social, cultural and economic arenas

68. In a sweeping effort that entrenches the principles of CERD, within the domestic context, the Government of Israel has embarked on a comprehensive initiative to promote development within the Arab sector, Israel's largest minority community. This multi-year plan goes beyond legislation in addressing gaps in the social, economic and cultural fields. In essence, this initiative seeks to promote equality in Israel by developing increased social services, economic opportunities, and cultural facilities.

69. In October 2000, the Government submitted a comprehensive scheme, designed by nearly all government agencies, addressing all aspects of development in the Arab sector. Israel Government Decision No. 2467 established a multiyear development plan for the Arab-Israeli sector (hereinafter: "the plan"). This plan emphasizes the government's duty to eliminate gaps between Jews and Arabs and to promote equality and fair conditions concerning economic and social welfare.

70. The preparatory work for this plan involved nearly all governmental agencies. The plan operated from 2001 until December 31, 2004, with an overall budget of 3.9 billion NIS. The Government successfully implemented 88% of the plan; furthermore, the Government has decided to finalize all uncompleted projects by December 31, 2006.

71. Some important aspects of the plan are translated below, including the sums (in NIS) of actual funds that were disbursed during the years 2001-2003.

A. General

72. The government of Israel regards itself as obligated to act to grant equal and fair conditions to Israeli Arabs in the socio-economic sphere, in particular in the areas of education, housing and employment.

Arab-sector communities, including one billion NIS as an additional payment from the Ministry of Finance for the budget of the ministries .These budgets include the share granted to the Arab-sector communities in the development budgets of the government ministries.

77. The development plan shall apply to Arab local authorities and Arab communities located within regional councils.

78. An inter-ministerial team, headed by the Prime Minister's Office, with the participation of the Ministry of Finance and other ministerial representatives, as required, shall coordinate staff activities, including status of implementation, planning of operations, identification of priorities, allotments of budgetary amounts and setting performance timetables. The inter-ministerial team shall oversee and control the status of implementation of the development plan by the government ministries and, in cooperation with the representatives of the Arab sector, shall perform an annual survey of plan performance.

79. Recognizing the importance of addressing the economic and social gaps in the Arab minority sector, the Prime Minister in 2003 further pushed for the integration of the Arab sector into the civil service and governmental corporations. He initiated the establishment of a Public Complaint service for the Arab minority, economic development plans that integrated the Arab municipalities with the regional sectors, a Permanent Council for addressing problems of relations and pressing issues between Arabs and Jews, and demanded the governmental ministries (noted below) to submit proper plans that address the problems of the minority Arab sector.

An average 10 million NIS will be spent annually in the years 2001-04 in order to complete this project.*

91. *By developing new neighborhoods on private lands, the aid will include funding for planning (at the detailed plan stage), in addition to contributions toward development in an amount not exceeding 50% of the approved infrastructure tariffs up to a ceiling of 20,000 NIS per residential unit. In the years 2001-2003, the actual dispersed funds totaled 1.9 billion NIS

123. Although the economic situation has led the Government to decide on an overall cutback of 8% of the State's total budget, the plan's budget was reduced only by 30 million NIS and most ministries did not implement this cutback. Figures show that during 2001 and 2002, out of 1.74 billion NIS that had been allocated for the plan, 1.57 billion NIS had been expended (a 90% implementation rate).

124. All of the development plans in the areas of sewage infrastructure, road infrastructure, communal bodies and the construction of classrooms (save for the construction of classrooms using PFI tender methods) were executed at a pace faster than planned.

125. Incomplete implementation of the plan in some cases is due to the aforementioned cutbacks, as well as bureaucratic barriers and budget deficits in some of the municipalities where cooperation is required for the successful implementation of the plan.

126. The actual use of the allocated resources is not uniform. In some instances, tenders have been published, and funds transferred to municipalities, though not necessarily spent. In other instances, budgets have been limited for particular projects. At present, the budgets for 73 Arab towns and villages have been set directly by the Prime Minister's Office. Furthermore, the Government has successfully implemented effective solutions to sewage problems in those towns and villages.

127. The Prime Minister's Office decided in mid-2002 to hire a private accountant, to better and more closely monitor implementation of the plan. The accountant provided an interim report in November 2002, detailing budget allocation in light of actual expenditures in the plan's first two years.

128. Thus far, the following funds have been spent for the years 2001-2003:

128.1. Ministry of the Interior - 259 million NIS;

128.10. Ministry of Public Security - 90 million NIS;

128.11. Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport - 9.7 million NIS.

Bedouins in the Negev

129. The Bedouin population resides in both the North and the South of the country. The government has initiated a number of plans that address the concerns and needs of the Bedouin population, as fully described in Article 5 below. The key goals of the plans are to allow for sustainable integration of the Bedouin population into the State, while maintaining their traditional practices and lifestyle. All of the plans involve active societal participation of the relevant tribes and communities and strive to properly compensate and integrate the Bedouin population into Israeli society.

I. Pedagogic programs to foster democracy and tolerance

130. Under the guidance of its pedagogical department, the Ministry of Education has made a concerted effort to advance the principles of democracy and coexistence in its curriculum, and through this framework, works to combat all forms of discrimination. In the academic year 2001, the Ministry of Education funded a number of programs with costs totalling 8 million NIS. For more detailed information, see below Article 7.

II. Affirmative action in higher education

131. A special sub-Committee of the Council for Higher Education in Israel examined the state of Arab students in Israel and prepared a comprehensive report on the subject. The Council for Higher Education subsequently adopted the report's key recommendations in January 2002. One significant recommendation worth highlighting here is the adoption of an affirmative action policy in higher education.

III. Appointment of minority judges

132. In the Judicial system there are currently 526 judges and 77 registrars functioning. In the Supreme Court, out of the 14 justices, one is of Arab origin. In the District Courts 3 Christian judges and 4 Muslim judges are active. In the Magistrate Courts 11 Christian judges, 6 Muslim judges and 5 Druze judges are active. One Christian judge serves on the District Labor Court. In total 30 judges from minority groups function in the judiciary system. Nine persons from minority groups are active as registrars: one Druze registrar, 6 Muslim registrars and 2 Christian registrars.

IV. Development of industrial zones

133. A new District Outline Plan for the northern district of Israel was deposited on 7.9.1999 for public comments. Hundreds of comments were submitted. The comments were considered and the Plan was adjusted accordingly, such that the Plan is expected to be approved soon. The majority of the suggested development is in the central sector of the Galilee, in which most of the population is Arab. The scheme gives special consideration to the special demographic needs of the Arab population, addressing, among other things, establishing industrial zones (described below). The Ministry of Industry Trade and Labor has devoted 16% of its 2002 budget for this purpose, and in the prior 4 years has devoted on average 15% of its budget for the purpose of encouraging the creation and development of industrial zones in Arab locales.

134. In 2002, the Ministry of ITL's budget for development of industrial zones in minority areas grew from 15 million NIS (in 2001) to 25 million.

Table 1Development budget for industrial areas, 1995-2000 (in millions of NIS)

Year	Budget allocated to minority sector industrial areas	Budget allocated to all industrial areas	Percentage allocation to minority sector (%)
1995	6	163	3.6
1996	30	269	11.1
1997	24	242	9.9
1998	21	222	9.5
1999	23	216	10.6
2000	31	236	13.1

V. Encouraging local entrepreneurs

135. In 2002, four companies established by Arab-Israeli entrepreneurs participated in a biotechnology exhibition sponsored by the Ministry of ITL. This was the first time that Arab-Israelis were able to present their technological contributions to the country on such a level. Moreover, this development underscores the ability of Arab-Israelis to increasingly branch out into fields in which they were traditionally not represented. Already, over 10 companies founded by Arab-Israelis cooperate with technological greenhouses throughout the country. Several of these companies are valued at multi-million dollar levels (2002).

Article 3

136. Apartheid has always been regarded as abhorrent by the Israeli Government and society and continues to be so regarded. Apartheid has never been practiced in Israel. There exist in Israel no restrictions of any kind as to place of residence nor is there any segregation of any kind.

Article 4A. Criminal prosecution of racism*I. The Law

137. As previously reported, Article 144A of the Penal Law provides for a penalty of up to five years' imprisonment for a person who publishes with the intent to incite to racism, or holds such a publication with the intent to publish it.. Racism is defined in the Law as "persecution, humiliation, vilification, the display of enmity or violence, or the causing of animosity towards a community or parts of the population, by reason of color, racial origin or national-ethnic origin".

138. Articles 144 A-E of the Law further prohibit publication or dissemination of materials with the intent to incite to racism, even if ineffectual in result. The punishment is up to five years imprisonment.

139. A major 1994 amendment of Article 144D1 of the Penal Law establishes that a person who commits, out of racist motives, an offence, inter alia, against a person, a person's liberty or property; an offence involving threats or extortion; offences of hooliganism and public disorder or offences by public officials, is liable to the lesser of either double the punishment prescribed for such offence or 10 years' imprisonment.

140. In May 2002, the Knesset further amended Articles 144D2 and 144D3 of the Penal Law criminalizing the publication of a call for acts of violence or terror or even praise, support or encouragement for such an act, support or identification with it, where the call is likely to lead to violence.

141. A more recent amendment, dated November 2004, inserted a section titled "Hate Offences" – consisting of Article 144F - "Offences motivated by racism or hostility towards the public – under "aggravated circumstances" which set the punishment to be emitted by the Court to be either double the penalty set to certain offences or ten years imprisonment, the lesser of the two. This applies if the offence was performed out of racist motives against a population due to religion, religious group, ethnic origin, sexual orientation or due to them being migrant workers.

142. The number of cases under this statute varies every year; most of the indictments involve incitement against the Arab minority. During the years 2000-2002, an increasing number of indictments have been filed against Jews and Arabs based on incitement to racial hatred.

143. Another source of law is Article 133 of the Penal Law that prohibits the encouraging of hatred between different sections of the population. It carries a punishment of up to 5 years imprisonment.

144. In accordance with Article 46 (a) (2) of the Second Authority for Television and Radio Law, 5750-1990 ("The Second Authority for Television and Radio Law"), the holders of licenses for cable TV services must not transmit any broadcast which contains racial incitement. They are further bound to take any measure necessary to ensure that no broadcast is liable to incite to discrimination on grounds of religion, race, nationality, community, lifestyle or origin.

145. In accordance with Article 6(25) of the Telecommunications Law (Bezeq and Broadcasts 5742-1982 ("The Telecommunications Law (Bezeq and Broadcasts)") and article 46 (a) (2) of the Second Authority for Television and Radio Law, the cable TV concession holders shall not transmit any broadcast which contains racial incitement. Concession holders are further bound to take all measures necessary to ensure that no broadcast is liable to incite to discrimination on grounds of religion, race, nationality, community, lifestyle or origin. The Communications Act further stipulates under Article 6(57) that this obligation also applies to satellite broadcasts.

146. The defamation of any group as such, including national, racial or religious groups, is prohibited by law (Article 4 of the Prohibition of Defamation Law, 5725-1965 ("The Prohibition of Defamation Law").

147. The Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 5708-1948, addresses individuals supporting a terrorist organization. Article 4(b), for example, stipulates that a person, either verbally or in written form, who publicly praises, favors, or calls for support or assistance to a terrorist organization will be charged with committing an offence. Accordingly, several racist organizations were declared terror organizations. The law enforcement authorities and the judiciary are striving to strike the balance between enforcing these laws and respecting the right to freedom of expression.

148. Given the rise of incidents of racist taunts and physical violence in sports events, the Vilan Committee was established as per a Knesset directive in 2001 to investigate the phenomena and propose needed solutions. The Committee's initial findings from 2001 called for rules that would enhance punishment and increase deterrence against the use of racist and offensive expressions. The Committee indicated that fans and the teams should be directly penalized and educational programs should be adopted promoting fair play and sportsmanship.

149. In November, 2004, the Vilan Committee proposed an amendment to the Security in Public Places Law, 5723-1962 ("The Security in Public Places Law"), adding on sections preventing individuals from entering sports arenas with weapons or pyrotechnic instruments, and disallowing any types of racist exclamations during a sporting event. The proposed punishment is up to one year imprisonment and the draft law has been presented to the Constitution and Law Committee in the Knesset.

II. Judicial perspectives

150. The possessor of racist material, with the intention of distributing it, is liable to one year's imprisonment and the material is to be confiscated. As previously reported, in the case of C.A. 2831/95, Ido Alba v. The State of Israel (24.9.96) the Supreme Court considered an appeal against a conviction for incitement to racism and set an important precedent. The Supreme Court quoted specifically Article 4 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination that mandates a State to punish all forms of racism. The Court also stated, inter alia:

"The appearance on the scene (in the seventies) of the Kach movement which called for the creation of a Jewish State based on Jewish law and excluding non-Jews brought to a public platform a political party based on a racist ideology ...

This led to legislation intended to combat racism...

Racism is no longer only a belief in racist theories; it is also a hatred of strangers as such on the basis of different racial or national-ethnic background. Such hatred is an ancient social malaise. The Israeli legislation is intended to eradicate such racism (Justice Matza paras. 11, 12, 15).

Racism is destructive of the democratic social fabric. It violates Israel's international obligations and the need to combat racism is one of the lessons the Jewish people have learned from their history. Every democracy is therefore entitled to abrogate the principle of freedom of speech insofar as incitement to racism is involved (Justice Barak, para. 4)."

151. Another noteworthy case is A.C.C.1789/98 The State of Israel v. Benjamin Kahane (27.11.2000): Following the publication and distribution of a Kahane Chai leaflet which called for the destruction of Arab villages in Israel, the State charged Benjamin Kahane with incitement, a criminal offense under Articles 133 and 134(3) of the Penal Law. In finding Kahane guilty of these offenses, the Court ruled that the offense of incitement was designed not only to protect the stability of the State, but only to preserve community bonds among the State's citizens. This ruling is significant insofar as it has extended the scope of the criminal offense and may facilitate future prosecution of parties calling for acts of violence against minority groups.

152. The State indicted Tatyana Suskin for posting leaflets in Hebron which depicted the Prophet Mohamed as a pig, standing on the Quran. She was charged, among other things, with committing an act of racism and offending religious sensitivity, violations of Article 144(d)(1)(a) and 173 of Israel's Criminal Code. The District Court found Suskin guilty on all charges and sentenced her to two years imprisonment and one year suspended imprisonment (Cr.C 436/97 The State of Israel v. Tatiana Suskin (30/12/1997)). The Supreme Court declined the defendant's appeal.

153. The Supreme Court has even upheld a prolonged detention for an individual accused of committing a hate crime against a religious institution. In Hazut v. State of Israel, the accused physically removed foundation stones from a mosque in Tiberius. Given the strong evidence provided to the Court and the gravity of the offence, the Court upheld the lower court's extension of his pre-trial detention (C.R. 8971/00 Avshalom Hazut v. The State of Israel (14.12.2000)). Similar detentions were upheld by the Supreme Court in C.R. 2714/01 Gadi Levanon v. The State of Israel (15.04.2001) and in C.R. 8169/00 David Ben-Ami v. The State of Israel (19.11.2000), where the defendants committed assault out of racist motives.

154. In a Magistrate Court decision (Cr.C 3709/02, The State of Israel v. Cohen Yossef (16.06.2004)); the Court upheld an indictment against the accused who shouted "Death to Arabs" at a soccer game with intent to incite racism. Despite the protestations of the accused that he was merely shouting slogans along with other spectators who were caught up in the heat of the match, the Court held that the gravity of the remarks dictated the indictment under Article 144 B of the Penal Law.

155. In the Tel-Aviv Magistrate Court, a police officer was convicted of assault and battery committed out of racist motives and of abuse of authority. Specifically, the officer assaulted the victim in a demeaning manner. He was sentenced to 6 months of imprisonment and 8 months suspended sentence and ordered to pay 10,000 NIS compensation to the victim. The Court rejected the appeal against the verdict but suspended the sentence because the officer's wife was dying (Cr.C 71188/00 Ron Forbet v. The State of Israel (28.12.2000)).

156. The Kfar-Saba Magistrate Court recently convicted two individuals who were indicted in offences of vandalism, the destruction of real estate and publication of racial incitement (the accused drew graffiti on walls stating – "Kahana was right" and "deport the Arabs"). The Court examined Article 144B of the Penal Law and concluded that the graffiti's text constituted racial incitement, and that the relevant text is the external-verbal expression of the political racial idea. In addition, the circumstances of the cases show the defendants' awareness to the criminality of their acts and therefore the criminal intention to incite against Arabs is clear (Cr.C 2110/03 The State of Israel v. Pniri and Shriki (05/01/05)).

157. There are several indictments filed for offences related to racism, that are currently pending in the Courts:

Incitement to racism on the Internet

158. A special department in the State Attorney's Office (the Department for Special Functions) deals with prosecution of incitement in general, and recently also handles cases of incitement on the internet. The department files indictments on the basis of investigations conducted by the police. For example, in CC 3878/04, the accused established a Neo-Nazi web site with racial expressions, incitement to violence, racial insults, denial of the Holocaust and insults to the Israeli flag. The accused was convicted, among other offences, of incitement to violence and publication of incitement to racism (Articles 144D2 and 144B of the Penal Law) in January 2005. His sentence is expected to be handed down in May 2005.

159. In some cases, it was decided not to initiate an investigation, but to warn those responsible or draw their attention to the limits imposed upon certain publications. For example, a director of a web site removed racial jokes against Arabs along with a statement that there was no intention to incite to racism, following a warning from the Deputy attorney General.

Article 5

A. The right to equal treatment before the national tribunals

160. The right to equal treatment for all persons regardless of their race or ethnic origin is a basic and fundamental principle in Israel. All governmental bodies and judicial apparatus recognize this right, maintain and uphold equal treatment for all individuals.

Training for law enforcement officers

Israeli Police

161. Human rights' education for public officials responsible for law enforcement is of vital importance to forestall violations of human rights in criminal justice. Israeli Police works together with the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) in devising Police training programs in the field of civil rights for several reasons.

162. The Israel Police attach the greatest importance to educating those serving in its ranks regarding the need to defend the rights of the ordinary citizen in a democratic society. Police officers are constantly required to find the balance between the need to fulfill their functions to maintain law and order (implicit within this is the need to arrest and detain individuals, acts which deny them of their freedoms) while protecting and preserving basic human rights, a seemingly contradictory situation. Police personnel should be able to balance these two sometimes-opposing interests so that they exercise their authority while reducing to a minimum any violation of civil rights.

163. The Israel Police operate various educational programs within its formal training course and during the course of service in the police department. In large part, these programs are designed to provide knowledge and awareness regarding human rights to police officers and to ensure equal enforcement of the law and a better understanding of the diverse communities living in Israel whom the Police are protecting.

164. The Israel Police have initiated a wide variety of educational activities in this sphere in the form of workshops, weekly lessons and refresher courses of various durations in which all levels of Police officers participate.

165. For example, in preparation for the International Human Rights Day on December 2002, a visual presentation was given to all Police Units and was placed on the Police Internet Website, where it was available to all ranks.

166. In 2002 the Police decided to focus on the issue of Human Rights from the perspective of the inherent civil right to demonstrate. This issue was chosen because general elections were to be held in 2003. Throughout 2003, the Police's Educational Program focused on conflicts in Israeli society, prejudice and tolerance. The Israel Police is doing all in its power to ensure that the messages inherent in these Programs are adapted and implemented.

167. Additional educational activities include for example:

- 167.1. Inter-cultural encounters - These workshops, led by numerous experts during training and service, seek to eliminate stereotypes related to new immigrants and minority populations.
- 167.2. Holocaust awareness - This subject is covered by visits to museums including Yad Vashem, and by seminars designed to strengthen humanitarian and democratic understanding among police officers.
- 167.3. Human rights seminars - The Israel Police works in collaboration with the education department of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) to design activities and workshops for its basic training courses. During these seminars, officers are exposed to Israel's Basic Laws regarding human rights and their real-world implications by conducting simulations designed to convey the difficulties that may arise when rights are threatened or violated.
- 167.4. Dialogue on Rights in the Galilee - The subject of working with Israel's Arab community has been a central issue for many years at Israel's Police Academy. However, since the riots of October 2000, the Israel Police has sought to expand its training in this area through the creation of additional opportunities for dialogue. With the cooperation of "Adam Nof", an Israeli NGO, officers are taking part in interesting and unique meetings with Arab residents of the Galilee that facilitate different attitudes and new sensibilities.
- 167.5. Ethic workshops - The Education Department of the Israel Police conducts approximately 90 ethics seminars annually. Most of the topics relate to human rights and prevention of discrimination and serve to clarify the Police's role and the expectations placed on officers.
- 167.6. Trafficking in persons training - ACRI, in association with the "Hotline for Migrant Workers" have built a training program on the topic of trafficking in persons. The purpose of the program is to familiarize police personnel with the phenomenon, both in the human context, to understand the experience through the victims' eyes, and in the social context, to understand the social causes of the phenomenon. The actual training of police personnel is in the form of workshops and seminars.

168. Furthermore, every police officer joining the Immigration Administration must go through a specific training program focusing, among other things, on the perception of migrant workers as victims of economic distress rather than offenders, and providing the officers with tools to handle delicate situations. They are also provided with training on the phenomenon of trafficking in persons and identifying its victims.

Measures for the investigation of complaints

169. The authorities in Israel investigate any complaint against law enforcement officers. In 1992, an independent department within the Ministry of Justice, the Department for Investigation of Police Officers, was established. This Department is charged with investigating any complaints of involvement of police personnel in the commission of offences.

170. The Department for Investigation of Police Officers is headed by an attorney who is entrusted with authority equivalent to a District Attorney, and aided by police investigators. The Department handles any complaint regarding offences punishable by one year of imprisonment or more. These offences cover cases of unlawful or excessive use of force and related offences. The Department may recommend the initiation of administrative and/or criminal proceedings against a suspected policeman, and in some cases the Department itself handles the criminal proceedings.

171. Any person, whether a national of Israel or otherwise, may file a complaint with the department, directly or via mail, fax or e-mail. Complaints filed with the Police are immediately transferred to the Department.

172. Data on cases handled by the Department does not include specific information on the age or nationality of the complainants, as part of its policy of equally addressing all complaints. During 2001, the Department received 5,896 complaints. 2,362 complaints were found to be within the authority of the Department and were investigated. In 29% of the investigations, the initiation of criminal or administrative proceedings was recommended (Please see table below).

173. Distribution of the complaints investigated by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in 2001:

Table 1
Complaints investigated by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers

Recommendation of the Department	Number of cases
Criminal proceedings	199
Administrative proceedings	225
No evidence of guilt	327
Non-sufficient evidence	559
Lack of public interest	134
Offender unknown	74
On-going investigation	884
Total	2 362

174. A total of 6,355 complaints were filed against police personnel during 2002, and 442 of the complaints received and investigated resulted in the initiation of administrative and/or criminal proceedings against the suspected officer (close to 28% of the complaints received and investigated). This level of proceedings is an indication of the extent of law enforcement and the equality in which the law enforcement agencies treat any violation of the law, especially by those entrusted to uphold it.

175. There have been claims of excessive police violence by a variety of individuals (from both the majority and minority population alike). As a result, the Knesset Committee on Internal Affairs and the Environment, along with the Constitution and Law Committee recently discussed the matter to determine if further action or legal oversight is required. In the most recent session in November 2004, the panel heard testimony from Russian immigrants and Arabs about alleged excessive use of force by the police. At the session, the Department for Investigation of Police Officers reported that they usually conclude their investigation within a three-month period. It was further noted that 20% of submitted complaints usually warrant further action. 40% of these cases warranting further action are then either transferred onward to the Prosecutors Office, with the remaining being addressed via internal disciplinary procedures. Of the cases eventually heard by a Court, 90% of the time the officer is found to have committed a violation. The Police further noted that many of the submitted complaints are usually of a trivial nature that are suited for the Police's Internal Public Complaints Unit, given the lack of any potential criminal violation by the Police.

General - the Ombudsman

176. The Ombudsman investigates complaints against bodies that are by law subject to auditing by the State Comptroller, such as government ministries, local authorities, state enterprises and institutions and government corporations. The Ombudsman also investigates complaints against the employees of these bodies.

177. Complaints relating to the activities of public bodies which the law does not authorize the Ombudsman to investigate, such as banks, insurance companies and other non-governmental entities that serve the public, are often forwarded to the bodies statutorily charged with their supervision, examples being the Supervisor of Banks, Supervisor of Insurance and Director of Capital, Insurance and Savings. Thus, the Ombudsman is an effective address for dealing with problems of discrimination within a broad array of governmental and public institutions.

178. A complaint is subject to investigation by the Ombudsman if it involves an act that is injurious to or withholds a benefit from the complainant. In addition, the act must have been committed contrary to law, or without lawful authority, or contrary to good administration, or involves a too inflexible attitude or flagrant injustice.

179. When a complaint is submitted, the Ombudsman opens an investigation. The Ombudsman may discontinue an investigation if grounds do not exist, the matter has been rectified, or the complainant withdrew the complaint.

180. The Ombudsman may investigate a complaint in any manner he sees fit and is not bound by rules of procedure or rules of evidence. He may hear any person if he deems it beneficial and he may require any person or body to give him any documents or information that are likely, in his opinion, to assist in the investigation of the complaint.

181. Any person may submit a complaint to the Ombudsman free of charge. The complainant is only required to sign the complaint and state his name and address.

B. Security of the person

182. Israel's official database for the criminal system only classifies indictments or sentences on the basis of the underlying charge(s). Hence although the database might be divided by offenses, such as physical offenses, sexual offenses, or fraud, there is no way of identifying whether a complainant is from the minority population.

183. However, complaints against police officers regarding racial discrimination or racially motivated abuse are vigorously investigated by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice. As a result, during the reporting period the State has filed several indictments against officers who have mistreated individuals via undue physical violence, mistreating individuals in custody etc. In all these instances, the officers were indicted under the Penal Law and the State intends to fully prosecute and punish them.

184. Note as well the criminal cases mentioned in Article 4, above, including cases involving police officers. Those cases involved racist acts against individuals from the minority population. In these cases, the Courts have not hesitated to impose severe sentences and to ensure public safety by not releasing the defendants for the duration of the trial.

The "Orr Commission"

185. During mass violent demonstrations and riots in Northern Arab towns in October, 2000, 14 Israeli citizens were killed. The Government decided to establish the Orr Commission, headed by Supreme Court Justice Theodore Orr, in order to examine the above-mentioned events and recommend the proper course of action, regarding participating individuals as well as overlying apparatus and institutions.

186. The Government responded to the Orr Commission Report by adopting, on September 14, 2003, Resolution No. 772 upon which the Government adopted as a whole all aspects of the report relating to the functioning, status, and personal future of all persons mentioned in the report. In addition, as to the overall recommendations and conclusions that require further inquiry and deliberations, the Government established a Ministerial Committee, the "Lapid Committee", headed by the (then) Minister of Justice. The Lapid Committee held more than 25 meetings, visited relevant areas, and further examined reports, submissions and other documents.

187. In the interim, the Israel Police took action to improve relationship with the Arab minority. They recruited more police officers from the minority sector, and have become more involved within the Arab community via meetings with leaders of the Arab community.

188. In May, 2004, the Lapid Committee issued its final findings. The Committee recognized that it is one of the most important, charged and complicated matters confronting the State of Israel and its society.

189. The report and recommendations are divided into two volumes. Volume One deals with the Committee's recommendations regarding the Arab sector and Volume Two deals with the Committee's recommendations regarding the Ministry of Public Security and the Israel Police. The recommendations of the Lapid Committee were instituted as government decisions.

190. It should be noted that many of these recommendations were implemented by the Israel Police and other governmental authorities even prior the publication of the Lapid report.

The recommendations of the "Lapid committee" regarding the Arab sector

191. The report specifies, in great detail, those recommendations of the "Orr Commission" which have already been accepted by the government and the ministerial committee for the non-Jewish sector (headed by the prime minister), and are already being carried out. As for those recommendations of the "Orr Commission" which have not been met by government decisions, the "Lapid committee" found it necessary to recommend the following:

- 191.1. Establishing a governmental authority to promote minority sectors. Establishing a governmental authority to promote and handle the unique problems of the non-Jewish sectors, including matters such as planning and building, budgets, prevention of discrimination and proper representation in State services, promoting education, and integration into the Israeli society and economy. The authority will verify the execution of governmental decisions, follow it, maintain constant contact with the various governmental ministries relating to the handling of minority sectors, and report to the Prime Minister and the ministers' committee.
- 191.2. Incorporating the men and women of the Arab sector into a civilian national service. The Lapid Committee suggested that the government promote the idea of founding a civilian state national service, which will be served by Israeli citizens who are not recruited for military service. As a preliminary stage, this service could be voluntary and within their community. The government will encourage the possibilities of broadening the circle of volunteers from amongst the Arab sector to include the army, the Israeli Police and other functions, and shall examine ways of promoting such voluntary activities.
- 191.3. Outline planning for the Arab towns. The Lapid Committee suggested ordering the minister of the Interior and the Israel Lands Administration, together with the local Arab municipalities, to draw, as soon as possible, outline plans for Arab towns for which plans have not yet been drawn, and to complete the drawing of plans for towns for which the process has already begun, while maintaining constant use of the principle of saturated building. The marketing of lands will be carried out according to needs, and according to proper building principles. The designation of some of the land additions for development will be for the establishing of local and regional employment areas, including the creation of joint industry areas (industrial parks) for Jews and Arabs.

At the same time, the Lapid Committee denounced the phenomenon of illegal building in the Arab sector, as well as in any sector, and recommended taking action against this phenomenon, with all available legal means.

- 191.4. A week of mutual study. Holding a week dedicated to studying about different sectors in society, learning about the components of the Israeli society, and the characteristics of the different sectors and congregations in the Israeli society, while putting an emphasis on the difference in customs, culture, language, etc. and at the same time, emphasizing their equality and citizenship as Israelis. This shall be done with the assistance of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.
- 191.5. The offered week has four levels: theoretical study; meetings; advertising efforts in Hebrew and Arabic; outdoor events demonstrating the culture and customs of the different congregations. The purpose is to show a congregational, religious, national and cultural mosaic, to reflect the uniqueness of each sector under the roof of pluralist Israel, while emphasizing mutual tolerance.
- 191.6. Tolerance Day. Instituting a national “tolerance day” which will express the signs of civic partnership, express the multi-cultured Israeli society, and encourage tolerance and solidarity between all sectors in the State of Israel. Therefore it is suggested to establish a public committee charged with providing actual content to a special day, of a national, joint and uniting manner, that will emphasize the solidarity and tolerance between the sectors, which despite the difference between them are committed to living their lives in harmony, brotherhood and peace.

The recommendations of the “Lapid Committee” regarding the Arab sector’s leadership

192. The committee recommended that the government call upon the leaders of the Arab sector to reach out to the governmental efforts to promote equality between the sectors; while the Israeli government does its best to ensure the rights of Arabs in Israel, on the personal and public levels. It has been specified that the Arabs and Jews should take part together in rehabilitating the relations between the sectors after the October 2000 trauma.

193. It is also suggested that the government call upon the leaders within the Arab public: to avoid words of incitement against the State and its establishments; to denounce any incitement which might result in violence; to condemn any act of violence; to stop any attempt to promote issues, even the most painful and legitimate, in illegal ways; to refrain from blurring the line between a link to the Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and messages which do not coincide with the loyalty every citizen should hold to his own country; to develop a civic consciousness within the Arab sector, while being strict about enforcing local laws, especially to do with building and the collecting of local tax; being strict about displaying the state’s flags and emblems on public buildings and establishments; to encourage the participation of members of the Arab sector in serving the State, including volunteering to functions such as the civil guard; and to contribute to the improvement of the atmosphere between Arabs and Jews through social, educational and cultural co-operation, especially among the youth.

194. The recommendations of the “Lapid Committee” regarding the Ministry of Public Security and the Israel Police.

- 194.1. A major part of the Committee’s work concerned the recommendations of the “Orr Commission” regarding the Israeli Police and the Ministry of Public Security. The Committee was under the impression that the Ministry of Public Security and the Israel Police have taken the recommendations of the “Orr Commission” under consideration and have carried out the necessary conclusions. The aforementioned has been expressed by a number of actions specified in great detail in the “Lapid Committee” report. The Committee has had the efficient co-operation of police members, especially the Police Chief and his deputy.
- 194.2. Today, the Ministry of Public Security and the Israeli Police are better prepared than ever for events of mass violent demonstrations and riots in the manner of October 2000, following the “Orr Commission” Report and the “Lapid Committee” sessions.
- 194.3. The Israeli Police have executed a long list of operational and organizational moves since October 2000, to greatly improve its ability to handle similar challenges.
- 194.4. However, according to the recommendations of the “Orr Commission,” there is a need to provide the Ministry of Public Security and its divisions with the appropriate tools to handle such challenges, and these needs will be presented to the Israeli Government by the Minister of Public Security.
- 194.5. The Committee believes that implementing its recommendations is vital to strengthening the rule of the law and enforcement of law within the Arab sector, while maintaining their civil rights and duties, in the communal, public and criminal arenas. The aforementioned is vital to the building of mutual trust between the Arab citizens of the State of Israel and the law and order enforcement authorities of the State of Israel.

195. Conclusion

- 195.1. The Committee concluded that Israel is committed to a normative change in the mutual relationship between Jews and Arabs, while recognizing the right of each sector to be different from the other. The aforementioned means one should not prevent Arab citizens from expressing their culture and identity. The Government policy is to reach true equality of rights and duties between the citizens, Jews and Arabs alike, as soon as possible.
- 195.2. The great majority of the Arab public is law-abiding. The decisive majority of the Arab Israeli citizens accepts the rules of democratic society and aspires to join in Israeli society. Arab Israeli citizens have the right, as do all other Israeli citizens, to demonstrate and to protest, within the confines of the law, while abiding it.

- 195.3. However, the grievances of the Arab Israeli citizens, as mentioned in the “Orr Commission” report, do not justify by any means the violent events initiated by groups of Arab Israeli citizens in October 2000.
- 195.4. The direct or indirect support of Palestinian terror organizations responsible for murdering Israeli citizens, among whom are Arab victims, is unacceptable.
- 195.5. Furthermore, the State of Israel will not tolerate incitement; and organizing or carrying out of riots and violent uprisings against the State and its institutions.
- 195.6. The Committee stated that the implementation of its recommendations will make an important contribution to disposing of the grievances and tensions which led to the tragic events of October 2000, while maintaining the character of the State of Israel as a democratic Jewish State.
- 195.7. The Committee reported it is honored to bring forth its conclusion and recommendations to the Government and to the Israeli public, Jewish and Arab as one, with hope to bring the hearts closer together, promote equality and incorporation, keep the abiding of the law, brotherhood, co-existence and the promise of life together in peace.

Protection of migrant workers

196. In recent years, the number of migrant workers arriving to Israel in search of work has significantly increased. According to the Central Bureau of statistics, at the end of 2003, there were approximately 189,000 migrant workers, who make up 7.4% of the work force in Israel. Most of these workers have entered Israel illegally or stayed in Israel after the expiry of their visa, with illegal migrant workers reaching a number of around 100,000. According to information provided by the Police Immigration Administration, during 2004, approximately 45,000 illegal migrant workers have left the country, with the authorities responsible for the removal of approximately 19,000 migrant workers, and the rest leaving on their own accord.

197. This situation required some legislation and policy adaptation, and indeed, over the last ten years there have been several key legal initiatives undertaken to amend existing legislation for the purpose of ensuring and protecting migrant workers' rights.

198. Over the last few years, the authorities have turned their attention towards the employers, issuing fines and even revoking business licenses for instances of illegal employment or treatment towards migrant workers (such as withholding wages or breaching contracts).

199. In some cases, workers take substantial loans in order to pay for the right to work in Israel. Israeli law explicitly prohibits collecting fees from such workers, and employment agencies found to be collecting illegal fees, have their licenses revoked.

200. In August 2002 the Government decided on the establishment of an interim Immigration Administration in the Police, to operate until the establishment of a national Immigration Authority.² The national authority would coordinate all aspects of entry into Israel of foreign nationals, including migrant workers. The interim Immigration Administration serves as a focal point for many of the issues relating to migrant workers, including investigations into any allegations of abuse. The interim Administration has been quite active in cooperating with NGOs, addressing complaints, and meeting with foreign representatives. A special unit within that body – the Crime Unit – is charged with investigating offences committed against migrant workers, by employers and others.

201. Furthermore, the Immigration Administration takes pro-active steps, and may investigate behavior of employers even without complaints being filed. The Immigration Administration also focuses on enforcing the law against employers and any other offenders committing offences against migrant workers, in cooperation with the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor. Additionally, since its creation, the administration has been working closely with NGO's, and investigating all allegations made by these organizations.

202. The central piece of legislation relating to migrant workers was enacted in 1991. The Foreign Workers (Prohibition of Unlawful Employment and Assurance of Fair Conditions) Law, 5751-1991 ("The Foreign Workers (Prohibition of Unlawful Employment and Assurance of Fair Conditions) law") was enacted to ensure that violations of the provisions of the law with regard to employment of foreign workers are met with criminal sanctions. The Law was amended in 2000 to ensure that proper working conditions and social rights are provided to workers, and again in 2003 to meet new administrative needs that arose. The Entry into Israel Law, 5712-1952 ("The Entry into Israel Law") was amended in 2001 to establish a special Tribunal, which provides judicial review of the detention of persons subject to a removal order. The Penal Law was also amended to include a provision defining withholding of passports as a criminal offence. The key goals of these laws are to encourage voluntary departure and strengthen enforcement activity and information campaigns directed at employers. The police will not prosecute illegal workers as criminals in connection with their illegal entry or stay in Israel. Minors are treated by the State in accordance with their special needs, as detailed below.

203. The Knesset's Special Committee for Migrant Workers recently (November 2004) chided the police for using at times unnecessary force against migrant workers. Noting the importance of preserving the human dignity, the Committee requested the police to act properly and with restraint, as well as limit arrests in improper venues, such as in front of churches.

204. The Immigration Administration (within the Police), via its Crime Unit, exposed several criminal networks involved in smuggling, document forgery and trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution. It retrieved thousands of passports and prosecuted several employment agencies, which abused their employees or employed them illegally. During 2003, the Crime Unit in the Immigration Administration recommended the filing of indictments in relation to 439 of its investigations (involving offences committed against migrant workers).³ The indictments, involve, inter alia, offences such as Fraud, Forgery, Trafficking in persons for prostitution and/or pandering, Withholding Passports, Aiding and Abetting infiltration and Aggravated Assault.

205. During January-February 2004 the Crime Unit investigated, inter alia, 142 cases of fraud and forgery, 8 cases of withholding passports and 98 cases of illegal employment. It also initiated investigations of 7,059 employers, resulting in 1,762 follow up investigations by the Enforcement Unit of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (hereinafter ITL).

206. In 2003, the Enforcement Unit of the ITL opened 6,256 files against employers suspected of violating the laws concerning employment of foreign workers, and imposed 3,305 administrative fines on employers, totaling 47,145,000 NIS. In 2004, the Enforcement Unit of the ITL opened 9,834 files against employers suspected of violating the laws concerning employment of foreign workers,⁴ and imposed 11,019 administrative fines on employers, totaling 161 million NIS.

207. During 2003, the Prosecution Division of the ITL filed 753 criminal indictments against employers - including manpower companies - for violations of these laws, and received 42 judgments with fines totaling 5 million NIS, up from the combined sum of a half of a million NIS imposed by Courts on employers of migrant workers in 2002, in 32 decisions. In 2004, the Prosecution Division of the ITL filed 309 criminal indictments against employers - including manpower companies - for violations of these laws, and received 88 judgments with criminal fines totaling 14.8 million NIS.

208. Following are a few examples of verdicts received in criminal cases against employers and manpower companies found guilty of violations of the labor laws relating to employment of foreign workers: C.C. (District Labor Court) 1062/02 The Ministry of ITL v. Eliezer Bonfil (17.12.03) - 100% of the maximum fine imposed on a manpower company (783,000 NIS); C.C. 1183/00 (District Labor Court)- The Ministry of ITL v. A. Hovala Inc., Ephrat Avraham (28.12.03) - Fine of 360,000 NIS imposed on the company and an additional fine of 50,000 NIS imposed on its Director. In its decision, the Labor Court emphasized that strict fines must be imposed on company functionaries in cases of offences concerning foreign workers; C.C. (District Labor Court) 88/03- The Ministry of ITL v Zoharim Inc. (11.1.04) – a fine of 1,158,850 NIS was imposed in a plea bargain; C.C. (District Labor Court) 1251/01 The Ministry of ITL v Shriebman Building Services inc. (07.01.04) – a fine of 1,530,760 NIS was imposed in a plea bargain; C.C. (District Labor Court) 304/03- The Ministry of ITL v A.S.L. Personnel Inc. (3.11.03) - Fine of 563,760 NIS was imposed on the Manpower Company in a case of illegal employment, and non-provision of detailed employment contract and medical insurance.

Refugees

209. Israel is a party to the UN 1951 Convention on the Status of Refugees. Any person who meets the Convention's definitions may apply for a refugee status in Israel, regardless of his or her religion.

210. Since January 2002, a special Committee dealing with persons seeking recognition as refugees has been operating in Israel, and the Committee advises the Minister of the Interior on refugee applications. The Committee is comprised of officials from the Ministries of Justice, the Interior and Foreign Affairs and is presided over by a jurist, with the competencies of a District Court Judge. The Committee works in cooperation with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees' representatives in Israel and usually operates based on their recommendations. During 2004, the Committee recommended that refugee status be granted in 12 cases out of the overall 142 applications. It shall be noted that the number of persons affected exceeds 12, as any application may include several family members. Once recognized as refugees, the individuals or families generally integrate into society, although some are occasionally resettled to a third country. Asylum seekers generally have not been detained, except for individuals arriving from countries that Israel sees as “enemy” countries. They are allowed to remain in Israel until an alternative solution is found for them, in cooperation with the office of the High Commissioner for Refugees.

C. Political rights

1. Access to the political system

211. The right to vote is the principal mechanism in which to actively participate in the Israeli political system. All citizens 18 years of age or older are entitled to vote, without distinction as to gender, race, color, ethnicity, wealth, property, or any other status ((Basic Law: The Knesset, 5718-1958 ("Basic Law: the Knesset")), Article 5). A person may be denied the right to vote only by judgment of a competent court pursuant to valid legislation (Basic Law: The Knesset, Article 5), however, no statutory provisions have been enacted to permit the denial of the right to vote.

The right to run for national public office

212. Any citizen 21 years of age or over may run for a seat in the Knesset, subject to three sets of exceptions.

- 212.1. If a person has been sentenced, in a final verdict, to imprisonment for at least three months, and seven years have not yet passed since the end of that term of imprisonment, then the person is ineligible to run in national elections. This is the case, unless the Head of the Central Election Committee concludes that the offence committed, under the circumstances, is without disgrace.
- 212.2. A court may deny an individual the right to run for office pursuant to legislation (Basic Law: The Knesset, Article 6(a)). No such legislation exists.
- 212.3. Several public officials are precluded from running for election to the Knesset by virtue of their position: the President of the State, the two Chief Rabbis and other members of clergy who earn wages from their religious function, any active judge of a general or religious court, the State Comptroller, the I.D.F. Chief of Staff, Police and Prisons Service personnel, and senior public servants and army officers of a certain rank (Article 7 of the Basic Law). Such senior public servants may run for national election if they leave office at least 100 days prior to the elections (Elections Law, 5729-1969 ("The Elections Law"), Article 56(A1)). Army officers, at the rank of Colonel or higher, may run for national elections if they leave office at least six months prior to the elections. Other, less senior public servants and military personnel may run for elected office so long as they vacate their positions by the date of submission of the candidates list; if elected, they are deemed to have ceased their service so long as they remain members of the Knesset (Elections Law, Article 56(b)).

- 212.4. Dual nationals may run for election to the Knesset, but if elected they may not take the oath of office until they have taken all steps necessary to relieve themselves of the other nationality, nor will they hold the rights of Knesset members until they do so (Elections Law, article 16A).

Members of ethnic and religious minorities

213. Minorities vote for Knesset lists (political parties) along with the entire political spectrum. In addition, Arab political parties have been represented consistently in the Knesset, as is the case in the current 16th Knesset. There are 7 Muslim Arab Knesset Members, 2 Druze, 1 Christian and 1 Bedouin Knesset Members.

The right to participate in election - Political expression

214. In Election Appeal 2600/99 (29.04.1999) the appellant requested that the Arab political party Ballad be disqualified from participation in the election in light of the views expressed by its chairman, Azmi Bshara, speaking against the right of the Jewish people to the State of Israel. Justice Tirkel, while examining Article 7A(1) of Basic Law: the Knesset, repeated the rule that only extreme and severe expressions justify disqualifying a party from participating in the election. Justice Kedmi added:

“freedom of opinion and the right to present it, are basic values of a democratic state; and that it would be justified to limit these rights only when there are clear unequivocal evidence that they were misused.”

215. In H.C.J. 212/03 Herut National Party v. Central Elections Committee (16.1.03), the Central Elections Committee refused to allow the broadcast of a political advert of the petitioner because it was demeaning to the State's flag and national anthem. The High Court of Justice dismissed the petition and upheld the Central Committee's decision, noting the Central Committee's broad discretion concerning the balance between the freedom of speech and contradictory values.

Political expression of Knesset Members

216. On August 2001, the Attorney General announced his decision to indict MK Bshara on 2 counts. One indictment relates to the organization of illegal trips to Syria by Arab-Israelis. The Court later canceled this indictment. The other indictment relates to statements made by MK Bshara supporting Hizbollah, praising acts of terrorism carried out by that organization and calling for the Palestinians to adopt Hizbollah's methods in their struggle against Israel.

217. Unlike other constitutions that only grant immunity to statements made within Parliament, the Israeli law grants immunity to Knesset Members also for statements made outside the Knesset. However, the Attorney General found that this was not plainly a political statement but rather an encouragement for acts of terrorism. He therefore decided to indict Mr. Bshara.

218. The immunity of Mr. Bshara was removed after both the Knesset House Committee and the Knesset plenary debated the issue, heard Mr. Bshara's stand, and reached the conclusion that there are substantive justifications for the request.

219. Mr. Bshara was indicted in the Nazareth Magistrate Court (C.C. 1087/02) for these political statements. On November 2003, the Court ruled that it would address Mr. Bshara's arguments regarding the parliamentary immunity only during the final stages of the legal proceedings.

220. On December 2003, Mr. Bshara petitioned the Supreme Court regarding this decision. This case is currently pending and concerns whether the proper venue for the issue of parliamentary immunity is the Magistrate Court or the Supreme Court. (H.C.J. 11225/03 Azmi Bshara v. The Nazareth Magistrate Court).

221. Local and municipal elections. The fundamental right to vote and be elected applies as well to participation in local government. A series of statutes regulating elections of mayors, municipal and local councils generally mirror the arrangements for national elections, including the requirement that elections be "equal", "general", "secret", "direct" and "proportional"; the right of all persons 17 years of age and older who reside in the municipal area in question to vote in such elections; the right to run for election, subject to exceptions for judges, convicts, those lacking legal capacity, and certain classes of civil servants; and the right to propose candidate lists. See Local Authorities (Elections) Law, 5725-1965 ("The Local Authorities (Elections) Law"). The principal differences between local and national elections are that non-citizen residents may vote in local elections, but not in national elections.

222. In the case of C.A.P. 6709/98 The Attorney General v. The Central Elections Committee (01.02.1999), an appeal was filed by the Attorney General against the Head of the Central Elections Committee regarding a list of candidates from Moledet, Gesher, and Zomet parties during the 1999 Upper Nazareth municipal elections.

223. The Supreme Court prohibited the list sponsored by the aforementioned right wing Jewish political parties from participating in the elections on the grounds that the candidate running for mayor, who headed this list, put forward a racist campaign. The Court emphasized the importance of the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination and declared that it is one of the basic values that every civil society must protect.

2. Access to public service

224. Since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report, there have been significant changes, both in law and policy, concerning the minority population within the Civil Service. These important changes are discussed below.

The civil service - general

225. The State of Israel employs more than 56,000 civilian employees. These civil servants are selected pursuant to legislation and the Civil Service Code, known as the "Takshir", which establishes a merit-based civil service system. The Civil Service (Appointments) Law, generally requires that civil servants be appointed through a competitive tender process which clearly defines minimum qualifications for the position in question.

226. Several layers of legislation aim to protect against discrimination in access to the civil service. Both the Employment Service Law, 5719-1959 ("The Employment Service Law"), and the Equal Opportunity in Employment Law, which apply to private and public employers generally, forbid discrimination among job applicants on the basis of religion, race, nationality or national origin, sex, sexual orientation, age, personal or marital status, personal worldview or political affiliation. These provisions apply, mutatis mutandis, to civil service hiring without a tender, to terms of employment, promotion, on-the-job professional training, and termination of employment. The Civil Service (Appointments) (Tenders and Examinations) Rules, 5721-1961, obligates members of tender committees to avoid questions relating to controversies between political parties as much as possible. See also Takshir, Paras. 11.61 and 12.367, and Civil Service Commissioner Notice 56/12.

Affirmative action in the civil service

227. There has been an important and significant amendment in the Civil Service (Appointments) Law that reflects the principles of CERD and highlights the importance of equality to the State. Specifically, the law has been amended in 2000 to require; in the employment and civil services employees, giving:

"... appropriate expression, in the circumstances of the case, to representation of members of both sexes, people with disabilities, and members of the Arab, including Druze and Circassian, population (in this Law – "appropriate representation")."

228. The Government is thus required to facilitate and encourage appropriate representation, set aside positions (when possible) for minority groups in units that do not have appropriate representation, and institute preference-oriented affirmative action programs. Each ministry and agency shall present an annual report to the Civil Service Commissioner as to implementation of the provisions of the law, and the Civil Service Commissioner shall present the Government and the Law and Constitution Committee of the Knesset with an annual report detailing the steps taken thus far along with recommendations for further implementation.

229. On a more substantive level, the Ministerial Committee for the Non-Jewish Sector issued a decision in February 2004 requiring that within 3 years, 8% of the governmental workforce is to come from the minority population (defined as Arab, Bedouin, Druze, and Circassian), with the figure rising to 10% within 5 years. As a means of guaranteeing the desired goals, the Government is required to hire new personnel from the minority population at a rate of at least 8% during the coming year, with the figure rising to 15% of all new staff during the following year. Any governmental body that does not meet these goals is required to submit a detailed explanation to the Ministerial Committee. The Ministry of Justice, together with relevant applicable Ministries, is also to examine the expansion of hiring from the minority population within other bodies such as regional authorities and governmental corporations.

230. Despite affirmative action instituted by the legislator and the Government, there remain gaps in the actual representation of women and minorities in the civil service.

231. Arabs and Druze are underrepresented in the civil service as a whole. In 1994, the government decided to take affirmative action measures to enhance the integration of Arabs and Druze into the civil service, among other things by issuing tenders for mid-level positions solely to members of those minorities. Between January 1, 1994, and April 1996, 661 Arabs and Druze were appointed to government service posts. The numbers have been increasing steadily. Thus, in 2001, there were 2,806 Arab and Druze workers in the civil service, representing 4.86% of such workers, while the figures recently rose to 2,818 workers representing 4.95% of civil service workers. The rate of hiring minorities increased from 8.4% of the hired workers representing a minority group in 2001, to 10.3% minority workers hired in 2002.

232. The figures continued to rise in 2003, reaching a level of 2,798 workers or 5.05% of civil service staff. This increase demonstrates a desire of government agencies to implement the Government's plans of raising the level of minority workers within the civil service workforce.

233. Additionally, it is important to note that many of these employees within the civil service maintain senior level positions, some with decision making capacity. Thus, there are civil service employees from the minority population fulfilling roles such as investigative engineers, clinical psychologists, senior tax investigators, senior economists, senior electricians, geologists, department controllers, and education supervisors, to name but a few.

234. Moreover, these employees serve the good of the Israeli community as a whole and are a driving force in the integration of the Arab minority into the Israeli society.

235. In 2002, in the Arab education system, the number of teachers in primary education was 11,748 (compared to 43,168 in the Hebrew education). In junior high schools and high schools the numbers were 4,046 and 4,843, respectively (compared to 18,966 and 34,796 respectively, in the Hebrew education system).

236. Employees in local and regional government bodies largely reflect the demographic composition of the locality or region. In the 88 local councils or municipalities which serve towns and villages in which the population is primarily composed of Arabs, Druze, Bedouin or Circassians, the employees of the local government bodies are almost exclusively composed of members of those minorities. In larger municipalities with mixed populations, such as Jerusalem, Haifa and Lod, members of minorities are employed at a level which approaches their representation in the population, although less so at the most senior levels.

237. According to Article 4(1) of the Israel Lands Administration Law, 5720-1960 ("The Israel Lands Administration Law"), the Israel Lands Committee shall have a maximum of 24 representatives consisting of an equal number of representatives from the Government and from the Jewish National Fund. The law further requires that the Government delegation be composed equally of senior employees from relevant ministries and academics and public representatives.

238. In H.C.J 6924/98, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel v. Israeli Government, Minister of National Infrastructures and the Finance Minister (09.07.2001), the Association for Civil Rights in Israel claimed that the Israel Lands Committee did not reflect the proper representation mandated by law. The Court elucidated a distinction between the principles of equality and fair representation whereby equality is achieved through the passive application of non-discrimination, and fair representation requires the application of affirmative action. In this way, fair representation is a necessary prerequisite for fulfilling the principle of equality. The Court noted two sources for fair representation: the first stems from the doctrine of equality and the second from specific laws. Although two laws regulate fair representation in Israel's Government and civil service, the Court found that the Israel Lands Committee was neither a governmental body nor characterized as a civil service body. Therefore, any determination of fair representation required the application of the doctrine rather than a specific law. The Court referred to Article 15A of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law that creates a duty of fair representation of the Arab minority in the civil service. The Court ruled that as there was only one Arab member out of 12 state representatives sitting in the Council, the Government should consider the appointment of a second Arab member.

239. According to the application of this doctrine, the Government has a responsibility to promote fair representation of the Arab community. To that end, it should also verify whether there are suitable Arab candidates to fill positions that lack fair representation.

240. Following this ruling, there are currently 2 Arab members in the Israeli Land Administration, out of 12 Government representatives.

Representation in governmental corporations

241. Similar to the changes made in the Civil Service concerning the minority population, progress has also been made within governmental corporations. Thus, minorities are better represented within these corporations, pursuant to formalized laws and governmental directives, described below.

242. The 1993 amendment to the Government Corporations Law, (Article 18a) established a requirement for appropriate representation of both genders on the Board of Directors of every government corporation.

243. A key change to the law further reflects the State's desire to implement and uphold the Convention and provide for fair representation of all population groups. An important amendment was made to the Government Corporations Law in May 2000 (Article 18(a) (1)) requiring appropriate representation of the minority population on the Board of Directors of every government corporation. Until such appropriate representation is achieved, the Ministers shall, as far as possible, appoint minority directors.

244. The decision was further entrenched following a September 2003 decision from the Ministerial Committee for the Non-Jewish Sector requiring appropriate representation and appointment of the minority population onto the Board of Directors.

245. In October 2000, the Attorney General issued guidelines, circulated among all government ministries, on the implementation of the said provision, providing that:

“The idea of an ‘appropriate way of representation’ mentioned above does not mean creating quotas upon the Arab representation but it is rather to be construed in light of each particular circumstance. The appropriate rate must be decided according to the character, the purposes and the special needs of a corporation and according to the selection of available candidates who suit the specific mandate. (...) However (...), as far as possible, the obligation of priority to the Arab population prevails.

The refusal to nominate an Arab applicant to fulfill a mandate has to be justified by the Appointing Commission. Such decision prerequisites the examination of the possibility to select a minority applicant following reasonable attempts to identify such a candidate.”

246. The amendment of the Government Corporations Law, brought about significant change in a short period of time. In June 2001, the rate of Arab representation in governmental bodies reached only 1 percent and by January 2003 (within a period of 18 months), the rate of the Arab population representation had increased to 5.7 %.

247. In statutory corporations and another seventeen bodies mentioned in the annex to the Government Corporations Law (e.g. the Museums Council, the Education Board, the Water Council) the rate of Arab population representation has increased to 3.3 %.

D. Civil rights

1. The right to freedom of movement and residence within the border of the State

The legal landscape

248. Until 1992, the right to enter and exit Israel, as well the right to freedom of movement within the State, were articulated and developed mainly through judicial decisions which interpreted legislation dealing with these matters. The Supreme Court has held that "freedom of movement ... is a natural right, recognized ... in every state with a democratic form of government -- of which our country is one -- and the citizen does not need any special qualifications to be entitled this 'grant'." H.C.J. 111/53, Kaufman v. Minister of the Interior et al (9.6.53).

249. Any governmental action affecting travel is subject to review by the Supreme Court, which must be convinced by clear, unequivocal evidence that there exists a "genuine, serious concern" that national security or other equally crucial interests will be "substantially damaged" if the person's right to travel is not restricted (H.C.J. 448/85, Dahar et al. v. Minister of the Interior (28.05.1986)).

Freedom of movement within the State

250. For all persons who are lawfully within the territory of the State of Israel, there is no requirement of registration in particular districts, and movement within the State is generally unrestricted. All residents of Israel (i.e., citizens, permanent residents who are not citizens, and temporary residents) are required to register their address, or any change thereof, at the Population Registry. Non-resident Aliens need not register their whereabouts while in the country.

2. The right to leave any country, including one's own, and to return to one's country

251. With the enactment of Article 6 of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, the rights to leave and to enter Israel were given a firmer constitutional basis:

251.1. All persons are free to leave Israel.

251.2. Every citizen of Israel has the right of entry into Israel from abroad."

252. These rights are subject to the limitation clause (Article 8) of the Basic Law, which prohibits any impairment of the right except by a statute which befits the values of the State and is intended for a proper purpose - and then only to the extent required; or pursuant to such a statute which explicitly authorizes deviation from the right. In addition, Article 12 of the Basic Law stipulates that emergency regulations properly in force may deny or restrict these rights only for a proper purpose, and for a period and to an extent that does not exceed what is necessary. The Basic Law is binding on all official authorities.

253. Legislation predating 1992 which deals with entry into or exit from Israel remains in force, but is now interpreted according to the principles in the Basic Law.

Exit from Israel

254. All persons leaving the State of Israel must present a valid passport, laissez passer or other travel document.

255. Restrictions on the right to leave Israel. No person may leave Israel directly to any of the countries specified in the Prevention of Infiltration (Offenses and Punishment) Law, 5714-1954 ("The Prevention of Infiltration (Offenses and Punishment) Law") (the current list includes Lebanon, Syria, Yemen, Saudi Arabia and Iraq) nor may Israelis travel to these countries without a permit from the Minister of the Interior.

256. An example of the Law's operation was the recent decision concerning a Druze resident in the Golan who desired to make a pilgrimage to the grave of a holy person in Syria. The applicant was granted permission to make the journey, via Jordan.

257. Travel documents. Passports and travel documents are generally issued as a matter of course. Arab residents of Jerusalem, many of whom are Jordanian citizens, receive laissez passer documents routinely.

Entry into Israel

258. Israel is the designated homeland of the Jewish people. Jews have been in the Diaspora for close to 2000 years prior to the creation of the State and thus realized a dream of having a homeland and place of refuge in the post-Holocaust era, and for Jews in Arab States and elsewhere. Thus, the Law of Return, 5710-1950 ("The Law of Return") was enacted as a tool to realizing this dream and as a means of enhancing Israel as a home for all Jews dispersed throughout the world. It is a linchpin of the State and serves as a foundational principle towards the effectuation of a viable and thriving Jewish State.

259. Any person who is neither an Israeli national nor the holder of an oleh's (lit. "A person who ascends") certificate under the Law of Return must enter Israel by visa and permit of sojourn. For such persons, there are four general categories of visas and permits of residence under Israeli law: a permit of transitory sojourn (up to five days); a visitor's permit (up to three months); a permit of temporary residence (up to three years); and a permit of permanent residence (Entry into Israel Law, Article 2). Each of these permits may be renewed for periods prescribed by law.

260. Permanent resident status is granted at the discretion of the Minister of the Interior, most typically in cases of family reunification and on other humanitarian grounds. The criteria applied by the Ministry of the Interior in applications for permanent residency focus on the capacity to show that one's life, or that of one's immediate family, is centered, as a practical matter, in Israel. If a permanent resident leaves Israel for a period of at least seven years, and has become a permanent resident or citizen of another country, then his permanent residency status in Israel is deemed to have expired.

261. In September 1999, the Minister of the Interior decided upon a policy under which those who had been permanent residents of Israel, whose residency permit had expired due to having been resided abroad for over seven years, would be able to receive a new permanent residence permit, after a passage of two years from their return to Israel, provided that they had not received foreign citizenship or a permit for permanent residency in a foreign state in the meantime, and provided that there is no security or criminal impediment with regard to that person.

262. In the wake of the new policy, new permits for permanent residency were granted to many ex-residents who had returned to live in Israel. Consequently, a petition on the matter, filed by the Centre for Protection of the Individual to the High Court of Justice, was summarily dismissed (H.C.J 2227/98 Centre for Protection of the Individual v. Minister of the Interior (07.04.1998)). This change of policy mostly affects the Arab residents of the Eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem as described below.

3. The right to nationality

Obtaining Israeli citizenship

263. In general, citizenship may be obtained through birth, residence, or naturalization. In any case, the manner in which persons become Israeli citizens does not affect in any way the scope of their rights and privileges arising from citizenship, such as the right to vote and be elected, or the right to hold public office.

The Law of Return

264. The State of Israel was expressly established to serve as a Jewish, democratic state - a homeland for the Jewish people, while, at the same time, according all of its citizens the full enjoyment of economical, cultural, and social rights. In 1950, the Knesset enacted the Law of Return, under which a Jew who immigrates to Israel is accorded the status of "oleh" and automatically granted citizenship, unless the person is deemed likely to endanger public health, security of the State, or public welfare, or if the person is "engaged in an activity directed against the Jewish people" (Law of Return, article 2(b)).

265. In this respect, Israel is no different from other states that upon attaining their statehood, in accordance with the principle of self-determination, grant preference to individuals with certain social, cultural, or ethnic links to that State for the purpose of developing the national identity of that State.

266. Notwithstanding Paragraph 279 below ("family unification"), non-Jews are not prevented from immigrating to Israel, nor are there any restrictions on any particular group. Non-Jews who wish to acquire Israeli citizenship may duly apply for such citizenship in accordance with Israel's Citizenship Law, 5712-1952 ("The Citizenship Law").

267. Under the Citizenship Law, Israeli citizenship may be acquired under certain circumstances, by birth; by residence; by a combination of birth and residence; by return, under the Law of Return; by naturalization; and by grant, with no regard to religious or ethnic distinction.

268. According to the current policy of the Ministry of the Interior, the Law of Return does not apply to a non-Jewish spouse of a person who already is an Israeli national. Accordingly, he or she does not receive the benefits of a Jewish new immigrant, including the right to automatically acquire Israeli citizenship. However, he or she may, nevertheless, attain Israeli nationality by way of naturalization, as described above, with no religious or ethnic distinction.

Nationality by birth

269. A person born in Israel whose mother or father was an Israeli national is granted Israeli citizenship. If a person is born outside Israel, he or she will be granted citizenship unless his or her parent had acquired their Israeli citizenship by birth abroad. Acquisition of Israeli citizenship by birth does not involve any distinction in law or in fact between Jews and non-Jews.

Naturalization

270. Under Article 5 of the Citizenship Law, a person over 18 years of age may attain Israeli nationality if he or she:

- 270.1. Is in Israel; and has been in Israel for three out of the five years preceding the application for citizenship; and
- 270.2. Is entitled to reside in Israel permanently; and
- 270.3. Has settled, or intends to settle in Israel; and
- 270.4. Has some knowledge of the Hebrew language; and
- 270.5. Has renounced his or her prior nationality or has proven that he or she will cease to be a foreign national upon becoming an Israeli national.

271. Upon being naturalized, a person's minor children automatically become Israeli citizens as well, unless such naturalization is prevented by exceptional circumstances (Article 8). As a rule, Israeli legislation accords a full range of social, economic and cultural rights to residents who hold a valid residency permit, apart from rights deriving only from citizenship (such as the right to vote in national elections, the right to hold an Israeli passport). Non-residents enjoy rights in legal proceedings before Israeli courts and in their dealing with the law enforcement system. In addition, all protective labor laws apply irrespective of citizenship or residency, as well as most of the provisions of the National Insurance Law, 5755-1995 ("The National Insurance Law"). Additionally, although the National Health Insurance Law, 5754-1994 ("The National Health Insurance Law") does not grant health insurance coverage to non residents, the Foreign Workers (Prohibition of Unlawful Employment and Assurance of Fair Conditions) Law requires employers of foreign nationals to insure their employees, regardless of their legal status.

Eastern Jerusalem

272. The status of most of the Arab population in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem is that of "permanent residents" of Israel. According to Israeli law, a permanent resident is entitled to the same civil rights as an Israeli citizen, such as the right to vote for local municipalities, the right to social security, and the right to medical insurance. Naturally, Arab residents in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem enjoy these rights as do any other permanent residents.

273. The option to request Israeli citizenship by Arab residents in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem existed since 1967. The policy of the Government of Israel since 1999 is that permanent residents of the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem, whose permits have expired since 1995, could nevertheless be acknowledged as permanent residents if they kept special links to Israel during the years that they lived elsewhere, and if they lived in Israel at least two years.

Revocation of citizenship

274. The Citizenship Law authorizes the Minister of the Interior to revoke the citizenship of an Israeli citizen whose actions were in breach of allegiance to the State of Israel. This is an extreme measure, to be used only in rare and exceptional occasions. Any person whose citizenship is revoked may file a petition to the Israeli Supreme Court.

275. The Minister of the Interior has used his authority under the abovementioned law and revoked the Israeli citizenship of two Arab Israelis who took an active role in hostilities against the State of Israel and its citizens. The decision was made after the Minister provided them with an opportunity to argue against the revocation.

276. Mr. Nihad Abu Kishak, a resident of Judea and Samaria, was a member of a Palestinian terrorist group responsible for the murder and injury of dozens of Israelis. After the revocation of his citizenship, Abu Kishak announced that he considers himself to be a Palestinian rather than an Israeli, and that he would be willing to give up his citizenship voluntarily.

277. Mr. Kase Ubade, resides in Lebanon and chose not to file a petition to the Supreme Court sitting as High Court of Justice.

4. Free choice of spouse

Free choice of spouse and non-discrimination

278. In 1995, the Ministry of the Interior altered its previous policy, and started to apply a different interpretation to the Law of Return. Under the new interpretation, the Law of Return will not, henceforth, apply to the Non-Jewish spouse of a Jewish person who already is an Israeli national, so that he or she will no longer receive the benefits of a Jewish new immigrant, including the right to automatically acquire Israeli citizenship. Thus, the Ministry of the Interior no longer favors Jewish Israeli nationals by automatically granting citizenship to their foreign national spouses. At present, the foreign spouses of persons who are already Israeli nationals, whether Jewish or Non-Jewish, may attain Israeli nationality by way of naturalization. A petition challenging the new policy was dismissed by the High Court of Justice which affirmed the new policy (H.C.J. 3648/97 Stamka v. The Minister of the Interior (04.05.1999)). A later request for a further hearing in this case was also dismissed by the High Court of Justice.

Family unification

279. Since the outbreak of the armed conflict between Israel and the Palestinians towards the end of the year 2000, which led, inter alia, to the commission of dozens of suicide bombings inside Israel, a growing involvement in assisting terrorist organizations had been noted on the part of Palestinians originally from the West Bank and Gaza, who carry Israeli identity cards pursuant to procedures of family unification with Israeli citizens or residents; and who abuse their legal status in Israel, which allows them free movement between the West Bank and/or Gaza and Israel.

280. In order to prevent such potential danger posed by former residents of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip during the current armed conflict, the Government decided in May 2002 to temporarily stop granting them legal status in Israel, including through family unification. The decision was adopted following a horrendous terror attack in Haifa in March 2002 killing 15 people, committed by a suicide bomber who received Israeli ID following family unification.

281. The decision does not apply to persons already granted legal status in Israel prior to the decision, and leaves them with the same legal status they had prior to the adoption of the decision.

282. It is important to note that this decision does not discriminate between Israeli citizens and residents as it applies to all. It also does not prevent any Israeli citizen, from uniting in Israel with spouses from Arab or Palestinian origin, who do not reside in the West Bank or Gaza Strip. The criterion is only whether the spouse is a resident of the West Bank or Gaza Strip. It should also be noted that a State has the right to control entry into its territory, and more so, during times of armed conflict, when persons requesting to enter may potentially be involved in acts of violence against its citizens.

283. On July 31, 2003 the Knesset enacted the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision), 5763-2003 ("The Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision)") which limits the possibility of granting residents of Palestinian territories Israeli citizenship pursuant to the Citizenship Law, including by means of family unification, and the possibility of granting such residents residence permits in Israel pursuant to the Entry into Israel Law. The Law was invoked for one year. At the end of that period in August, 2004, the Law was extended for another six months. It was re-extended in February 2005 for a period of four months.

284. The Israeli Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order), is a security oriented law, the result of the wave of atrocious and indiscriminate Palestinian terrorism which broke out in 2000 and claimed the lives of over 1,000 innocent Israelis as described above. The Law is the direct result of 23 murderous terrorist attacks, made possible by the involvement of persons who were granted legal status in Israel based on their marriage to an Israeli citizen, and took advantage of their Israeli ID to pass checkpoints and carry into Israel either suicide bombers or explosives.

285. Moreover, the Law does not change the status of people who already received their status prior to the day the law came into effect. However, those people's status shall not be advanced, yet left static. It should be emphasized that this is a temporary law, which presently expires on May 31, 2005.

286. Furthermore, the Law's constitutionality was scrutinized by the Supreme Court in H.C.J. cases 7052/03 7102/03 Adalah and others v. The Minister of the Interior (14.12.04, 01.03.05), which are still pending. The Court noted that the Government has decided to prepare an amendment to the Law adding exceptions to the general rule that would allow withholding application of the law to groups of individuals who pose a lower security risk to the lives and security of Israeli citizens. It also pointed out the limited time frame of the Law and that the Government did not extend the Law for the full year. The Court thus did not issue any order concerning the Law, leaving open the possibility to request further information from the Government, if necessary, following the envisioned changes to the law.

287. This decision addresses the concerns expressed by the Committee in its Decisions 63 and 65.

5. The right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion

Freedom of religion

Promoting equality in funding of religious services

288. Cemeteries. In an April 2000 case before the Supreme Court concerning the unequal allocation of funds to Jewish and Arab Cemeteries, the Court stressed the importance of the principle of equality in the allocation of state funds, and ordered the Ministry of Religious Affairs to revise its cemetery budget so that the Arab sector receives a more equitable share (H.C.J. 1113/99 Adalah, et al. v. The Minister of Religious Affairs (26.09.2000)).

289. Indeed, over the last few years, the State has succeeded in maintaining equal levels of allocations to all religious cemeteries. In 2003, for example, the Ministry of Religious Affairs allocated 6,490,000 NIS towards the maintenance of religious cemeteries in the non-Jewish sector of which 1,278,000 NIS were utilized, with the remaining funds (totaling over 5,000,000 NIS) to be used the following year. Additionally, the Ministry distributed 15,813,000 NIS worth of funding towards similar purposes in the Jewish sector.

290. In other words, 1/3 of such funding went to the non-Jewish sector, which comprises about 20% of the Israeli population

291. Religious courts. In terms of allocations made to religious courts, vast strides have been made to increase funding to non-Jewish courts, particularly Muslim Sha'aria courts. In 2001, the Ministry of Justice took over the supervision of the Sha'aria Courts from the Ministry of Religious Affairs. Over the past 2 years both the physical structures as well as the internal computer systems have been improved in these courts as part of a wider effort to bring these courts up to the standards of the civil courts.

292. Educational institutions. As for allocations to educational institutions belonging to the various religious sectors of Israeli society, it appears that a change is about to occur in terms of the allocations, following the publication of the Shoshani Committee Report, which investigated budgeting methods in the Israeli primary educational system. The Report was presented to the Minister of Education in 2002 and adopted by her. The basic recommendation of the Report is to abandon past guidelines for the allocation of resources and to adopt a new method that bases allocation on the following principals: 1. Standard per pupil –The number of budgeted hours allocated to the school is to be determined only on the basis of the number of pupils attending and their socio-economic background. 2. Equal Standard: All Israeli pupils are assessed on the basis of a uniform socio-economic index. 3. Differential standard: Each pupil is classified according to the decile to which he belongs and the budget allocated to the school for that pupil is determined accordingly. 4. Pedagogic conditions: A necessary condition for any budgeting is compliance with the basic (core) curriculum including secular studies such as Mathematics, Foreign Languages etc., and the participation in the GEMS - growth and effectiveness measures for schools procedures.

Non-discrimination on the basis of religious affiliation

293. As to the effect of religious affiliation on the enjoyment of civil rights, Israeli law does not distinguish between religious statuses except for matters of marital status, where the King's Order in Council⁵ (British-Mandate legislation) applies, and provides exclusive jurisdiction to officially recognized religious tribunals in Israel over matters of marital status within their respective religious communities.

294. The couple's religious law applies to matters regarding alimony for wives and children, as interpreted by the civil courts. When partners are not members of the same religious group, the civil law applies. In matters of legal competency, children's custody, spousal property and other family issues (family violence, adoption, etc.) – the civil law applies.

Free access and protection of holy places

295. Israeli Law grants freedom of worship and ensures the safekeeping of and access to holy places to members of all faiths. Articles 170-173 of the Penal Law, provide as follows:

“A person who destroys, damages or desecrates a place of worship or any object which is held sacred by a group of persons with the intention of thereby reviling their religion or with the knowledge that they are likely to consider such destruction, damage or desecration as an insult to their religion is liable to imprisonment for three years.”

“A person who willfully and without proving lawful justification or excuse disturbs any meeting of persons lawfully assembled for religious worship or willfully assaults a person officiating at any such meeting or any of the persons there assembled is liable to imprisonment for one year.”

296. The Protection of Holy Places Law, 5727-1967 ("The Protection of Holy Places Law"), expands on the guarantees contained in the Penal Law by mandating that holy places of all religions be protected from any "desecration or other violations," and prohibiting any act that might impair the free access of members of all religions to their holy places or "anything likely to violate the sensitivities of the members of the different religions with regard to those places."

297. Desecration or other violations of holy places are punishable by seven years' imprisonment; impairment of free access and violation of religious sensitivities, as outlined above, are punishable by up to five years imprisonment.

298. As detailed above, the State indicted Tatyana Suskin for posting leaflets in Hebron which depicted the Prophet Mohamed as a pig, standing on the Quran. She was charged, among other things, with committing an act of racism and offending religious sensitivity. (Cr.C 436/97 The State of Israel v. Tatiana Suskin (30/12/1997)).

299. Violation of this law, unlike the parallel provisions in the Penal Law, does not require criminal intent or knowledge, as it is sufficient simply if the offender had constructive knowledge that such a violation was likely to be caused as a result of the conduct.

300. Recently, Adalah, The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel, filed a petition to the Supreme Court calling for regulations that would directly address Muslim holy places in a manner similar to some Jewish holy sites. The petitioners claim that the Government should be compelled to promulgate regulations in the interest of eliminating discrimination, upholding equality, and pursuant to the requirements of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The petition was filed in November 2004 (H.C.J 10532/04 Adalah et al v. The Prime Minister et al).

301. Several statutes aim to protect holy sites against physical harm by requiring the consent and guidance from the relevant Minister as a precondition to performing certain actions in or around a holy place, such as excavating (Mines Ordinance, Article 8(1)(a)), draining (Drainage and Protection Against Flooding Law, 5718-1958, Article 22(a)), the addition of water and sewage systems (Water Law, 5719-1959, Articles 70-71; Local Authorities (Sewage) Law, 5722-1962, Article 14), declaring the site a national garden (National Parks and Nature Reserves Law, 5723-1963, Articles 4-5), vacating and demolishing houses (Building and Evacuation of Rehabilitation Areas Law, 5725-1965, Article 51), and so on.

302. Furthermore, most of the holy places are also considered as antiquities sites, and are thus protected by similar provisions in the Antiquities Law, 5738-1978.

303. In H.C.J. 7128/96 The Temple Mount Faithful Movement v. The Government of Israel et al. (12.3.97): The Court held the following:

"The Government has decided, following the Six Day War, that the Muslims are permitted to continue and perform prayers in mosques that are located on the Temple Mount as they did in previous years, whereas the Jews, even though their right to the Temple Mount exists and stands historically, are not permitted to currently actualize their right to perform public prayers on the Temple Mount.

Access to the Mount has, up to the present day, exists yet is limited. Jews and other visitors that are not Muslim, are permitted to the Mount and to enter the area that is reserved most days of the year, only during morning and noon hours, when prayers are not being performed in the mosques."

304. In practice, the access to holy places and freedom of worship for members of all faiths is strictly guarded, with few exceptions relating to the maintenance of public order and morals.

305. 350 workers are employed to maintain and operate Islamic holy places sites. A sum of 7.5 million NIS has been allocated for the developments of religious buildings and Muslim cemeteries.

6. Freedom of opinion and expression

306. In A.C.C. 8613/96 Jabarin v. The State of Israel (27.11.00), the Supreme Court accepted Mr. Jabarin's appeal and acquitted him from his conviction according to Article 4 of the Prevention of Terror Ordinance. Mr. Jabarin was convicted by the District Court in supporting a terrorist organization, due to the publication of three articles encouraging the tossing of stones and explosive bottles. The Supreme Court interpreted the above-mentioned offence and held that the words of praise should refer to acts performed by a terrorist organization. Yet in the case of the appellant, his words referred to acts of non-organized people. In addition, the Court held that the offence does not require that the publication itself create a risk of future damage.

307. In ACC 1789/98, State of Israel v. Kahane (27.11.00), following the publication and distribution of a Kahane Chai leaflet which called for the destruction of Arab villages in Israel, the State charged Benjamin Kahane with incitement, a criminal offense under Articles 133 and 134(3) of the Israeli Penal Law. In finding Kahane guilty of these offenses, the Court ruled that the offense of incitement was designed not only to protect the stability of the State, but also to preserve community bonds among the State's citizens. This ruling is significant insofar as it has extended the scope of the criminal offense of incitement and may facilitate future prosecution of parties calling for acts of violence against minority groups. The decision indicated to the public that the Court follows strict legal standards and applies them equally to Arabs and Jews. Judge Orr, who wrote the majority opinion, favored a limited interpretation of the offence, so that it only applies to supporting terrorist organizations. The majority believed that this interpretation of the offence is consistent with respect for the freedom of speech.

7. Other civil rights

Due process rights - the right to assigned legal assistance in criminal cases

308. Court-appointed counsel. Prior to an indictment, Israeli law requires court appointment of legal counsel for a person in detention in cases where he or she is without means to finance legal counsel or mentally-ill within the purview of the Criminal Procedure [Consolidated Version] Law, 5742-1982 ("The Criminal Procedure [Consolidated Version] Law"), Article 15 or the Mentally Ill Treatment Law, 5751-1991 ("The Mentally Ill Treatment Law"), Article 18, or where he or she is under sixteen years of age, or when it is necessary to take testimony prior to filing the charge sheet and the detainee is either blind, deaf, dumb or mentally disabled, or when the detainee is suspected of murder or another offense bearing a penalty of ten years or more (Criminal Procedure Law, Article 15(a)).

309. In cases where there is no obligation to appoint legal counsel for a detainee, a court may decide at its discretion to appoint counsel if the detainee has insufficient financial means to do so, if the offense involved bears a penalty of at least ten years' imprisonment, if the detainee is blind, deaf, dumb or mentally incapacitated, or if for any other reason the court deems that the detainee is unable to manage his own defense adequately. A detainee without means is entitled to representation by the Public Defender's Office, even without counsel being appointed by the court.

310. An indication of the desire and capacity to serve the minority sector is reflected by the pool of attorneys operating within the Public Defenders Office. That is, 7.5% of the full-time staff attorneys are from the minority population, while 21% of external attorneys hired by the Office are members of minority groups. Even more telling is that the external attorney's pool for the Northern Public Defenders Office reaches 55% of minorities. This is important for the Northern District, as it is an area where the minority population exceeds the majority. The Office thus is meeting the needs of the minority population by ensuring that attorneys are available who can converse and understand minority clients.⁶

The right not to be arbitrarily expelled

311. During the 1990's the number of alien residents, mostly migrant workers, entering Israeli illegally, or staying in Israel illegally once their visas have expired, have dramatically increased, and was estimated to be around 120,000 by the end of 2002, 100,000 by the end of 2003, 60,000 by the end of 2004. At the peak of this trend, during 2001-2002, migrant workers (both legal and illegal) were 9.6% of the working population in Israel. These figures dropped to 7.4% by the end of 2003 due to strengthened enforcement against those entering and staying in Israel illegally and quota reduction.

312. The Entry into Israel Law (as amended in 2001) criminalizes the illegal entry or stay in Israel, which is punishable by one-year imprisonment. A person staying in Israel without a valid permit is to be removed or may leave the country voluntarily. The Law entitles foreigners, including migrant workers, to a range of substantive and procedural rights. It also uses a new terminology - removal rather than deportation, to emphasize that this is not a punitive measure, and to adjust the language to the new attitude of the law, giving greater weight to the rights of persons subject to its provisions.

313. The Law provides that persons illegally staying in Israel, held in custody until their removal, must be detained separately from criminal detainees. In addition, a list of their basic rights must be posted in a prominent place in the detention facility in both Hebrew and English. Such detention facilities are now operating in Hadera (for women), Nazareth and Zohar (for men).

314. The Law establishes in Article 13(D) a minimum period of three days between the issuance of the Removal Order and the execution of the order, to give the foreign national sufficient time to appeal the order and arrange for departure upon request. This period may be extended up to 14 days, or longer for humanitarian considerations. Such considerations may include, inter alia, the fact that the alien had been in Israel for a long period of time (Administrative Petition 998/02 Trinidad Aguila v. the Tribunal, the District Court of Jerusalem (23.01.2003).

315. Any person arrested for illegal stay must be brought before the Border Inspector (from the Ministry of the Interior) within 24 hours, and provisional release should be considered. Failure to fulfill this time requirement should result in that person's release.

316. A special tribunal has been appointed with jurisdiction to judicially review the detention decisions of the Border Inspector, including proceedings that deal with bail and the extension of detention (Custody Tribunal). The Tribunal has been operating since November 2001, and as a rule, a foreign national staying in Israel illegally must be brought before the Tribunal no later than 14 days from his arrest. If this is not done, he must be released from detention. As the hearings are conducted in the detention facilities, this time limit is enforced, such that in practice, most detainees are brought before the Tribunal within 3-4 days. Additionally, the Attorney General instructed the police that detainees should be brought before the Tribunal within 4 days.

317. The Custody Tribunal has jurisdiction to confirm a detention order, to order a review within a specified time, to cancel the detention order and rule upon bail, or to change the conditions of bail.

318. In addition, a person illegally staying in Israel who was released on bail may approach the Tribunal at any time with a request to change his conditions of bail. Such a person also has the right to be present in any proceeding dealing with his case unless it is not possible to locate him by reasonable efforts. In addition, he is entitled to be represented free of charge by a representative who is not a lawyer.

319. A person who has been detained, but for reasons not caused by him, had not been removed from Israel within 60 days, must be released from detention. Such a person shall not be released if the Tribunal is convinced that he poses a danger to the public, public health or state's security.

Freedom of information

320. The 1998 enactment of the Freedom of Information Law has given a solid legislative basis to the public's right of access to information. The main innovation of the law is in recognizing the right of an Israeli citizen or resident to receive information from public authorities, regardless of whether he or she has any personal interest in it, and without having to state a reason for the request. Moreover, Article 12 applies the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law to persons who are not citizens or residents of the State of Israel, regarding access to information concerning their rights in Israel.

E. Economic, social, and cultural rights

1. The right to employment

321. Overall, unemployment within Israel has been on the rise since 1996, with the figures reaching over 9% in 2001 and approximately 10.5% in 2002 and 2003. Similarly, unemployment has been increasing since 1996 for the minority sector, as in the rest of the country. Among the Arab population, unemployment rose from 6.2% in 1996 to 10.6% in 2001. The number continued to rise in the ensuing years, reaching 13.4% in 2002 and then falling to 11.5% in 2003.

322. Similarly, among new immigrants, the rate of unemployment for 2003 was 11.2%. These latter two figures are slightly higher than the overall population and essentially reflect the overall high rate of unemployment in Israel. Programs to improve job opportunities for new immigrants, as well as for other unemployed groups in the labor force, have included: streamlining public Employment Service activities to encourage employers to seek workers through the Employment Service; improving the matching of job vacancies with job seekers; temporary employment programs in the public sector; and vocational training, retraining and on-the-job training.

323. Concerning unemployment among the Israeli Arab population, the Government's resolution adopted in October 2000, as set out in full in Article 2 above, and attempts to address this gap by allocating additional resources for vocational training for this sector of the population.

324. Note as well that labor force participation of Arab women remains low, though rising slowly. During the last two decades, there was a moderate increase in Arab women's participation in the labor force, from 11% in 1980 to 14.8% in 2002. Arab women today constitute about 4% of all women in the civil labor force in Israel. In 2002, there were 252,500 employed Arabs in the labor force, 196,200 (77.7%) were men and 56,300 (22.3%) were women. 38,900 of the Arab population were listed as unemployed, 6,800 (17.4%) of them women.

325. In the Arab sector women employees earned 7% more than men. This can be explained by the fact that 47% of Arab women are employed in academic and technical professions, while 64% of Arab men were skilled and unskilled workers in construction and industry branches.

326. In the Arab sector, the majority of men (81,200) in the labor force completed 11-12 years of schooling, compared to the majority of women (32,100), who completed 13 years or more of schooling.

327. Of the women who were employed in 2003, 14.1% work as academic and professionals, 19.8% work as professionals and technicians, 26.4% as Clerical workers and 23.3% as agents, sales or service workers. Furthermore, 7.5% work as unskilled workers, 4.1% as manufacturing, construction or other skilled workers and 0.4% as skilled agricultural workers. 4.4% work as managers.

328. Regarding unemployment among the Bedouin population, their rate of unemployment today is more than 20%. In recent years, the government has undertaken projects to reduce unemployment among the Bedouin, including vocational training for adults and subsidized employment, particularly in areas related to tourism, such as in national parks and at archeological sites.

329. With respect to unemployment among women, three authorities in Israel are currently actively engaged in promoting employment opportunities for women: the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in the Prime Minister's Office; the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women; the Unit for Integration and Advancement of Women in the Civil Service Commission.

330. Women entrepreneurs face inherent obstacles, such as insufficient administration skills, difficulties in financing and low self-esteem. Consequently, several programs were developed by the Ministry of ITL through the Israel Small and Medium Size Enterprises Authority and in the Centers for Fostering Entrepreneurship for women of all sectors, including the Arab sector, new immigrants, orthodox women and single-parents. These programs include assistance funding for small businesses, feminine empowerment courses, establishment of "women only" business clubs and other activities.

331. With respect to women's advancement in the civil service, in 1999 the Unit for Integration and Advancement of Women brought before the Civil Service Commissioner the following recommendations: to require each government office to carry out a detailed investigation of women's advancement, to set specific goals on women's appointments for each government office, to include the subject of women's status in all educational activities undertaken by the Civil Service Commission and to promote changes in the Civil Service Law (Appointments) to make the director-general of each government office directly responsible for implementing the law in his or her office.

332. A significant amendment in this field was the Obligatory Public Tenders Law (Amendment No. 12) of 2002, to the Obligatory Public Tenders Law, 5752-1992 ("the Obligatory Public Tenders Law"), which in Article 2 prohibits discrimination amid the candidates in a government tender for certain grounds, including sex, sexual orientation, personal status and parenthood.

333. The gaps between men and women in women's participation in internal job-tenders in the Civil Service, both as candidates and appointees, have diminished. There were more women-candidates than men every year since 2000, with 62.36% in 2003. There were also more women appointees than men with 61.52% women-appointees in 2003. There has also been moderate progress in public tenders, yet there remains a slight disparity in favor of men (in relation to their high percentage in the civil service in general), with 49.11% of the candidates being women yet a higher rate of women-appointees (53.50%) in 2003.

334. The Civil Service Commission, following an appeal filed on behalf of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, added a segment in tender announcements regarding affirmative action for women, providing special measures for women and establishing educational programs on the issue of affirmative action for women for members of tender committees.

335. The Authority for the Status of Women and the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women are particularly active in the following two areas: encouraging Arab women to join the police force and encouraging Arab women to train as social workers in the Arab sector which currently lacks sufficient social workers.

336. Another statutory protection of employment of women was introduced via a 2000 amendment to The Women Labor Law, 5714-1954 ("The Women Labor Law"), prohibiting the dismissal of a woman due to an absence from work where it is necessary for her to hide from her battering husband.

337. Training for women - In 1999, women comprised 44% of all trainees in vocational courses provided by the Division for Training and Development in the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs (currently in the Ministry of ITL), Within retraining courses for people who hold an academic degree, women comprised 53% of all trainees. Recently, the Division for Training and Development (joined by the Women NGOs Council) initiated a unique project, aiming at increasing women's participation in its courses.

338. There are two groups – ultra-orthodox Jewish women and Arab women – who require special programs and measures, due to the cultural factors affecting their potential entry into the labor market. In the field of vocational training, the intention is to continue the policy of devoting special budgets to training for women. Some special programs are targeted to women in general, while others target especially vulnerable groups of women.

339. The Unit for the Integration and Advancement of Women has at its main goal to increase employability of women and their economic independence, through policies of professional and personal growth. The Unit's initiatives are workshops for empowerment and entrepreneurship skills, especially for new immigrants, non-Jewish and ultra-orthodox women. Participants report improved self image, personal and professional empowerment and better assessment of the job market. Participants in the Entrepreneurship Workshops report a better understanding and knowledge of the various aspects of small business establishment, and participants in the workshops in the community enjoy continued professional assistance. They also run workshops and counseling for professional working women within the community.

340. The Ministry, in collaboration with Women's Rights NGOs, initiated a program aimed at reducing poverty among women. This includes workshops on empowerment and work skills, and completion of education. The programs are running in several locations in Jewish and Arab municipalities, chosen because unemployment there exceeded 10%.

341. Migrant workers. Over the course of the last ten years there have been several key legal initiatives undertaken to amend existing legislation for the purpose of ensuring and protecting migrant workers' rights.

342. In 1991, the Foreign Workers (Prohibition of Unlawful Employment and Assurance of Fair Conditions) Law was enacted to ensure that violations of the provisions of the law with regard to employment of migrant workers are met with criminal sanctions. The Law was amended in 2000 to ensure that proper working conditions and social rights are provided to workers, and again in 2003 to meet new administrative needs which arose.

343. The Entry into Israel Law was amended in 2001 to establish a special Tribunal which provides judicial review of the detained persons who are subject to a removal order.

344. The Penal Law was also amended to include a provision defining withholding of passports as a criminal offence, and a new government bill to specifically deem trafficking in persons for labor a specific offence, was drafted by the Ministry of Justice.

345. Migrant workers in Israel enjoy additional guarantees, provided in a variety of laws:

345.1. Protection from discrimination - The Equal Opportunity in Employment Law prohibits discrimination on the basis of "nationality" or "State of origin" as regards to granting work opportunities and determining conditions of work;

345.2. Labor Standards - Israel's Labor Laws which determine the basic rights of the worker (minimum wage, hours of work and rest, prohibition on delaying salary payment, severance pay, safety in the workplace, etc.) apply to every worker, irrespective of his or her citizenship or legal status. This is also the case with regard to other rights stemming from collective agreements and extension orders.

346. The system for recruiting and employing migrant workers has been reviewed and amended to allow migrant workers to change employers, even if they were brought into Israel for a specific employer and purpose. As in most countries, a migrant worker arriving in Israel is designated for work with a specific employer, whose name is stamped in the employee's visa. A migrant worker may change employers throughout the legal duration of his stay in Israel, by following a specified procedure.

347. Israeli law explicitly prohibits employment agencies from taking any commission or fee from migrant workers or from any person working on their behalf.⁷ Violation of this section is a criminal offence.

348. The courts in Israel have served as the guardians of migrant workers' rights, providing free access to all workers, regardless of their legal status. The High Court of Justice has always opened its doors to migrant workers, and its determinations have resulted in changes in governmental policies and practices.

349. In three cases, the Supreme Court, acting as the High Court of Justice, brought about a change in the practice of administrative and enforcement authorities towards migrant workers. In H.C.J 155/97 Alonim INC v. The Minister of the Interior et al (12.02.2001) the Court abolished the requirement that employers pay bonds to ensure the departure of their assigned migrant workers. Such bonds imposed a heavy burden on the employers, and in some cases, led to violence and coercion towards the workers to prevent them from leaving their employers.

The requirement was therefore abolished effective January 2001. In H.C.J 01/8088 Valentin Fridinand et al v. The Minister of the Interior et al. (21.11.2001), the Court expressed harsh criticism of the practice of legally “binding” a worker to a specific employer. Accordingly the Ministry of the Interior reviewed its procedures and now permits workers to leave their employers and to find new employers, without immediately forfeiting their legal status. In response to H.C.J 2117/97 Paltia v. Israeli Police regarding non-enforcement of article 376A of the Penal Law prohibiting the withholding of passports, a new Police Guideline regarding enhanced enforcement of this offence has been drafted and implemented.

350. Labor Courts and District Courts have proven to be as vigilant in protecting migrant workers’ rights as the High Court of Justice.

351. As mentioned above, in 2002 the Government decided on the establishment of an interim Immigration Administration in the Police, to operate until the establishment of a national Immigration Authority. The national authority would coordinate all aspects of entry into Israel of foreign nationals, including migrant workers. The interim Administration has been quite active in operating with NGOs, addressing complaints, and meeting with foreign representatives. A special unit within that body – the Crime Unit – is charged with investigating offences committed against migrant workers, by employers and others.

352. Furthermore, the enforcement unit in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and labor has been enhanced. The inspectors in the enforcement unit investigate suspected violations of criminal provisions of the Foreign Workers Law, as well violations of the Minimum Wage Law, 5747-1987 (“The Minimum Wage Law”), as they relate to migrant workers. There also has been a focus on punishing employers of migrant workers and ensuring that salaries and monies owed are paid in full.

353. For further data regarding the overall status and characteristics of the Israeli labor force, see attached Annex 1.

Remuneration

354. Minimum wages. The Minimum Wage Law was amended and strengthened in 1997. The law is enforced by the Enforcement Division of the Ministry of ITL. The Ministry’s inspectors regularly conduct on-site inspections at work places throughout the country. Employers who violate this law are fined or, in rare cases, prosecuted, and are required to pay workers the differences between the actual wages paid and the statutory wages, in accordance with the Law.

355. Enforcement covers all workers: Israeli adults, teenage workers, foreign workers, and workers hired by manpower contractors, etc.

356. In 2000, the policy concerning the enforcement of the minimum wage was revised. It was decided that an expanded effort will be made to take legal action against employers violating the Law, seeking compensation from the employer for the workers - especially in serious cases.

2. The right to form and join trade unions

357. The legal protection for the right to organize in trade unions is recognized in Israel and equally applies to all individuals. This right was expanded, by several important judicial decisions.

358. In the case of Mifaley Tahanot v. Israel Yaniv (46/3-209 National Labor Court, 05.11.96), the Court cancelled the dismissal of two workers after finding that the real ground for dismissal was their initiative to organize a workers committee. The company had no previous workers organization. This landmark case was important in two respects. First, it laid down two alternative legal grounds for the recognition of the right to organize as a basic right: a) the right derives from the concept of human dignity entrenched in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty; b) the right derives from the general right to equality, namely the prohibition to discriminate against workers on irrelevant grounds, like involvement in organizational activities.

359. This ruling was reinforced in the Horn & Leibivitz Transport Co. v. The Histadrut case (99/323 National Labor Court, 26.07.99). This company had dismissed a group of drivers who tried to organize themselves into a union, just after the "Histadrut" Workers Union had expressed its willingness to recognize it under its federation. The Court recognized the right to organize in labor unions as a basic human right. The remedy of reinstatement was declared the most effective one in order to protect this right, since an employer might not be deterred by the threat of compensation alone, while deciding how to respond to his employees' organizational activities. Interestingly, the company then reacted by firing about a hundred more drivers, arguing that it had to close the whole department. The Histadrut threatened the company that it intended to appeal to the Court in a contempt of court proceeding. The conflict ended by the signing of a collective agreement with the company.

360. In the 1998 case of Delek, the Israeli Petrol Company v. The Histadrut (98/4-10 National Labour Court, 29.10.98), the National Labour Court extended the concept of the legal basis for the recognition of the right to organize, already introduced in the Mifaley Tahanot case mentioned above. The Court ruled in favour of the protection of such workers' right to organize. The Court developed the interpretation of the legal right to organize on the basis of the non-discrimination principle. Since the dismissed employees who submitted the complaint were mostly members of the representative labour organization at the place of work, the court ruled that consideration by the employer of union membership, when deciding upon economic dismissals, amounted to unjustified discrimination between workers.

361. The right to organize a trade union applies to all groups and workers. The right was further qualified in the landmark decision of Tadiran Keshet Inc. et. al. v. The Histadrut (97/41-96 National Labor Court, February, 1998). The National Labor Court sought a balance between the basic right of employees to organize and to choose their representative organization, and the employer's basic right to property entrenched in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The employer's prerogative to manage his business was here countered by the workers' basic rights. The Court held:

“When balancing between the workers' right to organize and the employer's right to manage his business, a special weight should be given to the workers' right, because their fate is embedded in the rights that are to be entrenched in the collective agreements applying to them. The employer's right to be part of a change in the bargaining unit is a relative one and is subordinate to the condition that it is not intended to impair organizational rights of workers... The employer and the labor union have therefore to agree on the structure of bargaining appropriate for them. In a democratic society there is great importance in granting dignity and liberty to each worker. An expression of this is the worker's power to participate in the determination of the bargaining unit in which he belongs. This includes the power to influence changes in the bargaining unit, by way of negotiations between the labor organization which represents the workers and the employer who provides them with work."

3. The right to housing

The housing situation in Israel

362. There is a disparity between the percentage of individuals who own their homes in the minority sector (approaching 93% in the 2000 survey) as opposed to the 50-70% figures for the Jewish population residing in principal urban locales such as Tel Aviv or Haifa. This disparity indicates a different approach towards property and land ownership, especially among the family-oriented clusters favored by the minority populations, as discussed below.

Non-discrimination in housing

363. Special attention was accorded to the Bedouins living in houses illegally constructed. In addition, the relative situation of Arab Israelis continues to be a source of concern, even though important improvements can be reported whereby the Government instituted significant plans to improve their situation and overall status.

Israeli Arabs

364. As mentioned in detail above (Paragraph 36 onward), in H.C.J 6698/95 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (ILA), The High Court of Justice has held that the State of Israel was not permitted, by law, to allocate State land to the Jewish Agency for Israel for the purpose of establishing a community which would discriminate between Jews and non-Jews.

365. As a response to the Ka'adan ruling, the Israel Land administration, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency for Israel, has issued new admission criteria to be applied uniformly to all applicants seeking to move into small, communal settlements established on state-owned lands. Admission decision would be made by admission committees, subject to review by a Public Appeals Committee.

366. In H.C.J 2101/99, Shibli and ACRI v. Minister of Construction and Housing (21.04.2002), the Israel Supreme Court was faced with a challenge to the allocation of rental benefits, the claim being that the method of allocation unfairly discriminated against minorities. During the submission of materials to the Court, the Government noted a recent change to its allocation policy that would remove any distinctions with regard to benefit allocations. Basically, the determining factor is linked to the number of residents and the percentage of housing used for rental properties. The complainant nevertheless claimed that the Government's policy was discriminatory in result because most Arab towns were small and thus not entitled to such benefits. The Court held in April 2002 that the Government should be given the opportunity to implement the new program to adequately determine whether it is discriminatory in result. No further action has been taken in the case since then.

367. Another notable case concerning rental benefits was before the Be'er Sheva Administrative Court, A.C.A. 335/04 Vered Pinhasi v. State of Israel, (22.11.04). The claimant was married to a non-citizen Palestinian with 5 children and in dire need of rental assistance. The State denied such benefits because she was married to a non-citizen. The Court however held that such a basis was incorrect and against the interests of justice and fairness, such that the claimant and her family should not be denied such assistance.

Outline plans for Arab towns and villages

368. Over the course of the last few years, the Israeli Government has placed an emphasis on improving Arab villages and towns. To this end, it has promoted local outline plans (for the development of Arab villages and towns) and allocated funds to support their development. The Government adopted a series of decisions on giving priority to the preparation of outline and zone plans in the Arab sector (January 1998, March 2000, June 2004). The planning budget for the preparation of the outline and zone plans is approximately 56 million NIS. A national project to promote outline and zone plans in the Arab sector currently takes place in around 60% of the settlements of the Arab sector and may be expanded. In addition, The Ministry of the Interior currently employs 309 employees at the department for the non-Jewish communities.

369. As previously mentioned (See Article 2), the abovementioned plans are meant to respond to expected population growth until the year 2020 and to allocate sufficient land to this end. Where there is need for public lands, the Israel Land Administration (ILA) allocates land for the purpose of establishing public institutions and housing for residents who are not landowners. A comprehensive national outline plan, dealing with construction, development and preservation (National Outline Plan #35) is near completion and will be presented for governmental approval in 2005.

Recent developments

370. In March 2000, the Government promoted planning initiatives in 21 towns and villages in the Arab sector in five districts. To date, planning has commenced in two districts. The budget allocated for this project amounts to 17.7 million NIS for 2001-2003.

371. Additionally, the Planning Administration and ILA are working on outline plans for 36 Bedouin and Arab towns and villages in northern Israel. Planning has already been completed for 34 of these communities, as will be discussed in Article 5. An inter-ministerial committee headed by the Ministry of the Interior and in cooperation with the Ministry of Construction and Housing is currently preparing outline plans for an additional seven Druze, Bedouin and Arab towns. Five more communities await approval of completed outline plans.

372. As mentioned above, a new District Outline Plan for the northern district of Israel is expected to be approved shortly. The majority of the suggested development is in the central sector of the Galilee, in which most of the population is Arab. The accelerated development of this sector will increase the standard of living for both population groups, especially the Arab population due to its greater size. Furthermore, the scheme gives special consideration to the special demographic needs of the Arab population, which are higher than the Jewish population group, addressing in particular overcrowding, capacity for enlargement, and establishing industrial zones.

373. It should be noted that in a recent survey, it was found that of 79 villages with a mostly Arab population, 45 had approved outline Plans, and 6 had approved Comprehensive Plans, with the rest in various approval or planning stages, as detailed in Table 2 below.

Eastern Jerusalem

374. All building plans are subject to approval by the District Planning and Building Committee. The rate of application for building permits corresponds approximately with the percentages of the population. For example, in the first half of 1999, approximately 20% of the total number of applications was received from residents of the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. Of the total applications for building permits which were received, approximately 60% of those submitted by residents of the eastern neighborhoods were approved and approximately 67% of those submitted by residents of western Jerusalem were approved.

375. In western Jerusalem, building violations almost invariably consist of illegal additions built onto a legal building, such as a room in a courtyard or an attic annexed in a roof space. In the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem, they typically take the form of entire buildings illegally constructed without a permit. An additional problem exists concerning the use of public lands for private housing, a matter the Knesset has begun to address via the establishment of a Committee on the matter. Thus, demolitions in the eastern part of Jerusalem are far more extensive than in the western part of the city.

376. With respect to demolitions of illegal buildings, the policy of the Municipality of Jerusalem is to issue a demolition order in cases where the construction of such illegal buildings interfere with plans for public facilities, such as schools or roads, or with the city's historical heritage. The Ministry of the Interior also has the authority to demolish illegal buildings.

377. It should be stressed that all demolitions are conducted in accordance with due process guarantees after a fair hearing subject to judicial review with the right to appeal and without distinction on the basis of race or ethnic origin. Those affected by a demolition order are entitled by law to appeal to the Supreme Court. In general, demolition orders regarding illegally constructed buildings are issued in cases where buildings interfere with plans for the construction of public facilities such as schools or roads; pose a safety threat to their inhabitants; or interfere with historic landmarks.

378. Throughout the past years, there has been a growing trend of illegal construction of buildings without a permit in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. In 1997 the total number of new illegal buildings was 202; in 1998 it was 485; and in 1999 it was 554. Only a small number of demolition orders are actually carried out each year, as presented in the following table.

The Bedouin illegal villages

379. As of October 2004, approximately 94,000 Bedouin (61% of the total Bedouin population) live in planned, urban towns. All towns were planned for “low-rise construction” in order to address the Bedouin community’s basic needs. The members of the abovementioned Bedouin community were allocated larger portions of land per person than any other sector of the Israeli population. The remaining 58,000 Bedouins (39%) reside in hundreds of illegal clusters over an area of more than half a million dunams obstructing the urban expansion in the greater Negev area and the common good of the Bedouin population.

380. The existing towns can accommodate most of the needs of the Bedouin population. In all of these towns vacant lots await additional occupants. It is important to clarify that in Israel every interested party can initiate a plan, and build a town with the approval of the relevant authorities (subject to certain conditions). For example, an agrarian farm is being promoted by Bedouins on their lands in the Negev (Kuchle Farm).

381. Notwithstanding, a decision was made to build seven additional Bedouin towns and to expand the existing towns on land owned by the Government and at the government’s expense. It is important to mention that between the years of 1995 and 2002 the yearly growth rate of these towns was approximately 8%, while the growth rate of the population in the “diaspora” was less than 2%.

382. The Government is in the process of establishing the abovementioned seven new Bedouin towns. The names of the towns were chosen by the Bedouin population. In addition, the government is in the process of expanding the existing towns of Rahat, Segev Shalom, Hura, Lakiya and Tel Sheva.

383. In accordance with provisions offering compensation to Bedouins moving to these towns, the Government provides the land free of charge, while the affected Bedouins receive significant compensation for any abandoned properties. Compensation is awarded both in monetary terms and in terms of land, as quantified by construction and crop value. In addition, grants are provided for the families who choose to move to existing or new towns. Since 2002, these compensation rates have risen dramatically.

384. In order to ensure the special character of Bedouin communal life and prevent exploitation of those state benefits by non-Bedouins, the State has refused offers by non-Bedouin to buy land in the areas designated for exclusive Bedouin towns.

385. The relevant planning authorities continue in their efforts to settle the Bedouin population. Following lessons learned from past planning committees, they perform this task in constant consultation with Bedouin representatives, who provide input as to their vision of every town's desired character: whether the town is being built for an agrarian population with a special need for designated flock areas; or whether the town is being planned for a group requiring that a strict separation is maintained between the various tribes; or whether the town is being designed for a population that has a more urban character.

386. A special steering committee with representatives from all Bedouin local Authorities was assembled and conducts regular meetings at which, among other issues, the planning of the future Bedouin towns is discussed.

387. In April 2003, the Government decided to allocate sizable budgets for the creation of these seven new towns as well as the expansion and improvement of existing on. In addition, a budget of 325 million NIS has been allocated to compensate Bedouins moving into towns.

388. The following table shows the data concerning lots in the Bedouin towns:

389. As shown above, there are approximately 3,700 vacant lots for occupancy by the Bedouins living in the Diaspora throughout the existing permanent towns and in addition some 4,000 lots which can be developed upon demand.

Leasing land for use as pasture grounds

390. For those interested in working in traditional occupations – agriculture and herding flocks – the Government leases approximately 135,000 dunams of land for these purposes in exchange for a symbolic payment.

391. In the spring pasture season, some 280,000 dunams of Government land are leased and pasturing is permitted in approximately 35,000 additional dunams in Army firing areas.

Planning - the Bedouin sector in the north

392. In 1998, the Government decided to embark upon a five-year program to develop the Bedouin towns in the north. The budget for this program should be 615 million NIS (approximately $154 Million), from 1999 to 2003. This program encompasses many subjects, including developing new neighborhoods, building public institutions, building roads, sewage, industrial areas, improving the education system, building social services institutions and more.

4. The right to public health, medical care, social security and social services

The right to health

393. The right to health is provided for all individuals without discrimination or distinction. Throughout the State, nation-wide health promotion programs have gained momentum during the last few years, especially those emphasizing physical activity. Thus, for example, in 1990, the percentage of smokers among people 20 years of age or older was 35 percent. In 2000, the percentage of smokers of the respective age group was 24.3 percent (among Jews, 29% of males and 22% of females; among non-Jews, 43% of males and 7.4% of females).

National health policy

The National Health Insurance Law

394. The National Health Insurance Law has greatly improved the universality and equality of health care services provided to the Israeli population as a whole, and for the Bedouin population in particular. Every Bedouin resident now enjoys comprehensive health insurance (before the passage of the law, 40% had no health insurance).

395. The National Health Insurance Law has encouraged health providers to build additional clinics in the Bedouin population centers, both in established towns and throughout the Diaspora.

396. The health tax which funds the National Health Insurance is a progressive tax, linked to income-level and not to the range of required health service. There is a requirement for a minimal co-payment for certain services. In order to avoid harming the least capable socio-economic groups and to minimize the impact on others, the following are exempt from the co-payment requirement: residents receiving supplemental income payments pursuant to the National Insurance Law, residents receiving support payments pursuant to the Maintenance (Assurance of Payment) Law, 1972-5732, ("The Maintenance (Assurance of Payment) Law") residents receiving invalidity or disability payments pursuant to the National Insurance Law, and residents who have AIDS, cancer, dialysis or other specified illnesses (partial exemption).

Vulnerable groups

397. The effects of the Health Insurance Law on vulnerable groups are clearly apparent. Since the enactment of this law, the health funds have rapidly improved their services, especially within Arab communities, in order to increase their membership and accordingly their funding (which the law sets pursuant to a per capita formula). Citizens of Israel, Arab and Jews alike, enjoy good quality healthcare that corresponds to international standards.

Gaps between the Jewish and Arab population

398. The gaps between the Jewish and the Arab population have been considerably reduced and Israel's Arab population's initial low level of health has risen at an extremely high rate in the past fifty years, faster than the Jewish population's health level. Today, Arab citizens of Israel enjoy a level of health that corresponds to the level among Israel's Jewish population.

399. Current figures indicate that the non-Jewish population has a higher percentage of vaccination (95%) than the Jewish population, since some ultra orthodox Jews do not vaccinate their children. Life expectancy is as follows:

400. Since the late 1940's, the average life span of the Arabs in Israel has increased by 27 years and the gap between Arabs' and Jews' life spans diminished from 15 to 2.1 years: In 2002, Men: Jews – 78.1, non-Jews – 74.7; Women: Jews – 81.9, non-Jews – 77.9, and the gap continues to decrease.

Infant mortality rate in Israel

401. The Infant mortality rate for the overall Israeli population per 1000 births for the year 2003, was 4.96:

- 401.1. 3.5 per 1,000 births among the Jewish population;
- 401.2. 8.77 per 1,000 births among the Muslims;
- 401.3. 3.24 per 1,000 births among Christians; and
- 401.4. 7.09 per 1,000 births among Druze.

402. In 2003, there was a 10% decline in infant mortality in the Jewish sector and 8% decline in the Arab sector. This decline (compared to 2002) is linked to the decrease in number of low-weight births and a decrease in the number of deaths of multiple-fetuses pregnancies. The most prevalent cause of death in all sectors was still premature birth.

403. In the Arab sector there is a large gap between the infant mortality rates per 1000 births of Muslims (8.77) Druze (7.09) and Christians (3.24). It should be noted that there exists a particularly high rate of infant mortality in the South (mostly Bedouins -13.3 in 2003 and 17.1 in 2002).

404. The relatively high infant mortality rate among Muslims and Bedouins stems from a number of factors, among them the high rate of consanguineous marriage - approx. 40% in the Arab sector and approx. 60% in the Bedouin sector, (these kinds of marriages lead to a high rate of birth defects), religious prohibition against abortion, even in medically recommended cases, as well as socio economic differences.

405. 34% of the infant mortality rate in the Arab sector was due to birth defects - the most common reason for infant mortality in this sector; whereas the rate was 27.59% in the rest of the population.

406. The Ministry of Health monitors annually the rates of infant mortality and its causes and makes recommendations accordingly (for example: following the finding that there is a high rate of infant mortality in multiple-fetuses pregnancies, it recommended that in the course of fertility treatment only two fetuses shall be returned to the womb).

407. The Ministry is currently working intensively to reduce the Israeli Muslims Arab infant mortality rate through a Health's education/information project. The central aims are to discourage marriage among close relatives, attempt to encourage pregnant women to make more use of diagnostic procedures during pregnancies, and encourage mothers to make more use of the Mother and Child Care Services dispersed throughout the country.

408. A new project of pre-conception intervention aimed at reducing congenital malformations has been launched and 60% of the targeted population is in the Muslim Arab population. Note that infant mortality in the Muslim Arab sector has declined each year.

409. Since 1996, the Ministry of Health has been funding a program aiming at reducing infant mortality, through a multiphase, multidisciplinary program. This program has been designed in concert with the Bedouin population to be culturally sensitive and appropriate. The Public Health Services initiated the program. The program was executed at first in Rahat in 1996 and was expanded in 1998 to the entire Bedouin sector. The project operates through Arab-speaking female instructors, who educate prospective mothers on the importance of regular visits to the doctor during pregnancy. Amongst the topics the instructors address are the importance of medical examinations to detect birth defects during pregnancy and awareness of the consequences of consanguineous marriage.

410. Infant-Care Clinics - Following a Government decision to establish new infant-care clinics in the Arab sector, nine new clinics will be established in the following towns: Mousmous, Baka El-Garabia, Ein Ashala, Arara, Paradis, Bartaa, Zilpa, Um el-Kutuf and Ein Ibrahim.

411. Family Health Stations - During the period between 1993 and 2000, the Ministry of Health established 84 family health stations in the Arab and Bedouin sectors and 16 in the Druze sector.

412. Health Clinics - Brookdale Institute research indicates an increase in the rate of establishment of new clinics, bridging the gap between the Jewish and the Arab population and an improvement in the level of health services provided by HMOs in Arab towns.

413. Nurses – According to figures dated December 2000, there are 28,200 licensed nurses in Israel, 2,802 of them are non-Jews (9.9%). Out of the 17,316 practical nurses in Israel, 2,813 are non-Jews (16.24%).

414. The Mentally Ill - In the year 2000, the Law on the Rehabilitation and Integration into Society of the Mentally Ill, 5760-2000 ("The Law on the Rehabilitation and Integration into Society of the Mentally Ill") was enacted. The Law requires the State to support the mentally ill financially and in other regards, based on a list of criteria, which determine the extent of such support. One of the criteria which make a person eligible for additional assistance is speaking Arabic as a native tongue. Another criterion is living in the periphery. Many Arab towns are located in the periphery (30% of the Galilee, 50% of the Negev), which creates another benefit for eligible citizens in these towns.

415. Health Stations - The Ministry of Health allocated 10 million NIS for construction of family health stations and oral health stations in the Arab-sector communities, a sum of 2.5 million NIS was disbursed each year during the period of 2001-2004.

The Bedouins

416. The Bedouins living in existing Bedouin towns enjoy the same services provided to all Israeli citizens, some of which are adapted especially to their needs. Unfortunately, many Bedouins choose to live outside permanent towns, in living conditions considered inadequate by the Ministry of Health. Thus, additional funds shall be allotted towards the development of their health services and the Government is doing all it can to provide sufficient health care to Bedouins in illegal villages.

417. All of the Bedouin towns have connections to running water. Recently, five of the seven future public service centers, which will provide the future needs of the local population, were connected to the water grid, through the national water company (MEKOROT).

418. These public service centers consist of most of the public and communal structures, such as schools, kindergartens, health clinics, municipal facilities, welfare, community and commercial areas.

419. The community living in these clusters can connect itself to the water supply through the Water Connections Allocation Committee, which has been operating under the Administration for the Promotion of Bedouins since 1997. Within the last six years, the total number of connections to the main water lines has increased from 60 connections to 260.

420. The establishment of a sewage system is under the authority of the local government and the minority localities receive loans for this purpose. It should be mentioned, that these loans are more generous than those allocated to Jewish localities.

421. The relatively high rates of intestinal infections and pneumonia among children in the Bedouin population, is a direct result of their living conditions – their harsh ways of life, close proximity to animals, crowded quarters, the use of water from immovable water sources and improper nutrition.

422. Sixty percent of Bedouin live in established towns, with municipal infrastructure, including running water in every home (meeting the Israeli standards for drinking water quality), electricity and sanitation services, as well as all the usual municipal services, such as local health clinics for curative as well as preventive maternal and child health care and educational services.

423. Six new Mother and Child Health Clinics (Tipat Halav) have recently been constructed in the illegal villages in addition to the existing station, the eighteen Mother and Child Health Clinics located in Bedouin towns and a mobile family care unit.

424. Nine Health Fund medical clinics (Kupat Holim) have been built to provide for the medical needs of Bedouin living in illegal villages, in addition to the 32 Health Fund medical clinics already existing in the Bedouin towns.

425. Two mobile immunization teams managed by the Ministry of Health provide home immunizations to infants of Bedouin families living outside of permanent towns, whose families do not bring them to one of the Mother and Child Health Clinics for treatment. A computerized tracking system allows the Ministry of Health to identify, at any point in time, infants who are behind on their immunization schedule, and send one of the mobile immunization teams to immunize them. The 1999 figures indicate that 90-95% of the Bedouin children have completed all necessary vaccinations by age three – a sizeable increase compared to the equivalent rate in 1981 of 27%.

426. A mobile team, run by Soroka Hospital in Beer Sheva, in cooperation with the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, provides follow-up home care to Bedouins who live outside permanent towns after they have been discharged from the hospital, in case they need additional medical care in their homes. The Soroka Hospital also runs a special mobile eye care (ophthalmology) unit.

427. A course for qualified Bedouin nurses opened in 1994. Since then, 34 students have graduated from the nursing course and 32 are currently participating in the course. It should be noted that the students participating in the third course committed to serve their first 3 years in practice after graduation wherever the Ministry of Health decides their services are needed. This will guarantee that the trained nurses serve the target population, the Bedouins.

Migrant workers

428. In July 2000, The Foreign Workers Law came into force. Under this Law, the Minister of Health is to promulgate regulations defining an assortment of services that insurance companies are required to supply to migrant workers. The regulations were enacted in 2001. As for the migrant workers' children, the Ministry of Health published a tender to supply them with health care services. One of the health funds was chosen as a supplier, and the arrangement, which took effect on February 1, 2001, applies the following rules:

- 428.1. Children born in Israel can be enrolled in the health fund chosen in the tender within six months from the child's birth, if at least six months have passed since the mother's arrival in Israel. Then, the child will be immediately insured. Failing to enroll the child within a period of six months shall result in a delay of six months in the child's entitlement to the health fund's services. However, every child is immediately entitled to emergency services without any waiting period.
- 428.2. Children not born in Israel can be enrolled in the health fund chosen in the tender no earlier than six months from the child's arrival in Israel. The child's entitlement to the health fund's services shall begin 6 months from the date of enrollment. Again, emergency services will be provided without any waiting period. The arrangement is to apply to all children of foreign workers, regardless of the legality of their parents' stay in Israel.

The right to social security and social services

429. Special Assistance of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs Programs to Combat Poverty: During the years 1995-1999, there was a five-year program of development in the Druze and Circassian sectors. This program included a budget of 1,070 Million NIS (approximately $250 Million), which targeted different objectives, such as sewage, water, roads, electricity, health, housing and others.

430. The Ministry of Social Affairs provides social services to all sectors of society, with no discrimination.

5. The right to education and training

431. One of the enumerated purposes of the education system in Israel is to ensure equal opportunities for all children, as noted in Article 2(8) of the Education Law, 5713-1953 ("The Education Law"). Similarly the Pupils Rights Law, 5761-2000 ("The Pupils Rights Law") in Article 5(A) (1) disallows any form of discrimination concerning the registration of students by the governmental and local authorities or any educational institution.

432. A key goal of the Israeli education system is to ensure that policy makers, administrators, educators, education providers, and the communities themselves will be involved in the effort of providing full opportunity for all young people to participate in the education options best suited to them, and to achieve a high standard of education whatever their race or socio-economic status. This is evident even in the pre-school years, whereas the Government committed itself in August 2003 to establishing a special needs nursery for deaf children in various Arab towns in the same manner as was done for Israeli children. The commitment to establish the nursery arose as a response to a petition filed to the Supreme Court by a number of Arab municipalities.

433. The Ministry of Education regards the need to deal with the gaps in the educational system in Israel as its main obligation. The main priorities for the Ministry beginning in 1999 were the following: bridging gaps by elevating peripheral municipalities and weak population groups; affirmative action for the Arab educational system; elevating special education; and increasing the number of students with matriculation entitlement.

434. The leading programs implemented to fulfill these goals are as follows:
- 434.1. Implementing the Free Compulsory Education Law starting with ages 3-4 in places of need in all population groups.
 - 434.2. Several programs focused towards raising the level of matriculation entitlement.
 - 434.3. Several support programs such as special education assistance of which 23% of such students were from the Arab sector in 2002 (compared with only 1.6% in previous years), support counseling (which has reached 287 counselors in 2002).
 - 434.4. A five-year program for affirmative action in the Arab sector.
 - 434.5. An affirmative action program in the area of schools construction such that of the 2002 construction budget for schools, the Arab sector received over 17% of the funds. In 2003, the number of classrooms and nurseries built for the Arab, Druze and Bedouin sector totaled 1,583, as compared to the majority Jewish population that had a total of 2,683 such structures.

435. The Ministry of Education has, among other subjects, placed the following on a high priority level: reducing violence and use of drugs in schools, furthering science and technology education, and taking action for the purpose of strengthening democratic sentiments among students.

436. These subjects are closely related to bridging majority-minority gaps and assisting weak population groups.

Pupils rights

437. The Pupils Rights Law is intended to establish principles for the rights of pupils in the spirit of human dignity and the principles of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, while preserving the uniqueness of the various educational institutions as defined in the Compulsory Education Law, 5709-1949, the State Education Law, the Special Education Law 5748-1988, ("The Special Education Law"), and any other law.

438. Under Article 3 of the Pupils Rights Law, every child and adolescent in the State of Israel has a right to education in accordance with the provisions of the Law.

439. Under the Law, it is forbidden to discriminate against a pupil based on his/her ethnicity; socio-economic standing, or political orientation of the child or of the child's parents. Under Article 5(b) of the Law, any person who infringes the provisions of this article shall be liable to imprisonment for one year, or a fine, as provided under Article 61(a)(3) of the Penal Law. The Law forbids discriminatory behavior in all of the following:

- 439.1. The registration of a pupil;
- 439.2. Admission to or expulsion from an educational institution;

- 439.3. The establishment of separate tracks or the development of separate educational curricula in the same educational institution;
- 439.4. The establishment of separate classes in the same educational institution;
- 439.5. The Rights and obligations of pupils, including discipline of students and the application of disciplinary practices.

440. The Ministry of Education has completed a guide to students' rights that was distributed amongst all students and published in Hebrew and Arabic.

Statistical data

441. Literacy - Israel has a very low rate of illiteracy – 4.8% (men – 3.1%, women – 6.4%). There is a 3.6% illiteracy rate in the Jewish population and a 10.3% illiteracy rate in the non-Jewish population. The older population is mostly accountable for this gap, such that among the younger population, the differences considerably decrease, as indicated by Annex 2 attached at the end of this report.

Attendance rates in the education system

442. There are approximately 1,270,000 pupils in schools: about 79% of them are in the Jewish sector and 21% in the non-Jewish sector. The table in Annex 3 indicates a decrease in all sectors of the number of pupils who do not attend school.

Education

443. The number of persons with only four years or less of formal education has continued to decline, and there has been an improvement in the situation in all sectors. Among the non-Jewish population, the number of such persons decreased from 15.9% in 1994 to 10.4% in 2003.

Higher education

444. The number of persons with higher education among the Jewish population grew between 1980 and 1999 by about 88% (from 20.8% to 39.0%); among the non-Jewish population, the number of persons with higher education grew by about 156% (from 7.7% to 19.7%). All these figures are higher than those observed in 1995, as indicated by Annex 4.

Drop-out rates

445. In the Jewish sector there has been a slight reduction of this phenomenon, but in the non-Jewish sector there has been a slight increase, although it may be characterized as stable, as demonstrated by Annex 5. The reason for that is that these figures relate only to attendance in institutions under the supervision of the Ministry of Education and many of the non-Jews students are enrolled in institutions under the supervision of the Ministry of Social Affairs. Moreover, combining the figures of attendance in institutions under the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Social Affairs and the former Ministry of Religious Affairs, the drop-out rates show a trend of stability or even a slight reduction. Since the 1990's, in both Jewish and Arab education sectors, the percentage of attendance among female pupils has been higher than that of male pupils every year.

446. Recent studies indicate the existence of a gap in the dropout rate between the Jewish and Arab sectors. The rate in the Jewish sector is 4.9%, while the rate in the Arab sector is 10%. The majority of dropouts are of the age of 15 to 17. There are 60 regular truancy officers who work in the Arab sector and promote programs discouraging students from dropping out of school.

447. The Table below shows an increase in the percentage of pupils entitled to matriculation certificates upon their graduation from high school. The increase is especially notable in the Bedouin, Druze and Arab education sectors.

Source: Central Bureau of Statistics, 2004.

448. The numbers continued to increase, rising in 2002 to over 33% for the Arab sector (up from 28% in 2000) over 25% for the Bedouins living in the Negev (up from 16% in 2000) and 35% for the Druze (up from 28% in 2000). Furthermore, in higher education there is a trend towards an increasing number of graduating students, with more women graduates than men.

Education in the Arab sector

449. The issue of eliminating disparities in the educational system in Israel is a priority of the State of Israel. According to the Central Bureau of Statistics from 2003, the total number of schools in the Arab educational system was 629 out of a total of 3,700 schools nationwide. The number also included 72 schools for the Druze population. The curriculum requirements are essentially the same for all population groups, save for the Arab schools maintaining a stronger focus on the Arab language as opposed to Hebrew when studying literature and grammar.

450. The Education and Welfare Services Department in the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport (EWS) is responsible, since its establishment in the 1970s, for the advancement of weaker populations by applying special programs and projects in the educational system. For the first ten years of its existence, the EWS did not handle the Arab and Druze sectors, which were dealt with by a special unit in the Ministry of Education.

451. In 1997, following a petition to the Supreme Court of Justice of the Legal Center for the Rights of Arabs in Israel, demanding that the Ministry of Education apply the EWS special reinforcement programs in the Arab municipalities, as well as the Jewish ones (H.C.J. 2814/97 The High Follow-up Committee on Matters of Arab Education in Israel et al. v. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport (13.01.1998)), the Ministry of Education set up a special committee, headed by Professor Miriam Ben-Peretz, (The Ben-Peretz Committee) for the development of a five year educational plan for the Arab sector for the years 1999-2003. In 1998, the Ben-Peretz Committee presented a comprehensive report, offering a variety of recommendations, including comments that the following developments shall take place:

- 451.1. 1,600 new classrooms be built (including those to be used as kindergartens and for special education purposes) within five years;
- 451.2. Programs offered by the Education and Welfare Services Department (EWS) be expanded;
- 451.3. The Tutorial Project (Perach), in which university students give tutorials to school children in need of additional help be expanded;
- 451.4. An experimental program geared towards lowering drop-out rates be set up in the five municipalities (and be used as a model for future, similar programs);
- 451.5. The scope of teachers' training, and the establishment of regional centers for teachers' training be expanded;
- 451.6. 50 teachers be granted scholarships in the field of science and technology;
- 451.7. An accelerated program be introduced in the Arab sector in order to attract gifted students. The Committee also recommended that vocational programs be established to cater to the needs of weaker students;
- 451.8. The budget for school construction and science lab equipment be increased;
- 451.9. Methods for identifying special needs children be improved and that the work hours of educational psychologists be expanded – adding approximately 13,000 academic hours and 120 positions;
- 451.10. The number of children in every class be reduced;
- 451.11. Regional educational centers be introduced into the system.

452. The implementation of the Ben Peretz Committee Report was conducted through a five-year plan. This plan was supported by a budget of 250 million NIS (approximately US $62.5 million), which was to support affirmative action programs; the allocation of 37% of the pre-school education budget to the Arab municipalities, the allocation of 29.5% of the Ministry's construction budget towards the construction of classrooms in the Arab schools; double funding of special education in the Arab sector by making it 18% of the total budget. In addition it should be noted that the number of teaching positions in the Arab sector increased by 25% as well.

453. The steering committee for the program has determined a basic program for its application, based on the recommendations of three different committees (including the Ben Peretz Committee). Accordingly, the program's main goals in the Arab sector include:

- 453.1. Increasing the number of Arab pupils eligible for matriculation;
- 453.2. Increasing the amount of teachers training programs;
- 453.3. Improving and expanding the services of psychologists and councilors;
- 453.4. Improving special education;
- 453.5. Improving technological education;
- 453.6. Training the teaching, psychological and counseling staffs;
- 453.7. Reducing dropout rates.

454. Throughout the year 2000, the program addressed the following issues:

- 454.1. Reducing dropout rates;
- 454.2. Upgrading 1,526 computer stations;
- 454.3. Supplying scientific equipment to kindergartens and primary education schools;
- 454.4. Increasing the number of pupils eligible for matriculation;
- 454.5. Developing curricula;
- 454.6. Training teaching staff.

455. Israel's Arab population's initial low level of education has risen at an extremely high rate in the past fifty years, faster than the Jewish population's education level. Today, Arab citizens of Israel enjoy a good level of education according to any international standard.

456. From a ratio of 1:3 Arab to Jewish boys enrolled in elementary school and 1:15 Arab to Jewish girls in 1943/44, in 2001/02 the gap between Arab and Jewish children's enrollment in elementary school was less than 1%.

457. The percentage of students completing 12 years of schooling has risen in the Arab sector from 56.7% in 1995 to 71.2% in 2000 while the percentage of Jewish students finishing 12 years has remained the same.

458. Over the last three years there has been a sizeable increase in the percentage of pupils in the Arab sector that have qualified for a matriculation certificate (from 28.95% in the year 2000 to 33.69% in the year 2003).

459. Schools in the Arab sector have on-average 31.2 pupils per class. Over the last ten years, the average number of students per class has decreased in all sectors, and is currently as follows:

459.1. Elementary schools - 26 students per classroom in the Jewish population and 29 students per class in the Arab population.

459.2. Junior high schools – 30 students per class in the Jewish population and 33 students per class in the Arab population.

459.3. High school – 30 students per class in the Jewish population and 33 students per class in the Arab population.

Construction of new schools

460. In recent years the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has allocated special budgets for building new schools, and expanding and renovating existing ones. This trend continues to date.

461. In 2000, 779 million NIS (approximately $192.7 million) were allocated to the development budget. In addition, 693 million NIS (approximately $171.4 million) were allocated in 2000 for the continued construction of 1,880 new classrooms, 25 million NIS (approximately $6.2 million) for the renovation of school buildings, 18 million NIS (approximately $4.5 million) for equipping new classrooms, and 20 million NIS (approximately $4.9 million) for schools' peripheral expenditures.

462. In 2001, a total of 456 classrooms were built within the Bedouin Sector (approximately 3% of the Israeli population), while 2,683 classrooms were built in the Jewish Sector (app. 80% of the Israeli population) in the same period. The Ministry of Education allotted 700 million NIS (approximately $174 million) for construction of classrooms in elementary and high schools in the Arab sector, in addition to pre-compulsory kindergarten classrooms.

463. By contrast, in 2004, where the overall budget was reduced by around 2% despite an increase in students, the development budget was 455 million NIS, with 85% of that total (389 million NIS) going towards construction of classrooms. In the past few years, there has been a steady increase of students without a corresponding increase in the budget.

464. Technological Education has become increasingly popular in the Arab sector. It should be noted that in 2002, 5.5 million NIS was allocated towards installing additional equipment in technical schools and introducing additional 30 new technology classrooms in the Arab sector, in which information technology, biotechnology, designing arts and architecture are taught.

465. Despite the lack of resources, there are 115 psychologists in the Arab sector, who enjoy a larger budget than their Jewish counterparts. There is also a special training program for psychologists who are interested in working in the Arab sector, offered at Beer Sheva and Haifa Universities. In addition, 3,000,000 NIS were allocated to improve the results of the Wexler test in the Arab sector and to increase awareness and change perceptions of psychologists in the Arab sector.

466. There are 27 Educational Counselors in the Arab sector, with a special emphasis on affirmative action measures needed in this sector. All four Israeli universities offer a special training program for Educational Counselors who work or wish to work in the Arab sector.

467. Further resources were allocated towards purchasing computers for schools in the Arab sector (currently – 79.5% of the schools possess computers) in order to facilitate increased access to computers among Arab children. This purchase added 2,000 computers to the school system, as well as science labs completed in 80 of Arab sector high schools and junior high schools.

468. Special Education programs in the Arab sector are identical to those in the Jewish sector, and pupils are given the same amount of time and resources. Certain affirmative action measures have been undertaken to overcome previous misallocation. In the last year, there was a 38.3% increase in the number of children attending special education programs in the Arab sector. Moreover, 40 of the 233 special education schools address the needs of the Arab sector exclusively, and the average number of children in a special education class in the Arab sector is lower than that of a class in the Jewish sector.

The Extended School Day and Supplementary Education Law, 5757-1997 ("The Extended School Day and Supplementary Education Law")

469. In 1990, the Knesset enacted the Long School Day Law, which was replaced by the Long School Day and Enrichment Studies Law. The purpose of this Law is to add study and education hours to the existing hours in educational institutions. This Law is aimed to further advance equal opportunity in education, and contribute to helping the children make the most of their natural abilities. It provides that four school days per week shall be at least eight academic hours long. The Law is being gradually implemented, with a preference to municipalities and neighborhoods in need of additional assistance in education. Thus in 2002, of the 100 municipalities that had received budgets to implement an extended school day, 37 were from minority communities.

Promoting the Arab sector's access to higher education

470. An analysis of the trends in higher education among Arabs in Israel shows that there has been quantitative and qualitative progress over time. This fact is manifested by the impressive growth in the number of Arab graduates, by the spread of Arab students over various areas of study and by the progressive rise in the representation of women, who today make up about half of the entire Arab student body in Israeli institutions of higher education. Despite these achievements, however, representation of the Arab population in institutions of higher education is still low, both at the student level and at the level of academic staff and administrative employees. At a time when Arabs constitute about 17% of the total population of Israel, in the 1998/99 academic year Arab students constituted only 7.1% of the students in universities and 5.6% in academic colleges. Representation of Arab students in the pre-academic programs of the institutes of higher education was also relatively low at 3%. On the other hand, the percentage of Arab students in the same year in teacher training colleges was 17.3%.

471. The Council for Higher Education, the State institution responsible for higher education, including teaching and research (hereinafter: the Council), operating under the Council for Higher Education Law, 5718-1958, ("the Council for Higher Education Law") has taken several decisions in recent years aimed at promoting access of Arab students to higher education.

472. On July 27, 1999, the Council issued a decision that allows Arab students to spread their academic studies over four years (instead of the standard three years), while paying tuition fees for only three years.

473. On June 27, 2000 the Council made a declaration (approved at the Council meeting of November 7, 2000) that it regards favorably the establishment of an academic college in an Arab locality.

474. The Council held a special session regarding the situation of Arab students in higher education institutions. The Council was presented a position paper incorporating data on higher education among Israeli Arabs. The paper was presented by Professor Majid Alhaj, a Council member.

475. The issue was brought for deliberation in the Planning and Budgeting Committee (hereinafter: the PBC), as part of its resolution on higher education among the Arab population from July 1999.

476. The Council resolved to take note of the PBC resolution and to appoint a committee to handle the special problems of Arab students in institutions of higher education given the importance of the matter and desire by the Government to properly address the problem. This step accords with the general policy of the Council and PBC, emphasizing the social aspect of higher education and the important function which the institutions of higher education fulfill in the context of community development and bridging gaps. Indeed, the Committee's recommendations were unanimously adopted by the Council in a resolution taken on 8 January 2002 and the PBC was charged with exploring the financial requirements of implementing these recommendations.

477. Within its letter of appointment dated December 12, 2000, the Committee was requested to formulate a general overview on the advancement of higher education among the Arab population in Israel. At the same time, the Committee was requested to examine programs to be submitted by the institutions of higher education for advancement of Arab students and to advise PBC on the modes of remunerating the institutions for initiatives and achievements leading to the broadening of access for Arab students to academic studies and support programs, to reduction of the dropout rate of such students and to increase in the number of Arab students studying for master's degrees in general, and in research tracks, in particular.

478. The Committee discussed five main topics during the course of its deliberations:
- 478.1. Access of the Arab population to higher education;
 - 478.2. Pre-academic programs;
 - 478.3. Information and support centers;
 - 478.4. Assistance and support mechanisms and modes of integrating Arab students studying at institutions of higher education;
 - 478.5. Integrating Arab faculty members and administrative employees in institutions of higher education.
479. The Committee, headed by Professor Majid Alhaj, met several times and following deliberations proceeded to formulate principles and recommendations, as set forth below in Annex 8.

The Dovrat Committee

480. In September 2003, a national task force for the advancement of education in Israel ("Dovrat Committee") was established by the Israeli government. The Committee was to carry out a comprehensive examination and review of the education system in Israel, to recommend on a structural, organizational and pedagogical transformation program; and to outline its implementation. The members of the Committee include education oriented persons, from the academy and the practice, law and economy experts, businessmen and public figures. The Committee's Report was issued on January 2005. Its conclusions were adopted except for two budgetary issues, in Government Decision No. 3060, dated January 16, 2005. The following are the Committees' recommendations regarding the Arab education system:

Organization of the public Arab education system

481. The organization of the public Arab education system, in its various levels, will express the autonomous content of the public Arab education, as defined below.

482. "We recommend the following:

- 482.1. The advisory council for the Arab education issues, established in 1995, will function in a continuous manner as an advisory body to the Minister of Education, on Arab education issues. We recommend that the advisory council will be headed by a person of Arab origin, who has a high pedagogical and academic position and that the members of the council will be education and academy persons, from the Arab sector. The function of the council will be, inter alia, to lead the Arab education system and to influence it towards the fulfillment of the standards and improvement of its achievements. All of these recommendations stem from partnership and increasing efforts by the State, the Arab education system and the Arab society, as a whole.

- 482.2. A representative from the Arab education system will be a member of the Unit for Educational Development, as part of the unit management. This representative will be responsible for the Arab heritage curriculum and recommend unique curriculums within the framework of the school autonomy, concerning the Arab schools.
- 482.3. Arab scholars and education personnel will be integrated in all levels and branches of the Ministry of Education.
- 482.4. A Regional Education Administration, in which there are Hebrew and Arab schools, will appoint a representative for Arab education issues, who will advise on matters related to those schools, in general, and on the appointment of principals, in particular. In a Regional Education Administration, in which over 50% of the pupils are Arab, an Arab person will be appointed as the director or deputy director of the Regional Education Administration.
- 482.5. Arab schools will conduct studies 5 days a week. The rest day of the Arab-Muslim schools will be Friday and of the Christian education system will be Sunday. Instructions concerning the activity during the additional day of the week, which apply to Jewish schools, will apply also to the Arab schools.
- 482.6. We took note of the Ministry of Education's intention to cancel, as soon as possible, the position of the deputy in charge of the Arab Education Department. We recommend that in the future, a similar position will not exist in the Arab Education Department or in its branch. The District Education Administration and the Ministry of Education will be responsible for the prevention of appointments of or the dismissal of teachers, principals and other functionaries, who do not fulfill the purposes of the State education, Jews and Arab alike.

483. Curriculums which will give expression to the educational and cultural needs of the Arab sector.

- 483.1. We recommend that concerning that part of the core program, which does not consist of heritage studies and in which there is no cultural element par excellence – as math studies, nature studies, geographical studies, sciences and all the practical professions, the curriculum for the Jewish and Arab sector should be identical, that the study books should be identical except for the language, that the changes inserted in the books should be minimal and no cultural adjustment should be made in them. Names of towns and geographical places should appear according to their official names.
- 483.2. Topics pertaining to the history of the State of Israel and the shared history of Jews and Arabs in the country may be the subject of controversy. We recommend that these topics should be discussed in a public joint Jewish-Arab committee, which will act according to the format of the committee, which was established concerning civic studies. The introduction of new programs in the Arab sector will be performed after consultation with Arab educational and academic persons.

483.3. We recommend that in the framework of the curriculum – in both the core program, as well as in the independent curriculum of the Arab schools, emphasis in its implementation should be on the Jewish history and tradition as well, especially underlining the Jewish-Arab tradition, the heritage of Spanish Jewry and Arab Jewry. We are of the opinion that it is proper that a recommendation in this spirit, should also apply to the Jewish schools in all its streams, which will educate about the history and heritage of the Arabs. We recommend that the curriculum on Hebrew literature in the Arab schools shall include written Arab works of Hebrew authors. Likewise we recommend that parts of the Bible should be studied, which have parallels in the Quran.

483.4. We recommend that in the framework of the studies of the heritage, which are part of the core studies in the Arab education, should safeguard the rights of the various communities, including the specific history and the heritage of the community to which the school belongs. Pupils choosing a school teaching a specific heritage to which they themselves do not belong, will not be entitled to demand studies of their heritage in the framework of that school, unless the school offers this, within the framework of its autonomy.

484. Teachers' training for Arab education will be constructed in different models.

484.1. We recommend that the colleges for training education workers, Hebrew and Arabic, will be open for students, Jews and Arab, by their qualifications, without derogating from the Arabic courses in Jewish colleges.

484.2. The training of teachers for the Arab education system will be conducted in three possible alternative courses:

484.2.1. A course in which Arabic teachers will be trained in an Arab college.

484.2.2. A unique course for training Arabic teachers that is delivered by a Hebrew college for teachers.

484.2.3. A non-Arab teachers training course (in a university or in Hebrew colleges for teachers training).

484.3. Special courses will be offered in the Arab colleges for Jewish teachers that will teach Arabic in Hebrew schools, simultaneously, special courses will be offered in Jewish colleges for Jewish Teachers that will teach Hebrew in the Arab schools.

Reciprocal measures and "lowering the walls" between Jews and Arabs

485. We see great importance in strengthening the ties between the Jewish and the Arabic People. Therefore we suggest the following:

- 485.1. We recommend that the parents will have the right to "cross the lines" and choose a Jewish school or an Arab school as they see fit. And at the same time, we see fit to authorize the regional education administration to determine rules for that matter, including the maximum number of Arab pupils in a Jewish school and the maximum number of Jewish pupils in an Arab school, thus preventing the turning of a Jewish school to an Arabic school and vice versa.
- 485.2. We see in a positive light the establishing of bi-lingual schools in which Jewish and Arab pupils study together. We see this kind of schools as a possible exception - a super-regional school. We see in those kinds of schools a recommendable effort for bringing people closer together, and also as a testing ground for joint learning programs in all schools in Israel. It should be considered, under the current budget limitations, to allocate special funds towards promoting the integration of Arab and Jewish pupils in the same school.

486. We recommend that in the framework of lowering the walls that separate the two societies, the Hebrew language lessons in the Arab educational system be strengthened in all educational stages, in order to achieve success in higher educational institutions and reach full integration in the public daily life and economy of the country.

487. In this frame, it is recommended to recruit Arabic speaking Jewish teachers, to teach Hebrew mainly in high schools, and Arabic speaking teachers to teach Arabic in the Jewish schools, all of the above following suitable professional training."

The Bedouin sector

488. The Bedouins living in existing towns enjoy the same rights and opportunities as other Israeli citizens, including the right to receive formal education at all levels, in accordance with the laws of Israel. Indeed, their situation concerning education has considerably improved over the past years, as indicated by the information provided in Annex 6.

489. All the Bedouin pupils study in 53 primary schools and 10 secondary schools. To date, there are 16 schools for the Bedouin population and eighty kindergartens for children from the age of three. Since 1998, three new schools have been built. Several kindergartens have also been established on the premises of existing elementary schools. As noted, a total of 456 classrooms were built within the Bedouin Sector (approximately 3% of the Israeli population), while 2,683 classrooms were built in the Jewish Sector (approximately 80% of the Israeli population) in 2001.

490. The education system in the Bedouin sector faces many difficulties that are partially the result of the unique Bedouin life-style in a plethora of illegal villages as well as their culture. All the schools in the Bedouin sector have electricity, provided by generators, and are directly connected to water pipes. Bedouin pupils enjoy the same standards of transportation to and from school as their Jewish peers.

491. Bedouin schools have on average 31.2 pupils per class, an average similar to the national average; all teachers teaching in the Bedouin sector have the same certification requirements as all other Israeli teachers. A high percentage of the teachers attended a full academic program as part of their training.

492. The Ministry of Education held special training programs for kindergarten teachers, teachers, principals and counselors from the Bedouin sector. Such training was funded by the State at a cost of 570,000 NIS.

493. There exists a shortage of psychologists in the Bedouin sector, but since 2002, efforts have been made to add psychologists in the Bedouin community. Be'er Sheva University has initiated a special training program for psychologists in the Arab and Bedouin sectors. Currently, there are nineteen active psychologists working in the Bedouin sector, seven in the illegal villages.

494. There are twenty-four educational counselors in the Bedouin sector. Unfortunately many principals fail to recognize the importance of their work. Accordingly, a special consultant was appointed to assist these counselors and promote their work amongst principals.

495. Bedouin children aged 3 and 4 from illegal villages have a higher attendance rate in state nursery classes (35.9%) than the remaining general population of Israeli children (29.7%).

496. Recent studies indicate that there is an 11.58% high-school dropout rate in the Bedouin sector, compared to a 4.53% dropout rate in the Jewish sector. There are 8 regular visitations supervisors in the Bedouin sector that promote programs discouraging dropping out of school.

497. The Ministry of Education operates adult education programs which include 20 classes in six different towns, including the illegal villages, teaching reading and writing as well as specific topics and lectures for women on current events.

498. Over the last five years there has been an substantial rise in the percentage of pupils in the Bedouin sector taking matriculations exams (up from 19.7% in the year 1998 to 53.8% in the year 2002), as well as a huge leap in the percentage of pupils entitled to a matriculation certificate (from 15.5% in the year 1998 to 42.8% in the year 2002).

499. Special Education programs in the Bedouin sector are identical to those in the Jewish sector, and pupils are given the same amount of time and resources. Certain affirmative action measures have been undertaken to overcome previous misallocation.

500. Three special classes for hearing-impaired children have opened in the Bedouin sector, with special funding for equipment provided by the Department of Social Security. Special training programs are held for teachers in this sector, as well as a unique two-year program for teachers specializing in the field of educating the hearing impaired. Nationally, all hearing-impaired children, regardless of their ethnicity, suffer from the dearth of funds.

Illegal Bedouin villages

501. With regard to education, it should be emphasized that pupils in illegal villages are entitled to the same level of education as all other pupils in Israel. However, for obvious reasons, it is not possible to build elementary and high schools in every village, whether legal or not. Hence, 11% of the pupils of Israel (Jews and non-Jews) study in regional schools that serve rural localities. Thus, it is not uncommon for Israeli localities not to have their own local schools.

502. Furthermore, the special situation of pupils from illegal villages is given consideration by the education authorities. The education system allocates extra resources (primarily study hours) to schools whose pupils suffer from environmentally caused academic deficiencies. A special index is used to determine the eligibility of schools to receive such additional resources and one of the criteria of this index in the non-Jewish sector is the inclusion of pupils from illegal villages. In other words, the higher the percentage of pupils who come from families that reside in illegal villages, the more resources are allocated to the school. Thus, schools with pupils from illegal villages receive additional teaching hours which enable them to deal with the specific problems of this population (most notably, poor domestic complementary studying conditions).

Migrant workers' children

503. During the last decade, many migrant workers arrived in Israel from all over the world. At present, there are approximately 2,500-3,000 children of migrant workers living in Israel. Some of their parents have visas and work permits, and some have remained in Israel illegally. Children of migrant workers are entitled to free education within the public school system, regardless of the legality of their stay in Israel. This entitlement begins 3 months after their arrival (during the initial three months period they are considered tourists).

6. The right to equal participation in cultural activities

Funding of cultural events

504. The Ministry of Education. The object of The Department for Arabic Culture of the Ministry of Education is to promote and develop Arabic Culture while preserving the cultural and ethnic uniqueness. The Department does so by encouraging and financing many institutes, events and projects that help to reach this object. The Department supports Arab writers, theaters, publications, colleges, research centers for the Arabic language etc. During the year 2000, the budget for the Department was, 6,032,000 NIS; in 2001 it was, 7,500,000 NIS, and 7,175,000 NIS in 2002.

505. The Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport. The Department of Arab culture, a division of the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, initiated, encouraged and developed a wide variety of cultural and scientific activities for the Arab sector. The Department made special efforts to preserve Arab culture by funding Arab theaters and literature. It also undertook research projects in the areas of the Arabic language, Arab literature and Arab and Islamic heritage. The Department supported festivals and libraries in Arab villages and certified art tutors and teachers. Additionally, the Department awarded scholarship for Arab students who study art at the university level and beyond.

506. Between the years of 1999 and 2000 the Department allocated a total of 25 million NIS for cultural and scientific projects and events. In addition, a sum of 6.7 million NIS was also allocated between 2000 and 2002 for the purpose of renovating cultural buildings. 752,000 NIS were also granted to support Arab music, while Arab theaters received more than 6.2 million NIS in 2000.

507. After the reorganization of the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport continues to carry out these tasks.

The role of mass media and communication in promoting participation in cultural life

508. The importance of ensuring participation in the media is reflected in the legislation regulating the activities of the two main T.V. authorities in Israel:

508.1. The Broadcasting Authority Law, 5725-1965 ("The Broadcasting Authority Law") – The Law regulates the activities of the Israel Broadcasting Authority (IBA), currently responsible for two TV channels and ten radio channels. The IBA now also broadcasts over a satellite channel (Channel 33), which until recently, mainly aired the sessions of the Israeli parliament (the Knesset) and its committees. One of the Authority's roles as defined in the Law is to provide TV programs in Arabic to meet the needs of the Arabic-speaking population and to promote understanding and peace with Israel's neighboring states.

508.2. The Second Authority for Television and Radio Law - In March 2000, the law was amended, establishing a requirement for broadcasting programs in the Arabic and Russian languages, through speech or translation. The required figure is not less than 50% of the total broadcasts for each language (Article 4 of the amendment). The amendment has also changed the Second Authority's functions and duties. They now include catering to the needs of the Arabic speaking sector, promoting peace and understanding with neighbouring states and to give a proper venue to the cultural diversity of the Israeli society (Article 5 of the Second Authority Law).

509. The electronic media (i.e., television and radio) broadcasts Arabic-speaking programs throughout the day; and one licensed local radio station broadcasts solely in Arabic. The Ministry of Communications decided to promote the establishment of six new TV channels in Israel, including an exclusive Arabic-speaking channel.

510. In addition, the Ministry of Communication has taken measures to open the media market to a multiplicity of broadcast-providers and diversity in the contents of broadcasts. Such measures include the opening for competition of the paid cable services market, the establishment of an additional commercial channel and the establishment of specialty channels.

The status of the Arabic language

511. According to Article 82 of the King's Order in Council on Palestine – 1922, Hebrew and Arabic are the official languages of the State of Israel. This is also reflected in several provisions of the Israeli law, which mandates the use of the two languages, cumulatively or alternatively in public life. The right of Arabic-speaking minorities to use their language is generally recognized and observed. Furthermore, the presence and use of the Arabic language is prevalent within the Government and Arabic is used in every aspect of public life in Israel.

512. Justice Cheshin of the Supreme Court in P.C.A 12/99 Jamal v. Saback (25.04.1999) stated:

“... The Arabic language is the language of approximately one-fifth of the population – the language of conversation, of culture and of religion – and this share of the population is a substantial minority, whom we ought to respect – the minority and their language. The State of Israel is a Jewish and democratic state, and being what it is, it has a duty to respect the minority within it: the person, the person’s culture and the person’s language.”

513. Official documents. Under a specific directive issued by the Attorney General, it is prohibited to oblige a citizen to translate an official document originally in Arabic to Hebrew, such as a marriage certificate, divorce certificates etc., as long as the certificate was issued by an authority which is recognized by the State of Israel. In addition, the Attorney General’s directive prescribes that the Government must make legal forms available in both Hebrew and Arabic.

514. Vehicle license plates. Under a specific directive issued by the Attorney General and directed at the Ministry of Transportation (26.03.1998), new car license plates are to bear the name of the State of Israel in Arabic as well as in Hebrew. The objectives of the new directive are to emphasize the official status of the Arabic language in Israel, as well as to increase consciousness of the needs of minorities in Israel.

515. Public tenders. The Attorney General has directed all legal advisors in the civil service that public tenders are to be published in both an Arabic language newspaper and a Hebrew one, as well as to be made available on the internet (17.06.1999). The directive stresses that it is prohibited to distinguish between public tenders according to their relevance to the Arab sector. Furthermore, the duty to translate the public tenders into Arabic is the Government's duty.

516. Municipal public notices. Pursuant to H.C.J. 1114/01 Adalah v. Municipality of Haifa (31.12.03) the applicant desired to obligate the Municipality to advertise notices in Arabic at the municipality's expense in Arab language newspapers. The Municipality agreed to advertise for the Arabic speaking public, pursuant to their customary practice and in the exact same manner as advertised for the Hebrew speaking public. Particularly, the Municipality agreed to publish the following in such a manner:

- 516.1. All official municipal notices, such as public tenders, planning and building notices, and all statutory notices;
- 516.2. All related municipal services (such as school registration or traffic notices);
- 516.3. All advertisements that relate to cultural activities open to the general public such as concerts and performances.

517. Road signs. Following H.C.J. 4438/97 Adalah V. Public Works Department (25.2.98), the State took upon itself to complete a plan to add Arabic to all existing intercity and highway roads. During the past 5 years, 15,000 signs on major roads and highways have been altered to include both Arabic and Hebrew, along with all new road signs.

518. H.C.J. 4112/99 Adalah v. Municipality of Tel Aviv PD 46(5) (25.5.2002) dealt with the duty of municipalities in which there exist an Arab minority to use the Arab language along with Hebrew in all municipal signs. Chief Justice Barak on behalf of the majority required Arabic to immediately be used in all new signs or instances where old signs are replaced. In major thoroughfares or public institutions, and side streets in districts with a significant Arabic speaking population, signs must be altered within 2 years. Finally, regarding remaining signs, the Chief Justice required a change within 4 years from the date of the judgment.

519. A 2000 amendment to the Second Authority for Television and Radio Law established a requirement for broadcasting programs in the Arabic and Russian languages, through speech or translation. The required figure is a 50% minimum of the total broadcasts for each language (Article 4 of the amendment), as reported above in this Article in the section on the Second Authority for Television and Radio Law.

520. A few other examples: The Planning and Building Law, 5725-1965 ("The Planning and Building Law") requires the publication of official planning and building plans in Arabic-speaking newspapers, if the plans cover an area where 10% or more of the population's native language is Arabic; the Public Tender Regulations, 5753 -1993 requires publication of all public tender ads in Hebrew and Arabic newspapers; the Work Safety Ordinance (New Version) 5730-1970 requires posting of the summary of safety regulations in Hebrew and/or Arabic so that all workers will be able to read them.

Arabic education

521. Of particular importance is the use of Arabic in the education system. In Arab and Druze schools, Arabic is the teaching language; and is taught in most Jewish schools. Arabic Language and literature are also taught at all Universities in Israel.

522. The approach to studying Arabic language and Islamic civilization is historical, cultural, linguistic and textual, and students read a broad range of writings: Islamic religious texts, classical (medieval) Belles Lettres, and modern and contemporary literature. Linguistics is studied through classical grammatical texts as well as modern style. Changes in terms and concepts in the language are examined as reflections of developments in Islamic traditions, sacred texts including the Quran, Vitae Prophetarum (stories on the prophets), Arabic poetry, and Judeo-Arabic writings. Modern Arabic is part of the curriculum and students take courses in developing skills like writing letters and essays and learning spoken Arabic.

523. Arabic is also taught at several independent Colleges and Institutes among them "Ulpan Akiva", "Givat Haviva" (both of which were awarded UNESCO prizes for peace education), and "Beit Berl" College. Preparatory courses in which students can study Arabic are given in all the Universities, Colleges and Institutes mentioned above, and each year hundreds of students enroll in one of the programs that these institutes provide. The Universities award B.A.,

M.A., and Ph.D. degrees in different tracks of study such as, classical Islamic texts, classical Arabic poetry, history of Islamic religious thought, Islamic Philosophy, modern Arabic poetry and prose and Arabic linguistics. All universities and institutes have research libraries for Arabic that consists of thousands of books.

524. Several scholarly journals on Arabic language and literature are published annually.

Hostility in sport events

525. In recent years, an increase in the phenomenon of violence and racism linked to football has been taking place. This violence is exhibited by fans inside and outside of football stadiums. Verbal and physical violence and racist songs and expressions are part of this phenomenon.

526. In order to eliminate this phenomenon, the Knesset endorsed MK Avshalom Vilan's proposal to establish a parliamentary committee to examine violence in sports. The committee began its investigation on January 1, 2001 and during eight months and fifteen sessions of hearings sought operational conclusions to help reduce or eliminate altogether the phenomenon of violence in sports.

527. The Committee heard the testimony of athletes on racist and violent incidents in sport events, discussed the role of education in prevention of violence, and the need for enhanced enforcement against offenders (higher fines, etc.). The Committee is promoting several bills on the general subject of violence in sports destined to increase the safety of audience in sports events.

528. On July 18, 2001, the Committee released its interim report that included the following relevant recommendations:

- 528.1. An amendment to the law and consolidation of rules aimed at enhancing punishment and deterrence measures.
- 528.2. Consolidation of rules includes: Forbidding racist or offensive expressions - A team whose fans violate this rule would be punished by sanctions such as reducing points or barring fans from attendance at matches.
- 528.3. Holding managers, coaches and players responsible - Central figures will carry added responsibility for their behaviour and disciplinary measures will be taken against them in case of any action resulting in violence or racism.
- 528.4. To effectively eliminate the phenomenon of racism in sports, FIFA and UEFA rules should be enforced immediately and in accordance with Israeli law.
- 528.5. Educational programs including an awareness programs focusing on violence and racism and promotion of sportsmanship and fair-play in sports.

529. According to Police data there was a reduction of 20% in average in violence at the stadiums and football fields in 2001. As discussed in Article 4 above, the Commission has continued with ongoing meetings concerning relevant issues and in November 2004 submitted a proposed amendment to the existing law that also would punish racist expressions at sporting venues with a year imprisonment.

7. The right of access to places of service

Elimination of discrimination in the private sphere

530. The legal position in the area of discrimination in the private sector has changed dramatically due to the enactment of the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law. Under Article 3(a) of this Law, a provider of products or services to the public, or anyone engaged in the operation of a public place, is prohibited from discriminating on the grounds of race, religion or religious group, nationality, country of origin, sex, sexual orientation, views, political affiliation, personal status, parenthood or disability.

531. Such discrimination constitutes, under Article 5, a civil wrong, enforceable under the provisions of the Tort Ordinance. In addition, such discrimination constitutes, under Article 9, a criminal offence, punishable by fine. Under Article 11, this Law applies to the State as well. It also establishes a series of legal presumptions, shifting the burden of proof to the defendant in cases of prima facie discrimination.

532. Given the importance of the Law and recognizing the key change that it has instituted within the private sphere, a translated version of the Law's substantive provisions follows:

Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law

Object

The object of this Law is to promote equality and prevent discrimination in entry into public places and in the provision of products and services.

Definitions

2. (a) In this Law

“disability” means a physical, mental or intellectual handicap within its meaning in the Equal Rights for Persons with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998;

“personal status” means the state of a person being single, married, divorced or widowed;

“public place” means any place designated for use by the public, including a tourist attraction, hotel, hostel, guest house, public garden, restaurant, coffee house, auditorium used for entertainment and cultural shows, museum, library, discotheque, sports hall or installation, swimming pool, shopping mall, shop, garage and any place offering public transport services;

“public service” means services of transport, communications, energy, education, culture, entertainment, tourism and financial services designated for use by the public;

“financial services” means banking services, credit supply and insurance;

“transport services” means buses, trains, air transport, ships, travel services and car rental.

(b) For the purposes of this article, “public” means an unspecified public; however, a place or service shall not be deemed to be a place or service unavailable for public use by reason of denial of use or entry based on the grounds of discrimination mentioned in the Article.

Prohibition of discrimination

3. (a) A person whose business is the provision of a product or public service or the operation of a public place shall not discriminate - in the provision of the product or public service, in the grant of entry to the public place or in the provision of the service in the public place - on grounds of race, religion or religious group, nation, country of origin, gender, sexual orientation, ideology, party affiliation, personal status, parentage or disability.

(b) For the purposes of this Law, it is immaterial whether the business is made for the purpose of profit or not-for-profit and whether or not payment has been collected in consideration for provision of the product or the public service, operating the public place, grant of entry to the public place or provision of the service at the public place.

(c) In this Law, “a person whose business” includes the owner, occupant or manager of a business, as well as the person actually responsible for provision of the product or public service or for the operation of or entry into the public place.

(d) It shall not be deemed discrimination under this article:

(1) where the matter is necessitated by the nature or substance of the product, public service or public place;

(2) where the act is done by an organization or club not for profit and is done with the object of promoting the special needs of the group to which the members of the club or organization belong, provided however that these special needs are not contrary to the object of the Law;

(3) where separate frameworks are maintained for men and women and non-separation would deny to a segment of the public the provision of the product or public service, entry to the public place or the provision of the service at the public place; provided however that the separation is justified, taking into consideration, inter alia, the nature of the product, public service or public place, the measure of its essentiality, the existence of a reasonable alternative and the needs of the public likely to be affected by the separation.

Discriminatory advertising

4. A person whose business is the supply of a product or public service or the operation of a public place shall not publish an advertisement including any discrimination prohibited under Article 3.

533. The Law has been broadly interpreted as applying to a host of public places, including schools, libraries, pools, stores, and any other places that serve the public. Thus, in a recent June 2004 case before the District Court of Jerusalem, (A.C. 1320/03 Aleklesli and others v. Beitar Illit Municipality and the Ministry of Education (21.06.2004)), the Court applied the law to a private school. The Court held that no criteria existed by which to gauge the acceptance of pupils and even though it was a private institution, the school was still required to create non-discriminatory guidelines for admission, under the aegis of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

534. Note as well a decision of the Jerusalem Magistrate Court issued prior to the passage of the Law, where Justice Mizrachi found that "according to international treaties which Israel is a signatory of, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination of 1966, discrimination on racial grounds is forbidden." Justice Mizrachi noted that according to this Convention, "State parties must prohibit and abolish racial discrimination of all forms and guarantee every person's right, regardless of the color of his skin or his national origin, to equality before the law, especially with regard to privileges concerning access to places or services open to the general public." After referring to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Justice Mizrachi concluded that:

"In certain areas equality cannot be disregarded, and this comes to be expressed in the legislation of different states, and also in international affairs which seek to uphold equality. This approach stems from the fundamental nature of the value of equality and from an understanding that the absence of equality degrades an individual's human dignity. ... As mentioned before, I agree with those who reason that Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity enshrines the right of equality as being constitutionally protected. Yet, even those who believe otherwise would agree that this case falls within the same category of incidents in which the harm to one's dignity - given the denial of entrance to Arabs and the permission of entrance to Jews - is obvious. There can be no doubt that the plaintiffs, forced to turn back after having been denied entrance to the site, experienced humiliation at the hands of the management." (C.C 11258/93 Ibrahim Na'amna et al v. Kibbutz Kalia et al (01.09.1996) regarding a claim by an Arab family prevented from entering a water amusement park).

535. Tourism. The main law in the field of tourism, the Tourism Services Law, 5736-1976, forbids providers of tourism services (hotels etc.) to refuse to provide their services when the refusal is unreasonable. Any refusal to provide tourism services based on racial or ethnic origin will be regarded as such “unreasonable refusal” and may involve criminal proceedings against the provider.

536. The main guardian of the individual "against any acts of racial discrimination which violate his human rights and fundamental freedoms" is the court system. The Court system is open to all without discrimination, including to non-citizens of Israel. The individual can sue both other individuals and the Government for any wrong or harm done to himself or his property and can claim compensation or an injunction. In addition to the normal court procedure, the Supreme Court, sitting as High Court of Justice, can and does issue writs against the Government and public bodies.

537. Similarly, District Courts also have served as effective tool for preventing discrimination and awarding compensation. For example in 1576/99 Simi Nidam v. Rally Electric (05.11.2003) in the Beer-Sheva District Labor Court, the complainant was awarded the difference in compensation between the wages she received as opposed to the wages of her male counterparts in the same position. The complainant was awarded a sum of 30,000 NIS.

538. Other recent examples of cases that have been filed include the following:

- 538.1. District Court case, 7611/04 Al Kuds Restaurant v. Israel Police involving Arab residents who challenged the closing of their restaurants due to marches that were to take place on Jerusalem Day and the Ninth of Av (a day of Jewish religious fast);
- 538.2. Labor Court case, 1012/04 Chalichal v. State of Israel, claiming that his work contract was not renewed due to possible relations with a Jewish co-worker.

Other avenues

539. In addition to the Court system, there exist other avenues of redress in cases of discrimination. There are Members of Knesset, who frequently avail themselves of the parliamentary right to compel government ministers to answer parliamentary questions, a vocal press including an Arabic press, an independent State Comptroller who also acts as an Ombudsman. In employment matters, there is the Ministry of ITL, the Labor Courts system, and, when the civil service is involved, the Disciplinary Supervisor in the civil service.

Note further that the Prohibition on Discrimination in Services, Products and Access to Public Places Law, discussed above, provides for a private cause of action as well.

540. The Courts in Israel have served as the guardians of migrant workers' rights, providing free access to all workers, regardless of their legal status. The High Court of Justice has always opened its doors to foreign workers, and its determinations have resulted in changes in governmental policies and practices.

541. In H.C.J. 2442/02 Suzanna Kises and Migrant Workers Hotline v. The Ministry of the Interior (4.6.02), the Supreme Court held that the Police should not arrest a migrant worker who is in the midst of switching her work permit to another employer. The Ministry of the Interior must afford such workers reasonable time to make proper requests prior to arresting them and the Ministry was requested to draft guidelines that would make the process easier and more fluid for migrant workers. Such guidelines were in fact promulgated and are implemented by the Immigration Administration in cooperation with the Ministry of the Interior.

- 541.1. Labor Courts and District Court have proven to be vigilant in protecting migrant workers' rights as the High Court of Justice as apparent from decisions discussed above.

Article 7

Measures to combat prejudices and to promote understanding and tolerance

542. Israel is an open society with vocal parliamentary debates, a free press including multiple TV and radio stations and a politically active electorate. Activities in Israel have traditionally been very newsworthy and the foreign press corps stationed in Israel is larger than that in most countries. These elements combined with the existence of an independent judiciary ensure a very full public airing of any complaint as an alleged abuse of human rights.

543. There are a number of NGOs in Israel monitoring human rights. The leading organization is the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which is affiliated with the International League for Human Rights, New York and the Fédération Internationale des droits de l'homme, Paris.

A. Education and teaching

544. Human rights education. In 1994 the Ministry of Education adopted a new civics studies curriculum that emphasizes human rights and universal democratic principles, including the International Declaration of Human Rights. Civics is a mandatory subject for the matriculation exam. The Civics textbook, published by the Ministry of Education, includes a chapter titled "Human Rights and Civil Rights and the Rights of Minorities in Israel." The Convention is mentioned as one of the sources for the State's obligation to protect human rights in Israel. The rights enshrined in the different human rights instruments are discussed through the prism of the specific legislation guaranteeing these rights. This curriculum is identical for Arab and Hebrew schools.

545. Democracy education. The pedagogical secretariats at the Ministry of Education designed a program to promote democracy, coexistence and to fight discrimination of any kind in the educational system. During the year 2002, the Ministry of Education budgeted for the following:

- 545.1. School hours on democracy and values - 3,890,000 NIS.
- 545.2. Contracts between The Ministry of Education and external bodies that provide training in democracy and civil rights - 2,053,000 NIS.

545.3. Supporting education for democracy and coexistence - 1,029,000 NIS.

545.4. Student's scholarships in civic classes for university students - 360,000 NIS.

545.5. Teachers advance studies in civic, Haifa University - 200,000 NIS.

545.6. Teachers advance studies centers - 400,000 NIS.

Total: 7,932,000 NIS.

546. Arab-Jewish schools. Another interesting project is that of the Associated School Project (ASP), that has been operating for the last 13 years. It is one of cooperation between a school in the Arab village of Tira and a Jewish school in Kfar-Saba. This project has been maintained despite all of the hardships and changes over the last several years. Teachers, students, parents and the communities meet to discuss and to become familiar with its partner community. Every school year the students become a part of this process. This project is a basis for teaching coexistence and mutual respect among cultures and communities. Similar schools exist in Neveh Shalom, Jerusalem, and Kfar Kara.

547. Environmental education. The Ministry of the Environment has initiated an educational project of environmental conservation as a starting point for improvement of environmental Arab-Jewish relations and understanding. The project was set into motion during 2000. The project is aimed at students in both the Arab and Jewish sectors of northern Israel who study in an environmentally or scientifically oriented educational framework.

548. The environmental issue has great potential to form a basis for development of joint responsibility, cooperation, trust and tolerance between the Arab and Jewish communities. Twenty schools have participated in the program so far, 10 of which are Arab schools. A total of 1,500 students attended the program during 2001. The project entails day-long meetings that consist of working groups with emphasis on group discussions and exposure to nature (plants, wildlife and various natural phenomena). The issues being discussed combine education material concerning science and environment, and joint discussions in an effort to come up with solutions to the environmental problems which both communities' face.

549. During the academic year of 2003, the Ministry of the Environment has been conducting 7 programs within the framework of the project; some of which are annual and include several 1-2 days-long meetings throughout the year. Additionally, youth movements from the northern region of Israel have also joined the project this year. Student meetings are conducted bilingually, when the need arises. It is important to note that teachers from both sectors maintain constant working relations during the preparation and throughout the entire project.

Preventing violence and racism in sports

550. In recent years, an increase in the phenomenon of violence and racism linked to football has been taking place. This violence is exhibited by fans inside and outside of football stadiums, and in a few instances has received the tacit encouragement of football players themselves. Verbal and physical violence and racist songs and expressions are part of this phenomenon.

551. As noted in Article 4 above, to eliminate this phenomenon, the Knesset endorsed a proposal to establish a parliamentary committee, the Vilan Committee, to examine violence in sports. As discussed above, the Committee has continued with ongoing meetings concerning relevant issues and has recently submitted a proposed amendment to the existing law that also would punish racist expressions at sporting venues with a year imprisonment.

Projects to promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among nations

552. Israel was the recipient of the UNESCO Prize for Peace Education, given to the Jewish-Arab Center in Givat Haviva in 2001. This award is indicative of the fact that Israel invests a great deal of effort in education among the various communities within its society. We believe that such an approach legitimizes the social, cultural and human aspects of Israeli society's kaleidoscope. This includes the right and opportunity, both of the majority and of the minorities, to live, work and contribute in a democratic society.

553. Givat Haviva is an education, research and documentation center, founded in 1949 by Ha'kibbutz Ha'arzi Federation, in memory of Haviva Reich. The campus is located in the northern Sharon Valley (east of Hadera), Israel. The mission of Givat Haviva today is to cope with the major issues that are on the agenda of Israeli society, and to foster educational initiatives, research and community work in the fields of peace, democracy, coexistence, tolerance and social solidarity. Over 50,000 children, youth and adults from Israel and abroad participate annually in the seminars, workshops, courses, conferences and other projects offered by Givat Haviva in a range of educational, academic and professional fields. Some of its recent projects include:

- 553.1. Givat Haviva and Peace Works Foundation agreed recently to cooperate on the one voice campaign, aiming at strengthening moderate voices in the Middle East. Givat Haviva accepted one voice's invitation to support the initiative, which is in line with its objectives and aligned with its ultimate pursuits.
- 553.2. Jewish-Arab young leadership workshop with the participation of the Jewish community of San Diego, a group of high school students from Bedouin communities in the South and from the Kibbutzim of the Sha'ar Hanegev Regional Council. Following a series of meetings in the Negev and at Givat Haviva. The participants learned about Jewish and Moslem joint history in the Middle Ages and participated in study workshops on the Jewish-Arab conflict.
- 553.3. Courses in Arabic - The Institute has 40 years' experience in teaching the Arabic language.

B. Culture

554. There are many examples of cultural projects in Israel intended to promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among nations. Civil society is the leading actor in such initiatives. Several government-supported examples are worth mentioning here.

- 554.1. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has a Department for Arabic Culture in charge of promoting and developing Arabic Culture while preserving the cultural and ethnical uniqueness. The Department does so by encouraging and financing countless institutes, events and projects that helps to reach this object. The Department supports Arab writers, theaters, publications, colleges, research centers for the Arabic language etc.
- 554.2. A new youth orchestra consists of Jewish and Arab musicians, was established in 2002. The orchestra consists of 16 young musicians, and its creation was preceded by 3 years of meetings between young musicians, both Jewish and Arab. The orchestra's purpose is to carry its musical results out to Arab and Jewish audience, in order to foster mutual knowledge of these two cultures and enhance their interaction and cross- fertilization. The creation of the orchestra was made possible through the support of the former Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, The Beracha Foundation, UNESCO and the Association for the Promotion and Nurturing of Arab Music in Israel.
- 554.3. For the last ten years, a theater group called "local theater", serves as an example for cooperation between Arab and Jewish actors and play-writers. The group, along with the Arab El-Sarayah-jaffah, cooperated in the establishment of an "Arab-Hebrew theater". The theatre cultivates tolerance, understanding and mutual respect to the different cultural heritages in Israel and presents an ideal of Jewish-Arab co-existence, based on equality and mutual respect. Jewish, Arab, emigrants from Russia and Italian actors participated in the recent premiere called "yearning" which tells the story of their fathers cultural and physical uprooting. The theater offers various activities to the students and young people of Jaffa, including creativity workshops, theater workshops and assisting in the promotion of young creators. The theater is supported by the Tel-Aviv Municipality and the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport. Multicultural is not only an idiom but a fact and ideology of the theater, the theater of Jaffa operates to promote and nurture the cultural heritage of the different groups who reside in Jaffa and aspires to build a frame of Jewish- Arab co- existence through the knowledge and understanding of the two cultures.
- 554.4. The Holon Children's Museum, have recently begun using Arabic speaking guides and instituted Arab language text in their exhibits to make it more accessible to the Arab-speaking population.

C. Information

The role of State media in the dissemination of information to combat racial prejudices

555. It is recognized that broadcasting services offer a powerful means for developing a degree of harmony and understanding. As a result, Israeli legislation has provided for an expansion in the range and diversity of services, appealing to a variety of tastes and interests. The Israel Broadcasting Authority is a public broadcasting body. Thus, the directorial aspect is important, such that all regulations concerning administrative bodies are mandatory, including discrimination prohibition and adequate representation of minorities in jobs appointments. Another aspect is broadcasting contents and the way it helps to eliminate racial discrimination. The IBA as a public authority acts in accordance with the law and does not discriminate between employees on the basis of racism, color, origin, ethnicity or nationality.

556. Under Article 46(a) (2) of the Second Television and Radio Authority Law, the holders of concessions for cable television services may not broadcast any material containing racial incitement, and they bear a duty to ensure that none of their broadcasts will be liable to incite discrimination on grounds of religion, race, nationality, ethnicity, lifestyle or origin.

557. As for the broadcasting contents, the IBA recognizes the importance of eliminating racism; however it maintains deference to the freedom of expression. There are several TV and Radio Programs promoting dialogue between the different social sectors that are focused on stereotype breaking:

- 557.1.1. A children program called “Sach-Ten” is broadcast once a week. In this T.V. game show there are two mixed teams of young Arabs and Jews. Short video films enable us to get to know their way of life. The teams are challenged with trivia questions and they express their opinions on related issues. This program is broadcast simultaneously in Hebrew and in Arabic by two hosts – Arab and Jewish.
- 557.1.2. “Ahalan Vesahalan” is a weekly program where Moslem, Druze, and Circassian children meet and discuss various subjects.
- 557.1.3. “Shabat Salam” a weekly program that focuses on co-existence of Muslims and Jews.
- 557.1.4. “Promises”, a documentary movie, follows for several years, Jewish and Palestinian children and presents the conflict in the Middle East in a different light.
- 557.1.5. “The country’s heart” documentary movie dealing with three women, religious orthodox, Moslem and a new immigrant who live in Ramle with different kinds of education and way of living.

The role of mass media in the publicizing of human rights

558. Human rights awareness within the Israeli public is quite high. The language of rights has permeated the daily life in Israel. For example, a major newspaper in Israel (MAARIV) published in the beginning of 2003, a booklet called “RIGHTS – the rights we are all entitled to” – which includes a detailed description of rights in school, rights at work, civil liberties, rights of persons with disabilities and more. The booklet contains contact information of the relevant governmental offices, NGO’s and voluntary associations. The booklet can be accessed through the Internet on www.myrights.co.il.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE ADVANCEMENT OF HIGHER EDUCATION AMONG THE ARAB POPULATION IN ISRAEL

1.1. Pre-academic programs

- 1.1.1. The representation of Arab students in the pre-academic programs is extremely low, despite the fact that these programs are intended first and foremost for marginal groups, including the Arab population.
- 1.1.2. Believing in the importance of the pre-academic programs for promoting access to higher education for groups having a low starting point and the opening up of new horizons for educational and professional advancement, the Committee recommended that:
- 1.1.3. All feasible measures should be taken to raise the representation of Arab students in the pre-academic programs, including measures taken among the Arab population to raise awareness of the existence of the pre-academic programs.
- 1.1.4. Admission requirements to the pre-academic program should be adapted to the specific needs of the Arab student (completion of twelfth grade or having reached 19 years of age).
- 1.1.5. The entrance exam should be adjusted to the cultural background of Arab students or offered in Arabic.
- 1.1.6. Students participating in the program should be allowed to prepare for the psychometric examination and take it during their studies.
- 1.1.7. Pupils from the Arab sector should be encouraged to integrate within programs taking place in the institutions of higher education spread out throughout the country.
- 1.1.8. A pilot plan should be developed for a number of pre-academic programs in Arab localities that meet the academic criteria, under the responsibility of several selected institutions of higher education.
- 1.1.9. Action should be taken to find sources of financing for subsistence grants for Arab students in institutions of higher education.
- 1.1.10. Integrating Arab student counselors within existing programs.

1.2. Increasing access - information and support centers

- 1.2.1. During the deliberations of the Committee it became apparent that part of the problem of access to higher education or the dropout rates of Arab students was due to lack of knowledge and lack of professional guidance at the stage of pre-registration for academic studies. The Committee therefore adopted a proposal on the establishment of information and support centers for the Arab population.
- 1.2.2. These centers will collect information from various sources, so that current and accurate information will be made available to young men and women, in order that the option of academic studies be presented to them in the most clear and explicit manner. The centers shall be operated and information gathered in coordination with local authorities, education departments, the monitoring committee of the heads of Arab local authorities, and other entities.
- 1.2.3. Institutions of higher education should formulate a special program to strengthen ties with high schools with the object of facilitating the transition from high school to university studies.
- 1.2.4. In some fields, such as psychology, social work, and school counseling, great importance attaches to verbal and cultural communication with the client. Accordingly, the higher education system needs to train Arab students to hold positions in these areas, on condition that this is done in coordination with the Government ministries responsible in these fields and in accordance with the needs of the Arab population.
- 1.2.5. Institutions of higher education should take into account the fact that Arab students approach academic studies immediately after high school, when considering acceptance to departments and courses in which there is an age restriction on acceptance and for which there is a demand among the Arab population, such as social work. The needs of the Arab population and a lower starting point of many Arab students should be taken into account in admission considerations.
- 1.2.6. Regarding the establishment of an academic college in an Arab locality, the Committee emphasizes that determining content and structure of such a college should be based on the particular national and cultural characteristics of the Arab population in Israel and take into account the nation-wide set-up of the higher education system.

1.3. Psychometric examination

- 1.3.1. The deliberations of the Committee stressed that the psychometric examination was a main barrier restricting acceptance of Arab students to institutions of higher education, and in particular, to universities.

- 1.3.2. The Committee took the view that the psychometric examination mirrors a situation in which there are gaps in the starting point of Jewish and Arab pupils. Therefore, using the psychometric examination as a condition for admission to institutions of higher education merely entrenches the existing situation and the gaps.
- 1.3.3. Furthermore, there are a number of problems in connection with the examination itself. The psychometric examination is designed and intended mainly for students coming from a western cultural background and is thus not adapted to Arab students or even Jewish students from an Oriental background. In view of the problems specified above, the Committee recommended as follows:
 - 1.3.3.1. The psychometric examination requires revision, particularly the section on verbal thinking. Steps should be taken to ensure that this section is based on material taken from the cultural and cognitive world of the Arab student and not material that has been translated from Hebrew to Arabic. Furthermore, one problem Arab pupils encounter derives from the dual nature of the language which is a direct consequence of the vast disparity between the spoken mother tongue and literary Arabic. In actual fact, even when an Arab pupil is tested in Arabic he is coping with a second language. The problem, however, is not the level of Arabic but the character of the literary texts chosen. Thus, in the verbal part, extracts need to be chosen from more widespread literary Arabic language and not from classical language, which is far removed from the cognitive world of the pupil. Furthermore, English is a second foreign language for the Arab student (presently a first foreign language for the Jewish student). Moreover, like other weak strata of society, some Arab students have a time-management problem.
 - 1.3.3.2. For the purpose of re-examining examination content and adapting it to Arab society and culture, the Committee proposes that the National Center for Examinations and Evaluation, in coordination with the Council for Higher Education, establish a professional committee whose members shall be Arab academics. This committee shall undertake a comprehensive review of the psychometric examination so as to locate content which is problematic for the Arab population, limit the translated sections and formulate a method in which more appropriate content may be used for pupils from Arab cultural backgrounds.
 - 1.3.3.3. The Committee requests the institutions of higher education to make the grade weight of the psychometric examination for acceptance to institutions no more than 50%. Concurrently, the Committee takes the view that action should be taken to find a compensatory mechanism for weaker populations whose access to prestigious and sought-after courses is harmed because of the psychometric examination.

- 1.4. Assistance and support programs for integration of Arab students studying at institutions of higher education - Regarding financial assistance, the Committee recommended:
 - 1.4.1. Including the Arab student population within the definition of “deprived groups” entitled to such assistance.
 - 1.4.2. Formulating a plan for acceptance and advancement of Arab students at every institution of higher education.
 - 1.4.3. The Committee concurs with the decision of the Council of July 27, 1999, allowing Arab students to spread their studies over four years, paying tuition fees for only three years.
 - 1.4.4. Institutions of higher education should examine the feasibility of a review program designed for students accepted to academic studies, focusing on subjects such as computer orientation, Hebrew, English, scientific writing and logical thinking.
 - 1.4.5. The services provided to Arab students shall be taken into account in the calculation of the index of “quality of services” which determines the budgets to institutions of higher education.
 - 1.4.6. Issues of alienation and difficulties in social and cultural integration which Arab students encounter shall be dealt with by counseling within the Office of the Dean of Student Affairs and by counseling at the class level, preferably through a special unit in the office of the students’ dean.
 - 1.4.7. The Office of the Dean of Student Affairs in each of the institutions of higher education shall examine the cultural and religious needs of Arab students and shall act to meet these needs.
 - 1.4.8. An examination shall be made of problematic courses in which the failure rate of Arab students is particularly high and support courses shall be developed for such courses.
 - 1.4.9. Arab students studying in their freshman year be given extra time for examinations, as is customary for other students whose mother tongue is not Hebrew.
 - 1.4.10. Where military service is included as one of the criteria for receipt of various university services, a compensatory mechanism should be found for Arab students.
 - 1.4.11. A special plan should be developed for outstanding Arab students studying for their doctorate or in a direct doctoral program. This plan should be based on a nationwide competition in a research track within which between ten and fifteen grants would be allocated each year to outstanding students.

- 1.4.12. A national grants fund designated for outstanding Arab bachelor degree students should be set up. The capital for the fund would be raised jointly by the institute for higher education and external donors, including donors from the Arab population, with the institution matching every donation raised from external donors.
- 1.4.13. Special weight should be accorded to socio-economic background, when determining criteria for awarding grants and for accommodation in student dorms.
- 1.5. Social and multi-cultural integration on campus - The Committee concluded that socio-cultural absorption is a highly important factor in integrating students into campus life, reducing alienation, creating success in studies and turning the encounter between groups with national, ethnic and cultural differences from a “problem” into an “experience”. The Committee thus recommended as follows:
 - 1.5.1. Special plan for the intensification of multi-cultural education on campus by cooperation between the deans of student affairs, student unions and Arab student committees should be developed.
 - 1.5.2. As part of promoting a multi-cultural atmosphere on campus and among the students a number of steps having both symbolic and practical significance should be taken:
 - 1.5.2.1. Names of the institution, the faculties and various departments should appear in both Hebrew and Arabic, they being the official languages of the State.
 - 1.5.2.2. The list of holidays and festivals of Moslems, Christians and Druze should be included within the yearbook of each institution of higher education.
 - 1.5.2.3. These holidays and festivals should be respected when determining the examination timetable or any other mandatory student study activity.

1.6. Integration of faculty members and administrative personnel

- 1.6.1. Available information shows that no more than 1% of the faculty members at universities are Arab. Furthermore, there are almost no Arab administrative employees at the universities, and there are no Arabic speakers among those employees providing services to students.
- 1.6.2. One of the major goals that the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport promotes is to increase the number of researchers and scientists in the Arab, Druze and Circassian sectors. Every year since 1995, the Ministry grants 50,000 NIS scholarships to those who qualify.
- 1.6.3. It should be noted that in recent years there has been an important change, although still limited, as regards the acceptance of Arabs into senior academic positions. In this context it should be noted that more than half the Arab lecturers currently at universities were appointed thanks to grants from the Maof Fund set up in 1995 jointly by the Council for Higher Education – PBC and the Kahanoff Fund. A Maof grant is designated for outstanding Arab scientists whom the universities are interested in absorbing. Every year, four to six grants of three year duration are awarded, with the universities undertaking to budget for permanent positions at the end of the grant period.

1.6.4. It has been decided to raise the number of grants to 6-10 annually, and to open the competition for them to the academic colleges as well. To date, 32 Arab lecturers teaching at various universities and at the Technion have been absorbed by means of Maof Fund grants, making up about 50% of all Arab lecturers in these institutions. The Committee thus recommended as follows:

1.6.4.1. The absorption of Arab faculty members within the various departments is of prime importance, as it also helps enrich the study system at the institutions, as well as integrate the Arab population within this system.

1.6.4.2. In view of the success of the Maof Fund in promoting the absorption of Arab members of faculty, the Committee recommends empowering the Fund and formalizing its activities.

1.6.4.3. The absorption of Arab administrative employees in institutions of higher education in Israel is of great importance. The Committee therefore recommends that this issue be suitably placed when absorbing new employees in the various departments.

1.6.4.4. Institutions of higher education should be encouraged to take into account the needs of the Arab localities and employment opportunities when accepting students to certain courses which are in high demand in Arab localities, such as psychologists, social workers, school advisers, physical therapists etc.

To demonstrate, the Ben Gurion University in Beer Sheva recently appointed two Bedouin professors as Department Heads. One is in Sociology and the other is Middle Eastern Studies. There also are 4 Bedouin lecturers and 6 PhD students in the University.

2. Furthermore, there currently exist a number of institutions geared towards the interests and needs of the Arab sector. One is a College of the Shariah, an educational institution for the study of Islam, another two are for the purpose of training educators and are the Arabic College for Education and the Alkasmi College, and a third is a branch of the University of Indianapolis that recently opened in an Arab town in the Galilee.

3. Additionally, a number of scholarship programs have been established for the benefit of the minority Arab population, specifically to encourage minority students to attend institutions of higher education. There also are more specific awards for Druze students and for minority students desiring to study technology.

COMMITTEE ON THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
Seventieth session
19 February - 9 March 2007

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES UNDER ARTICLE 9 OF THE CONVENTION

Concluding observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

ISRAEL

1. The Committee considered the tenth to thirteenth periodic reports of Israel, submitted as one document (CERD/C/471/Add.2), at its 1794th and 1795th meetings (CERD/C/SR.1794 and 1795), held on 22 and 23 February 2007. At its 1810th and 1813th meetings (CERD/C/SR.1810 and 1813), held on 6 and 8 March 2007, it adopted the following concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee appreciates the attendance of a large delegation, and welcomes the submission of the report, which contains important statistical data and information in relation to the implementation of the Convention in Israel. The Committee regrets, however, that many of the questions sent in advance to the State party remain unanswered.

3. The Committee regrets that, despite requests made in its previous concluding observations, the report has not provided any information on the Occupied Palestinian Territories, due to the position of the State party that the Convention does not apply to these Territories. It appreciates, however, that the delegation, while maintaining its position, provided responses to some of the questions raised by the Committee on this issue.

4. The Committee notes with satisfaction that numerous non-governmental organizations contributed to the process before the Committee. It is concerned however about the discrepancy of the assessment made by the State party on the one hand, and that made by an overwhelming majority of these organizations on the other hand, of the level of implementation of the Convention by the State party.
5. Noting that the report was more than five years overdue when submitted, the Committee invites the State party to respect the deadline set for the submission of its future reports.

B. Positive aspects

6. The Committee notes with interest the role played by the Supreme Court of Israel in combating racial discrimination, for example in matters of allocation of State land, as demonstrated by its 2000 decision in Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration.
7. The Committee notes with satisfaction the domestic legislation implementing article 4 of the Convention, as well as efforts made by the State party to tackle the issue of violence and racism linked to football.
8. The Committee welcomes affirmative action programmes to ensure better representation of minority groups in the civil service and within government-owned corporations, and encourages the State party to enhance its efforts in this direction.
9. The Committee notes with satisfaction that for the first time an Arab Israeli citizen has been appointed to the cabinet.
10. The Committee welcomes the enactment of the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law (2000).
11. The Committee notes with appreciation that the civil service sector has taken steps to accommodate the different cultural and religious traditions and practices of minority employees at work.
12. The Committee welcomes efforts made by the State party to improve the status of the Arabic language, in particular steps taken to add Arabic to all existing intercity and highway road signs, as well as to municipal signs in municipalities where there exists an Arab minority.

C. Factors and difficulties impeding the implementation of the Convention

13. In the present context of violence, the Committee recognizes the difficulties of the State party in fully implementing the Convention. Guided by the principles of the Convention, the State party should ensure, however, that security measures taken in response to legitimate security concerns are guided by proportionality, and do not discriminate in purpose or in effect against Arab Israeli citizens, or Palestinians in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, and that they are implemented with full respect for human rights as well as relevant principles of international humanitarian law.

14. The Committee reiterates the view that the Israeli settlements in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, in particular the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, are not only illegal under international law but are an obstacle to the enjoyment of human rights by the whole population, without distinction as to national or ethnic origin. Actions that change the demographic composition of the Occupied Palestinian Territories are also of concern as violations of human rights and international humanitarian law.

D. Concerns and recommendations

15. The Committee, bearing in mind the oral clarification provided by the delegation, notes the absence of information on the ethnic plurality of the Jewish population of Israel, particularly in the context of the Law of Return.

The State party is requested to provide information on the ethnic composition of the Jewish population of Israel, in order to facilitate a full understanding of the implementation of the Convention in the State party's jurisdiction.

16. The Committee welcomes the fact that several pieces of legislation prohibit racial discrimination, for example in the field of health, employment, education, and access to products and services, and takes into consideration the information provided by the delegation relating to the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court. The Committee remains concerned however that no general provision for equality and prohibition of racial discrimination has been included in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (1992), which serves as Israel's bill of rights. (Article 2 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party ensure that the prohibition of racial discrimination and the principle of equality be enacted as general norms of high status in domestic law.

17. The Committee welcomes the statement made by the delegation that the Jewish character of the State party does not allow it to discriminate between its citizens. It also notes the statement that the only significant difference regarding the enjoyment of human rights between Jewish nationals and other citizens exists with regard to determining the right to immigrate to Israel, according to the Law of Return, and that such preference is made for the purpose of developing the national identity of the State party. The Committee is concerned, however, by reports that such preference is accompanied by other privileges, in particular regarding access to land and benefits. (Articles 1, 2 and 5 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party ensure that the definition of Israel as a Jewish nation State does not result, in any systemic distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin in the enjoyment of human rights. The Committee would welcome receiving more information on how the State party envisages the development of the national identity of all its citizens.

18. The Committee is concerned about the denial of the right of many Palestinians to return and repossess their land in Israel. (Article 5 (d) (ii) and (v) of the Convention)

The Committee reiterates its view, expressed in its previous concluding observations on this issue, and urges the State party to assure equality in the right to return to one's country and in the possession of property.

19. The Committee regrets that it has not received sufficient information from the State party on the status, mandate and responsibility of the World Zionist Organization, the Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund, as well as on their budgets and allocation of funds. It is concerned by information according to which these institutions manage land, housing and services exclusively for the Jewish population. (Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention)

The Committee urges the State party to ensure that these bodies are bound by the principle of non-discrimination in the exercise of their functions.

20. The Committee notes with concern that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) of 31 May 2003 suspends the possibility of granting Israeli citizenship and residence permits in Israel, including through family reunification, to residents of the Occupied Palestinian Territories, except in limited and discretionary exceptions. Such measures have a disproportionate impact on Arab Israeli citizens wishing to be reunited with their families in Israel. While noting the State party's legitimate objective of guaranteeing the safety of its citizens, the Committee is concerned that these "temporary" measures have systematically been renewed, and have been expanded to citizens of "enemy States". Such restriction targeting a particular national or ethnic group in general is not compatible with the Convention, in particular the obligation of the State party to guarantee to everyone equality before the law. (Articles 1, 2 and 5 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party revoke the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order), and reconsider its policy with a view to facilitating family reunification on a non-discriminatory basis. The State party should ensure that restrictions on family reunification are strictly necessary and limited in scope, and are not applied on the basis of nationality, residency or membership of a particular community.

21. The Committee notes with concern that military service provides highly advantageous access to various public services, for example in the fields of housing and education. Such a policy is not compatible with the Convention, bearing in mind that most Arab Israeli citizens do not perform national service. (Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party adopt measures to ensure that access to public services is ensured to all without discrimination, whether direct or indirect, based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin.

22. The Committee notes with deep concern that separate “sectors” are maintained for Jewish and Arab persons, in particular in the areas of housing and education, and that according to some information, such separation results in unequal treatment and funding. The Committee regrets that information provided by the State party on this matter was not sufficiently detailed. (Articles 3, 5 and 7 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party assess the extent to which the maintenance of separate Arab and Jewish “sectors” may amount to racial segregation. The State party should develop and implement policies and projects aimed at avoiding separation of communities, in particular in the areas of housing and education. Mixed Arab-Jewish communities and schools should be promoted and strong action taken to promote intercultural education.

23. The Committee welcomes the decisions of the Supreme Court in Ka’adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (2000) and Kibbutz Sde-Nahum et al v. Israel Land Administration et al (2002), in which it ruled that State land should not be allocated on the basis of any discriminatory criteria or to a specific sector. It notes that the Israel Land Administration, as a result, has adopted new admission criteria for all applicants. It remains concerned, however, that the condition that applicants must be “suitable to a small communal regime” may allow, in practice, for the exclusion of Arab Israeli citizens from some State-controlled land. (Articles 2, 3 and 5 (d) and (e) of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party take all measures to ensure that State land is allocated without discrimination, direct or indirect, based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin. The State party should assess the significance and impact of the social suitability criterion in this regard.

24. The Committee notes the efforts made by the State party to promote development within the Arab sector, in particular through the Multi-year Plan (2001-2004). It remains concerned however that the lower level of education provision for Arab Israeli citizens is a barrier to their access to employment, and that their average income is significantly lower than that of Jewish citizens. It is also concerned by the discrepancies still remaining between the infant mortality rates and life expectancy rates of Jewish and non-Jewish populations, and by the fact that minority women and girl children are often the most disadvantaged. (Articles 2 and 5 (e) of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party increase its efforts to ensure the equal enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights by Arab Israeli citizens, in particular their right to work, health and education. The State party should assess the extent to which the alleged discriminatory attitudes of employers against Arabs, scarcity of jobs near Arab communities, and lack of daycare centers in Arab villages are a cause of high unemployment rates among Arabs. Bearing in mind its general recommendation No. 25 (2000) on gender-related dimensions of racial discrimination, the Committee also recommends that the State party pay particular attention to the situation of Arab women in this regard.

25. The Committee expresses concern about the relocation of inhabitants of unrecognized Bedouin villages in the Negev/Naqab to planned towns. While taking note of the State party's assurances that such planning has been undertaken in consultation with Bedouin representatives, the Committee notes with concern that the State party does not seem to have enquired into possible alternatives to such relocation, and that the lack of basic services provided to the Bedouins may in practice force them to relocate to the planned towns. (Articles 2 and 5 (d) and (e) of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party enquire into possible alternatives to the relocation of inhabitants of unrecognized Bedouin villages in the Negev/Naqab to planned towns, in particular through the recognition of these villages and the recognition of the rights of the Bedouins to own, develop, control and use their communal lands, territories and resources traditionally owned or otherwise inhabited or used by them. It recommends that the State party enhance its efforts to consult with the inhabitants of the villages and notes that it should in any case obtain the free and informed consent of affected communities prior to such relocation.

26. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the laws of the State party prohibit the withholding of passports of migrant workers, prohibit employment agencies from collecting fees from migrant workers, and allow migrant workers to change employers without losing their work permit. It regrets however that it has not received sufficient information on the practical implementation of these laws. (Article 5 (e) (i) of the Convention)

The State party should make all efforts to ensure the full implementation of these laws, and provide the Committee with detailed information, including statistical data, on this matter. The Committee also draws the attention of the State party to general recommendation No. 30 (2005) on discrimination against non-citizens and encourages the State party to ratify the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families.

27. The Committee expresses concern about information, according to which the psychometric examinations used to test aptitudes, ability and personality, indirectly discriminate against Arabs in accessing higher education, an allegation that the State party has not commented upon as requested. (Articles 2 and 5 (e) (v) of the Convention)

The State party should ensure that access to higher education is ensured for all without discrimination, whether direct or indirect, based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin.

28. The Committee expresses concern at information that several laws establish Jewish cultural institutions but that none create similar centers for Arab Israeli citizens, and that the same level of protection is not offered to Jewish and non-Jewish holy sites. The Committee regrets that the State party has not commented on these allegations as requested. (Articles 2, 5 (d) (vii) and (e) (vi) and 7 of the Convention)

The State party should ensure that laws and programmes be equally devoted to the promotion of cultural institutions and the protection of holy sites of both Jewish and other religious communities.

29. The Committee regrets that the State party has not provided detailed information as requested on the number of complaints, investigations, indictments and prosecutions in relation to acts criminalized under articles 133 and 144 A-E of the Penal code, as well as on their outcomes. It is concerned by information, according to which the Attorney-General has adopted a restrained policy in relation to prosecutions against politicians, government officials and other public figures for hate speech against the Arab minority, an allegation that the State party cannot justify by mere reference to the right to freedom of expression. (Article 4 of the Convention)

The State party should increase its efforts to prevent racially motivated offences and hate speech, and to ensure that relevant criminal law provisions are effectively implemented. The Committee recalls that the exercise of the right to freedom of expression carries special duties and responsibilities, in particular the obligation not to disseminate racist ideas. It recommends that the State party take resolute action to counter any tendency to target, stigmatize, stereotype or profile people on the basis of race, colour, descent, and national or ethnic origin, especially by politicians. Recalling its general recommendation No. 31 (2005) on the prevention of racial discrimination in the administration and functioning of the criminal justice system, the Committee also requests the State party to remind public prosecutors of the general importance of prosecuting racist acts, including all offences committed with racist motives.

30. The Committee notes with concern information according to which a high number of complaints filed by Arab Israeli citizens against law enforcement officers are not properly and effectively investigated and that the Police Investigations Unit (Mahash) of the Ministry of Justice lacks independence. It regrets that the State party has not commented on this allegation as requested, nor provided any information as to whether the persons responsible for the killings of 14 Israeli citizens in October 2000 have been prosecuted and sentenced. (Articles 4, 5 (a) and (b), and 6 of the Convention)

Bearing in mind general recommendation No. 31 (2005) of the Committee, the State party should guarantee the right of every person within its jurisdiction to an effective remedy against the perpetrators of acts of racial discrimination, or acts committed with racist motives, without discrimination of any kind, whether such acts are committed by private individuals or State officials, as well as the right to seek just and adequate reparation for the damage suffered. The State party should ensure that complaints are recorded immediately, and that investigations are pursued without delay and in an effective, independent and impartial manner.

31. The Committee notes that the State party has neither established a specialized agency on racial discrimination nor a national human rights institution in accordance with the principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (the Paris Principles, General Assembly resolution 48/134, annex). (Articles 2 and 6 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party consider the establishment of a national mechanism for redress of racial discrimination either as a specialized agency on racial discrimination or a national human rights institution in accordance with the Paris Principles.

The Occupied Palestinian Territories

32. The Committee reiterates its concern at the position of the State party to the effect that the Convention does not apply in the Occupied Palestinian Territories and the Golan Heights. Such a position cannot be sustained under the letter and spirit of the Convention, or under international law, as also affirmed by the International Court of Justice. The Committee is concerned at the State party's assertion that it can legitimately distinguish between Israelis and Palestinians in the Occupied Palestinian Territories on the basis of citizenship. It reiterates that the Israeli settlements are illegal under international law.

The Committee recommends that the State party review its approach and interpret its obligations under the Convention in good faith, in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to its terms in their context, and in the light of its object and purpose. The Committee also recommends that the State party ensures that Palestinians enjoy full rights under the Convention without discrimination based on citizenship and national origin.

33. The Committee, while noting that the Supreme Court has recommended that the course of the wall be changed to prevent disproportionate harm to specific Palestinian communities, is concerned that the State party has chosen to disregard the 2004 advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the legal consequences of the construction of the wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. The Committee is of the opinion that the wall and its associated regime raise serious concerns under the Convention, since they gravely infringe a number of human rights of Palestinians residing in the territory occupied by Israel. These infringements cannot be justified by military exigencies or by the requirements of national security or public order. (Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party cease the construction of the wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, including in and around East Jerusalem, dismantle the structure therein situated and make reparation for all damage caused by the construction of the wall. The Committee also recommends that the State party take action to give full effect to the 2004 advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the legal consequences of the construction of the wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territories.

34. The Committee is deeply concerned that the severe restrictions on the freedom of movement in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, targeting a particular national or ethnic group, especially through the wall, checkpoints, restricted roads and permit system, have created hardship and have had a highly detrimental impact on the enjoyment of human rights by Palestinians, in particular their rights to freedom of movement, family life, work, education and health. It is also concerned that the Order on Movement and Travel (Restrictions on Travel in an Israeli Vehicle) (Judea and Samaria), of 19 November 2006, which bans Israelis from transporting Palestinians in their vehicles in the West Bank, except in limited circumstances, has been suspended but not cancelled. (Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Convention)

The State party should review these measures to ensure that restrictions on freedom of movement are not systematic but only of temporary and exceptional nature, are not applied in a discriminatory manner, and do not lead to segregation of communities. The State party should ensure that Palestinians enjoy their human rights, in particular their rights to freedom of movement, family life, work, education and health.

35. The Committee notes with concern the application in the Occupied Palestinian Territories of different laws, policies and practices applied to Palestinians on the one hand, and to Israelis on the other hand. It is concerned, in particular, by information about unequal distribution of water resources to the detriment of Palestinians, about the disproportionate targeting of Palestinians in house demolitions and about the application of different criminal laws leading to prolonged detention and harsher punishments for Palestinians than for Israelis for the same offences. (Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Convention)

The State party should ensure equal access to water resources to all without any discrimination. The Committee also reiterates its call for a halt to the demolition of Arab properties, particularly in East Jerusalem, and for respect for property rights irrespective of the ethnic or national origin of the owner. Although different legal regimes may apply to Israeli citizens living in the Occupied Palestinian Territories and Palestinians, the State party should ensure that the same crime is judged equally, not taking into consideration the citizenship of the perpetrator.

36. The Committee is concerned about the excavations beneath and around Al-Aqsa Mosque and the possible irreparable damage these may cause to the mosque. (Articles 5 (d) (vii) and (e) (vi), and 7 of the Convention)

While stressing that the Al-Aqsa Mosque is an important cultural and religious site for people living in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, the Committee urges the State party to ensure that the excavations in no way endanger the mosque and impede access to it.

37. The Committee is concerned by the persistence of violence perpetrated by Jewish settlers, in particular in the Hebron area. (Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention)

The Committee recommends that the State party increase its efforts to protect Palestinians against such violence. The State party should ensure that such incidents are investigated in a prompt, transparent and independent manner, the perpetrators are prosecuted and sentenced, and that avenues for redress are offered to the victims.

38. The Committee recommends that the State party ratify the amendment to article 8, paragraph 6, of the Convention, adopted on 15 January 1992 at the fourteenth meeting of States parties to the Convention and endorsed by the General Assembly in resolution 47/111. In this connection, the Committee cites General Assembly resolution 57/194 of 18 December 2002, in which the Assembly strongly urged States parties to accelerate their domestic ratification procedures with regard to the amendment and to notify the Secretary-General expeditiously in writing of their agreement to the amendment. A similar appeal was made by the Assembly in resolution 58/160 of 22 December 2003.

39. The Committee notes that the State party has not made the optional declaration provided for in article 14 of the Convention and urges it to consider doing so.

40. The Committee recommends that the State party's reports be made readily available to the public at the time of their submission, and that the observations of the Committee with respect to these reports be similarly publicized in Hebrew and Arabic.

41. The Committee recommends that the State party consult widely with civil society organizations working in the field of combating racial discrimination, in connection with the preparation of the next periodic report.

42. The Committee invites the State party to submit its core document in accordance with the requirements of the common core document in the harmonized guidelines on reporting, recently approved by the international human rights treaty-bodies (HRI/MC/2006/3 and Corr.1).

43. The State party should, within one year, provide information on the way it has followed up on the Committee's recommendations contained in paragraphs 20, 22, 25 and 34 above, pursuant to paragraph 1 of rule 65 of the Committee's rules of procedure. The Committee is aware that issues raised under paragraph 22 may not be resolved within one year, but wishes to receive comments by the State party on the concerns expressed by the Committee, as well as information on first steps taken to implement the recommendations of the Committee.

44. The Committee recommends that the State party submit its fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth periodic reports in a single document, due on 2 February 2010, and that the report be an update document and address all points raised in the present concluding observations.

Introduction

1. The Government of Israel welcomes the opportunity to present its fourteenth periodic report to the Committee for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination in accordance with the requirements of article 9, paragraph 1(b), of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (hereinafter, the “Convention” or “CERD”). This report describes the developments that have taken place since the submission of Israel’s thirteenth report on 1 September 2005 (CERD/C/471/Add.2), taking into account the concluding comments adopted by the CERD Committee on June 14, 2007 (CERD/C/ISR/CO/13). In accordance with the reporting guidelines, this report builds upon Israel’s previous reports. Accordingly, information and explanations that have been included in previous reports from the Government of Israel are not repeated in this Report, except where necessary.

2. In accordance with recommendation No. 41 to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination of June 14, 2007, (CERD/C/ISR/CO/1), all Israeli Government Ministries and institutions relevant to this Report were requested to supply data and information concerning their areas of operation. Israeli non-governmental organizations (“NGOs”) were also invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of this Report, both through direct application and a general invitation to submit remarks posted on the Ministry of Justice’s web site. Their contributions were given substantial consideration.

3. This Report was compiled by the Human Rights and Foreign Relations Department at the Ministry of Justice, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and other governmental agencies.

4. Racial discrimination is prohibited in Israel. The State of Israel condemns all forms of racial discrimination, and its Government has maintained a consistent policy prohibiting such discrimination. The Israeli Government has taken comprehensive measures to uphold the provisions of CERD since its ratification of this important instrument.

5. Since the submission of Israel’s thirteenth periodic report to the Committee in 2005, many significant legislative, judicial and administrative developments relevant to the Convention have occurred. This Report provides a comprehensive account of these developments.

6. A short summary of several of the most significant policy and legislative developments that have occurred in Israel since Israel’s last Report to the Committee is provided below. Please note that while it will naturally take time for some of the more recent developments to translate into concrete results, in many areas substantial new measures that give effect to the provisions of the Convention have already come into effect.

7. In accordance with recommendation No. 39 to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination of June 14, 2007, (CERD/C/ISR/CO/1), we would like to note that Israel routinely considers its position with regard to Article 14 of the Convention, but that based on the experience of other states and on the current work of the Committee, it does not consider it appropriate to accept this optional procedure at this time. Under Israel’s domestic legal system, any alleged victim of violations has full access to seek effective redress and judicial review in Israeli courts, as well as in many other venues, as detailed in Israel’s Core Document.

Legislative measures

8. Since the submission of Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, significant new steps have been taken by the Israeli Parliament (the "Knesset") to promote tolerance and the elimination of racial discrimination in all its forms. Some noteworthy examples are cited below.

9. The Prohibition of Violence in Sport Law 5768-2008 (the "Prohibition of Violence in Sport Law"), came into effect on August 12, 2008. The new Law was enacted in order to facilitate safe and peaceful participation in sporting events, by broadening the definition of a racist display and facilitating training for security personnel, as well as by expanding their responsibilities and authorities. The Law further establishes a Committee for the Prevention of Violence in Sport geared towards the elimination of this phenomenon. Section 15 of the new law expands the offence, which was previously incorporated in Section 11A2, of the Safety in Public Places Law 5723-1962 (the "Safety in Public Places Law"), which prohibited racial expressions during sport events, by effecting several important amendments (please see further discussion in the section addressing Article 7 below).

10. In accordance with recommendation No. 29 to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination of June 14, 2007, (CERD/C/ISR/CO/1), which calls, inter alia, for increasing increase efforts to prevent racially motivated offences and hate speech, and to ensure that relevant criminal law provisions are effectively implemented, on February 25, 2008, Section 145 of the Penal Law 5737-1977 (the "Penal Law"), which refers to illicit association, was amended (Amendment No. 96) to include subsection 2A, which prohibits the gathering of people, associated or not, who preach, incite or encourage racism, including preaching, inciting or encouraging the principles of Nazism or the National Socialist Party. According to Sections 146 and 147 of the Penal Law, a person who preaches or encourages the activities forbidden in Section 145 will be sentenced to a maximum of three years' imprisonment, and a person of the age of 16 or over, who is a member, an employee or an agent of an illicit association will be sentenced to a maximum of one year's imprisonment.

11. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, (CERD/C/ISR/CO/1), amendment No. 1 to the Pupil's Rights Law 5761-2000 (the "Pupil's Rights Law") issued on December 22, 2004, amends Section 1. The Pupil's Rights Law stipulates that the purpose of the Law is to establish principles for the rights of pupils in the spirit of human dignity and the principles of the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), while preserving the dignity of all: the pupil, the educational employee and the education institution staff. This, in addition to preserving the uniqueness of different kinds of educational institutions, and to encouraging the creation of an atmosphere of mutual respect in the educational institution community. The amendment also serves to amend Section 4 of the Pupil's Rights Law, stipulating that the Director General's Directive, as well as the school-principals guidelines, must include rules for the protection of dignity, discipline and the prevention of violence.

Judicial measures

12. The Supreme Court of Israel has played a pivotal role in the promotion of the principles enshrined in CERD through the development of jurisprudence dealing with contentious and highly charged political and security-related issues. Often, these issues also involve allegations of discrimination. As a result, the Supreme Court has issued a number of precedent setting decisions that have resulted in the modification of past practices.

13. In the criminal context, a number of criminal cases concerning incitement to racism and the commission of racist acts were decided by the Supreme Court as well as the lower courts, generally resulting in convictions.

14. On December 7, 2006, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal filed against a judgment given by the Jerusalem District Court, which convicted the two appellants with various charges of violence and assault of an Israeli Arab, and sentenced each of them to three years' imprisonment, six months' suspended imprisonment, and required each of them to make compensation to the victim, in the sum of 7,500 NIS (US$ 2,027). When imposing the sentence, the District Court attributed special gravity to the fact that the offences were racially motivated – the Court asserted that the racial element involved in the offences, must be reflected in the punishment as well. The Supreme Court reaffirmed this approach and emphasized that in a society which espouses the values of equality and protection of human rights, there is no room for such racially motivated crimes, and any such behavior is to be condemned and denounced. In light of the above, the appeal was rejected (Cr.A. 9040/05, Yitzhak Orion and Yehuda Ovdia v. The State of Israel). Note that this decision is in accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 30 of June 14, 2007, (CERD/C/ISR/CO/1), which, inter alia, calls on the State to guarantee an effective remedy against perpetrators of acts of racial discrimination or acts which are racially motivated.

15. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 30, in November 2008, the Jerusalem District Court convicted eight defendants who were members of a Neo-Nazi group for crimes of incitement, including hate crimes. The defendants were convicted in the frame of a plea bargain, and sentences were handed down on November 23, 2008. The first defendant was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment; the second defendant was sentenced to three years' imprisonment; the third defendant was sentenced to 26 months' imprisonment; the fourth defendant was sentenced to five years' imprisonment; the fifth defendant was sentenced to four years' imprisonment; the sixth defendant was sentenced to three years' imprisonment; the seventh defendant was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment and the eighth defendant was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. All of the defendants were also sentenced to 18 months' suspended imprisonment (C.C. 40270/07 The State of Israel v. Boanitov Arik et al. (23.11.08)).

16. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 30, in the civilian context, a number of cases concerning discrimination were decided by the lower courts. Recently the Tel-Aviv Magistrate Court granted compensation in the amount of 60,000 NIS (US$ 16,216) for two individuals who were prevented from entering a public place on racial grounds. The Court found that entrance to the club was selective, since the selector conditioned entrance upon advance booking, while focusing on men with dark skin and eastern appearance. The court noted that the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law 5761-2000 (the "Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law") is intended, inter alia, to implement the Convention. Therefore, preventing a person from entering a public place based on a suspicion that he/she will act violently, which suspicion is based on racial grounds, constitutes illegitimate discrimination. The Court emphasized that such discrimination exists even when it is not carried out sweepingly, and even when the owners of the place do not themselves harbor racial opinions but only fear potential economic losses. The Law prohibits racial discrimination regardless of the motivation behind it. The Court decided to mete out increased compensation, the maximum set by the Law, due to the difficulties of preventing discrimination based on economic motives, and in order to overcome the phenomenon of racial discrimination in public places, which has become a country-wide problem (C.C. 43168/05 Zadok Eran et al. v. Shevah Shalosh Company Ltd. et al. (26.9.09)).

17. On September 6, 2009, the Tel-Aviv Labor Court ruled that the requirement of serving military service set by Israel Railways Company as part of its requirements for employment of new supervisors constituted discrimination against citizens who do not serve in the IDF. The Court emphasized the importance of the right to equality and the prohibition of discrimination, which form the basis of all other basic rights, as well as the values of democracy, and noted that the Law also prohibits indirect discrimination. (C.M. 3863/09 Abdul-Karim Kadi et al. v. Israel Railways et al. (6.9.2009)).

18. With respect to H.C.J. 5601/00 Ibrahim Dwiri v. Israel Land Administration et. al., which was presented in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, it should be noted that the Israel Land Administration considered the counter opinion of the Dwiri family and decided on March 1, 2006, that they were entitled to purchase land on the Kibbutz. The Kibbutz filed a petition with the High Court of Justice against this decision, which petition was rejected by the Court on January 22, 2007 (please see further details in the section addressing Article 1 below). (H.C.J. 7574/06 Hasolelim "Young Maccabi" Group for Cooperative Agricultural Settlement Ltd. et al. v. Israel Land Administration et al. (22.1.07)).

Administrative measures

19. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 31 of June 14, 2007, which, inter alia, calls upon the State party to consider the establishment of a national mechanism for redress of racial discrimination either as a specialized agency on racial discrimination or a national human rights institution, one of the key factors reflecting the State of Israel's commitment to comply with the basic principles enshrined in CERD in both a procedural and substantive manner is the establishment of the position of Minister of Minority Affairs in the current 32nd Israeli Government. The Minister is intended to be in a position in which he/she can better address and promote the situation of Israel's minority populations. The Minister in the Prime Minister's Office was also nominated as the Head of the Ministerial Committee of Minority Affairs (previously named the Committee for the Non-Jewish Population). The Minister's vision is of Inclusion and Equality, based on a strong conviction that inclusion in Israeli society shall result in equality amongst Israeli society (please see further details below).

20. In addition, over the past several years, the Government has made important inroads into improving the representation of the minority population within the civil service and government corporations. The Government instituted affirmative action programs and mandated specific target goals that would significantly increase the number of minority employees within public service bodies.

21. On March 21, 2010, the Government approved Government Resolution No. 1539, titled "Five Year Plan for the Economic Development of Minority Localities" (including Arab, Bedouin, Druze and Circassian local authorities). According to this Resolution, the plan will focus on the development of the economy, increasing employment, enhancing housing and real estate, providing transportation and ensuring personal safety and enforcement, in twelve chosen localities, encompassing a population of 370,000 people. The budget for the execution of the plan is 778.5 Million NIS (USD $210,405,405). The plan will be managed by the Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and Circassian Populations within the Prime Minister's Office, and will include, among other activities: development of industrial zones, retraining of personnel and career change, funding for the building of new housing units and operation of public transportation.

22. The Government has also been active in addressing the rights of migrant workers. Changes have been implemented that more fully protect their rights, particularly vis à vis their employers. This has largely been instituted by a reform in the methods of employment, increasing the foreign workers' awareness of their rights, and the establishment of specific enforcement divisions within the relevant governmental authorities, which are provided with special training.

The Attorney General

23. On April 13, 2008, the Attorney General issued an opinion in which he ruled that Ramla Mayor Yoel Lavie cannot serve as Director General of the Israel Lands Administration (ILA) because of several racist statements he made to the media in 2006 which were directed against the Arab population. The Attorney General instructed the Minister of Construction and Housing to find another candidate to head the organization, which controls all the country's publicly-owned land.

Other measures

24. Several projects to promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among nations and populations are implemented in Israel, two examples of such projects are:

(a) Education Seminars by the "Peres Center for Peace", aimed to offer instruction to Palestinian and Israeli educators and teachers, in order to provide them with the educational tools to guide their pupils in dealing with issues related to the conflict, and allow them to implement peace building activities. Thus far, two seminars have been held, in which nearly 100 Israeli and Palestinian educators have taken part;

(b) Another project which is in accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 22 of June 14, 2007, is the "Mirkam Encounters in the Galilee" – A joint initiative of the Abraham Fund Organization, the Ministry of Education and The Haifa, Acre and Ma'alot-Tarshihah Municipalities. The initiative intends to encourage a shared society in the mixed cities of the Galilee, by holding joint educational activities bringing together elementary school pupils, teachers and principals from ten pairs of Jewish and Arab schools. During the meetings, pupils learn about each other's culture, tradition and heritage, thus learning to appreciate and respect each other's perspectives and views.

25. The following Report addresses the main issues raised by the Convention since the submission of Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, as well as the concerns raised by the Committee during the last session. Finally, this Report complies with the Committee's guidelines regarding the form and contents of reports to be submitted by states parties to the Convention. We trust that this report will facilitate the Committee's work and provide a more complete picture of the situation in Israel concerning the implementation of the Convention's provisions. We look forward to maintaining a constructive dialogue with the distinguished members of the Committee.

I. Article 2

A. Measures to eliminate racial discrimination

1. Measures taken to prevent discrimination by all public authorities and institutions

Overview

26. Racial discrimination is prohibited in Israel as required under Article 2(1)(a) of the Convention. Several Basic Laws, laws, and court rulings operate together to guarantee that no public authority or public institution engage in any act or practice of racial discrimination against persons, groups of persons or institutions. These prohibitions apply with equal force at the national and local levels, and all public authorities and institutions are required to comply with their directives.

(a) Judicial measures

27. Just as the Israeli legislature crafts and adopts both new laws and administrative measures to ensure that government agencies do not engage in any discriminatory act or practice, the country's independent judiciary serves to interpret, guide, and enforce these measures.

28. This judicial effort is guided by the Supreme Court, which has issued a number of landmark decisions against certain discriminatory practices of both government entities and private individuals.

29. As stated above, on December 7, 2006, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal filed against a judgment handed down by the Jerusalem District Court, which convicted the two appellants of various charges of violence and assault of Arab-Israelis, and sentenced each of them to three years' imprisonment, six months' suspended imprisonment, and required each of them to pay compensation to the victim in the sum of 7,500 NIS (US$ 2,027). When imposing the sentence, the District Court attributed special gravity to the fact that the offences were racially motivated by the Court asserted that the racial element involved in the offences, must be reflected in the punishment as well. The Supreme Court reaffirmed this approach and emphasized that in a society which espouses the value of equality and the protection of human rights, there is no room for such racially motivated crimes, and any such behavior is to be condemned and denounced. In light of the above, the appeal was rejected (Cr.A. 9040/05, Yitzhak Orion and Yehuda Ovadia v. The State of Israel).

(b) Administrative measures*The Minister of Minority Affairs*

30. The current Israeli Government (the 32nd Government) has appointed a Minister of Minority Affairs, whose position is intended to better address and promote the situation of Israel's minority populations. The Minister in the Prime Minister's Office was also nominated as the Head of the Ministerial Committee of Minority Affairs (previously named the Committee for the Non-Jewish Population).

31. The Minister's annual budget is 12 Million NIS (US$ 3,243,243) for the year 2009, and 20 Million NIS (US$ 5,405,405) for the year 2010. The Minister's vision is of Inclusion and Equality, based on a strong conviction that inclusion in Israeli society shall lead to equality amongst members of Israeli society.

32. The Minister commands a staff of eight persons, dedicated to promoting this vision of inclusion and equality throughout the Israeli society. In addition, the Minister is responsible for the Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and Circassian Populations, which was established by Government Resolution No. 1204, (February 15, 2007), and the Minister is currently in the advance stages of forming a new division in the Authority, following the addition of six employees, three of whom have already been approved and three of whom are still to be assigned.

33. The Minister and his staff, who have been operating since April 2009, are in the process of better acquainting themselves with the facts on the ground — within the minority population, and in the sphere of the various Government Ministries and bodies — regarding specific aspects of issues relevant to minorities. Existing projects for improving the lives, socio-economic, and overall conditions of the minority population are being analyzed so as to best identify any existing obstacles, obstructions and failures and formulate and implement measures to best address them.

34. The Minister and his personnel work closely with the various Ministries and enjoy a close and productive interface with them, and endeavor to improve this level of cooperation for the benefit of the minority populations. Moreover, the Minister is in the process of establishing working relations with the local authorities in minority localities, and is attempting (along with his team) to develop these relations, including by way of channeling specific applications from these authorities and from members of the minority population.

35. Another channel that is considered of the highest importance is NGOs from the minority population. In this regard, the Minister is investing significant efforts in empowering these NGOs through close and mutual cooperation.

36. Among the topics that the Minister is focusing upon:

(a) Higher Education – in accordance with the Committee’s recommendation No. 27 of June 14, 2007, which, inter alia, calls upon the State to ensure that access to higher education is guaranteed to all without discrimination, the Minister, in his previous position as the President of Ben Gurion University located in the Negev, has contributed extensively to the immersion of the minority population of the Negev in the field of higher education, and continues to do so in his new role. This is pursued beginning with those at high school level, utilizing means such as vocational training, increasing the number of individuals entitled to matriculate, and reducing dropout rates; and at a later stage through specific programs, for instance scholarships – all conducted in full cooperation with the Ministry of Education;

(b) The Minister is striving to increase the rate of participation of members of the minority population in national-civil service, working side by side with the Public Commission for National-Civil Service in the Prime Minister’s Office. Further, by increasing the extent of schooling allowed during the period of completion of such service, the Minister and Israeli Government are enabling the development of additional skills during the period of national-civil service;

(c) The Minister and his team are working in conjunction with the Ministry of Interior to promote the completion of outline plans in localities where minority populations reside, so as to bridge the gaps that currently exist between these localities, and the planning situation with respect to the overall population;

(d) In accordance with the Committee’s recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, the Minister is working with the Ministry of Construction and Housing towards promoting specific minority-oriented programs to better address the unique needs of the minority population in this area;

(e) The Minister and his team are also working in conjunction with the Ministry of National Infrastructure to alleviate infrastructure issues which exist in minority communities.

The Knesset Code

37. According to Section 134(c) of the Knesset Code, the Government chairperson and his/her deputies may refuse to authorize a bill they think is essentially racist or which denies the State of Israel’s right to exist as the State of the Jewish people.

Attorney General guidelines regarding racial discrimination

38. As mentioned in Israel’s thirteenth Periodic Report, all Government Ministries are required to operate in accordance with the guidelines prohibiting racial discrimination, which were issued by the Attorney General. Accordingly, any authority exercising any public function by virtue of the law is prohibited from discriminating on the basis of race, gender, religion, creed, political opinion or any other ground. All Ministries are prohibited from engaging in any form of racial discrimination in all aspects of their activities

(employment, services etc.). Furthermore, the Government is to take an active role in hiring women and minorities, especially via the imposition of affirmative action programs. All governmental bodies and government corporations are to actively pursue the hiring of women and minorities and achieve a fair representation of such groups.

39. As mentioned above, on April 13, 2008, the Attorney General issued an opinion in which he ruled that Ramla Mayor Yoel Lavie cannot serve as Director General of the Israel Lands Administration (ILA) because of several racist statements he made in 2006 to the media, which were directed against the Arab population. In his written opinion, the Attorney General has instructed the Minister of Construction and Housing to find another candidate to head the organization, which controls all the country's publicly-owned land.

The Attorney General refused to prosecute the Ramla Mayor prior to Lavie's candidacy for the position of Director-General of ILA for fear of infringing the right to freedom of speech. However, his decision demonstrates to public figures that racist remarks are not only abhorrent but also do not go unpunished.

Arab cooperative societies

40. All Israeli NGOs are treated equally. In 2007, The Registrar of Cooperative Societies published on its Internet web site a document in Arabic entitled "The Proper Administration of Cooperative Societies," which is a translation of a Hebrew document first issued in October 2002. Additionally, the Registrar employs an Arab lawyer who handles applications submitted in Arabic, a contract lawyer who is fluent in Arabic and is particularly involved in registration, and two Arab accountants who examine NGOs' files. The Registrar and its representatives took part in a number of conferences organized by Arab representatives and attended lectures concerning the different requirements of the Registrar in order to better facilitate the operation of Arab cooperative societies.

2. Not sponsoring or defending discrimination by persons or organizations

41. On July 9, 2008, The Basic Law: The Knesset was amended (amendment No. 39) in which Subsection (a1) was added to Section 7a. According to Subsection (a1), a candidate who resided in an enemy state illegally during the seven years prior to the submission of the list of candidates will be regarded as supporting the armed struggle against the State of Israel unless he/she has proven otherwise. It should be noted however that the exercise of the authority in Section 7a(a) to the Basic Law — disqualification of a candidates list — is to be carried out only in acute cases and the reasons for disqualification are to be interpreted narrowly.

42. Amendment No. 142 of March 23, 2007, to Section 1 of the Cooling-Off Period for Persons Serving in the Security Forces Law 5767-2007 (the "Cooling-Off Period for Persons Serving in the Security Forces Law"), also amended Section 56 to the Knesset Elections Law 5729-1969 (the "Knesset Elections Law"). According to Section 56, senior public servants, such as the head of Israel's Security Agency (ISA), Israel's Defense Force (IDF), Police officers with a rank of Major General and above, and the Israel Prisons Service (IPS) Commissioner may run for national election provided they leave office at least three years prior to the Election Day. However, for the purpose of an election which follows the abovementioned election, these persons may run for public office even if the three year period has not fully expired. Other senior public servants, IDF officers, Police or Prisons Service personnel may run for national election if they leave office at least 100 days prior to the elections (Section 56(a1)(3)). Other less senior public servants and military personnel may run for elected office so long as they vacate their positions by the date of submission of the candidates list; if elected, they are deemed to have ceased their service so long as they remain members of the Knesset (Section 56(b)).

43. Israel's Penal Law also counters discrimination by prohibiting racial incitement and other related offences, and was recently amended so as to include an additional offence related to racial hatred.

44. On February 25, 2008, Section 145 of the Penal Law, which refers to illicit association, was amended (Amendment No. 96) so as to include subsection 2A, which prohibits the gathering of people, associated or not, that preach, incite or encourage to racism, including preaching, inciting or encouraging to the principles of Nazism or the National Socialist Party. According to Sections 146 and 147 of the Penal Law, a person who preaches or encourages the activities forbidden in Section 145 will be sentenced to a maximum of three years' imprisonment, and a person of the age of 16 or over, who is a member, an employee or an agent of an illicit association will be sentenced to a maximum of one year imprisonment.

3. Measures to review, amend, rescind or nullify governmental, national and local policies that create or perpetuate racial discrimination

(a) Legislative measures

Compensation for victims of hostilities

45. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 30 of June 14, 2007, a recent amendment to The Compensation for Victims of Hostilities Law 5730-1970, (the "Compensation for Victims of Hostilities Law") passed on July 19, 2006, extends compensation under the Law to victims of terrorist attacks motivated by the Arab-Israeli conflict. Prior to the July amendment, the Law covered hostilities perpetrated by "enemy forces", but did not cover other hostilities.

46. The amendment to the Law adds the following grounds for compensation:

(a) Harm resulting from an act of violence, the main purpose of which is to harm a person due to his/her national-ethnic origin, provided that the act stems from the Arab-Israeli dispute;

(b) Harm resulting from an act of violence, the main purpose of which is to harm a person due to his/her national-ethnic origin, where the act of violence has been carried out by a terrorist organization, recognized as such under Section 8 of the Terror Prevention Ordinance – 1948, except for an organization that is a part of enemy forces, or where the said act of violence has been carried out in the service of or on behalf of such an organization.

47. The amendment also provides for the payment of compensation for damage to property resulting from an act of violence as described above, in accordance with regulations issued by the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Knesset Finance Committee.

48. Eden Nathan-Zadah, allegedly a member of the Kach movement, who opened fired on a bus in Shfara'm in August 2005, killing four Israeli Arabs and wounding a dozen others – could not be considered as an "enemy", and thus the families of his victims could not be recognized as victims of terrorism under the Compensation for Victims of Hostilities Law and were not entitled to compensation under that law. However, the families of the victims were able to apply to a special committee authorized to grant compensation on an ad hoc basis, in situations not covered by the Law.

49. With regard to the Shfara'm terrorist attack, the victims' families together received a special payment of 100,000 NIS (US$ 27,027) from the Jewish Agency. Moreover, in its August and November 2005 sessions, the Knesset Finance Committee decided to make an exception and recognize those who were directly harmed by the Shfara'm attack as victims of terrorism. Accordingly, compensation was granted in January 2006, for those whose property was damaged. With respect to the victims' families – the National Insurance Institute (NII) informed them of their right to receive compensation either from the Knesset Finance Committee or as a result of the amendment to the Compensation for Victims of Hostilities Law. All three families requested to be compensated by the Knesset Finance Committee.

Israeli identity cards

50. Until 2007, in all Israeli identification cards, the date of birth was registered according to the Gregorian calendar; but in identification cards belonging to Jews the date of birth was also stipulated according to the Jewish calendar. However, in November 2007, the Population Registry Law 5725-1965 (the "Population Registry Law"), was amended (Amendment No. 12) such that in all identification cards both dates appear, unless an individual specifically requests that his/her date of birth be presented only in accordance with the Gregorian calendar. This is geared towards removing an element that might have created an improper distinction and ensuring that all Israeli identity cards are similar.

Enhancing infrastructure within Israel's Arab localities

Planning scheme for the Arab population

51. In recent years, the Department of Planning in the Ministry of Interior, has initiated an extensive project towards the preparation of updated planning schemes for the majority of Arab localities. Note that according to the law, the responsibility for initiating and promoting local planning is that of the local authorities, however, the Government decision to take this responsibility upon itself (including funding) is a form of affirmative action for those Arab localities which are unable to take such steps independently.

52. The objectives of the project are:

- The improvement of the quality of life in the localities, including a significant increase in residential areas, areas of employment, open spaces, and public facilities as well as suitable infrastructure – in order to address the long-term needs of the localities
- The regulation of the planning situation, in order to meet the needs of the localities and their integration in the surrounding area
- The provision of a planning basis towards the integration of the minorities' localities in the socio-economic development of the Israeli society in general

53. Seventy (70.3) per cent of the Arab localities in Israel are included in the project (90 out of 128 localities). Most of the remaining localities (30 out of the remaining 38) have approved planning schemes, which adhere to their developmental needs; or are in the process of approving such a plan. In some of these localities, the planning schemes are promoted by the local authorities themselves.

54. Thus far, the planning stage has been completed in 62 localities and by the end of 2010, the planning stage shall be finalized in a total of 102 localities (out of 128).

55. To date, 60 Million NIS (US$ 16,216,216) has been allocated for the promotion of the planning project. It is notable, that in spite of wide-ranging cutbacks in the Ministries' budgets in the past few years, the budget allocated for this project has increased.

56. The project is supported by several Government Resolutions, and is based on the national planning policy as developed and adopted in the NOP 35 – the National Outline

Plan for Construction, Development and Conservation. The national planning policy indicated new developmental trends in various localities, as well as diverse density rules based on the size of the locality, its social and economic status and its demography.

57. The planning schemes implement several fundamental principles:

- Solutions for anticipated population growth
- Designation of public areas for use as public institutions, green areas and infrastructure layout
- Designation of State land for construction which will benefit people who seek housing and the fulfillment of public needs
- Development of regional or joint employment areas in order to enhance the income of the various local authorities
- Creation of a framework of regional solutions in a variety of fields such as environmental protection, public transportation, burial etc.
- Adaptability to the special needs of the different populations and the uniqueness of each locality (for example: land ownership, preservation of the rural or urban character, preservation of traditions and religious values, commerce and occupation according to the needs of the locality, etc.)
- Creation of joint employment areas for Jewish and Arab local authorities in order to promote the economic integration of the Arab localities, and in order to increase the income of both Jewish and Arab local authorities

58. Note that the expansions of the Arab localities are much greater in comparison to the Jewish localities and reach an average of 60 per cent of the size of the locality and in certain cases even up to 100 per cent. In addition, the current total size of the Arab population in Israel is 1,450,000, out of which 1,280,000 (88 per cent) are included in the program (in comparison only 61 per cent of the Jewish population is included in the program).

59. Each plan is promoted by a professional planning panel, hired by the Department of Planning and accompanied by a broad steering committee, headed by representatives from the Department. Each committee includes representatives from the local authority, the relevant Ministries and the neighboring local authorities, the Jewish National Fund (JNF) (Keren Kayemeth Le'Israel), the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel, and the Israel Nature and National Parks Protection Authority.

60. Stemming from the appreciation of the importance of the community's involvement in the decision-making processes affecting its daily life and the nature of its place of residence, a special emphasis is placed on the participation of the local community in the planning process.

61. In addition to the full participation of the local leadership, the effort to include the local community in the planning process is carried out through diverse methods which are varied according to the character of the locality and its social structure. These include focus groups, distribution of questionnaires, the holding of open assemblies to present the plan and receive comments, etc.

62. The success of the planning project depends, first and foremost, on the assumption of responsibility by the local leadership, and its support of the project, promotion of detailed planning compatible with the planning scheme, execution of expropriation orders issued for public purposes, collection of fees and development of taxes and law enforcement against illegal construction. The Department of Planning in the Ministry of Interior is doing its utmost in order to realize the improvement needed for all fractions of the Arab population in Israel.

63. Notice should be paid to the fact that most of the Arab localities have a planning scheme, even if not an updated one, which was initiated by the Government during the 1980's.

Recent developments

64. Given the importance of the promotion of planning in the Arab population, the State allocated a budget of 56 Million NIS (US$ 15,135,135) for the promotion of planning schemes for Arab localities for the years 2000 to 2005. In recent years, the Government had allocated an additional 25 Million NIS (US$ 6,756,756) for the promotion of planning schemes in the Druze, Circassian and Bedouin localities in the north and additional Arab localities in the south.

(b) Judicial measures

65. In the case of Association of Kfar Neve-Atid – Dahamsh, the Tel-Aviv District Court, residing as an Administrative Tribunal, discussed a petition regarding the planned regularization of the Dahamsh village. The village is located near the city of Ramla, and most of its houses were built unplanned and unlawfully. The village's infrastructure is not regulated and municipal services are not provided to its residents. Thus, over the years, the planning authorities worked to prevent illegal construction in the village, by issuing demolition orders and filing indictments. The petitioners, residents of the village, prepared a detailed plan for construction in the village and submitted it in July 2006 to the relevant planning and building committee. Yet, the plan was never discussed by the committee. The Court noted that the fact that the plan was not discussed, served to perpetuate the situation in which the petitioners were considered to be lawbreakers, and contradicted the Planning and Building Law 5725-1965 (the "Planning and Building Law"). The Court ordered the committee to discuss the plan, and noted that specific claims regarding demolition orders would continue to be heard in local courts (Ad.P. 1037/07 The Association of Kfar Neve-Atid – Dahamsh et al. v. The "Lodim" Local Planning and Building Committee (30.1.08)).

Amending discriminatory land allocation policies

66. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 19 and 23 of June 14, 2007, and as mentioned in detail in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, in a landmark decision in H.C.J. 6698/95 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (ILA), the Supreme Court reaffirmed the Jewish agency's role in promoting the development and fulfillment of Israel's values and goals. In particular, Chief Justice Barak asserted that the Agency played a major role in Israel's establishment, and that its many efforts to develop the State should not go unrecognized. The unique status that the Jewish Agency holds in Israeli life is reflected in Israeli legislation, where Section 3 of the Status of World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for The State of Israel Law 5713-1952, provides that the two bodies shall strive, as they did before the enactment of the Law, to promote Jewish immigration to Israel and to co-ordinate absorption and accommodation projects.

67. The Court held in the Ka'adan case that the State may not allocate land directly to its citizens on the basis of religion or nationality. Following the Court's decision, the ILA adopted a decision setting out new admission criteria to be applied uniformly to all applicants seeking to move into small, communal localities established on state-owned lands.

68. On June 24, 2006, the World Zionist Organization (WZO) decided that the Jewish Agency is obligated to include Arab-Israelis in its development plans for the State, including Muslims, Christians, Druze and Circassians. The annual budget allocated for these plans is currently 60 Million NIS (US$ 16,216,216) and it is expected to grow.

69. Following the above mentioned petition and a number of other petitions submitted in 2004 to the Supreme Court with respect to the issue of transferring rights in real estate property, which is owned by the Jewish National Fund, to non-Jewish persons, and given the opinion released by the Attorney General according to which the ILA is bound by the principle of equality even when managing the lands of the JNF, the ILA and the JNF signed an agreement of principles according to which the JNF would receive lands in the Negev and the Galilee, in return for the conveyance of lands in Israel's central area. The agreement was signed on June 7, 2009, and was approved by the general assembly of the JNF on June 23, 2009. The new land rotation agreement allows the conveyance of lands managed by the Israel Land Administration for every lease, with no regard to the lessee's nationality, in a manner which respects both the principle of equality and achieves the aims of the JNF. In addition, it was agreed to reduce the number of JNF representatives in the future ILA which will replace the current Israel Land Council.

70. The reform in the Israel Land Administration was further promoted by Amendment No. 7 of August 3, 2009 to the Israel Land Administration Law 5720-1960 (the "Israel Land Administration Law"). The Amendment allows for the conveyance of lands managed by the ILA, to its lessees, who will be able to take any action with respect to the property, even in the absence of the ILA's approval.

71. The Israel Land Administration continues to operate in accordance with the Supreme Court's ruling of 1995 in the Ka'adan Case, according to which the principle of equality also applies to the allocation of real-estate property by the State. Thus, on July 27, 2005, the Israel Land Council approved Directive No. 1064 which updates Directive No. 1015 of August 1, 2004, and refers to the criteria for the acceptance of candidates for the purchase of rights to lease real-estate in agricultural and communal localities. The Directive contains a closed list of legitimate criteria on which to assess eligibility, including criteria regarding special characteristics of these localities, if such exists, on condition that these criteria are approved in advance by the Administration and after the approval of the Registrar of Associations, as well as a review procedure of the decision by way of appeal to the Israel Land Administration (ILA). The Ministry of Justice and the ILA continue to work together in order to examine potential improvements to Directive No. 1064.

72. In March 2010, Directive No. 1195 was approved, which further limits the grounds for refusing to accept new candidates in agricultural and communal localities with up to 500 families. According to this Directive, among other criterions, in localities with more than 120 families, a refusal may be based on avoiding harm to the daily life of the community. Refusal to accept a new candidate in smaller localities according to this criterion may be done only if the new candidate is not suitable to the social life of the community (after professional examinations). In addition, according to Directive No. 1195, an additional criterion was added for rejection of candidates – a candidate may be rejected if his/her acceptance will result in the creation of a sub-community within the locality in a way that will substantially harm the character of the community.

73. With regard to H.C.J. 5601/00 Ibrahim Dwiri v. Israel Land Administration et. al., presented in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, it should be noted that the Israel Land Administration considered the counter opinion of the Dwiri family and decided on March 1, 2006, that they are entitled to purchase land in the Kibbutz that was in question. The Kibbutz filed a petition with the High Court of Justice against the decision, which was dismissed by the Court on January 22, 2007. The Court accepted the ILA's position as reflected by Directive No. 1064, and ruled that the ILA is not bound by the criteria of acceptance established by an examination committee of a communal locality, and is authorized to intervene when required, in accordance with the Israel Land Administration

Law and the Court's previous rulings. A request for a further hearing was also denied by the Court on March 14, 2007 (H.C.J. 7574/06 Hasolelim "Young Maccabi" Group for Cooperative Agricultural Settlement Ltd. et al. v. Israel Land Administration et al. (22.1.07)).

74. Several petitions were filed with the High Court of Justice concerning Directive No. 1064, requesting the elimination of the involvement of committees, following the denial of the petitioners' requests to be accepted to a communal locality on the ground of incompatibly with the communal way of life. In the State's response to the petitions it was argued that the criterion included in Directive No. 1064, which allows committees to consider the applicant's suitability to the social life of the community, is an appropriate criterion that promotes the unique fabric of communal life while preventing discrimination based on illegitimate grounds when acquiring proprietary rights in State land. The petitions are still pending (H.C.J. 3552/08 David Kempler et al. v. Israel Land Administration et. al.; H.C.J. 8036/07 Fatma Abric-Zbidat et al. v. Israel Land Administration et. al.).

Other

75. Recently, the "Heshvan 12th – the Movement for Reinforcement of Tolerance in Religious Education" Association, petitioned the High Court of Justice for an injunction against the Attorney General ordering him to justify why no indictments were filed against the Rabbis Itzhak Shapira and Yossef Elitzur for incitement to racism, violence and for calls for rebellion. The petition concerned the book entitled "The King's Torah," which was written by the two Rabbis and contains incitement for racism and calls for violence against non-Jews. On December 20, 2009, the Court ordered the State to submit its response and the case is still pending (H.C.J. 10143/09 "Cheshvan 12th – the Movement for Reinforcement of Tolerance in Religious Education" et al. v. The Attorney General et. al.).

4. Measures to end discrimination by individuals and organizations

76. Racism, in its various manifestations is considered a criminal offence in Israel, as discussed in the section dealing with Article 4 below.

(a) Legislative measures

(i) Increasing proportional representation in Israel's Civil Service and within governmental corporations

Civil Service

77. The Civil Service (Appointments) Law 5719-1959 (the "Civil Service (Appointments) Law") requires that the Israeli civil service maintain fair representation in terms of appointments. According to the Law, the Government is entitled to apply an affirmative action policy so as to allocate certain positions to under-represented groups for the purpose of attaining fair representation.

78. In 2000, the Civil Service (Appointments) Law was amended (Amendment No. 11) in order to ensure that minorities and under-represented populations such as women, persons with disabilities, and the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations are represented in the Civil Service according to their proportion in the eligible work force population. The Law requires appropriate representation of the various groups throughout the Civil Service, at all levels and in all professions.

79. The Civil Service (Appointments) Law was amended in 2005, in order to include persons of Ethiopian origin among the various groups entitled to appropriate representation in the Civil Service. Following this amendment, the Government accepted Resolution No.

1665 concerning the allocation of positions in the Civil Service for persons of Ethiopian origin and affording them priority in appointments and promotions.

Government corporations

80. As stated in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, under Amendment No. 11 of May 30, 2000, to the Government Corporations Law 5735-1975 (the "Government Corporations Law"), the Arab population (defined as including people of Druze and Circassian origin) must be appropriately represented on the board of directors of every government corporation and statutory corporation. In January 2001, the rate of Arab representation in governmental corporations reached only 3.2 per cent (22 out of 695 directors). In January 2007 that rate reached 12.61 per cent (57 out of 452 directors, 10 of whom (1.91 per cent of the total) were women). The rate of directors in governmental corporations who are of Arab origin (including Druze and Circassian) decreased in 2008 to 8.02 per cent (47 out of 586).

81. In addition, the Law prescribes that until appropriate representation is achieved, Ministers will appoint Arab directors to the extent possible according to the relevant circumstances. Section 60A of the Government Corporations Law extends the application of Amendment 11 to encompass the appointments of directors to the board of statutory corporations and other statutory organizations.

82. Section 18(a)(1) of the Law mandates the directorate of government corporations to reflect the governmental policy of fair representation. Moreover, the amendment empowers the Government to do its utmost to appoint directors from the Arab population until the goals of the amendment are achieved. The Attorney General has provided Government Ministers with guidelines regarding the implementation of the new standards. In addition.

83. The Committee for Examination of Appointments According to the Government Corporations Law (operating since 1993) and the Prime Minister's Office established a database of potential Arab candidates who qualify for senior government corporation positions. The information was brought to the attention of every Minister. Additionally, efforts exist to create an official database of qualified minority candidates for senior government corporation positions.

(ii) The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law 5761-2000

84. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 21 of June 14, 2007, which addresses the need to adopt measures to ensure that access to public services is guaranteed to all without discrimination, whether direct or indirect, based on race, color, descent, or national or ethnic origin, the enactment of the Law has substantially limited the possibility of discrimination occurring in the private sector. Section 3 of the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law, prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, religion or religious affiliation, nationality, country of origin, gender, sexual orientation, views, political affiliation, personal status, or physical disability in the provision of public products or services, and in the admittance to a public place, by an individual who provides such products or services, or operates a public place. Violation of this prohibition is both a civil tort and a criminal offence, and according to Section 5(a) of the Law, the Tort Ordinance 5728-1968 (the "Tort Ordinance"), applies to such civil tort. Moreover, Section 5(b) allows the court to grant compensation of no more than 50,000 NIS (US$ 13,513), without proof of damage, due to a violation of this Law. Section 11 applies the provisions of this law to the State as well and has been interpreted broadly as applying to a host of public places, including schools, libraries, swimming pools, stores, and all other places serving the public. Court decisions have routinely upheld this broad interpretation of the law.

(iii) The Patient's Rights Law 5756-1996 ("The Patient's Rights Law")

85. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 21 of June 14, 2007, and as mentioned in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, Section 4 of the Patient's Rights Law stipulates that a health care provider may not discriminate against patients on the basis of religion, race, gender, nationality, country of origin, sexual orientation or for any other reason.

(iv) The 2006 Amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5748-1988 ("The Equal Employment Opportunities Law")

86. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 31 of June 14, 2007, according to a 2006 Amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission was established, within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (hereinafter: "the Ministry of ITL"). The Commission is charged with the promotion, implementation and civil enforcement of the following laws and statutory provisions: Equal Employment Opportunities Law; Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law 5756-1996 (the "Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law"); Women's Employment Law 5714-1954 (the "Women's Employment Law"); Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law 5758-1998 (the "Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law") (in relation to employment) and other statutory provisions relating to: discrimination on religious grounds and army reserve duty, discrimination by public and private employment agencies, affirmative action for women, people with disabilities, Israeli-Arabs and persons of Ethiopian origin in the public sector and legislation protecting workers who "blow the whistle" regarding violations of the above laws and statutory provisions.

87. On August 1, 2007, the Employment Service issued a Directive regarding the prohibition against discrimination, in accordance with Section 42(a) of the Employment Service Law 5719-1959 (the "Employment Service Law"), and Section 2 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. The Directive was distributed to the Employment Service's workers, who also received relevant training on this issue.

(b) Judicial measures

Prohibiting discrimination by private enterprises

88. In a case of prohibited discrimination, on September 6, 2009, the Tel-Aviv Labor Court ruled that the requirement of the Israel Railways Company that a prospective supervisor have served military service constituted discrimination toward citizens who do not serve in the IDF. Moreover, the Court noted that the amendments made to these demands of the Israel Railways Company following the onset of the trial (professional experience of 18 months shift work; and employment experience in an hierarchic organization), were not sufficient, as the criteria still afforded army veterans a significant advantage, while the job itself did not demand these requirements. The Court emphasized the importance of the right to equality and the prohibition of discrimination, which constitute the basis of all other basic rights and values inherent in a democracy, and noted that the law also prohibits indirect discrimination. Thus, the Court accepted the request for an injunction against the dismissal of several Arab employees, who were dismissed on the basis that they had not served in the IDF. In doing so the Court accepted the opinion submitted by the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, according to which Israel Railways Company had failed to show that the new employment criteria were demanded by the character and essence of the employment positions, and that they are did not constitute discrimination against persons who did not serve in the IDF (C.M. 3863/09 Abdul-Karim Kadi et al. v. Israel Railways et al. (6.9.2009)).

89. In another case, the Tel-Aviv Magistrate Court ruled in favor of an award of compensation in the amount of 60,000 NIS (US$ 16,216) for two individuals who were prevented from entering a public place on racial grounds. The Court found that the entrance to the club was selective, since the selector conditioned entrance upon advance booking, while focusing on men with dark skin and eastern appearance. The Court noted that the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law is intended, inter alia, to implement the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. Therefore, preventing a person from entering a public place on the basis of a suspicion that he/she will act violently, which suspicion is based on racial grounds, constitutes illegitimate discrimination. The Court emphasized that such discrimination exists even when it is not carried out sweepingly, and even when the owners of the place do not hold racist opinions but only fear potential economic losses. The Law prohibits racial discrimination regardless of the motivation for it. The Court finally decided to order an increased amount of compensation, above the maximum set by the Law, due to the difficulties of preventing discrimination based on economic motives, and in order to overcome the phenomenon of racial discrimination in public places, which has become a country-wide problem (C.C. 43168/05 Zadok Eran et al. v. Shevah Shalosh Company Ltd. et al. (26.9.09)).

90. In another case, on August 17, 2006, the Haifa District Court ruled that the requirement of the University of Haifa that prospective students have served military service as part of its application for dormitories discriminated against Israeli citizens who do not serve in the IDF. The university explained, inter alia, that this requirement was not a morally based requirement, but an economic criterion, since those who serve in the IDF were unable to work during their service and accumulate the necessary resources to fund other housing solutions. The Court held that such a requirement discriminates between students in the Jewish population and students in the Arab population and noted that according to the law, every Israeli citizen is obligated to serve military service, however in practice Non-Jewish persons are not called for service and their options to volunteer are limited. The Court stated that the actual result of such a criterion in the allocation of dormitories is discrimination against Israeli Arabs. The Court therefore ordered the university to remove this as a criterion for the allocation of housing in dormitories. The university submitted an appeal which is still pending. (O.M. 217/05 Hanin Naamne v. The Haifa University (17.8.06)).

5. Measures to encourage integrationist multiracial organizations

91. There are a number of multiracial organizations in Israel, principally operating with the goal of enhancing cross-cultural understanding and co-existence. As discussed further in the section dealing with Article 7 of the CERD below, the activities range from youth orchestras to educational centers such as Givat Haviva etc.

B. Social, economic, and cultural measures to ensure development and protection of racial groups

92. In line with the judicial and legislative measures and policies outlined above, the Government of Israel has turned its attention to developing proactive policies aimed at encouraging the development of racial groups, enhancing diversity, and preserving ethnic traditions and cultures.

Plans to extend equality to various social, cultural and economic arenas

93. As detailed in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, in October 2000, the Government consolidated a comprehensive multi-year plan addressing all aspects of development for the Arab population (hereinafter: “the 2000 multi-year plan”). The 2000 multi-year plan operated from 2001 until December 31, 2004, during which time the Government successfully implemented 87 per cent of the plan.

94. Although the recent economic situation has led the Government to make overall cutbacks, figures show that during 2001 and 2002, the plan’s implementation rate was 90 per cent, in 2003 – 81 per cent, and in 2004 – 85 per cent.

95. Incomplete implementation of the plan in some cases is due to the aforementioned cutbacks, as well as bureaucratic barriers and budget deficits in some of the municipalities where cooperation was required for the successful implementation of the plan.

96. In accordance with the Committee’s recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, which inter alia, recommends that the State party increase its efforts to ensure the equal enjoyment of social, economic and cultural rights. that the State party increase its efforts to ensure the equal enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights by Arab Israeli citizens, in August 2006, the Government resolved to implement two additional multi-year plans (2006–2009) for the socio-economic development of Arab localities in the North, particularly concerning education, housing and employment. These plans were approved in the form of Resolution No. 412 on the development of the Druze and Circassian populations, in the amount of 447 Million NIS (US$ 120,810,811), and Resolution No. 413 for the development of the Bedouin population, in the amount of 318 Million NIS (US$ 85,945,946).

97. The process of consolidation of the multi-year plans by the Government lasted for several months, as the preparations of the plans involved the heads of the Druze, Circassian and Bedouin municipalities respectively, as well as representatives of the relevant Government Ministries. Additional input was sought from a wide range of sources.

98. The new development plans focus on three main issues: investment in human resources, with a special emphasis placed on the empowerment of women, economic development, and employment – including the development of tourism as a source of income.

99. The budget required for the implementation of the plans was allocated by the relevant Government Ministries, in addition to a special budget from the Prime Minister’s Office designated for the minority population. The current implementation rate of both Resolutions is 88 per cent.

100. Note that these plans build on previous multi-year plans implemented and completed since the submission of Israel’s thirteenth Periodic Report.

101. Furthermore, Government Resolutions No. 412 and No. 413 are supplemental to the development budgets that the Ministry of Interior allocates to local municipalities, the subsidies given to retired soldiers in purchasing land plots and housing construction, and segments of the budget set aside for the rehabilitation of Northern Israel, adopted following the Second Lebanon War.

102. Concerning the Bedouin population in the Negev in the South, reference should be made to the aforementioned National Strategic Plan for the Development of the Negev. The Plan was devised, in part, to assist the Bedouins living in the Negev. For example, one of the plan’s goals is the creation of approximately 20,000 jobs for the Negev population within 10 years. In pursuit of this end, the plan seeks to encourage the founding of businesses and the creation of employment within the Bedouin population through the provision of financial assistance to entrepreneurs, vocational training and developing commercial areas and joint industry zones.

103. In addition, Government Resolution No. Arab/40 3956 of July 18, 2005, provided a total budget of 387.7 Million NIS (US$ 104,783,784) for the development of infrastructure and building public structures in Abu-Basma and Al Sid between 2005 and 2008. The budget includes 285 new school and kindergarten classrooms, targeted and specialized education programs (3 Million NIS (US$ 810,811)), the paving of new roads (50 Million NIS (US$ 13,513,514)), sewage, water and electrical infrastructures (44 Million NIS (US$ 11,891,892)), general planning (90 Million NIS (US$ 24,324,324)), industrial area planning and development, employment and business entrepreneurship (20 Million NIS (US$ 5,405,405)), building public institutions (16 Million NIS (US$ 4,324,324)), as well as investment in health, welfare, religion, agriculture and more.

104. Government Resolution No. 4088 of September 14, 2008 extended the duration of resolution No. 3956 until the end of 2009, in order to use the remaining budget allocated for the abovementioned plans.

105. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, on March 21, 2010, the Government approved Government Resolution No. 1539, titled "Five Year Plan for the Economic Development of Minority Localities" (including Arab, Bedouin, Druze and Circassian local authorities). According to this Resolution, the plan will focus on four main issues: the development of economy and employment, housing and real estate, transportation, and personal safety and enforcement in twelve chosen localities encompassing a population of 370,000 people. The budget for the execution of the plan is 778.5 Million NIS (USD $210,405,405). The plan will be managed by the Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations within the Prime Minister's Office, and will include, inter alia: the development of industrial zones, retraining of personnel and career change, funding for the building of new housing units and operation of public transportation.

The Prime Minister's Office

106. Investment Fund for Businesses in the Arab Population. In December 2006, the Director General of the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) announced the decision to establish a private equity fund, in cooperation with the private sector geared towards the Arab population. The fund will invest an overall sum of 160 Million NIS (US$ 43,243,243) over a period of seven to ten years in businesses located in Arab localities. Any factory, company or business will be able to apply for an amount of between two to four Million NIS (US$ 540,541–$1,081,081) in financing, thus enabling 40–80 companies to receive financial assistance in exchange for stocks.

The fund's purposes are, inter alia, to encourage investment in the Arab population while reducing the risks for investors, to develop and improve businesses while providing administrative and business acumen, to assist in creating new businesses, to create a meeting place to bring together sources of capital and know-how in the private market and the Arab population, to fully exhaust the unrealized entrepreneurial potential in the Arab population, to fully utilize human resources, and to increase the Arab population's involvement in business.

The Ministry of Defense

107. Currently there are approximately 900 soldiers of the Arab population serving in the Israel's Defense Force (IDF), of which, 73 per cent are the Bedouins, 17 per cent are Muslim Arabs and 10 per cent are Christian-Arabs. In addition, 39 per cent of these soldiers are ranked as corporals, 18 per cent are ranked as sergeants, 7 per cent are ranked as first sergeants, 1 per cent are ranked as first lieutenants, and 15 per cent as Academic Professional Officers. Of these soldiers – 61 per cent have combat duties, 14 per cent have driving duties, 11 per cent serve in the courses alignment, 8 per cent serve in administrative positions, 5 per cent in technical alignment and 1 per cent serve as officers in regular service.

108. There is no obligatory draft requirement for members of the Arab population – drafting is voluntary and currently stands at only 6 per cent of the draft potential.

109. However, the Defense Service Law 5746-1986 does apply to members of the Druze and Circassian populations. The rate of recruitment among the Druze population is high and in 2008 stood at 83 per cent. 58 per cent of the Druze soldiers serve in combat positions. 4 per cent of the total number of officers and Non-Commissioned-Officers are of the Druze population (3 per cent officers and 5 per cent Non-Commissioned-Officers). The top ranks of officers of the Druze populations are Major General (1), Brigadier General (2) and Colonel (5).

The Ministry of Interior

110. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, the National Outline Plan (NOP) no. 35 that was approved in 2005, gives clear preference to the Negev and Galilee areas, in which the majority of the Minority population resides, and enables new forms of expansion for all localities and establishes new density rules according to the size of the locality, its socio-economic situation and its demographic structure. The leading principle of NOP 35 concerns the communal-religious specification of each locality and reinforcing their integration within the State of Israel. In addition, other NOPs which deal with various national infrastructure systems such as roads, railways, gas lines, water pipes, sanitation etc., make such infrastructures more accessible to peripheral areas in general, and specifically to Arab localities.

111. Local planning schemes include references to infrastructure systems in the various localities and their surrounding areas. In addition to planning infrastructure systems within each locality, the plans explore the possibility of integrating each locality into the national infrastructure layout, and sometimes even expanding the national infrastructure layout to that end. Thus, for example, planning procedures in Arab localities in central Israel (Tira, Klansawa and Taibe) led to the establishment of additional railway stations on a national line, which serves Arab localities nearby. A similar examination is currently being conducted regarding other localities in Wadi-Ara in the north.

The Ministry of National Infrastructures

Administration for sewage infrastructures – Arab population

112. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, as part of the abovementioned 2000 multi-year plan, extensive sewage infrastructure projects were completed in 73 Arab localities (affecting a total of 700,000 residents).

113. In July 2005, the Government approved Resolution No. 3958, in which it was resolved, in continuation of Resolution No. 1328 of January 14, 2004, to update the assistance program for minority localities and allocate an additional 400 Million NIS (US$ 108,108,108) (of which 50 per cent is in the form of a Government loan) for treating sewage in the years 2005–2007.

114. On February 4, 2007, the Government consolidated an additional multi-year plan to promote and assist in the construction and development of sewage infrastructure in Arab, Druze and Circassian localities, as well as Bedouin localities in the North (Government Resolution No. 1140). The multi-year plan is to be implemented in the years 2007–2011, and a total budget of 400 Million NIS (US$ 108,108,108) (of which 50 per cent is in the form of a Government loan) was allocated to that end. According to the Government Resolution, as a prerequisite for the implementation of the plan, the localities are required to establish Water and Sewage Corporations, as stipulated in the Water and Sewage Corporations Law 5761-2001 (the “Water and Sewage Corporations Law”). Progress has been made towards the establishment of Water and Sewage Corporations by the localities, however they have yet to be completed.

115. Both of the Government Resolutions mentioned above are in addition to an additional budget of 400 Million NIS (US$ 108,108,108) that was allocated in 2000, for treating sewage, thus making the total budget for treating sewage from the year 2000 and up to 2011 – 1.2 Billion NIS (US$ 324,324,324).

Administration for sewage infrastructures – Bedouin population

116. Government Resolution No. 3956 (Arab/40) of July 18, 2005, established a total budget of 387.7 Million NIS (US$ 104,783,784) for the development of infrastructures and building public structures in Abu-Basma and Al Sid localities between 2005 and 2008. The budget included 44 Million NIS (US$ 11,891,892) (of which 50 per cent is in the form of a Government loan) for development of water and sewage systems. The implementation of this resolution was delayed due to the slow population of these localities and for difficulties the localities encountered in returning the loan.

117. On October 11, 2007, the Government consolidated an additional multi-year plan to promote and assist in the construction and development of sewage infrastructure in the Bedouin localities in the Negev area (Government Resolution No. 2428). According to the Government Resolution, as a prerequisite condition for the implementation of the plan, the localities were required to establish Water and Sewage Corporations, as stipulated in the Water and Sewage Corporations Law. However such corporations have yet to be established.

118. In March 2010, the Be'er Sheva District Court approved an agreement between Kssaife local authority and “Adam, Teva V'din – The Israel Union for Environmental Defense” regarding arrangements of the Kssaife sewage system. The finalization of the sewage system was delayed due to the objection of one of Kssaife’s residents to the laying of the sewage pipe near his property. According to the agreement, the head of Kssaife locality and the local authority shall take all necessary steps to complete the building of the sewage line by June 2010. The agreement was reached after concluding that the area in question does not belong to the objecting resident.

Development of road infrastructure

119. In accordance with the aforementioned multi-year plan of October 2000, between the years 2001 and 2004, the Ministry of Transport and Road Safety allocated a budget of 180 Million NIS (US$ 48,648,649) for the development of intra-municipal road infrastructure and safety projects (45 Million NIS per year), and a budget of 325 Million NIS (US$ 87,837,838) for the development of inter-municipal road infrastructure (81.25 Million NIS – US$ 21,959,459 per year) in various Arab localities.

120. During the years 2005–2007, the Ministry of Transport and Road Safety continued to advance the development of intra-municipal infrastructure in Arab localities. Furthermore, the Ministry continues to develop inter-municipal infrastructure through the allocation of budgets to the local municipalities towards their development of infrastructure in their jurisdiction, or through management companies. During these years, 94,386,900 NIS (US$ 25,509,973) was allocated for development projects for the Druze and Circassian population, 69,652,880 NIS (US$ 18,825,102) for projects in the Bedouin towns in the North, 34,790,000 NIS (US$ 9,402,703) for the Bedouin towns in the Negev and 230,448,321 NIS (US$ 62,283,330) towards Arab localities.

121. During the first half of 2008, the Ministry of Transport and Road Safety allocated a budget of 52.2 Million NIS (US$ 14,108,108) towards the development of intra-municipal infrastructure, from which 7.8 Million NIS (US$ 2,108,108) was allocated to Bedouin localities in the Negev, 11.8 Million NIS (US$ 3,189,189) to Bedouin localities in the North, 6.1 Million NIS (US$ 1,648,649) to Druze and Circassian localities and 26.4 Million NIS (US$ 7,135,135) to Arab localities. Furthermore, during this period of time, the Ministry allocated an additional 29.3 Million NIS (US$ 7,918,919) for the development of infrastructure and safety projects in these localities.

122. According to the Ministry's estimates, as of December 2008, the Ministry has allocated a further 20 Million NIS (US$ 5,405,405) for additional funding of uncompleted projects.

123. The inter-municipal infrastructure development is performed by 'Ma'atz' – Israel National Road Company Inc., in accordance with a five-year plan which sets out the projects to be completed. The current plan is for the years 2005–2009. According to the five-year plan, 2.333 Billion NIS (US$ 630,540,541) was allocated for the development, maintenance and reconstruction of inter-municipal infrastructure in the Arab localities.

124. According to information provided by 'Ma'atz', by the beginning of 2008, a total of 315.26 Million NIS (US$ 85,205,405) was invested in the development of inter-municipal infrastructure in the minorities' localities. An additional amount of 1.0111 Billion NIS (US$ 273,270,270) will be allocated for the completion of remaining projects. Furthermore, during 2008–2009, another 1.0065 Billion NIS (US$ 272,027,027) will be allocated according to the five-year plan, for the development, maintenance and reconstruction of inter-municipal infrastructure in minorities' localities.

The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (ITL)

Development of industrial zones

125. The Ministry of ITL has recently announced that Grants to companies and firms made by the chief scientist in the Ministry of Science and Technology will be conditioned upon the firms' undertaking to protect their employees' rights. The budget of the chief scientist for purposes of research and development is approximately 1.4 Billion NIS (US$ 378,378,378) annually. In addition, the companies shall have to show that they have not been convicted or fined for violations of their employees' rights, for example for the dismissal of a pregnant employee, for paying wages under the minimum wage etc. The firms have to guarantee to protect employees' rights according to the relevant laws and agreements. Firms that were convicted within the last three years, or more than twice in the year prior to the submission of a request for a grant, will not qualify to receive the grant.

126. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, one of the Government's central goals is to increase the participation rate of the Arab population in the workforce, thus increasing the number of employed and wage-earners. The employment potential of the Arab population is further increased by a greater participation rate of Arab women in the workforce. Within this framework, the Ministry of ITL is utilizing a number of tools to increase the number of Arab women participants in the workforce including professional training programs, employment tracks, entrepreneurship etc. In addition, the Authority for Advancement of the Status of Women has taken several steps to increase the percentage of Arabs employed, especially among women. This includes cooperation with business development centers to develop entrepreneurship programs for women, professional training programs, and loans or small businesses related to home industry. In order to improve accessibility for Arab women, a municipal project has been formed in order to establish new industrial areas and expand existing ones etc.

The Ministry of Tourism

127. In the last decade the Government has invested extensive efforts towards developing tourism as a source of employment and income among the Arab population, as part of the general effort to promote and advance economic prosperity in the Arab population, thus bridging the gaps with the Jewish population. Accordingly, in the 2000 multi-year plan and the two additional multi-year plans for the development of the Arab population in the North, emphasis was placed on this issue and the required budget was allocated.

128. Between the years 2000 and 2008, the Ministry of Tourism invested 21,173,000 NIS (US$ 5,722,432) towards the development of tourism infrastructure in Arab localities. The Ministry of Tourism further provides financial assistance and professional guidance to entrepreneurs in establishing rural-accommodation units (Zimmers), as well as in other tourism-related initiatives.

The Ministry of Agricultural and Rural Development

129. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development invests significant efforts and resources towards the development and advancement of agricultural activity in the minority populations, thus maintaining and creating new employment opportunities. In 2007 and 2008, the Ministry allocated a budget of 20 Million NIS (US$ 5,405,405) towards agricultural development in Arab localities, in two main spheres – general infrastructure and the individual farmstead.

130. With regard to general infrastructure, the Ministry provides financial assistance (grants for 60 per cent – 100 per cent of the cost) for reconstruction of agricultural roads in all of the Arab localities throughout the country. In addition, the Ministry provides financial assistance for the removal of pens and cowsheds located in the center of Arab villages, and their relocation on State lands outside these villages, as well as on private lands.

131. The Ministry participates (grants for 60 per cent of the cost) in the reconstruction and replacement of main water pipes for agricultural use in the Arab villages throughout Israel. The Ministry also assists in the preparation of programs for agricultural tourism in the Arab villages, including in the Negev.

132. The development activity concerning the individual farmstead can be divided into three major branches – livestock, vegetable crops and plantation. With regard to the livestock branch, financial assistance (60 per cent of the cost) is provided for establishing milking facilities. Activities to promote the vegetable crops branch include financial assistance (30 per cent of the cost) in order to facilitate building greenhouses for growing vegetable for the local market, in the framework of the program for strengthening northern Israel. Financial assistance is further provided for the creation of vegetable growing habitats in the Jewish fallow year, for local marketing. The activity concerning the plantation branch includes assistance in the establishment of packinghouses and ice houses (in the framework of the program for strengthening northern Israel), and financial support for planting olive and almond trees – which varies according to geographic location (20 per cent in central Israel, 25 per cent – 40 per cent in the north).

133. The aforementioned development activities are additional to the utilization of funding offered to the general public.

134. In addition, the Ministry decided to allocate two million cubic meters of water for Bedouin farmers who will receive the water under a specially designated procedure.

135. In order to minimize the damage inflicted on Arab farmers due to general cutbacks in water for agriculture use in Israel, it was decided to formulate a special water allocation policy for the Arab population. Accordingly, since 2006, the water quotas for Arab farmers are determined according to their actual use in the previous three years. Consequently, these farmers have not suffered from the cutbacks implemented in recent years due to the water shortage.

The Authority for Economic Development of the Arab Population, including Druze and Circassian

136. On February 15, 2007 the Government decided to establish, within the Prime Minister's Office, the Authority for Economic Development of the Arab Population, including the Druze and Circassian (hereinafter: the "Authority"). The aim of the Authority is to realize, to its maximum ability, the economic potential of the minority population, through the encouragement of productive economic activity within this population, and its integration into the national economy. Among its functions, the Authority operates as coordinator for the purposes of integration and supervision with regard to government activities concerning the economic advancement of the Arab population.

Pedagogic programs to foster democracy and tolerance

142. The Ministry of Education has made a concerted effort to advance principles of democracy and co-existence in its curriculum, and through this framework, works to combat all forms of discrimination.

143. The Administration for Society and Youth in the Ministry of Education has in recent years formulated several educational programs regarding democracy, tolerance and co-existence, which are intended, inter alia, to combat all forms of discrimination. The following are descriptions of some of the programs:

(a) Democracy at critical times – A social educational program intended for pupils in the 7th to 12th grades, which presents substantial issues regarding the culture of democracy and challenging dilemmas for Israeli democracy. The program was developed by the Administration for Society and Youth and the national training center for employees in the field of education;

(b) Reelecting democracy – this program presents the advantages of democracy over other forms of governance and governing regimes. The participants are presented with the complexity of the democratic regime, which is subject to several conflicting considerations: the obligation to protect the common good and the desire to protect individual's rights, and protecting the State's security and freedom of speech;

(c) Living in a multicultural society – the purpose of this program is to reinforce the awareness that disagreements on certain matters may cause divisions in Israeli society which may endanger the existence of the State. The program encourages pupils to develop tolerance towards others and to deal peacefully with conflict situations;

(d) Communication – An education program which deals with the way in which one should conduct political debates in public and in accordance with the principles of a democratic regime. The program emphasizes the threats posed to the existence of the State of Israel through the use of illegitimate avenues of protest. The program presents areas of common ground in Israeli society as foundations for partnership and provides practical tools for learning the skills of communication.

144. The Administration for Society and Youth in the Ministry of Education also publishes a monthly brochure which addresses a different issue each month. The brochure also offers educational programs relevant to the monthly issue. Among the issues published in the brochure and the programs offered are:

(a) "Operation Moses", in which approximately 8,000 immigrants from Ethiopia were brought to Israel between November 1984 and January 1985. The brochure contained information regarding the immigrants' travel while in Ethiopia, their hardships after coming to Israel, challenges while trying to integrate into Israeli society and educational programs regarding the Ethiopian culture, and teaching tolerance and respect for other cultures (published in November 2009);

(b) In September 2009, in light of the Jewish New Year, the brochure addressed the issue of social and public self-examination. The brochure analyzed events of the past year which reflected the hardships experienced by the weaker segments of Israeli society, and ways of dealing with these difficulties and of assisting these individuals to overcome these hardships.

Affirmative action in higher education

145. Since 1995, the Planning and Budgeting Committee (henceforth: the Committee) in the Council for Higher Education has conducted a special program for the promotion and absorption of excellent Arab lecturers, in which four to six three-year long scholarships are granted annually. These scholarships are intended for young excellent Arab scientists who study in universities and other financed institutions. The scholars are appointed as lecturers, senior lecturers or associate professors, and the scholarship is provided for a period of three years, in addition to a special grant which is provided for the purchase of the required equipment.

146. In 2003, a permanent steering committee was established under the stewardship of the Council for Higher Education, with a budget of 5 Million NIS (US$ 1,351,351) per year. This Committee uses its budget for promoting higher education in the Arab population by way of three central activities:

(a) Scholarships for achieving excellence among Arab doctorates – each year up to 10 such scholarships are granted for a period of three years, in the sum of 52,000 NIS (US$ 14,054);

(b) Information Center – the Center’s purpose is to render higher education accessible for the Arab population, by bringing the candidates together and preparing them for academic studies and advising them with respect to choosing a field of study. In 2009–10, a national information center will be operated with a budget of 1 Million NIS (US$ 270,270);

(c) Programs for expanding the accessibility of higher education institutions – the Committee has allocated approximately 2.5 Million NIS (US$ 675,676) towards supporting Arab students and promoting plans submitted by higher education institutions for that purpose, such as student tutors, counseling, preparation days, academic preparatory classes, study assistance etc. Currently, 20 institutions submit such programs annually to the Committee at a cost of approximately 20 Million NIS (US$ 5,405,405).

The judicial branch

147. In the Judicial system there are currently 569 judges. Of the twelve justices currently serving in the Supreme Court one is a Christian Arab. Of the 128 judges currently serving in the District Courts, 5 are Muslim Judges, 2 are Christian and one judge is of Druze origin. Of the 381 judges currently serving in the Magistrate Courts, 14 are Christian judges, 10 are Muslim and 5 are Druze judges. One Christian judge and one Druze Judge serve in the Labor Courts. In addition, there are 3 Druze judges in the state-funded Druze Religious Courts (Qadi Madhab) and additional 3 judges are in the final stages of approval. In total 43 judges from minority groups’ function in the judiciary system.

Development of industrial zones

148. Development of Industrial Zones. In accordance with the Committee’s recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, in 2006, following Government Resolution No. 249, the Encouragement of Capital Investments Order (Determination of Development Areas) 5763-2002 (the “Encouragement of Capital Investments Order”), was amended in order to include all minority localities within the definition of “Development Area A”, thus enabling plants in industrial areas located in these localities to receive various tax benefits and grants as stipulated in the Order and the Encouragement of Capital Investments Law 5719-1959 (the “Encouragement of Capital Investments Law”). Furthermore, on January 7, 2007, the Government resolved to expedite the marketing of lands for industrial purposes in “Development Area A”, thus facilitating the expedition of land marketing in these localities, as well as subsidizing the land development expenses, as stipulated in the Resolution.

149. Between the years 2005 and 2008, development activities in industrial zones in Arab and Druze localities were subsidized by the Ministry of ITL, in to the amount of 28,665,967 NIS (US$ 7,747,559). As part of these activities, 1,008 square kilometers of state-owned land in these areas was marketed.

150. In 2005 and 2006, the Government approved two additional resolutions (Resolution No. 3957 dated July 22, 2005, and Resolution No. 632 dated November 5, 2006), establishing a plan for the development and expansion of new and existing industrial zones, as well as assistance to small businesses in Arab, Druze and Bedouin localities. The Government allocated a total of 119 Million NIS (US$ 32,162,162) during the years 2005–2006 towards this purpose.

151. The Administration for Industrial Zones within the Ministry of ITL is working on the development of 32 industrial zones for Minority populations throughout Israel. The total budget allocated for this purpose in the years 2006–2009 was 122.5 Million NIS (US$ 33,108,108) (not including a special budget of 5 Million NIS (US$ 1,351,351) allocated for the establishment of joint industrial administrations).

Encouraging local entrepreneurs

152. The Ministry of ITL is aware of the inherent difficulties faced by entrepreneurs from the Bedouin population, such as limited financial capability, and is therefore taking action to bridge the gaps. The Ministry of ITL has established a designated Center for Nurturing Entrepreneurship among the Arab and Bedouin populations located in Rahat that is better equipped to serve these populations' needs. Furthermore, in order to support entrepreneurs among the Bedouin population in the Negev, the Ministry of ITL has established a unique loan fund for small enterprises.

153. Employment centers for the Bedouin population. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, in the framework of cooperation between the Government and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, it was decided to create unique employment centers in the Bedouin localities. These centers will assist in enhancing the number of employed persons, aid in the creation of small businesses and enterprises, provide professional training and guidance for entrepreneurs and financial solutions and will lead to change in employment-related perceptions and norms in the Bedouin population, including encouraging the employment of women while providing them with unique training for that purpose. The First employment center was inaugurated in Hura in April 2010 and two additional Centers are to be established in 2010–2011.

154. Furthermore, as mentioned under Article 2 above, the Encouragement of Capital Investments Order, was amended in order to strengthen the Arab localities, including the Bedouins communities. There are currently seventeen planned industrial areas in the Southern district, three (17 per cent) of which are located in Bedouin towns – Rahat, Segev Shalom and Hura. Additionally, a new industrial area, currently in the advanced stages of planning, will also service the Bedouin population – Shoket, (for Hura, Lafia, Meitar and Bney Shimon). Development of all these areas is uniform and subject to the same general criteria.

155. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 24 of June 14, 2007, a new Industrial Park in the Negev which is a result of Jewish-Bedouin cooperation was inaugurated by the Minister for the Development of the Negev and the Galilee and the Minister of ITL in April 2010. The Park — "Idan Ha-Negev" (The Negev Era) spreads over 1,700 dunams and is managed and operated by the three local authorities which established it — Bnei-Shimon local authority, Rahat municipality and Lehavim local council. The Park was established with an investment of 20 Million NIS (U.S $5,405,405) and recently the Ministry of ITL has allocated additional 25 Million NIS (U.S $6,756,756) for the second stage of development. 130 entrepreneurs applied to join the Park, of which 18 entrepreneurs have already purchased lots in the new park and are expected to employ approximately 700 employees. Some of the entrepreneurs are Bedouin from the Negev who wish to establish factories which will employ young Bedouins from the area in order to lower the relatively high unemployment rates among the Bedouin population.

Vocational training for Arab women

156. Over the past few years, there has been an increase in the rate of employment among Arab women, yet this rate remains relatively low. Academic education and vocational training are the key components for the integration of Arab women into the work force, yet various barriers inhibit their integration into these educational and training systems, such as the level of education and social/cultural barriers. The traditional stances and cultural stigmas among the Arab population define the acceptable limits with respect to women traveling alone to school and work, and Arab women are therefore often reluctant to attend courses that require travel to other towns. Not all vocational courses are available in the women's residential towns, because of a lack of a proper framework, candidates, and future job opportunities.

157. Due to the above, many Arab women attend "traditional" courses that are local, and are likely to enable them to meet the requirements of local job opportunities, whether full-time or part time. This is not the case with regard to education, computers, graphics or technical assistants/engineers. Additionally, the employment opportunities in these fields, in some of the residential towns, are very limited.

158. In this regard, during 2006, an educational program was implemented for the coordinators of the Project for the Advancement of the Bedouin population in the North, dealing with the issue of social/cultural barriers, motivation, recruitment of candidates and persistency through vocational training. Also, in order to rectify the current situation, joint efforts are being made by the Ministry of ITL, local authorities, social services, vocational training institutes and employers in order to provide vocational training, and to create more feasible job offers for Arab women.

159. In addition to the general training system provided by the Ministry of ITL, there are special programs for Arab women, aimed at bridging the gaps that exist and increasing women's participation in training courses.

160. Day care centers – Arab and Bedouin localities. Arab women are considered the primary caretakers for children; this is one of the factors that explain the low percentage of Arab women who participate in the work force. The Government, through the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, has invested significant efforts in enhancing awareness among women of their own career options and self-fulfillment. In recent years, the growth in the rate of Arab women's participation in the workforce, including Bedouin women, has led to a need for the establishment of day-care centers and nurseries. The Government has taken steps to meet this need.

161. In 2007, the Government allocated funding for the establishment of 150 buildings designated for use as day care centers, 17 of which are located in Arab municipalities.

162. Special vocational training and unique programs for the Bedouin population were developed in order to increase employment rates and increase the number of students, both male and female, enrolled in higher education courses.

163. An economic model for Bedouin women in the weaving, needlework and food fields was formulated, where the women market their products in special fairs and abroad. The women are also prepared for the process that includes building a business organization model, creation of a unique product line and the proper means of marketing. The project is to last three years, during which the women will open independent businesses. Currently, the project runs in Kssaife and 20 women participate in it.

Bedouins in the Negev

164. The Bedouin population resides in both the North and the South of the country. The Government has initiated a number of plans that address the concerns and needs of the Bedouin population, as fully described in the section addressing Article 5 of the CERD below. The key goals of the plans are to allow for sustainable integration of the Bedouin population into the State, while maintaining their traditional practices and lifestyle. All of the plans involve active societal participation of the relevant tribes and communities and strive to properly compensate and integrate the Bedouin population into Israeli society.

II. Article 3

165. Apartheid has always been regarded as abhorrent by the Israeli Government and society, and continues to be so regarded. Apartheid has never been practiced in Israel. There exist in Israel no restrictions of any kind as to place of residence nor is there any segregation of any kind.

III. Article 4

A. Criminal prosecution of racism

1. The Law

166. As previously reported, Section 144B of the Penal Law provides for a penalty of up to five years' imprisonment for a person who publishes material with the intent to incite to racism, even if ineffectual in result, and Section 144D provide for a penalty of up to a year imprisonment for a person who is in possession of such a publication with the intent to publish it. Racism is defined in Section 144A of the Law as "persecution, humiliation, vilification, the display of hostility, enmity or violence, or the causing of animosity towards a community or parts of the population, by reason of color, racial origin or national-ethnic origin".

167. In May 2002, the Knesset amended Sections 144D2 and 144D3 of the Penal Law, criminalizing the publication of a call for acts of violence or terrorism or even praise, support or encouragement for such an act, as well as support or identification with it, where the call is likely to lead to violence or terrorism. The punishment for this offence is up to 5 years imprisonment. According to Section 144D3, a person holding publications according to Section 144D2, will be sentenced to one year imprisonment.

168. A more recent amendment, dated November 2004, added a section titled "Hate Offences", which consists of Section 144F, which stipulates that offences motivated by racism or hostility towards the public, which are committed under "aggravated circumstances", will result in punishment by the courts of either double the penalty which exists for the specific offence committed or ten years' imprisonment, whichever is the lesser of the two. This applies if the offence was racially motivated and performed against a population or hostility towards a public on the basis of religion, religious group, ethnic origin, sexual orientation or on the basis of their being migrant workers.

169. Another source of law is Section 133 of the Penal Law that prohibits, among others things, the encouragement of hatred between different sections of the population. This offence carries a punishment of up to 5 years' imprisonment.

170. In accordance with Section 6(25) of the Telecommunications Law (Bezeq and Broadcasts) 5742-1982 (the "Telecommunications Law (Bezeq and Broadcasts)") and Section 46 (a) (2) of the Second Authority for Television and Radio Law 5750-1990 (the "Second Authority for Television and Radio Law"), TV concession holders shall not transmit any broadcast which contains racial incitement. Concession holders are further bound to take all measures necessary to ensure that no broadcast is liable to incite to discrimination on grounds of religion, race, nationality, community, lifestyle or origin. Section 6(57) of the Telecommunications Law (Bezeq and Broadcasts) further stipulates that this obligation also applies to satellite broadcasts. In addition, according to the Telecommunications Rules (Bezeq and Broadcasts) (TV Concession Holders) 5748-1987 (the "Telecommunications Rules"), Section 2(4) determines that TV concession holder shall not transmit any broadcast which contains racial and national incitement. Furthermore, Section 3(3) to the Telecommunications Rules determines that during broadcasts the concession holder shall take all required steps to ensure that no broadcast contents are liable to incite to discrimination on ground of race, origin, religion, nationality and gender.

2. Judicial perspectives

171. On December 7, 2006, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal filed against a judgment given by the Jerusalem District Court, which convicted the two appellants of various charges of violence and assault committed against Israeli-Arabs, and sentenced each of the appellants to three years' imprisonment, six months' suspended imprisonment and ordered each of them to pay compensation to the victims in the sum of 7,500 NIS (US$ 2,027). When imposing the sentence, the District Court attributed particular gravity to the fact that the offences were racially motivated – the Court asserted that the racial element involved in the offences must be reflected in the punishment as well. The Supreme Court reaffirmed this approach and emphasized that in a society which espouses the values of equality and the protection of human rights, there is no room for such racially motivated crimes, and any such behavior is to be condemned and denounced. In light of the above, the appeal was dismissed (Cr.A. 9040/05, Yitzhak Orion and Yehuda Ovadia v. The State of Israel). Note that this decision co-insides with the with the Committee's recommendation No. 30 of June 14, 2007.

172. In another case, the Jerusalem District Court convicted eight defendants on the basis of their membership in a Neo-Nazi group, for incitement offences which included, inter alia, hate crimes. The defendants were convicted in the framework of a plea bargain and were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from 7 years to 12 months, including 18 months' suspended imprisonment (please see further details below, in Table No. 2) (C.C. 40270/07, The State of Israel v. Boanitov Arik et al. (23.11.08)). Note that this decision also co-insides with the with the Committee's recommendation No. 30 of June 14, 2007.

173. The following table includes a detailed list of cases relating to racism, incitement and other serious offences. Some of the cases are still pending in the Courts:

Incitement to racism on the Internet

174. A special department in the State Attorney's Office (the Department for Special Functions) deals with the prosecution of incitement in general and also deals with cases of incitement on the Internet. The department files indictments on the basis of investigations conducted by the police.

175. In some cases, it was decided not to initiate an investigation, but to warn those responsible or draw their attention to the limits imposed upon certain publications.

IV. Article 5

A. The right to equal treatment before national tribunals

176. The right to equal treatment for all persons regardless of their race or ethnic origin is a basic and fundamental principle in Israel. All governmental bodies and judicial apparatus recognize this right, and maintain and uphold equal treatment for all individuals.

177. With respect to General Recommendation XXXI (II. A. 7, 8 – Steps to be taken to prevent racial discrimination with regard to victims of racism, Access to the law and to justice and III. C. 2 – Steps to be taken to prevent racial discrimination against accused persons who are subject to judicial proceedings, the trial and the court judgment, the right to the assistance of counsel and the right to an interpreter) on the prevention of racial discrimination in the administration and functioning of the criminal justice system (2005), we wish to indicate the following.

The Legal Aid Department in the Ministry of Justice

178. The Legal Aid Department is responsible for providing legal assistance to persons who are unable to afford it, in accordance with the Legal Aid Law 5732-1972 (the "Legal Aid Law") and the Legal Aid Regulations 5733-1973 (the "Legal Aid Regulations"). The Law and its Regulations determine the extent of the assistance which can be provided by the Department, as well as the conditions under which an individual is entitled to receive such assistance. Legal aid is provided in various fields, including representation of victims of trafficking in persons, representation of minors, providing legal aid in matters of finance, national insurance, labor law, family law, and persons who were forcibly hospitalized.

179. In order to be provided with legal aid, the Law and its Regulations establish three conditions: one with respect to the legal field concerned, the second regarding the economic status of the applicant, and the third relating to the likelihood of success. These conditions apply equally with respect to every applicant.

180. The right of equal access to courts for all population groups in Israel is a first and foremost goal, and the Department has invested extensively in order to provide legal aid for those who are unable to afford legal representation or for those who have limited access to such legal aid, and for persons who are members of minority populations and who are unaware of their entitlement to legal aid. Out of the total applications for legal aid, approximately 10 per cent are drawn from the Arab population, including Druze, Bedouins and Circassians.

181. The Department's bureaus are located in all five districts of jurisdiction (Tel-Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Nazareth and Be'er-Sheva) and are prepared to receive and deal with requests for legal aid from all population groups in Israel. Many of the Department's employees, including attorneys and administrative workers, are of the Arab population; this is particularly so among the bureau in Nazareth, which serves a major segment of that population. The Department also provides legal representation in the Muslim and Christian Religious Court Systems which enjoy jurisdiction over personal status issues, and external attorneys are hired when required.

182. The percentage of minorities who serve in different positions in the Department is 15 per cent (30 employees of the Arab, Druze, Bedouin and Circassian populations), which is higher than the Government's general target for 2010 (10 per cent) as established by Government Resolutions No. 4729, 2579, 4436 and 4437. Some of these employees serve in positions which were not originally designated for affirmative action.

183. The Department also invests significant efforts in increasing the awareness of the entitlement to legal aid among minorities. Thus, the Department has recently conducted meetings in this regard with welfare representatives of Bedouin localities in the south, managers of welfare bureaus of Arab localities in the north, and welfare representatives of Druze localities in the Golan Heights. The Department is continuing to arrange such meeting throughout the country.

184. In order to make legal aid more accessible for the minority populations, the Department's attorneys are conducting interviews for applicants in different welfare bureaus across the country; interviews are also conducted in prisons for prisoners who have requested legal aid. For example, the Department recently provided legal aid in a petition submitted to the High Court of Justice by an Arab-Israeli prisoner who claimed to have been discriminated against by the Israel's Prisoner Rehabilitation Authority, since he was unable to participate in a rehabilitation program (H.C.J. 4874/09 Masarwa Hiri v. The Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services).

185. The Department also provides legal aid for minors who came to Israel illegally; and encourages the release of such minors from detention and their placement in alternative custody, such as foster families and boarding schools.

186. Victims of trafficking in persons are entitled to legal aid from the Department, regardless of their financial standing. This entitlement applies to proceedings conducted under the Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952 (the “Entry into Israel Law”) or other civil proceedings stemming from offences of trafficking in persons. Legal aid is provided to victims who stay in the shelters designated for victims of trafficking, as well as to victims who are held in detention; all of whom are informed of their right to legal aid. Since 2004, the Department has provided legal aid to 170 victims of trafficking in persons for prostitution and 25 victims of trafficking in persons for slavery and forced labor. According to the 2007 report of the “Ma’agan” Shelter for Women Victims of Trafficking, established by Government Resolution No. 2806 dated December 1, 2002, 94 per cent of the women who were referred to the shelter received legal aid, which significantly advanced their rehabilitation. The Department’s activity with respect to victims of trafficking was also commended by the annual Trafficking in Persons Report of the US Department of State.

The Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the Ministry of Justice

187. Since the submission of Israel’s thirteenth Periodic Report, the Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the Ministry of Justice has conducted many seminars, courses, and vocational training attended by hundreds of practitioners, to raise the awareness of attorneys and legal advisors of human rights issues and in particular to eliminate racial discrimination. The training focused on the following issues: the impact of international law on criminal law (February 2005), international confrontation with terrorism (March 2006), the individual in international law (February 2007), terrorism and human rights (May 2007), the battle against trafficking in persons (November 2008, October 2009, March 2010), enforcement of international law (February 2009), infiltrators, asylum seekers and refugees in Israel (June 2009), human rights in international law (September 2009) in addition to seminars on freedom of speech versus incitement, social rights etc.

188. In addition, at the beginning of 2007, a special seminar was held for all the lawyers working in the Legal Aid Department of the Ministry of Justice concerning innovations in the Anti Trafficking Law 5767-2006 (the “Anti Trafficking Law”). In November 2007, another training course took place for all the Department’s lawyers concerning the salient aspects of the new Anti Trafficking Law and the recommendations of the inter-ministerial team for developing an action plan for the identification of victims of trafficking and slavery.

The Institute of Advanced Judicial Studies

189. The Institute holds lectures, seminars and courses on the various forms of discrimination for judges of all instances. In 2005 for example, the Institute held a course titled, “Equality and Discrimination”, chaired by Professor Daphna Barak-Erez. The course is scheduled to be held again in December 2010. In May 2009, the institute held a four-day seminar titled: “Israeli Arabs – Culture and Customs”. In addition, various forms of discrimination and the need to eliminate it are also discussed in lectures presented by the Institute regarding other issues such as trafficking in persons etc.

Training for law enforcement officers

Israeli Police

190. Police combat against hate propaganda. The Israeli Police attaches great importance to educating those serving in its ranks regarding the need to defend the rights of the ordinary citizen in a democratic society. The Police regularly conduct educational activities for police officers in order to raise their awareness of the social complexity in Israel and its impact on police work. The activities advance knowledge and understanding of the characteristics of minority populations in Israel, including Arabs, immigrants, the homosexual community and persons with disabilities, and provide tools for the provision of professional, sensitive police work among these populations. The concept of “equal and suitable service in a multi-cultural society” was formulated as the annual education target for 2007.

191. For example, police activities include special training days and educational seminars in each police station, an academic course on the Arabic language and the Arab culture, which is held in collaboration with Haifa University, a special seminar on the homosexual community delivered together with gay representatives, and distribution of information cards concerning police services offered to persons with disabilities. In addition, the Police conduct educational activities on the legacy of the holocaust and the importance of combating racism and securing democratic values. As a result of these activities, the commitment of police officers to protect minority groups from discrimination and hate propaganda and crime has increased significantly.

192. In 2008, the police southern district commander decided to open a special preparatory course for the Bedouin population in the Negev. The decision was taken after realizing that 95 per cent of the Bedouin applicants which applied for recruitment for the southern district failed the entry exams. The preparatory course prepares young Bedouins, men and women, for the psychometric test and allows them to overcome cultural and linguistic obstacles. The first class in which 15 Bedouins participated, graduated in May 2009, after three weeks of intensive studies, and 50 per cent of the participants passed the entry exams for the Police training course and began the drafting process. The Bedouin policemen and police officers serve as a bridge between the Police and the Bedouin population and assist the population in times of need.

193. In May 2010, the Minister of Public Security presented a program that is intended to increase law enforcement in the Arab population. According to the program 400 policemen from the Arab population will be recruited during 2010 and will primarily operate in Arab communities. The program includes opening special preparatory and placement classes in order to assist candidates to prepare for the Police entry exams. The first class candidates are scheduled to take their police entry exams in a few weeks time.

194. In addition, the Ministry of Public Security is preparing two additional programs. The first program is intended to strengthen law enforcement and to fight violence and crime among the Arab population, and the second program is intended to strengthen the Police presence among the Ultra-Orthodox population. The implementation of both of these programs will include the strengthening of police services in the Arab and in the Ultra-Orthodox populations and activities to strengthen civilian prevention bodies operating in these populations, such as the Israel Anti-Drug and Alcohol Authority and the national program of City Without Violence.

195. Trafficking in persons training. In 2008, the issue of trafficking in persons remained an integral part of most of the training courses taking place in the Investigations and Intelligence Training School, and was covered in lectures by members of the relevant NGOs, State Attorney’s representatives and the National Coordinator on the Battle against Trafficking in Persons. In addition, two week-long training courses on trafficking in persons are held annually. Trafficking training also takes place in combating organized crime training, courses for heads of Investigations and Intelligence offices, coordinators' courses and similar courses. In addition, as a part of the regular training of the School of Continuing Education for the Police, lectures and training regarding the Anti Trafficking Law and handling of trafficking offences were given to all of the Police personnel.

Measures for the investigation of complaints

196. The Israeli authorities vigorously investigate any complaint against law enforcement officers. The Department for Investigation of Police Officers (DIPO) was established in 1992 as an independent department within the Ministry of Justice. The Department is a civilian body which operates within the Ministry of Justice, and it is charged with investigating any complaints of involvement of police personnel in the commission of offences.

197. In 2004, Section 49I1 of the Police Ordinance was amended (Amendment No. 18) in order to expand the Department for Investigation of Police Officers' scope of authority over ISA interrogators. Their expanded authority of review now applies to every criminal offence committed in the course of fulfilling the ISA interrogators' duties, or in relation to their duties. The scope of review was previously limited to criminal offences committed in the course of an interrogation, or with regard to a detainee held in custody awaiting interrogation, and was recently expanded, such that every suspicion of a criminal offence committed by ISA personnel, while on duty, is investigated by the Department.

198. In 2006, in response to a State Comptroller report, the DIPO announced a six-year plan for the purpose of hiring qualified civilian investigators to replace the policemen and police officers temporarily employed in the Department. The recruitment procedure began in 2008, and after meticulous examinations and classifications, an investigators' course was opened. During the course new civilian investigators were trained, who have as of the date of this Report been working in the DIPO for over a year in place of police investigators. In 2009, a course for civil investigators was not opened, however, one civil investigator joined to the DIPO in 2009. The gradual process of replacing the former police investigators with qualitative civilian investigators is continuing, and to date, the DIPO has 25 police investigators and 19 civilian investigators.

199. As stated in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, any person, whether a national of Israel or otherwise, may file a complaint with the Department, directly or via mail, fax or e-mail. Complaints filed with the Police are immediately transferred to the DIPO.

* Figures received from the Police Disciplinary Department.

200. In 2008, the DIPO transferred 150 cases that were closed for lack of guilt, lack of sufficient evidence and lack of public interest to the Police Disciplinary Department for additional review and study, and to ensure that lessons are drawn from the case for the future.

201. In 2009, of the 93 cases in which the criminal proceedings had ended, 68 cases ended in conviction or a decision that an offence was committed. The punishment varies according to the case circumstances and in some cases includes imprisonment.

202. In order to fulfill their duties, police personnel have the authority to use reasonable force where necessary. The difficulty in investigating complaints regarding the improper use of force lies in the examination of the circumstances which justified the use of force, and the justification for the amount of force used.

203. In addition, since the use of force can be considered a tool available to police personnel when exercising their duties, in certain cases the complaints are handled by disciplinary procedures. Disciplinary procedures are used in cases where the Police personnel had the authority to use force, but the force used slightly deviated from the degree of reasonable force needed. The advantage of the disciplinary procedure is the fact that the event is examined from an organizational, and educational point of view.

204. Hereinafter are several examples of investigations conducted by the DIPO:

(a) On March 9, 2004, three border policemen robbed illegal aliens in the city of Lod, while beating and abusing them. As a result, the three were indicted and were convicted by the Tel Aviv District Court for the use of threats to acquire an asset, aggravated assault, theft and abuse of power. The three were sentenced to actual periods of imprisonment;

(b) On April 26, 2004, two border policemen arrested two illegal aliens, one of them a minor, and took them to an isolated grove, where they beat them with a club and abused them. The two were indicted for abuse of a minor or a person under care, and for inflicting grievous harm under aggravated circumstances. The Jerusalem District Court convicted the defendants and sentenced them to actual periods of imprisonment;

(c) On September 11, 2004, five border policemen abused two illegal aliens while threatening them with firearms. The five were indicted for abuse of a minor or a person under care and assault that causes actual bodily harm. The five defendants were convicted and were sentenced by the Jerusalem District Court to actual periods of imprisonment;

(d) During an operation conducted by the Hadera Police station detectives, the policemen noticed a person breaking into a vehicle. In the pursuit, one of the policemen shot at the suspect, who was hit in the head. The investigation determined that the gunfire was not justified since the policeman was not under any immediate threat to his life. The case was transferred to the prosecution and evidence is currently being gathered.

The Ombudsman

205. In Israel, the State Comptroller also serves as Ombudsman (Public Complaints Commissioner). He/she performs this function by way of a special unit within the State Comptroller's office – the Public Complaints Commission. The Ombudsman investigates complaints against statutory bodies that are subject to audit by the State Comptroller, including Government Ministries, local authorities, state enterprises and institutions, government corporations, as well as their employees.

206. Complaints relating to the activities of public bodies which the law does not authorize the Ombudsman to investigate, such as banks, insurance companies and other non-governmental entities that serve the public, are often forwarded to the bodies statutorily charged with their supervision, examples being the Supervisor of Banks, Supervisor of Insurance etc. Thus, the Ombudsman is an effective address for dealing with problems of discrimination within a broad array of governmental and public institutions.

207. Any person may submit a complaint to the Ombudsman, be he/she a citizen, a resident, a tourist or any other person who feels that an act of a public body, which is subject to audit, directly wronged him/her or withheld from him/her a right or a benefit. The submission of the complaint is free of charge. The complainant is only required to sign the complaint and state his/her name and address. It is possible to submit a complaint about an act that resulted in a wrong being caused to another person provided that that person agrees that another person will submit the complaint in his/her name. Members of the Knesset may also complain about an act that results in a wrong being committed against another person. The Ombudsman does not investigate anonymous complaints; however he/she forwards such complaints, as well as complaints of a general nature, to the State Comptroller's office.

208. The combination of the two functions of State Comptroller and Ombudsman enables the Office of the State Comptroller and Ombudsman to oversee the activities of the governmental administration from both a general public perspective and from the more particular perspective of specific citizens who come in contact with the administration. The Ombudsman provides assistance to every person who has been wronged by an unjust or unlawful act on the part of the authorities, whereas the State Comptroller deals directly with improving the administration and revealing defects in the activities of the executive authority. Moreover, the melding of the functions in one body allows for the combination of information and activities in a way that optimizes the oversight of governmental bodies.

The Public Complaints Commission

209. The Public Complaints Commission invests substantial efforts in order to raise the awareness of this institution among population groups which are exposed to discrimination, and to communicate with the periphery population, including minorities and immigrants. Thus, reception offices were opened in Nazareth (north) in recent years, in close vicinity to where minority localities are located, in Be'er Sheva (south) in close vicinity to many Bedouin localities and an additional office will be opened in 2010 in the central area — Ramla or Lod — where there is a high percentage of Arab residents.

210. The employees in the Commission's reception offices are fluent in Arabic, Russian or Amharic, and they carry out explanatory activities within the welfare offices of local authorities in the periphery and among different social organizations, in order to encourage people to approach the Commission for assistance.

211. The Commission receives many complaints every year (11,000 in 2008), but only few are directly related to racial discrimination. The few complaints which relate to issues of discrimination, are primarily concerned with discrimination in admission to places of work and discrimination in receiving health, education, welfare and municipal services. For example, the Commission received complaints concerning discrimination against the Druze community in the conduct of land evaluations performed for the purpose of the payment of taxes; a failure by the Ministry of Health to inquire into the circumstances in which an Arab patient died; humiliating security checks of Arabs in airports; and discrimination by an Arab female officer in a local planning and building committee against Bedouin citizens who served in the IDF. These complaints were all examined by the Commission with the relevant authorities, and eventually, after no corroborating data was found, they were dismissed.

B. Security of the person

212. The Crime Victims' Rights Law 5761-2001 (the "Crime Victims' Rights Law") which entered into force in 2005, requires the provision of relevant information to a victim of crime at every stage of the criminal procedure. Accordingly, the Police established a new computerized system designated for this purpose. The system gathers the necessary information from other systems including police systems, the Israeli Prisons Service (IPS) and the State Attorney's Office. Victims of crimes may receive the information by calling a designated phone number or by text or voice messages initiated by the computerized system. The information is also accessible through the Internet. The system became operational in May 2005. The information is given to all crime victims without any distinction.

213. In 2007, a manned phone service center was established in order to assist persons who find it difficult to receive information via voice messages or through the Internet. The following table describes the number of applications for information received by the system:

Legal assistance with foreign countries

214. The Legal Assistance Unit in the Israeli Police receives requests from foreign countries for legal assistance in the framework of investigations conducted in these countries with respect to incitement, racism and genocide offences, and crimes committed on ethnic, religious or national grounds. Such requests may relate to recently committed offences, as well as offences committed during the Second World War. Between the years 2005 and 2009, the Legal Assistance Unit received at least 27 requests of this kind, and efforts are made to give high priority to such requests.

The Status of the Ministry of Justice investigation into the activities of police officers during the October 2000 demonstrations in which police killed 12 Israeli Arabs and one Palestinian (Note that this section relates to the committee's recommendation No. 30 of June 14, 2007)

215. On September 18, 2005 the decision of the Head of the Department for Investigation of Police Officers concerning the October 2000 incidents was released. Despite investigation, there was a lack of evidence and unknown offenders (and in regard to one injury, the finding of "no offence").

216. Following several requests for re-examination of the decisions, and due to the highly sensitive nature of the issue, the Attorney General, the State Attorney and the Director of the Department for Investigation of Police Officers (DIPO) reached the conclusion that it would be advisable to initiate an appeal process, which would be carried out by the Deputy State Attorney (Special Functions) with the assistance of a staff of attorneys who were appointed for this matter specifically. The findings of the additional examination were to be presented to the Attorney General for his review and approval.

217. In the framework of the team work, the evidentiary material, containing thousands of testimonies, exhibits, and documents was examined; the Commission of Inquiry's report and the protocols prepared by the Commission were studied, as was the DIPO's report. After studying and examining the material and following many team discussions, first drafts of detailed opinions regarding each of the events were prepared.

218. In September 2006, as the re-examination process had reached a highly progressive stage, the Deputy State Attorney Office had been asked by Adalah — The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel — to postpone the publication of the State's conclusions until the publication of Adalah's report on the issue in October 2006.

219. Naturally, following the publication of Adalah's 100 pages long report, the State found it appropriate to address the relevant issues mentioned in the report, consequently extending the duration of the examination process.

220. Adalah's detailed report was conveyed to the team and it studied the report thoroughly. In light of this report, the draft opinions prepared by the team were re-examined and in all the relevant opinions, concrete references were made to the contentions and comments of Adalah.

221. Upon completion of the formulation of the team's recommendations, the team provided the Attorney General with drafts of opinions with respect to each of the events that were examined, including its findings and recommendations regarding each event. These opinions extend over a total of some 500 pages.

222. Each opinion included a detailed analysis of the facts and the findings regarding the events referred to in the Orr Commission's report and in the Department for Investigation of Police Officers investigation, an analysis of the evidentiary material, and conclusions and recommendations of the staff regarding the event.

223. Upon receipt of the draft opinions, the Attorney General held a series of lengthy discussions with the team members regarding each of the examined events. Others from the State Attorney's Office and the Ministry of Justice also participated in the discussions, and the DIPO also gave reference in the discussions. During these discussions, the opinions were examined thoroughly, one by one.

224. On January 28, 2008 the Attorney General issued a statement presenting the decision of the appeal process, carried out by the Deputy State Attorney (Special Functions) and the team members.

225. The decision stated that it would be improper to interfere with the decisions made by the DIPO, which concluded that the investigative material did not provide a sufficient evidentiary foundation that would enable the filing of indictments against any of the suspects, based on the relevant law and Supreme Court judgments (“a reasonable possibility of conviction” requirement).

226. This decision was based on several grounds. The crucial aspect was the investigative difficulty, including difficulties in the gathering of evidence and in obtaining consent to conduct autopsies on the victims, as well as a lack of ballistic, forensic and on-site investigations due to the gravity of the events, etc. The Attorney General’s decision was issued in Hebrew, English and in Arabic and may be found on the Ministry of Justice website.¹

227. Furthermore, it should be mentioned that the evidence presented before the Orr Committee, could not be used in criminal procedures, due to the difference in the rules of evidence applicable in administrative procedures as opposed to those applicable in criminal procedures. Thus, the evidentiary foundation that would be sufficient to establish findings and recommendations in a commission of inquiry are not necessarily sufficient to form the basis of a criminal indictment. This too was a major consideration in reaching the decision.

228. The Attorney General, in the above mentioned statement, decided to adopt the recommendations made by the appeal process team and therefore criminal charges were not filed against the officers involved.

Protection of migrant workers

229. Israel is a destination country for migrant workers from Asia, Eastern Europe and Africa. The main countries of origin of foreign workers in Israel are: China, the Philippines and Thailand.

230. The Government allows for the employment of legal foreign workers in specific fields: care giving for elderly and disabled, construction, agriculture, certain restaurants and industry. Employment of a legal foreign worker in one of the permitted fields requires the submission of an application for employment permit, after which a working visa is granted to the desired foreign worker. The Government encourages the rehiring of foreign workers who are in Israel and have not completed the maximum 63 months period of employment, in order to allow workers who have arrived legally to maximize their earning potential, and to limit the abuse of foreign workers, which is more prevalent with new workers from abroad. Employment of foreign workers by employers who do not hold such permits constitutes a criminal offence punishable by a substantial administrative or criminal fine.

231. Migrant workers coming to Israel in search of employment are motivated mostly by harsh economic conditions and low wages in their countries of origin. By coming to Israel they hope to earn high wages and guarantee a solid financial future for themselves upon return to their home countries. Some enter Israel by illegally crossing the southern border of Israel or illegally enter through Israel’s airports, using either a forged tourist visa or a false Jewish identity. The vulnerability of these persons exposes them to the risk of being exploited for easy financial gain. This vulnerability may be heightened by requirements to pay high middleman fees in their countries of origin.

232. Employers may be prosecuted for violations of the labor laws in Israel, including the Foreign Workers Law 5751-1991 (the “Foreign Workers Law”), which was revised in 2000 to ensure the protection of foreign workers’ rights.

233. The Foreign Workers Law and its Regulations impose additional obligations on employers of foreign workers, including the obligation to provide the worker with a detailed employment contract in his/her language (Section 1C), the obligation to provide the employee with decent lodging (Section 1E), and the obligation to provide the employee with private medical insurance for his/her employment period (Section 1D). A violation of the above provisions, including illegal deductions from a worker’s salary, is a criminal offence punishable by substantial administrative or criminal fines. The Law was amended in July 2009 (Amendment No. 11) to include Section 1N1 according to which, not-paying a peremptory fine imposed as a result of violating the Foreign Workers Law or the second addendum of the Labor Court Law 5729-1969 (the “Labor Court Law”), is a ground for cancellation of or refusal to issue a permit to employ foreign workers by the fined employer.

234. Amendment No. 14 of 2004, to the Employment Service Law criminalizes the collection of illegal excessive recruitment fees from foreign workers, and renders this crime punishable by up to six months’ imprisonment and/or attended by a fine of up to 200,000 NIS (US$ 54,054). The Amendment also applies a temporary order (in force until July 1, 2011) amending the Prohibition on Money Laundering Law 5760-2000, making the collection of exorbitant fees an origin offence.

235. The Employment Service (Recruitment Fees) Regulations 5766-2006 (the “Employment Service (Recruitment Fees) Regulations”) cap the permitted recruitment fees of Israeli recruitment agencies at 3,135 NIS, (US$ 847.3) or 88 per cent of the monthly minimum wage, minus any sum already paid by the worker to a foreign recruitment agency. The agency may, however, be legitimately reimbursed by the foreign worker for the cost of airfare from the source country to Israel. The Regulations also detail the terms under which it is permitted to collect the fee, for example, a detailed contract must be in effect between the agency and the worker. Additionally, the Regulations outline the circumstances under which a recruitment agency shall reimburse payments collected from a foreign worker.

236. The Employment Service (Provision of Information) Regulations 5766-2006, (the “Employment Service (Provision of Information) Regulations”) require a recruitment agency to provide foreign workers with all relevant information relating to their rights and obligations as foreign workers in Israel, for example, the identity of his/her employer, the term of employment permit of the employer, a description of the job, information as to the permitted recruitment fees etc.

237. In recent years, the number of migrant workers arriving in Israel in search of work has significantly increased. According to the Central Bureau of Statistics, at the end of 2008, there were approximately 223,000 migrant workers. Most of these workers (approximately 115,000) entered Israel illegally or stayed in Israel after the expiry of their visas, with illegal migrant workers reaching approximately 107,000.

238. The annual quotas for foreign workers are determined by the Government, after considering the rates of unemployment and the needs of the various economic sectors. Government Resolutions concerning quotas are usually determined after informal negotiations are conducted between the relevant Government Ministries. In 2009, the Government decided on the following annual quotas of foreign workers: 28,500 in the agricultural field, 8,000 in the field of construction, 700 in restaurants, and 1,200 in the industrial field. As for the field of nursing care, the quota is determined in accordance with the demands, and to date 50,000 permits were issued in this field. Thus, the total number of permits issued for foreign workers is approximately 88,500.

239. In May 2006, the National Labor Court upheld a decision of the head of the Foreign Workers Department in the Ministry of ITL, to reduce the permitted quota of foreign workers given to a manpower agency which misreported data regarding its foreign construction workers. The Court noted that corporations which received permits to employ foreign workers are responsible for protecting the labor rights of the workers during their stay in Israel, and are required to provide reliable and specific reports regarding every foreign worker they employ (La.C. 2/06 Milgam Manpower Management Agency Ltd. et al. v. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (17.5.06)).

240. Foreign workers arrive in Israel at the request of a specific employer, who has received a permit to employ a foreign worker after examination of his/her eligibility to receive such a permit under the relevant procedures. Previously, a worker who wanted to change employers was allowed to do so subject to the agreement of the original employer or in exceptional cases. This procedure was cancelled by the Government, and today all foreign workers, including care givers who arrived in the country to care for a specific individual, may leave their registered employer to look for alternative legal employment after registering this change of status in accordance with the relevant procedures. The worker is not required to specify the reason for the requested change.

241. The ruling by the High Court of Justice November 2008 (H.C.J. 4542/02 "Kav Laoved" Association v. The Government of Israel), declaring that binding a foreign worker to a specific employer is illegal, required the Government to formulate new systems of employment for foreign workers which would allow for the supervision of such employment, while allowing even greater freedom for workers who wish to change employers. Thus, an intergovernmental committee was appointed and created new systems in which a worker who decides to leave his/her employer does not have to register with the Ministry of Interior, but rather with a manpower agency (in the construction field) or with recruitment agencies (in the nursing care and agriculture fields). These systems greatly ease the process of change for the worker.

242. In anticipation of the implementation of these complex new systems in the nursing care and agriculture fields (in the construction field the new system has functioned since 2005), new guidelines were issued by the Population, Immigration and Border Authority (PIBA) to allow any foreign worker who was fired or who resigned from his/her employment to search for a new employer for a period of 60 to 90 days in which he/she will not be arrested and removed from Israel, subject to the receipt of notification by PIBA of the worker's resignation (in the field of construction the period is 60 days, while in all other fields the period is 90 days).

243. As a result of this decision, visas issued to foreign workers no longer include the name of the current licensed employer, and instead, only the economic field in which the foreign worker may be employed appears in the worker's passport – agriculture, construction, nursing care, etc.

244. In addition, lists of employers authorized to employ foreign workers in the fields of agriculture, restaurants and industry are routinely published on Government web sites to allow easier placements for foreign workers who decide to change employers, and the number of employment permits of foreign workers issued in these fields has increased by 10 per cent to 30 per cent over the yearly quota of foreign workers. This, for the express purpose of allowing the workers to change employers more easily, in addition to allowing the development of competition regarding the worker's services which will result in improved employment conditions.

The agricultural field

245. According to a series of Government Resolutions, the Government is required to enter into bilateral agreements with countries of origin regarding, inter alia, supervision of recruitment, which is also supervised by the IOM, in order to combat overcharging and other recruitment abuses in the field of agriculture.

246. Pursuant to Government Resolution No. 147 of May 12, 2009, it was decided to increase the number of permits issued in the agricultural field by 10 per cent. In addition, in the near future PIBA will examine the gap between the number of workers in this field in comparison to the number of permits issued to employers, in order to establish what the actual demand for workers is. However, in Government Resolution No. 752 of September 14, 2009, the Government decided to decrease and limit the percentage of foreign workers recruited for the agricultural field from countries that do not have an arrangement according to which, the recruitment will be carried out with the assistance of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) or a similar body, pending the signing of bilateral agreements between these countries and the Government of Israel. Moreover, it was decided to appoint an inter-ministerial team which will operate to promote the conclusion of bilateral agreements with relevant source countries. Nonetheless, the changeover from the system of recruitment by private agencies to recruitment in accordance with bilateral agreements is still in its early stages, and no such agreements have yet been signed. Progress was made in this regard with the Government of Thailand, with which there is an intention to enter such an agreement during 2010.

247. In addition, an agreement between the Government and the Farmer's Association of May 2009 established a gradual reduction of the quotas for foreign agricultural workers in the framework of additional budgets for research into agricultural technology and grants to farmers for purchasing agricultural machinery to replace manual labor. In addition, the Government committed to providing annual sums to encourage Israelis to work in the agricultural field by way of bonuses and additional payments for long-term work in this field. According to this agreement, the number of foreign agricultural workers is to be gradually reduced, such that by 2015 the number of such workers will be 18,900, down from 28,500 in 2008.

The construction field

248. In 2005, the Government initiated a new system for employment of foreign workers in the field of construction, which has proven successful in protecting workers' rights and related labor conditions, as well as in providing employment for foreign workers in short-term projects carried out by registered contractors in the construction industry. According to this new system, foreign workers are employed by 40 bonded and licensed manpower agencies which are responsible for their salaries and work conditions. Each agency is required to report directly to the relevant authorities each month, regarding the salary and deductions from salary of each foreign worker it employs. The limited number of licensed agencies allows authorities a closer degree of supervision over the agencies and the working conditions of the foreign workers.

249. In addition, complaints submitted by foreign workers against the manpower agency which employs them can be submitted to the Ombudsman for Foreign Worker Rights in the Ministry of ITL. The Ombudsman's phone number is printed on the monthly pay slips of the workers and posted in the worker's lodgings which are provided by the agency. In 2009, the Ombudsman received 138 new complaints, of which 105 were addressed. Of the total complaints received in 2009, the Ombudsman received 42 applications for the transfer of foreign workers between corporations in the construction field (prior to the lapsing of the requisite three months), of which 14 were approved.

250. The Manpower agencies must provide each worker with a document in his/her language, prepared by the Ministry of ITL, setting out the workers' rights and obligations. At the beginning of each year, the agency's director must issue a formal declaration to the authorities affirming that each worker has received this document. The document, translated into different languages, can also be found on government Internet sites.

251. In order to counteract the problem of underreporting of the working hours of foreign workers, manpower agencies in the construction field are required to pay their foreign workers for a minimum of 211 working hours per month, which include over twenty hours of overtime.

252. In addition, the new system allows workers to change manpower agencies on a quarterly basis. However, a worker whose complaint against a manpower agency is found to be justified by the Ombudsman, may change his/her manpower agency at any time.

253. A special deposit system has been established for each foreign construction worker, in which the manpower agencies must deposit 700 NIS (US$ 189) every month in a bank account in the name of the worker. The accrued sum, which is, inter alia, in lieu of severance pay, is given to the foreign worker in cash when he leaves the country permanently. The payment is made to the worker at a special bank branch which was established at the Ben-Gurion Airport for this purpose. The workers may also opt to have the payment transferred to their bank account abroad, after they leave the country. In cases in which the workers do not leave the country by the end of the period stamped in their visa, a portion of the deposit is deducted for each month that they overstay their visa, while a worker who overstays his/her visa by six months forfeits the sum. In cases in which the worker claims that his/her overstay was justified or was caused by events which were not under his/her control, he/she may appeal to receive the payment despite the overstay. Between July 2005 and Mid-October 2009, a sum of 112,667,768 NIS (US$ 33,156,154) had been transferred to 8,706 foreign construction workers as part of this system.

The nursing care field

254. The largest number of foreign workers in Israel is employed as care givers for elderly and disabled persons, as the need for live-in nursing care givers has grown in recent years.

255. The National Insurance Institute provides up to sixteen weekly hours of nursing care assistance for this population, in addition to allowances for the severely disabled population. However, for those who need full-time care, live-in help provided by foreign workers is very important.

256. In 2009, approximately 55,000 persons held permits to employ a foreign care giver, and approximately 45,000 care givers were employed in the country. There is no quota for foreign care givers, as the need for such assistance is important in order to help elderly and disabled Israeli citizens confined to their homes and communities, especially elderly and isolated holocaust survivors.

257. The primary countries of origin of care giving workers are the Philippines, Nepal, Sri Lanka, and India, but workers also arrive from a variety of other countries.

258. Permits to employ foreign nursing care givers are currently issued by the PIBA in the Ministry of Interior, mostly to elderly persons who have been examined and found to have extremely limited ability to perform basic daily activities. Once the eligibility of the applicant has been established, and after he/she or a responsible family member has signed a statement to the effect that he/she is aware that Israeli laws apply to foreign workers in the same manner as they apply to Israeli workers, and that he/she is aware of his/her obligation to provide the worker with rights as set out by law, the applicant may contact a licensed recruitment agency which will find a foreign worker with legal status currently in the country for him/her to employ, or will recruit a suitable worker abroad.

259. Foreign workers may remain in Israel for up to 63 months after their original date of entry. An exception is made in cases in which the worker requests to stay in Israel for an additional period after having cared for an elderly or disabled employer for at least one year. In this case, if a social worker certifies that due to the close relationship between the employer and the care giver, the absence of the worker will harm the disabled employer, the worker may remain in Israel for additional periods.

260. Foreign nursing care givers may change employers throughout their 63 months of maximum stay in Israel without limitation, by notifying the recruitment agency with which they are registered of the change. Government policy is to encourage the rehiring of workers already in the country who have not completed the maximum period, instead of the recruitment of new workers from abroad, so as to provide experienced workers with continued employment and to limit opportunities for fraudulent recruitment practices.

261. In 2008, the Ministry of Interior carried out a legalization campaign for foreign nursing care givers who entered the country legally, have not completed four years in the country, and have lost their regular status in the country. Care givers who re-registered with the Ministry of Interior received a 90 day tourist visa allowing them an additional period to find legal employment in this field.

262. An additional campaign, detailed in Government Resolutions but not yet implemented, will limit the number of new nursing care givers which licensed recruitment agencies may bring from abroad, relative to the number of foreign workers with legal status currently unemployed.

263. As an additional step to limit abuses in the recruitment process, Israeli embassy officials have been directed to conduct personal interviews with foreign workers applying for entry as caregivers, in order to ensure that these workers receive the "Rights Handbook" in their language prepared by Ministry of ITL, are aware of the nature of the work they will perform as well as the remuneration set by law, and to ensure that they have the basic skills, including language skills, necessary for the work. In addition, according to Government Resolution No. 147 of May 12, 2009, the current Ministry of Interior's policy is to limit recruitment in the nursing care field of foreign workers who cannot communicate in English, except in special cases in which there is a need for a worker who speaks another language.

264. In 2009, stricter licensing requirements reduced the number of recruitment agencies for foreign care givers from over 300 to approximately 140. Every agency is required to hire qualified, experienced social workers who must examine all placements and conduct quarterly visits. Agency workers are required to sign an affidavit before recruiting foreign workers from abroad, stating that the worker has the necessary qualifications needed by the disabled employer, including knowledge of the English language, and that the agency assumes responsibility for finding the worker alternative employment in cases where the original place of employment comes to an end. The name of the recruitment agency which brought a worker into the country is registered with the Ministry of Interior, so that in cases of abuse it is possible to trace the agency.

265. The new method of employment in the nursing care field, which was implemented in 2008, continued to operate during 2009; and currently most of the employers and workers in this field are registered as belonging to a specific private bureau. Thus, foreign workers are now able to shift easily between different employers, without the need to approach the district bureau of the Ministry of Interior for registration. The new private bureaus are obliged to conduct quarterly reviews of the employers and the workers in order to assist with any problems that might arise and report unusual findings.

The Population, Immigration and Border Crossings Authority (PIBA)

266. On April 13, 2008, the Government approved Resolution No. 3434, which established the new Population, Immigration and Border Crossings Authority (henceforth: "PIBA"). The PIBA replaced certain functions previously falling under the authority of the Immigration Administration, and all issues related to foreign and Palestinian workers were transferred to the PIBA in January 2009. Thus, the PIBA operates as an independent body within the Ministry of Interior, which has joint authorities regarding population, immigration and border issues, which authorities previously belonged to the Immigration Administration and other Ministries.

Membership in the Histadrut (the General Federation of Laborers in Israel)

267. On November 24, 2009, the management of the Histadrut decided to submit a motion to the organization's board of representatives, according to which, the Histadrut's constitution would be amended in order to allow for foreign workers to become members with equal rights in the Histadrut. Previously, such membership was limited to workers who were Israeli citizens or residents. The amendment of the organization's constitution will allow any foreign worker with full and equal membership, and every foreign worker who chooses to join the Histadrut, entitlement to full rights, including the right of association, the right to vote and be elected, and to other benefits provided by the organization. The amendment will not only impact the individual foreign worker's rights, but also the ability of the Histadrut to officially represent foreign workers and to promote their protection and improve their rights.

Enforcement of foreign workers rights

268. In accordance with the Committee's recommendation No. 26 of June 14, 2007, as of November 2009, the Labor Laws Enforcement Division in the Ministry of ITL investigated more than 850 employers for allegedly violating the Minimum Wage Law 5747-1987 (the "Minimum Wage Law") and investigations against 500 of these employers were opened in 2009. In addition, 44 indictments were filed against employers, and 413 administrative fines were imposed in a total sum of approximately 3 Million NIS (US$ 810,811). The number of investigations has decreased in recent years due to better and enhanced enforcement, which has resulted in a lower number of complaints. For purposes of comparison, the numbers of investigations opened against employers of foreign workers in previous years were: 2004 – 9,834; 2005 – 4,170; 2006 – 3,743; 2007 – 3,111.

269. During 2009, the Enforcement Division of the Foreign Workers Department in the Ministry of ITL imposed approximately 2,052 administrative fines on employers of foreign workers for violating the Foreign Workers Law, with a total sum of approximately 29,182,500 NIS (US$ 7,887,162) being imposed according to the following distribution: 272 administrative fines were paid in the total sum of 2,395,000 NIS (US$ 647,297); 1,063 administrative fines are currently outstanding in the total sum of 14,422,500 NIS (US$ 3,897,973); 286 administrative fines are currently the subject of legal proceedings in a total sum of 6,310,000 NIS (US$ 1,705,405); 328 administrative fines are currently in the process of collection in the total sum of 4,605,000 NIS (US$ 1,244,595); and 94 administrative fines were annulled, in the total value of 1,340,000 NIS (US$ 362,162).

270. During 2009, 934 criminal indictments were filed against employers and manpower agencies for violations of labor laws relating to employment of foreign workers (up until October 2009, the Department imposed approximately 196 fines on employers of foreign workers for violating the Minimum Wage Law, with a total sum of approximately 1,923,000 NIS (US$ 506,053)) having been received and 171 judgments having been handed down. The total sum of the criminal fines imposed by the labor courts was 7,788,280 NIS (US$ 2,104,941) in all cases.

271. In addition, in 2009, 15 disabled employers had their permits to employ nursing foreign workers revoked, and in four cases, relevant conditions or limitations were imposed on existing permits.

272. For example, on September 6, 2009, the appeal of an agricultural cooperative society which was convicted of abusing foreign workers and required to pay the maximum fine set by law, was dismissed. In this case, two foreign workers employed by the appellants were found to be residing in inhuman conditions. The Be'er-Sheva Labor Court imposed the maximum fine of 939,600 NIS (US$ 253,946) on the employing company, as well as an additional fine of 261,000 NIS (US$ 70,541) on each of the directors of the company, which would be substituted with one year imprisonment if not paid on time. The National Labor Court affirmed the Be'er-Sheva Labor Court's decision, and emphasized that the fines imposed in such cases of abuse and objectification of foreign workers must be high, as part of the public interest and the necessity to deter such violations of the laws regarding the employment of foreign workers (Cr.A. 13/07 Nir-Am Cohen Vegetables Agricultural Cooperative Society et al. v. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (6.9.09)).

273. On August 6, 2007, the Jerusalem District Court ruled that a violation of an employment permit by an employer, who employed a foreign worker in giving massages instead of in the agricultural field, is in itself administrative proof which can constitute a basis for the cancellation of the employment permit. Here the employer was also indicted for having sexual relations with a foreign worker whose consent was given as a result of exploitation of the relationship of authority by the employer (Ad.P. 350/07 Shlomo Mutsafi et al. v. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (6.8.07)). The decision to cancel the employer's permits to employ foreign workers as a result of the abovementioned charges was upheld by the Supreme Court (Ad.P.A. 7216/07 Shlomo Mutsafi et al. v. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (24.12.07)).

274. The Israeli labor laws, including extension orders and collective agreements, apply to foreign workers as they do to regular Israeli workers. For example, in November 2005, the Be'er-Sheva Labor Court found that the provisions of a collective agreement granting certain benefits only to hotel employees whose identity cards registered them as Eilat residents, constituted discrimination against foreign employees in those hotels, and required that the benefits be paid to the foreign employees as well (La.C. 6042/04 Ahmad Montilo v. Isrotel Ltd. et al. (29.6.05)).

275. In addition, in February 2006, the Tel-Aviv Regional Labor Court stated that foreign workers who were employed in Israel illegally, are also entitled to enjoy labor rights prescribed by law, including severance pay, in cases in which they are deported from Israel as a result of their illegal status (La.C. 4814/05 Arnel Marco et al. v. Pnina Rozenblum (21.2.06)).

276. Accordingly, the claims of illegal foreign workers who are detained, with respect to salary and benefits owing, are routinely referred by the Tribunals for Detention Review to labor inspectors who contact the employers for the purpose of receiving the payments on behalf of the worker prior to his/her deportation. In 2008, 1,723,777 NIS (US$ 465,886) was collected on behalf of detained foreign workers in this manner. In addition, foreign workers who have left the country are allowed to enter temporarily, as necessary, in order to testify in civil suits which they filed against their former employers.

277. The Police handle all populations and sectors, with special attention paid to areas and fields of employment in which foreign workers are employed, while focusing on several main offences, including: exploitation, fraud, withholding of passports, sexual abuse, abduction for purposes of trafficking and excessive and illegal commission fees. According to the relevant sources, it is impossible to define a specific population from a certain country of origin as a population at the greatest risk for abuse. Yet, the risk for abuse will be higher the greater the worker's debt, the lower his/her level of education and the more limited his/her abilities to communicate.

278. An Ombudswoman for the Complaints of Foreign Workers was appointed in the Ministry of ITL. Her mandate is to safeguard the rights of foreign workers employed in Israel, and to handle complaints received from foreign workers, employers, citizens, NGOs, associations and the media. The Ombudswoman has the authority to recommend that a criminal investigation be carried out by the Enforcement Division, as well as to initiate administrative proceedings. The Ombudswoman serves a central coordinating function in reviewing complaints and deciding if they contain violations of regulatory laws or crimes of slavery, forced labor or trafficking. She then refers them to the proper authority (the Ministry of ITL if a regulatory violation is involved and the Police if a crime of trafficking, slavery or forced labor is involved).

279. Actions against Recruitment Agencies. The Ministry of ITL investigates complaints of abuse in the process of recruitment of foreign workers and the cancellation of permits given to Private Recruitment Agencies found to have violated the relevant laws and procedures, particularly regarding recruitment of foreign workers in the nursing care field.

280. During 2009, licenses and special permits to recruit foreign workers were revoked from 18 agencies; three agencies which applied for special permits to recruit foreign workers were refused; two permits were revoked for a fixed period of time, and the permits of four other agencies were rendered conditional.

281. During 2008 and up until October 15, 2009, 47 permits to recruit foreign workers in the nursing field were revoked. In eight cases the permits were temporarily revoked, and in six cases the permits were granted on probation. In 27 cases, applications for licenses and permits were denied. In addition, investigations and administrative hearings led to the closure of recruitment agencies in cases in which managers of abusive agencies which received closure orders, continued to recruit illegally under the auspices of another licensed recruitment agency. The above decisions required intensive investigatory preparations carried out with the cooperation of NGOs, the Ministry of Interior and the Police. Numerous appeals which were lodged against the cancellation of these permits and closure orders were denied by the National Labor Court in a series of 2008–9 rulings that emphasized the importance of close supervision of foreign worker recruitment agencies.

282. During 2007, approximately 50 licensed recruitment agencies holding special permits to recruit foreign workers were inspected and investigated by the Ministry of ITL. In 42 cases, both the licenses and permits of the agencies were revoked. In four cases, the permits given to the agencies to recruit foreign workers were revoked for a set period. In four cases the permits given to the agencies to recruit foreign workers were revoked indefinitely and one permit was granted on probation. The revocations were based on the following grounds: unlawful collection of fees from foreign workers, recruitment of workers in collaboration with a non-licensed agency, false social worker reports, unlawful transfer of foreign workers and bringing a foreign worker to Israel contrary to the terms of the permit. Seven agencies appealed the revocation of their licenses/permits to the Labor Court; their appeals were denied.

283. The following is an example of one decision handed down in 2008 illustrating the severity with which the courts and the authorities regard breaches of the Foreign Workers Law. On July 17, 2008, the National Labor Court accepted the State's appeal, regarding the leniency of the punishment imposed on the defendants. The defendants were convicted of employing a foreign worker without a lawful license, without arranging medical insurance for him, without providing him with a contract in a language he understood, and without stipulating the details of his salary and the deductions to be made there from. The worker, after working for only a month, was injured in a work related accident (which was later defined as a traffic accident since it involved a fork-lift). The worker was taken by ambulance to a hospital, but was admitted anonymously since the company employing him denied having any knowledge of his details and denied the existence of a relationship between him and the company. The District Labor Court imposed a lenient fine of 50,000 NIS (US$ 13,514) on the company and 15,000 NIS (US$ 4,054) on its manager, since it determined that the employment was only for a short period of time, and did not involve personal gain for the defendants; and because the defendants had no prior convictions.

284. The State appealed against the leniency of the fine, which constituted only 15 per cent of the maximum penalty stipulated in the Foreign Workers Law, claiming that the fine imposed did not reflect the severity of the offences, as the defendants evaded their responsibilities as employers, and deserted the worker without financial support in a time of distress and uncertainty, which amounted to a risk to his health. The National Labor Court accepted the appeal and imposed a 150,000 NIS (US$ 40,541) fine on the company as well as a 45,000 NIS (US$ 12,162) fine on its director (Cr.A. 27/07 The State of Israel v. Thesea Import and Export of Wood Inc. et al. (21.5.08)).

Dissemination of information regarding rights among foreign workers

285. A special workers' handbook regarding the rights of foreign workers in the construction field was issued by the Ministry of ITL in English, Russian, Romanian, Turkish, Thai and Chinese. The handbook instructs the workers to contact the Ombudswoman in any case in which the rights discussed therein have been breached.

286. Private recruitment agencies who have recruited foreign workers in the field of construction are required to distribute the handbook to each foreign worker they have recruited, and the directors of the agencies must provide the Foreign Workers Department in the Ministry of ITL with an affidavit stating that they accept personal responsibility for the distribution of this handbook to each worker.

287. Furthermore, as discussed above, the Employment Service (Provisions of Information) Regulations require recruitment agencies to provide foreign workers with all information relating to their rights and obligations as foreign workers in Israel (e.g. permitted fees' rates, etc.).

288. In addition, a brochure discussing the general labor rights of foreign workers in Israel has been published on the website of the Ministry of ITL in English, Hebrew, Chinese, Thai, Russian, Romanian and Turkish. This brochure is also distributed by the Ministry of Interior to each foreign worker who arrives at Ben Gurion Airport.

289. An additional method of disseminating information has been implemented by the Israeli Embassy in Thailand. In cooperation with the Ministry of ITL and the Thai Labor

Ministry, a brochure has been released discussing the rights of foreign workers in Israel. The booklet, which is in Thai, contains information regarding the labor and social security rights of workers and includes other information, such as relevant phone numbers, medical treatment facilities and basic Hebrew. The booklet is attached to the passport of each worker who receives a visa to Israel.

290. The Knesset's Special Committee on Foreign Workers. The Knesset's Special Committee on Foreign Workers regularly holds sessions regarding issues and complaints relating to the situation of foreign workers in Israel. The committee has dealt intensively with many issues concerning foreign workers in Israel between the years 2008–2009 and has requested updates upon the work of the new PIBA in these matters. The following is a partial list of the subjects the committee has dealt with: enforcement of foreign workers' rights, complaints regarding enforcement in the agricultural field, examination of reforms enacted in the nursing care field, safety and hygiene in factories, deportation of illegal foreign workers etc.

291. Bilateral agreements with Countries of Origin. During 2009–2010, the Government continued to take steps towards the finalization of bilateral agreements with countries of origin, under the supervision of the International Organization of Migration (IOM), with respect to the recruitment of foreign workers to Israel. The implementation of the agreement between the IOM and the Government of Thailand regarding the recruitment of Thai agricultural workers for work in Israel has been delayed due to the fact that the Government of Thailand has yet to ratify the bilateral agreement with Israel, in accordance with the IOM's requirement.

292. The Ministry of ITL is making every effort in order to sign additional bilateral agreement with countries regarding the recruitment of foreign workers for work in Israel. For example, a video conference was conducted with the Government of Sri Lanka on December 17, 2009, with the intention of promoting the signing of such an agreement.

293. In this regard please also see the section on the Protection of Migrant Workers in Article 5 above.

Children of foreign workers

294. In 2007, approximately 1,000 children of foreign workers lived in Israel. Since the submission of Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, there has been progress in the legal status afforded to children of foreign workers. Government Resolution No. 3807, dated June 26, 2005, was amended by Government Resolution No. 156, dated June 18, 2006, and states the following:

(a) Upon request, the Minister of the Interior is entitled to grant permanent residency status to children of illegal immigrants who have been part of the Israeli society and culture, if they fulfill the following conditions:

- (i) The child has lived in Israel for at least 6 years (as of the date of the Resolution), and entered Israel prior to the age of 14. A short visit abroad will not be viewed as an interruption of this time period;
- (ii) Prior to the child's entry or birth, the parents must have entered Israel legally, and with an entry permit issued in accordance with the Entry into Israel Law;
- (iii) The child speaks Hebrew;
- (iv) The child is in first grade or above, or has completed his/her studies;
- (v) Those filing the request will be required to submit documentation or participate in hearings, in order to prove that they satisfy the abovementioned criteria;

(b) The Minister can grant temporary residency status in Israel to the parents and the siblings of the child, as long as they have lived in the same household from the child's entry date into Israel or birth in Israel, and are in Israel as of the date of this Resolution. If there is no reason for objection, the temporary residency status will be renewed until the child reaches the age of 21. At that point, the parents and the siblings will be entitled to file a request for permanent residency status.

295. As of June 1, 2009, approximately 862 requests have been filed of which 436 were accepted, 424 were denied and 2 are still pending. Of the requests that have been denied, 354 appeals were filed with the committee of appeals. On review, 131 applications were accepted by the Ministry of Interior, and 219 were denied. Of the appeals which were denied, 31 were referred to the committee that reviews humanitarian issues and four are currently under review. In total, 567 applications were accepted and 291 were denied.

Unaccompanied foreign minors

296. Among the foreign population unlawfully residing in Israel, some are children. These children require special treatment. The Ministry of Interior's Procedure No. 10.1.0016 (currently undergoing an amendment process): "Unaccompanied Foreign Minors Treatment Procedure", determines avenues of treatment, as follows: Placement in custody must be in a residence which is principally for minors; prior to the removal of minors under 18 years of age consideration must be given to the child's best interest as a primary concern. An illegal minor who has been placed under a temporary custody order shall be brought as soon as possible — no later than 24 hours — to a Border Control Officer. The Border Control Officer, after having considered the minor's opinion regarding the custody order and removal order, shall decide which of the orders shall be given effect (the decision is an ad hoc decision, and depends on the specific circumstances of the case).

297. A minor under the age of 14 shall not be held in custody, but rather in an appropriate facility or foster care pending removal. A minor must be informed of his/her right to counsel. Within 24 hours (48 hours in special circumstances and 72 hours if it is a holiday or a weekend) the minor will meet with a social worker. The social worker shall submit his/her professional opinion to the Border Control Officer within 48 hours, followed by a decision to keep the minor in custody or release him/her from custody. Notification regarding any delay in removal shall be transmitted to the minor's state of origin, unless it endangers the minor's life, freedom or the lives or freedom of members of his/her family.

298. An unaccompanied minor placed within an educational framework, is dependent on the assistance of the Ministry of Education, as the responsible authority, which shall take care of it, is eligible to receive medical insurance. A minor can be held for a period of up to 60 days in custody and then moved to an appropriate alternative facility, pending age confirmation and availability of a facility. Notification of the relocation is provided at least seven days prior to the final date set for relocation, and is coordinated to the extent possible with the recipient State. A minor will not be removed if his/her life or liberty is in danger in his/her state of origin.

299. The Legal Aid Department of the Ministry of Justice. As mentioned above, the Department provides legal aid for minors who have arrived illegally in Israel, and promotes the release of such minors from detention while transferring them to alternative custody, such as foster families and boarding schools.

Refugees

300. Israel is a party to the 1951 UN Convention on the Status of Refugees. Any person who meets the Convention's definition of a refugee may apply for refugee status in Israel, regardless of his/her religion.

301. Every asylum seeker has full and free access to the UNHCR, and may approach the Police and the Courts regarding any claim he/she may have, and in many cases this right has been exercised, either directly or indirectly through NGOs.

302. In 2002, a procedure for the processing of requests by asylum seekers in Israel was formulated in coordination with the delegation of the UNHCR in Israel, the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Justice, and was in force until April 2009.

303. In 2009, a special unit for the Treatment of Asylum Seekers was established within the Ministry of Interior and received extensive training from the Israeli branch of the UNHCR.

304. The Refugee Status Determination (RSD) Unit in the Population, Immigration and Border Authority (PIBA) within the Ministry of Interior, was established in order to conduct thorough interviews for asylum seekers and provide written recommendations for the Advisory Committee's consideration. The Unit began operating in April 2009.

305. The RSD Unit began conducting initial and in depth interviews in July 2009, until which time every asylum seeker was referred to UNHCR. All asylum-seekers however still enjoy full access to UNHCR, as well as to various NGOs.

306. Naturally, as the authority and responsibility for the determination of refugee status is a sovereign Israeli decision, Israel reserves the right not to grant a permit to stay in Israel for citizens of hostile or enemy states.

307. A person determined to be a genuine asylum seeker, and who has received a certificate from the UNHCR, and following an evaluation it was determined that his/her matter should be brought before the Advisory Committee, shall be awarded a six-month permit to stay in Israel.

308. As of December 2009, there were over 20,000 infiltrators/asylum seekers residing in Israel, most of whom had been awarded temporary protection based on their country of origin. In 2009, 2,525 infiltrators applied for asylum and were interviewed by the RSD Unit of the Ministry of Interior, the Immigration Authority, and received temporary protection status. 948 infiltrators completed the questioning process but have not yet been referred to the inter-ministerial National Status Granting Body (NSGB). 520 infiltrators were considered by the inter-ministerial NSGB, and five infiltrators are appealing the decision of the committee. 284 infiltrators approached the courts after their appeals were dismissed by the inter-ministerial NSGB.

Training for Refugee Status Determination (RSD) Unit's employees

309. Establishment and Recruitment – The Unit employs approximately 30 employees who speak a variety of languages, including: English, Arabic, Russian, Spanish, Tigrinya, Amharic, French and other languages. The Unit includes a general manager, two deputies, coordinators and interviewers. The recruitment of these employees was made based on a meeting which was held between the Authority and the UNHCR. The conditions for employment include, inter alia, holding a bachelor's degree, high level English, previous experience working with individuals and groups, and participation in group evaluations conducted by an organizational psychologist.

310. The training received by the unit personnel included a six-week long seminar which began on March 1, 2009 and was held in cooperation with the delegation of the UNHCR in Israel, during which time the employees received information on the work of the UNHCR, the importance of registration, and information regarding "countries in crisis;" with emphasis placed on Eritrea and Sudan. The course was coordinated by representatives of the UNHCR in Israel and a representative of the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), and was supervised and approved by the UNHCR Headquarters in Geneva.

311. The course involved a review of a variety of issues, including the 1951 Convention Related to the Status of Refugees, the rules for conducting interviews, techniques, research methods, treatment of populations with special needs, and formulating recommendations and reports. In order to qualify for employment, each employee was required to pass weekly and final examinations with high scores.

312. After completing the course, the employees began interviewing asylum seekers for a period of three months, during which time the employees were accompanied and inspected by representatives of the UNHCR. Moreover, during the six months following the completion of the course, the Authority and the UNHCR conducted periodic meetings in order to identify difficulties, receive updates and assist in solving problems the employees encountered. The Unit's employees received additional professional training held by the UNHCR.

313. All judges serving in the Ktziot, Givon and Matan facilities holding infiltrators and asylum seekers, were directed to call upon professional interpreters when conducting a hearing in a language which they do not speak. The Ministry of Justice allocated all of the necessary resources for this purpose. As for releasing persons prior to a judicial determination of their status, every detainee must be brought before a judicial authority within 96 hours, which authority is to determine their status and therefore there is no reason to release them prior to such a hearing.

C. Political rights

1. Access to the political system

314. All citizens who are of 18 years of age or older are entitled to vote, without distinction on the grounds of gender, race, color, ethnicity, wealth, property, or any other ground (Basic Law: The Knesset, Section 5). A person may be denied the right to vote only by the judgment of a competent court, which judgment is handed down pursuant to a valid piece of legislation (Basic Law: The Knesset, Section 5).

The right to run for National Public Office

315. Any citizen who is 21 years of age or over may run for a seat in the Knesset, subject to certain exceptions. Hereinafter are some of the more recent amendments regarding this issue:

(a) Amendment No. 142 of March 23, 2007, to Section 1 of the Cooling-Off Period for Persons Serving in the Security Forces Law, also amended Section 56 of the Knesset Elections Law. According to Section 56, senior public servants such as the head of the ISA, IDF and Police officers with a rank of Major General and above, and the Prisons Service Commissioner may run for national election if they leave office at least three years prior to Election Day. However, for the purpose of an election which follows the abovementioned election, these persons may run for public office even if the three year period has not expired. Other senior public servants, IDF officers, Police or Prisons Service personnel may run for national election if they leave office at least 100 days prior to the elections (Section 56(a1)(3)). Other less senior public servants and military personnel may run for elected office provided that they vacate their positions by the date of submission of the candidates list; if elected, they are deemed to have ceased their service for such time as they remain members of the Knesset (Elections Law, Section 56(b));

(b) According to Section 7A of Basic Law: The Knesset, as amended by Amendment No. 35 of May 22, 2002, those listed on a candidates' list shall not participate in elections, nor shall a person stand as a candidate for the Knesset if the list's objectives, or the person's actions, expressly or by implication, include one of the following: (1) negation of the existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state; (2) incitement to racism; (3) supporting an armed conflict of an enemy state or a terrorist organization against the state of Israel;

(c) On July 9, 2008, The Basic Law: The Knesset was again amended (amendment No. 39) and Subsection (a1) was added to Section 7a. According to Subsection (a1) a candidate who resided in an enemy state illegally during the seven years prior to the submission of the list of candidates is considered as having supported armed combat against the State of Israel unless he/she has proven otherwise. The exercise of authority under Section 7a(a) to the Basic law — disqualification of a candidates list — is to be carried out only in extreme cases and the reasons for disqualification are to be interpreted narrowly.

Members of ethnic and religious minorities

316. Minorities vote for Knesset lists (political parties) along with the entire political spectrum. In addition, Arab political parties have been consistently represented in the Knesset, as is the case in the current 18th Knesset. There are currently ten Arab Knesset Members, three Druze, and one Bedouin Knesset Member. The following table presents figures regarding Arab Knesset Members sitting in the current 18th Knesset:

Table 6

317. On January 29, 2007, during the term of the 17th Knesset, MK Raleb Magadele of the Labor party was appointed to serve as a Minister in the Israeli Government. At first MK Magadele served as a Minister without portfolio, but later, on March 21, 2007, he was appointed as the Minister of Science, Culture and Sport, thus making him the first Arab MK who was appointed to serve as a Minister in an Israeli Government. Currently there is one Arab Deputy Minister (Deputy Minister of the Development of the Negev and Galilee).

The right to participate in elections – Political expression

318. On January 12, 2009, the Central Election Committee of the 18th Knesset decided to disqualify the “Balad” (National Democratic Assembly) and the “Ra'am-Ta'al” (United Arab List and the Arab Movement for Renewal) Israeli-Arab political parties from participating in the elections. The Committee argued that the Balad party platform opposed the existence of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, and that members of the party expressed their support for a terrorist organization. Similarly, “Ra'am-Ta'al” was disqualified based on statements made by its members. Both parties submitted appeals to the Supreme Court, which accepted the appeals on January 21, 2009. Thus, the Court nullified the Committee’s decision to disqualify the parties (E.A. 561/09 Balad et al. v. The Central Election Committee of the 18th Knesset et al. (21.1.09)).

Political expression of Knesset members

319. According to Section 1 of the Immunity, Rights and Duties of Knesset Members Law 5711-1951 (the “Immunity, Rights and Duties of Knesset Members Law”), a member of the Knesset shall bear no criminal or civil liability, and shall be immune from any legal proceeding, in respect of a vote, an oral or written statement or any other act, inside or outside the Knesset, if such vote, expression of opinion or act pertains to or is directed towards the carrying out of his/her mandate as a member of the Knesset. However, an act, including a statement, of a Knesset member, which is not random, will not be considered as pertaining to or directed towards the carrying out of his/her mandate, if such an act or expression include one of the following: (1) negation of the existence of Israel as a the state of the Jewish people; (2) negation of the democratic nature of the state; (3) inciting to racism for reason of color, racial affiliation or national-ethnic origin; (4) supporting an armed conflict of an enemy state or terrorist acts against the state of Israel, or against Jewish or Arab people because of their being Jewish or Arab, in Israel and abroad.

Case law

320. In August 2001, the Attorney General announced his decision to indict MK Bishara on two counts – the first related to the organization of illegal trips to Syria by Arab-Israelis, which count the Court later deleted, and a second count related to statements made by MK Bishara supporting Hezbollah, praising acts of terrorism carried out by Hezbollah and calling for the Palestinians to adopt Hezbollah’s methods in their struggle against Israel. Unlike other constitutions that only grant immunity to statements made within Parliament, the Israeli law also grants immunity to Knesset Members for statements made outside the Knesset. However, the Attorney General found that this was plainly not a political statement but rather constituted support for acts of terrorism. He therefore decided to indict Mr. Bishara. Mr. Bishara’s immunity was revoked after both the Knesset House Committee and the Knesset plenary debated the issue and heard Mr. Bishara’s position. Mr. Bishara was indicted in the Nazareth Magistrate Court (C.C. 1087/02) for these political statements. In November 2003, the Court ruled that it would address Mr. Bishara’s arguments regarding the parliamentary immunity only during the final stages of the legal proceedings.

321. In December 2003, Mr. Bishara petitioned the Supreme Court regarding this decision. Justice Hayut who presented the minority opinion, stated that the petitioner’s two speeches were not protected by substantive immunity, since they expressed support for an armed struggle of a terrorist organization against the State of Israel. Such expressions cross the “red-line” marking the boundary of the Israeli democracy’s tolerance towards persons elected by the public and there is no room to grant the petitioner immunity in this regard. The majority opinion of former Supreme Court President Barak and Justice Rivlin, held that under the Immunity, Rights and Duties of Knesset Members Law, expressions of support for an armed struggle of a terrorist organization against the State of Israel are not protected by parliamentary immunity. According to the Court, this limitation of immunity should be interpreted strictly; it does not exclude all expressions of support and praise for a terrorist organization, only those that contain support for an armed struggle of a terrorist organization against the State of Israel. The Court stated that as the Court held in El.A. 11280/02 Central Elections Committee for the Sixteenth Knesset v. Ahmed Tibi (15.5.03), the petitioner's speeches did not contain clear support for an armed struggle of a terrorist organization against the State of Israel, although they did contain support for a terrorist organization. Consequently the statutory exclusion of immunity was held not to apply. The Court therefore cancelled the criminal proceedings against the petitioner (H.C.J. 11225/03 MK Dr. Azmi Bishara v. The Attorney General et al. (1.2.06)).

322. On April 8, 2007, it was publicized that Bishara fled Israel and on April 22, he submitted his resignation from the Knesset to the Israeli Ambassador in Cairo. The resignation followed an investigation into his foreign contacts, and accusations of allegedly aiding the enemy during wartime, passing information on to the enemy and contacts with a foreign agent, as well as laundering money received from foreign sources. On May 2, 2007, following a petition to lift the prohibition that had been placed on publications regarding the investigation against Bishara, the Petah-Tikva Magistrate Court cancelled the order with respect to most of the charges against him. According to the information made available to the public, Bishara was suspected of contacting a Hezbollah terrorist organization foreign agent, transmitting information to the enemy, assisting the enemy in wartime, and laundering large sums of money he received from Hezbollah and other foreign bodies through money changers in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem.

323. Local and Municipal Elections. The fundamental right to vote and be elected applies to local government elections as well. A series of statutes regulating the election of mayors, municipal and local councils generally mirror the arrangements for national elections, including: the requirement that elections be "equal", "general", "confidential", "direct", and "proportional;" the right of all persons 17 years of age and over who reside in the municipal area in question to vote in such elections; the right to run for election, subject to exceptions for judges, prisoners, those lacking legal capacity, and certain classes of civil servants; and the right to propose a list of candidates. See Local Authorities (Elections) Law 5725-1965 (the "Local Authorities (Elections) Law"). The principle difference between local and national elections is that non-citizen residents may vote in local elections, but not in national elections.

324. In 2008, Amendment No. 39 (of November 4, 2008) to the Local Authorities (Elections) Law was enacted. The Amendment added subsection (A1) to Section 7(2) of the Law, according to which, a person who served as a chairperson of a committee or as a member of a committee which replaced the head of a local authority and the authority's council, is not entitled to be included in a candidate's list or to be elected as a member of the local council in the first local elections held following his appointment. According to Section 7(2)(A1)(2), these provisions also apply to a person who the Minister appointed to perform the duties of the head of a local authority or members of the local council until after the first local elections held since they were appointed.

2. Access to public service

325. Since the submission of Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, there have been significant changes, both in law and policy, concerning the minority population within the Civil Service. These important changes are discussed below.

The Civil Service – General

326. The State of Israel employs more than 60,800 civilian employees. These civil servants are selected pursuant to legislation and the Civil Service Code, known as the “Takshir”, which establishes a merit-based civil service system. The Civil Service (Appointments) Law generally requires that civil servants be appointed through a competitive tender process which clearly defines minimum qualifications for the position in question.

327. Several layers of legislation aim to prevent discrimination in access to the civil service. Both the Employment Service Law and the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, which apply both to private and public employers, generally forbid discrimination among job applicants on the basis of religion, race, nationality or national origin, gender, sexual orientation, age, personal or marital status, personal worldview or political affiliation. These provisions apply, mutatis mutandis, to civil service hiring without a tender, to terms of employment, promotion, on-the-job professional training, and termination of employment. The Civil Service (Appointments) (Tenders and Examinations) Rules 5721-1961, obligates members of tender committees to avoid questions relating to controversies between political parties as much as possible. See also Takshir, Paras. 11.61 and 12.367, and Civil Service Commissioner Notice 56/12.

Affirmative action in the Civil Service

328. In recent years there have been several important and significant amendments in the legislation regarding appointments in the civil service, which reflect the principles of CERD and highlight the importance of equality to the State.

329. In 2000, the Civil Service (Appointments) Law was amended (Amendment No. 11) in order to ensure that minorities and under-represented populations such as women, persons with disabilities, and the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations are represented in the Civil Service according to their proportion in the eligible work force population. The Law requires appropriate representation of the various groups throughout the Civil Service, at all levels and in all professions.

330. On November 30, 2003, the Government consolidated Resolution No. 1073 concerning the appropriate representation for persons with disabilities in the Civil Service. Among the measures set out in the Resolution is the appointment of Equality for Persons with Disabilities Supervisors in each Ministry, whose task it is both to promote the employment of persons with disabilities in the Civil Service and to make the Ministries more accessible to persons with disabilities in general. The Government further decided to give priority to persons with severe disabilities in appointments and promotions in the Civil Service.

331. The Civil Service (Appointments) Law was amended in 2005, in order to include persons of Ethiopian origin among the various groups entitled to appropriate representation in the Civil Service. Following this amendment, the Government accepted Resolution No. 1665 concerning allocation of positions in the Civil Service for persons of Ethiopian origin and giving them priority in appointments and promotions.

332. On March 12, 2006, the Government approved Government Resolution No. 4729, based on Section 15A of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law, which designates 337 employment positions towards the integration of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassians, into the Civil Service between the years 2006 and 2008.

333. Hereinafter is Resolution 4729 titled: “Promoting Equality and Integrating Minority Israeli Citizens in the Civil Service” main principles:

- (a) In accordance with the Civil Service (Appointments) Law:
 - (i) Between the years 2006–2008, the Civil Service Commission shall allocate 37.5 additional government and support units positions annually, which shall be occupied, to the extent possible, only with eligible candidates from among the Arab population, including the Druze and Circassian population. The Budgetary Department at the Ministry of Finance shall allocate the sum necessary for the additional designated positions, in accordance with this section;

(ii) Moreover, between the years 2006–2008, 37.5 of the existing positions in the civil service shall be designated to members of the Arab population, including the Druze and Circassian population, on the basis of availability;

(iii) In accordance with the above cited sections a. and b., between the years 2006–2008, it shall be possible for a further 337 citizens from among the Arab population, including the Druze and Circassian population, to be integrated into the civil service. The positions designated according to this section, shall be allocated to the Arab and the Circassian population, and to the Druze population separately;

(iv) The distribution of the designated positions of Government Ministries and support units as determined by this section shall be performed in accordance with the needs of the various Government's Ministries and following an examination of the manning of the designated positions allocated in previous years;

(b) The Civil Service Commission shall establish a panel, along with the Ministry of Justice and the Budgetary Department of the Ministry of Finance, to examine additional methods needed to promote the adequate representation of the Arab population, including the Druze and Circassian population, in the civil service. This panel shall submit its recommendations in this regard within a period of two months.

334. In addition, the Government decided to establish an inter-ministerial team charged with examining further ways in which to promote the appropriate representation of Arabs in the Civil Service. On July 16, 2006, the inter-ministerial team submitted its recommendations.

335. On August 31, 2006, the Government adopted Resolution No. 414/arab3, in which the Government adopted most of the inter-ministerial team's recommendations, including: determination of new objectives for advancing appropriate representation of Israeli Arabs in the Civil Service, such that Arabs would constitute 8 per cent of all Civil Service employees by the end of 2008, and 10 per cent by the end of 2010. In addition, it was decided that until the end of 2008, 20 per cent of all new positions would be allocated to Arabs. Previous decisions to give priority to Arab-Israelis in appointments and promotions were extended by a further four years. Each Ministry was required to appoint a supervisor charged with the advancement of Arab representation and an inter-ministerial team to ensure the implementation of the Resolution.

336. On November 11, 2007, the Government adopted Resolution No. 2579 entitled: "Proper Representation of the Arab, Druze and Circassians Populations in the Civil Service". This Resolution amended the previous Resolution No. 414. According to the new Resolution, Arabs, including Druze and Circassians, are to make up 10 per cent of all Civil Service employees by the end of the year 2012. In addition, until 2012, 30 per cent of all new positions advertised are to be allocated to this segment of the population. In order to achieve these goals, the Resolution requires all Government Ministries to consolidate a five-year working plan. The Resolution further requires that until the end of 2012 priority be given to Israeli-Arabs appointments and promotions. The Resolution established an Inter-ministerial team headed by the Director General of the Ministry of Justice to follow-up on the implementation of the provisions detailed above by every Government Ministry and examine ways in which obstacles to the integration of Israeli Arabs into the Civil Service can be overcome. Pursuant to this Resolution, the Civil Service Commission has been in constant contact with each Ministry, monitoring its progress in achieving the goals set by the Government (at least once every six months).

337. Subsequently, an Inter-ministerial team headed by the Director General of the Ministry of Justice has been operating and assisting Government Ministries in removing barriers hindering the employment of members of the Arab population. The team consisted of representatives of the Civil Service Commission, the Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety, Prime Minister's Office etc.

338. The Civil Service Commission is very active in the promotion and advancement of proper representation of the Arab, Druze and Circassians populations in the Civil Service and as in previous years, in 2009 it took several important steps to this end, including, inter alia, the following:

(a) Publication of a report regarding the integration of Arab employees in the Civil Service;

(b) Hosting explanatory conferences intended for persons of the Arab community regarding integration into the Civil Service;

(c) Holding explanatory meetings and seminars for Civil Service employees on the importance of integrating Arab employees into the Civil Service;

(d) Allocation of designated jobs and positions for persons of the Arab community;

(e) Recruitment of manpower companies to find suitable Arab candidates and applicants.

339. Adjustment of Entry Examinations. The Civil Service Commission held an extensive examination in which it found that members of the Arab population encounter difficulties in passing the civil service entry examinations. In light of these findings, the commission modified the tests intended for Arab nominees and applicants. In the last year, the commission also examined the possibility of making cultural changes to the entry tests. The commission also prepares a cadre of Arab examiners in order to integrate them into the civil service examination committees.

340. Data indicates a steady increase in the rates of Arab, Druze and Circassian employees in the Civil Service. In 2009, 6.97 per cent of employees in the Civil Service were Arabs, Druze and Circassians (in comparison to 6.17 per cent in 2007 and 6.67 per cent in 2008).

341. Furthermore, 11.66 per cent of all new employees integrated into the Civil Service in 2008 were Arabs, Druze and Circassians, in comparison to 6.9 per cent in 2005, and 4.26 per cent in 2003. The rates of Arab, Druze and Circassian newly integrated female employees are also on the rise. In 2009, 39.8 per cent of all recently accepted Arab, Druze and Circassian employees were women, in comparison to 34.2 per cent in 2003, 35.3 per cent in 2007, and 36.8 per cent in 2008.

342. The number of Arab women employed in the Civil Service has also increased in recent years. Since 2004, there has been an increase of 9 per cent in the rate of Arab and Druze women employed in the Civil Service in comparison to 2007.

343. An increase is also evident in the employment of Arab, Druze and Circassian academics in the Civil Service. In 2009, 50.37 per cent of Arab, Druze and Circassian Civil Service employees had an academic degree, in comparison to 43.7 per cent in 2006 and 48.6 per cent in 2008. This trend correlates with the general trend of allocating positions intended for the integration of Arab, Druze and Circassian academics.

344. Many of the Arab-Israeli employees within the civil service maintain senior level positions, some with decision-making capacity. Thus, there are civil service employees from the minority population fulfilling important roles such as investigative engineers, clinical psychologists, senior tax investigators, senior economists, senior electricians, geologists, department controllers, lawyers and educational supervisors, to name but a few. Data indicates an increase in the number of Arab employees holding senior positions – 451 employees in 2009, in comparison to 347 in 2006 and 376 in 2007. These employees serve the good of the Israeli community as a whole and are a driving force in the integration of the Arab minority into the Israeli society.

345. On March 12, 2006, the Government of Israel passed a resolution, at the request of the Ministry of Justice, with respect to the appropriate level of representation among interns in the Ministry of Justice (Resolution No. 4730). The Government decided, inter alia, as follows:

“A. In accordance with the provisions of Section 15A(b)(2) of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law to designate, insofar as possible, some ten percent of the annual class of interns in the Ministry of Justice solely for the employment of candidates who qualify for an internship in the Ministry of Justice and fulfill one of the following:

- (a) The candidate is a member of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassian;
- (b) The candidate or one of his/her parents was born in Ethiopia;
- (c) The candidate is a “person with a severe disability” within its meaning in Section 35.252 of the Civil Service Regulations ...”.

346. In accordance with the aforesaid resolution, it was decided to compile a directory of candidates who satisfy the aforesaid and will include candidates who meet the criteria set forth in the Government’s Resolution and whose particulars and qualifications make them suitable for an internship position. Accordingly, in 2008, the Ministry of Justice announced, for the second year, the compilation of a directory of candidates for internship positions for September 2008 and March 2009.

347. Government Resolution No. 4436 of January 2009, adopted the abovementioned Government Resolution No 2579, and established a list of steps that are intended to aid Government Ministries to reach the desired representation targets.

348. In 2005, a petition was filed with the High Court of Justice, requesting the Court to order the Prime Minister and the Civil Service Commissioner to implement Section 15A of Civil Service (Appointments) Law with respect to Arab population representation in the Civil Service. On February 18, 2009, after receiving a detailed report by the State regarding the steps taken in this regard (as detailed above), the Court decided to reject the petition (H.C.J. 10418/05 Dr. Yossi Beilin v. The Prime Minister et al. (18.2.09, not published)).

349. Local municipalities. Local municipalities in Israel provide services to all of Israel’s citizens and residents, without any form of discrimination based on religion, race, gender or ethnic background. The employees in all local municipalities in Israel represent the entire State’s population, as well as its various religious and ethnic groups, without any discrimination.

350. In the 88 local councils or municipalities which serve towns and villages where the population is primarily composed of Arabs, Druze, Bedouins or Circassians, the employees of the local government bodies are almost exclusively composed of members of these minorities. In larger municipalities with mixed populations, such as Jerusalem, Haifa and Lod, members of minorities are employed proportionate to their overall representation in the population, although less so at the most senior positions.

351. The Judiciary. In the past ten years there has been a significant increase in the number of Arab citizens working in the Israeli judicial system. This is greatly the result of the increase of appointments of members of minority populations within the Ministry of Justice. As mentioned above, in the judicial system there are currently 569 judges. Out of the 12 justices serving in the Supreme Court, one is Christian Arab. Out of the 128 judges serving in the District Courts five are Muslim, two are Christian and one judge is of Druze origin. Out of the 381 judges serving in the Magistrate Courts, 14 are Christian, ten are Muslim and five are Druze judges. One Christian judge and one Druze Judge serve in the Labor Courts. In addition, there are 3 Druze judges in the state-funded Druze Religious Courts (Qadi Madhab) and additional 3 judges are in the final stages of approval. In total 43 judges from minority groups function in the judicial system.

352. Minorities' Terms of Employment in the Civil Service. In addition to increasing the level of representation of minority groups, the Civil Service Commission has also taken steps to better accommodate the various needs and lifestyles of minority employees. Holiday and vacation time is provided according to the relevant religious holidays, such that Muslim employees are entitled to a day off during Ramadan, and Christians can choose Sunday as their day off work.

353. Furthermore, members of the Arab population employed in the Civil Service enjoy a unique benefit in the form of State participation in the rent paid by them for apartments in the vicinity of their workplace and funding of weekly commuting expenses.

354. In a Civil Service circular of November 15, 2007 it was determined that in the name of equality and uniformity, Muslim and Christian employees should be entitled to mourning leave of seven days in the event of a death of a first degree relative. No change has been made with respect to the three-day mourning period of Muslim and Christian employees in the event of a death of a relative of the second degree.

Representation in Governmental Corporations

355. Government Corporations. Similar to the above mentioned positive changes which have taken place in the Civil Service with respect to the representation of the Arab population, progress has also been made within governmental corporations. Minorities are better represented in these corporations, pursuant to formalized laws and governmental resolutions, described below.

356. As mentioned in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, the 1993 amendment to the Government Corporations Law, (Section 18A) established a requirement for appropriate representation of both genders on the Board of Directors of every government corporation.

357. A key change which further reflects Israel's desire to implement and uphold the Convention and provide for fair representation of all population groups is Amendment No. 11 of May 2000, to the Government Corporations Law, which added Section 18A1 which requires appropriate representation of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassians, on the Board of Directors of every government corporation and statutory corporation.

358. The Law prescribes that until appropriate representation is achieved, the Ministers must appoint as many Arab directors as possible. Section 60(a) of the Government Corporations Law extends the application of Amendment No. 11 to apply with regard to the appointment of directors on the board of statutory corporations and other statutory organizations.

359. Section 18A1 of the Law mandates that the directorate of government corporations reflect the governmental policy of fair representation. Moreover, the Amendment empowers the Government to do its utmost to appoint directors from the Arab population until the goals of the amendment are achieved. The Attorney General has provided Government Ministers with guidelines regarding the implementation of the new standards.

In addition, a governmental sub-committee was established to monitor efforts geared to enforce the new affirmative action measures.

360. In addition, the Committee for Examining Appointments (established under Section 18b of the Law, and which has been operating since 1993), is responsible for examining the qualification of directors and the appropriate representation of the Arab population; and for the monitoring of efforts geared to enforcing the new affirmative action measures. This Committee may delay, if required, an appointment of other qualified directors, until an appropriate representation of the Arab population is achieved. The Committee is appointed by the Minister of Finance.

361. The Committee and the Prime Minister's Office established a database of potential Arab candidates who might qualify for senior government corporation positions. The information was brought to the attention of every Minister. Additionally, efforts exist to create an official database of qualified minority candidates for senior government corporation positions.

362. Appropriate representation is required in each government corporation, and in accordance with the corporation's unique characters. Thus, the Committee for the Examination of Appointments does not insist upon appropriate representation in very small corporations (1-3 directors), or in a corporation which is newly established or which is under liquidation, or in a corporation which in essence is not related to the Arab population (such as the Company for the Restitution of Holocaust Victims' Assets).

363. The Amendment of the Government Corporations Law brought about significant changes in a short period of time. In January 2001, the rate of Arab representation in governmental corporations reached only 3.2 per cent (22 out of 695 directors) and by December 2004 it rose to 7.9 per cent (46 out of 583 directors), by January 2006 to 9.71 per cent (53 out of 546 directors), and by January 2007 to 12.61 per cent (57 out of 452 directors, 10 of whom (1.91 per cent per cent of the total) are women.). However, the rate of Arab origin directors in governmental corporations (including Druze and Circassians) decreased in 2008 to 8.02 per cent (47 out of 586).

364. According to data received from the Committee for the Examination of Appointments, as of June 2010, out of a total of 98 government corporations, only 70 are relevant for the purposes of appropriate representation, and of these, 39 satisfy this requirement with respect to the Arab population. In addition, several Arab nominees for positions of directorates in government corporations currently await the committee's in regard to six additional government corporations. The Committee aims to achieve complete appropriate representation in all government corporations.

365. In addition, as of September 2008, out of a total of 60 statutory corporations, only 47 which are relevant for the purposes of appropriate representation, and of these, 32 satisfy this requirement with respect to the Arab population.

366. On June 27, 2007, the Jerusalem District Court held that an Arab citizen could not be disqualified from appointment to the Board of Directors of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), which is a dual entity committed to the principal of equality. The petitioners requested that the Court annul the election of new directors to the JNF which had taken place on July 13, 2006, due to fundamental deficiencies in the process, and the election of an Israeli Arab, elected as a representative of the Meretz Party.

The Court discussed whether the procedure of appointing new directors to the JNF accorded with the Companies Law 5759-1999 (the "Companies Law"), and whether an Israeli Arab could be appointed as director of a corporation defined as being a "trustee of the Jewish people in the land of Israel". The Court stated that the appointment procedure was not deficient, and refused to annul the elections. It held that former court decisions acknowledged the duty of every authority in Israel to treat all individuals in the State equally. Although the JNF is a private company – it was held to be subject to the principle of equality as it is a dual entity (O.P. 5299/06 Uri Bank v. The Jewish National Fund (27.6.07)).

D. Civil rights

1. The right to freedom of movement and residence within the border of the State

The legal landscape

367. This issue has been extensively discussed in Israel's previous Reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the thirteenth Periodic Report.

Freedom of movement within the State

368. There is no requirement that persons who are lawfully present within the territory of the State of Israel register in particular districts, and movement within the State is generally unrestricted. All residents of Israel (i.e., citizens, permanent residents who are not citizens, and temporary residents) are required to register their address, or any change thereof, with the Population Registry. Non-resident aliens need not register their whereabouts while in the country.

Public transportation services in Bedouin localities

369. The Bedouin Population in the North consists of 70,000 people, of which approximately 60,000 live in urban localities and 10,000 live in villages. The Bedouin population in the South is estimated at approximately 180,000 people, 66 per cent of whom live in areas with no municipal status, sometimes unlawfully.

370. Public transportation services are provided for the Bedouin population in the north at lower cost, and are operated regularly on Saturdays (Sabbath).

371. The Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety has made preparations for the examination of the public transportation services in the northern Bedouin villages and localities during 2011–2012, which examination falls within the framework of an extensive development plan for the Arab population.

372. As for the Bedouin localities in the south, bus services began to operate on a large scale in Rahat in May 2009, at a particularly subsidized cost, thus significantly improving the residents' quality of life. Public transportation is also continuously operated in the localities of Kssaife and Hura, and in Lafia on Saturdays only. Other localities are assisted by service lines that reach the cross-roads located at the entrance to the localities.

373. The Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety is currently promoting the operation of public transportation in additional Bedouin localities in the Negev, and has begun to examine the current situation in Tel-Sheva, Kssaife, Lafia, Hura, Arara, Segev-Shalom and the area of the local council of Abu-Basma. The project providing public transportation to these localities is expected to be completed during 2010. In the short term, the Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety is promoting a solution for the transportation of Bedouin students to institutes of higher education.

374. As for the Bedouin localities in the North, public transportation is provided for the localities of Abtin, Shibli and Zarzir. Other localities are assisted by service lines, which are operated in a similar manner to those that operate in localities in the South.

Accessibility to public transportation

375. Accessibility to railways, planes and ships designated for passengers, public transportation and pickup stations for all transport measures is mandated by law. As of April 2010, 42 of the 47 train stations in Israel (89.3 per cent) are accessible to persons with mobile disabilities and other disabilities and accessible train cars are available on every line. Although the placement of signs for persons with disabilities is currently still insufficient, the railway company has requested and received all the necessary information regarding this issue from the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, and in the upcoming months accessible signs will be installed in all stations. In addition, all the service personnel in every train station are trained to assist persons with disabilities, and in every station there are workers who are in charge of providing assistance to persons with disabilities. The Equality for People with Disabilities (Arrangement of Accessibility to Public Transportation) Regulations 5763-2003, determine that since 2002 every new city bus that is registered for the first time in the vehicle registration authority will be accessible according to the requirements set in the Regulations. According to the Regulations, the accessibility requirement is not applicable to inter-urban buses. Up to date all the urban buses are accessible. The process of rendering all buses accessible for persons with disabilities will continue until full completion, which is expected in the coming years. All the major bus companies also train their drivers to assist persons with various disabilities. These workers undergo special training regarding assisting persons with mobile disabilities to board buses as well as assisting persons with other disabilities. The Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety issued a program obliging bus companies and local authorities to complete the accessibility process within 5 years, while completing relative parts of the program each year.

2. The right to leave any country, including one's own, and to return to one's country

376. As mentioned in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, with the enactment of Section 6 of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, the rights to leave and to enter Israel were provided a firmer constitutional basis:

- (a) All persons are free to leave Israel;
- (b) Every citizen of Israel has the right of entry into Israel from abroad.

377. These rights are subject to the limitation clause (Section 8) of the Basic Law, which prohibits any impairment of the right except by way of a statute which befits the values of the State and is intended for a proper purpose – and then only to the extent required; or pursuant to a statute (as described above) which explicitly authorizes deviation from the right. In addition, Section 12 of the Basic Law stipulates that emergency regulations properly in force may deny or restrict these rights only for a proper purpose, and for a period and to an extent that does not exceed that which is necessary. The Basic Law is binding on all official authorities.

378. Legislation predating 1992 which deals with entry into or exit from Israel remains in force, but is now interpreted in accordance with the principles of the Basic Law.

Exit from Israel

379. All persons leaving the State of Israel must present a valid passport, laissez passer or other travel document.

380. Restrictions on the Right to Leave Israel. No person may leave Israel, knowingly and without legal authorization, so as to any of the countries specified in the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Punishment) Law 5714-1954 (the list includes Lebanon, Syria, Egypt, Yemen, Iran, Saudi Arabia and Iraq) nor may Israelis enter these countries without a permit from the Minister of Interior or from the Prime Minister.

381. However, there are certain exceptions regarding Druze residing in the Golan Heights who desire to travel directly to Syria. Druze women who desire to marry and settle in Syria, and Druze Students wishing to acquire higher education in Syria, may do so according to procedure No. 5.1.0010 of the Ministry of Interior. The individual may travel to Syria through the Quneitra-Golan border crossing after receiving the proper permit and under certain conditions which are specified in the permit. In addition, there is another procedure which regulates pilgrimages. The procedure is accessible and published on the Ministry of Interior Website.

382. Travel Documents. Passports and travel documents are generally issued as a matter of course. Arab residents of Jerusalem, many of whom are Jordanian citizens, receive laissez passer documents routinely.

Entry into Israel

383. Israel is the designated homeland of the Jewish people. Jews have been in the Diaspora for close to 2000 years prior to the creation of the State and thus realized a dream of having a homeland and a place of refuge in the post-Holocaust era for Jews in Arab States and elsewhere. Thus, the Law of Return 5710-1950 (the "Law of Return") was enacted as a tool to realize this dream and as a means of rendering Israel a home for all Jews dispersed throughout the world. The Law of Return is a linchpin of the State and serves as a foundational principle towards the effectuation of a viable and thriving Jewish State.

384. Any person who is neither an Israeli national nor the holder of an oleh's (lit. "A person who ascends") certificate under the Law of Return must enter Israel by visa and permit of sojourn. For such persons, there are four general categories of visas and permits of residence under Israeli law: a permit of transitory sojourn (up to five days); a visitor's permit (up to three months); a permit of temporary residence (up to three years); and a permit of permanent residence (Entry into Israel Law, Section 2). Each of these permits may be renewed for periods prescribed by law.

385. Permanent resident status is granted at the discretion of the Minister of Interior, most typically in cases of family reunification and on the basis of other humanitarian grounds. The criteria applied by the Ministry of Interior when considering applications for permanent residency focus on the applicant's ability to demonstrate that one's life, or that of one's immediate family, is centered, as a practical matter, in Israel. If a permanent resident leaves Israel for a period of at least seven years or has become a permanent resident or citizen of another country, then his/her permanent residency status in Israel expires.

386. In March 2000, the Minister of Interior decided upon a policy under which those who had been permanent residents of Israel, whose residency permit had expired after 1995 due to having resided abroad for over seven years and in this time having visited Israel, would be able to receive a new permanent residence permit, after the passage of two years following their return to Israel. This permit would be granted provided that they had not received foreign citizenship or a permit for permanent residency in a foreign state in the interim, and provided that there is no security or criminal impediment with regard to that person.

387. In the wake of the new policy, new permits for permanent residency were granted to many ex-residents who had returned to live in Israel. This change of policy mostly affects the Arab residents of the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem as described above.

3. The right to nationality

Obtaining Israeli citizenship

388. In general, citizenship may be obtained through birth, residence, or naturalization, or through the Law of Return as described above. In any case, the manner in which persons become Israeli citizens does not affect in any way the scope of their rights and privileges arising from citizenship, such as the right to vote and be elected, or the right to hold public office.

The Law of Return

389. This issue has been extensively discussed in Israel's previous Reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the thirteenth Periodic Report.

Nationality by birth

390. This issue has been extensively discussed in Israel's Previous Reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the Previous Periodic Report.

Naturalization

391. This issue has been extensively discussed in Israel's previous Reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the thirteenth Periodic Report.

Eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem

392. On October 28, 2007, the Government approved Resolution No. 2492, in which it resolved to issue temporary permits to residents of the West Bank who had for an extended period of time illegally resided in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem.

393. Under the Resolution, the Minister of Interior may issue a temporary permit to a resident of the West Bank who is registered in the Population Registry and has illegally resided in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem on a continual basis since 1987 and until the submission of the request for a permit, depending upon several conditions, including a consideration of his/her personal circumstances. Such permits will also be given to minor children of the resident.

Revocation of citizenship

394. On July 28, 2008 the Knesset approved Amendment No. 9 to the Citizenship Law 5712-1952 (the "Citizenship Law"), which amended Section 11 to the Law. This amendment extended Section 11, the reasons to revoke a person's citizenship were narrowed and additional safety measures to protect human rights were added. According to Section 11(a), the Minister of Interior may revoke the citizenship of an Israeli citizen if he/she is convinced that citizenship was obtained based on false information and less than three years has passed since the citizenship was granted. According to Section 11(b), the Minister may request the administrative court to revoke the Israeli citizenship of a person under the following conditions: Section 11(b)(1) – the citizenship was obtained based on the provision of false information and more than three years has passed since the citizenship was granted, Section 11(b)(2) – the person committed an act of breach of allegiance to the State of Israel, provided that by revoking the individual's citizenship the person will not be left without any citizenship, and if so, he/she will be granted a permit to stay in Israel. Section 11 further states that a request according to Section 11(b)(2) shall not be submitted without the consent of the Attorney General.

4. Free choice of spouse

Free choice of spouse and non-discrimination

Same-sex marriages

395. Under Israeli law there are no civil marriages. Marriage is conducted according to the religious law of the couple; therefore marriages between two persons of the same-sex are impossible. Nevertheless, in recent years two alternatives to the traditional institution of marriage have been developed. The first is the recognition of the concept of Reputed Couples (common-law partners). The relationship is legally binding, and the individuals hold similar legal rights and duties as couples who were legally married. Gradually, the legal status of same-sex couples has been integrated into the concept of reputed couples. The second alternative for same-sex couples is the registration of couples who were married abroad with the Israeli Population Registry as shall be detailed below. (The above data relates to all religious communities in Israel).

396. In recent years, there have been many judgments and decisions issued which have promoted the rights of same-sex couples in Israel, some of which are detailed below.

397. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court handed down a landmark decision concerning the rights of same-sex couples. It held that a wedding certificate issued in a foreign country in which same-sex marriages are recognized, could enable the couple to register as married with the Ministry of Interior. Five gay couples who held wedding ceremonies abroad petitioned the Supreme Court following the Ministry of Interior's refusal to register them as married. This registration equalizes the civil (legal) status of reputed and/or same-sex couples to those of legally married couples including for the purposes of National Insurance and tax benefits (H.C.J. 3045/05 Ben-Ari v. The Ministry of Interior, H.C.J. 3046/05 Bar-Lev v. The Ministry of Interior, H.C.J. 10218/05 Herland v. The Ministry of Interior, H.C.J. 10468/05 Lord v. The Ministry of Interior and H.C.J. 10597/05 Remez v. The Ministry of Interior). The Supreme Court based its decision on a previous Supreme Court ruling (H.C.J. 143/62 Fonk-Shlezinger v. The Minister of Interior) in which a distinction was made between the duty to register marriages, and the question of recognition of their status. The Supreme Court determined that the Ministry of Interior must not discriminate against same-sex couples who hold a wedding certificate from a foreign country that permits same-sex marriages. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court noted that registration of the couple as married does not grant a new status to same-sex marriages, and reiterated that it is the role of the Knesset to endow such a status.

398. On April 19, 2007, the Haifa Labor District Court accepted a claim against the "Mivtachim" pension fund, and determined that a surviving partner of a lesbian relationship was eligible to the legal rights of an “insured widow”, and not of an “insured widower”. As a result of this decision, the plaintiff was to be paid a survivors’ pension of 40 per cent as opposed to only 20 per cent (La.C. (Haifa) 1758/06 Moyal-Lefler v. Mivtachim (19.4.07)). The Court concluded that in this instance, the plaintiff was the deceased’s spouse, and was publicly recognized as her co-habitator. Therefore, she was eligible to a survivors’ pension, according to the rules of the pension fund. The Court stated that “the distinction between men and women in the rules of the respondent and the National Insurance Law (Consolidated Version) 5755–1995 derives from a similar rationale – a reflection of the economic situation in which we live, where women’s incomes are lower than men’s, and their promotion in the labor market is more difficult. Therefore there is a justification for the preference of female widows as it narrows the existing gap between men and women”. The Court held that the plaintiff should be classified as a female widow, and not as a male widower. She was therefore eligible for the rights of an “insured widow”, and the corresponding pension as stated in the rules of the pension fund.

399. On March 3, 2008 the Tel-Aviv Family Matters Court issued an adoption order regarding a minor. The petitioner was the same-sex spouse of the minor’s parent. The Court determined that according to the examination conducted by the welfare officer, the minor was a happy child who considered both males as his parents. Therefore the Court held that there was no impediment to granting the adoption order, and it was in the child’s best interest to do so. The Court further stipulated that granting the adoption order does not negate any rights of the father and his extended family (Ad.C. (Tel-Aviv) 58/07 Giora Shavit Shadiv et al. v. The Attorney General (20.03.2008)).

400. On December 20, 2006, the Tel-Aviv Family Matters Court determined that a pre-nuptial financial agreement between a same-sex female couple was valid with respect to the manner in which it distributed property between the couple; however, the Court further held that its conclusion did not in and of itself affect the personal status of the couple, and could not be seen as changing the couple’s status to married. The Court emphasized that significant changes in public opinion regarding women’s issues had occurred in the past century, including with respect to same-sex relations, and therefore public morality had changed and now recognized the right of same-sex couples to enjoy the same rights as married couples, i.e. recognizes their right to equality and equal treatment. However, the definition of marriage is determined by the legislator which is not expediting a change to the current definition (F.M.C. 47720/06 Anonymous et al. v. Anonymous (20.12.2006)).

401. In a decision dated January 23, 2005, the Attorney General established a new precedent in which the State is willing to grant legal status to same-sex adoptions of the birth-child or adopted child of one of the spouses. Furthermore, it states that the State is willing to allow the adoption of a non-biological child by same-sex couples, having considered the best interest of the child. This decision relates to the legal aspects of same-sex adoptions; however the decision regarding a specific case remains in the hands of the relevant social service.

Family unification

402. In its concluding observations to Israel’s thirteenth Periodic Report the Committee expressed concern with the process of family reunification for foreign spouses.

403. Since the outbreak of the armed conflict and hostilities between Israel and the Palestinians towards the end of the year 2000, which led, inter alia, to the commission of dozens of suicide bombings inside Israel, there has been growing involvement in assistance provided to terrorist organizations by Palestinians, who are residents of Israel, but are originally from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Such individuals carry Israeli identity cards as a result of the principle of family unification with Israeli citizens or residents, allowing their free movement between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and into Israel.

404. In order to prevent this potential danger posed by former residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the Government decided in May 2002 to temporarily suspend granting such individuals legal status in Israel, through the process of family unification. The decision was adopted following the horrendous wave of terrorist attacks in March of 2002, when 135 Israelis were killed and a further 721 were injured.

405. The current situation is the result of the genuine difficulties involved in obtaining information concerning residents of the West Bank, following Israel's transfer of powers and responsibilities and the termination of Israeli forces' daily presence in this area pursuant to the Israeli – Palestinian Interim Agreement, dated September 28, 1995.

406. Israel, as any other State, is entitled to control entry into its territory, and more so, during times of armed conflict, when persons requesting to enter may potentially be involved in acts of violence and terrorism against Israeli citizens.

407. On July 31, 2003, the Knesset enacted the Citizenship and Entry into Israel (Temporary Provision) Law 5763-2003 (the "Citizenship and Entry into Israel (Temporary Provision) Law"), which limits the possibility of granting residents of the West Bank with Israeli citizenship pursuant to the Citizenship Law, including by means of family unification; and the possibility of granting such residents, residence permits into Israel pursuant to the Entry into Israel Law. The Law was amended in 2005 and 2007, in order to expand the humanitarian relief it initially provided. The amendments also expanded the applicability of the Law to citizens of enemy states (namely: Iran; Syria; Lebanon; and Iraq).

408. The Law enables entry into Israel for the purposes of medical treatment, employment, or on the basis of other temporary grounds, for an overall period of up to six months.

409. In addition, the Minister of Interior may authorize a request for family unification for those who are married to an Israeli spouse, and are residents of the West Bank for men over the age of 35 and women over the age of 25. The Law further authorizes the Minister of Interior to grant residency permits to children of such couples who are minors under the age of 14. With respect to children of such couples who are minors over the age of 14, the Law stipulates that the Minister of Interior has the authority to grant temporary permits under certain conditions.

410. The Law further allows the Minister of Interior, as a result of special humanitarian reasons and in accordance with a recommendation of a professional committee appointed for this purpose, to grant temporary residence permits to a resident of the West Bank or a citizen of Iran, Iraq, Syria or Lebanon, who has a family member legally residing in Israel, and to approve a request of a resident of the West Bank who has a family member legally residing in Israel for a permit to stay.

411. Any such decision by the Minister of Interior is to be reasoned and provided in writing, within 6 months from the day that the professional committee received all the necessary documents.

412. The Law stipulates that a request can be denied in cases where the Minister of Interior or certain security functionaries assert that the person, or a family member of first relation, poses a security threat.

413. In cases where a person or a family member has been known to act for the benefit of the State of Israel, the Law enables the Minister of Interior and certain security functionaries to grant permits to a resident of the West Bank.

414. The Law does not change the status of persons who already received their status prior to the day on which the Law came into effect. Such persons' status shall remain static.

415. The Law was initially enacted for a period of one year. At the end of that period, in August, 2004, the Law was extended for a further six months. It was re-extended in February 2005 for a period of four more months, and was again extended at the end of that period until August 31, 2005. The revised Law was published on August 1, 2005 and was invoked until March 31, 2006. At the end of that period it was extended until April 2007, and later an amended version was extended until July 31, 2008, and re-extended until July 31, 2009 and then again until July 31, 2010. On July 21, 2010 the Law was extended again and it is currently valid until January 31, 2011.

416. The Law's constitutionality was scrutinized and upheld by the Supreme Court in H.C.J. 7052/03, 7102/03 Adalah – The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel et al. v. The Minister of Interior (14.5.06). The High Court of Justice, residing with an extended panel of eleven judges, rejected the petitions against the legality of the Law, by a vote of six to five.

417. On December 17, 2007, the Minister of Interior announced the formation of the professional committee required by the Law, and decided upon its members.

418. Additional petitions against the constitutionality of the Law are pending before the High Court of Justice (H.C.J. 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07 MK Zehava Galon et al. v. The Minister of Interior et. al.). On July 31, 2008, the State submitted its arguments in these cases and on April 13, 2010, the State submitted a supplementary notification to the Court. In its supplementary notification, the State clarified that since August 2005, the Ministry of Interior authorized the provision of staying permits in Israel to 4,118 Palestinians (more than 1,000 individuals per year) based on requests for family unification and under the exceptions recognized by the Law. The State noted that in addition to these figures, the professional humanitarian committee received over 600 requests, 282 of which were dealt with and 33 of which were transferred to the Minister of Interior with positive recommendations which were adopted by the Minister, thus resulting in the provision of staying permits in Israel for the applicants. The State further noted that since September 2005, 632 requests for status in Israel on the basis of family unification were rejected. An analysis of the requests that were rejected reveals that the rejections were based on the following grounds: the applicant was a terrorist (4 cases), the applicant was an operative of a terrorist organization (149 cases), the applicant was linked to operatives of terrorist organizations (63 cases), the applicant aided a terrorist organization (22 cases) and the applicant had contact with family members who are operatives of terrorist organizations (394 cases).

5. The right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion

Freedom of religion

Promoting equality in funding of religious services

419. Until very recently, all cemeteries in Israel, except those of the kibbutzim, have been managed by religious institutions of the various religious communities. If a person who dies was not a member of a religious community which administers graveyards, or has expressed the wish not to be buried according to religious tradition, there was a need to find a solution, often at kibbutzim. Jewish burial grounds are managed by officially appointed Orthodox burial societies (“Hevrot Kadisha”), which bury only those who are Jewish according to Jewish religious law, and following an Orthodox ceremony. In 1992, the Supreme Court ordered the Minister of Religious Affairs to recognize a non-Orthodox Jewish burial society, and also ordered the Israel Land Administration to allot land for such a non-Orthodox cemeteries. In April 1996, the first “alternative” cemetery for Jews was inaugurated in Be'er Sheva. Additional licenses for alternative burial services have been granted in Jerusalem and Haifa. During that year a new law was enacted guaranteeing the right of citizens to be buried according to their chosen manner of observance in alternative cemeteries (Right to Alternative Civil Burial Law 5756-1996). The Law requires that such alternative graveyards be established in various areas around the country, sufficiently distant from one another so that all those who wish to take advantage of the new arrangement may reasonably be able to do so.

420. Cemeteries. Currently there are eight cemeteries for alternative civilian burial which are contracted with the Israeli National Insurance Institution, in accordance with the National Insurance (Burial Fees) Regulations 5736-1968 (the “National Insurance (Burial Fees) Regulations”). These cemeteries are located in Kiryat Tiv'on, Kfar Haro'eh, Kfar Sava, Petah Tiqwa, Hazor, Revadim, Giv'at Brenner and Be'er Sheva.

421. Alternative Civil Burial. On January 29, 2008, the Jerusalem Planning and Building Committee delivered for deposition the Jerusalem Mayor's plan to establish a cemetery for civil burial in the area of the new planned cemetery in Givat Shaul in Jerusalem. The new cemetery is to cover an area of 350 dunams, in which a special section will be allocated for civil burial of persons that Jewish Law (Halacha) does not allow to be buried in religious cemeteries, or who do not desire religious burial. According to the Municipality of Jerusalem, the plan is designated to allow every person to choose his/her way of life and the form of his/her burial without any kind of coercion.

Non-discrimination on the basis of religious affiliation

422. As to the effect of religious affiliation on the enjoyment of civil rights, Israeli law does not distinguish between religious statuses except for matters of marital status, where the King's Order in Council (King's Order in Council 1922–1947, British-Mandate legislation, parts of which are still valid, including Section 51) applies, and provides exclusive jurisdiction to officially recognized religious tribunals in Israel over matters of marital status within their respective religious communities.

423. Overall, Religious Courts have an exclusive jurisdiction over all matters of marriage and divorce, except when the couple is not affiliated to any religion or of different religions. Regarding these exceptions, in matters relating to divorce, the jurisdiction is granted to the Family Matters Courts or to the Religious Courts. In Matters concerning women's and children's alimony, property issues, child maintenance, guardianship, violence and in the case of Muslims, also parental matters, Family Matters Courts and the Religious Courts have a parallel jurisdiction, with certain differences between the various religious communities.

424. Inheritance, guardianship and adoption – the Family Matters Courts have the main jurisdiction, the Religious Courts jurisdiction is subject to the consent of all relevant parties and certain limitations stipulated in the Law. Child abduction, marriage approvals under the Marital Age Law 5710-1950 (the “Marital Age Law”) name changing, determination of age, surrogacy, parenthood (except for Muslims) and other disputes among family members, in matters not mentioned above – are all subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Family Matters Courts.

Non-discrimination regarding building of religious institutions

425. The Planning and Building Law stipulates that every plan promoted by planning institutions must be published, and an opportunity for submitting objections together with the right to a hearing must be provided. This includes the opportunity to contest real estate initiatives concerning religious structures and sites. The planning institutions are obliged to hear the parties who claim that they might be harmed by the implementation of a specific plan. According to Section 100 of the Law, a contention can be also submitted by a public or professional body which was authorized by the Minister of Interior, and since January 2004, the Arab Center for Alternative Planning is also authorized as aforesaid. Other institutions that may submit such contentions include, inter alia, a local committee or an engineer of such committee and local authority, including a local board, the area of jurisdiction of which is incorporated in such plan or borders it and every Government Ministry.

426. The Protection of Holy Places Law 5727-1967 (the “Protection of Holy Places Law”) does not include any distinction between Jewish holy places and holy places of other religions. Moreover, the Planning and Building Law also does not distinguish between structures which are used for Jewish religious needs and structures which are used by other religions. Thus, no advantage is afforded to structures belonging to or serving the Jewish religion in planning initiated by the planning institutions. Note that in cases of a plan which is to be carried out in an area where over 10 per cent of the population is Arab, the plan must be published and approved in Arabic.

427. Planning is implemented while considering the allocation of land for public needs, including religious institutions. The allocation is made according to the quotas set in the “Planning Guidebook for Allocating Land for Public Needs”, which was adopted in Government Resolution No. 2873 of January 28, 2001, and which determines land allocation quotas, including for religious institutions of the Arab population.

Budgeting of religious services and religious institutions

428. According to a coalition agreement signed in April 2006, it was decided that authorization of a budget of 85 Million NIS (US$ 22,972,973) would be given for Jewish religious services in the years 2006–2007. However, in order to avoid inequity in allocating budgets for the development of religious structures and institutions of other religions, the Ministry of Interior respectively allocated the required amount for religious services for the minority populations.

429. According to data received from the Ministry of Interior, the 2009 budget for religious services for the Jewish population was 329.2 Million NIS (US$ 88,972,973), and the budget for Jewish religious institutions was 113 Million NIS (US$ 30,540,541), of which 107.8 Million NIS (US$ 29,135,135) was in the form of cash and 5.2 Million NIS (US$ 1,405,405) was in the form of an authorization for budgetary obligations.

430. The 2009 budget for religious services and religious institutions for the Arab population was 55 Million NIS (US$ 14,864,865), of which 48 Million NIS (US$ 12,972,973) took the form of cash and 7 Million NIS (US$ 1,891,892) was in the form of an authorization for budgetary obligations. The cash budget was divided between religious services (which received 35 Million NIS (US$ 9,459,459)) and the development of religious institutions including holy places and cemeteries. Note that the abovementioned 7 Million NIS (US$ 1,891,892) was intended for the development of religious structures and institutions, including holy places and cemeteries.

431. The 2010 budget for religious services and religious institutions for the minority population is 47 million NIS ($12.7 million), of which 41 million NIS ($11,081,081) in cash and 6 million NIS ($1.621 million) as an authorization for budgetary obligations. The cash budget is divided to religious services (39 million NIS) and development of religious institutions including holy places and cemeteries (2 million NIS). Note that the abovementioned 7 million NIS is intended for obligations concerning the development of religious structures and institutions including holy places and cemeteries.

432. The budget for Yeshivot (Jewish Rabbinical colleges) is currently 720 Million NIS (US$ 194,594,595) and according to the estimations given by the Ministry of Finance, at the end of the year it will increase to approximately 975 Million NIS (US$ 263,513,514). The budget for Jewish studies is currently 124 Million NIS (US$ 33,513,514).

433. The budget for the Yeshivot (Jewish Rabbinical colleges) is currently 720 million NIS ($192.5 million) and according to the estimations of the Ministry of Finance, at the end of the year it will set at about 975 million NIS ($260.7 million). The budget for Jewish studies is currently 114 million NIS ($30.8 million).

434. As noted above, the State also allocates part of its budget to non-Jewish religions, however there are religious congregations that refuse to accept funds from the State on the basis of principle and ideological grounds.

Free access and protection of holy places

435. Israeli Law grants freedom of worship and ensures the safekeeping of and access to holy places to members of all faiths. Moreover, these sites are guarded by the Police in order to protect public order in these sensitive places.

436. In February 2000, pursuant to a Government Resolution, a special committee was established in order to investigate the conditions of Arab holy sites. The Committee included representatives from the Ministries of Religious Affairs and of National Infrastructure, the Israel Lands Administration, as well as a representative of the Regional Committee for Arab Local Councils. Responsibility was conferred on the Committee to prepare a program to deal with the issue of non-Jewish holy sites and to prepare a list of these places, and a schedule of priorities for implementing the program.

437. On November 21, 2004, 'Adalah' – the Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel, petitioned the Supreme Court and asked that the Court issue an order to compel the Minister of Religious Affairs to issue regulations for the protection of Muslim holy sites in Israel in accordance with the Law. The petition asserted that a failure to issue regulations for the protection of Muslim holy sites, when such regulations have been issued for the protection of Jewish holy sites, constituted a breach of the Law, violated the principle of the rule of law and the principle of equality. Furthermore, it was claimed that the failure to promulgate such regulations for the protection of Muslim holy sites resulted in discrimination in the designation of the budget for holy sites. The Supreme Court determined that such regulations are not a necessary condition in order to ensure respect for and the guarding of holy places. The State's representative announced that in order to guard Muslim holy places, it was decided to allocate, in the framework of the state budget, a sum of 2 Million NIS (US$ 540,541) per year for the treatment and reconstruction of such places. Moreover, a list of priorities was to be prepared by an inter-ministerial team, which will consider the position of Muslim representatives. Therefore, the Supreme Court decided to dismiss the petition, subject to the State's commitment to act for the establishment of procedures for the caretaking of Muslim holy places (H.C.J. 10532/04 Adalah – The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel et al. v. The Prime Minister et al.).

438. Nevertheless, on the basis of the work of the abovementioned committee and of the work of another inter-ministerial Committee, which was established following the petition, a program was prepared for the appropriate treatment, in terms of budget and planning, of the relevant holy sites. Furthermore, following the work of the Committee, a special budget was to be allocated for the restoration of Arab holy sites, the list of which is currently being drafted.

Excavations in Jerusalem

439. With respect to the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination's Observation No. 36 of the Concluding Observations of 14 June 2007 (CERD/C/ISR/CO/1), the concerns of the Committee are groundless. There are no excavations presently conducted beneath the al-Aqsa Mosque, nor has Israel ever conducted any such works in the past.

440. The excavation conducted by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem to the south of the al-Aqsa mosque and the Temple Mount was concluded in 1980, over 29 years ago. These excavations were conducted outside the area of the Temple Mount. Since then no excavations have been conducted beside the al-Aqsa Mosque, beyond that conducted illicitly by the Islamic Waqf itself, without proper engineering supervision in Solomon's Stables on the eastern edge of the al-Aqsa Mosque. This work, by the Islamic Waqf, beyond being a breach of the Israeli Antiquities Law 5738-1978 (the "Israeli Antiquities Law"), contravened international charters, conventions and professional ethics governing the management of antiquities sites of supreme universal cultural value. These include contravention of the 'UNESCO Recommendation on International Principles Applicable to Archaeological Excavation (1956)', the 'Venice Charter (1964)' and the 'Convention for the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage (1972)'. Violation of the latter is especially poignant as it concerns the cultural management of Jerusalem as a site registered in UNESCO's World Heritage List in 1981 and its subsequent inscription in 1982 on the World Heritage List in Danger. The works caused the loss of a singular opportunity to investigate in a professional manner the ancient layers of the Temple Mount/al-Haram el-Sharif and can be considered no less than a cultural offence.

441. Excavations by Israeli archaeologist have been carried out in other areas that surround the Temple Mount, in the vicinity of Robinson's Arch between 1996–2000, in the Western Wall Tunnels between 1969–1980 and the Mughrabi Ascent in 2007. Presently there are no excavations adjacent to the walls of the Temple Mount. None of the past works penetrated beneath the walls of the Temple Mount and all were conducted according to the highest professional standards, and under engineering supervision to ensure that no danger was posed to the Temple Mount, which is a monument of supreme importance to Jews, Muslims and to the rest of the world's community.

442. Unimpeded access to the Temple Mount/al-Haram al-Sharif is possible through eight gates that open daily into the complex. Seven of these gates are for the use of the Muslim public, while one (the Mughrabi or Moroccan Gate) is used exclusively by local and foreign tourists and security forces.

443. Israel is not aware of any damage, actual or potential, caused by the excavation south of the al-Aqsa Mosque that was terminated in 1980. The al-Aqsa Mosque, both as a holy site and as a designated antiquities site according to the Antiquities Law, is a structure of major importance and is protected by Israeli law. The State of Israel sees the protection of this important monument as a central tenet of its responsibility towards the protection of all cultural heritage under its sovereign control.

444. In practice, access to holy places and freedom of worship for members of all faiths is strictly protected, with few exceptions relating to the maintenance of public order, security and morals.

6. Freedom of opinion and expression

445. Between 2006 and 2009, approximately 10 indictments were filed annually in regard to offences related to freedom of expression. In 2009 (up until August), 155 cases of such offences were opened, in comparison with 158 in 2008, 139 in 2007 and 170 in 2006. Approximately 70 per cent of these cases were opened with respect to offences of inciting to racism or inciting to violence.

446. In June 2008, the Jerusalem Magistrate Court convicted Elisheva Federman for offences of violence or terrorism, and publication for the purpose of inciting to racism. The defendant was indicted and convicted for statements she made during a recorded television interview for channel 10 (TV) and in the course of a documentary series which was broadcast on channel 2 (TV). The Jerusalem Magistrate Court emphasized that the right to freedom of expression is not absolute, and in certain circumstances it is required to protect other fundamental social values. Thus, racial expressions cannot find shelter under the right for freedom of expression, and limiting this right so as to prevent racism is a worthy cause. Moreover, the Court noted that the offence of publishing incitement to racism is a behavioral offence, and there is no need to show the probability of actual incitement to racism as a result of the publication (C.C. 4437/06 The State of Israel v. Federman Elisheva (15.6.08)).

7. Other civil rights

Due process rights – The right to assigned legal assistance in criminal cases

447. Court-Appointed Counsel. Amendment No. 49 of July 19, 2006, to the Criminal Procedure [Consolidated Version] Law 5742-1982 (the “Criminal Procedure [Consolidated Version] Law”), amended Section 15 of the Law by adding subsections 15(a)(4)–(6). According to the Amendment, the court shall appoint an attorney for an unrepresented defendant, or for an unrepresented suspect in an offence for which immediate testimony is required, if the following conditions are met: the person is charged with an offence punishable by actual imprisonment or imprisonment, which in the absence of special circumstances, cannot be entirely suspended (Section 15(a)(4)); when the prosecutor gives notice to the court that he/she intends to request the incarceration of a defendant if the defendant is convicted (Section 15(a)(5)); when the prosecutor did not give such notice (as referred to in Section 15(a)(5)), and the court considers, following the conviction of the defendant, that there is a possibility that the defendant will be sentenced to a period of incarceration.

448. Amendment No. 49 added Section 15A to the Law which stipulates that a prosecutor who is of the opinion that there is a possibility that he/she will request a sentence of incarceration, shall notify the court of his/her intention, together with the serving of the indictment or at another time prior to the beginning of the trial (Section 15A(a)(1)). The court must forward this notice to the defendant and the Public Defender’s Office (Section 15A(a)(2)). According to Section 15A(b), if the prosecutor did not provide such notification to the court, and following the beginning of the trial he/she is of the opinion that new circumstances or reasons justify requesting that the court sentence the defendant to a period of incarceration, he/she shall then notify the court and the defendant at the first available opportunity. According to Section 15A(c), if the prosecutor provides notice under Section 15A, then legal counsel shall be appointed for an unrepresented defendant.

449. In addition, Amendment No. 49 added Section 15B to the Law, which stipulates that a court may not sentence an unrepresented defendant to a period of incarceration. However, this section shall not apply to a defendant who was represented, but whose representation was terminated with the consent of the court under Section 17.

The Public Defender’s Office

450. An indication of the desire and capacity to serve the minority population is reflected by the pool of attorneys operating within the Public Defender’s Office. That is, 16.3 per cent of the full-time staff attorneys belong to the minority population (14 attorneys out of 88), while 19 per cent of external attorneys hired by the Office are members of minority populations (131 out of 689). Even more telling is that 45 per cent of the external pool of attorneys for the Northern Public Defender’s Office belong to minority populations. This is important for the Northern District, as it is an area where the minority population is in the majority. Therefore, the Office is able to better meet the needs of the minority populations by ensuring the availability of attorneys who can converse with and understand their clients.

The right not to be arbitrarily expelled

451. During the 1990's the annual increase in the number of alien residents, mostly migrant workers, entering Israel illegally, or staying in Israel illegally once their visas had expired, dramatically increased, and was estimated to have increased by 120,000 by the end of 2002, 100,000 by the end of 2003, 60,000 by the end of 2004 and by 107,000 by the end of 2008. At the peak of this trend, during 2001–2002, migrant workers (both legal and illegal) constituted 9.6 per cent of the work force in Israel.

452. The Entry into Israel Law criminalizes the illegal entry into or stay in Israel, which is punishable by one year's imprisonment. A person staying in Israel without a valid permit is to be removed or may leave the country voluntarily. The Law entitles foreigners, including migrant workers, to a range of substantive and procedural rights.

453. The Law provides that persons staying in Israel illegally, who are held in custody until their removal, must be detained separately from criminal detainees. In addition, a list of their basic rights must be posted in a prominent place in the detention facility in both Hebrew and English (in practice the list of rights are also posted in Chinese, Arabic, Thai, Spanish, Portuguese, Amharic, Russian, Romanian etc.) and pamphlets containing information regarding their rights are provided to them in Hebrew, English and additional languages (Philippine, Ukrainian, French, Czech, Turkish, Polish, Bulgarian, Hungarian etc.). Such detention facilities currently operate in "Ktziot" (in the Negev) "Givon" detention facility (near Ramla) and "Matan" (near the city of Hadera).

454. A special tribunal has been appointed with jurisdiction to judicially review the detention decisions of the Border Inspector, including proceedings that deal with bail and the extension of detention (Detention Review Tribunal). The Tribunal has operated since November 2001, and as of 2008, the Law requires that a foreign national staying in Israel illegally must be brought before the Tribunal no later than 96 hours (4 days) (previously 14 days) from his/her arrest. If this is not done, he/she may be released from detention. As the hearings are conducted in the detention facilities, this time limit is enforced, such that in practice, most detainees are brought before the Tribunal within 3–4 days.

455. The Tribunal has jurisdiction to confirm a detention order, to order a review of a detention order within a specified time, to cancel the detention order and grant bail, or to change the conditions of bail.

456. In addition, a person illegally staying in Israel who was released on bail may approach the Tribunal at any time with a request to change his/her conditions of bail. Such a person also has the right to be present in any proceeding dealing with his/her case unless it is impossible to locate him following reasonable efforts to do so. In addition, he/she is entitled to be represented free of charge by a representative who is not a lawyer.

457. A person who has been detained, but for reasons not caused by him/her, has not been removed from Israel within 60 days of his detention, may be released from detention. Such a person shall not be released if the Tribunal is convinced that he poses a danger to the public, public health or state security.

Freedom of information

458. As mentioned in Israel's thirteenth Periodic Report, the 1998 enactment of the Freedom of Information Law has given a solid legislative basis to the public's right of access to information. The main innovation of the Law is the recognition of the right of an Israeli citizen or resident to receive information from public authorities, regardless of whether he/she has any personal interest in it, and without having to state a reason for the request. Moreover, Article 12 applies the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law to persons who are not citizens or residents of the State of Israel, regarding access to information concerning their rights in Israel.

459. The Freedom of Information Law has been amended several times since its enactment. Amendment No. 3 of August 8, 2005, added Section 6A to the Law, which stipulates that a public authority must publicize information on its website regarding environmental issues in its territory, including: information regarding materials that were spilled, cleaned or dumped and results of measures taken regarding noise, odors and smells, and radiation in public property. According to the amendment, the Minister of Environmental Protection, together with the Minister of Finance and in consultations with the Minister of Justice and additional relevant Ministers will determine the various kinds of information that is to be published. On March 4, 2009, the Minister of Environmental Protection enacted the Freedom of Information Regulations (Providing Information regarding Environmental Protection for Public Review) 5769-2009).

Case law

460. In 2005, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) petitioned the Supreme Court requesting it to order the Director of Israel's Defense Force's archives to allow a journalist to browse through its materials and to provide any person with information that does not contain confidential material and may not harm state security. On January 13, 2010, the High Court of Justice rejected the petition after reaching the conclusion that "significant changes have been made regarding the different aspects of the petition, including the award of several of the requested remedies for the petitioners". Due to the fact that this was only done following the submission of the petition, the Court awarded the petitioners expenses in the amount of 20,000 NIS (US$ 5,405). The Court further stated that "in light of the fact that a process for changing the version of the regulations had already began [...] we find no reason for the Court's interference in the arrangement anchored in regulations, and we are of the opinion that the authorities should be permitted to complete the new regulation before we are to address them". However, the Court criticized the respondents regarding the amount of time it took for them to address the petitioner's request and the time it took them to release various archive materials which are not related to specific requests. The Court stated that one should hope that in the framework of the changes brought by this petition, and the examination of the issue, the respondents would consider the reasonable amount of time for processing requests by individuals in a way that will constitute a proper response to the needs of academic research, and to important public interests, particularly the importance of realizing the public's right to be exposed to information found in the hands of government authorities. (H.C.J. 2467/05 Gershom Gorenberg v. The Director of the IDF's and the Ministry of Defense's Archive (13.1.10)).

E. Economic, social, and cultural rights

1. The right to employment

461. Equal Employment Opportunities Commission. In 2005, the Knesset enacted Amendment No. 10 to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, which established the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission within the Ministry of ITL.

462. The Commission is charged with the promotion, implementation and civil enforcement of the following laws and statutory provisions: Equal Employment Opportunities Law; Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law; Women's Employment Law; Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law (in relation to employment) and other statutory provisions relating to: discrimination on religious grounds and army reserve duty service, discrimination on the part of public and private employment agencies, affirmative action for women, people with disabilities, Israeli Arabs and persons of Ethiopian origin in the public sector, and legislation protecting workers who “blow the whistle” on violations of the above laws and statutory provisions. The Commission is also charged, inter alia, with a wide range of duties, including fostering public awareness through education, training and information; encouraging programs and activities; cooperation with relevant persons and bodies; conducting research and gathering information; intervention, with the courts approval, in ongoing legal proceedings; handling complaints regarding violations of equal employment legislation; submission of requests for general orders; and instructing employers to take general measures regarding all or part of their workforce or employment applicants, designed to ensure compliance with duties imposed by equal employment legislation or to prevent violations of such duties.

463. Structure of the Commission – The Commission is headed by a National Commissioner, who is appointed by the Government, upon the recommendation of the Minister of ITL, following consultation with the Minister of Justice. The National Commissioner is appointed for a term of four years, which may be renewed only once; the National Commissioner has to have a law degree and at least seven years of proven experience in the areas within which the Commission operates.

464. The Equal Employment Opportunities Commission commenced operation at the beginning of 2008, following Government Resolution No. 2578 of November 2007. This position is the first of its kind to be established in Israel. The Commissioner is responsible for collecting information and hearing complaints from workers concerning instances of sexual harassment, and/or discrimination based on gender, sexual orientation, parenthood, religion and race. Where necessary, the Commissioner is also responsible for initiating legal action on behalf of any adversely affected workers. The commissioner also has the authority to request that courts issue special orders prohibiting sexual harassment in the workplace. Violation of these orders is considered a criminal offence. In addition, the commissioner is responsible for encouraging special programs related to equality in employment as well as other educational and promotional activities in the workplace. At the end of each year the Commissioner is required to submit an annual report to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Labor, who shall forward the report with his/her comments to the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women, and to the Knesset Committee for Labor, Welfare and Health.

465. In late 2008, the advisory committee to the Commission was appointed. Under the Amendment to the Law, the 21-member committee is comprised of representatives of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Government Ministries, NGOs, trade unions and employers’ associations. Appropriate representation is given, insofar as is possible, to women, the Arab population, including the Druze and the Circassian, and persons with disabilities.

466. Since her appointment in January 2008, the National Commissioner has manned regional commissioners and three additional positions, published a pamphlet dealing with employment rights that was distributed to 300,000 employers and employees, and conducted other activities of the Commission.

467. In addition, since September 2008, the services provided by the Commission have included the handling of 150 specific applications, three law suits which are currently being prepared, and many preliminary measures taken regarding discrimination by employers.

468. On January 21, 2009, the Commission launched its Arabic website.² In marking the event, the National Commissioner emphasized the importance of the website as a tool for disseminating information regarding equal opportunities in the labor market for the Arab population. The Commissioner further stated that as of January 2009, only 5 per cent of the complaints received by the Commission were for reasons of discrimination on the basis of national background and called for the Arab public to file a complaint in any case of discrimination. The website contains information for employers, employees and employment-seekers on issues such as: discrimination at work, discrimination in applying for work, discrimination upon dismissal, verdicts and court decisions regarding issues of discrimination etc.

469. In March 2009, the Commission published a pamphlet in Arabic which is intended for employers, employees and employment-seekers in the Arab population.³ The pamphlet contains information regarding discrimination at various stages of the employment process and details regarding the Commission, ways of contacting it, ways of addressing a complaint etc.

470. On May 4, 2009, the Commission announced that in the first quarter of 2009, it received a total of 180 complaints, of which only 3 per cent were for discrimination on the grounds of national background. The Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Labor stated that she would attribute special emphasis to fighting discrimination among the Arab population and that there is an important need to raise awareness of the Commission throughout this population.

471. The Equal Employment Opportunities Commission has made the Arab population a priority in its work and is targeting cases dealing with discrimination, thus raising public awareness and enforcing the law in specific cases.

The Israeli Employment Service

472. The Israeli Employment Service is responsible for the placement of employees without any prejudice or discrimination. As of September 2009, approximately 220,000 unemployed persons were registered with the Employment Service. These unemployed persons are of different populations, ages, professions and levels of education, and include job-seekers, as well as people who are entitled to receive unemployment or income support allocations.

473. On August 1, 2007, the Employment Service issued a Directive regarding the prohibition on discrimination, in accordance with Section 42(a) of the Employment Service Law, and Section 2 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. The Directive was distributed to the Employment Service's workers, who also received relevant training on this issue.

474. In order to promote the placement of unemployed persons, the Employment Service refers job-seekers to vocational training held by the Vocational Training and Manpower Development Department in the Ministry of ITL. Thus, many job-seekers of the Bedouin and the Ultra-Orthodox populations have been referred to such training sessions over the years.

475. Special programs are designated for members of weaker populations in order to facilitate the better integration of such populations in the labor market. The Employment Service operates various instruments for identifying population groups which require special assistance, such as employment, psychological counseling, and computerized diagnostic tests. During 2007 and 2008, a unique project was conducted together with the Microsoft Corporation and WIZO (Women's International Zionist's Organization) to diminish disparities of digital knowledge and providing intensive assistance to women, single mothers, and women of minority populations. In addition, single parents were informed of the unique programs and benefits of the Single Parents Department in the Ministry of ITL. Moreover, the Employment Service has cooperated with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's (JDC) program for integrating people of the Ultra-Orthodox population into the labor market through special centers for employment development among that population.

476. The development of several pilot programs for assisting weaker populations is currently being concluded, such as providing financial incentives for employers who employ people of minorities for long periods, providing financial incentives for employers and employees in the agricultural field, recovery of high travel expenses for job-seekers of weaker populations who are placed in work which is far from their permanent residence, and a program designated for the Ultra-Orthodox population.
