COMMITTEE AGAINST TORTURE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES
UNDER ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONVENTION

Initial reports of States Parties due in 1992

Addendum

ISRAEL

I. GENERAL INFORMATION

1. The State of Israel is a parliamentary democracy in which the Knesset (the legislature) enacts statutes which are interpreted and applied by an independent judiciary and enforced by the executive. Acts of torture, etc. as defined by the Convention are designated as criminal offences by penal legislation (see below) and perpetrators of such offences are tried and punished by the courts.
2. In addition to the criminal law, the law of civil wrongs enables a victim of torture to seek civil redress in damages for torts such as assault or false imprisonment. In appropriate cases, such civil action is available against the State or public officials.
3. Israel is a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, provisions of which may be considered as of wider application than those of the Convention against Torture.
4. Under the Israeli constitutional system customary international law is a part of its legal system; however, international conventions are not part of the law of the land, nor can they be directly invoked before the courts. The provisions of international conventions have to be explicitly incorporated into national legislation. For details of such legislation applying the provisions of the Convention, see below.

5. As already stated, the ordinary courts have jurisdiction to try offences against the penal provisions prohibiting torture and similar acts. Moreover, those courts can award compensation in civil actions for damages. In addition, public officials who violate the criminal law or administrative directives by which they are bound (see below) are subject to disciplinary jurisdiction and may incur sanctions imposed by disciplinary bodies. This includes members of the General Security Services (GSS), as well as members of the Israel Defence Forces who are subject to court martial in respect of violation of military law involving torture or similar acts.

II. IMPLEMENTATION OF SPECIFIC PROVISIONS OF THE CONVENTION

Article 1

6. While Israeli legislation does not specifically define torture, statutory provisions clearly cover all acts of torture as found in the definition in article 1 of the Convention. (See remarks on art.4, below).

7. A number of sections of the Penal Law, 5737-1977 provide criminal sanctions against acts of torture (see below). Reference should also be made to the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom, enacted recently. Moreover, strict guidelines relating to methods of interrogation of security suspects are also directed to prevention or torture (see below).

8. Another relevant statutory provision is section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance [New Version], 5731-1971 which invalidated any confession made by an accused person not made freely and voluntarily.

9. Regarding article 2(3) of the Convention, we refer to section 24(1)(a) of the Penal Law, 5737-1977 which allows the defence of acting under superior orders only where the orders are lawful. Where an order is manifestly illegal, as would be the case with an order to commit acts of torture, acting under such order would clearly not constitute a defence for a person accused of committing such acts. On this, we would refer to the decision of the Supreme Court, sitting as High Court of Justice (27.12.89) to make absolute decree against the chief Military Advocate, the chief of the General Staff and others, requiring them to commit an army officer for trial before a court martial for committing acts of torture against residents of certain Arab villages in Samaria (administered territories) during the course of putting down the Arab uprising (intifada) at its inception in January 1988. According to the findings of an investigation instituted at the request of the International Red Cross, the residents had been bound and severely beaten by orders of the said army officer. The court characterized such acts as repugnant to civilized standards of behaviour and rejected the plea that they were carried out as a result of the "uncertainty" that prevailed as to orders for quelling the intifada. (High Court case No. 425/89 Piskei Din (Supreme Court Judgements), vol. 43, Part IV, p. 718).

10. Under the Extradition Law, 5714-1954, a prior condition for any act of extradition is the existence of an extradition convention between Israel and the State to which it is proposed to extradite the offender.

11. Where a request for extradition is submitted by a foreign State, the Minister of Justice may direct that the person concerned be brought before a District Court to determine whether he is subject to extradition, and in pursuance of such direction, the Attorney General or his representative submits to the court a petition to declare the person concerned subject to extradition. If the statutory conditions are fulfilled, the court will make such a declaration, and the extradition will then eventually be carried out. A person declared subject to extradition does have a right of appeal to the Supreme Court sitting as a Court of Criminal Appeal within 30 days of the decision of the District Court. However, the final decision as to his extradition is, under the Extradition Law, at the discretion of the Minister of Justice.

12. The following are the relevant provisions of the Penal Law, 5737-1977 providing criminal sanctions for acts of torture:

"CHAPTER NINE: Offences relating to Public Authority and the Administration of Justice

Article Four: Offences Committed in or Against the Public Service

277. Oppression by public servant. A public servant who does one of the following is liable to imprisonment for three years:

(1) uses or directs the use of force or violence against a person for the purpose of extorting from him or from anyone in whom he is interested a confession of an offence or information relating to an offence;

(2) threatens any person, or directs any person to be threatened, with injury to his person or property or to the person or property of anyone in whom he is interested for the purpose of extorting from him a confession of an offence or any information relating to an offence."

"CHAPTER ELEVEN: OFFENCES RELATING TO PROPERTY

Article Six: Deceit, Blackmail and Extortion

427. Blackmail with use of force. (a) A person who unlawfully uses force to induce a person to do some act or to refrain from doing an act which he is permitted to do is liable to imprisonment for seven years or, if the use of force leads to the doing or omission of the act, nine years.

(b) for the purposes of this section, a person who administers drugs or intoxicating liquors shall be treated as a person using force."

13. Regarding complicity of participation in torture, the following general provisions of the Penal Law, 5737-1977, are relevant:

"CHAPTER FOUR: PARTIES TO AN OFFENCE

25. In this chapter, 'offence' does not include a contravention.

26. Where an offence is committed, each of the following is deemed to have taken part in its commission and to bear responsibility for it:

(1) a person who does one of the acts or makes one of the omissions which constitute the offence;

(2) a person who, whether or not he is present at the time the offence is committed, does or omits to do any act for the purpose of enabling or aiding another person to commit the offence;

(3) a person who, whether or not he is present at the time the offence is committed, counsels or procures any other person to commit the offence;

(4) a person who aids another in committing an offence by being present at the place where it is committed for the purpose of overawing opposition or of strengthening the resolution of the perpetrator or of ensuring the carrying out of the offence.

27. A person who procures another to do an act or make an omission which if he had himself done or made it would have constituted an offence on his part is guilty of that offence.

28. Where two or more persons associate to pursue an unlawful purpose, and in the course of its pursuit an offence is committed which by its nature is a probable consequence thereof, each of them present at the commission of the offence is deemed to have committed it.

29. Where a person counsels another person to commit an offence, and an offence is thereafter committed by the other person, the first-mentioned person is deemed to have counselled the offence actually committed even if it is not committed in the way counselled or is not the offence counselled, so long as the facts constituting the offence actually committed are a probable consequence of carrying out the counsel.

30. If any person has procured or counselled another person to commit an offence and before the commission of the offence has countermanded the commission, he shall not be deemed to have committed the offence if it is subsequently committed."

14. Regarding attempts to commit torture, the following general provisions of the Penal Law, 5727-1977 are relevant:

"CHAPTER FIVE: ATTEMPT AND INCITEMENT

31. In this chapter, 'offence' does not include a contravention.

32. A person who attempts to commit an offence shall unless some other punishment is provided be liable:

(1) to imprisonment for twenty years if the offence is punishable by death;

(2) to imprisonment for fourteen years if the offence is manslaughter;

(3) to imprisonment for ten years if the offence is any other offence punishable by imprisonment for life;

(4) in every other case, to half the punishment prescribed for the offence.

33. (a) A person is deemed to attempt to commit an offence when he begins to put his intention to commit it into effect by some overt act and by means adapted to achieve such intention, but does not achieve such intention to such an extent as to commit the offence.

(b) It is immaterial, except as regards punishment, whether the offender does all that is necessary on his part to complete the commission of the offence or whether the complete commission thereof is prevented by circumstances independent of his will or whether he desists of his own motion from further prosecution of his intention.

(c) It is immaterial that by reason of circumstances not known to the offender it is impossible in fact to commit the offence.

34. Any person who attempts to procure or incite another to do any act or make any omission, in Israel or elsewhere, which if it were done or made would constitute an offence under Israeli law or the laws of the place where it is proposed to be done or made shall be liable to the same punishment as if he had himself attempted to do the act or make the omission in Israel:

Provided that if the act or omission is proposed to be done or made at a place outside Israel:

(1) the punishment shall not exceed that which he would have incurred under the laws of that place if he had himself attempted to do the act or make the omission;

(2) he shall not be prosecuted save at the request of the State having jurisdiction in that place."

15. Mention must also be made of the Police Ordinance [New Version], 5731-1971, section 50 (a) of which, as amended in 1988, defines as a disciplinary offence as "an offence which prejudices good order and discipline, as specified in the Schedule." Item 19 of the Schedule to the Ordinance states the following to be a disciplinary offence: "Use of force against any person within the scope of fulfilment of duty, contrary to the standing orders of the Israel Police or to any other order lawfully given."

16. Police standing orders prohibit the use of force except in very clearly defined cases, i.e. resistance to arrest, attempt to escape from lawful custody, to overcome mob violence, in self-defence or to prevent a crime involving violence. In none of these circumstances would the use of torture be justified. An indictment under this provision may only be brought by decision of the Attorney General or of a person authorized by him.

17. The following are the penalties which a Police Disciplinary Tribunal may impose for disciplinary offences: reprimand; severe reprimand; fine of up to two month's pay; confinement to place of duty for up to 45 days; detention for up to 45 days; reduction in rank. Disciplinary proceedings may be instituted in addition to criminal proceedings for the same offence.

18. Equivalent provisions apply to prison officers under section 101 of the Prisons Ordinance [New Version], 5731-1971 and item 19 of the Schedule to that Ordinance.

19. Section 65 of the Military Justice Law, 5715-1955 provides as follows: "A soldier who strikes or otherwise maltreats a person committed to his custody or a soldier inferior to him in rank is liable to imprisonment for a term of three years." A soldier would be tried before a court-martial for such an offence.

Article 5

20. Israeli criminal jurisdiction is territorial in nature, covering all acts committed within the territory under its jurisdiction. The basic jurisdictional provision of the Penal Law, 5737-1977, is to be found in section 3 thereof:

"CHAPTER TWO: TERRITORIAL APPLICATION

3. Extent of jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the courts in Israel in the matter of offences extends to the area of the State and its territorial waters and, by Law, also beyond the said area. Where an offence is committed partly within the jurisdiction, the person who commits it may be tried and punished as if he had committed it wholly within the jurisdiction."

21. Furthermore, Israeli courts are competent under section 6 of the said Law to try a national, a resident or a public servant of Israel who has committed a number of specific offences, among which are included oppression by a public servant (section 277) abuse of office (section 280) and blackmail with use of force (section 427), all of which are quoted above (see remarks on art. 4). Section 6 reads as follows:

"Offences by public servants and offences in respect of public property.

6. (a) The courts in Israel are competent to try a national, a resident or a public servant of Israel who committed abroad one of the following offences:

(1) an offence under any of the sections of articles 4 and 5 of Chapter Nine of this Law;

(2) an offence under any of the sections of Chapter Eleven, except sections 401 and 429, and Chapter Twelve or under section 381 (2) or 489, which harms any property or rights of the State or of one of the bodies or associations specified in the Schedule.

(b) The Minister of Justice may, with the approval of the Constitution, Legislation and Law Committee of the Knesset, vary the Schedule by adding or deleting the names of bodies or associations."

22. Section 7 extends criminal jurisdiction to instances of injury to Israeli nationals and residents committed abroad:

"Injury to nationals or residents of Israel.

7. (a) The courts in Israel shall be competent to try under Israeli Law a person who committed abroad an act which would have been an offence had it been committed in Israel and which injured or was intended to injure the life, person, health, freedom or property of an Israeli national or resident of Israel.

(b) If the offence was committed in a place under the jurisdiction of another State, no information shall be filed under this section unless the act is also an offence under the law which applies in that place."

23. In this context, the following additional provisions of the Penal Law regarding jurisdiction should be noted:

"9. Attempt, incitement and conspiracy. The courts in Israel shall be competent to try, in addition to the parties to an offence under Chapter Four, a person who, in respect of an offence which a court is competent to try under this chapter, has done any of the acts mentioned in Chapters Five and Fourteen or in sections 260 to 262 of this Law.

"10. Restrictions. (a) No information shall be filed in respect of an offence under sections 4 to 9 save by the Attorney General or with his written consent.

"(b) No information shall be filed in respect of an offence under section 7 unless the penalty prescribed for it by Israeli law is imprisonment for a term of one year or more.

"(c) No person shall be brought to trial under sections 6 or 8 for an act or omission for which he has been brought to trial, and convicted or acquitted, abroad.

"(d) A person who has committed an offence under sections 4, 5 or 7 may be brought to trial in Israel even if he has already been brought to trial abroad for the act or omission; but if a person is convicted in Israel of an offence as aforesaid after being convicted thereof abroad, the court in Israel shall, in determining the penalty, have regard to the penalty he has undergone abroad.

"11. Saving of powers. The provisions of this chapter shall not derogate from any power under another law to try offences committed abroad."

24. Under the general rules of criminal procedure, where jurisdiction exists, a person suspected of having committed an offence such as those constituting torture would be arrested and detained in custody, or he may be released on adequate bail in appropriate cases. Police investigation of the alleged offence would be initiated without delay.

25. Detainees who are foreign nationals are permitted to communicate with the diplomatic or consular representatives of their State of nationality.

Article 7

26. Persons suspected of having committed acts of torture would be prosecuted, if they are not extradited.

Courts or tribunals would decide on cases of alleged torture in the same way as they decide on any other cases of serious crimes. Standard of evidence required for proof of torture are the same whatever the basis of jurisdiction of the court.

Article 8

27. For Israeli provisions regarding extradition, see under article 3 above. Israeli law makes extradition conditional on the existence of an extradition treaty with the State requesting extradition. A multilateral treaty providing for extradition to which Israel and another State are party and fulfilling the provisions of Israeli law satisfies the statutory requirement.

Article 9

28. The statute regulating judicial assistance, both civil and criminal, is known as the Legal Assistance to Foreign States [Consolidated Version] Law, 5737-1977. The statute provides for service of documents, taking of evidence, production of documents, seizure of documents or other articles, carrying out of searches and performance of other legal acts on behalf of foreign courts. Moreover, it provides for transfer abroad of prisoners and detainees for the purpose of giving evidence in foreign proceedings. The statute provides that judicial assistance may be withheld where it is likely to prejudice the sovereignty or security of Israel or any matter of public policy, or where there is lack of reciprocity between Israel and the State requesting the assistance.

29. Special regulations govern judicial assistance in criminal matter to States parties to the Strasbourg (Council of Europe) Convention of 20 April 1959, to which Israel is also a party.

Articles 11, 12 and 13

30. The State of Israel maintains that the basic human rights of all persons under its jurisdiction must never be violated, regardless of the crimes that the individual may have committed. To prevent terrorism effectively while ensuring that the basic human rights of even the most dangerous of criminals are protected, the Israeli authorities have adopted strict rules for the handling of interrogations. These guidelines are designed to enable investigators to obtain crucial information on terrorist activities or organizations from suspects who, for obvious reasons, would not volunteer information on their activities, while ensuring that the suspects are not maltreated.

The Landau Commission

31. The basic guidelines on interrogation were laid down by the Landau Commission of Inquiry. The Commission, headed by the former Supreme Court President, Justice Moshe Landau, was appointed following a decision of the Israeli Government in 1987 to examine the General Security Service's (GSS) methods of interrogation of terrorist suspects. In order to compile its recommendations, the Landau Commission examined international human rights law standards, existing Israeli legislation prohibiting torture and maltreatment, and guidelines of other democracies confronted with the threat of terrorism.

32. The Landau Commission envisioned its task as defining "with as much precision as possible, the boundaries of what is permitted to the interrogator and mainly what is prohibited to him". The Commission determined that in dealing with dangerous terrorists who represent a grave threat to the State of Israel and its citizens, the use of a moderate degree of pressure, including physical pressure, in order to obtain crucial information is unavoidable under certain circumstances. Such circumstances include situations in which information which an interrogator can obtain from the suspect can prevent imminent murder, or where the suspect possesses vital information on a terrorist organization which could not be uncovered by any other source (e.g. locations of arms or explosive caches or planned acts of terrorism).

33. The Landau Commission recognized the danger posed to the democratic values of the State of Israel should its agents abuse their power by using unnecessary or unduly harsh forms of pressure. As a result, the Commission recommended that psychological forms of pressure be used predominantly and that only "moderate physical pressure" (not unknown in other democratic countries) be sanctioned in limited cases where the degree of anticipated danger is considerable.

34. It should be noted that the use of such moderate pressure is in accordance with international law. For example, when asked to examine certain methods of interrogation used by Northern Ireland police against IRA terrorists, the European Human Rights Court ruled that "[i]ll-treatment must reach a certain severe level in order to be included in the ban [of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment] contained in article 3 [of the European Convention on Human Rights]". In its ruling, that Court sanctioned the use of certain forms of pressure in the interrogation process, such as hooding (except during the actual questioning), sleep deprivation and reduction of food and drink supply.

35. The Landau Commission was aware that the issue of moderate pressure during interrogation is both a serious and a sensitive one. The guidelines regarding interrogation provide for limited forms of pressure under very specific circumstances, to be determined on a case-by-case basis. They by no means authorize indiscriminate use of force. Rather, specific circumstances have been identified and interrogation practices have been strictly defined in a manner that, in the opinion of the Landau Commission, "if these boundaries are maintained exactly in letter and in spirit, the effectiveness of the interrogation will be assured, while at the same time it will be far from the use of physical or mental torture, maltreatment of the person being interrogated, or the degradation of his human dignity".

36. To ensure that disproportionate pressure is not used, the Landau Commission identified several measures, which have been adopted and are now in force, namely:

1. Disproportionate exertion of pressure on the suspect is not permissible - pressure must never reach the level of physical torture or maltreatment of the suspect, or grievous harm to his honour which deprives him of his human dignity.
2. The use of less serious measures must be weighed against the degree of anticipated danger, according to the information in the possession of the interrogator.
3. The physical and psychological means of pressure permitted for use by an interrogator must be defined and limited in advance, by issuing binding directives.
4. There must be strict supervision of the implementation in practice of the directives given to GSS interrogators.
5. The interrogators' supervisors must react firmly and without hesitation to every deviation from the permissible, imposing disciplinary punishment, and in serious cases, causing criminal proceedings to be instituted against the offending interrogator.

37. Once these measures were set down, the Landau Commission went on, in a second section of its report, to detail precisely the exact forms of pressure permissible to the GSS interrogators. This section has been kept secret out of concern that, should the narrow restrictions binding the interrogators be known to the suspects undergoing questioning, the interrogation would be less effective. Palestinian terrorist organizations commonly instruct their members, and have even printed a manual, on techniques of withstanding GSS questioning without disclosing any information. It stands to reason that publishing GSS guidelines would not only enable the organizations to prepare their members better for questioning, but would reassure the suspect as to his ability to undergo interrogation methods without exposing vital information, thus depriving the GSS of the psychological tool of uncertainty.

Safeguards

38. Since the interrogation guidelines are secret, the Israeli Government recognized the importance of establishing safeguards and a system of review of interrogation practices in order to ensure that GSS investigators do not violate the guidelines. As a result, the GSS Comptroller was instructed to check every claim of torture or maltreatment during interrogation. Since 1987, the Comptroller has carried out this responsibility, initiating disciplinary or legal action against interrogators in cases where they have been found to have deviated from the legal guidelines.

39. The Landau Commission recommended that there be external supervision of GSS activities in addition to the GSS Comptroller. Since the Landau Commission issued its recommendations, the State Comptroller's Office has launched an examination of the GSS investigator's unit. Upon the completion of its inquiry, the State Comptroller's findings will be submitted to a special subcommittee of the Knesset (Israeli Parliament) State Comptroller Committee. Also in accordance with the recommendation of the Landau Commission, an additional review procedure exists whereby the conclusions of the special ministerial committee, referred to below, as well as the annual reports of the investigators' unit are brought to the attention of the Subcommittee for Services of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee.

40. In addition, an agreement between the State of Israel and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) provides for the monitoring of conditions of detention. Delegates from the ICRC are permitted to meet with detainees in private within 14 days of the arrest. ICRC doctors may examine detainees who complain of improper treatment. All complaints made by the ICRC regarding treatment of prisoners are fully investigated by the relevant Israeli authorities and the findings are made known to the ICRC.

41. In May 1991, a special ad hoc committee composed of members of the GSS and the Justice Ministry was appointed to review complaints against the conduct of GSS investigators during interrogation. The committee identified a number of cases in which investigators did not act in accordance with the guidelines for treatment of detainees. As a result of the Committee's findings, action has been taken against GSS investigators involved in these cases.

42. In order to further ensure the effectiveness of the review process it has recently been decided to set up an independent body to check claims of maltreatment instead of the GSS Comptroller. To this end, a unit has been established in the Justice Ministry under the supervision of the State Attorney, which will investigate all complaints of maltreatment in the future.

Review

43. As recommended by the Landau Commission, a special ministerial committee headed by the Prime Minister was established in 1988 under the previous Government to review periodically the interrogation guidelines themselves. This committee held several sessions but its work was cut short by the national elections which were held in June, 1992. Following the establishment of the new Government in July 1992 a new ministerial subcommittee composed of the Ministers of Justice and Police was appointed. This committee is currently reviewing the interrogation guidelines and will soon submit its conclusion and recommendations to the Cabinet.

44. In 1991, a petition was submitted to the Supreme Court of Israel sitting as the High Court of Justice by a detainee named Murad Adnan Salkhat and a private group named the Israel Public Committee Against Torture, challenging the legality of the guidelines and demanding that they be made public. This petition, which is currently pending, demonstrates the openness of the independent judiciary of Israel to adjudicate even highly sensitive matters relating to human rights and security.

IDF investigators

45. The Israel Defence Forces (IDF), like the GSS, has a strict policy of investigating every claim of maltreatment of detainees by IDF investigators. Soldiers who are found to have deviated from the strict IDF orders against violence or threat of violence in interrogation are either court-martialled or have disciplinary proceedings brought against them, depending on the severity of the charges. The IDF also appointed a commission to review interrogation practices and policies. On 10 May 1991, Major General (Reserve) Raphael Vardi was appointed to investigate claims of maltreatment of detainees in military investigation facilities in the administered areas. As a result of his inquiry, a number of interrogators found to have violated the norms were punished. In addition, Major General Vardi submitted a list of recommendations to the IDF Chief of Staff designed to reduce the possibility of maltreatment by IDF investigators. These recommendations have been adopted.

46. In addition to the possibility of bringing a tort action for damages, the victim of an act of torture has a right to compensation under the general provisions relating to compensation for victims of crime. Section 77 of the Penal Law, 5737-1977 empowers a court that has convicted a person to require him to pay to the victim of his offence compensation for damage or suffering caused to him, and calculated on the basis of the time of commission of the offence or of the time of the decision, whichever sum is higher. Compensation is recovered in the same way as a fine. The maximum amount payable to any individual is at the moment fixed at 37,500 New Shekels.

47. Section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance (New Version), 5731-1971, entitled "Confessions" provides as follows:

"12. Evidence of confession by the accused that he has committed an offence is admissible only when the prosecution has produced evidence as to the circumstances in which it was made and the court is satisfied that it was free and voluntary."

Article 16

48. The recently enacted Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom is relevant to this article, especially section 2, entitled "Preservation of Life, Body and Dignity", which states as follows: "2. No act shall be committed that harms the life, bodily integrity or dignity of any person as a human being." Section 4, entitled "Protection of Life, Body and Dignity", reads "Every person is entitled to protection of his life, bodily integrity and dignity." Section 11 provides:

"Application 11. Every governmental authority shall be bound to respect the rights under this Basic Law."

United Nations • New York, 1994

157. The Committee also recommends that more attention be given to adequate training on the prohibition of torture to medical personnel.

158. In addition, the Committee expects to receive answers to the various questions addressed to the Greek delegation, especially those concerning refugees.

Israel

159. The Committee considered the initial report of Israel (CAT/C/16/Add.4) at its 183rd and 184th meetings on 25 April 1994 (CAT/C/SR.183 and 184), and has adopted the following conclusions and recommendations:

A. Introduction

160. Israel ratified the Convention on 3 October 1991 and made reservations on articles 20 and 30. It also did not make the declarations to accept the provisions of articles 21 and 22 of the Convention.

161. The initial report was filed in a timely fashion and was well supported by the oral presentation of the delegation, which was both focused and informative.

B. Positive aspects

162. The Committee notes the way in which public debate is allowed in Israel on such sensitive matters as ill-treatment of detainees, both in Israel and the occupied territories.

163. The Committee is pleased to acknowledge the way in which the Israeli Medical Association reacted to prevent its members from participating in ill-treatment of detainees by filling in the "medical fitness forms".

164. The Committee is pleased to note that the General Security Service and police are no longer responsible for reviewing complaints of ill-treatment of detainees by their own members, and that such function is now the responsibility of a special unit of the Ministry of Justice. The Committee is also pleased to note that Israel has prosecuted interrogators who have breached domestic standards of conduct and has disciplined others.

C. Subjects of concern

165. There is real concern that no legal steps have been taken to implement domestically the Convention against Torture. Thus, the Convention does not form part of the domestic law of Israel and its provisions cannot be invoked in Israeli courts.

166. The Committee regrets the clear failure to implement the definition of torture as contained in article 1 of the Convention.

167. It is a matter of deep concern that Israeli law pertaining to the defences of "superior orders" and "necessity" are in clear breach of that country's obligations under article 2 of the Convention.

168. The Landau Commission Report, permitting as it does "moderate physical pressure" as a lawful mode of interrogation, is completely unacceptable to this Committee:

(a) As for the most part creating conditions leading to the risk of torture or cruel, or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment;

(b) By retaining in secret the crucial standards of interrogation to be applied in any case, such secrecy being a further condition leading inevitably to some cases of ill-treatment contrary to the Convention against Torture.

169. The Committee is greatly concerned at the large number of heavily documented cases of ill-treatment in custody that appear to amount to breaches of the Convention, including several cases resulting in death that have been drawn to the attention of the Committee and the world by such reputable non-governmental organizations as Amnesty International, Al Haq (the local branch of the International Commission of Jurists) and others.

D. Recommendations

170. The Committee recommends:

(a) That all the provisions of the Convention against Torture be incorporated by statute into the domestic law of Israel;

(b) That interrogation procedures be published in full so that they are both transparent and seen to be consistent with the standards of the Convention;

(c) That a vigorous programme of education and re-education of the General Security Service, the Israel Defence Forces, police and medical profession be undertaken to acquaint them with their obligations under the Convention;

(d) That an immediate end be put to current interrogation practices that are in breach of Israel's obligations under the Convention;

(e) That all victims of such practices should be granted access to appropriate rehabilitation and compensation measures.

171. Finally, the Committee expresses its wish to cooperate with Israel and it is sure that its recommendations will be properly taken into consideration.

* The present document contains a revised version of the special report submitted by Israel on 6 December 1997 in accordance with a request made by the Committee against Torture on 22 November 1996. The second periodic report, when submitted by Israel, will be issued in a separate document. The initial report submitted by Israel is contained in document CAT/C/16/Add.4; for its consideration by the Committee, see documents CAT/C/SR.183 and 184 and Official Records of the General Assembly, Forty-ninth Session, Supplement No. 44 (A/49/46), paras. 159-171.

I. ISRAEL'S INTERROGATION POLICIES AND PRACTICES

1. In the last month, the Supreme Court handed down a decision which cancelled an interim injunction ordering the General Security Service (GSS) to abstain from the use of any physical pressure during the interrogation of a detainee. Since this decision was the subject of much controversy and was given an utterly mistaken interpretation in the world media, we found it necessary to submit this paper in order to clarify Israel's interrogation policies and practices and in particular the above-mentioned decision of the Supreme Court.

2. We would like to emphasize that Israeli law strictly forbids all forms of torture or maltreatment. The Israeli Penal Code (1977) prohibits the use of force or violence against a person for the purpose of extorting from him a confession to an offence or information relating to an offence. Israel has signed and ratified the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

3. The State of Israel maintains that the basic human rights of all persons under its jurisdiction must never be violated, regardless of the crimes that the individual may have committed. Israel recognizes, however, its responsibility to protect the lives of both Jews and Arabs from harm at the hands of terrorist organizations active throughout the world. To prevent terrorism effectively while ensuring that the basic human rights of even the most dangerous of criminals are protected, the Israeli authorities have adopted strict rules for the handling of interrogations. These guidelines are designed to enable investigators to obtain crucial information on terrorist activities or organizations from suspects who, for obvious reasons, would not volunteer information on their activities, while ensuring that the suspects are not maltreated.

II. THE LANDAU COMMISSION

4. The basic guidelines on interrogation were set by the Landau Commission of Inquiry. The Commission, headed by former Supreme Court President, Justice Moshe Landau, was appointed following a decision of the Government of Israel in 1987 to examine the General Security Service's methods of interrogation of terrorist suspects. In order to compile its recommendations, the Landau Commission examined international human rights law standards, existing Israeli legislation prohibiting torture and maltreatment, and guidelines of other democracies confronted with the threat of terrorism.

5. The Landau Commission envisioned its task as defining "with as much precision as possible, the boundaries of what is permitted to the interrogator and mainly what is prohibited to him". The Commission determined that in dealing with dangerous terrorists who represent a grave threat to the State of Israel and its citizens, the use of a moderate degree of pressure, including physical pressure, in order to obtain crucial information, is unavoidable under certain circumstances. Such circumstances include situations in which information sought from a detainee believed to be personally involved in serious terrorist activities can prevent imminent murder, or where the detainee possesses vital information on a terrorist organization which could not be uncovered by any other source (for example, location of arms or caches of explosives for planned acts of terrorism).

6. The Landau Commission recognized the danger posed to the democratic values of the State of Israel should its agents abuse their power by using unnecessary or unduly harsh forms of pressure. As a result, the Commission recommended that psychological forms of pressure be used predominantly and that only "moderate physical pressure" (not unknown in other democratic countries) be sanctioned in limited cases where the degree of anticipated danger is considerable.

7. It should be noted that the use of such moderate pressure is in accordance with international law. For example, when asked to examine certain methods of interrogation used by Northern Ireland police against IRA terrorists, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that "ill-treatment must reach a certain severe level in order to be included in the ban [of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment] contained in Article 3 [of the European Convention on Human Rights]". In its ruling, that Court disagreed with the view of the Commission that the above-mentioned methods could be construed as torture, though it ruled that their application in combination (emphasis added) amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment. The question whether each of these measures separately would amount to inhuman and degrading treatment was therefore left open by the Court.

8. The Landau Commission was aware that the issue of moderate pressure during interrogation is both a serious and a sensitive one. The guidelines regarding interrogation provide for limited forms of pressure under very specific circumstances, to be determined on a case-by-case basis. They by no means authorize indiscriminate use of force. Rather, specific circumstances have been identified and interrogation practices have been strictly defined in a manner that, in the opinion of the Landau Commission, "if these boundaries are maintained exactly in letter and in spirit, the effectiveness of the interrogation will be assured, while at the same time it will be far from the use of physical or mental torture, maltreatment of the person being interrogated, or the degradation of his human dignity".

9. To ensure that disproportionate pressure is not used, the Landau Commission identified several measures, which have been adopted and are now in force, namely:

- (i) Disproportionate exertion of pressure on the suspect is not permissible - pressure must never reach the level of physical torture or maltreatment of the suspect, or grievous harm to his honour which deprives him of his human dignity.
- (ii) The use of less serious measures must be weighed against the degree of anticipated danger, according to the information in the possession of the interrogator.
- (iii) The physical and psychological means of pressure permitted for use by an interrogator must be defined and limited in advance, by issuing binding directives.

- (iv) There must be strict supervision of the implementation in practice of the directives given to GSS interrogators.
- (v) The interrogators' supervisors must react firmly and without hesitation to every deviation from the permissible, imposing disciplinary punishment, and in serious cases, causing criminal proceedings to be instituted against the offending interrogator.

10. Once these measures were set down, the Landau Commission went on, in a second section of its report, to precisely detail the exact forms of pressure permissible to the GSS interrogators. This section has been kept secret out of concern that, should the narrow restrictions binding the interrogators be known to the suspects undergoing questioning, the interrogation would be less effective. Palestinian terrorist organizations commonly instruct their members, and have even printed a manual, on techniques of withstanding GSS questioning without disclosing any information. It stands to reason that publishing GSS guidelines would not only enable the organizations to prepare their members better for questioning, but would reassure the suspect as to his ability to undergo interrogation methods without exposing vital information, thus depriving the GSS of the psychological tool of uncertainty.

III. SAFEGUARDS

11. Since the interrogation guidelines are secret, the Government of Israel recognized the importance of establishing safeguards and a system of review of interrogation practices in order to ensure that GSS investigators do not violate the guidelines. As a result, the GSS Comptroller was instructed to check every claim of torture or maltreatment during interrogation. From 1987 until the beginning of 1994, the Comptroller carried out this responsibility, initiating disciplinary or legal action against interrogators in cases where they have been found to have deviated from the legal guidelines. Early in 1994, in accordance with the recommendations of the Landau Commission, responsibility for investigation of claims of maltreatment was transferred to the Division for the Investigation of Police Misconduct in the Ministry of Justice under the direct supervision of the State Attorney.

12. The Landau Commission also recommended that there be external supervision of GSS activities. Since the Landau Commission issued its recommendations, the State Comptroller's Office has launched an examination of the GSS investigator's unit. Upon the completion of its inquiry, the State Comptroller's findings will be submitted to a special subcommittee of the Knesset (Israeli Parliament) State Comptroller Committee.

13. In addition, an agreement between the State of Israel and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) provides for the monitoring of conditions of detention. Delegates from the ICRC are permitted to meet with detainees in private within 14 days of the arrest. ICRC doctors may examine detainees who complain of improper treatment. All complaints made by the ICRC regarding treatment of prisoners are fully investigated by the relevant Israeli authorities and the findings are made known to the ICRC.

14. In May 1991, a special ad hoc committee composed of members of the GSS and the Justice Ministry was appointed to review complaints against the conduct of GSS investigators during interrogation at the Gaza Prison investigation section. The committee identified a number of cases in which investigators did not act in accordance with the guidelines for treatment of detainees. As a result of the Committee's findings, action has been taken against GSS investigators involved in those cases.

IV. REVIEW

15. As recommended by the Landau Commission, a special ministerial committee headed by the Prime Minister was established in 1988 under the previous government to review periodically the interrogation guidelines themselves. On 22 April 1993, the ministerial committee determined that certain changes should be made in the GSS guidelines. On the basis of the committee's recommendations, new guidelines were issued to GSS investigators. The new guidelines clearly stipulate that the need and justification for the use of limited pressure by investigators must be established in every case, according to its own special circumstances. The guidelines point out that the use of exceptional methods was intended only for situations where vital information is being concealed and not in order to humiliate, harm or mistreat those under investigation. In addition, it is expressly prohibited to deny a person under investigation food or drink, to refuse him permission to use a bathroom, or to subject him to extreme temperatures. Since then the guidelines have been reviewed from time to time, including during the last year, in the light of the conclusions drawn from recent experience.

16. It should be noted that these guidelines are reviewed against a background of escalating terror. The years since the signing of the Oslo agreement in 1993 have been the bloodiest since the establishment of the State of Israel. During this period Palestinian terrorist groups, such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, have planned and perpetrated numerous violent attacks which have resulted in the death and injury of hundreds of innocent victims. The spate of suicide bombings on buses and public places designed to terrorize the local population has made it imperative that the defence and security services work as effectively as possible to prevent further terrorist attacks and ensure the security of the population.

17. Within the last year a number of petitions have been submitted to the Supreme Court of Israel sitting as the High Court of Justice demanding that the court issue an injunction forbidding the GSS from using any force throughout the investigation. The court's decisions have dealt with these guidelines and their implementation on a case-by-case basis. Two cases of particular significance are worth mentioning.

18. In December 1995, the High Court of Justice issued an interim injunction on the basis of a petition brought by Abd al-Halim Belbaysi against the GSS (HCJ 336/96), to abstain from the use of physical pressure against the petitioner during his interrogation. At the request of the GSS, this interim order was later cancelled after the petitioner, who had earlier signed a written declaration denying any connection on his part to any illegal activity, admitted that he had planned the heinous terrorist attack at Beit Lid on 22 January 1995 at which two suicide bombers blew themselves up and killed 21 Israelis. Belbaysi confessed that three bombs had been prepared at his home, that he himself had hidden the bombs in the vicinity of Beit Lid and that on the day of the attack he had handed over two bombs to the two suicide bombers and had driven them to the site of the attack.

19. Belbaysi also provided information which enabled the authorities to retrieve the third bomb, containing 15 kg of explosives, from its hiding place. During the investigation it also became apparent that Belbaysi had additional information regarding serious terrorist attacks in Israel planned for the near future. In order to uncover this essential information, the GSS appealed to the court asking it to cancel the injunction.

20. The court therefore accepted the argument of the GSS attorney that disclosure of this information by Belbaysi could save human lives. In light of this the court cancelled the interim injunction. At the same time the court emphasized the importance of adhering to the rule of law: "... it is clear that the cancellation of the interim order should not be seen as permission for the investigators to use measures which are not compatible with the law and the relevant guidelines."

21. In a more recent case, Muhammed Abdel Aziz Hamdan (HCJ 8049/96), the High Court again cancelled an interim injunction, which had been issued against the GSS following a petition by Hamdan, to abstain from the use of any physical pressure throughout his interrogation. This interim injunction was issued with the agreement of the GSS, who informed the court that at this stage of the investigation, they did not intend to use any physical pressure against the petitioner. However, within 24 hours, as a result of new inquiries and additional information regarding the petitioner, the GSS applied to the court for the cancellation of this interim injunction. It should be noted that Hamdan had previously been detained in 1992 at which time he admitted that he belonged to and was active in the Islamic Jihad cells. At that time he was included in the group of Islamic Jihad and Hamas activists who were deported to Lebanon. Upon his return, Hamdan was sentenced to three additional months of imprisonment, which he completed at the end of February 1994.

22. In July 1995 he was placed under administrative detention for one month, and in March 1996 he was arrested by the Palestinian Authority together with a number of activists of extreme terrorist organizations. He was released in August 1996. In October 1996, the GSS received information which raised definite suspicions that Hamdan had in his possession extremely vital information, the disclosure of which would help save human lives and prevent serious terrorist attacks in Israel, of which there was a real fear of their occurrence in the near future.

23. The conclusion was therefore reached that there was a vital need to immediately continue with the interrogation. It was at this point that the GSS petitioned the Supreme Court to cancel the interim injunction, as it was considered essential to waive the limitations of the interim injunction in order to be able to pressure Hamdan into disclosing information that could prevent danger to many human lives. The attorney for the GSS emphasized that "... the use of such pressure in the present circumstances is allowed by law". He also stated that the physical measures which the GSS wished to use did not amount to "torture" as defined in the Convention against Torture, and that each of these measures fell under the defence of "necessity" as specified in section 34 (11) of the Penal Law, the conditions of which existed in the present case. In the light of the classified information presented to the court by the GSS, the court was satisfied that there was indeed an extremely high probability that Hamdan did indeed possess extremely vital information the immediate disclosure of which would prevent a terrible disaster and save human lives. In cancelling the interim injunction, the Court stated that "After reviewing the classified material presented to us, we are satisfied that the Respondent does indeed have in his possession information on which a clear suspicion can be based that the Petitioner possesses extremely vital information, the immediate disclosure of which will prevent the most serious attacks. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that there is no justification to continue with the interim injunction. Needless to say the cancelling of the interim injunction is not tantamount to permission to use interrogation methods against the Petitioner which are against the law."

V. CONCLUSION

24. In conclusion, we would like first to note that as a result of GSS investigations of terrorist organizations' activists during the last two years, some 90 planned terrorist attacks have been foiled. Among these planned attacks are some 10 suicide bombings; 7 car-bombings; 15 kidnappings of soldiers and civilians; and some 60 attacks of different types including shootings of soldiers and civilians, hijacking of buses, stabbing and murder of Israelis, placing of explosives, etc.

25. The State of Israel prides itself on having an open society with a democratic legal system which is subject to public scrutiny and which respects human values. Israel has a unique procedure for the judicial review of complaints of alleged maltreatment or torture, namely, the Supreme Court of Israel sitting as a High Court of Justice. Anyone who believes he has been wronged - whether a citizen of Israel or someone merely under the jurisdiction of the Israeli authorities - can petition directly to the Supreme Court sitting as a High Court of Justice. Such a petition will be brought before a judge within 48 hours from the time of its submission. Every allegation of maltreatment is taken seriously and investigated. However, it should be noted that individuals arrested, tried or convicted have both personal and political motives for fabricating claims of maltreatment during interrogation. Personal motives include the desire to have a confession ruled inadmissible at trial, to present oneself as a "martyr", or to escape retribution from Palestinian terrorist cells which have often assassinated or tortured individuals who have given information to the Israeli authorities. Political motives include the desire to spread anti-Israel disinformation in the form of unfounded human rights complaints, in order to undermine Israel's human rights image or discredit the GSS.

26. It is the unfortunate reality that, during times of political unrest and violence, restrictions must be placed on individuals who threaten the welfare of the State and its citizens. This paper has been aimed at demonstrating that, despite the harsh reality of continuing terrorism faced by the State of Israel, the State does everything in its power to uphold the rights of all persons under its jurisdiction while ensuring the safety of innocent individuals.

Respondents: The General Security Service

Decision

President A. Barak

1. The Petitioner is an administrative detainee. He has been interrogated by the Respondent (General Secret Service), and has submitted a petition to this court on 12.11.96. In this petition he complained of the use of physical pressure against him during the interrogation. He requested that the Respondent show cause why he should not abstain from the use of these measures. In addition, an interim injunction was requested to prohibit the use of physical pressure until the decision is given on the petition.

The petition was scheduled for an urgent hearing on 14.11.96, and the State Attorney was informed of this on 13.11.96. The attorney for the Respondent, Mr. Shai Nitzan, asked for a postponement of the hearing. He stated that considering the short period of time that remained until the hearing he did not have enough time to carry out the necessary inquiries needed for the response to the petition. At the same time, it was noted that, "in accordance with the telephone inquiries made, the Respondent had no intention to use physical pressure against the petitioner at this stage of the interrogation.

Therefore, and without admitting to the veracity of the general facts presented in the petition, the Respondent informed the court that he agrees that an interim injunction be issued, barring the use of physical pressure against the Petitioner until the hearing of the actual petition".

On the basis of the statement an interim injunction was issued on that day - 13.11.96, as requested in the petition.

2. Today, 14.11.96, an application on the part of the Respondent has been submitted to us, asking for an urgent hearing to cancel the interim injunction. In giving the reasons for this request, Mr. Nitzan stated that numerous inquiries had been made in the meantime, that the Respondent had received the most updated information regarding the matter under discussion.

Based on this information the Respondent has decided to request that the interim injunction issued by the court be immediately cancelled.

3. In his application the Respondent stated that already in 1992 the Petitioner had been detained for interrogation. He admitted then that he belonged to and was active in the Islamic Jihad cells. At the conclusion of the interrogation he was included in the group of Islamic Jihad and Hamas activists who were deported to Lebanon. Upon his return, the Petitioner was sentenced to 3 additional months of imprisonment, which he completed at the end of February 1994.

In July 1995 he was placed under administrative detention for one month. In March 1996 he was arrested by the Palestinian Authority together with a number of activities of extreme terrorist organizations. He was released in August 1996. The Petitioner remained free for 2 months until he was arrested on 22.10.96 and placed under administrative detention. This detention was based on information which connected him to the activities in the Islamic Jihad.

4. The Respondent notes in his application that a few days before the arrest of the Petitioner the Respondent received information which raised definite suspicions that the Petitioner had in his possession extremely vital information, the disclosure of which would help save human lives and prevent serious terrorist attacks in Israel, of which there was a real fear of their occurrence in the near future. The petitioner was therefore transferred to the detention facility in Jerusalem for interrogation.

In the course of the interrogation additional information accumulated which strengthened the previous information and the fears referred to above. In his application the Respondent stated that such information has been received during the last few days, including the previous night. The Respondent reached the conclusion that there was a vital and urgent need to continue the interrogation immediately without it being subjected to the limitations included in the interim injunction. The withdrawal of these limitations is necessary in order to enable the immediate uncovering of the information in the Petitioner's possession so that danger to human life is prevented. The Respondent pointed out that in his view the use of such pressure in the present circumstances is allowed by law. As specified in Section 34(11) of the Penal Law 1977, the use of physical pressure is permitted in a situation where conditions for the defense of necessity exist.

5. We have held a hearing of this application in the evening hours. We heard the arguments presented by Mr. Nitzan. He submitted that the physical measures which the Respondent wishes to use do not amount to "torture" as defined in the International Convention Against Torture. Mr. Nitzan also noted that each of these measures falls under the defense of necessity as specified in Section 34(11) of the Penal Law, the conditions of which exist in his view in the present case. As against this view, Mr. Rosenthal noted that the use of this defense cannot be made by the Respondent's interrogators. With the consent of Mr. Rosenthal, we have heard the Respondent's interrogators who have presented to us the overall intelligence picture which relates to the Petitioner in particular.

6. After reviewing the classified material presented to us, we are satisfied that the Respondent does indeed have in his possession information on which a clear suspicion can be based that the Petitioner possesses extremely vital information, the immediate disclosure of which will prevent a terrible disaster, will save human lives, and will prevent the most serious terrorist attacks. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that there is no justification to continue with the interim injunction (see Misc. Appl. HCJ 336/96 Abd Al Halim Belbaysi vs. The General Security Service) (not published). Needless to say the cancelling of the interim injunction is not tantamount to permission to use interrogation methods against the Petitioner which are against the law. With regard to this matter, we have not been given any information regarding the methods of interrogation which the Respondent wishes to use and we are not taking any stand regarding them. Moreover, our decision applies to the interim injunction only and it does not take any final position with regard to the questions of the principle which were raised before us and which relate to the application of the defense of necessity and its scope. Therefore, we decide to cancel the interim injunction which was issued on 14.11.96.

Justice A. Matza: I agree

Report of the Committee against Torture

General Assembly
Official Records • Fifty-second Session
Supplement No. 44 (A/52/44)

United Nations • New York, 1997

M. Israel

253. The Committee considered the special report of Israel (CAT/C/33/Add.2/Rev.1) at its 295th, 296th and 297th meetings, on 7 and 9 May 1997 (CAT/C/SR.295, 296 and 297/Add.1), and adopted the following conclusions and recommendations.

1. Introduction

254. The special report of Israel was submitted on 18 February 1997, pursuant to the request contained in the letter to the Permanent Representative of Israel to the United Nations Office at Geneva, dated 22 November 1996 (see para. 25 above). It responded to a number of concerns of the Committee contained in its conclusions on the first periodic report of Israel and the Committee's reaction to certain decisions of the Supreme Court of Israel. The Committee thanks the Israeli delegation for its informative opening statement and its frank and open responses to the Committee's questions.

2. Conclusions

255. The information provided by Israel in its special report and in the opening statement of its representatives was essentially a reiteration of its position described in the initial report, namely, that interrogation, including the use of "moderate physical pressure" where it is thought that interrogatees have information of imminent attacks against the State which may involve deaths of innocent citizens, is lawful if conducted in accordance with the "Landau rules", which permit "moderate physical pressure" to be used in strictly defined interrogation circumstances.

256. It is Israel's position that interrogations pursuant to the "Landau rules" do not breach prohibitions against cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment as contained in article 16 of the Convention against Torture and do not amount to torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention.

257. However, the methods of interrogation, which were described by non-governmental organizations on the basis of accounts given to them by interrogatees and appear to be applied systematically, were neither confirmed nor denied by Israel. The Committee must therefore assume them to be accurate. Those methods include: (1) restraining in very painful conditions, (2) hooding under special conditions, (3) sounding of loud music for prolonged periods, (4) sleep deprivation for prolonged periods, (5) threats, including death threats, (6) violent shaking, and (7) using cold air to chill, and are, in the Committee's view, breaches of article 16 and also constitute torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention. This conclusion is particularly evident where such methods of interrogation are used in combination, which appears to be the standard case.

258. The Committee acknowledges the terrible dilemma that Israel confronts in dealing with terrorist threats to its security, but as a State party to the Convention Israel is precluded from raising before this Committee exceptional circumstances as justification for acts prohibited by article 1 of the Convention. This is plainly expressed in article 2 of the Convention.

259. The Committee is also concerned that the effect of the Hamdan decision by the Israeli Supreme Court dissolving the interim injunction was to allow some of the interrogation practices referred to above to continue and to legitimize them for domestic purposes.

3. Recommendations

260. The Committee recommends that:

(a) Interrogations applying the methods referred to above and any other methods that are in conflict with the provisions of articles 1 and 16 of the Convention cease immediately;

(b) The provisions of the Convention be incorporated by legislation into Israeli law, particularly the definition of torture contained in article 1 of the Convention, as is currently under consideration by the expert committee of the Ministerial Committee for Legislation;

(c) Israel consider making the declarations provided for under articles 21 and 22 and withdrawing its reservation to article 20 of the Convention;

(d) Interrogation procedures pursuant to the "Landau rules" in any event be published in full;

(e) Israel include information on the measures taken in response to these conclusions and recommendations in its second periodic report, which was due on 1 November 1996. That report should be submitted as soon as possible and in any event no later than 1 September 1997, in order to allow the Committee to consider it at its next session.

* The initial report submitted by the Government of Israel is contained in document CAT/C/16/Add.4; for its consideration by the Committee, see documents CAT/C/SR.183 and 184 and Official Records of the General Assembly, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 44 (A/49/44, paras. 159-171). For the special report, see CAT/C/33/Add.2/Rev.1; for its consideration, see CAT/C/SR.295, 296 and 297/Add.1 and Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifty-second session, Supplement No. 44 (A/52/44, paras. 253-260).

Introduction

1. This report is submitted pursuant to article 19 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, which entered into force with regard to Israel on 2 November 1991.
2. The present report supplements the initial report submitted by Israel in 1994 (CAT/C/16/Add.4) and the report submitted in 1996 (CAT/C/33/Add.2/Rev.1). Thus, for a comprehensive review it should be read in conjunction with those reports.
3. The report is divided according to the articles of the Convention. Since article 16 of the Convention widens its scope to also include a prohibition on cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, the discussion under each article should be construed as covering both torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

INFORMATION ON NEW MEASURES AND NEW DEVELOPMENTS RELATING TO THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE CONVENTION

Article 2 - Measures to prevent torture

Legislative measures bearing on the prohibition of torture and of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty

4. In 1992, the Israeli Knesset enacted the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The fundamental rights guaranteed in that basic law not only form the basis for interpretation of previous legislation and the limiting criteria for new laws; in addition, the Basic Law has itself stimulated numerous legislative efforts, in areas such as arrest and detention, searches and seizures, emergency legislation, privacy, imprisonment for civil debts, and the rights of patients, which aim to give the fullest practical realization of the principles embodied in the Basic Law.

5. Section 2 of Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity, which prohibits any "violation of the life, body or dignity of any person as such", and section 4 of the Basic Law, which grants all persons the right to protection against such violations, have constitutional status in Israel's legislative framework. The Supreme Court arguably has the power to void any legislation enacted after the entry into force of the Basic Law which violates the above provisions; previously enacted laws may not be deemed void by the Court for this reason, but they will be interpreted in accordance with the fundamental principles of the sanctity of life, integrity of the body and primacy of human dignity, broadly construed. These provisions in the Basic Law, then, may be deemed to constitute a general prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, including torture, and are binding both vis-à-vis public and private entities.

General Security Service Bill

6. The functions, powers and structure of the General Security Service (GSS) have, to date, not been determined in any law but solely, and partially, in government decisions. Over the years, a process has developed of giving expression in legislation to various powers of the GSS - for example, in the Secret Monitoring Law, 5739-1979, in the Criminal Record and Rehabilitation Law, 5741-1981, in the Privacy Protection Law, 5741-1981, in the Equal Opportunities in the Workplace Law, 5748-1988, and others. However, all of these concern only piecemeal arrangements in specific areas. The status, structure, functions and powers of the GSS and the modes of supervision over its activity have not as yet been given an overall arrangement in legislation.

7. This does not mean, of course, that the GSS exists and acts outside the law. It is a division in the Office of the Prime Minister, and the legal basis for its activity, in those areas that have not been set out in legislation, is found in government decisions, by virtue of "the general powers of government" granted to it in accordance with section 40 of Basic Law: The Government, and subject to the legal constraints on the exercise of such powers (see H.C.J. 5128/94, Federman v. Minister of Police, 48(5) P.D. 647, 651-654).

8. Over the last few decades there has been a growing international trend towards setting out, in legislation, the activities of the various secret services, and several countries have enacted laws in this area. The proposed law is intended to fill the gap in Israeli law in all matters related to the structure, purpose, functions and powers of the GSS, as well as scrutiny over its activities.

9. Because the GSS activity is, by definition, classified and protected, the efficacy of normal mechanisms of control, deterrence and balance that exist in a democratic society to guard against governmental arbitrariness and abuse of its power, such as a free press, parliamentary supervision, public opinion and judicial review, is severely limited with regard to such organizations. It is thus particularly important to create effective institutionalized arrangements and mechanisms for scrutiny, control and review of the activity of the GSS. This is achieved in the bill by a range of provisions and mechanisms.

10. Under the proposed law, the GSS will be subject to the authority of the Government, in a manner similar to the Israel Defence Forces as set out in Basic Law: The Army. The Government will appoint the Head of the GSS, on the proposal of the Prime Minister. The Government will approve the objectives of the GSS's activity, and will establish various directives regarding the fulfilment of its functions, in accordance with and subject to the provisions of the proposed law, which also include parliamentary oversight.

11. The Prime Minister is responsible for the GSS on behalf of the Government. To this end he or she has been given various powers in the proposed law, including the authority to promulgate regulations and rules, with the approval of the Ministerial Committee for Service Affairs and the Knesset Committee for Service Affairs, in all matters relating to the implementation of the law. The Prime Minister is also the person who will approve GSS Directives determined by the head of the GSS.

12. Under the proposed law, the Government has to appoint a special Ministerial Committee for Service Affairs, headed by the Prime Minister, which will act in the name of the Government in matters which the Government will determine. The law also prescribes provisions for the composition of the Committee, to ensure that it will remain compact and businesslike.

13. The Committee will have various functions, in particular with respect to scrutiny and oversight of the GSS's activity. It is empowered to approve regulations and rules in respect of the implementation of the law. It is also entitled to receive periodic reports from the head of the GSS, and may demand special reports upon request.

14. Under the proposed law, the Subcommittee for Secret Services of the Knesset Defence and Foreign Affairs Committee will be established as the "Knesset Committee for Service Affairs". Regulations and rules for the implementation of the law require the approval of this Committee. It is also entitled to receive periodic reports from the head of the GSS.

15. The proposed law determines, for the first time, the functions and powers of the GSS. The objective of the GSS consists principally of protecting the security of the State, its governance and institutions, from the threat of terrorism, espionage, and other, similar threats. To this end the task of the GSS is to foil and prevent unlawful activity aimed at harming the aforementioned objectives. The GSS is also given duties in the realm of protecting persons, information and sites, security classification and vetting, settling security procedures for bodies designated by the Government, gathering and receiving information, and giving counsel and situation appraisals to the Government and other bodies which it designates.

16. To carry out its objectives and functions, the GSS has been given various powers, including conducting investigations, gathering and receiving information, powers of arrest and search, and search powers for intelligence purposes.

17. Also, a service Comptroller, who is not an employee of the GSS, is to be appointed by the Prime Minister. The Comptroller will be subject to the provisions of the Internal Audit Law, 5752-1992, with slight modifications. Among other duties, the Comptroller is to assist the Government and the Ministerial Committee in fulfilling their various functions, and may be charged with other functions, including handling inquiries, complaints and disciplinary complaints against the GSS from the general public, as well as complaints by GSS employees.

18. In addition, the GSS will continue to be subject to the scrutiny of the State Comptroller by virtue of section 9 of the State Comptroller Law [Consolidated Version], 5718-1958, and of the Division for the Investigation of Police Misconduct in the Ministry of Justice under chapter 4.2 of the Police Ordinance [New Version], 5731-1971; and also, of course, to judicial review, first and foremost by the High Court of Justice.

19. The bill was adopted by the Israeli Government on 2 February 1998. It was then put on the Knesset table for further consideration.

Proposed amendment of the Evidence Ordinance

20. The proposed amendment seeks, inter alia, to bring the Evidence Ordinance [new Version] in line with Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity and with article 15 of the Convention. It is therefore discussed under that article.

Other measures bearing on the problem of torture and of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

The Kremnitzer Committee

21. Following a report in 1993 by the Comptroller of the Israel Police which examined the systemic response to acts of violence by police personnel, the Minister of Police (now renamed the Minister of Internal Security) appointed a public commission, headed by the former dean of the Law Faculty at the Hebrew University, Professor Mordecai Kremnitzer, to propose a plan of action for dealing with the issue. The Kremnitzer Committee, as it is called, issued its report in June 1994, which included specific recommendations for the prevention and deterrence of violence by police officers. These recommendations may be summarized as follows.

22. Prevention of police violence should be achieved by:

- (a) Improvement in screening candidates for enlistment;
- (b) Involving more women in detective and fieldwork, so as to "soften" the contact between the police and citizens;
- (c) Examining the disciplinary profile of police personnel prior to promotion;
- (d) Placing emphasis on the responsibility of commanders to transmit the educational message directly to their charges, and especially regarding the equality of all persons and the rights of minorities; and
- (e) Videotaping investigations and field operations.

23. The response to incidents of violence should include:

- (a) Distinguishing between severe violence and the use of force which does not amount to severe violence; the former cases, according to the committee's recommendation, should be adjudicated before a specially appointed Magistrate Court judge. Where there are acts attributed to a police officer and the officer admits to them, or where there exists unequivocal evidence against such officer, then dismissal from the Police should be mandatory;
- (b) Any police officer who is convicted of severe violence should likewise be dismissed; and
- (c) Occurrences of unlawful use of force which do not amount to severe violence should be dealt with in disciplinary proceedings or by senior commanding officers. Repeat occurrences should result in dismissal from the police force.

24. Following publication of the Kremnitzer Committee's report, the Israel Police adopted its recommendations, and the Minister of Police appointed an oversight committee to ensure their implementation. While the oversight committee has only recently begun to function actively, the Israel Police has taken several measures to implement the committee's recommendations, such as strict screening of candidates for enlistment in the police, including weighing of sociometric tests indicating capacity for self-control and interpersonal skills; periodic evaluations of performance; training workshops in questioning persons who are not designated as criminal suspects, as well as in prevention of violence, human rights and equality before the law (some of these workshops were taught by members of independent human rights groups); giving an annual prize for tolerance to particular precinct stations; publishing a newsletter on police ethics; and starting an experimental "community policing" project in 10 precincts. In addition, the disciplinary desk of the Israel Police was expanded to a fully-fledged department, with added personnel, to improve the efficiency and quality of handling disciplinary complaints.

25. The response of the Israel Police thus far in implementing the recommendations of the Kremnitzer Report has met with praise from at least one prominent independent civil rights group.

Public Defender's Office

26. In 1995, a national public defender's office was created by legislation. The major impetus for forming the new department derived from the difficulties encountered by the courts in appointing experienced criminal attorneys to represent indigent persons suspected of serious offences. While it is too early to assess the performance of the new, State-funded department, it is anticipated that the augmented protection of the rights of criminal defendants and detainees by a highly trained corps of criminal defence attorneys will result, among other things, in a decrease in violent treatment on the part of law enforcement officials.

Article 4 - Criminal Legislation

27. In 1994, the Penal Law was amended by a revision of the general part, which sets out the legal principles of Israeli criminal law. This amendment includes a revision of the provisions relating to attempt, assistance, encouragement and incitement. These provisions are a matter of particular importance in cases of physical or psychological abuse. The following are the relevant provisions of Chapter Five of the Penal Law, entitled "Derivative Offences"*:

* As no official translation of the amendment is yet available, the above is an unofficial translation.

"Title One: Attempt

"What constitutes an attempt

A person attempts to commit an offence, if he - with intent to commit it - commits an act that does not only constitute preparation, provided the offence was not completed.

"Commission of offence is impossible

For purposes of attempt, it shall be immaterial that the commission of the offence was impossible, because of circumstances of which the person who made the attempt was not aware or in respect of which he was mistaken.

"Special penalty for attempt

If a provision sets a mandatory penalty or a minimum penalty for an offence, then it shall not apply to an attempt to commit that offence.

"Exemption for remorse

If a person attempted to commit an offence, he shall not bear criminal liability therefor, if he proved that, of his own free will and out of contrition - he stopped its commission or substantively contributed to the prevention of results on which the completion of the offence depends; however, the aforesaid shall not derogate from his criminal liability for another completed offence connected to the same act.

"Title Two: Parties to an Offence

"Perpetrator

"(a) 'Perpetrator of an offence' includes a person who committed the offence jointly or who committed through another.

"(b) Participants in the commission of an offence, who perform acts for its commission, are joint perpetrators, and it is immaterial whether all acts were performed jointly or some were performed by one person and some by another.

"(c) A perpetrator of an offence through another is a person who contributed to the commission of the act by others who acted as his instrument, the other person being in one of the following situations, within their meaning in this Law:

- (1) he is a minor or mentally incompetent;
- (2) he lacks control;
- (3) he has no criminal intent;
- (4) he misunderstands the circumstances;

(5) he is under duress or has a justification.

"(d) for the purposes of subsection (c), if the offence is conditional on a certain perpetrator, then the person in question shall be deemed to have committed that offence even if the condition is only met by the other person.

"Incitement

If a person causes another to commit an offence by means of persuasion, encouragement, demand, cajolery or by means of anything else that constitutes the application of pressure, then he incites an offence.

"Accessory

If a person does anything, before an offence or during its commission, to make its commission possible, to support or protect it, or to prevent the perpetrator from being taken or the offence or its spoils from being discovered, or if he contributes in any other way to the creation of conditions for the commission of the offence, then he is an accessory.

"Penalty of accessory

The penalty for being an accessory to the commission of an offence shall be half the penalty determined by legislation for the commission of that offence; however, if the penalty set is:

- (1) the death penalty or mandatory life imprisonment, then his penalty shall be 20 years' imprisonment;
- (2) life imprisonment, then his penalty shall be 10 years' imprisonment;
- (3) a minimum penalty, then his penalty shall not be less than half the minimum penalty;
- (4) any mandatory penalty, then it shall be the maximum penalty and half thereof shall be the minimum penalty.

"Attempted incitement

The penalty for attempting to incite another to commit an offence shall be half the penalty for the commission of the offence itself; however, if the penalty set is:

- (1) the death penalty or mandatory life imprisonment, then his penalty shall be 20 years' imprisonment;
- (2) life imprisonment, then his penalty shall be 10 years' imprisonment;
- (3) a minimum penalty, then his penalty shall not be less than half the minimum penalty;

(4) any mandatory penalty, then it shall be the maximum penalty and half thereof shall be the minimum penalty.

"Exemption for remorse

"(a) If a person was an accessory or if he incited another to commit an offence, he shall not bear criminal liability for being an accessory or for incitement, if he prevented the commission of the offence or its completion, or if he informed the authorities of the offence in time, in order to prevent its commission or its completion, or if - to that end - he acted to the best of his ability in some other manner; however, the aforesaid shall not derogate from his criminal liability for another completed offence connected to the same act.

"(b) For the purposes of this section, 'authorities' means the Israel Police or any other body lawfully empowered to prevent the commission or completion of an offence.

"Other or additional offence

"(a) If, while committing an offence, a perpetrator also committed another or an additional offence, and if, under the circumstances, an ordinary person could have been aware of the possibility that it would be committed, then:

(1) the other joint perpetrators shall also bear liability for it; however, if the other or additional offence was committed intentionally, then the other joint perpetrators shall bear liability for it only as an offence of indifference;

(2) a person who incited or was an accessory to it shall also bear liability, as an offence of negligence, if such an offence exists based on the same facts.

"(b) If the court found an accused guilty under subsection (a) (1) for an offence for which there is a mandatory penalty, then it may impose a lighter penalty on him."

Article 10 - Education and information

Israel Police

28. The Israel Police and the Prisons Service maintain thoroughgoing training programmes for personnel at all levels, in which their obligations regarding the respect and realization of civil and human rights are taught. These training programmes take three basic forms: required courses for all entry-level personnel, and subsequently for all personnel as a condition prior to promotion in rank; voluntary continuing education seminars on specific topics, which typically last between several days and one week; and periodic refresher courses.

29. Required courses for Israel Police personnel are taught at the National Police Academy in Shfar'am or at the Senior Officers' College near Netanya. All police employees must pass a two-month basic training course, which includes a total of 47 hours of instruction in the areas of professional ethics, providing service to citizens, police powers, use of force, unlawful commands, and disciplinary violations.

30. The required courses for sergeants, captains, and senior staff officers also devote between 42 to 80 hours to instruction regarding the above matters, as well as to modules on competence in human relations, conflict resolution, investigation of police personnel, media in a democracy, citizens' complaints, family violence, treatment of juvenile offenders, legal and practical duties deriving from the right to human dignity, and inculcation of awareness of human rights. In addition, continuing education courses on specific topics, such as methods of investigation, arrest and searches, and so on, involve practical instruction in observance of human rights.

General Security Service

31. The GSS conducts courses and seminars at all levels of command and employment. These courses and seminars aim to instil principles and norms of human dignity and fundamental rights in employees, both at basic training and throughout the GSS. Special attention is given to the instruction of interrogators and their superiors. Particular emphasis is given to the rule of law and the GSS's commitment to the balance of interests required by law and by the practice of the courts.

Article 11 - Review of interrogation practices and treatment of persons subjected to detention and imprisonment

Review of interrogation practices

32. As explained under article 2, the Government of Israel recognized the importance of establishing systems of review of interrogation practices to ensure that GSS investigators do not violate the guidelines.

The State Comptroller's Office

33. In 1995, the State Comptroller's Office completed an examination of the GSS's investigator's unit during the years 1990-1992. The State Comptroller's findings, which were submitted to a special subcommittee of the Knesset State Comptroller Committee, found several instances of deviations from the Landau Commission's guidelines, and recommended measures to ensure compliance. The findings themselves have not yet been made public.

Ministerial oversight

34. In accordance with the recommendations of the Landau Commission, a special Ministerial Committee headed by the Prime Minister was established in 1988 to review the GSS interrogation guidelines periodically.

35. In April 1993, the Ministerial Committee determined that several changes should be made in the GSS guidelines. On the basis of the committee's recommendations, new guidelines were issued to GSS investigators. The new guidelines clearly stipulate that the need and justification for the use of limited pressure by investigators must be established in every case, according to its own special circumstances. The guidelines emphasize that the use of exceptional methods is intended only for situations in which vital information is being concealed, and not as a way to humiliate or mistreat those under investigation. They place a duty on the investigator to consider whether the means of pressure the use of which is being contemplated is proportional to the degree of foreseeable danger of the activity under investigation. Senior GSS staff must approve in writing the use of measures deemed to constitute moderate physical pressure, once again on a case-by-case basis, in light of the above criteria. In any case, it is expressly forbidden to injure or torture suspects, to deny them food or drink, to refuse permission to use the bathroom, or to subject the person to extreme temperatures for prolonged periods.

36. Since then, the guidelines have been reviewed from time to time by the Ministerial Committee, in the light of conclusions drawn from recent experience. The Ministerial Committee also reviews, in real time, specific cases of persons under investigation who are known to be active members of the military echelons of terror groups, and with regard to whom there are grounds to believe that they have knowledge of future terror attacks in the planning or execution stages.

Judicial review

37. All complaints of alleged mistreatment during investigation may be challenged directly to the Supreme Court sitting as a High Court of Justice. Any party who believes he or she has been wronged - not only the detainees themselves or their families, but, under the extremely flexible rules of standing in Israeli law, also virtually any person or group who claims an interest in legal or humanitarian issues involved - may have its petition heard by the High Court of Justice within 48 hours of being filed. Over the past few years several petitions have been filed with the Court seeking injunctions to forbid the GSS from using any force, or particular methods of pressure, throughout the investigation. The Court reviews each of these cases for their compliance with the detailed guidelines, and often, with the approval of the petitioner or his attorney, hears sensitive evidence in camera to examine whether the magnitude of foreseeable or imminent danger, and the grounds for believing that the suspect actually has vital information which is crucial to preventing such danger, are sufficiently clear to justify the use of the specific methods of interrogation in question. Two recent cases may be summarized briefly as follows.

38. Raaji Mahmud Saba (HCJ 5304/97) was arrested by the security services on 27 August 1997, on the grounds that he was a member of the armed wing of Hamas, the Islamic terrorist organization that has been responsible for many terrorist attacks, including the suicide bomb attacks on Israeli civilians in recent years.

39. On 14 September, Mr. Saba (through his own counsel) petitioned the Supreme Court, alleging that he was being subjected to torture during interrogation (this petition is currently pending before the Supreme Court). That same day the Supreme Court, in the light of this serious claim, made an interlocutory order requiring the Attorney-General to respond immediately to these allegations. In a night sitting on 15 September, counsel for the Attorney-General replied that no physical means of interrogation were to be used against the petitioner at this stage. As a result of this, the Supreme Court dismissed the petition, but ordered the Attorney-General to personally oversee the interrogation process, in order to ensure that no unlawful forms of interrogation were used.

40. In addition, Mr. Saba twice petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court against a decision prohibiting him from meeting with his lawyer. The Supreme Court, having heard the attorney for the GSS and having received intelligence materials submitted to it with the consent of the petitioner, decided that the measure was justifiable on security grounds and in the interests of the investigation. The prohibition against meeting with his lawyer was later lifted. Three weeks later, the Supreme Court was again petitioned by Mr. Saba (through his counsel) who complained that he had once more been denied the right to meet with his lawyer. On the same day, the Court also received a notice from the attorney representing the GSS, stating that the prohibition would cease that night. On the basis of this notice Mr. Saba's counsel withdrew the petition. The prohibition was indeed lifted that night. On 18 October, Mr. Saba's interrogation ceased, since which time he has been held in administrative detention and is due for release in April 1998.

41. A number of facts in Mr. Saba's case may be highlighted. Firstly, at no point has Mr. Saba denied the accusations against himself, namely that he is a member of the military wing of Hamas, and has himself been involved in the organization of terrorist attacks. Additionally, while the GSS admitted that his interrogation was a matter of necessity, since Mr. Saba was in possession of information that was crucial for the investigation, to prevent imminent terrorist attacks. In any event, the measures used were designed to avoid both physical and mental harm, something that has been verified by several medical examinations of Mr. Saba. Finally, it should be noted that Mr. Saba has had recourse to the highest judicial authority in the country which, because of the seriousness of Mr. Saba's allegations, heard each of his petitions immediately.

42. It should be emphasized that the Supreme Court has convened - so far - on three occasions to hear his petitions and has even instructed (in order to ensure that there is no doubt that Mr. Saba's basic rights are being respected) the Attorney-General to personally oversee the course of Mr. Saba's interrogation.

43. The second case in point is that of Abd al-Rahman Ismail Ghanimat. Mr. Ghanimat is accused of being the leader of the Surif terrorist cell, which was responsible for the killing of tens of Israeli civilians and soldiers. He has admitted in investigation that he is a member of this cell and has admitted involvement in the terrorist actions attributed to it. These actions include the following: shootings on cars driven by Israelis between November 1995 and July 1996, including gunfire attacks on 9 December 1995, in which Jonathan Moschitz (44) and his 10-year-old daughter Lior were injured; on 16 January 1996, in which Oz Tivon, a 28-year-old doctor and Yaniv Shimel, his 21-year-old passenger, were killed; on 9 June 1996, in which Yaron (26) and Efrat Unger (26), a married couple, were killed; and on 26 July 1996, in which Uri Monk (53) was killed together with his 30-year-old son Ze'ev and his 25-year-old daughter-in-law Rachel. In each of these instances, Mr. Ghanimat was personally involved.

44. Following the July murders, the cell changed its modus operandi, deciding to abduct and murder soldiers. On 9 September 1996, members of the cell abducted Sharon Edri, a 20-year-old soldier, and within minutes of taking him, murdered him. The cell attempted further abductions unsuccessfully.

45. On 21 March 1997, members of the cell bombed the Apropos cafe in Tel Aviv in which three women, Anat Winter-Rosen (31), Yael Gil'ad (32) and Michal Midan Avrahami (31), were killed and 30 civilians injured.

46. It should be noted that the uncovering of the Surif terrorist cell in the wake of the Apropos bombing, and the investigation of various members of this group, led to the discovery of a large explosive device in the village of Surif - identical to the one used in the Apropos bombing and which, according to the investigation conducted into the members of the cell, was intended for a further attack similar to the Apropos bombing. Additionally, the body of Sharon Edri, which had been missing for over six months since his abduction, was located as a result of the interrogation of members of the Surif cell.

47. Following the arrest of Mr. Ghanimat and his subsequent confession, his investigators had reasonable grounds to suspect that he was in possession of additional information which would have helped in the prevention of further imminent terrorist attacks. It is clear therefore that the methods of interrogation used against Mr. Ghanimat were necessary in order to obtain as quickly as possible information that was essential in uncovering further terrorist actions, which would have led to the loss of further civilian lives.

48. Concerning the allegation made by Mr. Ghanimat that he was not permitted to sleep and was forced to sit for hours with a thick sack over his head, the attorney for the State argued that because of the urgency of the investigation and the fact that in the opinion of the GSS, Mr. Ghanimat was in possession of information vital for the prevention of further terrorist attacks, the investigation had to be intensive and Mr. Ghanimat was indeed not permitted to sleep whenever he so desired. Nevertheless, he was allowed to sleep whenever the requirements of the investigation so permitted. With regard to the sack covering Mr. Ghanimat's head, this was only used when he was in the presence of other suspects and was simply to prevent communication between them.

49. In the light of the above, it should be clear that urgent steps were necessary in order to stop further terrorist attacks. In any event, the measures used could hardly be viewed as forms of torture in any objective sense.

50. At the end of January, the investigation was concluded and an indictment was served on Mr. Ghanimat containing several counts, including all of the incidents recounted above. A remand hearing was held on 8 February and the next hearing is due for mid-March, Mr. Ghanimat being represented by an attorney of his choice.

51. In several other cases, the Court issued interim injunctions forbidding the use of physical pressure during GSS interrogations, which remained in force throughout the investigation. See, e.g., H CJ 2210/96, Algazal v. General Security Service (not yet published). Another petition, which challenged the legality of the GSS interrogation guidelines then in force and demanded that the secret portion of the Landau Commission report be made public, was denied by the Court, inter alia because it was not linked to the application of these guidelines in the circumstances of a particular case (HCJ 2581/91, Salkhat et al. v. State of Israel et al., 47(4) P.D. 837).

Treatment of persons subjected to detention or imprisonment

52. The fundamental right of detainees and prisoners to conditions ensuring basic maintenance of their human dignity has been articulated and enforced in a long line of judgements of the Israel Supreme Court. In Yusef v. Director of Central Prison, for example, the Court held that "the order of life in the prison by its nature requires an infringement of liberties which a free person enjoys, but such infringement must derive from the nature and needs of imprisonment, and not beyond that [t]he purposes of criminal punishment may not be achieved through violation of the prisoner's dignity or his humanity It is the right of every person in Israel who is sentenced to imprisonment (or lawfully detained) to be confined in conditions that allow for civilised human life Only 'the most serious reasons', such as special security measures that must be taken, may justify any deviation from this basic approach." (HCJ 540-546/84, 40 (1) P.D. 567, 573, see also HCJ 114/86, Weill v. State of Israel et al., 41 (3) P.D. 477 (minimal civilized arrangements include the right to conjugal visits)).

53. Most of the basic conditions granted to prisoners and detainees as a matter of right, as well as limitations on measures that may impair their liberty or dignity and procedures for adjudicating prisoners' complaints, are provided for in legislation, primarily in the Prisons Ordinance [New Version], 5732-1971, and regulations thereunder. Other privileges or services have been given the status of a legal right by decisions of the Supreme Court, such as the presence in the prison facility of a social worker to deal with certain prisoner's concerns (Yusef v. Director of Central Prison, supra). Still other privileges, such as use of television and telephone, visits beyond the minimum provided by law, purchase of goods from the prison canteen, or receipt of newspapers and books, are granted as a matter of discretion by the prison director; in practice, these latter privileges are routinely granted.

Segregation and solitary confinement

54. Under section 21 (a) of the Prisons Regulations, 5738-1978, a senior prison official may order that a prisoner be confined separately from the rest of the prison population if he is convinced that doing so is necessary for reasons of State security, for maintenance of security, order or discipline in the prison, for protection of the safety or health of the prisoner or other prisoners, or at the prisoner's own request. This type of separate confinement is a preventive, not a punitive measure, and is to be distinguished from solitary confinement, which is discussed below.

55. Segregated prisoners have all of the rights and privileges of ordinary prisoners, except for conditions deriving by their nature from the fact of segregation. Such prisoners remain in their cells during the day hours, except for their daily excursion, family visits, medical care, visits with legal counsel, parole officer, social worker and so on. They are always accompanied by a warden whenever they are outside of their cell. Prisoners convicted of a criminal offence who are held in segregation for more than three months may be granted additional privileges and personal effects

(Part 14 of the Prison Commissioner's standing orders). The term of segregation is for 48 hours when ordered by a senior prison official; it may be extended for additional periods up to a total of 14 days with the consent of the director of the prison. Thereafter, separation may be extended only by order of the prison director, with the consent of the Commissioner of Prisons, provided that the justification for separation must be reviewed periodically (between 48 hours and two months, depending on the type of case in question), or at earlier intervals if the prisoner requests his separation. Any prisoner who is confined separately for a period exceeding eight months may lodge an appeal to the Commissioner of Prisons, who decides whether the separation will continue or cease. Certain classes of prisoners or detainees are segregated as a matter of law or policy from the rest of the prison population, such as known drug addicts or persons under administrative detention, and persons suspected or convicted of security-related offences.

56. Solitary confinement, on the other hand, is one of several punitive measures that may be imposed on a prisoner for violation of the prison code of conduct (section 56 of the Prisons Ordinance). Solitary confinement may be imposed only by the director or deputy director of the prison. As with all punitive measures, the decision to place a prisoner in solitary confinement may not be taken except following an investigation and a hearing at which the prisoner may hear the charges and evidence against him, and may defend himself properly (section 60 of the Prisons Ordinance). The maximum term of solitary confinement is 14 days, though the prisoner may not serve more than seven days consecutively, and must be given a break of at least seven days before solitary confinement is resumed.

57. All decisions regarding segregation and solitary confinement may be appealed directly to the appropriate District Court, and the District Court's decision may be appealed to the Supreme Court.

Contacts with the outside world

58. Immediately upon the arrest of any person, notification must be made to a relative or other person close to the detainee regarding the fact of the arrest and the place of detention.

59. Other rights of incarcerated persons to maintain contacts with the outside world vary according to the type of detention.

Visitation rights

60. Prisoners who have been convicted and sentenced for a criminal offence have the right to receive visitors, apart from legal counsel, at least once every two months, beginning after three months of imprisonment; such visitation rights may be increased as a privilege for good behaviour (section 47 (b) of the Prisons Ordinance). Persons who have been formally charged with a criminal offence have the right to receive visitors at least once a month (regulation 27A (b) of the Prison Regulations), and are to be given "every reasonable opportunity" to have contact with their friends and legal counsel (section 45 of the Prisons Ordinance). Persons who have been detained for criminal investigation, and have not yet been formally indicted, are not allowed visitors except with the permission of the police official in charge of the investigation.

61. Administrative detainees have a right to receive visits from immediate family members every two weeks; more frequent visits, as well as visits by persons other than immediate family and legal counsel, may be granted at the discretion of the director of the prison. The total number of visitors in any particular visit is limited to three persons in addition to the detainee's spouse and children, unless the prison director permits otherwise. The visitation rights of administrative detainees may be restricted only for reasons of State security. If such visitation rights are withheld for more than two months, the detainee may appeal before the Minister of Defence. All restrictions on the visitation rights of administrative detainees must be reviewed at least once every two months, if not earlier at the request of the detainee (regulation 11 of the Emergency Powers (Detention) (Conditions of Confinement in Administrative Detention) Regulations, 5741-1981). As with all decisions affecting the detainee or imprisoned convict, restrictions on visitation rights may be appealed before the District Court, and thereafter to the Supreme Court if necessary.

Correspondence

62. Prisoners who have been convicted and sentenced may write a first letter upon entering the prison, and then may write and receive correspondence freely after a period of three months. Detainees who have not been formally indicted are granted the right to maintain correspondence upon permission of the official in charge of the criminal investigation, or according to a court order. All detainees and prisoners who have the right to maintain correspondence are provided with writing paper, and may be exempt from postal expenses if the director of the prison decides that the prisoner's financial situation warrants such an exemption (regulation 32 of the Prisons Regulations).

63. Administrative detainees have the right to receive mail, and may normally send four letters and four postcards per month, not including correspondence with legal counsel or with official authorities (regulation 14 of the Emergency Powers (Detention) (Conditions of Confinement in Administrative Detention) Regulations, 5741-1981), or more with the permission of the prison director. The right of administrative detainees to send and receive mail may be restricted by the prison director if he is convinced that doing so is necessary for reasons of State security; in such circumstances, the prison director does not have to notify the detainee that a letter written by or to him has not been forwarded, except in the case of letters to or from family members (Id.).

Telephone

64. Until recently, the use of a telephone by prisoners and detainees was not granted by law, although it is routinely granted in practice. Under the recently enacted Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Arrest and Detention) Law, 5756-1996, detainees are specifically granted the right to use a telephone. Under both the current law and the previous regime, detainees who have not been formally indicted may have use of the telephone if the official in charge of the criminal investigation decides that such use will not impair a criminal investigation being undertaken at that time.

Furloughs

65. Detainees who have not yet been convicted and sentenced are not granted furloughs except by court order or by special permission in extenuating circumstances. While the right of convicted and sentenced prisoners to furloughs is not provided for in primary legislation, furloughs are granted according to the provisions of Prisons Commission standing order 12.05.01 of 1 December 1992, which has the status of law (section 80C (a) of the Prisons Ordinance). Such prisoners are categorized, within 30 days of their incarceration, into one of three groups for the purpose of determining their rights to furloughs: those who may not be granted furloughs except by permission of the Minister of Internal Security, either because their leaving the prison may pose a danger to public order and security, or due to an outstanding arrest warrant, or those who are detained by virtue of an extradition or deportation order; those who may be given furloughs according to conditions determined by the Israel Police; and those who may be granted furloughs with no such conditions. In general, prisoners have the right to furloughs after having completed one quarter of their sentence, or three years, whichever is earlier. Prisoners who are sentenced to life imprisonment may be granted furloughs only after their sentence is commuted to a specific period by the President of the State.

66. The length of the furlough is between 36 and 96 hours, and the frequency varies between once every three months and once a week (from Friday afternoon to Sunday morning), depending on the type of offence which the prisoner committed, his behaviour record in the prison, the type of rehabilitation programme in which the prisoner is participating, and other considerations. The interval between furloughs may be shortened in order to enable the prisoner to observe religious holidays outside of prison, or for family or medical reasons.

67. In addition, furloughs may be granted even though the prisoner has not completed the minimum portion of his sentence noted above, or even if the interval between furloughs has not transpired, in special circumstances, such as births, marriages or deaths in the family, memorial services, vocational testing, preparation of a rehabilitation programme, or medical reasons.

68. Persons imprisoned in the context of civil proceedings may be granted furloughs of 48 hours after having completed one quarter of their term of imprisonment or three months, whichever is earlier, and additional furloughs of 48 hours once every three months thereafter. If the term of civil imprisonment is four months or less, then the prisoner may be granted a furlough after having completed half of his sentence.

Conjugal visits

69. Under standing orders now in force, conjugal visits are allowed only for criminal prisoners who are serving long sentences and are not eligible for furloughs. The Prisons Service and the Ministry of Internal Security are currently investigating the possibility of extending this privilege to all persons incarcerated for criminal offences who are not granted furloughs.

Articles 12 and 13 - Procedures for complaints and disciplinary and criminal proceedings

70. The actions of law enforcement officials are subject to several overlapping legal institutions for review and sanctions. In general, each arm of the law enforcement authorities has disciplinary procedures, which may be initiated by the person claiming a violation, by other entities, or by the authorities themselves; all public servants are subject to the provisions of the criminal law; and detainees or prisoners may apply directly to the courts for relief against the action or decision in question.

Israel Police

71. Disciplinary proceedings are initiated by submission of a complaint to the disciplinary department of the Personnel Division at Central Headquarters or to one of its several branch offices. The Police may initiate disciplinary proceedings when it becomes aware of violations from other sources (e.g. statements of witnesses in the course of investigations or information forwarded by police personnel). In addition, the Department for Investigation of Police Personnel (DIPP) in the Ministry of Justice, which is responsible for most criminal investigations against police officers, transfers files to the Disciplinary Department of the Police both when the actions complained of fall short of a criminal offence but constitute a prima facie disciplinary violation, and also when criminal proceedings are brought against a police officer for actions which may entail parallel disciplinary sanctions.

72. If the Disciplinary Department, upon investigating the incident, finds that there is sufficient evidence of an infraction, then the matter is referred to a disciplinary tribunal, composed of either a single judge or a three-judge panel, depending on the gravity of the violation. (See generally Police (Disciplinary Proceedings) Regulations, 5749-1989; Police (Definition of Disciplinary Offences) Regulations, 5715-1955; Police Ordinance (New Version), 5731-1971, chapter 5.)

73. Alongside the disciplinary sanctions that may be imposed by a tribunal or single judge, the Police is bound to consider administrative sanctions against an officer who violates the law or internal standing orders. Administrative sanctions may be imposed at any time during the disciplinary or criminal proceedings, as well as after they are concluded. Such sanctions include dismissal from the police force, suspension, transfer to another position or department, demotion, postponement of promotion, and probation.

74. In 1992, a special department was set up at the Ministry of Justice - the Department for Investigation of Police Personnel (DIPP) - to investigate allegations of criminal conduct by police generally. Criminal investigations against police officers may be initiated by a complaint filed with the DIPP by the victim or his representative, by the DIPP itself as a result of information submitted to it by independent human rights groups or by entities within the Israel Police. A preliminary screening is carried out by a DIPP staff lawyer, who decides either to open an investigation or to close the file if the acts accused of do not give rise to a criminal offence (in the latter case the file may be transferred back to the Police for appropriate disciplinary measures). In the course of investigation, the DIPP staff takes testimony from the complainant, the suspect and other witnesses, as well as any other evidence relevant to the case. If the investigation indicates sufficient evidence of a criminal offence, then the file is transferred to the District Attorney's Office in the region where the offence occurred, or, in cases of unlawful use of force, to the State Attorney's Office, for a final decision as to whether to file criminal charges against the police officer. Under current guidelines, all criminal trials against police officers are prosecuted by the District Attorney's office. The DIPP may also decide that the police officer should stand trial in disciplinary proceedings for the unlawful use of force, in lieu of criminal proceedings.

75. Following are statistics compiled by the Israel Police and the DIPP regarding treatment of disciplinary and criminal complaints, respectively.

76. Between 1992 and July 1996, DIPP investigated 211 cases involving the use of firearms, and 25 cases involving the use of force, or threat of using force, in order to extract a confession. In 1993, 15 officers were tried in criminal proceedings for involvement in offences amounting to assault; 12 of these officers were convicted, and 3 were acquitted. In 1994, 10 officers were convicted of such offences in criminal proceedings. In one noteworthy case, 5 police investigators in the Minorities Division of the Jerusalem Region were convicted in July 1995 for unlawful use of force in investigating suspects (Cr.F. 576/91, in the Jerusalem District Court). In September 1995 the defendants were sentenced to varying terms of imprisonment. The case is currently on appeal in the Supreme Court.

77. In 1994, 22 police officers were dismissed from the force, 2 of whom as a result of their involvement in violent offences (down from 18 dismissals as a result of violent offences in 1993); 13 others were dismissed for "unsuitability", which includes those who were involved in repeated incidents of unlawful use of force (in 1993, as a result of a special effort by the Police to remove the most problematic employees, 30 officers were dismissed for unsuitability). In 1995, 29 officers were similarly dismissed for unsuitability, and no officers were dismissed in 1995 as a result of violent offences.

78. One officer was suspended in 1994 (out of a total of 20 suspensions that year) and 8 in 1995, as a result of involvement in violent offences; in 1993, no such suspensions were made.

79. Alongside the ordinary criminal and disciplinary processes described above, detainees held in police lock-ups have the right to file for habeas corpus relief against any unlawful treatment, including torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment on the part of police officers.

Prisons Service

80. Currently, the disciplinary and criminal investigation procedures regarding Prisons Service personnel differs from those followed with regard to police officers. Any prisoner or detainee under the care of the Prisons Service may file a complaint regarding ill-treatment or conditions of detention to the director of the prison. In cases involving use of force, a special committee within the Prisons Service investigates the complaint and transfers the file to the Attorney-General, who decides whether to institute disciplinary or criminal proceedings. Disciplinary trials are held before a tribunal within the Prisons Service, which is similar in structure and procedures to that of the Israel Police (see generally the Prisons Ordinance, sect. 101 et seq. and second schedule defining disciplinary offences; and the Prisons (Disciplinary Procedures) Regulations, 5749-1989), while criminal files are transferred first to the Israel Police, for completion of the investigation, and then to the appropriate District Attorney's office for filing a charge sheet.

General Security Service

81. Complaints by persons detained by the General Security Service regarding their treatment during investigation may be filed by the detainee or his or her legal representative, by local or international human rights organizations (complaints have been filed by the Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, the Physicians' Association for Human Rights, Amnesty International and the ICRC, among others). All complaints are examined by a complaints review unit within the GSS, which is subordinate to the State Attorney's Office. In the event that complaints are submitted to other governmental authorities, they are transferred to the above complaints unit, which is solely responsible for the initial investigation. Complaints that give rise to a suspicion that a criminal offence was committed are transferred to DIPP at the Ministry of Justice.

82. In 1995, 81 such complaints were received regarding treatment of detainees during GSS investigations. Thirty-four of these complaints were filed by the detainee, 23 by the detainee's legal counsel, 9 by local organizations and 15 by international organizations. In some instances, several entities filed complaints regarding a particular case. In four cases during 1995, the complaints unit found deviations from lawful authority; these cases were dealt with administratively within the GSS, including sanctions against the persons involved. In one case, that of Samed abd al Harizat, a GSS investigator was tried in disciplinary proceedings before a special tribunal.

83. Detainees in the custody of GSS also have the right to petition the High Court of Justice directly for habeas corpus relief.

General Security Service Comptroller

84. Initially, the GSS Comptroller was instructed to examine all claims of torture or maltreatment during interrogation. From 1987 until 1994, the Comptroller carried out this review function, initiating disciplinary or legal action against interrogators in cases where they have been found to have deviated from the legal guidelines.

Department for Investigation of Police Personnel

85. In 1994, in accordance with the recommendations of the Landau Commission that there be external oversight of General Security Service activities, responsibility for claims of maltreatment by GSS interrogators was also transferred to DIPP, described above, under the direct supervision of the State Attorney. The activity of DIPP appears to have had a significant deterrent impact on the incidence of intentional physical abuse of detainees and citizens by law enforcement officials, including GSS interrogators. Statistical information regarding the performance of the DIPP appears above.

Israel Defence Forces

86. The IDF maintains a strict policy of investigating every claim of mistreatment of detainees by IDF investigators. Soldiers who are found to have deviated from IDF standing orders forbidding violence or the threat of violence in interrogations are either court-martialled or have disciplinary proceedings brought against them, depending on the severity of the charges. In 1991, IDF also appointed a commission to review its interrogation practices and policies, headed by Major General (Reserve) Raphael Vardi, which resulted in the punishment of several interrogators. The Vardi Commission also submitted a list of recommendations designed to reduce the possibility of mistreatment by IDF investigators, which have been adopted.

Article 14 - Compensation to victims

87. Persons who have been subjected to torture or to any other unlawful mistreatment may, in addition to criminal, disciplinary or habeas corpus proceedings, initiate a tort action for damages against the perpetrators and against the State. In cases of assault, the State, like any private employer, is immune from liability unless it is found to have approved the unlawful assault or to have retroactively ratified it.

88. In addition, victims may receive a certain degree of compensation in the context of criminal proceedings under section 77 of the Penal Law, 5737-1977, which empowers a convicting court to order the payment to the victim of a crime for damages or suffering. Such compensation is recovered in the same manner as a fine. Currently, the maximum amount payable to a particular victim is fixed at NIS 60,000 (about US$ 17,000).

Article 15 - Rules of evidence

Goldberg Committee

89. In 1993, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Police appointed a public committee, headed by Supreme Court Justice Eliezer Goldberg, to examine the efficacy of convictions based solely or almost solely upon the defendant's confession, the availability of retrial, and other topics related to the rights of those investigated by the police. The Goldberg Committee's report, published in 1994, included recommendations aimed at ensuring that false confessions were not extracted by illegal means. Among other things, the Committee recommended employment of investigation techniques and technologies which have been developed elsewhere, and which have proven effective in fulfilling the purposes of the criminal investigation without resort to violence; increasing supervision of investigation by senior investigators; videotaping of any interview at which the interviewee's lawyer is not present; and giving the judge who presides over detention hearings more of a role in actively investigating the conditions of detention and the investigation.

90. An amendment to the Evidence Ordinance [New Version], 1971 is currently being prepared at the Ministry of Justice to implement the above recommendations of the Goldberg Committee.

91. The draft law stipulates that the statement of a defendant given outside the court shall not be admissible as evidence if it was given pursuant to inhuman treatment, real violence, physical torture, mental torture, severe humiliation, or as a result of the threat of any of the above to the defendant. However, independent evidence of guilt that was discovered by an inadmissible confession will still be admissible.

Fifty-third session
Supplement No. 44 (A/53/44)

United Nations • New York, 1998

4. Recommendations

219. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Consider the possibility of making the declaration provided for in article 22 of the Convention;

(b) Adopt all necessary safeguards for the protection of refugees from neighbouring countries, in particular so as to ensure that in case of repatriation they are not placed in the situation referred to in article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention.

N. Kuwait

220. The Committee considered the initial report of Kuwait (CAT/C/37/Add.1) at its 334th and 335th meetings, on 13 May 1998 (CAT/C/SR.334 and 335), and adopted the following conclusions and recommendations.

1. Introduction

221. Kuwait acceded to the Convention against Torture on 8 March 1996 and its initial report was due on 7 March 1997. The report was received in timely fashion on 15 October 1997.

222. The report accords generally with the guidelines for such reports.

2. Positive aspects

223. Kuwait seems to have in place the necessary legal institutions to combat torture.

224. Kuwait has confronted incidents of torture and prosecuted those responsible.

225. The Committee views as a positive step the setting up of a government-funded Torture Victims' Rehabilitation Centre in Kuwait.

3. Factors and difficulties impeding the application of the provisions of the Convention

226. The Committee is not aware of any factors that might impede the application of the provisions of the Convention.

4. Subjects of concern

227. The Committee is concerned that there is no defined crime of torture in Kuwait.

5. Recommendations

228. The Committee recommends that Kuwait consider withdrawing its reservations to the Committee's article 20 jurisdiction.

229. The Committee also recommends that Kuwait consider declaring in favour of articles 21 and 22 of the Convention.

230. The Committee further recommends that Kuwait consider enacting in its Criminal Code a defined crime of torture or, if the Convention applies by incorporation, an independent crime of torture.

231. The Committee looks forward to the additional explanations to be provided to it in writing as promised.

O. Israel

232. The Committee considered the second periodic report of Israel (CAT/C/33/Add.3) at its 336th and 337th meetings, on 14 and 18 May 1998 (CAT/C/SR.336 and 337), and adopted the following conclusions and recommendations.

1. Introduction

233. Israel signed the Convention on 22 October 1986 and deposited its instrument of ratification on 3 October 1991. The Convention entered into force in Israel on 2 November 1991. Upon ratification, Israel made a reservation in respect of articles 20 and 30. Israel has not declared in favour of articles 21 and 22. The second periodic report was due on 1 November 1996 and was received on 6 March 1998.

234. Israel had presented a special report (CAT/C/33/Add.2/Rev.1) at the Committee's request, and the Committee's conclusions and recommendations included the recommendation that the second periodic report of Israel be presented for consideration at the November 1997 session of the Committee. The second periodic report was prepared in accordance with the general guidelines concerning the form and content of such reports.

2. Positive aspects

235. Israel has embarked upon a number of reforms, such as the creation of the Office of Public Defender, the creation of the Kremnitzer Committee to recommend oversight of police violence, amendments to the Criminal Code, ministerial review of several security service interrogation practices and the creation of the Goldberg Committee relating to the rules of evidence.

236. Another positive aspect was the genuine dialogue that engaged the Committee and the Israeli delegation.

3. Factors and difficulties impeding the application of the provisions of the Convention

237. Israel points to the state of insecurity with which it copes, but the Committee notes that, pursuant to article 2, paragraph 2, this cannot justify torture.

4. Subjects of concern

238. The Committee is concerned about the following:

(a) The continued use of the "Landau rules" of interrogation permitting physical pressure by the General Security Services, based as they are upon domestic judicial adoption of the justification of necessity, a justification which is contrary to article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention;

(b) Resort to administrative detention in the occupied territories for inordinately lengthy periods and for reasons that do not bear on the risk posed by releasing some detainees;

(c) The fact that, since military law and laws going back to the Mandate pertain in the occupied territories, the liberalizing effect of the reforms referred to in paragraph 235 above will not apply there;

(d) Israel's apparent failure to implement any of the recommendations of the Committee that were expressed with regard to both the initial and the special report.⁵

5. Conclusions and recommendations

239. Israel expressed concern that the Committee had not set out in extenso the reasoning behind its conclusions and recommendations with regard to Israel's special report. Of course, the dialogue between a State and the Committee forms part of the context upon which the Committee's conclusions and recommendations are made. However, in order to ensure that there is no room for doubt, it was on the basis of the following that the Committee found that its conclusions and recommendations with regard⁶ to the Israeli special report should continue to form part of its conclusions and recommendations to the present report:

(a) Since the State party admits that it applies force or "physical pressure" to those in the custody of its officials, the State party bears the burden of persuading the Committee that such force or pressure offends neither articles 1 or 2 nor article 16 of the Convention;

(b) Since the State party admits to hooding, shackling in painful positions, sleep deprivation and shaking of detainees (through its delegates and courts, and supported by the findings of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture)⁷ the bare assertion that it is "not severe" is not in and of itself sufficient to satisfy the State's burden and justify such conduct. This is particularly so when reliable evidence from detainees and independent medical evidence made available to Israel reinforce the contrary conclusion;

(c) Given that Israel itself asserts that each case must be dealt with on its own "merits", but that for matters of security, material particulars of the interrogation cannot be revealed to the Committee, it follows that the conclusions of breach of articles 1, 2 and 16 must remain.

240. Accordingly, the Committee reaffirms its conclusions and recommendations with regard to Israel's initial and special reports:

(a) Interrogations applying the methods referred to above are in conflict with articles 1, 2 and 16 of the Convention and should cease immediately;

(b) The provisions of the Convention should be incorporated by legislation into Israeli law, particularly the definition of torture contained in article 1 of the Convention;

(c) Israel should consider withdrawing its reservations to article 20 and declaring in favour of articles 21 and 22;

(d) Interrogation procedures pursuant to the "Landau rules" should in any event be published in full.

241. The practice of administrative detention in the occupied territories should be reviewed in order to ensure its conformity with article 16.

242. The Committee would be remiss if it did not acknowledge that the Israeli delegation had initiated upon this occasion a genuine dialogue that revealed Israel's unhappiness with the current situation (without acknowledging any breach of the Convention) and its desire to cooperate with the Committee. The Committee, in its turn, respects Israel's right to present its position, even if the Committee disagrees with its reasons and conclusions, and expresses the genuine desire to continue the dialogue and to resolve the differences between Israel and itself.

P. Sri Lanka

243. The Committee considered the initial report of Sri Lanka (CAT/C/28/Add.3) at its 338th, 339th and 341st meetings, on 18 and 19 May 1998 (CAT/C/SR.338, 339 and 341), and adopted the following conclusions and recommendations.

Introduction

1. This report is submitted pursuant to article 19 of the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.
2. Israel signed the Convention on 22 October 1986 and deposited its instrument of ratification with the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 3 October 1991. In accordance with Article 27.2 of the Convention, the Convention entered into force for Israel on 2 November 1991.
3. Israel submitted an initial report in 1994 (CAT/C/16/Add.4), a special report in 1996 (CAT/C/33/Add.2/Rev.1) and a second periodic report in 1998 (CAT/C/33/Add.3).

I. INFORMATION ON NEW MEASURES AND NEW DEVELOPMENTS RELATING TO THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE CONVENTION

4. The most significant and important new development since the submission of Israel's second Periodic report to the Committee Against Torture was the decision of Israel's Supreme Court in September 1999 concerning investigation methods used by the Israel Security Agency (ISA).¹ That was the decision of the Israel Supreme Court, sitting as the High Court of Justice, in September 1999, in the case of Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel (HCJ 5100/94). A translation of that decision into English is attached to this periodic report as attachment A.
5. The Supreme Court, sitting as the High Court of Justice, had before it seven separate petitions challenging the methods used by the General Security Service (as it was then called) in the investigation of terrorist suspects. The importance of this decision is reflected in the fact that the case was heard by an expanded Supreme Court panel consisting of nine Supreme Court justices.
6. The case before the Supreme Court dealt with claims and allegations by the petitioners that certain interrogation methods used by investigators of the General Security Service during investigations were illegal. The State did not accept the contentions of the petitioners that the interrogation methods were illegal or that they constituted torture.
7. The Supreme Court in its decision did not find that the alleged interrogation methods constituted torture in violation of the Convention. In its unanimous decision, the Court held that the General Security Service was not authorized to use certain investigation methods (as set out in the Landau Commission report) that involved the use of moderate physical pressure, holding that such methods violate Israeli law.
8. The Government of Israel, in accordance with the Commissions of Inquiry Law, had appointed the Landau Commission. The Chairman of the Commission was Justice Moshe Landau, former President of Israel's Supreme Court. In the course of its inquiry, the Commission considered the legal status of the General Security Service, as well as the legality of the use of moderate means of physical pressure by investigators. Following the conclusion of its inquiry, the Commission issued a report in 1987. In its report, the Commission determined that in dealing with dangerous terrorists who pose a grave threat to the State and its inhabitants, the use of moderate physical pressure might be unavoidable if it is necessary to obtain information for the protection of human life.²

9. The Supreme Court had three issues to resolve in this case: first, the petitioners had challenged the legal authority of General Security Service investigators to conduct interrogations of suspects; secondly, if they were found to have a general authority to conduct interrogations, were they empowered to use the physical means as set out in the complaints of the petitioners; and finally, if the use of such physical methods were necessary to save human lives, could this justify endowing General Security Service investigators with the authority to use such methods in those situations.

10. As to the first issue - whether the General Security Service investigators are empowered by law to conduct investigations - the Supreme Court found that there was no specific statutory provision authorizing the General Security Service investigators to conduct investigations.³ The Court held, however, that General Security Service investigators did, in fact, have the legal authority to conduct investigations. The Court held that the statutory authority for that was to be found in section 2 (1) of the Criminal Procedure (Evidence) Ordinance. That law grants general legal authority to police officers to conduct criminal investigations. In addition, the Minister of Justice and the Minister for Public Security are authorized to empower other officials to conduct criminal investigations. The Minister of Justice, in accordance with this provision, authorized investigators of the General Security Service to conduct investigations of terrorist activities. The Court held that in view of the authorization by the Minister of Justice pursuant to this provision, investigators of the General Security Service had the same authority to conduct investigations of terrorist activities as was granted by the Ordinance to police officers to conduct investigations of criminal offences.

11. Consistent with the holding that General Security Service investigators derive their authority to investigate terrorist activities from the same statutory authorization granted to police officers, the Court determined that limitations imposed on police officers while conducting investigations of crimes also apply to General Security Service investigators. Aharon Barak, President of the Supreme Court, writing for the Court, set out this principle as follows:

“The power to interrogate given to the GSS investigator is the same interrogation power that the law bestows upon the ordinary police force investigator. It appears that the restrictions applicable to the police investigations are equally applicable to GSS investigations. There is no statutory instruction endowing a GSS investigator with special interrogation powers that are either different or more serious than those given to the police investigator. From this we conclude that a GSS investigator, whose duty is to conduct interrogation according to the law, is subject to the same restrictions applicable to a police interrogation.”⁴

12. After concluding, as set out above, that General Security Service investigators have authority to conduct investigations, the Supreme Court next examined the issue of whether that authority included the use of physical means during the course of an interrogation. In discussing the issue of the means used during an interrogation, the Court noted that, in a democratic regime, there was a clash between two values or interests:

“A democratic, freedom-loving society does not accept that investigators use any means for the purpose of uncovering the truth. ‘The interrogation practices of the police in a given regime’, noted Justice Landau, ‘are indicative of a regime’s very character’. At times, the price of truth is so high that a democratic society is not prepared to pay it ... The rules pertaining to investigations are important to a democratic State. They reflect its character. An illegal investigation harms the suspect’s human dignity. It equally harms society’s image.”⁵

13. The Supreme Court then set out certain general principles concerning the “law of interrogation”. The Court determined that:

“[A] reasonable investigation is necessarily one free of torture, free of cruel, inhuman treatment of the subject and free of any degrading handling whatsoever. There is a prohibition on the use of ‘brutal or inhuman means’ in the course of an investigation. Human dignity also includes the dignity of the suspect being interrogated ... These prohibitions are ‘absolute’. There are no exceptions to them and there is no room for balancing. Indeed, violence directed at a suspect’s body or spirit does not constitute a reasonable investigation practice.”⁶

14. After setting out the general principles concerning the means of conducting a reasonable investigation, as set out above, the Court next examined each of the specific interrogation means, which the petitioners in the case had challenged. In a decisive manner, which left no room for doubt, the Court determined as follows:

- (i) Concerning the use of shaking, the Court held that this is a prohibited investigation method, stating: “It harms the suspect’s body. It violates his dignity. It is a violent method which does not form part of a legal investigation. It surpasses that which is necessary.”⁷
- (ii) Concerning the use of having a suspect crouch on the tips of his toes for long periods of time (the “frog crouch”), the Court held that “this is a prohibited investigation method. It does not serve any purpose inherent to the investigation. It is degrading and infringes upon an individual’s human dignity.”⁸
- (iii) The Court held that painful handcuffing of a suspect is prohibited.⁹
- (iv) The Court held that seating a suspect in the “Shabach” position is likewise prohibited. The court stated that such methods “do not fall within the sphere of a ‘fair’ interrogation. They are not reasonable. They impinge upon the suspect’s dignity, his bodily integrity and his basic rights beyond what is necessary. They are not deemed as included within the general power to conduct interrogations.”¹⁰
- (v) The Court held that covering a suspect’s head with an opaque sack during interrogation is prohibited, holding that such method is not inherent to an interrogation and that it is forbidden, stating that this “is not part of a fair interrogation. It harms the suspect and his (human) image. It degrades him ...

All of these things are not included in the general authority to investigate. The covering of the head in the circumstances described ... is prohibited.”¹¹

- (vi) The Court next considered the playing of loud music while in the “Shabach” position and held that this method is prohibited.¹²
- (vii) The Court further held that the use of such methods in combination is prohibited. The Court held that this is an unacceptable method and that the “duty to safeguard the detainee’s dignity includes his right not to be degraded and not to be submitted to sub-human conditions in the course of his detention, of the sort likely to harm his health and potentially harm his dignity”.¹³
- (viii) Finally, the Court considered the use of deprivation of sleep during the course of an investigation. The Court noted that interrogations may be lengthy and as a “side effect” may cause a person not to be able to sleep during the interrogation. However, the situation changes if “sleep deprivation shifts from being a ‘side effect’ inherent to the interrogation, to [being] an end in itself. If the suspect is intentionally deprived of sleep for a prolonged period of time, for the purpose of tiring him out or ‘breaking’ him - it shall not fall within the scope of a fair and reasonable investigation. Such means harm the rights and dignity of the suspect in a manner surpassing that which is required.”¹⁴

15. The Supreme Court next considered the third issue before the Court in these applications - whether the General Security Services may employ physical means in the course of interrogations where this is necessary to save human lives - the “necessity” defence. The State had based its arguments on this issue on the text of section 34K of Israel’s Penal Law, which states as follows:

A person will not bear criminal liability for committing an act that was immediately necessary for the purpose of saving the life, liberty, body or property, either of himself or his fellow person, from a real danger of serious harm, due to the conditions prevalent at the time the act was committed, there being no alternative means for avoiding the harm.”

16. The State contended that investigators are entitled to use moderate physical pressure as a last resort in order to save human lives. The President of the Supreme Court, in the first paragraph of the judgement, described the background of constant threats to Israel’s security and its civilian population posed by terrorists and terrorist acts, stating:

“The State of Israel has been engaged in an unceasing struggle for both its very existence and security, from the day of its founding. Terrorist organizations have established as their goal Israel’s annihilation. Terrorist acts and the general disruption of order are their means of choice. In employing such methods, these groups do not distinguish between civilian and military targets. They carry out terrorist attacks in which scores are murdered in public areas, public transportation, city squares and centres, theatres and coffee shops. They do not distinguish between men, women and children. They act out of cruelty and without mercy.”¹⁵

17. The Court pointed out that many attacks planned by terrorists had been successfully prevented due to investigation by the authorities responsible for fighting terrorism, and that the main organization responsible for fighting terrorism in Israel was the General Security Service. The State had argued that such means of investigation were employed only when necessary to save human lives, and that the above section of the Penal Law provided that in such circumstances these methods did not constitute a criminal offence. The State contended that as such action, in such circumstances, does not constitute a crime, there is no reason to prohibit it ab initio, and that the use of such methods should not be prohibited in such circumstances.¹⁶

18. The Court in its decision held that while there were differences of opinion on this issue, it was ready to assume that if an investigator used physical means in the course of an investigation, under the circumstances set out in the statute, and if he were indicted for having used such means, this defence might be available to him. However, the Court held that the “necessity” defence in the case of a criminal trial of the investigator could not serve as a statutory basis for authorizing, in advance, the use of such means in the course of an investigation. The fact that a certain action did not constitute a criminal offence did not authorize an investigator to use that method in the course of an investigation. The Court held:

“The ‘necessity’ defense does not constitute a source of authority, allowing GSS investigators to make use of physical means during the course of interrogations ... [T]he ‘necessity’ defense has the effect of allowing one who acts under the circumstances of ‘necessity’ to escape criminal liability ... [I]t does not authorize the use of physical means for the purposes of allowing investigators to execute their duties in circumstances of necessity. The very fact that a particular act does not constitute a criminal act (due to the ‘necessity’ defense) does not in itself authorize the administration to carry out this deed and in doing so infringe upon human rights. The Rule of Law requires that an infringement of a human right be prescribed by statute, authorizing the administration to this effect. The lifting of criminal responsibility does not imply authorization to infringe upon a human right.”¹⁷

19. In conclusion, the Supreme Court nullified the general directives that authorized the use during an interrogation of physical means that infringe upon a suspect’s liberty.¹⁸

20. The importance, significance and difficulty of the Supreme Court decision must be viewed against the background that Israel’s citizens and residents are under constant threat of murderous terrorist acts by persons who have no respect for the rule of law. The justices pointed this out in their decision. After recalling the difficult security situation facing Israel, as set out in paragraph 1 of the judgement, the justices acknowledged that this decision would not make it easier for the security forces to deal with this situation. However, the Court noted:

“This is the destiny of democracy, as not all means are acceptable to it, and not all practices employed by its enemies are open before it ... Deciding these applications weighed heavily on this Court. True, from the legal perspective, the road before us is smooth. We are, however, part of Israeli society. Its problems are known to us and we live its history. We are not isolated in an ivory tower. We live the life of this country. We are aware of the harsh reality of terrorism in which we are, at times, immersed. Our apprehension is that this decision will hamper the ability to properly deal with terrorists and terrorism which disturbs us. We are, however, judges. Our brethren require us to act according to the law. This is equally the standard that we set for ourselves. When we sit to judge, we are being judged. Therefore, we must act according to our purest conscience when we decide the law.”¹⁹

Developments in the aftermath of the Supreme Court decision

The effect within the ISA

21. The Supreme Court decision, summarized above, had an immediate and profound effect on the conduct of all investigations by the Israel Security Agency (ISA).

22. The Israel Security Agency has always conducted investigations in accordance with the directives pertaining to such investigations. On the day that the Supreme Court decision was announced, 6 September 1999, the authorities of the ISA issued a directive to all personnel, including all investigators, directing that the decision of the Court should be strictly adhered to in all investigations conducted by the ISA.

23. While the present period of terrorism and terrorist activities against Israeli citizens and residents is a most difficult period, the investigators of the ISA are required to strictly adhere to the principles set out in the Supreme Court decision. If any investigator is found to have used physical pressure against a suspect during an investigation he will be disciplined, and where necessary will be dismissed from the Agency.

24. The principles set out in the Supreme Court decision, and the rules that now apply within the ISA as a result of that decision, are included in required courses, educational seminars and training programmes for all levels of ISA personnel.

Complaints concerning alleged misconduct by police personnel or by investigators of the Israel Security Agency

25. Persons who are detained by the Israel Police or by the Israel Security Agency for purposes of investigation are entitled to file complaints concerning any alleged mistreatment during such investigations. All such complaints are thoroughly investigated. The procedure followed in the investigation of such complaints will depend on whether the complaint involves a disciplinary action or a criminal offence.

26. If such investigation reveals a suspicion that a criminal offence may have been committed, the complaint is investigated by a special department within the Ministry of Justice - the Department for the Investigation of Police Misconduct (DIPM), which is directly responsible to the State Attorney. Any use of actual physical violence against a detainee is always treated and investigated as a criminal offence. During such investigation, the staff of the DIPM takes evidence from the complainant, from other witnesses and from the suspect. If the investigation reveals evidence of a criminal offence, the case is transferred to the office of the District Attorney in the area where the offence occurred for a final decision on whether to file an indictment. The DIPM may also decide that the police officer or the ISA investigator should be the subject of disciplinary action, in lieu of, or in addition to, the criminal proceedings.

27. If the case involves disciplinary action to be taken against police personnel, the file in the complaint will be transferred for investigation and action by the Disciplinary Department of the Israel Police at the National Police Headquarters.

28. If the case involves disciplinary action to be taken against an investigator of the Israel Security Agency, an attorney in charge of the unit for this purpose in the office of the State Attorney at the Ministry of Justice conducts the investigation concerning the complaint. The attorney responsible for this unit states that since the Supreme Court decision in September 1999, it has been the strict policy of the Israel Security Agency that the ISA personnel may not use during the course of an investigation any of the interrogation methods which the Court held to be illegal. Indeed, since that decision, this unit has not received complaints from detainees alleging the use of such interrogation methods.

29. In addition, the Israel Security Agency has taken steps, with the assistance of the attorney in charge of this unit at the Ministry of Justice, to ensure that major improvements have been made in the living conditions of security prisoners and detainees held in detention in Israel's prisons.

30. One case currently being investigated by the DIPM may be of interest. It may be recalled that in October 2000, two Israeli reserve soldiers, made a wrong turn while driving in their car and mistakenly entered territory under the control of the Palestinian Authority. They were detained by Palestinian police at a checkpoint. The Israeli reserve soldiers were taken to a police station in the Palestinian town of Ramallah. There an unruly crowd, including Palestinian police, took part in a cruel and savage lynching of the two reserve soldiers and brutally murdered them. The bodies of the two men were thrown out to the crowd waiting outside, which mutilated their bodies. All of this was seen on live television worldwide. The Israeli security forces succeeded in arresting some of those responsible for these brutal acts of murder. One of those who were arrested complained of physical mistreatment during his interrogation at a Jerusalem police station. The State of Israel maintains that the basic human rights of all persons under its jurisdiction must never be infringed, regardless of the crimes the person or persons are suspected of having committed. The above complaint is currently being thoroughly investigated by the DIPM and, if shown to be true, disciplinary or criminal actions will be taken against the police personnel responsible.

Petitions to Israel's High Court of Justice

31. Petitions by detainees complaining of mistreatment during ISA investigations may be heard by Israel's Supreme Court, sitting as the High Court of Justice. A detainee, his family, or any person or group that claims an interest in legal or humanitarian issues, may file a petition with the High Court of Justice to seek an injunction to forbid the Israel Security Agency from using improper force or improper physical pressure during investigation. A number of such petitions have, in fact, been filed with and been heard by the High Court of Justice in the past.

32. Since the Supreme Court decision in September 1999 (reported above), two petitions have been filed with the High Court of Justice complaining of physical mistreatment during investigation by the Israel Security Agency. After these complaints were investigated by the authorities and found to be groundless, the petitioners withdrew their applications to the Court.

Legislative developments since the second periodic report

Legislative background

33. Acts of torture are designated as criminal offences under Israel's penal law. This law strictly forbids all forms of torture or other mistreatment.

34. Section 277 of Israel's Penal Law of 1977 specifically relates to the prohibition of acts of torture or other mistreatment by public servants. This section provides as follows:

“277. Oppression by Public Servant

A public servant who does one of the following is liable to imprisonment for three years:

- (1) uses or directs the use of force or violence against a person for the purpose of extorting from him or from anyone in whom he is interested a confession or information relating to an offence;
- (2) threatens any person, or directs any person to be threatened, with injury to his person or property or to the person or property of anyone in whom he is interested for the purpose of extorting from him a confession of an offence or any information relating to an offence.”

35. Sections 427 and 428 of Israel's Penal Law of 1977 makes it a criminal offence to unlawfully use force or threats to force a person to do some act. These sections relate to such unlawful acts by the general public, including, of course, all State employees.

36. Section 427 provides:

“427. Blackmail with Use of Force

- (a) A person who unlawfully uses force to induce a person to do some act or to refrain from doing an act which he is permitted to do is liable to imprisonment for seven years or, if the use of force leads to the doing or omission of the act, nine years ...”

37. Section 428 provides:

“428. Blackmail by means of threats

- (a) A person who, in writing or by word of mouth, threatens a person with unlawful injury to his or another person's body, freedom, property, reputation or livelihood unless he does some act or refrains from doing an act which he is permitted to do is liable to imprisonment for three years or, if the act is done or omitted because of or at the time of the threat, nine years ...”

38. The above provisions in Israel’s Penal Law effectively provide that all acts of torture, as defined in article 1 of the Convention, are criminal offences under Israeli law.

39. In addition to the prohibition of torture as set out in Israel’s Penal Law, the prohibition against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is anchored in Israel’s Basic Law. This is set out in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, which was adopted by the Knesset in 1992, after Israel ratified the Convention against Torture. A translation of this Basic Law into English is provided in attachment B.

Legislation concerning Israel’s Security Agency

40. Following a comprehensive examination of the significance of the Supreme Court judgement in the case of Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel (HCJ 5100/94), and notwithstanding the serious limitations that the Court’s decision places on the ability and effectiveness of the security service to prevent ongoing terrorist attacks, the Israeli Government has decided not to initiate legislation that would authorize the use of physical means in investigations conducted by the ISA. The Government decided, instead, to focus on the improvement and strengthening of the ISA’s general capabilities by an increase in manpower, improved technological equipment and similar measures. A special working group, headed by the Minister of Justice and the Deputy Minister of Defense, was appointed to seek effective means to implement this governmental decision.

41. A private member’s bill was submitted to the Knesset by a group of Knesset members that would authorize the use of limited physical means of investigation in certain specific circumstances. The ministerial committee of the Government, headed by the Minister of Justice, opposed this proposed bill. This private member’s bill has yet to be brought to a preliminary hearing before the Knesset. The Prime Minister of Israel publicly rejected the provisions of this private bill during a plenum session of the Knesset.

42. As reported in Israel’s previous periodic report, the Government proposed a new law to the Knesset in February 1998 that would govern the structure and activities of the Israel Security Agency. This proposed new legislation, among other provisions, would provide new, additional mechanisms for the review of the activities of the ISA. The new proposed mechanisms would be in addition to current mechanisms for review, which include the possibility of petitions to the court system and investigations by the State Comptroller. This proposed legislation contains no provisions concerning the investigative methods which investigators of the ISA are permitted to use. This proposed law has passed its first reading in the Knesset and was transferred for further consideration to a special joint Knesset committee consisting of the Knesset Constitution, Law and Justice Committee and the Knesset Security and Foreign Affairs Committee.

43. In accordance with the proposed law, the ISA will be subject to the authority of the Government. The Government will appoint the director of the ISA, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. The proposed law provides that a special ministerial committee of the Government will be established which will be responsible for ministerial scrutiny and oversight of the ISA. The law also provides for parliamentary oversight of the activities of the ISA, which will be provided by a special committee of the Knesset. The proposed law further sets out the functions and powers of the ISA. The objectives of the ISA will include protecting the security of the State and protection for State authorities and State institutions from terrorism, espionage and other similar threats. The ISA would be given authority and power under the law to conduct investigations. The director of the ISA will provide periodic reports to the ministerial committee and to the Knesset committee.

44. This proposed law is currently pending before the aforementioned special joint committee of the Knesset.

II. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION REQUESTED BY THE COMMITTEE

45. The Committee, in its concluding observations following its consideration of Israel's second periodic report (A/53/44, paras. 232-242), did not request any additional information from the State of Israel.

III. COMPLIANCE WITH THE COMMITTEE'S CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

46. The Committee, in its concluding observations on Israel's second periodic report (A/53/44, paras. 232-242), made the following conclusions and recommendations (paras. 240-241):

Paragraph 240 (a) "Interrogations applying the methods referred to above are in conflict with articles 1, 2, and 16 of the Convention and should cease immediately."

47. As set out in Israel's previous reports to the Committee, Israel asserts that the methods which had been employed in investigations by Israel's security service (referred to as the "Landau Rules") do not constitute torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and do not violate the provisions of the Convention.

48. Israel's Supreme Court, in a judgement handed down in September 1999, (Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel), ruled that such interrogation methods are illegal under Israeli law, as they infringe on the dignity of the person being investigated. The Court, in its judgement, did not reject the arguments of the State that such interrogation methods did not constitute torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and do not violate the Convention. The judgement of the Supreme Court is summarized in part I of this third periodic report. An English translation of that decision is contained in attachment A to this report.

Paragraph 240 (b) "The provisions of the Convention should be incorporated by legislation into Israeli law, particularly the definition of torture contained in article 1 of the Convention."

49. As stated in part I of this report, sections 277, 427 and 428 of Israel's Penal Law of 1977 (the texts of these sections are set out in part I of this report) strictly forbid all forms of torture or maltreatment. Thus all acts of torture, as defined in article 1 of the Convention, are criminal acts under Israel's Penal Law. In addition, all forms of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by Israel's Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, which is set out in full as attachment B to this periodic report. This Basic Law has constitutional status within Israel's legislative framework. Section 2 of the Basic Law prohibits any violation of the life, body or dignity of any person. Section 4 guarantees to all persons the right to protection of their life, body and dignity. These provisions of the Basic Law constitute a prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, including torture. The Israeli Knesset enacted this Basic Law in 1992, after Israel ratified the Convention against Torture.

50. Following the unanimous decision of Israel's Supreme Court, in the case of Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel (as summarized in part I), it is clear that all provisions of the Convention are, in fact, a part of Israeli law. It is clear that any action that would constitute a violation of the Convention is a violation of the law of Israel and is prohibited under the law in Israel.

Paragraph 240 (c) "Israel should consider withdrawing its reservations to article 20 and declaring in favour of articles 21 and 22."

51. Upon ratifying the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, the State of Israel declared that in accordance with article 28 of the Convention, it did not recognize the competence of the Committee provided in article 20. Furthermore, the State of Israel did not declare in favour of articles 21 and 22 of the Convention, which recognize the competence of the Committee to receive and consider complaints from other States parties or from individuals, respectively.

52. Having reviewed the above declaration in light of the Committee's recommendations, Israel maintains that it is unlikely that the circumstances in the foreseeable future will permit it to change its position. However, Israel will continue to review its position in this regard.

Paragraph 240 (d) "Interrogation procedures pursuant to the 'Landau rules' should in any event be published in full."

53. Israel's Supreme Court, in its judgement in the case of Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel (as reported herein), held that interrogation procedures pursuant to the "Landau rules" are illegal under Israel's law. Since September 1999, such methods are no longer used by Israel's security service. For this reason, the publication of such rules is no longer relevant.

Paragraph 241 "The practice of administrative detention in the occupied territories should be reviewed in order to ensure its conformity with article 16."

54. Israel wishes to report that there has recently been a drastic reduction in the number of persons held in administrative detention, and at the present there are 11 persons being held in administrative detention for security reasons. In addition, no persons are being held in administrative detention in the occupied territories. The conditions in which such persons are held in administrative detention do conform to article 16. Those held in administrative detention have the right to file petitions with the Courts in Israel to review the legality of their being held in detention, including the legality of the conditions of their detention.

United Nations

Report of the Committee against Torture

Twenty-seventh session
(12-23 November 2001)

Twenty-eighth session
(29 April-17 May 2002)

General Assembly

Official Records

Fifty-seventh session

Supplement No. 44 (A/57/44)

(p) Include, in its next periodic report, statistical data regarding torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, disaggregated by, inter alia, gender, ethnic group, geographical region, and type and location of detention. In addition, information should be provided regarding complaints and cases heard by domestic bodies, including the results of investigations made and the consequence for the victims in terms of redress and compensation;

(q) Widely disseminate the Committee's conclusions and recommendations throughout the country, in all appropriate languages.

Comments by the Government of Indonesia

46. The Committee considered the note verbale dated 7 December 2001 from the Permanent Mission of Indonesia to the United Nations Office at Geneva containing comments and additional information on the conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Committee. The Committee thanks the Government of Indonesia for the note and welcomes the significant number of legal and institutional reforms which are currently under way in Indonesia. The contents of the note verbale will be reproduced in document CAT/C/GC/2001/1.

Israel

47. The Committee considered the third periodic report of Israel (CAT/C/54/Add.1) at its 495th and 498th meetings, on 20 and 21 November 2001 (CAT/C/SR.495 and 498), and adopted the following conclusions and recommendations.

A. Introduction

48. The Committee welcomes the third periodic report of Israel, due on 1 November 2000 and received on 15 March 2001. The report is in full conformity with the guidelines of the Committee on the preparation of State party periodic reports.

49. The Committee compliments the State party for ensuring the submission of its periodic reports in a timely fashion and welcomes the continuation of a constructive dialogue with Israel.

B. Positive aspects

50. The Committee welcomes the following:

(a) The September 1999 Supreme Court judgement in the case of Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. The State of Israel which held that the use of certain interrogation methods by the Israel Security Agency (ISA) involving the use of "moderate physical pressure" was illegal as it violated constitutional protection of the individual's right to dignity;

(b) The issuance by authorities of the ISA of a directive to all personnel that the decision of the Court should be strictly adhered to in all investigations conducted by the ISA;

(c) The decision by the Government of Israel not to initiate legislation that would authorize the use of physical means in interrogations conducted by the police or the ISA;

(d) The Israeli Supreme Court decision of April 2000 according to which the continued detention of Lebanese detainees held in Israel who did not constitute a threat to national security could not be authorized and the subsequent release of many Lebanese detainees;

(e) Israel's regular contribution to the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture;

(f) The provision of prompt judicial review of persons under detention upon their petition to the Supreme Court;

(g) The transfer, in 1994, of the responsibility for investigation of complaints against the ISA to the Ministry of Justice;

(h) The creation of a judicial commission of inquiry into the events of October 2000, which resulted in the death of 14 persons.

C. Factors and difficulties impeding the application of the Convention

51. The Committee is fully aware of the difficult situation of unrest faced by Israel, particularly in the Occupied Territories, and understands its security concerns. While recognizing the right of Israel to protect its citizens from violence, it reiterates that no exceptional circumstances may be invoked as justification of torture (art. 2, para. 2, of the Convention).

D. Subjects of concern

52. The Committee expresses concern about the following matters:

(a) While acknowledging the importance of the September 1999 Supreme Court decision, the Committee regrets certain of its consequences:

(i) The ruling does not contain a definite prohibition of torture;

(ii) The Court prohibits the use of sleep deprivation for the purpose of breaking the detainee, but stated that if it was merely incidental to interrogation, it was not unlawful. In practice, in cases of prolonged interrogation it is impossible to distinguish between the two conditions;

(iii) The Court indicated that ISA interrogators who use physical pressure in extreme circumstances ("ticking bomb cases") might not be criminally liable as they may be able to rely on the "defence of necessity";

(b) Despite the Israeli argument that all acts of torture, as defined in article 1 of the Convention, are criminal offences under Israeli law, the Committee remains unconvinced and reiterates its concern that torture as defined by the Convention has not yet been incorporated into domestic legislation;

(c) Allegations continue to be received concerning the use of interrogation methods by the ISA against Palestinian detainees that were prohibited by the September 1999 ruling of the Supreme Court;

(d) Torture and ill-treatment of Palestinian minors is alleged, in particular of those detained in the Gush Etzion police station. The difference in the definition of a child in Israel and in the Occupied Territories is also a matter of concern. While under Israeli law majority is attained at the age of 18, military order No. 132 defines a minor as someone under the age of 16. (In Israel, including the Occupied Territories, no minors under the age of 12 years can be held criminally responsible);

(e) While noting a substantial decrease since the examination of its previous report in the number of persons held in administrative detention, the Committee continues to be concerned that administrative detention does not conform with article 16 of the Convention;

(f) The continued use of incommunicado detention, even in the case of children, is a matter of grave concern to the Committee;

(g) Despite the numerous allegations of torture and ill-treatment by law enforcement officials received by the Committee, very few prosecutions have been initiated against alleged perpetrators;

(h) While noting that according to the delegation any allegation of physical violence against a detainee is always treated and investigated as a criminal offence, the Committee is concerned that the Department for the Investigation of Police Misconduct (DIPM) may decide that a police officer or ISA investigator should only be subject to disciplinary action, in lieu of criminal proceedings. This may amount to a violation of article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention;

(i) Israeli policies on closure may, in certain instances, amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (article 16 of the Convention);

(j) Israeli policies on house demolitions may, in certain instances, amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (article 16 of the Convention);

(k) The judicial practice of admitting objective evidence derived from an inadmissible confession is of concern to the Committee;

(l) The Committee is also concerned at instances of “extrajudicial killings” drawn to its attention.

E. Recommendations

53. The Committee makes the following recommendations:

(a) The provisions of the Convention should be incorporated by legislation into the domestic law of Israel; in particular, a crime of torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention should be enacted;

(b) The practice of administrative detention in the Occupied Territories should be reviewed in order to ensure its conformity with article 16;

(c) The State party should review its laws and policies so as to ensure that all detainees, without exception, are brought promptly before a judge and are ensured prompt access to a lawyer;

(d) The State party should ensure that interrogation methods prohibited by the Convention are not utilized by either the police or the ISA in any circumstances;

(e) In view of the numerous allegations of torture and other ill-treatment by law enforcement personnel, the State party should take all necessary effective steps to prevent the crime of torture and other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and institute effective complaint, investigative and prosecution mechanisms relating thereto;

(f) All victims of torture and ill-treatment should be granted effective access to appropriate rehabilitation and compensation measures;

(g) The State party should desist from the policies of closure and house demolition where they offend article 16 of the Convention;

(h) The State party should intensify human rights education and training activities, in particular concerning the Convention, for the ISA, the Israel Defence Forces, police and medical doctors;

(i) Necessity as a possible justification for the crime of torture should be removed from the domestic law;

(j) Such legislative measures as are necessary should be taken to ensure the exclusion of not merely a confession extorted by torture, but also any evidence derived from such confession;

(k) Israel should consider withdrawing its reservation to article 20 and declaring in favour of articles 21 and 22.

Introduction

1. The Government of the State of Israel is pleased to submit its Fourth Periodic Report Concerning the Implementation of the United Nations Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. This Report describes the developments that took place since the submission of the Third Report in 2001 pursuant to article 19 of the Convention. In accordance with the reporting guidelines, this Report builds upon our previous reports.
2. Israel signed the Convention on 22 October 1986, and deposited its instrument of ratification with the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 3 October 1991. In accordance with Article 27(2), the Convention entered into force for Israel on 2 November 1991.
3. Israel submitted an initial report in 1994 (CAT/C/16/Add.4), a special report in 1996 (CAT/C/33/Add.2/Rev.1), a second periodic report in 1998 (CAT/C/33/ Add.3) and a third periodic report in 2001 (CAT/5/54/Add.1).
4. This Report was compiled by the Department for International Agreements and International Litigation in the Ministry of Justice.
5. The following is a short summary of the major changes since the submission of Israel's previous report; a full and complete description shall follow, as well as responses and additional relevant data to the committee's previous concluding observations.
6. In the realm of legislation, the State of Israel has concluded the Israel Security Agency Law, 5762-2002, regularizing the activities of its security agency.
7. Israel also amended its Extradition Law, 5714-1954 ("the Extradition Law"), to permit extradition of nationals in all cases. However, under the Amendment, the extradition of any person who is an Israeli citizen and resident at the time the offence was committed, is subject to a condition that he¹ be permitted by the requesting state to serve any sentence imposed on him following his extradition in Israel.
8. On 26 June 2006, the Knesset approved the Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) (Temporary Provision) Law, 2006, that constitutes a Temporary Provision set for a defined period of 18 months, and also establishes specific provisions regarding delay in arraignment before a judge, as detailed in sections 95-100 below.
9. The courts play a pivotal role in promoting the Convention in Israel through their judicial decisions. Such a ruling since the submission of Israel's previous report is the May 2006 Supreme Court landmark decision laying down a court-made doctrine on the exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence. The Court held that under appropriate circumstances, substantial illegality in obtaining the evidence shall lead to its exclusion, even if there is no suspicion as to the veracity of its content. (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al., as detailed in sections 80-85 below.

10. The Military Court of Appeals in A. 153/03 Geva Sagi v. Chief Military Prosecutor, accepted an appeal by the Military Prosecution against the ruling of the special court which convicted lieutenant colonel Geva Sagi, upon his confession, of an “inappropriate behaviour”, as detailed in sections 57-65 below. The court demoted lieutenant colonel Geva to the rank of a First Lieutenant and described his threats as “shameful and extremely ugly”, directly citing the Convention and previous High Court of Justice rulings.

11. In addition, law enforcement agencies continue to undergo comprehensive training regarding the Convention, its contents and values, to ensure that those are instilled among law enforcement personnel.

12. Educational programs run by the Police Education and Information Section are one example of law enforcement training. Such programs aim at assimilating various values among police officers, including human rights, tolerance in a multicultural society, elimination of prejudice, as well as issues relating to the Convention and its values. The Police School for Investigation and Intelligence incorporates the main provisions of the Convention regarding procedures and investigation ethics into the training of investigators and investigation officers.

13. The instruction of the Israel Security Agency (hereinafter “ISA”) interrogators includes various components, such as training regarding the main issues of the Convention, its implications on interrogation methods, and the Supreme Court’s landmark ruling in H CJ 5100/94, Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel. These contents are also an integral part of the ISA courses and seminars, both at basic training, and regular courses throughout the ISA.

14. The School for Military Law holds specific training activities for Israel Defence Forces (hereinafter “IDF”) regarding human rights in general, and the prohibition on the use of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, in particular. These activities include lectures, producing learning aids and circulating informational material.

15. The Israel Prisons Service (hereinafter “IPS”) officers and wardens undergo regular training and instructions through courses held in the Nir School for IPS officers and wardens, as well as in their respective units. Training regarding the Convention is an integral part of the IPS training at the individual unit level, in addition to the courses given to officers and wardens.

I. INFORMATION ON NEW MEASURES AND NEW DEVELOPMENTS RELATING TO THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE CONVENTION

16. As detailed in previous reports, Israel took upon itself to legislate a specific law regarding the ISA. The enactment of the Israel Security Agency Law, 5762-2000 is the most significant new development since the submission of Israel’s third periodic report to this committee. This law addresses the major relevant issues concerning the mandate, operation, and scope of functioning of the ISA, as will be discussed below. [A translation is attached to this periodic report and marked "A".]

17. The Law states that the head of the Agency shall be appointed for a five-year term by the Government upon the proposal of the Prime Minister, unless the Government has prescribed a shorter term in its appointment resolution. The head of the Agency shall be in charge of the administration and operation of the ISA as well as the development of its capabilities.
18. The law specifically provides that the Prime Minister shall be in charge of the ISA on behalf of the Government; no mission shall be imposed on the ISA for the promotion of party-political interests.
19. The law also establishes a Ministerial Committee for the ISA which shall operate on its behalf in matters prescribed and be composed of five members, including the Prime Minister, the Minister of Defence, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Public Security.
20. Section 7 of the law details the mission of the Agency, as follows:

“The Agency shall be in charge of the protection of State security and the order and institutions of the democratic regime against threats of terrorism, sabotage, subversion, espionage and disclosure of State secrets; and the Agency shall also act to safeguard and promote other State interests vital for national State security, all as prescribed by the Government and subject to every law.”
21. Next, the law particulates the ISA’s functions:
 - “(1) foiling and preventing illegal activities aimed at harming State security, or the order or institutions of the democratic regime;
 - (2) protecting persons, information and places determined by the Government;
 - (3) determining directives on security classification for positions and offices in the public service and in other bodies, as determined by the Government, except for public appointees and judges; and determining the security suitability of a person for a position or office that holds a security classification, including by the use of polygraph tests, all as shall be prescribed by rules. In this paragraph, “judges” means any person holding judicial authority under the Basic Law: Judicature, except candidates for the judiciary and except a military judge under the Military Justice Law, 5715-1955 (“Military Justice Law”);
 - (4) establishing protection practices for bodies determined by the Government;
 - (5) conducting intelligence research and providing advice and position appraisals for the Government and other bodies determined by the Government;
 - (6) activities in any other area determined by the Government, with the approval of the Knesset Service Affairs Committee, which is designed to safeguard and promote State interests vital to the national security of the State;

- (7) collection and receipt of information for safeguarding and promoting the interests set forth in this section.

22. Section 8 to this law also grants the ISA the following general powers for the purpose of fulfilling its functions in the receipt and collection of information: to pass on information to other bodies in accordance with rules to be prescribed and subject to the provisions of any law; to investigate suspects and suspicions in connection with the commission of offences or to conduct investigations for the purpose of preventing offences in certain prescribed areas; to enlist the assistance of any person who is not an ISA employee for the carrying out of tasks in accordance with rules to be prescribed; ISA officials shall have the powers of a police officers to fulfil certain functions, following authorization from the head of the ISA to enter certain premises not being a closed private structure, in order to conduct inspections and to carry out protective and preventative actions for a limited period.

23. Section 12 compels routine reports of the head of the ISA to the Ministerial Committee and to the Knesset Service Affairs Committee, from time to time and no less than every three months, on the activity of the Agency. Special reports shall be submitted to these Committees, at their request, pursuant to rules prescribed.

24. Section 13 to the law also affixes an agency comptroller, to be appointed by the Prime Minister in consultation with the head of the ISA. The Comptroller shall conduct internal auditing of the ISA pursuant to the provisions of the Internal Auditing Law, 5752-1992, and shall assist the Government and the Ministerial Committee in fulfilling their functions. The Comptroller shall submit an annual report on his findings, and any periodic report made by him, to the head of the ISA, the Ministerial Committee, and the Knesset Service Affairs Committee.

25. According to section 18, an ISA employee or a person acting on behalf of the agency shall not bear criminal or civil responsibility for any act or omission performed in good faith and reasonably by him within the scope and in performance of his function; yet the provisions of this section shall not derogate from disciplinary responsibility under the provisions of any law.

26. The Extradition Law provides for the following procedural guarantees, as was reported in previous reports: where a request for extradition is submitted by a foreign state, the Minister of Justice may order that the person concerned be brought before a District Court judge to determine whether that person is subject to extradition, and in pursuance of such direction, the Attorney General or his representative submits to the Court a petition to declare the person extraditable. A person declared extraditable by the Court has a right of appeal to the Supreme Court sitting as a Court of Criminal Appeal within 30 days of the decision of the District Court. The final decision as to his extradition is, under the Extradition Law, at the discretion of the Minister of Justice. The discretion of the Minister may, however, be challenged before the Supreme Court sitting as the High Court of Justice on the grounds that the administrative decision whether to extradite was manifestly unreasonable.

27. The Extradition Law forbids the extradition of a person if acceding to the request for extradition militates against ordre public or an essential interest of the State. In addition, the Minister of Justice, like every other administrative functionary, must act in a reasonable manner in exercising the authority to decide on extradition. These legal principles would render it essentially impossible for someone to be extradited from Israel to a country where there are substantial grounds for believing that the extradited person would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

28. Furthermore, under Section 2B(a)(1) of the Extradition Law, a person shall not be extradited if the request for extradition was submitted for an offence of a political nature or was submitted in order to prosecute or punish a wanted person for an offence of a political character, although the extradition is not purportedly requested for such an offence.

29. According to the Extradition Law, an Israeli District Court will declare a person extraditable to a foreign country only if it is proven in court that there is evidence which would be sufficient for committing that person to trial for such an offence in Israel. The requirement to consider the prima facie evidence in the case also provides a safeguard against extradition requests that are groundless or arbitrary.

Article 5

30. Section 16 of the Penal Law, 5373 - 1977 (“the Penal Law”), was enacted in order to enable the prosecution of offenders accused of crimes against the law of the nations, to which the State of Israel is committed by international treaties to prosecute, regardless of whether the offender is an Israeli citizen or resident, and regardless of the place where the offence has been committed. Under this provision, Israel would have the jurisdiction to prosecute torture cases, in any case where it did not extradite the accused person.

31. As stated in Israel’s response regarding Article 5, under Israeli law, Israel has the authority to prosecute acts of torture in any case where it did not extradite the accused person. It may be noted that Israel amended its Extradition Law in 1999 and 2001 to permit extradition of nationals. Under the current law, where a person was an Israeli citizen and resident at the time of the crime, extradition is subject to a condition that that person be granted by the requesting state the right to serve in Israel any sentence imposed on that person following that person’s extradition. In short, Israel fully possesses the ability of extradition or prosecution in all torture cases.

32. As reported previously, courts or tribunals would decide on cases of alleged torture in the same way as they decide on any other cases of serious crimes. Standards of evidence required for proof of torture are the same regardless of the court’s jurisdictional basis.

33. The Extradition Law provides that an extradition offence is an offence which, had it been committed in Israel, would be punishable by a minimum imprisonment of one year or more. Acts of torture, which are cognizable offences under the Penal Law, are punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year. Therefore, they are extraditable offences.

34. Israel is a party to the European Convention on Extradition, which provides that every offence, for which the punishment is one year of imprisonment or more, is an extraditable offence. The new Extradition Convention concluded recently between Israel and the United States provides for a similar provision.

35. According to the Extradition Law, a prior condition for any act of extradition from Israel is the existence of an agreement on extradition between Israel and the state requesting the extradition. The term “agreement” has been defined in the Israeli law to include a bilateral or a multilateral treaty, such as the Convention Against Torture, which while not specifically an extradition treaty, contains provisions providing for extradition. Under Israeli law, an extradition agreement also includes a special agreement concluded between the State of Israel and a Requesting State concerning the extradition of a wanted person (an “ad-hoc agreement”).

36. As detailed in Israel’s previous reports, the actions and conduct of law enforcement officials are subject to several legal institutions for review and oversight. Overall, each branch of the law enforcement authorities has disciplinary procedures, which may be initiated by the person claiming a violation, by other entities, or by the authorities themselves. All public servants are subject to the provisions of the Penal Law and most of them to the regulations pertaining to governmental employees, detainees, prisoners or any other relevant person may apply directly to the courts or administrative proceedings for relief against the action or decision in question.

Israel police

37. As detailed in Israel’s previous reports, the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice is responsible for most criminal investigations against police officers. Disciplinary proceedings are initiated by submitting a complaint to the Disciplinary Department of the Personnel Division at the Police Central Headquarters, or to any of its branches. Also, administrative sanctions may be imposed at any time during the proceedings, as well as after the proceedings are completed.

38. Following are statistics compiled by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers regarding unlawful use of force by police officers:

Unlawful use of force by police officers (2001-2004)

39. The following are some of the most noteworthy examples of the Department's cases, indicative of the Department's diligence in completing the relevant investigations and ensuring utilization of the full extent of the law:

(a) Cr.C. 390/04 (District Court-Jerusalem) The State of Israel v. Itai Brayer et. al. (5.4.05). Three border police officers were convicted of causing severe bodily harm in aggravated circumstances, abuse of a minor or a helpless person, and obstruction of court procedures. They were sentenced to six to ten months of imprisonment, following a vigorous investigation by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers. The charge stemmed from an incident where the officers detained and assaulted two Palestinian teenagers. The Department considered the verdict too lenient and recommended that the State Attorney's Office appeal the verdict. Such an appeal was filed and is now pending before the Court;

(b) Cr.C. 436/04 (District Court-Jerusalem) The State of Israel v. Nir Levy et. al. (19.5.05). Five border police officers were convicted of assault under circumstances constituting a severe injury in aggravated circumstances, abuse of a minor or a helpless person, and obstruction of court procedures. They were sentenced to between four and fourteen and a half months of imprisonment. The indictments were filed shortly after an immediate and extensive investigation was completed by the Department, as to the circumstances of the case, involving the officers detaining a Palestinian resident, beating and abusing him;

(c) Cr.C. 907/05 (District Court-Jerusalem) The State of Israel v. Bassam Wahabi et. al. Four border police officers were indicted of man slaughter for detaining a Palestinian resident of Hebron and later throwing him off a moving military vehicle, which caused a severe head trauma that resulted in his death. The vehicle driver was recently convicted and sentenced to four and a half years of imprisonment. Proceedings against the remaining officers are still pending.

40. Following are statistics compiled by the Police Disciplinary Department regarding the treatment of cases forwarded by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers, recommending disciplinary measures:

Israel Security Agency (ISA)

41. As detailed in Israel's previous reports, complaints against ISA personnel alleging the use of unlawful investigation techniques are dealt with by the Inspector for the Complaints within ISA (hereinafter, "the Inspector").

42. The head of this unit is appointed directly by the Minister of Justice and is granted the authority of a disciplinary investigator. Moreover, according to ISA rules of operation, the Inspector functions independently. No member in the ISA has the authority to interfere with its findings.

43. The Inspector functions under the close supervision of a high-ranking prosecutor from the State Attorney's Office. Additionally, following a full examination of the complaints, the Inspector's report is thoroughly reviewed by the above-mentioned prosecutor and in cases in which the issues at hand are sensitive or circumstances so necessitate, also by the Attorney General and the State Attorney.

44. A decision is made regarding the complaint, by the Attorney General, the State Attorney and the prosecutor only following a thorough examination of the Inspector's findings. The decision is an administrative decision, subject to the judicial review of the Supreme Court sitting as High Court of Justice, like any other administrative decision.

45. In 2004, section 49I1 of the Police Ordinance was amended, expanding the Department for Investigation of Police Officers' scope of authority over ISA interrogators. Their expanded authority of review now applies to every criminal offence committed in the course of fulfilling the ISA interrogators' undertaking, or in relation with their undertaking. This scope was previously limited to criminal offences committed in the course of an interrogation, or as regards to a detainee in custody for interrogation.

46. Statistics indicate that the Inspector has initiated 81 examinations in the year 2002, 129 examinations in 2003, 115 examinations in 2004, and 61 examinations in 2005 (as of mid-December). These examinations were the result of exterior complaints, as well as incidents alleged in internal ISA reports. Four cases resulted in disciplinary measures and several cases resulted in general remarks to ISA interrogators.

47. The following are details of complaints which lead to the disciplinary measures detailed below (detainees' actual names can be provided to the committee upon request):

(a) Following a complaint regarding the interrogation of F.T.A. it was found that an ISA interrogator behaved inappropriately, for which he was reprimanded. A general guidance on this matter was issued to all ISA interrogators;

(b) Following a complaint regarding the interrogation of H.M.H.A., two general remarks were issued to all ISA interrogators concerning reports transmitted during an interrogation;

(c) Following a complaint regarding the interrogation of M.A.R.B., Z.A.K. and M.M.M., certain general remarks concerning interrogation methods were relayed to all ISA interrogators.

(d) Following a complaint regarding the interrogation of K.M.K.K. a general remark as to the documentation of interrogation methods was issued;

(e) Following a complaint regarding the interrogation of M.A.Y., it was found appropriate to clarify the guidelines pertaining to an immediate report regarding a change in a detainee's medical condition whilst undergoing an interrogation.

Israel Defence Forces (IDF)

48. As detailed in Israel's previous reports, the IDF maintains a strict policy of investigating every claim of maltreatment by IDF soldiers. The IDF instructions specifically prohibit any improper attitudes towards detainees, and instruct as to the denunciation of any instance of an inappropriate behaviour of a soldier in relation to detainees. In cases of soldiers' misbehaviour of detainees and interogatees, soldiers are either court-martialled or face other disciplinary proceedings, depending on the severity of the charges and policy of the Military Attorney's Office.

49. The interrogation of soldiers suspected of the above violations is performed by the Investigative Military Police. This unit is subordinate to the IDF General Staff, independent from the IDF regional commands, and therefore autonomous to handle the investigations within the auspices of the Military Attorney's Office.

50. The Military Attorney's Office and the military courts vigorously assist in upholding the above stipulated norms. Below are some noteworthy examples of such enforcement against soldiers deviating from the above norms: two soldiers charged with beating cuffed detainees while transporting them from the Beit El military court to a detention facility were sentenced to seven to ten months of imprisonment by the Military Court of Appeals; In another case several soldiers charged with assault, aggravated assault, and abuse of Palestinian residents at the Calandia checkpoint were sentenced to four to nine months of imprisonment.

51. The Tel Aviv District Court, in C.C. 22502/04 State of Israel v. Mustafa Dirani (19.12.05), rejected the State's request to dismiss the civil suit brought by Mr. Mustafa Dirani for the torture he allegedly suffered during his detention in Israeli prison.

52. Mustafa Dirani, a Lebanese citizen and a member of the Hezbollah terrorist organization, was captured and brought to Israel by IDF forces in 1994. Due to his activities in the Lebanese Amal movement and his responsibility in the capture of Ron Arad, a missing IDF navigator, he was interrogated for several months in 1994. Mustafa Dirani was held in administrative detention from 1994 until his release and return to Lebanon in the course of a prisoners-exchange pact completed in early 2004.

53. The State claimed that since Mustafa Dirani was released in a prisoners-exchange pact, and due to the fact that since his return to Lebanon he has rejoined the Hezbollah terrorist organization, the Court should dismiss his request for damages. The Court emphasized that according to Israeli law, even if Mustafa Dirani is to win his lawsuit and found to be entitled for damages, he will not be able to receive the money because the law prohibits any transfer of money to citizens of an enemy state. The Court however rejected the State's position that the inability to transfer the money renders the entire lawsuit "theoretical".

54. The Court stipulated that "[t]his lawsuit is brought in order for the court to determine whether the applicant's rights have been violated, whether he is entitled for damages and what is the amount of damages he should receive. The law prohibiting him for physically obtaining the money does not make the issue theoretical". The Court further stated that "[i]t is hard to accept the claim that a person who claims that he had been severely tortured while detained in Israel has no real interest in clarifying this issue in the court of law and that he has no interest that the court impose upon those who are responsible the duty to pay damages for such a severe harm inflicted on his body and honour, even if the applicant will not, at this stage or even ever, be able to receive the money."

55. After discussing relevant international law instruments, the Court concluded that although customary international law requires states to allow persons who have been injured by faults of the state to bring lawsuits, they are mute on the issue whether such obligation arises when the persons involved are enemies. The Court held that "[t]his is an issue to be determined by Israeli law."

56. The court stipulated that: "the position claiming that the purpose of the lawsuit is to slander the state is unacceptable, noting that: "[i]f the claims of the applicant that he has been severely tortured are proven true, this would not constitute a defamation of the country, on the contrary, this would be an act of unveiling the truth, a matter necessary in order to purify the system. It is the state's interest that these difficult claims, whose mere presentation severely shadows the investigation techniques in Israel, be thoroughly examined and clarified." The Court's concern was that by dismissing the lawsuit after Dirani had already given testimony, and with the state not providing any response, might "be interpreted as [having a] lack of willingness or ability to deal with the applicant's claims. This would severely damage the state's reputation locally and abroad as a state governed by the rule of law."

57. On 5 August 2004, the Military Court of Appeals accepted an appeal by the Military Prosecution against the ruling of the Special Court which convicted lieutenant colonel Geva Sagi, upon his confession, of "inappropriate behaviour" under section 130 of the Military Justice Law (A. 153/03 Geva Sagi v. Chief Military Prosecutor).

58. Lieutenant colonel Geva had been sentenced to 60 days imprisonment, and his rank was demoted from Lieutenant Colonel to a Major. In the appeal, the prosecution requested the Court of Appeals to further demote his rank.

59. The Court convicted lieutenant colonel Geva after he admitted to threatening Tarek, a 28 year-old resident of the Duha village, whose father was requested for questioning by the security forces.

60. The Court held that lieutenant colonel Geva, while searching for a person requested for questioning, threatened that person's son, Tarek, telling him that he would kill him if he did not indicate his father's whereabouts. The Court's judgement also described a series of humiliating and sexually degrading acts made by the defendant, including a threat to burn Tarek if he did not indicate where certain weapons were hidden.

61. The Court of Appeals ruled that the described abuse was performed during an investigation, which in itself, was for a worthy purpose. On the other hand, the Court stressed that acts of abuse against the local population are harmful both to the victim and to the IDF. "A commander who does not understand and assimilate the limits of the military use of force established by the principle of human dignity, and substantially deviates from these limits, is not worthy of command. No difference exists between an abuse of a subordinate, a soldier, an enemy or a simple person. The same rule applies for a commander who deviates from the orders concerning his subordinates and the commander who abuses a Palestinian, a suspect or an innocent, in order to force him to disclose information. Both commanders are unworthy of the command."

62. Regarding the case at hand, the Court of Appeals ruled that "it is possible that details could have been taken from Tarek concerning his father and concerning the place the gun was hidden. However, even if in that situation it was appropriate to interrogate him, there exist legal and moral rules which dictate the proper method of interrogation. The same applies even if Tarek himself had been the primary suspect."

63. The Court described lieutenant colonel Geva's threats towards Tarek as "shameful and extremely ugly", and stated that: "[n]o words can describe our shock." "Although it is only one incident, yet its escalation into a series of continuous actions, is inappropriate and ugly from its very beginning to its end".

64. Citing the Convention and previous High Court of Justice rulings, the Court held that "even if we accept the claim that the aggressive dimension in the defendant's behaviour had been relatively limited, for there had been no physical contact between him and Tarek, it appears that the defendant's actions fall within the absolute prohibitions referred to by the High Court of Justice. This is so both because of the severe humiliation entailed in the undressing of a person in front of other people, as well as because of the harsh violence towards the man's spirit."

65. The Court accepted the appeal and, as noted above, demoted lieutenant colonel Geva to the rank of a First Lieutenant.

Legislative developments since the Third Periodic Report

66. As detailed above, the most significant and important new development since the submission of Israel's Third Periodic Report to the Committee Against Torture was the enactment of the Israel Security Agency Law, 5762-2002.

67. Israel is in compliance with the obligations of Article 9 of the Convention.

68. The Statute replacing Israel's previous Legal Assistance Law of 1977 and regulating judicial assistance, both civil and criminal, is known as the International Legal Assistance Law, 5758-1998 ("International Legal Assistance Law"). This Statute provides for the service of documents, taking of evidence, production of documents, seizure of documents or other articles, carrying out of searches and performance of other legal acts on behalf of foreign states.

69. Moreover, it provides for transferring prisoners and detainees abroad for the purpose of testifying in proceedings taking place overseas. The Statute provides that judicial assistance may be withheld where it is likely to prejudice the sovereignty or security of Israel or any matter of public policy, or where the assistance is requested with respect to a political, a military or a fiscal offence, or where the request relates to a procedure that intends to harm a person due to their political opinions, their race, nationality, religion, sex or social group, or in the absence of reciprocity between Israel and the state requesting the assistance.

70. The International Legal Assistance Law permits assistance to be granted even in the absence of a treaty on legal assistance.

Article 12 and 13

71. In 2004, section 49I1 of the Police Ordinance was amended, expanding the Department for Investigation of Police Officers' scope of authority over the ISA interrogators, applying to every offence committed in the course of fulfilling their undertaking, or in relation with their undertaking. This scope was previously limited to offences committed in the course of an interrogation, or during a detainee's custody for interrogation.

Article 14

72. Section 77 of the Penal Law, enabling the courts to order compensatory damages to a victim of a crime for damages or suffering, was amended in 2004 in order to raise the amount awarded to the victim. Presently, the maximum amount payable to a particular victim is fixed at 228,000 NIS (app. 50,000 US$). Rulings of the Supreme Court since the Third Periodic Report.

73. In accordance with article 3, prohibiting the extradition of a person to another state where there are grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture, the court in Cr.A. 7569/00 Genadi Yegudayev v. State of Israel (23.5.02), ruled that Mr. Yegudayev is extraditable only after receiving the following assurances from the Government of Russia. (1) It was assured that Mr. Yegudayev will not be subject to any kind of torture or inhuman treatment; (2) he would be entitled to a visit by an Israeli representative; and (3) he would be entitled to due process of law for all the rights provided to him in the European Extradition Treaty.

74. Section 2B(a)(8) of Israel's Extradition Law states that a person shall not be extradited to the requesting state where the extradition is likely to harm public order. The term "public order" has been interpreted by the Israeli Supreme Court to mean "the basic values of the State and the society, those values which express the moral and justice sense of the public in Israel." Specifically, in Cr.A. 7569/00 Yegudayev v. the State of Israel, Deputy President M. Heshin declared that "a substantial concern as to physical injury or abuse of someone extradited to another country would clearly contradict the public order of Israel, and where the Court is convinced that such is the danger to a person, the Court shall deny the request of the [requesting] state and shall not declare the person extraditable."

75. In accordance with article 11, and in conformity with the ongoing cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the High Court of Justice accepted the petition of Sheikh Abd El Karim Ubeid and Mustafa Dirani (HCJ 794/98, Sheikh Abd El Karim Ubeid and Mustafa Dirani v. Minister of Defence et al., (23.8.01)), and ordered the Minister of Defence to allow representatives of the Red Cross to visit the petitioners, who were being held in administrative detention.

76. Here, the Court held that although the petitioners are members of the Hizbollah terrorist organization, the State is committed to their humanitarian rights as provided by international law. The Court has stated that "... Israel is a democracy that respects human rights and takes humanitarian considerations seriously. Israel adheres to these principles because of the humanism and mercifulness which form an integral part of its character as a Jewish and democratic state. Israel makes these considerations because the human dignity of a person is important for the state even if that person is an enemy".

77. In HCJ 11447/04, The Centre for Defence of the Individual v. the Attorney General (14.6.05), the Court rejected two petitions requesting an additional investigation of alleged torture and humiliation in the facility known as 1391.

78. The Court held that the decision was made following a very thorough preliminary examination carried out by the Military Attorney General and the Ministry of Justice, and was supported by the evidence gathered. The Court therefore held that in the instant case, the process which led to the decision not to open a criminal investigation was reasonable.

79. The Court also stated that it is difficult to establish criteria for the extent and quality of the examination needed; and that its thoroughness depends on various considerations that are particular to each case. In the case, the Court rejected the petition, stating that they were convinced that the extent and quality of the examination undertaken by the authorities was reasonable.

80. In May 2006, the Supreme Court gave a landmark decision, laying down a court-made doctrine on the exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al.), relating to a soldier who was not advised of his right to legal counsel prior to his interrogation, and its affect on the admissibility of his confession while under interrogation.

81. The Court held that “[a]chieving justice is also based on the manner by which the court reaches a decision under the circumstances of the case before it. Basing an indictment on evidence obtained unlawfully or through the substantial violation of a protected human right, allows the investigation bodies to enjoy the fruit of their sin and may create an incentive for improper investigation methods in the future ... under appropriate circumstances, substantial illegality in obtaining the evidence, shall lead to its exclusion, even if there is no suspicion as to the veracity of its content”.

82. In this case, the Court adopted a relative exclusion doctrine, according to which the court may rule on the inadmissibility of evidence on the basis of the manner by which it was obtained, if two conditions are fulfilled: (1) the evidence was obtained unlawfully; and (2) admission of the evidence will harm the defendant significantly in regard to his right to fair proceedings, in a way and to an extent which is not in accordance with the limitation paragraph of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

83. The Court held that “... the exclusion of evidence according to the said doctrine requires a causal connection between the administration of the improper methods of investigation and the collection of the evidence.” The Court also held that exclusion of evidence can be exercised even when the right violated is not of a constitutional nature.

84. The Court enumerated a list of non-exhaustive circumstances which should be considered by courts deliberating upon the possibility of excluding evidence: (1) The nature and severity of the illegality involved in obtaining the evidence; (2) The influence of the improper method of investigation upon the evidence obtained; and (3) The social harm versus benefit involved in exclusion of the evidence.

85. This judgment also analyzed section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance (new Version), 5731 - 1971 (“the Evidence Ordinance”). While the Court did not rule on exclusion of the defendant’s confession on these grounds, it held that the said section should be interpreted more widely on the basis of the new Basic Laws. According to this holding, a wider array of circumstances may now justify excluding confessions on the basis of section 12.

II. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION REQUESTED BY THE COMMITTEE

86. The Committee, in its concluding observations following its consideration of Israel’s third periodic report (C/XXVII/Concl. 5 (2001)), did not request additional information from the State of Israel.

III. COMPLIANCE WITH THE COMMITTEE'S CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

87. The Committee, in its concluding observations on Israel's Third Periodic Report (C/XXVII/Concl. 5 (2001)), made the following recommendations (paras. 7 a)-k)):

(a) The provisions of the Convention should be incorporated by legislation into the domestic law of Israel, in particular a crime of torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention should be enacted

88. As stated in our previous report, all acts of torture, as defined in article 1 of the Convention, are criminal acts under Israel's legislation. In addition, all forms of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by Israel's Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

89. Moreover, the Supreme Court has recently held that "... the nature and extent of the unacceptable methods of interrogation included today in the scope of 'harming the human character of the interrogatee' may be wider than in the past. This, in light of the interpretative impact of the Basic Law and considering the international contractual law that Israel is a party to." (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4.5.06))

(b) The practice of administrative detention in the Occupied Territories should be reviewed in order to ensure its conformity with article 16

90. Israel's position on the applicability of CAT beyond its territory has been presented at length to the Committee on previous occasions and remains unchanged. In our view, the current procedure of administrative detention conforms with the principles of international humanitarian law, and indeed it has regularly been reviewed by the Israeli judicial system and the military legal system on this basis. Israel wishes to clarify that this measure can only be used on an exceptional basis when the evidence in existence is clear, concrete and trustworthy but for reasons of confidentiality and protection of intelligence sources, cannot be presented as evidence in ordinary criminal proceedings.

(c) The State party should review its laws and policies so as to ensure that all detainees, without exception, are brought promptly before a judge, and are ensured prompt access to a lawyer

Arraignment before a judge

Criminal offences

91. Section 29 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, specifies that a person arrested without a warrant must be brought before a judge as soon as possible, and no later than 24 hours following the arrest, with a special provision regarding weekends and holidays. Following the completion of the above measures, the detainee shall be brought promptly before a judge, or released from custody.

92. Section 30 allows for an additional 24-hour extension based on the need to perform an urgent interrogation, which cannot be performed unless the detainee is in custody, and cannot be postponed following his arraignment; or if an urgent action must be taken regarding an investigation in a security-related offence. Following the completion of the above measures, the detainee shall be brought before a judge swiftly, or released from custody.

93. The Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) (Arrangements for Holding Court Hearings according to Section 29 to the Law) Regulations, 5757 - 1997 provide special arrangements concerning the arraignment of detainees on weekends and holidays in order to properly balance respect for the holidays with the individual rights of the detainee.

Security related offences

94. A person arrested in accordance with the Emergency Powers (Arrests) Law, 5739 - 1979 ("the Emergency Powers (Arrests) Law"), according to an order issued by the Minister of Defence, shall be arraigned before the president of a District Court no later than 48 hours following the arrest. If not brought before the president within 48 hours, he shall be released unless another ground for arrest is proven to the president of a District Court (section 4). The 48-hour period does not include holidays.

95. On 26 June 2006, the Knesset approved the Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) (Temporary Provision) Law, 2006, that constitutes a Temporary Provision set for a defined period of 18 months.

96. The law regulates the powers required for the enforcement authorities in order to investigate a detainee suspected of terrorism or security offences. Such investigations necessitate special enforcement powers due to the special characteristics of both the offences and the perpetrators. The main provisions of the law result from the exceptional circumstances of such a security offence.

97. Section 3 of the law stipulates that the appointed officer may delay the arraignment before a judge to a maximum of 48 hours from the arrest, if the officer is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would truly jeopardize the investigation. The officer may decide to delay the arraignment for another 24 hours if he is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would truly jeopardize the investigation or may harm the possibility to prevent harming human lives.

98. The officer may delay the arraignment for additional 24 hours for the same reason, provided that he explains his decision in writing and obtains the approval of the relevant approving authority. A delay of over 72 hours also requires the approval of the Head of Investigations Department of the ISA, or his deputy. In any case, the maximum delay would not exceed 96 hours from the time of the arrest.

99. It must be emphasized that the initial stage of the investigation of a detainee suspected of terror and security offence is critical for the investigation in many ways, such as the possibility to use the information obtained during the investigation to prevent imminent terror attacks. Therefore the legislator asserted that the provision concerning this delay in arraignment is properly balanced with the need to protect human lives.

100. Moreover, as a way of further assuring the rights of the detainee, and in light of the temporary nature of the law, during the duration of the law, the Minister of Justice would be obligated to report to the Committee of Constitution, Law and Justice of the Knesset on the implementation of the law every six months. The report would include, inter alia, detailed information concerning postponements in bringing a detainee before a judge (including the number of cases in which the postponement occurred and the duration of such postponements).

Soldiers - IDF

101. According to the Military Justice Law, following an amendment in 2000, the maximum period a soldier can be held under arrest before he is brought before a judge is 48 hours.

Access to legal counsel

102. In a recent decision by the Supreme Court, the Court held that “[t]here is no dispute as to the high standing and central position of the right to legal counsel in our legal system.” (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4.5.06)). Here, the Court adopted a relative exclusion doctrine, according to which the court may rule on the inadmissibility of a confession due to the interrogator’s failure to notify the soldier of his right to legal counsel.

Criminal offences

Detainees

103. Section 11 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests)(Terms of Detention) Regulations, 5757 - 1997, stipulates that the date of a detainee’s meeting with an attorney shall be predetermined, and that the commander of the detention facility shall enable the first meeting of a detainee with an attorney, at their request, even during extraordinary hours.

104. Section 34 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, states that a detainee has the right to meet and consult with a lawyer. Following a detainee’s request to meet with an attorney or the request of an attorney to meet a detainee, the person in charge of the investigation shall enable the meeting without a delay. This meeting can be delayed if, in the opinion of the police officer in charge, such a meeting necessitates terminating or suspending an investigation or other measures regarding the investigation, or substantially puts the investigation at risk. The officer in charge shall provide a written reasoned decision to postpone the meeting for the time needed to complete the investigation, provided this deferment does not exceed several hours.

105. The officer in charge can further delay this meeting if he issues a sufficiently reasoned decision that such a meeting may thwart or obstruct the arrest of additional suspects in the same matter, prevent the disclosure of evidence, or the capture of an object apprehended regarding the same offence. Such additional delay shall not exceed 24 hours from the time of arrest. An additional 24 hours deferment (to a total of 48 hours) can be granted, if the officer in charge provides an elaborated written decision that he is convinced that such postponement is necessary for safeguarding human life, thwarting a crime, or is in relation to a security offence under certain provisions. However, such a detainee shall be given a reasonable opportunity to meet or consult with a legal counsel prior to the arraignment before a court of law.

Prisoners

106. A recent amendment to the Prisons Ordinance, 1971 (amendment No. 30, dated July 2005) further stipulates the conditions for a prisoner meeting with an attorney for professional service. According to section 45, this meeting shall be held in private and in conditions allowing for the confidentiality of the matters and documents exchanged, and in such a manner that enables supervision of the prisoner's movements. Following the prisoner's request to meet with an attorney for professional service, or the request of an attorney to meet a prisoner, the director of the prison shall facilitate the meeting in the prison during regular hours and without delay.

107. Section 45A of the Prisons Ordinance relates to all prisoners, except for detainees who have yet to be indicted. This section authorizes the IPS Commissioner and the director of the prison to postpone or stop such a meeting for a set period of time if there is a substantial suspicion that meeting with a particular lawyer will enable the commission of an offence risking the security of a person, public security, state security or the prison security, or a prison offence substantially damaging to the prison discipline and that brings about a severe disruption of the prison procedures and administration. The director of the prison may delay such a meeting for no longer than 24 hours, and the IPS Commissioner may order an additional 5 days delay, with the agreement of the District Attorney. Such a reasoned order shall be given to the prisoner in writing, unless the IPS Commissioner specifically orders it shall be given orally. The reasoning may be withheld under certain limited provisions. Decisions rendered according to section 45A may be appealed to the relevant District Court.

108. The District Court may further extend the above time-periods up to 21 days, following an application of the representative of the Attorney General, based on one of the grounds specified above. The maximum delay shall not exceed 3 months. Such a decision can be appealed to the Supreme Court. A Supreme Court judge may further extend these periods based on one of the grounds specified above.

Security-related offences

109. According to section 35 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, a detainee in a security related offence shall have access to legal counsel as soon as possible, unless one of the following applies: the meeting may thwart the arrest of other suspects; the meeting may disrupt the disclosure of evidence or its capture, or disrupt the investigation in any other manner; or preventing the meeting is necessary to hinder an offence, or preserve human life.

110. Further details are given in the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests)(Deferral of a Detainee in Security Offence's Meeting with an Attorney) Regulations, 5757 - 1997. Under this enactment, a meeting between an attorney and a detainee held on security related offences may be postponed for a maximum 6 day period if a well reasoned statement is submitted by one of the following authorities: the head of an investigative team or the head of the Investigation Department in the ISA authorized by the head of the ISA; a police officer ranked chief superintendent and above, as authorized by the Chief of the Police; or an officer of the IDF ranked Lieutenant Colonel and above, as authorized by the head of the Intelligence Branch of the army.

111. This period can be extended to a maximum limit of 10 days, in a reasoned written decision, by the head of the Investigation Department in the ISA, a police officer ranked commander and above, or an IDF officer ranked colonel and above. Such a decision can be appealed to the president of a District Court and subsequently, to the Supreme Court. Following the termination of such an interrogation, the detainee shall be allowed to meet with an attorney.

112. According to section 35(d) of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, the president of a District Court may further extend the above 10 day period for an additional period, up to 21 days, following a written application, substantiated by an affidavit and authorized by the Attorney General, based on one of the grounds specified above.

113. Recently, in Cr.C. 10879/05, Al Abid v. State of Israel (18.12.05), the Supreme Court addressed the issue of a detainee's right to meeting with an attorney while in custody. During Al Abid's detention, a court order was issued postponing his meeting with an attorney. When that period concluded, he was not informed of his right to meet with an attorney.

114. The Court stipulated that "the postponement of a meeting between a detainee and his lawyer on the basis of security reasons compels the authorities to inform the detainee of the postponement. Moreover, when the security impediment no longer exists, it is the duty of the authorities to inform the detainee that he is entitled to meet a lawyer. This is a fundamental right; the parties concerned must, through appropriate instructions, ensure the fulfilment of this right frequently". The court added that even during regular police interrogations, where the detainee relinquishes the right to meet with an attorney and in cases where the interrogation is prolonged, "it is appropriate to remind the detainee of his right to meet an attorney". By interpreting the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, the Court explained that when there exists an impediment (prescribed by the law) for a meeting between a detainee and an attorney, and whenever this impediment is removed, the detainee must be immediately informed of the removal and must be allowed to meet with an attorney.

Soldiers - IDF

115. According to section 227A1 of the Military Justice Law, a soldier who is detained and likely to be arrested has the right to legal counsel, and the right to be notified thereof. This was recently upheld by the Supreme Court in C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4.5.06).

(d) The State party should ensure that interrogation methods prohibited by the Convention are not utilized be either the police or the ISA in any circumstances

ISA

116. The ISA interrogators operate in accordance with standard operational procedures, detailed acceptable interrogation techniques, and receive extensive training on permissible investigation methods. These methods and techniques are evaluated routinely by the ISA in order to assess their adaptability to the current situation.

117. The ISA rules and procedures are fully in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, and the ISA interrogators are instructed to uphold them meticulously.

- (e) In view of the numerous allegations of torture and other ill treatment by law enforcement personnel, the State party should take all necessary effective steps to prevent the crime of torture and other acts of cruel inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, and institute effective complaint, investigative and prosecution mechanisms relating thereto

118. Effective complaint, investigative and prosecution mechanisms exist throughout the relevant law enforcement authorities, as detailed in our previous reports, as well as in sections 36-50 above. In addition, the following are important highlights affecting these mechanisms:

119. The Israeli Police and the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice views instances of police officers' violence against citizens in general, and specifically, against those who are in custody, with great severity. Serious efforts are being undertaken to eliminate any form of such abuse. Cases of alleged violence are investigated thoroughly and meticulously, using all means to exhaust the interrogation and bring to justice those found to be unnecessarily violent or acting in an unreasonable manner.

120. Some of the major considerations in determining the reasonableness of such action are the purpose and specific circumstances of the use of force, the justification for the use of force and the extent in which it exceeded reasonable use of force, the severity of the use of force and the severity of the physical harm caused, if any.

121. The Police Disciplinary Tribunal, residing in a case of unlawful use of force towards a non-officer, shall be composed of two police officers and a public representative. The purpose of convening such a tribunal is to elevate the public's trust in police treatment of complaints regarding the unlawful use of force. The tribunal may impose penalties ranging between fines, warnings, reprimands, confinement, demotion, or incarceration.

122. In certain cases, when the use of force is relatively trivial, the Department submits complaint fact sheets, judicially reviewed by a single Tribunal judge through an expeditious process, without legal counsel. The Tribunal considers the type of injury, the results of the use of force, the location of the offence, the officer's disciplinary record and his personal circumstances.

ISA

123. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, thousands of investigations have been conducted, and a relatively low number of complaints have been filed - numbering around several dozen a year. Most of these complaints were found to be unjustified. When complaints were found to be justified, measures were taken against the investigators involved.

124. Prior to the year 2000, hundreds of petitions concerning the investigation methods of the ISA were filed to the Supreme Court, sitting as High Court of Justice. In sharp contrast, since the Supreme Court handed down its decision concerning the investigation methods of the ISA, only several petitions have been submitted to the High Court of Justice challenging investigation methods. At present, there are no petitions pending from interrogated suspects, or from non-governmental organizations such as B'tselem, and Physicians for Human Rights. As the figures indicate, the High Court of Justice's ruling has had dramatic effect.

125. To this date, no complaint has led to findings that a criminal offence has been committed. However, several disciplinary proceedings have been taken against several ISA personnel. Furthermore, several complaints resulted in a re-evaluation of interrogation techniques and conditions, and subsequent amendments and clarifications of procedures were made.

126. The criteria for distinguishing between a recommendation for a criminal procedure and disciplinary measures are not obvious or precise, as demonstrated in Supreme Court rulings in related matters. In order to make such a distinction, the Court considers the investigator's degree of deviation from normal investigative behavior as well as his mental state. These factors help determine the type of punishment or disciplinary measure.

127. It is noteworthy to mention that the ISA has a highly evolved process of examining certain deviations, including those not resulting in formal complaints. The ISA is constantly adjusting its procedures and regulations in this regard.

Israel Prisons Service (IPS)

128. Every prisoner or detainee under the care of the IPS has the following complaint mechanisms regarding the staff and wardens' use of force:

(a) Filing a complaint to the director of the prison;

(b) Petitioning the relevant District Court in a prisoner's petition, in accordance with section 62A of the Prisons Ordinance and the Procedures (Prisoners Petitions) Regulations, 5740-1980;

(c) Filing a complaint to the Warden's Investigation Unit (WIU), through the IPS or directly to the Unit. This Unit is part of the Israeli Police, and its members are police officers. The findings of the WIU are subject to the State Attorney's Office scrutiny, who decides whether to institute disciplinary measures or criminal proceedings; or

(d) Filing a complaint to the Prisoners Complaint Ombudsman, who is a member of the Ministry of Public Security's internal comptroller unit that has the authority to inquire. Following the completion of the inquiry, and based on its findings, the complaint shall be forwarded to the WIU or the Disciplinary Branch in the IPS.

129. Additionally, Section 71 of the Prisons Ordinance establishes rules for official visitors in prisons. These visitors are appointed by the Minister of Public Security and are comprised of lawyers from the Ministry of Justice and other Governmental Ministries, who are appointed on a yearly basis, either for a specific prison, or nationwide. Section 72 of the Prisons Ordinance grants official visitor authorities to Supreme Court judges and the Attorney General [in prisons] throughout Israel, and to District and Magistrate Courts judges in prisons in their jurisdiction. Official visitors are allowed to enter the prisons at any given time (unless special temporary circumstances apply), inspect the state of affairs, prisoners' care, prison management, etc. During these visits, the prisoners may approach the visitors and present their complaints, including grievances pertaining to use of force. Prisoners may also make a complaint with the director of the prison and ask for an interview with an official visitor. Attorney General's Guideline (No. 4.1201. (1.5.75), updated - 1.9.2002) broadened the scope of the above to also include detention facilities and detention cells in police stations.

130. According to the IPS' recent statistics, in 2004, 231 cases of use of force were opened in the WIU; as well as 160 in 2005 (as of 15 November). Roughly 30% of the cases resulted in disciplinary measures, and 3% resulted in criminal proceedings.

131. Disciplinary measures are mostly instituted when the findings indicate that Prison Services' procedures were deviated from to a significant enough degree that would merit a criminal offense, or due to lack of evidence. The penalties in these disciplinary measures range between punishments such as fines, warnings, reprimands, confinement, and demotion.

(f) All victims of torture and ill-treatment should be granted effective access to appropriate rehabilitation and compensation measures

132. In C.C. 1569/98, Guneimat v. Ami et al. (27.11.05), the Jerusalem District Court ordered the payment of 50,000 NIS (roughly 13,000$), as compensation for the pain and suffering caused to Mr. Guneimat for physical and emotional harm inflicted upon him during an ISA interrogation. The Court emphasized that the use of the claimed methods had not been proven. However, the defendants requested the Court to consider the claims raised by the applicant as if they were true (for the tort claim only).

133. The Court here held that: "Accepting the applicant's version obliges the grant of appropriate compensation for the pain and suffering inflicted upon him due to the violation of his rights. Previous rulings had granted compensation for lesser violations of greatly more important rights. It is therefore obvious that severe violations of such fundamental rights entitle the applicant to compensation for the suffering inflicted upon him during the torture."

(g) The State party should desist from the policies of closure and house demolition where they offend article 16 of the Convention

134. See Israel's reply in section 90 above.

(h) The State party should intensify human rights education and training activities, in particular concerning the Convention, for the ISA, the Israel Defence Forces, police and medical doctors

Police

135. The Police Education and Information Section operates educational programs aimed towards incorporating various values into police officers' work, including tolerance within a multicultural society, elimination of prejudice and promotion of human rights, as well as awareness of issues relating to the Covenant and its values.

136. The educational programs operate in the police units through special educational workshop days as well as within the overall training framework that includes seminars, courses, etc. In the last few years, special emphasis is given to the training of commanders in all levels, since they are in the best position to influence the values of their subordinates.

137. The Police School for Investigation and Intelligence incorporates the main provisions of the Covenant regarding procedures, basic flaws, investigation ethics, and “right and wrong” behaviors, into the training of investigators and investigation officers.

ISA

138. The instruction of the ISA interrogators includes various contents, such as training regarding the Convention, its subject matter, and its broader implications. As well, such instruction brings interrogators up to date on the Supreme Court ruling in HCJ 5100/94, Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel. These contents are also an integral part of the ISA courses and seminars both at basic training and throughout the ISA.

139. These courses and seminars aim to instil principles and norms of human dignity and fundamental rights in employees, both at basic training and throughout the ISA. Particular emphasis is placed on adherence to the rule of law and to the ISA’s commitment to the balance of interests required by law and by the practice of the courts.

IDF

140. The School for Military Law holds a variety of training activities for IDF forces regarding human rights in general, and the prohibition on the use of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, in particular. These activities include lectures, learning aids and comprehensive written materials.

141. In the period since the submission of Israel’s previous report, hundreds of lectures were given to regular forces, as well as reserve forces prior to their reserve duty. Lectures were attended by combat forces, officers’ course cadets, military police investigators, security analyzers and medical care personnel in detention facilities, as well as to commanders throughout the army.

142. These activities specifically laid emphasis on issues such as arrest and detention practices, detainee’s rights, international humanitarian law and rules of conduct during an armed conflict.

143. Additionally, the School for Military Law issued an educational computer program, titled “Principles of Conduct during Armed Conflict”, regarding the adequate treatment of prisoners and detainees, emphasizing the strong prohibition against inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners and detainees. This program is a vital tool in IDF combatants and commanders’ instruction.

IPS

144. The IPS officers and wardens undergo regular training and instructions through courses held in the Nir School for IPS officers and wardens, as well as in their respective units. Training regarding the Convention is an integral part of the IPS overall training at the unit level, as well as in courses given to officers and wardens.

(i) Necessity as a possible justification to the crime of torture should be removed from the domestic law

145. The use of the “necessity” defence is regulated in article 34K of the Penal Law, exempting a person from a criminal liability “... for committing an act that was immediately necessary for the purpose of saving the life, liberty, body or property, either of himself or his fellow person, from a real danger of serious harm, due to the conditions prevalent at the time the act was committed, there being no alternative means for avoiding the harm.”

146. As explained in Israel’s previous report, the Supreme Court, in HCJ 5100/94, Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. the State of Israel addressed the issue of the “necessity” defence in length.

147. The Court here held that if investigators used physical means in the course of an investigation, under the circumstances set out in the law, and if an indictment was submitted against them for the use of such means, it was willing to assume that this defence might be available to them. The Court specifically stated that the “necessity” defence does not constitute a source of authority that allows ISA investigators to make use of physical means during the course of interrogations.

(j) Such legislative measures as are necessary should be taken to ensure the exclusion of not merely a confession extorted by torture but also any evidence derived from such confession

148. As detailed in sections 80-85 above, on May 2006, the Supreme Court rendered a landmark decision, laying down a court-made doctrine for the exclusion of illegally obtained evidence. (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al.).

(k) Israel should consider withdrawing its reservation to article 20 and declaring in favour of articles 21 and 22

149. Having reviewed the aforementioned declaration, and taking note of the Committee’s recommendations, Israel maintains that it is unlikely that circumstances in the foreseeable future will permit it to change its position in this regard. However, Israel will continue periodic reviews of its position.

COMMITTEE AGAINST TORTURE

Forty-second session

Geneva, 27 April - 15 May 2009

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES
UNDER ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONVENTION

Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture

ISRAEL

1. The Committee considered the fourth periodic report of Israel (CAT/C/ISR/4) at its 878th and 881st meetings (CAT/C/SR.878 and 881), held on 5 and 6 May 2009, and adopted, at its 893rd meeting (CAT/C/SR.893), the following concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the fourth periodic report of Israel, which is in conformity with the Committee's guidelines for reporting.

3. The Committee expresses its appreciation for the extensive written responses to its list of issues (CAT/C/ISR/Q/4 and Add.1), which provided important additional information, and for the oral responses to the numerous questions raised and concerns expressed during the consideration of the report. The Committee also appreciates the expert delegation of the State party and the open and comprehensive dialogue conducted.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes that, in the period since the consideration of the last periodic report (CAT/C/54/Add.1), the State party has ratified the following instruments:

a) The Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict;

b) The Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography.

5. The Committee notes with appreciation the decisions of the Supreme Court of Israel on the case Yisacharov v The Head Military Prosecutor et. al., C.A. 5121/98, which calls for the exclusion of a confession or evidence obtained unlawfully or in violation of a defendant's right to fair procedure; and the case Physicians for Human Rights et al. v. Minister of Public Security, HCJ 4634/04, declaring that the State of Israel must provide a bed to every prisoner held in an Israeli prison as a basic condition for living in dignity.
6. The Committee also notes with appreciation the enactment of the Israel Security Agency Law No. 5762-2002, regulating the mandate, scope and function of this institution and regularizing its activities so that it is supervised by and reports to a Ministerial Committee and other official bodies.
7. The Committee welcomes the appointment of the Israel Prison Service as the authority in charge of many Israeli detention facilities, some of which were formerly controlled by the military and the police.
8. Additionally, the Committee welcomes the State party's affirmation that training concerning the Convention and the prohibition of torture is conducted in courses for security, police and military officials, including with regard to the Supreme Court's 1999 ruling on the prohibition on torture, affirming that "these prohibitions are 'absolute'. There are no exceptions to them and there is no room for balancing."
9. The Committee notes again, with appreciation, the way in which public debate ensues on such sensitive matters as torture and ill-treatment of detainees, both in Israel and the occupied Palestinian territories. It welcomes the State party's cooperation with non-governmental organizations that provide relevant reports and information to the Committee and encourages the State party to further strengthen its cooperation with them with regard to the monitoring and implementation of the provisions of the Convention. In this connection, the Committee also notes with appreciation the prompt judicial review of persons under detention upon their petition to the Supreme Court, and the role of non-governmental organizations in facilitating and lodging such appeals.

C. Factors and difficulties impeding the application of the Convention

10. The Committee is fully aware of the situation of unrest prevailing in Israel and in the occupied Palestinian territories. The Committee reiterates its recognition of the State party's legitimate security concerns and its duty to protect its citizens and all persons under its jurisdiction or de facto control from violence. However, the Committee recalls the absolute nature of the prohibition of torture contained in article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention, stating that "no exceptional circumstances whatsoever may be invoked as a justification of torture."
11. The Committee notes the State party's continued argument that the Convention is not applicable to the West Bank or the Gaza Strip and the claim that this position stems inter alia from longstanding legal considerations that encompass the original drafting history of the Convention as well as from changed practical developments since Israel's last appearance before the Committee, including the 2005 withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Gaza Strip, the dismantling of its military government and its evacuation of over 8,500 civilians from Gaza. In addition, the Committee notes the State party's argument that the 'law of armed conflict' is the lex specialis legal regime that takes precedence. However, the Committee recalls its general comment No 2 (2007) that State parties' obligation to prevent acts of torture or ill-treatment in any territory under its jurisdiction must be interpreted and applied to protect any person, citizen or non-citizen, without discrimination subject to the de jure or de facto control of a State party. The Committee further notes (a) that the State party and its personnel have repeatedly entered and established control over the West Bank and Gaza; (b) that, as acknowledged by the State party's representatives during the dialogue with the Committee, security detainees from the area are, in substantial numbers, detained in prisons within the boundaries of the State of Israel; and (c) that Israel admittedly maintains "full jurisdiction" over cases of violence in the territories by Israeli settlers against Palestinians. Thus, the State party maintains control and jurisdiction in many aspects on the occupied Palestinian territories. Furthermore, the Committee notes with appreciation the State party's affirmation that "an Israeli official is liable to Israel's criminal jurisdiction for any unlawful conduct committed inside or outside the territory of Israel, provided that the official operates within his official capacity." As to the lex specialis argument, the Committee recalls that it considers that the application of the Convention's provisions are without prejudice to the provisions of any other international instrument, pursuant to paragraph 2 of its articles 1 and 16. Additionally, the Committee considers that, as stated by the International Court of Justice in its Advisory Opinion, international human rights treaties ratified by the State party, including the Convention, are applicable in the occupied Palestinian territories.¹

12. In any event, the Committee notes that the State party has acknowledged that its actions in the West Bank and Gaza warrant scrutiny. It also notes that the State party has responded to and elaborated on many questions regarding the West Bank and Gaza posed by the Committee in the written list of issues and the oral discussion.

D. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

Definition of torture

13. The Committee notes the State party's explanation that all acts of torture are criminal acts under Israeli law. Nevertheless, the Committee reiterates its concern expressed in its previous concluding observations that a crime of torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention has not been incorporated into Israeli domestic legislation.

The Committee reiterates its previous recommendation that a crime of torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention be incorporated into the domestic law of Israel.

Defense of 'Necessity'

14. Notwithstanding the State party's assurances that following the Supreme Court's decision in H.C.J. 5100/94, Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. The State of Israel determined that the prohibition on the use of 'brutal or inhuman means' is absolute, and its affirmation that 'necessity defense' is not a source of authority for an interrogator's use of physical means, the Committee remains concerned that the 'necessity defense' exception may still arise in cases of 'ticking bombs,' i.e., interrogation of terrorist suspects or persons otherwise holding information about potential terrorist attacks. The Committee further notes with concern that, under Section 18 of the Israel Security Agency (ISA) Law 5762-2002, “an ISA employee (...) shall not bear criminal or civil responsibility for any act or omission performed in good faith and reasonably by him within the scope and in performance of his function”. Although the State party reported that Section 18 has not been applied to a single case, the Committee is concerned that ISA interrogators who use physical pressure in “ticking bomb” cases may not be criminally responsible if they resort to the necessity defense argument. According to official data published in July 2002, 90 Palestinian detainees had been interrogated under the “ticking bomb” exception since September 1999.

The Committee reiterates its previous recommendation that the State party completely remove necessity as a possible justification for the crime of torture. The Committee requests that the State party provide detailed information on the number of “ticking bomb” Palestinian detainees interrogated since 2002.

Basic safeguards for detainees

15. The Committee is concerned that while the Criminal Procedure Law and the Prisons Ordinance stipulate conditions under which detainees are entitled to meet promptly with a lawyer, these can be delayed, subject to written requests, if it puts the investigation at risk, prevents disclosure of evidence, or obstructs the arrest of additional suspects, and security-related offenses or terrorism charges permit further delays. Notwithstanding the safeguards provided by law and reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of Israel in its 2006 decision on the case Yisacharov v The Head Military Prosecutor et. al., C.A. 5121/98, for ordinary cases, there are repeated claims of insufficient legal safeguards for security detainees. The Committee also notes with concern that the 2006 Criminal Procedure Law allows detention for up to 96 hours of persons suspected of security offenses before being brought before a judge – although the State party claims a majority of cases are brought within 14 hours– and up to 21 days without access to a lawyer– despite the State Party’s claim that more than 10 days is “seldom used”.

The Committee calls upon Israel to examine its legislation and policies in order to ensure that all detainees, without exception, are promptly brought before a judge and have prompt access to a lawyer. The Committee also emphasizes that detainees should have prompt access to a lawyer, an independent doctor and family member, these are important means for the protection of suspects, offering added safeguards against torture and ill-treatment for detainees, and should be guaranteed to persons accused of security offenses.

16. While appreciating the adoption of the Criminal Procedure (Interrogating Suspects) Law of 2002, which requires that all stages of a suspect’s interrogation be recorded by video camera, the Committee notes with concern that the 2008 amendment to this law exempts interrogations of detainees accused of security offenses from this requirement. The State party has justified this on budgetary limitations and stated that the exemption of security-related suspects will only apply until December 2010.

Video recording of interrogations is an important advance in protection of both the detainee and, for that matter, law enforcement personnel. Therefore, the State party should, as a matter of priority, extend the legal requirement of video recording of interviews of detainees accused of security offenses as a further means to prevent torture and ill-treatment.

Administrative detention and solitary confinement

17. The Committee has expressed concern that administrative detention does not conform to article 16 of the Convention because, among other reasons, it is used for “inordinately lengthy periods.” Administrative detention thus deprives detainees of basic safeguards, including the right to challenge the evidence that is the basis for the detention. Warrants are not required and the detainee may be de facto in incommunicado detention for an extended period, subject to renewal. While the State party explains that this practice is used only exceptionally when confidentiality make it impossible to present evidence in ordinary criminal proceedings, the Committee regrets that the number of persons held in administrative detention has risen significantly since the last periodic report of the State party. According to the State party, 530 Palestinians are being held in administrative detention under Israeli security legislation and, according to non-governmental sources, as many as 700. The Committee also notes with concern that the Unlawful Combatants Law No. 5762-2002, as amended in August 2008, allows for the detention of non-Israeli citizens falling into the category of “unlawful combatants”, who are described as “combatants who are believed to have taken part in hostile activity against Israel, directly or indirectly” for a period of up to 14 days without any judicial review. Detention orders under this law can be renewed indefinitely; evidence is neither made available to the detainee nor to his lawyer and, although the detainees have the right to petition to the Supreme Court, the charges against them are also reportedly kept secret. According to the State party, 12 persons are detained under this law at present.

The State party should review as a matter of priority its legislation and policies to ensure that all detentions, and particularly administrative detentions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, are brought into conformity with article 16 of the Convention.

18. The Committee is concerned at reports received by the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism of solitary confinement used by prison authorities as a means of encouraging confessions from minors or as a punishment for infractions of prison rules. It is alleged that security detainees are kept in interrogation facilities, ranging from three to six square meters, with no windows or access to daylight or fresh air.

The Committee once again calls upon Israel to examine its legislation and policies in order to ensure that all detainees, without exception, are promptly brought before a judge and have prompt access to a lawyer. The State party should amend current legislation in order to ensure that solitary confinement remains an exceptional measure of limited duration, in accordance with international minimum standards.

19. The Committee is concerned that there are numerous, ongoing and consistent allegations of the use of methods by Israeli security officials that were prohibited by the September 1999 ruling of the Israeli Supreme Court, and that are alleged to take place before, during and after interrogations. According to the State party, there were 67 investigations opened by the Inspector for Complaints against ISA interrogators in 2006, and 47 in 2007, but none resulted in criminal charges.

The State party should ensure that interrogation methods contrary to the Convention are not utilized under any circumstances. The State party should also ensure that all allegations of torture and ill-treatment are promptly and effectively investigated and perpetrators prosecuted and, if applicable, appropriate penalties are imposed. The Committee reiterates that, according to the Convention, “no exceptional circumstances,” including security or war or threat to security of the State, justify torture. The State party should intensify human rights education and training activities to security officials, including training on the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment.

Complaints and need for independent investigations

20. The Committee notes that, out of 1,185 complaints investigated by the Israeli police for improper use of force during 2007, 82 criminal procedures have been initiated. The State party has noted the difficulty in investigating this type of complaints arguing that police officers are authorized to use reasonable force in the necessary cases.

The Committee requests information on the number of criminal procedures that have resulted in convictions of the accused and the penalties imposed.

21. While noting the State party’s clarification that “every claim regarding the use of allegedly impermissible means of interrogation is examined by the Inspector for Complaints,” the Committee is concerned that none of the over 600 complaints of ill-treatment by ISA interrogators received by the Inspector of Complaints between 2001 and 2008 has resulted in a criminal investigation. Although under supervision of the Attorney General, the Inspector of Complaints is an ISA employee. The Committee notes that, according to information received by the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, out of 550 examinations of torture allegations initiated by the General Security Services (GSS) inspector between 2002 and 2007, only 4 resulted in disciplinary measures and none in prosecution. While the State party’s representatives explained that there is a lack of evidence for pursuing and substantiating these complaints, and that the persons submitting them are engaged in a “campaign” alleging false information, the Committee has been informed by non governmental organizations that there is a decline in the number of complaints submitted, allegedly due to a sense of futility based on the absence of indictments and a sense of de facto impunity.

The State party should duly investigate all allegations of torture and ill-treatment by creating a fully independent and impartial mechanism outside ISA.

Non-refoulement and risk of torture

22. While the Committee is aware of the fact that Israel hosts increasing numbers of asylum-seekers and refugees on its territory, and whereas the principle of non-refoulement under article 3 of the Convention has been recognized by the High Court as a binding principle, the Committee regrets that this principle has not been formally incorporated into domestic law, policy, practices or procedure. The responses submitted by the State party all refer only to its obligations under the 1951 Convention Relating to Refugees and its 1967 Protocol, but do not even allude to its distinct obligations under the Convention.

The principle of non-refoulement should be incorporated into the domestic legislation of the State party, so that the asylum procedure includes a thorough examination of the merits of each individual case under article 3 of the Convention. An adequate mechanism for the review of the decision to remove a person should also be in place.

23. The Committee notes with concern that, under article 1 of the draft amendment to the 1954 Infiltration to Israel Law (Jurisdiction and Felonies) Act, which was passed on 19 May 2008 in first reading by the Knesset, any person having entered Israel illegally is automatically presumed to constitute a risk to Israel's security and falls within the category of "infiltrator" and can therefore be subjected to this law. The Committee is concerned that article 11 of this draft law allows Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) officers to order the return of an "infiltrator" to the State or area of origin within 72 hours, without any exceptions, procedures or safeguards. The Committee considers that this procedure, void of any provision taking into account the principle of non-refoulement, is not in line with the State party's obligations under article 3 of the Convention. The Israeli Government reported 6,900 "infiltrators" during 2008.

The Committee notes that the draft amendment to the Infiltration to Israel Law, if adopted, would violate article 3 of the Convention. The Committee strongly recommends that this draft law be brought in line with the Convention and that, at a minimum, a provision be added to ensure an examination into the existence of substantive grounds for the existence of a risk of torture. Proper training of officials dealing with immigrants should be ensured, as well as monitoring and review of those official's decisions to ensure against violations of article 3.

24. The Committee notes with concern that, on the basis of the "Coordinated Immediate Return Procedure", established by Israeli Defense Force order 1/3,000, IDF soldiers at the border – whom the State party has not asserted have been trained in legal obligations under the Convention – are authorized to execute summary deportations without any procedural safeguards to prevent refoulement under article 3 of the Convention.

The Committee notes that such safeguards are necessary for each and every case whether or not there is a formal readmission agreement or diplomatic assurances between the State party and the receiving State.

Prohibition of unlawful or coerced evidence

25. While welcoming the Supreme Court decision Prv. Yisascharov v the Head Military Prosecutor et al, C.A. 5121/98, which laid down the doctrine of exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence, the Committee notes that the question of determining whether or not to admit such evidence is left to the discretion of the judge.

The State party should prohibit by law that any statement which is established to have been made as a result of torture cannot be invoked as evidence in any proceedings against the victim, in line with article 15 of the Convention.

26. Notwithstanding the information from the State party that ISA secret detention and interrogation facility known as "Facility 1391" has not been used since 2006 to detain or interrogate security suspects, the Committee notes with concern that several petitions filed to the Supreme Court to examine the facility were rejected and that the Supreme Court has found that Israeli authorities acted reasonably in not conducting investigations on allegations on torture and ill-treatment and poor detention conditions in the Facility.

The State party should ensure that no one is detained in any secret detention facility under its control in the future, as a secret detention center is per se a breach of the Convention. The State party should investigate and disclose the existence of any other such facility and the authority under which it has been established. It should ensure that all allegations of torture and ill-treatment by detainees in Facility 1391 be impartially investigated, the results made public, and any perpetrators responsible for breaches of the Convention be held accountable.

Juvenile detainees

27. While noting the State party's argument that several measures are being implemented to ensure children's rights, including the preparation of a draft bill on the establishment of a new youth court, the Committee remains concerned at the differing definitions of a child in Israel – where legal age is attained at the age of 18 – and in the occupied Palestinian territories – where legal age is attained at 16. The Committee notes the State party's explanation that Palestinian juveniles under age 18 are treated as minors when imprisoned within the State of Israel. Nonetheless, it expresses deep concern at reports from civil society groups that Palestinian minors are detained and interrogated in the absence of a lawyer or family member and allegedly subjected to acts in breach of the Convention in order to obtain confessions. The Committee is further concerned by the allegations that approximately 700 Palestinian children annually were charged under military orders and prosecuted by Israeli military courts and that 95 per cent of these cases have relied on confessions as evidence to obtain a conviction.

Military order No. 132 should be amended to ensure that the definition of minor is set at the age of 18, in line with international standards.

28. The Committee also notes with concern that all but one of the prisons where Palestinian juveniles are detained, are located in Israel, which hinders prisoners from receiving family visits, not only because of the distances, but also since some relatives have been denied necessary permits for security reasons, in 1,500 out of 80,000 cases, according to the State party and more often according to non-governmental sources.

The State party should ensure that juvenile detainees are afforded basic safeguards, before and during interrogations, including prompt access to an independent lawyer, and independent doctor and family member from the outset of their detention. Furthermore, the State party should ensure that cases against juveniles are not decided solely on the basis of confessions, and that the establishment of a youth court is completed as a matter of priority. In addition, every effort should be made to facilitate family visits to juvenile detainees, including by expanding the right to freedom of movement of relatives.

Use of force or violence during military operations

29. Notwithstanding the ongoing indiscriminate rocket attacks against civilians in southern Israel which reportedly provoked Israel to exercise its right to defend its population by launching operation "Cast Lead" against Hamas in the Gaza Strip, the Committee is concerned over the insufficient measures taken by the State party to protect the civilian population of the Gaza Strip and to prevent the harm, including many hundreds of deaths, of Palestinian civilians, including minors, caused as a result of the Israeli military operation. A report of nine United Nations experts describes civilians, including medical workers—16 having allegedly been killed and 25 injured while on duty. As confirmed by Israeli investigators, there were severe effects on civilians as a result of Israeli weaponry containing phosphorus, although it was reportedly aimed to create smoke screens or uncover tunnel entrances in Gaza. Notwithstanding the State party's argument that this weapon is not banned by international humanitarian law and was not aimed at personnel, the Committee is concerned about its use in a densely populated area and the severe pain and suffering that this weapon caused, including deaths of persons who reportedly could not be duly treated at hospitals in Gaza, which were unable to provide palliative services for several reasons, including a lack of proper knowledge of the weaponry employed, as well as being used as headquarters, command centres and hiding places for Hamas attacks.

The State party should conduct an independent inquiry to ensure a prompt, independent and full investigation into the responsibility of state and non-state authorities for the harmful impact on civilians, and to make the results public.

30. The Committee has received reports that the “blockade” imposed on the Gaza Strip, especially aggravated since July 2007, has obstructed the distribution of humanitarian aid before, during and after the recent conflict, and has limited other human rights of the inhabitants, particularly the right to freedom of movement, of both juveniles and adults.

The State party should reinforce its efforts to ensure that humanitarian aid is accessible to ease the suffering of Gaza inhabitants as a result of the restrictions imposed.

31. Notwithstanding the State party's legitimate security concerns, the Committee is seriously concerned at the many allegations provided to the Committee from non-governmental sources on degrading treatment at checkpoints, undue delays and denial of entry, including for persons with urgent health needs.

The State party should ensure that such security controls are conducted in accordance with the Convention. In this regard, the State party should provide sufficient and adequate training for personnel to avoid unnecessary stress on persons travelling through checkpoints. The State party should consider, as a safety measure, establishing an urgent complaints mechanism for any persons claiming they have been subjected to undue or improper threats or behaviors. Further, consideration should be given as a matter of urgency to the availability of emergency medical personnel to assist persons in need.

Settler violence

32. The Committee notes with interest the State party's acknowledgement that “Israel has full jurisdiction” over cases of settler violence in the West Bank against Palestinians. It appreciates the statistics provided regarding the criminal enforcement of such matters as disorderly conduct, land disputes, and the overall increase in law enforcement involving Israelis, including investigations and indictments as well as administrative measures limiting movement of Israeli settlers who may endanger the lives and security of Palestinians. While appreciating that a special inter-ministerial committee has been created to address these cases, and to coordinate among the IDF, the Police, the State Attorney's Office, and the ISA, the Committee expresses concern about such violence, especially its rising number.

Any allegation of ill-treatment by Israeli settlers, like others under the State party's jurisdiction, should be promptly and impartially investigated, those responsible be prosecuted and, if found guilty, appropriately punished.

House demolitions

33. While recognizing the authority of the State party to demolish structures that may be considered legitimate military targets according to international humanitarian law, the Committee regrets the resumption by the State party of its policy of purely "punitive" house demolitions in East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip despite its decision of 2005 to cease this practice.

The State party should desist from its policies of house demolitions where they violate article 16 of the Convention.

Allegations of torture and ill-treatment by Palestinian forces

34. According to reports before the Committee, both Hamas security forces in Gaza and Fatah authorities in the West Bank have carried out arbitrary arrests, abductions and unlawful detentions of political opponents, denied them access to a lawyer and subjected detainees to acts of torture and ill-treatment. Reportedly, those detained have been denied, inter alia, basic due process rights and the right to prompt and effective investigations. Additionally, an increase in such incidents, including deliberate maiming, as well as extrajudicial killings, was reported to have been conducted by Hamas forces in Gaza, allegedly against Fatah security services officials or persons suspected of collaboration with Israeli forces, during and after Operation Cast Lead.

The Palestinian authorities in the West Bank should take immediate measures to investigate, prosecute and appropriately punish persons under their jurisdiction responsible for these abuses; additionally, Hamas authorities in the Gaza Strip should take immediate steps to end its campaign of abductions, deliberate and unlawful killings, torture, and unlawful detentions, and to punish those responsible. The creation of an independent, impartial and non-partisan commission of experts to investigate these abuses should receive attention as a matter of priority.

35. The Committee encourages the State party to ratify the Optional Protocol to the Convention.

36. The Committee also encourages the State party to consider making the declarations under articles 21 and 22 of the Convention, thereby recognizing the competence of the Committee to receive and consider inter-state and individual communications.

37. The Committee encourages the State party to withdraw its declaration prohibiting article 20 inquiries.

38. The Committee invites the State party to ratify the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance.

39. The State party is encouraged to disseminate widely the report and response to the list of Issues submitted by Israel to the Committee and the concluding observations, in appropriate languages, through official websites, the media and non-governmental organizations.

40. The Committee requests the State party to provide, within one year, information on its response to the Committee's recommendations contained in paragraphs 15, 19, 20, 24 and 33 above.

41. The State party is invited to submit its next periodic report, which will be considered as its fifth periodic report, by 15 May 2013.

Committee against Torture

Consideration of reports submitted by States parties
under article 19 of the Convention

Follow-up responses of Israel to the concluding observations of the Committee against Torture (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4)

[3 August 2010]

* In accordance with the information transmitted to State parties regarding the processing of their reports, the present document was not formally edited before being sent to the United Nations translation services.

1. As requested by the Committee in its concluding observations (para. 40) dated 23 June 2009, pursuant to paragraph 2 of rule 67 of the Committee's rules of procedure, the State of Israel respectfully presents the information requested:.

Paragraph 15 of the concluding observations

The Committee calls upon Israel to examine its legislation and policies in order to ensure that all detainees, without exception, are promptly brought before a judge and have prompt access to a lawyer. The Committee also emphasizes that detainees should have prompt access to a lawyer, an independent doctor and family member are important means for the protection of suspects, offering added safeguards against torture and ill-treatment for detainees, and that these should be guaranteed to persons accused of security offenses.

Access to legal council

2. In a recent decision released by the Supreme Court, the Court held that "[t]here is no dispute as to the high standing and central position of the right to legal counsel in Israel's legal system" (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4 May 2006)). In the case at hand, the Court adopted a relative exclusion doctrine, according to which the court may rule on the inadmissibility of a confession due to the interrogator's failure to notify the soldier of his right to legal counsel.

Criminal offences

Detainees

3. Section 34 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, 1996-5756, states that a detainee is entitled to meet and consult with a lawyer. Following a detainee's request to meet with an attorney or the request of an attorney to meet with a detainee, the person in charge of the investigation shall enable the meeting without delay, unless as stipulated below. The meeting can be delayed if, in the opinion of the police officer-in-charge, such a meeting necessitates terminating or suspending an investigation or other measures regarding the investigation, or substantially places the investigation at risk. The officer in charge shall provide a written reasoned decision to postpone the meeting for the time needed to complete the investigation, provided this deferment does not exceed several hours.

4. The officer in charge can further delay this meeting if he/she issues a sufficiently reasoned decision that such a meeting may thwart or obstruct the arrest of additional suspects in the same matter; prevent the disclosure of evidence, or the capture of an object regarding the same offence. Such additional delay shall not exceed 24 hours from the time of arrest. An additional 24 hour deferment (to a total of 48 hours) can be granted, if the officer in charge provides a detailed written decision that he/she is convinced that such postponement is necessary for safeguarding human life, or thwarting a crime. However, such a detainee shall be given a reasonable opportunity to meet or consult with legal counsel prior to their arraignment before a court of law. Data indicates that this additional extension is seldom used.

5. In Israel, Section 11 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) (Terms of Detention) Regulations 5757 – 1997, stipulates that the date of a detainee's meeting with an attorney shall be coordinated in advance, and that the commander of the detention facility shall enable the first meeting of a detainee with an attorney, at their request, even during extraordinary hours.

Prisoners

6. A 2005 Amendment to the 1971 Prisons Ordinance, further stipulates the conditions for a prisoner's meeting with an attorney for receipt of professional services. According to Section 45, this meeting shall be held in private and under conditions guaranteeing the confidentiality of the matters discussed and documents exchanged, and in such a manner that enables supervision of the prisoner's movements. Following the prisoner's request to meet with an attorney for professional service, or the request of an attorney to meet with a prisoner, the director of the prison shall facilitate the meeting in the prison during regular hours and without delay.

7. Section 45A of the Prisons Ordinance relates to all prisoners, except for detainees who have yet to be indicted. This section authorizes the Israel Prisons Service's (IPS) Commissioner and the Prison Director to postpone or stop such a meeting for a set period of time if there is a substantial suspicion that meeting with a particular lawyer will enable the commission of an offence risking the security of a person, public security, State security or the prison's security, or a prison offence substantially damaging to the prison discipline and which brings about a severe disruption of the prison's procedures and administration. The Prison Director may delay such a meeting for no longer than 24 hours, and the IPS Commissioner may order an additional five days' delay, with the agreement of the District Attorney. Such a reasoned order shall be given to the prisoner in writing, unless the IPS Commissioner specifically orders it shall be given orally. The reasoning may be withheld under certain limited provisions. Decisions rendered according to section 45A may be appealed to the relevant District Court.

8. The District Court may further extend the above time-periods up to 21 days, following an application by a representative of the Attorney General, based on one of the grounds specified above. The maximum delay shall not exceed a period of three months. Such a decision can be appealed to the Supreme Court. A Supreme Court judge may further extend these periods based on one of the grounds specified above.

Security related offences

9. In accordance with article 35 to the Criminal Procedure Law, (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) 1996- 5756, in exceptional cases (the meeting may thwart the arrest of other suspects; the meeting may disrupt the discovery of evidence or its capture, or disrupt the investigation in, any other manner; or preventing the meeting is necessary to hinder an offence, or preserve human life), it is possible to postpone a meeting with legal counsel on specific grounds. Preventing a detainee from meeting his/her attorney constitutes grave harm to his/her rights, and thus such harm is tolerated only when such prevention is necessary due to security reasons and for the sake of the interrogation.

Arraignment before a judgeCriminal offences

10. Section 29 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, specifies that a person arrested without a warrant must be brought before a judge as soon as possible, and no later than 24 hours following the arrest, with special provision being made regarding weekends and holidays. Following the completion of the above measures, the detainee shall be brought promptly before a judge, or released from custody.

11. Section 30 allows for an additional 24-hour extension based on the need to perform an urgent interrogation, which cannot be performed unless the detainee is in custody, and cannot be postponed following his/her arraignment; or if an urgent action must be taken regarding an investigation in a security-related offence. Following the completion of the above measures, the detainee shall be brought before a judge swiftly, or released from custody.

12 The Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) (Arrangements for Holding Court Hearings according to Section 29 to the Law) Regulations, 5757 – 1997 provides special arrangements concerning the arraignment of detainees on weekends and holidays in order to properly balance respect for the holidays with the individual rights of the detainee.

Security-related offences

13. The Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) (Temporary Provision) Law 5766-2006 (hereinafter: The Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) (Temporary Provision)) regulates the powers required by the enforcement authorities in order to investigate a detainee suspected of terrorism or security offences. Such investigations necessitate special enforcement powers due to the special characteristics of both the offences and the perpetrators. The main provisions of the Law result from the exceptional circumstances of such a security offence.

14. Section 3 of the Law stipulates that the appointed officer may delay the arraignment before a judge to a maximum of 48 hours from the time of arrest, if the officer is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would truly jeopardize the investigation. The officer may decide to delay the arraignment for a further 24 hours if he/she is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would truly jeopardize the investigation or may harm the police's ability to prevent harm to human lives.

15. The officer may delay the arraignment for an additional 24 hours for the same reason, provided that he/she explains his/her decision in writing and obtains the approval of the relevant approving authority. A delay of over 72 hours also requires the approval of the Head of the Investigations Department of the Israel Security Agency (ISA), or his/her deputy. In any case, the maximum delay should not exceed 96 hours from the time of arrest.

16. The initial stage of the interrogation of a detainee suspected of terrorist and security offences is critical for the investigation in many ways, such as the possibility to use the information obtained during the investigation to prevent imminent terrorist attacks. Therefore the legislator asserted that the provision concerning this delay in holding an arraignment is properly balanced with the need to protect human lives.

17. Moreover, as a way of further assuring the rights of the detainee, and in light of the temporary nature of the Law, during the duration of the Law, the Minister of Justice is obligated to report to the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee of the Knesset regarding the implementation of the law every six months. The report shall include, inter alia, detailed information concerning postponements in bringing a detainee before a judge (including the number of cases in which postponements occurred and the duration of such postponements).

18. According to information brought by the Israel Security Agency before the Knesset Constitution, Law and Justice Committee, from July 1, 2006 up until December 31, 2006 – the arraignment of one person was postponed between 48-72 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignments of two persons were postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. In 2007 – the arraignments of four persons were postponed between 48-72 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of one person was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. In 2008, the arraignments of two persons were postponed between 48-72 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of none (0) was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. In 2009, the arraignments of five persons were postponed for no longer than 48 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of none (0) was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law.

19. Israel maintains its position that the provisions of the Law dealing with arraignments before a judge and access to legal counsel are in accordance with article 2 of the Convention.

Arraignment before a judge

20. A decision to extend an arrest must be brought before a judge, as a rule, within 24 hours from the time of arrest. This occurs in the vast majority of cases. This limitation is deviated from only in rare instances, and even in those cases, the maximum delay is a total of 96 hours.

Access to legal counsel

21. The authorities take every measure to limit the use of the provision allowing for the authorities to postpone a meeting with legal counsel; hence, the use of this tool in Israel is exceptional. Prevention of a meeting for more than 10 days is seldom used.

Note also that for the purpose of extending the arrest period, the suspect is brought before a judge.

22. As for the issue of a court session in absentia, it should be stressed that in February 2010, the Israeli Supreme Court repealed Section 5 to the Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) (Temporary Provision) Law, which allowed a court to decide on detention on remand without the presence of the detainee for no longer than 20 days (Cr.C 8823/07 Anonymous v. The State of Israel). The initial purpose of this Section of the Law was to improve the ability of law enforcement agencies to conduct effective interrogations of suspects in security offences. In its decision, The Supreme Court found that this section, particularly when combined with other legal provisions, might gravely harm the rights of the suspect and prejudice the effectiveness and fairness of the judicial process. The Court was not convinced that the purpose of the Section could not be achieved by way of other means. Thus, the Court ruled that Section 5 is unconstitutional since it is incompatible with Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

Paragraph 19 of the concluding observations

The State party should ensure that interrogation methods contrary to the Convention are not utilized under any circumstances. The State party should also ensure that all allegations of torture and ill-treatment are promptly and effectively investigated and perpetrators prosecuted and, if applicable, appropriate penalties are imposed. The Committee reiterates that, according to the Convention, “no exceptional circumstances” including security or a war or threat to security of the State justifies torture. The State party should intensify human rights education and training activities to security officials, including training on the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment

23. The allegations referred to by the Committee are based on complaints made by individuals who for the most part have a clear interest against the State of Israel and the Israeli security forces. Thus, this mechanism is often used as a method by which to burden the security agencies in Israel in their ongoing fight against terrorism.

24. Nevertheless, every complaint made by an interrogatee is examined by the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators (hereinafter: The Inspector). The Inspector functions under the close supervision of a high-ranking prosecutor from the State Attorney's Office, who answers to the State Attorney and the Attorney General. The purpose of the examination is to examine whether the interrogators acted according to the law and procedures. The examination is performed thoroughly and impartially.

25. The fact that none of the examinations opened during the years 2006-2009 resulted in the submission of criminal charges indicates that all the interrogations were conducted according to law and procedures, and no ill-treatment or torture took place during the interrogations. However, certain procedures and interrogation techniques were modified as a result of some investigations. Additionally, during the years 2003-2009, ten examinations were opened as a result of complaints forwarded solely by the investigators themselves. Further, 55 examinations were opened based on the reports of investigators to the inspector regarding complaints of interogatees made to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and other public organizations.

26. The number of examinations, per year is as follows:

- 2006 – 67 examinations
- 2007 – 47 examinations
- 2008 – 30 examinations
- 2009 – 50 examinations

27. Israel's Security Agency and its employees act within the framework of the law, and are subject to internal and external review by, inter alia, the State Comptroller, the State Attorney, the Attorney General, the Knesset and the High Court of Justice in Israel.

28. Detainees receive all the humanitarian rights provided by the Conventions Israel is a party to and by Israeli law, including access to legal counsel and meetings with ICRC representatives.

29. In 2009, Israel's High Court of Justice rejected a petition claiming that the Government and the ISA disregarded the High Court of Justice ruling in H CJ 5100/94 The Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. The State of Israel. Thus, the Court found no legal and/or factual basis for this claim.

Paragraph 20 of the concluding observations

Information on the number of criminal procedures that have resulted in convictions of the accused and the penalties imposed

30. In order to fulfil their duties, police officers are authorized to use reasonable force in necessary cases. The difficulty in investigating complaints regarding the improper use of force is in the examination of circumstances which justified the use of force, and the justification for the amount of force used.

31. Since the use of force can be seen as a tool for police officers when exercising their duties, in certain cases the complaints are handled by way of disciplinary measures. Disciplinary measures are used in cases where the police officers were authorized to use force, but the force used has slightly deviated from the reasonable force needed. The advantage of the disciplinary procedure is the opportunity it provides for an examination of an event from organizational, educational and other important points of view.

32. The following are some of the most noteworthy examples of the Department's cases, indicative of the Department's diligence in completing the relevant investigations and ensuring utilization of the full extent of the law:

- In Cr.A 5136/08 The State of Israel v. Ynai Lalza (31.3.09), the Supreme Court accepted the State's appeal and raised the period of incarceration of a Border Patrol policeman who was convicted by the Jerusalem District Court, from six and a half years to eight and a half years' imprisonment. The defendant was convicted for participating in a series of acts of severe abuse and aggression against several Palestinians in Hebron, one of whom died after he was pushed out of a moving police vehicle. The Court described the acts committed by the defendant as severe, outrageous and villainous and added that these actions undermine the fundamental bases of justice and human decency. The Court indicated that the punishment for such offenses must serve to condemn the behaviour and express its anomalousness.

– Cr.C. 907/05 (District Court-Jerusalem) The State of Israel v. Bassam Wahabi et. al. Four border police officers were indicted of man slaughter for detaining a Palestinian resident of Hebron and later throwing him off a moving military vehicle, which caused a severe head trauma that resulted in his death. The vehicle's driver was recently convicted and sentenced to four and a half years' imprisonment. Proceedings against the remaining officers resulted in sentences of between four and a half and eight and a half years of imprisonment.

– Cr.C. 390/04 (District Court-Jerusalem) The State of Israel v. Itai Brayer et. al. (5 April 2005). Three border police officers were convicted of causing severe bodily harm in aggravated circumstances, abuse of a minor or a helpless person, and obstruction of court procedures. They were sentenced to six to ten months of imprisonment, following a vigorous investigation by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers.

– Cr.C. 436/04 (Jerusalem District Court) The State of Israel v. Nir Levy et. al. (19 May 2005). Five border police officers were convicted of assault under circumstances constituting a severe injury in aggravated circumstances, abuse of a minor or a helpless person, and obstruction of court procedures. The indictments were filed shortly after an immediate and extensive investigation was completed by the Department, as to the circumstances of the case, involving the officers detaining a Palestinian resident, beating and abusing him. They were sentenced to between four and fourteen and a half months of imprisonment.

33. In 2009, 93 proceedings against police officers ended: 68 cases concluded with a conviction, 20 cases concluded with acquittals and five cases had different outcomes. There is no correlation between the lack of proceedings that were initiated in one year and others that have been closed during the same year, due to differences in the length of proceedings following each complaint.

34. Below are further examples which evidence the above principles:

– A border police officer was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to two years' imprisonment for killing an infiltrator in Jaffa.

– A police officer was sentenced to one year's imprisonment for assaulting a detainee and accepting a bribe.

– Two Border police officers were convicted of assault causing actual bodily harm in aggravating circumstances and subornation in connection with an investigation, and were sentenced to six and four months' imprisonment respectively.

– Border police officers who assaulted a woman were sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

– A police officer was sentenced to one year's imprisonment for assaulting a demonstrator.

Paragraph 24 of the concluding observations

The Committee notes that such safeguards are necessary for each and every case whether or not there is a formal readmission agreement or diplomatic assurances between the State party and the receiving State.

Data regarding the scope of the infiltration phenomenon

35. During 2008, 7,703 people infiltrated Israel unlawfully through the Egyptian border. 75 per cent of the infiltrators that were caught during 2008 came from Sudan and Eritrea and 10 per cent of them were women and children.

36. In 2008, there was an increase of more than 30 per cent compared to 2007 in the rate of infiltrations of African origin entering Israel through the Egyptian border.

37. In 2009, 4,439 people infiltrated Israel unlawfully through the Egyptian border, whereas since January 2010 more than 7,300 people have infiltrated Israel unlawfully - a further increase in this phenomenon.

38. The infiltrators have entered Israel unlawfully, directly from a country in which they had already found protection or from a country that is a party to the Refugees Convention where an effective possibility to apply for asylum already exists. The infiltrators can therefore be returned to the country of "First Asylum". This practice also complies with the general understanding of conclusion No. 58 of the UNHCR ExComm (UNHCR ExComm, 'Problem of Refugees and Asylum-Seekers Who Move in an Irregular Manner from a Country in Which They Had Already Found Protection', Conclusion No. 58 (XL), 13 October 1989).

Coordinated Immediate Return Procedure

39. In accordance with the understanding between the former Israeli Prime Minister and the President of Egypt, an immediate return to Egypt of an infiltrator who crossed the border unlawfully into Israel is possible, following coordination with the relevant Egyptian authorities and in accordance with the criteria and guidelines established in the Procedure.

40. "Coordinated Immediate Return" is conducted at the Israeli-Egyptian border under Israel Defense Force (IDF) standard operational order no. 1/3.000 titled "Immediate Coordinated Return Procedure – Infiltrators Crossing the Egyptian-Israeli Border". The procedure is currently under the review of the Israeli Supreme Court, in a case pending before the Court (H.C.J. 7302/07 The Hotline for Migrant Workers v. The Minister of Defense). It should be stressed that for the time being, the court has decided not to intervene with the Procedure.

41. The Procedure's goal is to determine the actions for dealing with infiltrators, commencing at the time of their apprehension by IDF forces and/or Border Patrol units and until the time of their coordinated return to Egypt. In addition, the Procedure aims to define the reasons and circumstances for an immediate coordinated return of infiltrators and the relevant persons involved in the procedure and their authorities.

42. According to the principle of non-refoulement, a customary principle of international law, a person shall not be expelled to a country where his life or liberty might be at risk on the grounds of race, religion, nationality, affiliation to certain social groups or a political agenda.

43. As stated by the Committee, this principle was recognized in article 3 of the Convention. According to this article, a State party shall not expel or return a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he/she would be in danger of being subjected to torture. In addition, this principle is also recognized in article

33 of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, and constitutes part of Israeli law according to the Supreme Court of Israel, sitting as the High Court of Justice, in HCIJ 4702/94, El- Tahii et. al. v. Minister of Interior.

44. In accordance with the Procedure, a limited number of high-ranking officers were authorized to order the coordinated immediate return of infiltrators to the Egyptian authorities.

45. The Procedure specifies several conditions for the execution of the Procedure. For example, the authorized commander can order the coordinated return, only after confirming with the relevant Egyptian authority that no harm will be done to the returned infiltrator. Additionally, it is also required that the infiltrator undergo questioning by a specially trained agent prior to his/her return, in which it will be determined whether there is any concrete danger or a possibility of such danger posed to him/her.

46. Under the Procedure, the authorized commander is required to consider all the data gathered during the questioning, including the personal circumstances of every infiltrator, prior to ordering the coordinated immediate return. In any situation where there are grounds on which to believe that there is danger to the life or liberty of the infiltrator in Egypt, the return to Egypt will not be carried out.

47. Further, in the event of a dilemma arising in regard to a certain case, the authorized commander must seek guidance from the Southern Command Legal Advisor.

48. Thus, the authority to act in accordance with the Procedure is satisfied only in suitable cases and subject to the abovementioned conditions of the Procedure and the principal of non-refoulement. There had been several cases in which an Authorized Commander decided not to carry out the return due to developments in the field that led him to think that the infiltrator(s) might be in danger once they are returned to Egypt.

49. In addition, following H.C.J. 7302/07 The Hotline for Migrant Workers v. The Minister of Defense, the IDF Deputy Chief of Staff appointed a high-ranking officer to examine the implementation of the Procedure by IDF soldiers in the field. The investigating officer found that return of infiltrators at the Egyptian border is carried out according to the Procedure.

50. Further, below is a detailed account of the process of the Procedure, as well as the training provided to the officials in charge of implementing the Procedure:

The procedure's stages

Apprehension

51. Immediately after capture, an infiltrator or a group of infiltrators will be examined in order to rule out and if needed to neutralize any security threats posed by him/her/them.

Questioning

52. After ruling out any threat, the infiltrator will undergo an initial questioning either at the site where he/she was apprehended or at an IDF base. This questioning shall be conducted by a trained IDF soldier or by a Border Patrol Policeman for no more than three hours after the apprehension (or no more than six hours in case of a group of infiltrators). The purpose of the questioning is to gather crucial information about the infiltrator and to allow him/her to make claims regarding any threat against his/her life if he/she is returned to Egypt or regarding his/her status as an asylum-seeker. If the person makes such claims, he/she will be asked to specify the circumstances his/her claims are based upon.

53. If the questioning provides preliminary possible grounds for such claims, the person shall not be returned through this Procedure, but shall be transferred to the Ministry of Interior for extensive questioning by the specially designated unit.

54. If the questioning does not give rise to suspicion that the infiltration was related to State security or criminal activity – the person will be dealt with according to the Procedure with the aim being his/her immediate coordinated return to Egypt, so long as this is possible and in accordance with international law and the State's obligations. If however the questioning does reveal that the infiltration was related to State security or criminal activity the person will be transferred to the relevant security authorities.

Holding of an infiltrator by the IDF

55. Holding of an infiltrator in the short period of time until his/her coordinated return, shall be affected, based on legal authority, at an IDF's military base. Immediately after his/her capture and during his/her holding in a military facility, the infiltrator shall be held in proper conditions including the provision of water, food and if necessary medical examination by an IDF physician.

Registration and documentation

56. According to the Procedure, every infiltrator should be registered and documented, to the extent possible:

- Photographs of the infiltrator should be taken near the border.
- Photographs of the area of infiltration.
- Registration and documentation of the documents in the infiltrator's possession, such as immigration documents (e.g. passport), documents regarding contacts with United Nations agencies in Egypt and in other countries, information regarding the person's status in Egypt, regarding places he/she stayed before his/her apprehension etc.
- Photographs of the infiltrator's possessions and equipment, including weapons.
- The possessions of an infiltrator who is to be returned to Egypt according to the Procedure will be returned to him/her. The possessions of an infiltrator who is to be transferred to the immigration authorities for further security interrogations – his/her possessions will be handled according to the relevant procedures.

Temporary deportation order

57. No later than three hours after the apprehension of an infiltrator (or six hours in cases of a group of infiltrators) a temporary deportation order will be issued against him/her. The Order will be valid for 24 hours, and will be issued by an officer of the rank of Lieutenant Colonel or Captain, who has been authorized for this purpose by the Minister of Defense according to the Prevention of Infiltration Law 5714-1954 (the "Prevention of Infiltration Law"). The temporary deportation order constitutes a legal document authorizing the holding of the infiltrator at a military base.

Permanent deportation order

58. After the expiry of the temporary deportation order, and in cases where the coordinated return is delayed, a permanent deportation order will be issued in accordance with the Prevention of Infiltration Law. The order will be issued by the head of the operations division, and constitutes the legal authorization for the IDF's holding the infiltrator until his/her coordinated return (or until he/she is transferred to the immigration authorities).

Examination of the return of the infiltrator

59. A person will not be returned to Egypt according to the Procedure, if the authorized persons consider that there is a risk to the infiltrator's life or liberty if he/she is returned. Note that the possibility of a trial or a prison sentence imposed on the returned person for infiltration or any other criminal offences does not constitute a risk to life or liberty. In addition, a person will not be returned to Egypt according to the Procedure if the findings of his/her questioning give rise to the suspicion that the infiltration was carried out for security related purposes.

Training of personnel for questioning infiltrators

60. Article 14 of the Procedure stipulates that the officials who perform the questioning and the authorized commanders shall participate in a training seminar every four months. The seminar contents include background to the phenomenon of refugees; the authorities and responsibilities of IDF soldiers; IDF procedure regarding immediate coordinated returns; emphasis on treatment and questioning and more.

61. In its response to H.C.J. 7302/07 The Hotline for Migrant Workers v. The Minister of Defense, the State took upon itself to train soldiers for the purpose of questioning infiltrators. Hereinafter are the main training programmes which were carried out to that end by the State.

62. On 21 September 2008, a training seminar was held for over 30 IDF's soldiers and officers and Border Patrol Policemen serving in the Southern Command in high ranking command positions. The training included the following:

- Law and judicial review – description of the legal background of the IDF's treatment of infiltrators, including Prevention of Infiltration Law, Entry into Israel Law and the United Nations 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees. This chapter also included reference to the above mentioned appeal, the sensitivity needed when dealing with infiltrators, as well as a description of the Governmental Ministries and agencies dealing with this issue and the relations between these factors and the IDF.

- The powers granted to IDF soldiers – description of the authorities given to IDF soldiers in the field. Special emphasis was placed on the powers afforded to soldiers regarding arrest, detention and search according to the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) Law 5756-1996, and the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Trial) Law 5714-1954. In addition, the authority of the IDF to hold infiltrators until they are deported under deportation orders was also detailed.

- IDF procedure regarding immediate coordinated returns – the procedure was explained while emphasizing the importance of questioning the infiltrators, completing a report containing the infiltrator's answers, and the report's importance to the entire process of coordinated return. In addition, every question in the questionnaire was explained and rationalized and the participants were presented with cases and reactions regarding questions and statements of infiltrators during the questioning. The participants were also presented with the State's position regarding the possibility of coordinated return and different aspects of the importance of coordination with Egypt.

63. On 11 November 2008, another training session was held for 25 soldiers and officers serving in various units dealing with infiltrators in the IDF's Southern Command. This particular training session was wider and more extensive and was presented by personnel of the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of the Interior and the Southern Command Legal Advisor. The training focused on the operational and legal aspects of the coordinated return process, while emphasizing the importance of completing a detailed report regarding the apprehension of an infiltrator. During the training, the soldiers and officers were presented with different aspects of the importance of questioning an infiltrator, the importance of clarifying dilemmas which may arise during the questioning, the need to obtain the identity of the infiltrator in order to assist the immigration authorities and certain political aspects regarding the return of infiltrators to their state of origin. In addition, the trainees were presented with governmental activities held at the inter-ministerial level for dealing with the phenomenon, the severity of the phenomenon, the importance of conducting proper questioning of infiltrators etc.

64. These training sessions have continued to be conducted every few months in 2009-2010, or less when needed, so that the units dealing with infiltrators will be capable of questioning them properly, according to the Procedure.

65. The participants stated that the training contributed greatly to their understanding of the issue and the importance of the questioning procedure.

66. In accordance with the IDF's Southern Command guidelines, the participants will act as focal points in their units regarding the Procedure. In addition, according to the Southern Command guidelines, only soldiers that attended the above-mentioned training will be authorized to question infiltrators, complete questioning reports and deal with the Procedure together with the coordination units and in accordance with the IDF guidelines.

67. There is a great improvement in the assimilation of the Coordinated Return Procedure among the Southern Command units. The brigade stationed on the Israeli-Egyptian border issued a leaflet to all of its soldiers and commanders, clarifying the importance of the Procedure.

Paragraph 33 of the concluding observations

The State party should desist from its policies of house demolitions where they violate article 16 of the Convention.

68. Since September 2000, Israelis have been the victims of a relentless and ongoing armed conflict with Palestinian terrorist group's intent on spreading death and destruction, killing more than 1,178 Israelis and injuring more than 8,000.

69. In light of this unprecedented lethal threat, Israeli security forces have sought to find effective and lawful measures that may minimize the occurrence of such terrorist attacks in general, and suicide terrorism in particular, and discourage potential suicide bombers. Faced with the failure of the Palestinian leadership to comply with its obligations to fight terrorism, Israel has been compelled to combat this ongoing threat to the inherent right to life of Israeli citizens throughout Israel.

Demolition of structures that pose a security risk

70. One such security measure is the demolition of structures that pose a real security risk to Israeli forces.

71. Palestinian terrorists often operate from within densely crowded civilian neighbourhoods in grave breach of international law, whether firing from within these buildings or activating roadside charges from orchards and fields. In such instances, military necessity dictates the demolition of these locations. Under international law, such locations are considered legitimate targets for attack. Therefore, in the midst of combat, when dictated by operational necessity, Israeli security forces may lawfully destroy structures used by terrorists.

72. A further instance necessitating the demolition of buildings is the use made by terrorist groups of civilian buildings in order to conceal openings of tunnels used to smuggle arms, explosives and terrorists from Egypt into the Gaza Strip. Similarly, buildings in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are exploited for the manufacturing and concealment of weapons and explosive devices used against Israel, including the Qassam missiles fired on an almost daily basis against Israeli civilian population centres. The demolition of these structures is often the only way to combat these threats effectively.

73. In this regard, Israel's security forces adhere to the rules of the International Law of Armed Conflict and are subject to the scrutiny of Israel's High Court of Justice in hundreds of petitions frequently brought by Palestinians and human rights organizations.

74. These counter-terrorism measures, by any reasonable standard, do not constitute a form of "collective punishment" as some have claimed. While the security measures do unfortunately cause hardship, in certain cases, to those not involved in terrorism, this is categorically not their intent.

75. Wherever possible, even in the midst of military operations, Israel's security forces go to great lengths to minimize the effects of security measures on the civilian population not involved in terrorism. In this context, Israel adopts measures in order to ensure that only terrorists and the structures they abuse are targeted.

Demolition of structures due to planning and zoning violations

76. The Military Commander enforces the planning and building laws which were in place prior to 1967, in order to fulfil his/her duty under international law to respect, unless absolutely prevented, the law in place and to safeguard public order in the Area.

77. Accordingly, the demolition of buildings constructed illegally is carried out lawfully and in order to enforce the planning and building laws.

78. All demolitions are conducted in accordance with due process guarantees, such as the right to a fair hearing and the full opportunity to take measures towards the legitimization of an illegal building by completing and submitting requests for a building permit or by proposing a planning amendment.

79. Moreover, the process is subject to judicial review before the Israeli High Court of Justice, without distinction on the basis of race or ethnic origin

Demolition of homes of perpetrators of suicide attacks

80. Another method employed by Israel against terrorists is the demolition of houses resided in by those who had carried out suicide attacks or other grave terrorist attacks, or those who are responsible for sending suicide bombers on their murderous missions. The legality of this method, used for deterrence and not as a punitive measure, was upheld in numerous cases by the Israeli High Court of Justice, relating both to houses situated in the West Bank as well as in Israel's own territory.

81. In early 2005, Israel temporarily suspended the use of this method, following prolonged internal deliberations. However, in the first six months of 2008, the city of Jerusalem suffered a series of terrorist attacks, claiming the lives of 11 Israelis and injuring over 80. These attacks were the "peak" of a terrorist wave which began in 2007, characterized by the direct and active participation of inhabitants of the neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem, who abused their status in Israel as permanent residents. In light of this rapid deterioration and the tremendous risk posed by the involvement of the residents of the neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem in terrorist activities, the Minister of Defense found it necessary to resume the use of this method. Subsequently, the Chief of the Homefront Command decided to partially seal (as an alternative to total or partial demolition) one house and partially destroy another, resided in by the perpetrators, both of which are located in the neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem.

82. Consequently, the families of the perpetrators petitioned the High Court of Justice. In its judgment denying the petition, the Court reaffirmed the legality of the measure; once again, it reiterated that the measure is employed not as a form of punishment but as a deterrent, the employment of which is at the discretion of the Government. Accordingly, the latter may change its policy on the matter in light of changing circumstances. Therefore, the Court rejected the argument made by the petitioners that the decision to suspend the use of the measure rendered its application illegal, and accepted the State's position that the terrorist wave in the neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem, due to its unique characteristics, presented a substantial risk to Israel's security which justified the recourse to the measure of house demolition. (H.C.J. 9353/08 Hisam Abu-Dhim et. al. v. The Chief of the Homefront Command (5 Jan. 2009)

83. A request for a further hearing was denied by the High Court of Justice, who determined that its judgment was grounded in its previous rulings on the issue, and that the matter did not warrant further deliberations (Re.Ad.H. 181/09 Hisam Abu-Dhim et. al. v. The Chief of the Homefront Command (6 Jan. 2009)

Question No. 1 of the list of issues (CAT/C/ISR/Q/5) prepared by the Committee

1. Acts and behaviors defined as "torture" under Article 1 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ("CAT") and Article 7 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ("ICCPR") may constitute offences under the Israeli Penal Law 5737-1977 ("Penal Law").

2. Infliction of physical harm is criminalized in the Penal Law in the chapter on offences concerning harm and wounding.¹ In addition, the Penal Law includes an offence of "Assault that causes actual bodily harm" (Section 380). Inflicting mental pain could fall under the offence of "Threats" (Section 192). Furthermore, in certain cases, it may be possible to apply certain related offences: those in the Penal Law that criminalize causing mental or physical harm and committing physical, mental or sexual abuse,² as well as the offence of "Abuse" provided in Section 65 of the Military Justice Law 5715-1955 ("Military Justice Law"), which concerns a soldier who abuses a person under her/his custody. In addition, Section 277 of the Penal Law and Section 119 of the Military Justice Law prohibit public servants and soldiers from using or ordering the use of force or violence in order to extort a confession or information.³ Outside the context of an investigation, the offence of "Abuse of office" under Section 280 of the Penal Law prohibits public servants and soldiers from arbitrarily infringing a person's rights while abusing their authority; this could include acts that involve causing mental suffering.⁴ Finally, there is a positive duty to attend to the health and livelihood of a helpless person (Section 322 in conjunction with Section 377 of the Penal Law), which applies to anyone responsible for a helpless person – that is, a person who is unable to provide for his own sustenance for various reasons, including due to her/his arrest.

² "Violence against a minor or helpless person" and "Abuse of a minor or helpless person" under Sections 368B and 368C of the Penal Law.

³ See for example: Section 277 of the Penal Law:

Pressure by public servant

1. A public servant who is doing one of the following, is liable to three years imprisonment:
 - (1) Using or ordering to use force or violence against a person, in order to extort from that person or from another person in whom she/he has an interest, a confession of an offence or information concerning an offence;
 - (2) Threatening a person or ordering a person to be threatened, with bodily injury or damage to her/his property or of another person in whom that person has an interest in, in order to extort from him/her a confession of an offence or information about an offence.

⁴ Section 280 of the Penal Law:

Abuse of office

1. A public servant who is doing one of the following, is liable to three years imprisonment:
 - (1) while abusing his authority he performs or ordering to perform an arbitrary act that injures the rights of another person;
 - (2) [...].

3. Furthermore, abuse or cruel treatment towards a victim of an offence has been legislated to create harsher criminal punishment. Section 40I(a)(3),(4),(10) and (11) of the Penal Law, which was amended in the past year as part of Amendment No. 113 to the Penal Law (Construction of Judicial Discretion in Punishment) includes “the cruelty, violence and abuse by the perpetrator against the victim of the offence or her/his exploitation” as a factor to be considered by the court for determining punishment which may have aggravated the circumstances of the offence. Additional factors for determination include the damage resulting from the offence or an abuse of power by a public servant whilst performing her/his statutory duties.

4. Although the Convention does not expressly require State Parties to implement a specific crime labeled “torture”, a possible legislation of such an offence is currently an issue under review by the Examination and Implementation Team of the Second Turkel Report. The Turkel Commission was appointed by the Israeli Government on 14 June 2010, following the maritime incident of 31 May 2010. In its Second Report the Turkel Commission reviewed Israel’s mechanisms for examining and investigating complaints and claims of violations of the laws of armed conflict. One of the Commission’s Recommendations (No. 1) was the incorporation of an offence prohibiting torture into the Israeli Penal Law.

Necessity defense

5. The necessity defense, as stipulated in Section 34(11) of the Penal Law, is one of the defense claims afforded to a defendant in the criminal proceedings in Israel and remains in Israeli legislation. In H.C.J 5100/94 The Public Committee against Torture et. al. v. The State of Israel et. al. (6.9.99), the High Court of Justice held that this defense could apply to a defendant accused of using unnecessary or excessive physical pressure. In 2012, a petition was submitted requesting that the Attorney General instruct the Department for Investigations against Police Officers (“DIPO”) to initiate an investigation against employees of the Israel Security Agency (“ISA”) in a specific case, according to the petitioners the necessity defense does not apply in this case. This petition is still pending (H.C.J. 5722/12 Asad Abu Gosh et. al. v. The Attorney General et. al. (pending)).

ISA interrogators

6. The ISA is responsible by law for the safeguarding of Israel’s national security and State institutions from terrorist threats, espionage and other threats. In order to fulfill its purpose, the Agency performs, among other things, interrogations of suspects in terrorist activity, as is done in many countries across the world. The main goal of such interrogations is data gathering, intended to foil and prevent terrorist acts aimed at Israel and its inhabitants.

7. The ISA and its employees act within the limits of the law and are subject to constant internal and external supervision and review, including by the State Comptroller, the State Attorney’s Office, the Attorney General, the Knesset (Parliament) and every instance of the courts, including the High Court of Justice.

8. The ISA operates in accordance with the ruling of the High Court of Justice, and specifically the ruling concerning ISA interrogations from 1999 (H.C.J. 5100/94 The Public Committee against Torture v. The State of Israel (6.9.99)).

9. The detainees undergoing ISA interrogation receive all the rights to which they are entitled according to Israeli law and international conventions to which Israel is a party, including the rights to legal representation, medical care and visits by the International Committee of the Red Cross (“ICRC”).

10. Furthermore, any case of alleged wrongdoing by an ISA investigator can be referred to the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators (“Inspector”), as shall be elaborated in Israel’s reply to Question 29 below.

11. It should be noted that the mechanism of issuing complaints against the ISA is often used as a method by which to burden and hinder the security agencies in Israel in their ongoing fight against terrorism.

Case law

12. On April 26, 2010, the High Court of Justice, in a panel of three judges headed by the then President Dorit Beinisch (retired), rejected a petition submitted by the Public Committee against Torture requesting that the Court order the ISA to avoid enchainment by handcuffs during their interrogations and to establish rules regarding the use of restraint measures that do not cause pain or harm to interogatees and the frequency of their use. The State, in its submissions to the Court, stated that when deciding whether or not to use enchainment, the ISA primarily considers the medical situation of an interogatee, whether the interogatee is an elder, a minor under 16, or female. Furthermore, the ISA’s decision to ultimately handcuff an interogatee during interrogation will only be allowed after the consideration of the intelligence information concerning her/his violence offences; the age of the interogatee; the interogator’s assessment of the interogatee’s danger to the public, including the interogatee behavior during her/his detention and in the interrogation room. The ISA confirmed that every individual complaint is examined according to strict procedures by the Inspector and the Inspector’s Supervisor in the State Attorney’s Office. Ultimately, given the existence of the complaint procedure and the general nature of the petition, the Court did not find it necessary to consider the data before it supporting the request to end all use of the method of enchainment. The Court further noted that the legal advisor of the ISA reviews the methods in place. Therefore, based on all these reasons, the Court rejected the petition (H.C.J. 5553/09 The Public Committee against Torture et. al. v. The Prime Minister et. al. (26.4.10)).

Question No. 3

13. A petition for disclosure of similar details was submitted to the Jerusalem District Court, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Law 5758-1998, and rejected by the Court (Ad.P. 8844/08 The Public Committee against Torture v. The Supervisor of the Freedom of Information Law within the Ministry of Justice (25.2.09)).

Question No. 4

14. The ISA does not use threats against family members as a method of interrogation. Family members are detained or interrogated only when there are concrete suspicions against them and not for the purpose of creating a misrepresentation to the subjects of interrogation, to illicit information.

15. Complaints by interogated persons regarding illicit detention of family members are examined by the Inspector and the Inspector’s Supervisor in the State Attorney’s Office, and in each case, the ISA is called upon to explain the arrest of the family member and the subject-matter connection between the investigation and the detention. A breach of the rules may result in disciplinary or criminal measures against the ISA personnel involved.

16. On September 9, 2009 the High Court of Justice ruled in a case concerning the alleged practice of ISA investigators to manipulate suspects through various references to the fate of their family members. In particular, the petitioners sought to bring an end to the alleged practice of threatening suspects that harm would come to their family members in the event that they failed to properly cooperate with their investigators.

17. The Court noted that the Assistant to the Attorney General, in his letter to the petitioners, stated that the ISA had examined this issue and had emphasized that detention of an interrogatee's family member is legal when it is done in relation to the same criminal offence. The response of the Assistant to the Attorney General indicated that in such circumstances, there is no hindrance to inform one relative about the detention of the other, including allowing them to meet. However, when a detainee's relative is not arrested (and there are no legal grounds for her/his arrest), there is no justification to create a false display in which the detainee's relative is detained. The Assistant to the Attorney General also noted that there was no cause to take such an action by the ISA, from which a false display was created as if the detainee's father had been detained.

18. During the proceedings, the State stated that since the delivery of the Assistant to the Attorney General's letter, the ISA reiterated the internal procedure on the matter. Also on this basis, the petition was dismissed (H.C.J 3533/08 Mison Swetti et. al. v. The Israeli Security Agency et. al. (9.9.09)).

Article 2Question No. 5*Audio/visual documentation of interrogations

19. The Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law 5762-2002 ("Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law") requires that the Israel Police ("Police") carry out audio or visual recording of criminal suspect questioning (Sections 7 and 11). An exception to such recording has been provided for by Section 17 of the same law, that the Police can be exempt from such video recording in cases dealing with security offences. Though the Police is still required to keep a record of such security investigations in writing as part of the Police obligation to properly document all investigations.

20. The Section 17 exemption is a temporary provision that was extended in 2012 and is scheduled to expire in July 2015. The idea behind the exception is that if, for whatever reason, such a recording reached the hands of the terrorist organizations, it could be used to the advantage of these organizations to study the interrogation procedures and methods. In addition, such documentation may deter interrogatees from providing information, due to the fear that the cooperation with the interrogating authorities will be discovered to or revealed by their families, friends and the terrorist organization to which they belong to.

21. The Ministry of Justice and other relevant Ministries are in the process of analyzing whether the temporary provision related to an exemption for video recording should remain in effect for security related investigations, in particular by analyzing similar procedures used in other countries connected with security-related and terrorist offences. This follows the Ministerial Legislation Committee's examination in July 2012 of the temporary provision, when the Committee ultimately decided that the temporary provision should remain in effect for at least three additional years, given the importance and sensitivity of the security issues the provision is intended to protect. Together with the comparative research of this sensitive area, the Government is also analyzing other possible alternatives to the temporary provision, including the possibility of making the information gathered in such security investigations protected by a confidentiality privilege, and narrowing the current term “security offence” to mean that the action was carried out in circumstances in which there is a fear of harm to State security or was carried out in connection to an act of terrorism.

22. It should be noted that the Turkel Commission, the Public Commission to Examine the Maritime Incident of 31 May 2010, recommended in its Second Report (February 2013) titled: “Israel’s Mechanisms for Examining and Investigating Complaints and Claims of Violations of the Laws of Armed Conflict According to International Law” (recommendation No. 15) that there shall be full visual documentation of the ISA interrogations, according to rules that will be determined by the Attorney General in coordination with the Head of the ISA. This recommendation, as all other recommendations, shall be reviewed by the Examination and Implementation Team of the Second Turkel Report’s Recommendations.

23. On February 6, 2013, the High Court of Justice rejected an appeal filed by “Adalah – the Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel” against the Ministry of Defense, in which the petitioners requested the Court to revoke Section 17 of the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law and to instruct the ISA to visually document interrogations of suspects in security offences. The Court determined, inter alia, that in this case, when the arrangement of the temporary provision and the definition of a “security offence” are being reviewed by the State, the petitioners should wait for the results of the examination. Consequently, the Court found no room to intervene and dismissed the case (H.C.J. 9416/10 Adalah the Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel et. al. v. The Ministry of Defense et. al. (6.2.13)).

Question No. 6

Arraignment before a judge

Criminal offences

24. Section 29 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement – Arrests) Law 1996-5756 (“Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers – Arrests)”), specifies that a person arrested without a warrant must be brought before a judge as soon as possible, and no later than 24 hours following the arrest, with special provision being made regarding weekends and holidays. Following the completion of the above measures, the detainee shall be brought promptly before a judge, or released from custody. Section 30 allows for an additional 24 hour extension based on the need to perform an urgent interrogation, which cannot be performed unless the detainee is in custody, and cannot be postponed following her/his arraignment; or if an urgent action must be taken regarding an interrogation in a security-related offence. Following the completion of the above measures, the detainee shall be brought before a judge swiftly, or released from custody.

Security-related offences

25. The maximum times for bringing detainees suspected of security offences before a judge are found within the Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence)(Temporary Provision) Law 5766-2006 (“Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) Law”). Section 3(1) of the Law provides that the appointed officer may delay the arraignment before a judge to a maximum of 48 hours from the time of arrest, if the officer is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would significantly harm the investigation. According to Section 3(2) of the Law, the officer may decide to delay the arraignment for a further 24 hours if she/he is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would significantly harm the investigation resulting in the foiling of efforts to prevent harm to human lives. In such case the officer must do so in writing and to obtain the approval of the Head of the Investigations Department of the Israel Security Agency (ISA). Section 3(3) of the Law allows the court, under extreme circumstances, in accordance to a request by the Head of the ISA and the approval of the Attorney General, to extend the periods over 72 hours to a maximum of 96 hours, if the court is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would significantly harm the investigation resulting in the foiling of efforts to prevent harm to human lives.

26. According to information brought by the Israel Security Agency before the Knesset Constitution, Law and Justice Committee, in 2013 the arraignment of 3 persons was postponed for no longer than 48 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of none was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. In 2012 the arraignment of 12 persons was postponed for no longer than 48 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of eight was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. In 2011 the arraignment of 4 persons was postponed for no longer than 48 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of none was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. In 2010, the arraignment of 7 persons was postponed for no longer than 48 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of none was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. In 2009 the arraignment of 5 persons was postponed for no longer than 48 hours in accordance with Section 3(1) of the Law, and the arraignment of none was postponed between 72-96 hours in accordance with Section 3(2) of the Law. For further elaboration on this matter, please see “Follow-up responses of Israel to the concluding observations of the Committee against Torture (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4/Add.1)”, paras. 10-20.

Criminal offences

27. Within the criminal context, a suspect should be notified upon her/his arrest of her/his right to meet with a lawyer. If there is no restriction by law, the Israeli Prisons Service (“IPS”) allows the detainee to meet with her/his lawyer immediately and without need for coordination.

28. For further elaboration on this matter, please see “Follow-up responses of Israel to the concluding observations of the Committee against Torture (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4/Add.1)”, paras. 2-8.

Security-related offences

29. Security related offences sometimes call for an exception to immediate access to legal representation, when the detainee is considered as a serious threat to national security and access to legal representation could jeopardize crucial information gathering questioning of the suspect or accused. Section 35 of the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers – Arrests) provides for this exception and enables investigators to postpone the meeting between a detainee and her/his lawyer up to 21 days.

30. For further elaboration on this matter, please see Follow-up responses of Israel to the concluding observations of the Committee against Torture (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4/Add.1), para. 9.

31. Given the importance of the right to legal representation, a decision to delay a detainee’s legal consultation is never arbitrarily made. Any decision to postpone such a meeting is reached after a full examination of the individual circumstances of the case, the concrete necessity of postponement in each and every case, and the existence of one of the reasons stipulated by law allowing for postponement.

32. Even in a case where a decision is made to postpone the meeting with a lawyer, officials in charge of the investigation tend to only delay the meeting slightly. This is to adhere to a proportionality policy that the delayed access to legal representation should be relative to the seriousness of the offence and the risk of potential harm of the suspect to national security and to allow investigators to review the necessity of this postponement measure according to the development of the investigation.

33. During 2011, against the backdrop of gathered intelligence whereby visits by lawyers were used for coordination and mediation between terrorist organizations and their imprisoned activists or between security prisoners who are members of a terrorist organization who are imprisoned in different prisons, legislative amendments were made to allow for postponed legal representation, when there was a substantial suspicion of the described result. Section 45A of the Prisons Ordinance (New Version) 5732-1971 (“Prisons Ordinance”) was amended to include the clause that when there is a substantial suspicion that allowing the prisoner to meet with a specific lawyer would facilitate the transfer of information between prisoners or between prisoners and persons outside the prison, and there is a fear that transferring the aforementioned information is connected to promoting the activity of a terrorist organization or done under its guidance, the meeting may be postponed. However, this Amendment does not prevent the prisoner from meeting with another lawyer, if she/he decides to do so. Furthermore, the periods of time listed in the section for imposing such a restriction have been amended.

34. During 2012, Section 45A1 was added to the Prisons Ordinance. According to this Section, the IPS Commissioner may impose a limit on the number of lawyers with which a prisoner who is a member of a terrorist organization and was convicted of security offences (or a group of such prisoners) may meet concurrently (without imposing restrictions on the identity of the lawyers with which she/he/they meet), if she/he notices that a prisoner is meeting with several lawyers, in a manner that raises substantial suspicion that the meetings are not used for receiving professional counseling, and she/he has a substantial suspicion that these meetings are used to harm State’s security, public order or discipline and orders of the prison.

Public Defender Office

35. Pursuant to section 18(a)(7) of the Public Defender Law 5766-1995 (“Public Defender Law”), the Public Defender Order (Representation of Indigent Detainees) 5758-1998 (“Public Defender Order”) and the Public Defender Regulations (Eligibility for Representation to Additional Minors) 5758-1998 (“Public Defender Regulations”), all minors who are detained for investigation and all indigent detained adults are eligible to representation by a public defender.

36. In order to fulfill the provisions of the Law and Regulations, the Israeli Public Defender Office operates a system of lawyers on duty and on-call across the country, starting at 7 a.m. until late at night, including on weekends. Since August 2012, there has been an expansion of the working hours to eventually become a 24 hours/day-seven days/week system.

37. The activities of the Public Defender Office have resulted in a significant change in the representation of detainees. Today, according to information gathered by the Public Defender Office, most of the persons that are detained for investigation are being represented by Public Defenders in hearings concerning the extension of their detention. Furthermore, the Public Defender Office often become a major player in the subsequent criminal proceedings, representing most of the accused in criminal cases in the State of Israel, thus substantially reducing the rate of non-represented defendants in proceedings.

38. As for representation before the courts, the rate of the non-represented defendants in the Magistrates Courts is approximately only 15%. The Public Defender Office estimates that it represents approximately 60% of the defendants in the Magistrates Courts, around 80% of the defendants in the Juvenile Courts, and more than 50% of the defendants in the District Courts.

39. However, with regard to the right to consult a lawyer before and during a police investigation, the Public Defender Office maintains that in the majority of the cases, the Police informs the Public Defender Office of the arrest of the detainees after they were already investigated, so the effectiveness of the exercise of the right to counseling at this time is substantially impaired.

40. Following a petition to the High Court of Justice in 2011, the military orders were updated to allow military detainees to meet with their lawyer outside working hours. Due to this amendment of Military Ordinance No. 5136, the Court found no room to issue an order nisi in this case (H.C.J. 7071/11 Corporal Sharon Cohen v. The Military Advocate General (25.7.12)).

41. On January 8, 2012, the Supreme Court accepted an appeal permission request on the grounds that a Public Defender had not been appointed for the defendant, a prisoner, during the time of his petition to the District Court. The Supreme Court ordered that the Public Defender Office must represent the prisoner in his petition, and cancelled the District Court decision (M.A 8702/11 Roiter v. The State of Israel (8.1.12)).

42. On November 23, 2011, the High Court of Justice addressed an appeal of an accused, convicted of murder by the Tel Aviv District Court, who argued his conviction should be quashed as it was based on a confession made under threat during his police investigation.

43. The Court determined, inter alia, that the petitioner's confession to the police investigators was void since it was given under threats and while he was prevented from meeting his lawyer. The Court reiterated that the right to consult with a lawyer is one of the fundamental rights of detainees, enshrined in the State's law and jurisprudence. The goal of the legal representation in the criminal procedure is to ensure the right to due process. The Court noted that the police investigation was made more problematic since the police investigator told the petitioner that his lawyer did not care about him and could not help him. Ultimately, although the Court decided the confession given to the police investigator was inadmissible, the accused had separately confessed to the police informant and this confession was declared admissible. Consequently, the appeal was rejected on the basis of this second admissible confession (Cr.A. 5956/08 Saliman Al-Uka v. The State of Israel (23.11.11)).

44. On November 3, 2010 the Supreme Court ruled that the notice given to someone being held by the Police for investigation should include simultaneously, the information of the right to legal counsel and the right to have a Public Defender appointed. The Court determined that the appropriate time for giving this notice of both these rights, should be prior to the commencement of a person's investigation (Cr.A. 8974/07 Hunchian Lin v. The State of Israel (03.11.10)).

45. On August 31, 2010, the Nazareth District Court accepted a petition filed by a security detainee against the IPS, which requested the Court to allow him to meet with his lawyer without any glass partition between them, same as the procedure of meetings of non-security detainees with their lawyers. The basis for the procedure that meetings between security detainees/prisoners and their lawyers should be with a glass partition, unless the Prison's Director decides in exceptional circumstances to remove the partition, was found in the Israeli Prisons Service Directive Number 04.34.00.

46. The Court ruled, inter alia, that the Directive was void and reiterated that the right to counsel is part of the constitutional right to due process, and use of a glass partition between a lawyer and prisoner is an infringement upon this right. The Court noted that although the right to counsel is not absolute, there was no ground for the inclusion of a glass partition and the distinction between security and non-security detainees with regard to the execution of the right to counsel. Thus, the Court accepted the petition allowing the prisoner to meet his lawyer without a glass partition between them (Pr.P.C. 49300-07-10 Amir Machul v. Israel Prisons Service (31.8.10)).

Access to a physician

47. Section 9 of the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers – Arrests) Law, sets the conditions of detention. Sub-section (b)(1) stipulates that a detainee is entitled, inter alia, to the medical treatment required to maintain his/her health, and to appropriate supervision conditions as required by a physician. Within this context, Regulation 16 to the Criminal Regulations (Powers of Enforcement- Arrests)(Conditions of Detention) 5757-1997 (“Conditions of Detention Regulations”) stipulates that any detainee requesting medical treatment is entitled to be examined by a medic or a physician at his/her detention facility and also that any detainee is entitled to receive medical treatment necessary to maintain her/his health, according to the determination of a doctor within her/his detention facility, in a manner to be set in the ordinances. In addition, Section 6 of the Prisons Ordinance states that any prisoner that enters into the IPS's facilities will be examined by a physician as part of her/his admission process. This provision applies also to detainees.

48. The duties of the physicians working in IPS facilities are to treat the medical needs of the prisoners and detainees. These medical needs supersede any other needs or requirement of the IPS system. The physicians working in IPS facilities perform their duties as required by the law in Israel and by the universal rules of medical ethics. Under this legal and ethical framework they treat detainees and prisoners with full dedication to the detainees' and prisoners' wellbeing, and prepare independent professional opinions on their medical conditions, as required and in full adherence to their medical confidentiality. Any decision regarding the type of treatment or need for medical evacuation is of the medical staff alone. It should be emphasized, that the Police and ISA interrogators are conscious of any complaint made by, and medical problem of, detainees and prisoners and direct them for medical treatment without delay when required.

49. Every IPS detention facility employs a general physician, a dentist, a narcology specialist, a psychiatrist and a professional medic providing regular services. Examinations by expert doctors are made possible in the IPS medical center, prison infirmary and hospital clinics upon request. Where a need arises for a medical specialist or if there is a need of hospitalization, the proper coordination is made with the relevant hospital and the Ministry of Health.

50. In addition, the IPS operates a separate detention wing intended for prisoners with acute physical and mental disabilities in which prisoners with chronic illnesses may be cared.

51. Furthermore, Israeli Prisons Service Directive Number 04.46.00 allows for and regulates private doctors' visitations to prisoners for medical treatment. According to the Directive, a prisoner may be examined by a private doctor at her/his own expense in certain circumstances, subject to a preliminary medical examination by the IPS doctor. However, as was recently upheld by the High Court of Justice rejecting a prisoner's appeal for a private dentist, when a required medical service is not unique, urgent or lifesaving and the IPS provides a reasonable and adequate alternative medical treatment, the interest of the IPS in providing equal treatment to all prisoners, justifies its rejections of certain requests by prisoners to be treated by private doctors (H.C.J. 1233/13 Shay Shirazi v. The Israeli Prisons Service (05.03.13)).

Meeting with family members

52. As a rule, news of the person's arrest is forwarded to her/his family and to the ICRC.

53. The Israeli Law provides that prisoners, administrative detainees and detainees are entitled to family visits: prisoners are entitled to a visit once every two months unless the Prison Director resolved otherwise (Section 47(b) of the Prisons Ordinance (New Version) 5731-1971, and Section 19A of the Prisons Regulations 5738-1978); administrative detainees are entitled to a visit once every two weeks for a period of 30 minutes (Section 11(a) of the Emergency Powers (Arrests)(Conditions of Administrative Detention) 5741-1981; and detainees are entitled to a visit once a week for a period of 30 minutes (Section 12A of the Criminal Procedure Regulations (Enforcement Powers – Arrests) (Conditions of Detention) 5757-1997).

54. The Israeli Prisons Service Directive Number 04.42.00 "Arrangement of Visitation of Prisoners" regulates the right of a detainee who is arrested until the completion of legal proceedings against him/her to receive visitors once a week and for a period of 30 minutes. The detention facility's director has discretion to extend the duration of visits and allow additional visitors. A detainee, against whom an indictment has not yet been submitted, may not receive visitors (for fear of effecting the investigation), unless the supervisor of the investigation has approved it. The supervisor may also set conditions for such a visit. As for criminal and security prisoners who have already been convicted, they are entitled to a fortnightly visit of 45 minutes duration. The Directive contains provisions allowing the IPS to prohibit visits by specific visitors, or to a certain prisoner, for a limited period of time, when there is a reasonable suspicion that these visits are used to harm State's security or the safety of the public.

Maintaining contact with families

55. In order to maintain contact with their families, both criminal and security prisoners are entitled to send and receive letters and are entitled to receive family visits (as stated above, unless there is a specific security prohibition on such visitations).

Additional safeguards and remedies available to detainees and prisoners

Legislation

56. Amendment No. 42 to the Prisons Ordinance of May 2012, added Sections 11B to 11E to the Ordinance. These Sections require standardized detention conditions for prisoners, including adequate sanitation conditions, medical treatment and supervision according to an IPS physician's determination, bed and mattress, the ability to hold personal items, adequate food and water, cloths, items for personal hygiene, adequate lighting and ventilation, and the ability to go outdoors daily. Additionally, Section 11C provides the right to leisure or educational activities in accordance with Israeli Prisons Service Directives and other Regulations. According to Section 11D, the IPS Commissioner must examine the possibility of rehabilitation of a prisoner who is an Israeli citizen or resident, and will take the necessary steps to ensure maximal integration of that prisoner in rehabilitation activities during her/his time in prison. These Sections include certain exceptions regarding Security Prisoners.

57. Furthermore, during 2012, Section 68A of the Prisons Ordinance, concerning administrative release of prisoners for reasons of over-populated detention facilities, has been amended. As part of the amendment, the prisoners demographic to which this section applies, has been reduced to include only prisoners sentenced to less than four years, or those who have been sentenced for longer periods, but the Parole Committee finds them eligible for release on parole (including having served a minimum of two thirds of their sentence). In this amendment the obligation to report to the Knesset was extended to include annual reports regarding the number of prisoners released under administrative release.

58. In 2012, the Release from Prison on Parole Law 5761-2001, was amended, including the expansion of Section 7 regarding early release of a prisoner for medical reasons, on certain conditions. The Law now allows the Parole Committee to instruct an early release of a prisoner with severe medical conditions including constant need for artificial respiration, advanced dementia, constant unconsciousness, cancer or the need for transplant surgery, in accordance with conditions specified in the Law.

59. On January 12, 2014, the Central District Court accepted a petition by several prisoners to re-instate the cancelled Israeli Prisons Service Directive Number 04.41.00, which had allowed private therapists to enter prisons for the preparation of personalized rehabilitation programs for prisoners. The purpose being then to present these proposed rehabilitation programs to the Parole Committee. The Court ruled that in order to allow all prisoners to have a professional opinion regarding rehabilitation presented to the Parole Committee on their behalf, pre-approved therapists need to be allowed to enter the prisons (P.P. 22925-12-13 (Central District Court) Ben Hayun et. al. v. The Israeli Prisons Service et. al. (12.1.14)).

60. On December 24, 2012, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal submitted by several security prisoners, appealing the decision not to allow them to study their first university degree at the "Open University of Israel"; a privilege, however, granted to criminal prisoners. The IPS decision refusing studies was applied to both Jewish and Arab security prisoners. The Court held that there was no legal or constitutional foundation for obliging the IPS to allow prisoners to study in higher education institutes during their imprisonment. The Court deliberated whether the distinction between allowing and disallowing criminal and security prisoners constituted discrimination; however ultimately decided that it was not wrongful discrimination within this context. However, the Court mentioned that several of the security prisoners were already on the verge of completing their first degree when the IPS decision was made, and so suggested that the decision be reviewed in regards to these individual cases. The Court granted these prisoners the right to appeal the IPS decisions in their case to the District Court (Re. Ap. H.C.J 4063/12 Saeed Saleh v. The Israeli Prisons Service (24.12.12)). On October 28, 2013 a request for an additional hearing following this judgment by the Supreme Court was granted by the Supreme Court (Ad. h. 204/13 Saeed Saleh v. The Israeli Prisons Service (pending)).

61. On March 15, 2012, the Administrative Court accepted a petition of a prisoner, in which the petitioner requested the Court to order the IPS to provide a special meal during Muslim holidays for Muslim prisoners. The Court held that as an administrative authority, the IPS must strictly ensure the right to equality between prisoners, subject to the restriction of their detention. The Court acknowledged that although receiving a special meal was not a basic right of prisoners, given that the IPS had chosen to provide special meals on Jewish religious holidays, the IPS must then also provide this privilege to non-Jewish prisoners on their respective religious holidays. Consequently, the Court accepted the petition (P.Pt 43249-09-11 Mahmud Magadba v. The Israeli Prisons Service (15.03.12)).

Security-related offences detainees meetings with a lawyer

62. Please see Israel's reply to Question 6 above.
63. During the past few years, there has been a conscientious, substantial decrease in the number of detainees whose meetings with their lawyers were postponed due to an ISA interrogation, even though this includes an increased threat to Israeli State security.
64. On the issue of arrest of minors and their representation by the Public Defender's Office, please see Israel's reply to Question 33 below.

Meetings of detainees with their lawyer in the West Bank

Non-application of the Convention against Torture in the "Occupied Palestinian Territory"

65. According to the Israeli legal system, international conventions (as opposed to customary international law), only apply if they are formally legislated by the Knesset. This is the case with the CAT, which is implemented throughout Israel through a wide range of legal instruments, including the country's Basic Laws, laws, orders, regulations, municipal bylaws, and Court rulings.
66. The applicability of the Human Rights Conventions to the West Bank has been the subject of considerable debate in recent years. In its Periodic Reports, Israel did not refer to the implementation of the Convention in these areas for several reasons, ranging from legal considerations to the practical reality.
67. The relationship between different legal spheres, primarily the Law of Armed Conflict and Human Rights Law remains a subject of serious academic and practical debate. For its part, Israel recognizes that there is a profound connection between human rights and the Law of Armed Conflict, and that there may well be a convergence between these two bodies-of-law in some respects. However, in the current state of international law and state-practice worldwide, it is Israel's view that these two systems-of-law, which are codified in separate instruments, remain distinct and apply in different circumstances.
68. Israel's position on the applicability of CAT beyond its territory has been presented at length to the Committee on previous occasions and remains unchanged.
69. Jerusalem and the Golan Heights – In accordance with Section 1 of the Basic Law: Jerusalem, Capital of Israel 1980-5740 and Section 1 of the Golan Heights Law 1981-5742, Israeli law applies to the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem and to the Golan Heights, respectively.

Time between apprehension and appearance before a judge – security-related offences

70. The request for data on the number of persons apprehended pursuant to military legislation and the amount of time between apprehension and appearance before a judge has been addressed above under Question 6.

Question No. 8

Administrative detentions

71. Please see Israel's reply to Question 7 above.

Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law 5762-2002

72. On June 11, 2008 the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law 5762-2002 (“Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law”), while addressing the substantial legal aspects of unlawful combatant incarceration, for the first time since the Law was enacted in 2002 (Cr.A. 6659/06 Anonymous v. The State of Israel (11.6.08)).

73. While reaffirming the legality of the specific incarceration orders, the Supreme Court held that the Law meets the standards of both Israeli constitutional law and the Law of Armed Conflict (applicable to Israel’s fight against various terrorist groups) – noting that the Law as a whole does not infringe the right to liberty in a disproportional manner and finding it to be consistent with the administrative detention provisions in the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Civilian Persons (1949).

74. The Supreme Court ultimately held that the principle Sections of the Law had correctly struck the intended delicate balance between international human rights standards and the legitimate security needs of the country, as the Law was designed to address.

75. As for the application of the Law, in the twelve years since the enactment of the Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law, a total of 50 persons have been detained according to the Law. Twelve persons were detained during the Second Lebanon War in 2006, 30 were detained during operation “Cast Lead” (late 2008-early 2009) and eight on other occasions. As of October 1, 2014, there is one person (an adult male) who is detained according to this Law, he was brought for a judicial review of his detention in August and the Be’er-Sheva District Court affirmed his detention. An additional review is scheduled for February 2015, unless he will be released prior to that date.

Definition of terrorism and security

76. The definition of a “suspect of security offences” is enshrined in several laws. The most updated definition in the legislation is the definition of “security offence” within the Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence), “an offence as detailed as follows, when committed under circumstances that might raise a suspicion of harm to the State’s security, and linked to terrorist activity”. This definition assures the narrow application of the provisions of this law only to those who are suspected in involvement in terrorist activity.

77. The most recent development in the efforts to fight terrorism is the current work on the Fight against Terrorism Bill 5771-2011. In August 2011, this bill was approved by the Knesset in the first reading and is currently under review by the Knesset Constitution, Law and Justice Committee. This bill endeavored to clarify various definitions including “act of terrorism”, “terrorist organization” and “member in a terrorist organization”. Some of the definitions were adapted to match similar definitions in other countries with a similar justice system to that of Israel. In any case, all of these definitions were carefully drafted to provide law enforcement authorities with effective and precise tools in their fight against terrorist organizations and terrorism, while simultaneously protecting human rights and due process.

78. This bill, upon its enactment will nullify current legislation in the field of counter-terrorism, including: the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance 5708-1948, Prohibition of Financing Terrorism Law 5761-2005 and some of the Defense Regulation (State of Emergency)1945.

Review of the legislation governing the state of emergency

79. The State of Israel continues to remain in an officially-proclaimed “state of public emergency”, as it has since May 19, 1948, four days after its founding. The original declaration of a state of emergency was issued by the Provisional Council of State, in the midst of the war with neighboring states and the local Arab population, which began several months prior to the declaration of Israel’s independence on May 14, 1948. Since then, the state of emergency has remained in force due to the ongoing state of war and violent conflict between Israel and its neighbors, including the constant attacks on the lives and property of its citizens.

80. Nevertheless, Israel has been considering refraining from extending the state of emergency any further. This cannot take place immediately, however, as certain laws, orders and regulations are based upon the existence of this state of emergency. Consequently, these legal instruments must be revised, so that crucial matters of the State are not left unregulated when the state of emergency is eventually removed. Importantly, several laws essential to the war against terrorism are contingent on the existence of a declared state of emergency.

81. On December 16, 2013 the Knesset declared a state of emergency for six additional months in order to enable the continued legislative changes. The state of emergency is currently in force until December 31, 2014.

82. In preparation for this change, the Ministry of Justice has been reviewing relevant legislation and preparing required amendments. Several laws, which were previously dependent on the state of emergency, have since been repealed or amended, and other legislative changes are in various stages of preparation. In June 2009, the Joint Knesset Committee for Declaring a State of Emergency established a committee to supervise this work, which has become increasingly intensive.

83. On May 8, 2012, Israel’s High Court of Justice rejected a petition submitted by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, to cancel the declared state of emergency in Israel. The Court decided to cancel a previous order nisi and to strike off the petition since the proceedings had been exhausted and especially due to the legislative progress to enact and amend laws that would allow the future cancelation of the state of emergency, as they would not be dependent on the state of emergency. The Court held that although the work on this issue was not yet complete, the legislators should be allowed to continue the amendment process already begun; and that the Court should not interfere with these processes. It indicated that the legislature’s work already undertaken in this area, demonstrates the authorities’ understanding of the need to begin departing from the state of emergency legislation which has been in place since the State’s establishment. The Court emphasized, however, that the reality of the Israeli situation is still sensitive and complex and does not allow for leaving the authorities without the necessary powers they require in potential times of emergency. The Court further noted that Israel is a normal State which is not normal – it is a normal State in the sense that it is an active democracy which observes basic rights, among them free elections, freedom of speech, independence of the Courts and legal advice. However it is not normal since the threats over its existence have not yet been lifted, it is the only democracy under such threats and the fight against terrorism still continues and will probably continue in the near future (H.C.J. 3091/99 the Association of Civil Rights in Israel v. The Knesset (8.5.12)).

Question No. 10Solitary confinement

84. Section 56 of the Prisons Ordinance outlines 41 prison offences for which a prisoner can be found accountable, including quarreling with other prisoners, destruction of prison property and escaping or attempting to escape the prison. According to Section 58 of the Prisons Ordinance one of the penalties, which can be given by an authorized warden is a term in solitary confinement, for no longer than 14 days. However, Section 58 provides that a prisoner will not spend a term longer than seven consecutive days in solitary confinement and will continue the sentence only after an interval of seven days. According to the same section, only the Prison Director or the Deputy Director may impose a sentence longer than seven consecutive days of solitary confinement.

85. It should be noted that Israeli Prisons Service Directive Number 04.13.00 “Disciplinary Rules for Prisoners”, which was updated on September 20, 2011, includes a table that details the maximal punishment for each offence, according to the particular circumstances. According to this table, some offences are not punishable by solitary confinement; for others, solitary confinement is limited to seven days.

86. The Supreme Court has interpreted this authority by stating that the confinement of a prisoner under secluded and unsociable conditions constitutes an extraordinary action, as life among other human beings constitutes a basic human need. Accordingly, such living conditions may be deprived or limited only given special and substantial grounds. Even providing that such grounds existed, placing prisoners under such conditions must be limited to the minimal duration necessary, and the authorized agency must continuously reevaluate the need for these conditions, as part of its duty to limit the harm caused to prisoners. The Court further ruled that the longer the duration of the secluded conditions, the greater the burden on the authorized agency to explain the necessity in doing so (Ap.R.P. 10/06 Atias v. The IPS (9.5.06)). This ruling was reaffirmed in Ap.R.P. 8048/10 Abutbul v. Israel (24.2.11).

87. On April 14, 2010, the High Court of Justice dealt with a petition concerning the above-mentioned Section 58 of the Prisons Ordinance which establishes the terms for holding prisoners in solitary confinement. The petitioner claimed that the Section was in contravention of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, since it denies the prisoner’s right to proper living conditions that allow for a dignified, healthy existence. It was further claimed that the use of solitary confinement under this section amounts to a cruel and degrading form of punishment.

88. Ultimately, the Court dismissed the petition and held that Section 58 of the Prison Ordinance was compatible with the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (H.C.J. 1475/10 Moshe Cohen v. The State of Israel (14.4.10)).

Question No. 11Solitary confinement

89. The IPS is not able to provide aggregated data on the use of this measure, as it is used mostly for short periods of time, commonly two to three days, in accordance with the provision detailed in the reply to Question 10 above.

Family visits of Palestinian prisoners

Visitation of prisoners by families from the West Bank

90. The State of Israel acknowledges the importance of maintaining family visitations, and as clarified in H.C.J. 11198/02 Salah Diria v. The Head of the Military Detention Facility (16.2.03) – “The State does not dispute the prisoners’ right to receive family visitations”.

91. In order to accommodate the visits of immediate family members, a procedure was formed whereby prisoners’ family members may file requests through the ICRC, to allow entry into Israel specifically for visitation purposes. If no security hindrance exists to prevent the family member’s entry into Israel, a visitation permit to visit the incarcerated relative is granted.

92. The above-mentioned procedure reflects a proper balance between the will and willingness to enable family visitations, and the security considerations that must be taken into account.

93. The State of Israel is committed to enabling family visitations of residents of the West Bank with their family members incarcerated in Israel, and in fact does so while allowing thousands of visits annually.

94. In certain cases, where the security forces provides a security concern regarding the allowance of the relative/s to enter Israel, a visitation permit may still nonetheless be issued; however rather for a shorter duration of 45 days. Upon the permit’s expiration, family members are entitled to file a request for the renewal of the permit, subject to an individual security check. The current policy, according to which the objection of the security forces, based on an individual examination can constitute ground to prevent the entry of a resident of the West Bank to visit her/his imprisoned family member, was approved by the High Court of Justice (H.C.J.11515/04 Nada Muhammad Hassan v. The Commander of the IDF Forces in the West Bank (10.1.05)).

Family visit program for prisoners from the Gaza Strip

95. Following an Israeli initiative in collaboration with the ICRC on July 16, 2012, the previous “blanket ban” on visits of family members from the Gaza Strip to prisoners has been lifted, allowing prisoners who are Gaza residents to receive family visits whilst detained in Israeli prisons. The visits are coordinated between the Israeli authorities and the ICRC, following security examinations of the relatives requesting entrance into Israel. The visits are arranged on a weekly basis (every Monday). Every week, 50 prisoners are allowed to receive 150 visitors all together. Each prisoner is allowed to receive up to four visitors, not including the prisoner’s children under the age of eight.

96. Currently, due to security reasons derived from the latest escalation between Israel and the Hamas terrorist organization, the IDF halted the visits from the Gaza Strip. In this regard, it should be noted that the High Court of Justice determined that the basic humanitarian needs of the residents of the Gaza Strip, that Israel is obligated to provide, do not include entry to Israel for the purpose of prisoners’ visitations (H.C.J. 5268/08 Rami Tzaker Ismail Inbar et. al. v. The Minister of Defense et. al. (09.12.2009)).

97. With regard to the provision of medical care please see Israel’s reply to Question 6 above. As described, all prisoners, whether Israeli, Palestinian or otherwise, are provided with the same access to medical care.

Question No. 12General

98. In recent years the State of Israel has been facing a massive wave of illegal immigration of persons who, in the vast majority of the cases, cross the border illegally from Egypt. This particular border is 220 kilometers long and, until recently, was an open, unfenced border without any real obstacles.

99. According to the estimations of the relevant authorities, by October 5, 2014 over 64,000 persons had entered Israel illegally, and about 47,000 persons are staying in Israel after entering it illegally.

100. The phenomena began with the illegal arrival of a few persons from Sudan, and in 2006, over 700 foreign residents entered Israel illegally, in 2007 about 5,100 were caught, in 2008 – 8,900, in 2009 – 5,300, in 2010 – 14,700, in 2011 – 17,300 and in 2012 10,400 entered Israel illegally. Since mid-2012 until today the numbers of illegal arrivals decreased significantly, with only 45 illegal arrivals during 2013 and 19 in 2014 (until May 21). This decrease is attributed to the building of the fence between Egypt and Israel and the beginning of the implementation of the amended Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Jurisdiction) Law 5772-2012 (“Prevention of Infiltration Law”) in June 2012. The majority of the illegal immigrants are from Eritrea (67%) and Sudan (25%) alongside other African countries.

101. In this regard, Israel currently grants protection to more than 45,000 people and providing these individuals access to certain basic human rights without a need to prove prima facie that they have an individual claim to stay in Israel. Those individuals amount to approximately 95% of all individuals that entered Israel illegally through its southern border.

102. The problem of controlling its borders while upholding the rule of law is not unique to Israel. Many other countries face similar dilemmas, and Israel cooperates closely with those countries in order to develop the appropriate legal mechanisms to cope with these challenges. However, the situation in Israel tends to be much more complicated than in other developed countries for a few key reasons. Firstly, Israel is the only developed country with a long land border with the African continent – making it a highly-desired destination for land immigration, by cutting the need for expensive and often dangerous transportation, such as by boats. Secondly, in light of the tight control of European borders, many immigrants have turned to Israel instead, believing it to be an easier option to seek for a better economic situation. Thirdly, the current regional instability which touches almost all of Israel’s borders, together with the fact that a significant portion of these individuals come from Sudan – a country openly hostile towards Israel and which does not recognize its existence – adds to the security challenges Israel faces. Moreover, many scholars see migration as a regional phenomenon and believe that the policies for coping with it should be regional, rather than national. However, due to Israel’s unique situation in the Middle East and lack of regional cooperation, it is impossible for the country to develop regional strategies for cooperation with its neighbors and with countries of origin, as do other states facing similar challenges.

103. This unique situation resulted in the need to take several immediate steps to deal with the large and constant wave of illegal entrance into Israel in the last few years. This includes the construction of a physical barrier on the Egyptian-Israeli border, the expansion of the detention facilities in the south of the country and several amendments to the relevant legislation. These measures are an honest attempt to try and control Israel’s borders and reduce the financial incentives attracting arrival in Israel; while simultaneously adhering to the rule of law and respecting the human rights of all individuals in its territory.

Amendments to the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Jurisdiction) Law 5714-1954

104. Amendment No. 3 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law was enacted on January 18, 2012 as a temporary provision for a period of three years, in order to deal with the large and constant wave of illegal entrance into Israel in the last few years. In the amended Law, an “infiltrator” is defined as: “a person who is not a resident according to the definition in Section 1 of the Population Registry Law 5725–1965, who entered Israel other than by way of a border station prescribed by the Minister of Interior according to Section 7 of the Entry into Israel Law 5712–1952” (“Entry into Israel Law”).

105. Under the amended Section 30A of the Prevention of Infiltration Law, a person who entered Israel illegally could have been held in detention for a period of up to three years, subject to certain exceptions. This Section was implemented as of June 2012.

106. On September 16, 2013, the High Court of Justice ruled on a petition filed by several NGOs and asylum seekers, regarding the constitutionality of Amendment No. 3 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law. An extended panel of nine judges ruled that holding persons in detention for up to three years, subject to certain exceptions according to Section 30A under the Amended Law, constituted a material violation of their rights, including liberty and dignity, as enshrined in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The Court determined that this violation did not meet the proportionality criteria contained in the Basic Law, and was therefore unconstitutional. Consequently, the Court annulled Section 30A of the Amended Law. Furthermore, the State was given 90 days to examine the possibility of releasing the 1,750 people held in detention pursuant to this Section, on the basis of Section 13F of the Entry into Israel Law, which was deemed applicable (H.C.J. 7146/12 Nager Serg Adam et. al. v. The Knesset et. al. (16.9.13)).

107. On December 10, 2013, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 4 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law (described below), which was drafted, inter alia, following the High Court of Justice’s ruling that annulled Section 30A of Amendment No. 3. to the Law. Amendment No. 4 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law was enacted for a period of three years and was scheduled to expire on December 9, 2016.

108. Amendment No. 4 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law included two key changes:

(a) A new version of Section 30A which was annulled by the High Court of Justice is included. It stipulated that a person who enters Israel illegally could be held in detention for a period of up to one year, subject to certain exceptions at the discretion of the Border Control Commissioner at the Ministry of Interior. This amended section applied only to persons who entered Israel illegally after its enactment, as of December 10, 2013;

(b) The establishment of a new “Holot” facility for persons who entered Israel illegally and were already in Israel when the new Section 30A came into existence (stipulated in Chapter 4 of the Amended Law). According to Amendment No. 4, the Border Control Commissioner was authorized to place such persons in the new facility; from which they are allowed to exit during the daytime; however they have a duty to report to the facility three times a day. The facility is closed at night. Amendment No. 4 further stipulated that this new facility shall provide its inhabitants with suitable living conditions, including health, welfare services and a small financial allowance. The new facility’s inhabitants are not permitted to work outside the facility, but some are able to do so inside the facility, in exchange for reasonable remuneration. Since the enactment of the Amended Law, and during the deliberations in the Internal Affairs and Environment Committee of the Knesset, the Ministry of the Interior declared that currently no women and children are about to be summoned to stay in the new facility.

109. Amendment No. 4 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law also set instructions to safeguard order and discipline in the new facility. It also included measures which can be taken in cases of violations of these instructions, including, in some cases, transfer to a detention facility for periods set by the Law.

110. Since the Court's ruling on September 16, 2013 in the Adam case, the Population and Immigration Authority at the Ministry of Interior has examined the possibility of releasing the people held in detention pursuant to the previous Amendment No. 3 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law. Until December 9, 2013, 1,200 cases were examined and 707 people were released from detention. By December 13 2013, 483 people that were held in "Saharonim" detention facility were transferred to the new facility "Holot". By December 23, 2013, more than 360 of them did not report to the facility, thus violating the rules applied in the facility. Due to this violation of rules some of them were transferred to "Saharonim" detention center.

111. On September 22, 2014, the High Court of Justice ruled on a further petition filed by several NGOs and asylum seekers, regarding the constitutionality of Amendment No. 4 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law. The extended panel consisted of nine judges, six of which ruled that holding persons for up to a year in detention constituted a material violation of their rights, including liberty and dignity, as enshrined in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The Court determined that this violation did not meet the proportionality criteria contained in the Basic Law, and was therefore unconstitutional. Consequently, the Court annulled Section 30A of the Amended Law, and ruled that the Entry into Israel Law, applies instead.

112. Furthermore, the Court (by a majority decision of seven judges) decided to annul Chapter 4 of the Amendment, which established the new "Holot" facility, which annulment is to take effect in 90 days. However, the duty to report to the facility each day at noon was annulled with effect on September 24, 2014, such that until the entry into force of the annulment of Chapter of 4, persons will need to report only in the morning and evening. The Court pointed to the absence of a time limit for staying in the new facility, the duty to report three times a day given that the facility is located far from any locality and the existence of disciplinary measures and sanctions in case of violations of the applicable instructions. The collective effect of these aspects, together with other considerations, led the Court to conclude that Chapter 4 violates the rights enshrined in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty in a manner that does not meet the proportionality criteria contained in the Basic Law, and was therefore unconstitutional (H.C.J. 8425/13 Gabrislasy et. al. v. The Knesset et. al. (22.9.14)).

113. On April 30, 2013, the Administrative Court in Be'er-Sheva accepted a petition filed by an Eritrean woman and her two daughters, aged 8.5 and 11, for their release from custody due to unique humanitarian circumstances. The Court accepted the claim that "minors" may be construed as special humanitarian justification for release under Section 30A(b)(2) of the Prevention of Infiltration Law, as amended in January 2012 (Amendment No. 3). The Court held that the release of minors from detention is a matter of judicial discretion, taking into account the minor's age and the particular circumstances, and it is not only limited to unaccompanied minors. The Court further noted that according to Section 30A(b)(1) of the Prevention of Infiltration Law as amended, an almost categorical reason for release from custody exists regarding a minor is that the continuation of "holding him/her in custody may cause harm to her/his health and there is no other way to prevent the said harm." The Court held that babies and infants require special treatment due to their young age. The Court also noted that the mere age of the appellants was to be considered a special humanitarian consideration, as their prolonged detention and uncertain prospects of release (due to Israel's decision not to deport Eritrean citizens), were sure to affect them emotionally and hamper their emotional development. The Court ruled that the matter will be returned to the Detention Review Tribunal of Infiltrators' Custody in order to examine other options for the petitioners, such as placing them in the Carmel shelter in Osffiya, which in recent years housed many women who were released from the "Saharonim" facility (Ad.P. 44920-03-13 (Be'er-Sheva), Saba Tedsa et. al. v. The Ministry of Interior (30.4.13)).

General

114. The State of Israel has been making considerable efforts in its battle against trafficking in persons. Much has been done during the last few years, but more is still required.

115. On 2006 the Anti-Trafficking Law (Legislation Amendments), 5767-2006 was enacted and, inter alia, created five offences, which together encompass the main aspects of the trafficking phenomenon. The common denominator of the five core offences is that they all criminalize conduct by which a person is objectified and denied his or her basic human dignity and freedom. All five are punishable with severe prison terms.

Elaboration of the Five Core Offences in the Penal Law

Name	Section of the Penal Law	Description of the Offence	Maximum Prison Term
Trafficking in persons	377A (a)	A transaction in a human being for purpose of (1) organ removal, (2) illicit surrogacy, (3) slavery, (4) forced labor, (5) prostitution, (6) participation in a pornographic publication or exhibition, or (7) committing a sexual offence against the victim.	16 years; 20 years if the victim is a minor
Abduction for the purpose of trafficking	374A	Inducing a person to move from one place to another, by means of threats or force or by fraudulently obtaining her/his consent, for any of the purposes of trafficking in persons as detailed in Section 377A (a).	20 years
Holding a person under conditions of slavery	375A	Holding a person under conditions of slavery for the purpose of work or services, including sexual services.	16 years; 20 years if the victim is a minor
Forced labor	376	Forcing a person to work, whether for remuneration or not by means of force, other means of pressure or threats of force or pressure, or by fraudulently obtaining her/his agreement.	7 years
Causing a person to leave her/his country for purposes of prostitution or slavery	376B	Causing a person to leave the country in which she/he resides in order to engage him/her in prostitution or to hold him/her under conditions of slavery.	10 years

116. In addition, there are various related offences, which are not considered “trafficking” as defined above, yet are often (though not necessarily) related to trafficking, such as pandering, managing a property for the purpose of engaging in prostitution, withholding a passport, charging excessive brokerage fees, etc.

117. During 2013, 39 women in Israel were recognized as victims of trafficking in persons, 31 of them were Sinai victims (see definition in paragraph 120) who were held under conditions of slavery for the purpose of providing sexual services; 26 men were recognized as trafficking in persons victims, 24 of them were Sinai victims who were held under conditions of slavery for the purpose of providing services.

118. In its Trafficking in Persons Report for 2012-2013, the United States’ State Department ranked Israel as Tier 1 – a demonstration of the U.S. Government’s recognition of Israeli practical efforts taken to fight trafficking in persons (“TIP”) and an important external evaluation that Israel is fully meeting the minimal standards required for the eradication of TIP.

119. Some of the measures Israel has taken to prevent, prosecute and rehabilitate TIP during 2013 are as follows:

(a) Prosecution – There has been a marked reduction in the overall numbers of cases of trafficking for prostitution and related offences, as compared to the 2012 data. This is the fruit of comprehensive steps (prosecution, prevention and protection) and cooperation between government, civil society and the Knesset.

(b) Prevention – Further extensive specialized training has been provided for the personnel of all the relevant branches of Government focusing on identification and cultural sensitivity. This included victim identification training for people working on cases of individuals who entered Israel through the Egyptian border unlawfully, such as judges of the Detention Review Tribunals of Infiltrators’ Custody and staff of the detention facilities.

(c) Rehabilitation – On December 16, 2013, an additional shelter with 18 places for women who are victims of trafficking was opened (“Tesfa” – Hope). The objective of this shelter is to expand the number of places for women that were identified as victims of trafficking and are eligible to a year of rehabilitation. The shelter gives comprehensive psychosocial solutions, as well as all the other services that are provided at the Ma’agan Shelter. All the shelters are currently equipped to deal with a total of 106 victims of trafficking in persons and slavery: 35 places within the Ma’agan Shelter for women, 35 places in the Atlas Center for men, 18 places within transitional apartments, and 18 places in the additional extension of the Ma’agan Shelter (Tesfa) for women who are victims of trafficking and slavery.

120. Persons who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian border crossed through the Sinai Peninsula, and in some cases, while on Egyptian ground, such individuals were held in camps (“Sinai Camps”) where they suffered heinous crimes and grave abuse at the hands of their captors, for the purpose of obtaining ransom from their family members in their countries of origin (“Sinai victims”).

121. Some of those Sinai victims were forced to provide sexual services to their captives and others, who were compelled to forced labor and were held in slavery conditions, are considered as TIP victims, despite the fact that the offences against them were conducted outside of Israeli borders, by foreign nationals.

122. During 2012, the Deputy State Attorney (Criminal Affairs) directed the Police to investigate complaints regarding heinous abuse in Sinai and determined that under special circumstances, following the conclusion of the investigation, it is possible to consider indicting a non-Israeli citizen, who is currently present in Israel but participated in the heinous abuse in the Sinai Camps. A specific Directive was issued and circulated on this matter.

Case law: Trafficking in persons – sentencing

125. In regard to verdicts sentenced for trafficking offenders, please see references to three of the most prominent cases on the issue, rendered in 2012-2013:

Trafficking in persons for the purpose of slavery

126. On September 10, 2013, the Jerusalem District Court convicted a defendant of “holding a person under conditions of slavery” (Section 375A of the Penal Law) and of additional and related offences. The defendant committed all the offences against six women that lived with him and bore his children, and against his children and the stepchildren (children of the women) – 17 children in total. The defendant used various vicious methods including starvation, confinement, forced separation between a mother and her infant child, severe assaults, severe sexual assaults and different punishments in order to humiliate them and to prove their total subordination and obedience to him. On October 17, 2013, the defendant was sentenced to 26 years imprisonment, suspended imprisonment and ordered to pay 100,000 NIS (26,246 USD) in compensation to the four complainants. The State Attorney’s Office filed an appeal against the leniency of the sentence and the defendant filed an appeal against his conviction and the severity of the punishment. The appeals are scheduled to be heard in November 2014 (S.Cr.C 6749-08-11 The State of Israel v. Anonymous (Jerusalem District Court) (10.9.13)).

127. On February 29, 2012, the Jerusalem District Court convicted, for the first time, two defendants for the trafficking offence of “holding a person under conditions of slavery” (Section 375A of the Penal Law). The case involved a couple which was charged for abusive behavior and imposing slavery conditions towards its Philippino domestic care giver. Although the circumstances did not include physical violence, the couple removed and withheld the victim's passport. Moreover, during her 22 month employment period, she was denied basic rights such as work breaks, vacation days and the ability to attend church and to socialize with people outside her employment. Additionally all her movements were supervised, and when the couple went on vacation, they locked her in the house and replaced her cellular phone with one which could only receive incoming calls. Though her employers resided in a spacious villa, she was made to sleep on a folding bed in a hall leading to the bathroom. She worked from 07:00 until 22:00 and sometimes longer, only being allowed two short meal breaks. The victim was locked in the house at all times, aside from a few occasions when she accompanied the family outside the home or ran errands on their behalf, in which cases the defendants carefully followed and watched her.

128. On June 10, 2012, the Court sentenced the defendants to four months' imprisonment, to be served as a suspended prison sentence in the form of community service. Moreover, the Court ordered a 2,000 NIS (524 USD) fine and 15,000 NIS (3,937 USD) to be paid as compensation to the complainant.

129. The Court explained that the lenient sentence was given due to several mitigating circumstances. This, in addition to the fact that this is a precedential conviction, since the limits of this offence have not been set yet.

130. The legislation for the offence of holding a person under conditions of slavery has a minimum sentence of four years imprisonment, unless the Court decides there are special grounds to deviate from this minimum sentence. The grounds must be considered and noted by the Court, as was done in this case.

131. Following their conviction, the defendants appealed to the Supreme Court, their appeal is still pending. Their request to suspend the payment of the fine and compensation was denied by the Supreme Court (Cr.C. 13646-11-10 The State of Israel v. Ibrahim Julani and Basma Julani (10.6.12)).

Trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution

132. On January 12, 2012, the Tel Aviv-Jaffa District Court convicted Rami Saban and four other defendants for the offence of "trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution". This landmark case demonstrates the serious efforts of Israeli authorities, in prosecuting human trafficking offenders.

133. The facts of the case involve a central trafficking figure who operated his "prostitution business" between 1999 and 2008, both in Israel and outside the country. The main indictment was filed against eight defendants who were charged with trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, maintaining several places for the purpose of prostitution (during 1999-2006) and inducing women to leave their country to engage in prostitution and related offences.

134. Evidence presented to the Court indicated that until 2006, victims of trafficking in prostitution were brought to Israel, however by 2007, many were redirected to Cyprus as the "trade" had become too risky, even for experienced traffickers.

135. On May 10, 2012, the defendants were sentenced as follows:

136. Defendant 1 was sentenced to 16 years imprisonment, concurrent activation of two conditional imprisonments, accumulative to the imprisonment sentence, so that the defendant will serve an overall period of 18 years and 7 months. He was ordered to pay 15,000 NIS (3,937 USD) in compensation to each of the eleven victims, and fined 150,000 NIS (39,370 USD). Defendant 2 was sentenced to three years' imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, ordered to compensate one of the victims 15,000 NIS (3,937 USD) and fined

20,000 NIS (5,249 USD). Defendant 3 was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, ordered to compensate nine victims of 10,000 NIS (2,624 USD) each and was fined 100,000 NIS (26,246 USD). Defendant 4 was sentenced to six years' imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, ordered to compensate nine victims 5,000 NIS (1,312 USD) each and fined 60,000 NIS (15,748 USD). Defendant 7 was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment, suspended imprisonment, ordered to pay 300,000 NIS (78,740 USD) through forfeiture and fined 10,000 NIS (2,624 USD). One defendant was acquitted, after it was determined that his behavior was immoral but not criminal, whilst another defendant was convicted but had reached a separate plea bargain with the prosecution.

137. The defense lawyers tried to claim that as the phenomenon of trafficking in persons had been vastly eradicated in Israel, it was no longer necessary to create deterrence against it; so the Court should not make an example of this case. The Court rejected this statement and ruled that the required message to be sent was that anyone even considering committing such offences depriving another person of his or her liberty and controlling him or her in such a way, would receive the most serious of punishments (S.Cr.C. 1016/09 The State of Israel v. Rami Saban (12.1.12)).

138. These five defendants have since submitted appeals to the Supreme Court which has resulted in the following amendments to some of the sentences: the sentence of Defendant 2 was reduced to 16 months and 10 days imprisonment; the sentence of Defendant 3 was reduced to eight years and the Court added a fine of 1,235,745 NIS (324,342 USD); the sentence of Defendant 4 was reduced to four years and ten months, as he was acquitted of two offences previously upheld by the Tel Aviv-Jaffa District Court. Following this acquittal, his ordered compensation for two of the victims was cancelled; the sentence of Defendant 7 was reduced to six months imprisonment and the Court added a fine of 300,000 NIS (78,740 USD). (Cr. A. 4031/12 The State of Israel v. Rami Saban (11.12.13)).

Legislation

139. Israel's Penal Law expressly contains special provisions aimed at combating domestic violence and specifically protecting minors and vulnerable individuals from such abuse. For instance, various offences of violence in the Penal Law set harsher sentences when these crimes are conducted against family members – an assault against a family member, including spouses – doubles the maximum sentence applied in non-family circumstances. Similarly, “sexual assault against a minor” or “an abuse of a minor” set harsher punishments when the offender is the minor's guardian.

140. In addition, the Prevention of Domestic Violence Law 5751-1991 (“Prevention of Domestic Violence Law”) enables victims of domestic violence to request the Court to issue protection orders, especially restraining orders and other protection measures, by a simple and accessible procedure created for cases of domestic violence. Furthermore, the Rights of Victims of Crime Law 5761-2001 (“Rights of Victims of Crime Law”) provides protection of victims' rights in criminal investigations and for their involvement through all stages of legal proceedings.

National domestic and sexual violence investigative mechanism

141. Owing to their special characteristics, domestic violence offences require special treatment. Accordingly, a specially trained task force of 220 investigators specializing in the investigation and treatment of domestic violence and sex offences exists in Israel. Operating since 1998, the task force now has investigators in every police station around the country. As part of the Police work in dealing with violent offences against women, there is a special emphasis on conducting full investigations of complaints and on collaborating with other government officials providing treatment within the community.

142. Due to the realization that treatment of domestic violence offences requires multi-disciplinary intervention, the Police joined the “Police Social Workers” project. This is a joint venture by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, the Police and the Ministry of Public Security. This project is currently operating in 19 municipalities, as part of the national Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence, together with 16 police stations. In the framework of this project, the social worker conducts “real time” meetings with victims or the assailants, or shortly after the complaint is submitted, which allow for a prompt preliminary diagnosis and threat assessment in the police stations.

Measures to combat violence against minors

143. The treatment of cases concerning domestic violence and violence against minors is prioritized within the various District Attorneys’ Offices. The different units try to handle these cases within time frames which are much shorter than the maximum periods of time provided by law or by the State Attorney’s Guidelines. Furthermore, many cases in such offences are handled as “arrest cases”, meaning the suspect is investigated in custody and the case is forwarded to the prosecution in order to submit a request for detention until the completion of proceedings during the detainee’s arrest period. Various directives provided by the State Attorney emphasize the need to treat these cases with extra sensitivity, and include several considerations that should guide the prosecutors, for instance when conducting a plea bargain, sentencing hearings etc.

Training on domestic and sexual violence

144. The Police special task force on domestic violence investigations goes through intensive training, which includes, among other, two one-week courses regarding sexual offences and domestic violence. The training introduces Police guidelines on the issue and includes focused studies on the specific aspects of domestic violence, providing theoretical and practical information as to the social, legislative and judicial requirements and realities. For example, the participants take part in lectures and discussions regarding risk assessment, prevention of access to weapons, specific provisions of legislation, treatment of battering men, special characteristics of child-witnesses of domestic violence, models for collaboration with different welfare bodies, protection orders and their violations. In addition, the participants take part in a workshop aimed at encouraging victims of violence to come forward, including visiting a shelter for battered women. All persons who currently work as domestic violence investigators have taken part in this training, and have been subsequently approved to treat cases of domestic violence. In addition to this initial training, continued in-depth seminars and advanced studies are conducted on domestic and sexual violence, including providing updates of legislation, policy or information in this field. Furthermore, as part of weekly meetings within the various police units, all policemen are informed of new Court rulings, legislation, procedures and instructions in domestic violence treatment.

145. State Attorney’s lawyers also undergo professional training to deal with offences of domestic violence and sexual offences within the family and against women in general. Some seminars are conducted by the Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the Ministry of Justice (the “Institute”), whilst others are held by the Haruv Institute (founded by Schusterman Foundation Israel (SFI)). Additionally, seminars conducted in the prosecution units and guest lectures are occasionally dedicated to this topic.

146. Moreover, the Jerusalem District Legal Aid Administration works in close cooperation with the Center for Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence in Jerusalem. This includes conducting think-tanks headed by judges who run joint seminars for lawyers and social workers from the two organizations and cooperation on specific cases which require both therapeutic and legal attention.

Statistical data on incidents of domestic violence

147. The Police is working to prevent and uncover offences according to the characteristics of the crimes, irrespective of the perpetrator's identity and her/his classification as part of a specific segment of the Israeli population. Therefore, the statistical data is not separated by populations – geographically, religiously or otherwise.

148. As of October 15, 2013, 18,250 domestic violence cases were opened against 20,947 suspects (both men and women). The majority of these complaints were filed by women. In 2012, 21,351 cases of domestic violence were recorded (both of men and women), an increase of 4.8% compared to the number of cases recorded in 2011 (21,384). Of the total number of complaints in 2012, only in 65% of the cases (13,828 cases) women were the victims.

149. The percentages of the total number of domestic violence cases recorded by October 2013, pertained to the following complaints: 7% concerned assault and battery, 17% concerned threat offences, 17% concerned violation of a legal order, 6% concerned malicious damage to property, 1% concerned sexual offences and 12% related to other offences.

150. According to Police data, in 2013 (as at December 19), 15 women were murdered by their spouses in Israel. Of these women, four were new immigrants from the former Soviet Union, one was a new immigrant from Ethiopia, four were foreign citizens and one was an Arab woman. In 2012 (as of the beginning of November), 13 women were murdered by their spouses. This figure represents a slight decrease compared to previous years (20 women were murdered in 2011 and 18 in 2010).

151. During 2011, the Health System reported 4,761 cases of domestic violence and sexual assault of women or girls that were identified by the staff when arriving to receive medical treatment in hospitals, health clinics and mother and child health care clinics. This number is slightly higher than that reported during 2010 of 4,310 incidents. Out of all the cases reported to the health system, 3,772 incidents were located in the hospitals and health clinics and 1,039 in the Mother and Child health clinics.

152. There are 14 shelters for victims of domestic violence throughout the country; that may accommodate approximately 160 women and 320 children simultaneously. During 2012, 672 women and 992 children resided in these shelters; of which 233 (35%) of the women were from the Arab population, and 351 (52%) were Jewish, out of which 77 women were ultra-orthodox or devoutly religious.

153. Women typically reside in the shelters for a period of several months. As a general rule, the shelters are available, but under unusual circumstances when they are all at full capacity, unique and adequate solutions have been found so that all women ultimately receive an appropriate responses.

154. Two of the above 14 shelters are intended for Arab women, two other shelters have mixed Arab and Jewish women and have Arabic-speaking staff, two shelters are intended for ultra-orthodox Jewish women and two others accommodate women with special needs, in association with the Ministry of Health (each of this special needs shelter can accommodate three women). All of the shelters are operated by organizations and associations chosen by government tenders.

155. On November 5, 2012, the Knesset enacted the Welfare Service Law (Adaptation Grant for Women who stayed at a Shelter for Battered Women) 5773-2012 (“Welfare Service Law (Adaptation Grant for Women who stayed at a Shelter for Battered Women)”). According to the Law, a woman who stayed at a battered women’s shelter at least 60 days, will be entitled to an adaptation grant, provided according to a rehabilitation program within 60 days upon her leaving of the shelter. This is conditional on the fact she does not return to her former permanent place of residence. According to the Law, the grant will be a sum of 8,000 NIS (2,099 USD) for each woman, and for women with children an additional 1,000 NIS (262 USD) will be provided for each child.

156. On December 2, 2013 the Knesset amended the Welfare Service Law (Adaptation Grant for Women who stayed at a Shelter for Battered Women) to include that the grant must be paid no later than 60 days after the application for such as grant is submitted.

Treatment and rehabilitation of victims of domestic violence

157. In addition to the shelters described above, the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services provides service for treatment of domestic violence, throughout the country. This service is run through 88 centers and units, to men, women and children alike. The treatment can be both individual and/or group treatment. The centers also have inter-governmental programs such as “Friendship and Relationships without Violence” – a preventive program for minors in cooperation with the Ministry of Education, combining the provision of social workers from the centers to work with women who are victims of violence and with violent men in the police stations, and a bridging program for treatment of immigrants (in cooperation with the Ministry of Aliya and Immigrant Absorption).

158. During 2011, the centers for treatment of domestic violence received 11,750 patients: 67% women, 26% men and 7% children. 14% of the patients in the centers were from the Arab population.

159. Furthermore, the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services assists non-profit organizations to operate 11 Regional Centers for victims of sexual assault. These centers provide a hotline and first aid services to the victims, and assist them in contacting relevant services within the community. Furthermore, there are five treatment centers providing physical, mental, medical, psychiatric and legal care to the female victims of sexual assault, as well as additional social services, such as employment search and vocational training, with help from associated services within the community.

160. The treatment of female minors who have been victims of sexual assault is conducted both within special units which assist female minors at risk, and in specialized care centers established by the Child and Youth Service within the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. Additionally, most minors’ homes intended for female minors operate a designated program for female minors who were the victims of sexual assault. These programs include both individual and group therapy.

Legal support for victims of domestic violence

161. The Legal Aid Law 5732-1972, and the Legal Aid Regulations 5733-1973 (“Legal Aid Regulations”), apply in general three tests for eligibility of legal aid: the legal field of the lawsuit, financial eligibility and likelihood of winning the case. These criteria are applicable in an equal manner to all populations in Israel. Due to the commitment of the Legal Aid Administration’s to equality in granting legal aid, the database available is not divided according to populations. However, the Legal Aid Administration is set towards diverse representation; legal teams (including receptionists, administrative workers and lawyers) in the various districts across the country include employees from diverse populations, and the Legal Aid Administration also offers representation at the various religious courts.

162. The Legal Aid Administration provides representation according to the eligibility criteria provided by law, inter alia, in cases under the jurisdiction of the Family Matters Court (Regulation 5(1) to the Legal Aid Regulations). Representation is also provided for victims of domestic abuse in various civil proceedings, including:

- (a) Requests for a protection order against the violent element under the Prevention of Domestic Violence Law;
- (b) Submitting a claim for restrictive injunctions and requests for temporary restrictive injunctions in the Family Matters Court;
- (c) Submitting a claim for quiet and peaceful residence as part of an alimony claim;
- (d) Torts claim against the violent element;
- (e) Claim for the annulment of a guardianship.

Representation of Minors in proceedings according to the Youth Law (Care and Supervision) 5720-1960 ("Youth Law – Care")

163. The Youth Law – Care regulates the treatment of minors “in need” as defined by law by the welfare authorities. Section 2 defines minors “in need” to include situations such as when the guardian of a minor neglects her/his care and supervision, when a minor is subject to destructive influences, when her/his physical or mental wellbeing may be impaired. Amongst these situations are cases of minors who have experienced abuse and degrading treatment by their parents, family members or others. Section 3 defines the methods of treatment of a minor declared as “in need”, including removing the minor from the parents’ custody to the custody of welfare services if there is a fear for the minor’s physical or mental wellbeing, or her/his development.

164. The Legal Aid Administration is working to provide independent and separate representation for minors in the proceedings before Juvenile Courts, in accordance with the growing global recognition of the need for separate representation for minors. Over the past few years, there has been a substantial increase in the number of minors represented by the Legal Aid Administration in legal proceedings. The Administration has represented minors who have been subject to physical (including sexual) and/or mental abuse within their families, or in other homes in which they have been placed by welfare services, as well as represented minors who were victims of cult violence. The Legal Aid Administration assists in transferring such minors to appropriate places where they can receive appropriate care and attention.

Police handling of domestic violence in different populations

165. The Police is committed towards addressing any complaint or suspicion of an offence, including sexual offences within every population, without discrimination based on religion, race, gender or any cultural consideration.

166. As is often the case within any society, there is a general difficulty in uncovering and reporting incidents of sexual offences and domestic violence. Even more so within conservative communities, where conservative social norms create a culture that prefers resolution of problems internally, and possible imposition of “codes of silence” and refraining from reporting to the authorities. In some cases, these criminal offences are not perceived as illegal, but as legitimate behavior.

167. In attempting to overcome this difficulty, the training provided to investigators in this field directly addresses the question of traditional, conservative populations and the investigation obstacles inherent to such a cultural denomination.

168. Furthermore, the Police is fully committed to involving representatives of aid organizations for the victims of sexual assault during the investigation and the treatment of the victims, including aid centers for victims from both the Arab and the Jewish populations. The relationship between the Police and aid organizations leads to the incorporation of the aid organizations' representatives as companions for the victims of sexual assault from these populations, in order to alleviate the process for them and bridge the gap and difficulty associated with being exposed to police investigation.

169. This contact with the aid organizations contributes to the desire to increase the rate of cases reported within these populations.

Question No. 15

The deadly "Bar Noar" shooting incident

170. On July 8, 2013 the State Attorney's Office filed an indictment against Mr. Hagai Felisian in the Tel-Aviv District Court, accusing him of two counts of murder and 10 counts of attempted murder for the shooting event at the Tel Aviv social and advocacy center "Bar Noar" on August 1, 2009.

171. On March 2014, due to new evidence, this indictment was canceled. Currently the investigation of the incident is still ongoing.

Working connections between the LGBT community and the Police in Tel Aviv-Jaffa 172. Police and representatives of the LGBT Community in Tel Aviv-Jaffa have met on several occasions, during which time the Police invited representatives to contact the Police anytime, on all matters. Since then, a contact person in the central police station in Tel Aviv-Jaffa (Lev Tel Aviv), has been designated to liaise with the LGBT community. The Police station conducts organized and regular surveillance activities in the area of the LGBT center in Meir Garden and in the areas of clubs mainly attended by members of the LGBT community in Tel Aviv-Jaffa. Furthermore, in addition to the routine activity and the daily working relationship with the LGBT community, the Lev Tel Aviv station increases its activities during the Tel Aviv-Jaffa gay pride week and during the pride parade that is held, for several years, in the area of the station.

Demonstrations in Israel

173. Freedom of expression and the right to demonstrate are fundamental democratic rights strongly upheld within the State of Israel. As a rule, restrictions on demonstrations in the State of Israel apply to two kinds of demonstrations, according to Sections 83-85 of the Police Ordinance (New Version) 5731-1971 ("Police Ordinance") taking place outdoors. First, in cases of gatherings of more than 50 people who are convening to hear a lecture or speech about a topic of state interest. Second, in cases of marches of more than 50 people. These particular demonstrations require authorization according to the Law. In other kinds of demonstration, such as demonstrations by a smaller group of people, as well as immobile demonstrations which do not include speeches or lectures (however large), usually there is no need for Police authorization and these demonstrations are not subject to any administrative impediments.

174. According to Section 85 of the Police Ordinance, the organizer of a demonstration which requires such a permit is required to apply to the Police. The District Commander has the ability to either authorize the demonstrations without any pre-conditions, to require certain conditions for granting the permit, or to disallow the demonstration altogether.

175. Decisions by the High Court of Justice, as well as the Attorney General's Guidelines, have limited the discretion of the District Commander on this topic, based on the constitutional nature of the right to demonstrate. The right to demonstrate has been recognized by the High Court of Justice as a basic right, either as derived from the freedom of expression or as a distinct liberty of itself (H.C.J. 148/79 Saar v. The Minister of Interior and of Police (31.5.79)).

176. The High Court of Justice decisions have held that the Police may only prohibit a demonstration if there is a near certainty of actual damage to another protected interest, such as public safety or if the demonstration entails the committing of a criminal offence (H.C.J. 153/83 Levy v. The Southern District Commissioner of Police (13.5.84); H.C.J. 6658/93 Am Kalavie v. CO Jerusalem Station (14.7.94)).

177. Additionally, the Police may apply reasonable restrictions regarding the timing, location and manner of demonstration, in order to balance between the right to demonstrate and other rights and interests, such as freedom of movement.

The immediate coordinated return procedure

178. The practice of returning persons who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian border and were caught by the Israeli Defense Forces ("IDF"), known as the "coordinated return procedure", was put on hold by the IDF in March 2011 due to the recent geo-political changes in Egypt that no longer allowed the former coordination to take place. The Israeli commitment not to use the procedure of coordinated returns to Egypt was stated by the State to the High Court of Justice on March 2011 in H.C.J. 7302/07 Hotline for Migrant Workers v. The Minister of Defense (7.7.11), as part of the litigation on the matter. Considering the State's position, the petition was rejected by the Court on the grounds of it becoming a hypothetical petition. The State's commitment on this regard still stands and no coordinated returns are conducted.

Question No. 17

179. Israel signed the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (1951) (Refugee Convention) in 1951 and ratified it in 1954. The principle of non-refoulement enshrined in Article 33 of the Refugee Convention constitutes a fundamental principle of international law and was enshrined into Israeli case law two decades ago through the High Court of Justice ruling of H.C.J. 4702/94 Al-Tai v. The Minister of Interior (11.9.95). In the Al-Tai case, the former President of the Supreme Court, Justice Aharon Barak, determined that the principle of non-refoulement, according to which a person cannot be deported to a place where her/his life or liberty will be endangered, is not limited only to refugees. Justice Aharon Barak held that the principle of non-refoulement is applicable to any government authority decision dealing with the deportation of a person from Israel.

Case law

180. On July 7, 2013, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal filed by several Ivory Coast nationals against the decision to deny their individual requests for asylum. The appellants stayed in Israel as a result of a policy of temporary group non-refoulement protection, following the State of Israel's denial of their individual asylum requests. Following the State's termination of the temporary group non-refoulement protection policy, the petitioners requested that their individual asylum requests would be reviewed claiming that while staying in Israel they had joined the FPI political party which subsequently became the opposition party in the Ivory Coast – so they were in danger if they were to be sent back to their country. After reviewing the State's response and the evidence, the Court rejected the appeal stating that the decision of the relevant authorities was reasonable according to the evidence before them. In addition the Court stated that the appellants only proved their membership in the FPI party without demonstrating their engagement in any political activity beyond that membership. Consequently, the Court was not persuaded that the appellants' activity in the Israeli FPI branch was likely to cause their persecution, or threat to their lives or liberty, in the Ivory Coast. The Court examined the individual applications of the appellants, however, ultimately held that the appellants did not prove any overwhelming evidence of any change in circumstances that could entitle them to refugee status. Consequently, the Court held that the lower Court's decision had been given in accordance with the Law and rejected the appeal (Ad.A. 4922/12 Anonymous v. The Ministry of Interior et. al. (7.7.13)).

181. On July 7, 2012 the Jerusalem District Court ruled in a petition against the Minister of Interior's decision, following the declaration of independence of Southern Sudan, informing the nationals of Southern Sudan living in Israel that they were required to return to their country. Moreover the decision stated that beginning on April 1, 2012, enforcement activities would be taken against illegal immigrants of Southern Sudan who refuse to leave. According to the Court this decision essentially ended the temporary group non-refoulement protection policy which had applied to Southern Sudan nationals. The Court rejected the appeal, stating that due to the respondent notification that an individual examination would be made; there was no basis of the petitioners claim that there was an obligation to continue the policy of temporary group non-refoulement protection. The Court further noted that despite the fact that the respondent and the experts agree that the situation in some areas of Southern Sudan is problematic, violent and even dangerous; the petitioners did not substantiate their claim that this was the situation across the whole of Southern Sudan and would consequently endanger every national. The Court further noted that the petitioners did not demonstrate that the decision to stop the temporary policy and return Southern Sudan nationals to their place of origin (or another region in the county that does not endangers their life or liberty), was unreasonable (Ad.P. 53765-03-12 (Jerusalem District Court) ASSAF the Aid Organization for Refugees and Asylum Seekers in Israel. et. al. v. The Minister of Interior (7.7.12)).

182. Israeli law contains two main mechanisms for the deportation of a person who stays illegally in Israel: one is the Entry into Israel Law dealing with persons who have no legal permit to stay in Israel, and the other is the Prevention of Infiltration Law dealing with persons who entered Israeli illegally, not through an official border crossing point.

183. Section 13 of the Entry into Israel Law stipulates that the Minister of Interior may deport a person staying in Israel without a permit illegally, via a deportation order. The deportation order shall be in writing and the person shall not be deported sooner than three days after the order was served to him/her (unless he or she decides to leave earlier). Section 13 authorizes the Border Control Commissioner to delay the deportation for a maximum period of fourteen days, so to allow the person to attend to her/his legal matters in Israel. The Border Control Commissioner may extend this period due to special humanitarian reasons.

184. Over the years the courts have defined the authority of the Minister of Interior under this Section. Accordingly, it has been established that the Minister's discretion is subject to judicial review and that judicial scrutiny will be exercised in accordance with the court's rules concerning administrative discretion.

185. The discretion of the Minister of Interior under Section 13 has been further defined through a series of Population and Immigration Authority Procedures such as Procedure concerning the Issuance of a Deportation Order (No. 01.4.1110), which allows for a stay of deportation in certain cases, based on medical emergencies; Procedure concerning Requests to Delay Deportation/Grant Temporary Status for Medical Reasons (No. 5.2.0038), or humanitarian grounds; Procedure concerning Work of the Inter-Ministerial Committee for Granting Humanitarian Status (No. 5.2.0022).

186. Alternatively, the Prevention of Infiltration Law establishes mechanisms for persons who have entered Israel not through a declared crossing point. Section 30(a1) of the Prevention of Infiltration Law stipulates that "a deportation order under Sub-section (a) shall not be carried out until after the Minister of Defense or a senior State employee authorized by him/her has determined that this can be done, considering the personal circumstances of the infiltrator and of the country to which she/he is to be deported". According to this Section a person will not be deported without a decision by a high ranking official, on the basis of examining the individual circumstances of the potential-deportee and the country of destination for her/his deportation – two elements forming an integral part of the examination of the danger posed to the life and liberty of a person as a result of deportation.

187. In one of its most important decisions, establishing rules which limited the authority to deport under the Entry into Israel Law and the Prevention of Infiltration Law, the High Court of Justice ruled, inter alia, that the authority to deport must be exercised while taking into account the sanctity of human life and freedom, as established in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. Therefore, the Court ruled that the authority to deport may not be exercised if the deportee's life or liberty is threatened (H.C.J. 4702/94 Al-Tai v. Minister of Interior (11.9. 95)).

188. In Ad.P. 7079/12 The State of Israel v. Asmara Ahunum Germey (10.12. 12) the Supreme Court reiterated its ruling in Al-Tai and determined that the authority to deport was subject to the non-refoulement principle, according to which one may not be returned to a country where her/his life is in danger.

189. It should be stressed that issuance of a deportation orders (either through the Entry into Israel Law or the Prevention of Infiltration Law) is, like all administrative acts in Israel, subject to judicial review and may be challenged through appeal to Administrative Courts.

190. The State of Israel does not extradite a person to a State where she/he would be in danger of being subject to torture. Accordingly, before signing or ratifying extradition agreements the relevant authorities examine the human rights situation in the State in question, particularly in relation to torture.

191. Extradition proceedings to and from Israel are regulated by the Extradition Law 5714-1954 ("Extradition Law"). Section 2B(A)(8) of the Extradition Law regarding exemptions to extradition stipulates, inter alia, that a person will not be extradited to a requesting State when complying with the extradition request might violate public order in Israel. In addition, according to Section 18 of the Extradition Law, after a person is declared by a court to be extraditable, the Minister of Justice may order the extradition of the person to the requesting State.

192. On November 29, 2012, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal filed by Alexander Cvetković against the Attorney General, in which the appellant requested the Court to revoke the Jerusalem District Court's decision to extradite him to Bosnia-Herzegovina for his alleged involvement in genocide and crimes against humanity. The appellant argued that his extradition would violate public order pursuant to Section 2B(a)(8) of the Extradition Law. The appellant claimed that his right to due process would not be respected in Bosnia and that harsh prison conditions there would pose danger to his life. The Court held that a violation to public order claim would only be accepted in exceptional cases, where injury to the defendant's right to due process would be extremely severe if he was extradited; which in this case, could not be proven. The Court emphasized that Bosnia-Herzegovina had committed itself to ensuring the safety of the appellant while in its custody – by holding him in a separate wing with adequate supervision and close protection, and guaranteeing that he would be able to receive frequent consular visits. Consequently, the Court rejected Cvetković's request to revoke the lower court's decision to extradite him (Cr.A. 6322/11 Alexander Cvetković v. The Attorney General (29.11.12)).

193. On March 10, 2010, the High Court of Justice rejected a petition, in which the petitioner claimed that even though he had been declared extraditable by the District Court, the Minister of Justice's decision to extradite him to Ukraine had to be revoked due to new evidence that would create a substantive danger to his life if ultimately extradited. Moreover, the petitioner claimed that the Minister of Justice signed the extradition order without carrying out any serious examination of, or giving due weight to his arguments. The Court noted that Article 3(1) of the CAT stipulates that: "No State Party shall [...] extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture". Accordingly, the High Court of Justice determined that only in extraordinary and exceptional circumstances where there is a well-established and substantial danger to the life of a person if extradited, can the Minister of Justice choose not to order the extradition, according to Section 18 of the Extradition Law. In the present case, the Court found that there was no solid factual basis to support the petitioner's arguments, and therefore rejected the petition (H.C.J. 9420/09 Anonymous v. The Minister of Justice (10.3.10)).

Asylum seekers

194. Following are statistics compiled by the Population and Immigration Authority regarding the processing of asylum requests pursuant to the Procedure of Treatment of Asylum Seekers in Israel, entered into force on January 2, 2011. The data is provided for years 2009-2013:

 * Pursuant to the Procedure of treatment of asylum seekers in Israel, entered into force on January 2, 2011.

195. Out of the total asylum applications submitted in Israel in recent years, 2,841 were submitted by Sudanese and Eritrean who underwent an initial interview (as of March 3, 2014). 1,485 out of them were interviewed in depth. Until March 3, 2014, 453 cases were closed, out of which in two cases Eritreans were recognized as a refugee.

Process of granting refugee and humanitarian status

196. The Procedure of treatment of asylum seekers in Israel establishes the Advisory Committee to the Minister of Interior, regarding the granting of refugee status. The Advisory Committee is comprised of a chairman, who is not a civil servant, and three permanent members, from three different Ministries: Justice, Foreign Affairs and Interior. The Committee convenes once a month and additionally whenever necessary. The Committee discussed, from July 2009 until August 2013: 80 cases in 2013 (until August); 27 cases in 2012; 77 cases in 2011; 39 cases in 2010 and 19 cases in 2009.

197. Between 2010 and 2013, 30 people were granted refugee status by the Minister of Interior, following recommendations of the Advisory Committee.

198. For example, in November 2011, the Advisory Committee recommended to the Minister of Interior to grant a refugee status to an albino toddler from the Ivory Coast and her parents, due to a real risk to her life in her State of origin. It is a known phenomenon in Africa that albinos are sometimes murdered and their bodies are dissected, for trafficking in their organs. The committee's recommendation was approved by the Minister of Interior and the refugee status was granted.

199. Additionally, the Israeli Inter-Ministerial Committee for Granting Humanitarian Status in Israel, which was established according to the Population and Immigration Authority Procedure No. 5.2.0022, may grant humanitarian status to a person on a case by case basis.

Question No. 21

200. Persons who entered Israel illegally through the Sinai desert were, in some cases, held in camps (“Sinai Camps”) where they suffered heinous crimes and grave abuse at the hands of their captors, for the purpose of obtaining ransom from their family members living in Israel or abroad (“Sinai Victims”). Some of them, who were brutally injured, and in many cases were raped by the Bedouins, on their way to Israel, can be recognized in Israel as victims of trafficking in persons for the purposes of slavery or prostitution despite the fact that the offences against them were conducted outside of Israeli borders, by foreign nationals.

201. For further information on Sinai Victims please see Israel’s reply to Question 13 above.

Identification of victims of trafficking in persons in the detention facilities

202. In 2012, the IPS adopted a formal procedure to ensure a uniform and streamlined method of identifying signals raising suspicion of possible trafficked persons and relaying such information to the Police and Legal Aid Administration.

203. According to Government Resolutions No. 2806 of December 1, 2002 and No. 2607 of December 2, 2007, any case where there is a suspicion that a person may be a victim of trafficking in persons (“TIP”), the case must be transferred to the Police for investigation.

204. The IPS procedure provides that if a staff member in a detention facility believes that a detained individual has been the victim of any abuse due to slavery or trafficking, or if a detained individual alleges this to be the case, the staff member must notify and deliver a written report to the social worker in the facility. The social worker then must forward the report to the representative of the Police and Legal Aid Administration. Each of these bodies is responsible for follow-up within their respective fields of activity. Due to the importance of the issue, each Prison Director must ensure that all staff members of the detention facility are informed of the procedure. This procedure was monitored throughout its first year of implementation and results show that it has been effective and no problems or faults were detected.

205. Furthermore, every asylum seeker in a detention facility must be brought before a judge of the Detention Review Tribunal of Infiltrators' Custody. These judges are well informed and are acutely aware of the characteristics of trafficked victims, and would alert the Police of any cases they suspect to be trafficking-related.

206. Once the Police receive a report from the detention facility, an alert from a judge or other indication of a potential victim of TIP, the Police must investigate whether there is sufficient evidence that the person indeed is, or was, a trafficking victim. If the Police determine that such initial evidence exists, the victim will be transferred to a specialized TIP victims' shelter.

207. The Police's threshold for admitting a person to such a shelter is relatively low: if there is any preliminary evidence suggesting that the person might be a victim of trafficking, the person is promptly referred to a shelter. The shelters receive every individual referred to them by the Police.

208. Victims of trafficking are afforded three fundamental types of rights: shelter, free legal aid and ability to work. These rights (except for the visas granted during court cases) are not contingent upon cooperation with law enforcement. The shelters are supervised and financed by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services and run by an NGO; legal aid is State-funded, by the Legal Aid Administration of the Ministry of Justice and provided to all TIP victims; work visas are provided by the Population and Immigration Authority in the Ministry of Interior. The victims are directed to the shelters, and are also directed to aid organizations that provide additional legal aid, including with regards to the question of their status as refugees.

209. Two Governmental Resolutions on the issue of victims of TIP in prostitution, slavery and forced labor, set up the "Ma'agan" shelter for female victims and the "Atlas" center for male victims, in February 2004 and July 2009 respectively. The shelters provide holistic treatment to victims and are currently equipped to deal with a total of 88 victims: 35 places within the Ma'agan Shelter, 35 places in the Atlas Center and eighteen places within transitional apartments. In 2013, the services available for the treatment of victims of trafficking and slavery were expanded and include 18 additional places, in a new shelter for women called "Tesfa – Hope". Accordingly, the shelters are now equipped to deal with 106 victims of trafficking in persons and slavery.

210. The shelters provide all the necessary services and treatment to the victims, including meeting their physical, medical, emotional and social needs. During their residence in the shelter, a unique rehabilitation program is designed for them.

211. The shelters are staffed with professional employees of diverse backgrounds and specializations. The staff includes a manager, administrative team (including a secretary and maintenance supervisor), social workers, instructors, educators, translators, volunteers, mediators and security crew. These are complemented by two weekly visits by a doctor and visits by a psychiatrist as needed, as well as external professional instructors who lead workshops and classes such as sports, yoga, dance, arts and crafts workshops, and Hebrew and English lessons. The shelters provide an open, tolerant, attentive, sensitive and rehabilitative environment for victims of trafficking.

Legal aid for victims of trafficking

212. The Legal Aid Administration is part of the Ministry of Justice, and provides free legal assistance to victims of trafficking, in a broad range of cases, such as restitution claims, visa applications and assistance to victims in the context of civil proceedings. Among the victims assisted were victims that were held in the Sinai camps in Egypt.

213. During 2013, the Legal Aid Administration received 270 requests from victims, of which 70 requests were from victims of slavery or forced labor in Israel, and 13 requests from victims of trafficking for the purpose of prostitution or related offences in Israel; 187 requests were from African individuals who entered Israel through the Egyptian border unlawfully and were victims of cruel and degrading treatment in the Sinai Camps on their way; of which 20 requests were from unaccompanied African minors (or claiming to be minors).

214. In 2012, 40 victims who were recognized by the Police as persons who were held under slavery conditions were still detained at the “Saharonim” facility – since there was no room in the shelters for victim of trafficking in persons. In January 2013, one of the victims requested legal aid in filing a request to be released to her cousin’s house until there is vacancy in the Ma’agan Shelter. The woman claimed that staying in custody is causing her mental torment and distress. Following a meeting with the woman’s relative, who agreed to take care of the woman, a request was filed to the Detention Review Tribunal. The Tribunal rejected the request and the Legal Aid Administration appealed this decision to the Be’er-Sheva District Court. On March 6, 2013, the Court accepted the appeal and determined that the humanitarian distress in this case is severe and exceptional and ordered the immediate release of the woman to her cousin’s house until there will be a place for her at the Ma’agan Shelter.

215. In 2013, following this verdict and following requests of the Legal Aid Administration, 18 men and 36 women who were recognized by the Police as TIP victims were released from custody to relatives’ or friends’ homes until admission to the shelters. All were released following a hearing in the Detention Review Tribunal, with the presence of the family member or friend, and after an examination of their hosts.

216. Please see Israel’s reply to Question 12 above regarding the legal basis for the detention of people who enter Israel illegally.

217. Every detainee arriving to “Saharonim” detention facility is examined by a medical assistant and a physician. This initial medical treatment includes immunization, tuberculosis tests, as well as a meeting with a social worker. The detainees receive eating utensils, clothing and shoes, bed sheets and towel, toiletries, and hygiene products when needed.

218. In “Saharonim” detention facility there are health and social services including two physicians and 11 medical assistants, a dentist, and social workers. The detainees have unlimited access to the social workers and interpreters, and vice-versa. In relevant cases, a detainee is escorted to medical examinations and psychiatric treatment outside the facility.

219. In the detention facility there are public phones, postal services and TV sets with 11 different channels. Each wing includes showers, self-service laundry facilities etc.

223. The Police Education and Information Section operates educational programs aimed towards ensuring various values are incorporated into police officers' work, including tolerance within a multicultural society, elimination of prejudice, and raising awareness of the relevant human rights conventions.

224. The educational programs are run both on special educational workshop days and generally within the overall Police training framework that includes seminars and courses. In the last few years, special emphasis is given to the training of Police commanders in all levels, since they are in the best position to influence their subordinates.

225. The Police School for Investigation and Intelligence incorporates into the training of investigators and investigation officers the main provisions of the relevant human rights conventions and Law of Armed Conflict regarding procedures and investigation ethics, including "right and wrong" behaviors.

Israeli Defense Force (IDF)

226. The School for Military Law holds a variety of training activities for IDF forces regarding human rights and the Law of Armed Conflict. These activities include lectures, use of learning aids such as computer programs and comprehensive written materials.

227. Every year, hundreds of lectures are given to IDF soldiers both in mandatory service and reserve. Lectures are attended by combat forces, officers' course cadets, Military Police investigators, security analyzers and medical care personnel in detention facilities, as well as to commanders throughout the IDF.

228. These activities specifically place an emphasis on issues such as arrest and detention practices, detainee's rights, the Law of Armed Conflict and rules of conduct during an armed conflict.

229. The following are some of the tools that were developed as a part of the training activities for IDF forces stationed along crossing points:

(a) Creation of a designated security crossings unit of the Military Police, headed by an officer with the rank of Colonel. The unit operates in security crossings positioned along the security fence which was created to ensure national security by preventing the passage of terrorist factions from the West Bank into Israel. The unit was established with the specific intention, in addition to maintain security, to simultaneously uphold the quality of life of both the Israeli and the Palestinian populations;

(b) The soldiers are taught Arabic and meet with members of humanitarian organizations in order to better understand the humanitarian needs of the Palestinian population. Special emphasis is given to the issue of human dignity and the soldiers are taught a variety of relevant basic information, such as the basics of the Islamic religion and traditions, the Palestinian culture, with specific attention to cultural sensitivities and care required towards Palestinian women. In order to ensure protection of their dignity, the examination of women asking to cross the border is performed solely by Military Police women who are stationed at the crossings. In addition, the soldiers receive regular lectures from a representative of the office of the Coordinator of the Government Activities in the Territories and an officer from the Military Advocate General's Office.

Israeli Prisons Service (IPS)

230. The IPS officers and wardens undergo regular training and instructions through courses held in the School for IPS officers and wardens, as well as in their respective units. Training regarding the relevant human rights conventions is an integral part of the general IPS training at the unit level, as well as in specific courses given to officers and wardens. This training includes topics such as prevention of the use of force, ethics in the warden's work, and values of the rights and liberties of the prisoner. These issues are also routinely addressed during training and guidance of other staff member of the prisons. Additionally, ethics and values workshops were also held for the senior staff in the prisons.

231. In the recent years there have been workshops conducted for all staff members at the "Saharonim" and the "Givon" detention facilities regarding the identification of trafficked victims, as was detailed in Israel's reply to Question 21 above. These workshops are conducted by the National Anti-Trafficking Unit in the Ministry of Justice several times a year.

Israel Security Agency (ISA)

232. In 2013, the Legal Department of the ISA and dozens of ISA personnel underwent specific training on international law, including human rights law, the core human rights conventions and the work of the Human Rights Treaty Bodies.

233. Moreover, ISA interrogators are taught in detail about the relevant human rights conventions, including their implications in the unique Israeli context. This is done both during preliminary and continued ISA training. These courses and seminars aim to instill the importance of principles of human dignity and fundamental human rights, together with the upholding of the rule of law and practices stipulated by the courts.

235. It should be noted that the Turkel Commission, the Public Commission to Examine the Maritime Incident of 31 May 2010, recommended in its Second Report (February 2013)(recommendation No. 16) that the Head of the Investigations and Intelligence Department at the Police should ensure that in the framework of training the investigators, proper emphasis is placed on the relevant rules of international law, especially CAT, the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, UN Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, and the Istanbul Protocol. This recommendation applies to all of the bodies that deal with investigations into incidents to which international law applies.

236. This recommendation, as all other recommendations in the Report, shall be reviewed by the Examination and Implementation Team of the Second Turkel Report's Recommendations. Specifically, the Istanbul Protocol is being examined in order to fully understand its implications on the IPS and other authorities. As part of this learning process, on February 25, 2014, the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators ("Inspector") and the Inspector's supervisor attended a seminar conducted by the Israeli Medical Association and the Public Committee against Torture in Israel on the Istanbul Protocol and its implications.

237. Additionally, please see Israel's reply to Question 25 above.

238. The Population and Immigration Authority personnel who are trained to be part of the Refugee Status Determination Unit (RSD) undergo a four week course on topics specifically related to refugees and asylum seekers. This includes the Refugee Convention, relevant Human Rights conventions (including to the CAT) and Israeli laws, and trafficking in persons. The course was co-developed and first conducted in 2009 by the Ministry of Interior, UNHCR, the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS) and the United States Department of Homeland Security.

239. The judges of the Detention Review Tribunals of Infiltrators' Custody undergo specialized training with respect to trafficking in persons and the Sinai Camps. The most intensive training to date was a seminar regarding trafficking in persons that was conducted in 2011, attended by the all the judges of the Tribunal. Two additional seminars were conducted in 2012 regarding trafficking in persons, focusing on issues such as the cultural aspects of victims of trafficking, the identification of victims of trafficking in persons and modern slavery. Those seminars have helped in raising these judges' awareness to the victims of the Sinai Camps, as well as to victims of trafficking in persons.

240. For further information regarding human rights trainings please see Israel's reply to Question 25 above.

Question No. 29

Inspector for complaints against Israel Security Agency (ISA) interrogators

241. According to Section 49(9)(1) of the Police Ordinance, opening an investigation against an ISA employee is a discretionary decision of the Attorney General, the State Attorney or one of her/his deputies. If so decided, such an investigation will be conducted by the DIPO. However, in order to decide whether or not to conduct such an investigation, a preliminary examination is to be undertaken by the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators ("Inspector"). Following such an examination, the Inspector's findings are transferred to her/his Supervisor, a senior advocate in the State Attorney's Office, who decides if there is sufficient evidence to recommend opening an investigation.

242. Following comprehensive intergovernmental deliberations as well as several NGOs' petitions to the High Court of Justice, the Attorney General announced in November 2010 that the Inspector, which had previously been a role within the ISA, would become part of the Ministry of Justice and would be subordinate to the Director General of this Ministry.

243. This reform, which establishes an external inspector to examine complaints concerning ISA Interrogations, was supported by the Head of the ISA, the State Attorney and the Director General of the Ministry of Justice.

244. Israel is pleased to announce that the procedure of transferring the Inspector to the Ministry of Justice is complete. In June 2013, Colonel (Ret.) Jana Modzgvishvily, the former Chief Military Prosecutor, was chosen to serve as the Inspector. Recently another position in the unit was filled and a third position is scheduled to be filled temporarily. The unit in the ISA was disbanded.

Case law

245. On October 21, 2012 the High Court of Justice issued a partial judgment on a petition submitted by the Public Committee against Torture and the Swetti family requesting that the Court instruct the Attorney General to order the Department of Investigation of Police Officers (“DIPO”) to launch a criminal investigation against ISA investigators who were involved in Mahmoud Swetti’s interrogation. It was alleged that during Swetti’s interrogation, ISA officers created a false display and had Mr. Swetti believe that his father and wife had been arrested and detained.

246. The petitioners argued that no legal remedy other than filing a petition to the High Court of Justice was available by law, as criminal procedure allows the request of a review by the Attorney General only following a decision not to file an indictment, and does not include an equivalent remedy regarding a decision not to open a criminal investigation. The Court ruled that as was decided in H.C.J. 1265/11 The Public Committee against Torture et. al. v. The Attorney General (6.8.12) the petitioners can request the Attorney General to review the decision not to open a criminal investigation against the ISA investigators. The Court recommended that the period of appeal over a decision not to open an investigation in these specific cases be extended in order to allow the petitioners to request the Attorney General to review the decision (H.C.J. 1266/11 Mahmoud Swetti et. al. v. The Attorney General (21.10.12)).

247. On 12 November 2012 a final decision in the petition was rendered by the Court, allowing the submission of an appeal until 12 December 2012. The appeal was submitted and denied and another petition was submitted on the matter. The petition is still pending (3990/14 Mahmoud Swetti et. al. v. The Attorney General (pending)).

248. On August 6, 2012, the High Court of Justice issued a partial judgment regarding complaints concerning the Inspector. The petition included complaints regarding the Inspector’s authority to examine complaints against ISA Interrogators, the duty of the Police or the Attorney General (or another authorized body such as the DIPO) to investigate any complaint regarding an offence of an ISA employee, and the question of the independence of the Inspector, who was at that time, an ISA employee.

249. The Court noted that a preliminary examination, prior to a decision regarding opening a criminal investigation, may be part of the decision-making process in the State Attorney’s Office and held that such a preliminary examination is an acceptable course of action.

250. The Court also noted that in regard to the authority to order a criminal investigation, as determined by the Court in previous rulings, the authorities are not obligated to automatically open an investigation following a complaint; but rather such a duty to open an investigation is conditioned on sufficient evidence which justifies it.

251. The Court noted that in light of the principle authority to conduct a preliminary examination, and the need for sufficient evidentiary infrastructure to justify the opening of a criminal investigation, the mechanism of the Inspector and the Inspector’s Supervisor (a senior lawyer in the Israeli State Attorney’s Office of the Ministry of Justice, appointed by the Attorney General) strikes an appropriate balance between all the relative interests, in parallel with the recently completed process of the Inspector becoming part of the Ministry of Justice.

252. The Court also noted that the conducting of such a preliminary examination by someone who will not be an ISA employee, but rather an employee of the Ministry of Justice, will also serve the public interests in safeguarding the ISA interrogation methods by ensuring that efficient interrogation tools are used within the boundaries of the law, which will assist in protecting confidential information.

253. The Court recommended a minor amendment to the current Section 49 (9)(1) of the Police Ordinance, that would give the authority to the Inspector's supervisor to open investigations. This amendment is required, according to the Court, so that the same entity would be able to decide upon the opening and closing of investigations. As for the possibility to request a review on such decision, the Court held that the request should be made to the entity with supervisory powers on the authority authorized to open an investigation.

254. The Court found that the availability of an appeal process, both by requesting the Attorney General to review the Inspector's decision, followed by the possibility to petition for judicial review by the High Court Of Justice, provide adequate safeguards for complainants.

255. The Court did not examine the cases of the specific plaintiffs but rather recommended that the period of appeal over a decision not to open an investigation in these specific cases be extended in order to allow them to request the Attorney General to review the decisions (1265/11 The Public Committee against Torture et. al. v. The Attorney General (6.8.12)). Other issues that were still pending in the petition were deleted with the mutual consent of the parties (12.11.12).

256. Following the recommendation of the High Court of Justice regarding a minor amendment to Section 49(9)(1) of the Police Ordinance, the issue is under consideration in the Ministry of Justice. Furthermore, as a consequence of the High Court of Justice recommendation, currently all cases in which the Inspector's Supervisor decided not to pursue a criminal investigation are concluded in concurrence with the Deputy State Attorney (Criminal Affairs).

257. In addition, there are several pending petitions before the High Court of Justice on related matters, including: H.C.J. 2268/13 and H.C.J. 9132/12 Anonymous v. The State of Israel requesting to establish a timeframe for preliminary investigations conducted by the Inspector; H.C.J. 8899/13 Anonymous v. The Attorney General regarding the interrogations of women; H.C.J. 5722/12 A.A.G. et. al. v. The Attorney General et. al. requesting that the Court instruct the Attorney General and the State Attorney to order a criminal investigation into allegations of abuse and torture by a number of ISA interrogators involved in the interrogation of a suspect.

Question No. 30

Alleged cases of torture, ill-treatment and disproportionate use of force by law enforcement officials

258. Every complaint or report of torture, ill-treatment or disproportionate use of force is investigated promptly by the relevant authorities.

259. A number of sections of the Penal Law provide criminal sanctions against acts of torture, as was described in Israel's reply to Question 1 above. Specifically, the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty provides that there shall be no violation of the life, body or dignity of any person.

260. Another relevant statutory provision is Section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance [New Version] 5731-1971 ("Evidence Ordinance") which invalidates any confession made by an accused person which was not freely and voluntarily provided.

261. Section 34M of the Penal Law provides the defense of a person's conducting of an act if so obligated or authorized to do so according to the Law (Section 34M(1)), and if the person is acting according to an order of an authorized authority to which she/he was obligated to obey, except if the order was clearly illegal (Section 34M(2)). Where an order is manifestly illegal, as would be the case with an order to commit acts of torture, the claim that one was acting under such order does not constitute a valid defense for the committing such acts.

262. In addition, the IPS, the ISA, the Police and the Ministry of Public Security are routinely subjected to inspection by the State Comptroller.

Israel Police officers

263. The Police and the Department for Investigation of Police Officers (DIPO) in the Ministry of Justice views instances of police officers' ill-treatment and disproportionate use of force against detainees with the utmost severity.

264. Serious efforts are being undertaken to eliminate any form of such abuse. Cases of alleged violence are thoroughly investigated, using all means to exhaust an investigation and bring to justice those found to be unnecessarily violent or acting in an unreasonable manner.

265. The Police Disciplinary Tribunal is a semi-judicial administrative body which specifically deals with cases concerning unlawful use of force by police officers. It is comprised of two police officers and a public representative and has the purpose of upholding the public's trust in Police treatment of complaints regarding the unlawful use of force. The tribunal may impose penalties ranging between fines, warnings, reprimands, confinement, demotion, or incarceration.

266. In certain cases, when the use of force is relatively trivial, the Department submits complaint fact sheets, reviewed by a single Tribunal judge through an expeditious process, without legal counsel. The Tribunal considers the type of injury, the results of the use of force, the location of the offence, the officer's disciplinary record and her/his personal circumstances.

267. The DIPO is responsible for most criminal investigations against police officers. Disciplinary proceedings are initiated by a complaint submitted to the Disciplinary Department of the Personnel Division at the Police Central Headquarters, or to any of its branches. Administrative sanctions may be imposed at any time during the proceedings, or after they are completed.

Israeli Prisons Service (IPS) personnel

268. Every prisoner or detainee under the care of the IPS has access to the following complaint mechanisms concerning grievances regarding the staff and wardens', including claims of wrongful use of force:

- (a) Filing a complaint to the Director of the prison;
- (b) Petitioning the relevant District Court in a prisoner's petition, in accordance with Section 62A of the Prisons Ordinance, and the Procedures (Prisoners Petitions) Regulations 5740-1980;
- (c) Filing a complaint to the Unit for Investigation of Wardens ("UIW"), through the IPS or directly to the Unit. This Unit is part of the Police, and its members are police officers. The findings of the UIW are subject to the State Attorney's Office scrutiny, who decides whether to institute disciplinary measures or criminal proceedings;
- (d) Filing a complaint to the Prisoners Complaint Ombudsman, which is part of the Ministry of Public Security's Internal Comptroller Unit. Following the completion of such an inquiry of a complaint, and based on its findings, the complaint will either be forwarded to the UIW or the Disciplinary Branch of the IPS;

(e) Requesting a personal visit of an official visitor appointed by the Minister of Public Security, according to Section 72B of the Prisons Ordinance.

269. In addition, Section 71 of the Prisons Ordinance establishes rules for Official Visitors in prisons. These Visitors are appointed by the Minister of Public Security and are comprised of lawyers from the Ministry of Justice as well as few representatives of the Israel Bar Association who are appointed on a yearly basis, either for a specific prison, or nationwide. Section 72 of the Prisons Ordinance grants Official Visitor authority to Supreme Court judges, the Attorney General, the Chairpersons of the Internal Affairs and Environment Committee and the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee of the Knesset in prisons throughout Israel; to District and Magistrates Courts judges, in prisons in their jurisdiction. Official Visitors are allowed to enter the prisons at any given time (unless special temporary circumstances apply), to inspect the state of affairs, prisoners' care, prison management, etc. During these visits, the prisoners may approach the visitors and present their complaints, including grievances pertaining to use of force. As mentioned above, prisoners may also make a complaint to the Director of the prison and during an Official Visitor's visit, request for an interview with such a Visitor. Attorney General's Guideline (No. 4.1201. (1.5.75), updated – 1.9.2002) broadened the Official Visitors' scope of the above to also include detention cells in police stations and courts. ICRC personnel also conduct visits to prison facilities.

Israel Security Agency (ISA) interrogators

270. The ISA and its employees must act within the limits of the law and are subject to both internal and external supervision and review. This includes review by the Inspector for Complaints, by the State Comptroller, the State Attorney's Office, the Attorney General, the Knesset and every instance of the courts, including the High Court of Justice.

271. Such mechanisms for supervision of the ISA are provided for in the Israel Security Agency Law 5762-2002, which aim to ensure that the ISA acts according to its mandate and within the scope of its legislated functions, and that its members do not engage in ill treatment or disproportionate use of force.

Alleged cases of torture, ill-treatment and disproportionate use of force made before a prosecutor or judge

272. If the complaint of abuse is brought before a judge, the practice requires that she/he shall document the complaint in the court records and refer it for an investigation by the Police (in cases where the suspicion of abuse is by a civilian), or to the DIPO (in cases where the suspect of abuse is a police officer).

273. If the complaint of abuse is brought before a prosecutor, according to internal directives she/he shall document the complaint in an official memo and refer it to the Police (in cases where the suspicion of abuse is by a civilian), or to the DIPO (in cases where the suspect of abuse is a police officer). Furthermore, according to Israeli Law and courts rulings when the complaint is made by a suspect or a defendant, claiming to have been subjected to violence by the ISA, IPS or the Police, where the suspect or the defendant was investigated by the DIPO, the prosecutor should receive and forward any investigation material obtained from the DIPO to the defense lawyer, as part of her/his handling of the criminal case.

Medical treatment and reports to the authorities in cases of violence

274. During general medical training, physicians, nurses and medical staff are all taught to detect, and how to provide special treatment to, victims of violence, including victims of torture, abuse and rape. Awareness of special sensitivity required towards women and children is also taught. Physicians and medical staff are guided to pay attention to signs of violence, and to ask particular questions according to a questioning form. There is an obligation on physicians to note any suspicion of abuse and to immediately report to the Police each case in which such a suspicion arises. If there are distinct physical injuries indicating violence, the physician must ask the patient specific questions surrounding the circumstances in which they occurred, and must make a medical record of her/his suspicion of violence as well as the examinee's answers.

275. Victims of rape are usually transferred to rape centers. The staff of these centers include physicians, nurses and social workers who are specifically trained in this area; with the medical staff having participated in a specialized, three month course held in the United States. These centers are adapted to providing immediate medical services to rape victims and are equipped with technology for collecting and analyzing relevant evidence for possible indictment.

276. In instances where a victim is identified several weeks or months after a rape has occurred, they are not generally transferred to these rape centers but rather are referred for general medical treatment by a doctor (given the inability to collect relevant physical evidence weeks after a rape event). Where the doctor or member of the medical staff is satisfied that there is possible mental injury due to the event, even in instances where the victim does not have physical injuries, the victim is referred to a psychiatrist.

Question No. 31

277. Israel does not hold persons in secret facilities. Allegations of torture and ill-treatment in facility 1391 ("facility") were investigated by the competent authorities, and no grounds for criminal proceedings against any of the facility's staff members were found. This issue was later examined by the High Court of Justice, which upheld the findings.

278. To date, no detainee was held in the facility since 2006.

279. On January 20, 2011 the High Court of Justice dismissed a petition filed by Member of Knesset (MK) Zehava Gal-On and the Center of the Defense of the Individual, in which the petitioners requested the Court to reveal the location of facility 1391 and to allow members of the Knesset to visit the detention facility. The Court determined, inter alia, that the balance between the competing interests in the present case, namely parliamentary review of the facility to ensure protection of basic rights of detained individuals, versus national security interests, justified restricting the visit of Knesset members to the facility. As the State explained to the Court, specific permission had already been granted to MKs who were members of the Secret Services Subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee of the Knesset. The Court ruled that this permission guaranteed that the public interest in the existence of parliamentary review of the facility was being upheld, whilst simultaneously the public interest in keeping the location of the facility unidentified for security reasons.

280. The Court further noted that the existence of the facility was publicly known and was not denied by the State. According to the procedures, the detention of a detainee in the facility was subject to authorization by senior staff and the duration of their detention at the facility was short. The Court noted that the relevant bodies would be notified on the arrest of a person and that people would not "disappear" when they were brought to the facility. In addition, an address for inquiries for the submissions of requests was provided. The Court ruled that the procedures of the facility were in accordance with Israeli and international law.

281. The Court concluded that although the arrangement formulated by the State harmed the rights of the detainees and their families to receive information of the exact location of the facility, this harm was proportionate to the threat posed by exposing the location, due to security considerations. The Court held the harm was proportionate due to three restrictions provided for in the State's arrangement for the facility. First, people who were Israeli citizens or West Bank residents were not to be held in the facility. Second, only senior staff would be allowed to authorize the detention of a person at the facility. Third, the maximum length of detention at the facility was very short, as the main goal of the facility was use as interrogation facility in special security circumstances (H.C.J. 8102/03 MK Zehava Galon v. The Minister of Defense, and H.C.J. 9733/03 The Center for the Defense of the Individual v. The State of Israel (20. 1.11)).

Question No. 32

282. The following table indicates the number of Security Prisoners from the West Bank in Israeli prisons:

Table No. 7

Total Number of Prisoners – Residents of the West Bank – Security Prisoners 2013

	Sentenced	Detained	Total

Women	8	11	19
Total	3,498	2,700	6,228

* Another 30 prisoners are currently not considered sentenced nor detained and possibly are being shifted from one category to another.

283. Please see Israel's reply to Question 11 above regarding family visits of families of Palestinian prisoners from Gaza Strip and from the West Bank.

Question No. 33

Detention and imprisonment of minors in Israeli legislation

284. Arrest and detention of minors is regulated by the Youth Law (Trial, Punishment and Modes of Treatment) 5731-1971 ("Youth Law – Trial"). Amendment No. 14 to the Law, which entered into force in July 2009, greatly improved the treatment of minors in detention and subsequent criminal proceedings.

285. Section 10A of the Youth Law – Trial, titled "Detention of Youths as a Last Resort and Consideration for Arrest" expressly stipulates that a minor shall not be subjected to arrest if there is a way to achieve the goal of the detention through an alternative measure which impairs her/his liberty to a lesser extent; More so, it stipulates that the detention must be for the shortest time possible. When deciding to detain a minor, considerations including her/his age as well as the potential effects of detention on her/his physical and mental wellbeing, and her/his development, will all be taken into account.

286. Furthermore, Section 10C of the Youth Law – Trial stipulates that a minor under 14 will be arraigned before a judge after 12 hours.

287. Section 25 of the Youth Law – Trial stipulates that a minor may be kept in a closed residence in lieu of a detention. Additionally, in cases where there are mandatory maximum punishments stipulated by law there is no obligation to sentence minors to life imprisonment, mandatory punishments or minimum punishments, notwithstanding other provision of the law. The Section further stipulates that when sentencing a minor, the Juvenile Court shall consider her/his age at the time of committing the offence. A minor who is under fourteen at the time of sentencing shall not be subjected to imprisonment.

288. Section 26 of the Youth Law – Trial provides alternative measures which the Juvenile Court may order in lieu of imprisonment, including: placing the minor under probation; receiving a commitment from the minor or her/his parent regarding her/his future conduct; placing the minor in a closed residence facility; charging the minor or her/his parent with a fine, trial expenses or compensation to the injured party.

Representation of minors charged with criminal offences

289. Pursuant to section 18(a)(7) of the Public Defender Law, the Public Defender Order, and the Public Defender Regulations, all minors who are detained for investigation are eligible to representation by a public defender.

290. The Public Defender Office represents a significant portion of minors who are ultimately charged with criminal offences. In 2013, 14,464 proceedings were conducted in Juvenile Courts which constituted approximately 13% of the proceedings conducted by the Public Defender Office that year. In 2012, 15,484 proceedings were conducted in Juvenile Courts which constituted approximately 14% of the proceedings conducted by the Public Defender Office that year.

291. Representation of minors requires expertise in the specialized law that relates to minors; a specialization that the Public Defender Office has acquired. Lawyer-client relationships in the field also require flexibility and creativity, focusing on representation of the minor to seek a holistic approach to her/his treatment. To this end, the Public Defender Office dedicates significant efforts to finding adequate private therapeutic frameworks to present to the Juvenile Courts as alternatives to detention.

Solitary confinement of minors

292. Regulation 13 of the Youth Law (Trial, Punishment and Modes of Treatment)(Conditions of Holding a Minor in Detention or Imprisonment) 5773-2012 (“Youth Law – Trial Regulations”) determines that a confinement cell where a minor is being held shall be located within the wing where other prisoners or detainees are being held, so that the minor may maintain eye contact with the IPS wing’s staff. The regulation further provides that prison healthcare staff shall monitor the condition of such a minor, as the situation may require. Regulation 11 of the Youth Law – Trial Regulations requires that the minor’s parents be informed if a punishment of solitary confinement was imposed on their child.

Education of children in detention

293. A wide range of education services are provided to children in detention, including classes operated by the Ministry of Education that are available in the different prisons. For example, in the Juvenile Ofek Prison there are 10 classes for minors who are Israeli residents that create a continuity of the minor’s education in the community and allow the detained minor to take the matriculation certificate.

294. All the teachers in the prison school have the proper qualifications and certification from the Ministry of Education. The classes are overseen by the Ministry of Education and the Unit for the Promotion of Youth, regardless of the nature of crimes the child has committed.

295. Furthermore, please see Israel’s reply to Question 7 above.

296. All complaints submitted to the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators (“Inspector”) are examined independently, impartially and properly. So far, these complaints have not resulted in any prosecutions. However, some of them prompted changes in procedures and methods of interrogation.

297. The new Inspector has been conducting an examination of all of the means available to her in her new position. In addition, with the aim of expanding the transparency of the examination process, the Inspector conducted several meetings with representatives of the ICRC and of several non-governmental organizations.

298. In 2014, for the first time, testimonies were collected from detainees who were interrogated and were released. In addition, also for the first time, representatives of an NGO were allowed to be present in a meeting between the Inspector and a complainant – also with the aim of increasing the transparency of this process.

299. Following complaints of lengthy examinations of complaints, the Inspector, geared towards closing examinations that are overdue and with the purpose of curbing current examinations, is working to close all open complaint files regarding complaints that were served before 2013.

300. It should be mentioned that between the years 2009-2012 the vast majority of complaints submitted to the Inspector were forwarded to the Inspector by the ISA interrogators themselves, after they received complaints from interogatees.

301. For further information regarding the Inspector please see Israel’s reply to Question 29 above.

Question No. 35

Additional information of cases against police officers which concluded with a conviction

302. In 2009, 68 cases against police officers concluded with convictions. The penalties imposed in these cases included:

(a) In six cases, the offenders were sentenced to imprisonment, suspended imprisonment and compensation to the complainant or a fine;

(b) In 15 cases, the offenders were sentenced to imprisonment to be served as community service, together with suspended imprisonment and compensation to the complainant or a fine;

(c) In 20 cases, the offenders were sentenced to suspended imprisonment and compensation to the complainant or a fine;

(d) In 26 cases, the offenders were sentenced to community service and/or compensation to the complainant.

303. Since 2009, hundreds of additional cases regarding alleged use of force by police officers were investigated by the DIPO. However, the number of such cases has declined over the years: in 2010 – 679 cases; in 2011 – 526 cases; in 2012 – 344 cases (and an additional 74 cases in which an initial investigation was conducted); in 2013 – 197 cases (and an additional 91 cases in which an initial investigation was conducted). These cases alleging use of force include a variety of claims and complaints, with varied levels of violence and severity and only few of them amounting to abuse. It should be mentioned that the DIPO data system is not divided into claims or findings of abuse and therefore the cases cannot be presented according to this information.

304. A relevant case of alleged Police abuse was decided by the Jerusalem Magistrate and then District Court. On September 13, 2009, the Jerusalem District Court accepted an appeal filed by the two appellants against four policemen requesting to increase the compensation granted to them by the Jerusalem Magistrate Court. The Magistrate Court had found that the four policemen had attacked the appellants while they themselves were not subject to any danger. According to the Jerusalem Magistrates Court's ruling, after the appellants showed their valid entry permit to Israel to the policemen, they asked to search them and took them to a nearby forest, where the policemen attacked and hit them on their face, shoulders and back. The Court held, upon consideration of the physical injuries, in addition to the sense of helplessness, humiliation, insult and mental suffering, sustained, and the violation of the petitioners' right to dignity – the compensation should be raised. It awarded each of the appellants compensation of 40,000 NIS (10,498 USD) (instead of 10,000 NIS (2,624 USD)) and 15,000 NIS (3,937 USD) worth of expenses (C.A. 3128/09 (Jerusalem District Court) Anonymous et. al. v. The Israel Police et. al. (13.09.09)).

Israeli Prisons Service (IPS) officials accused of abuse

305. In recent years, the following criminal proceedings were filed against IPS wardens for allegations of use of force: against three wardens in 2013, against one warden in 2012, against four wardens in 2011 (two of which were involved in the same case), against two wardens in 2010 and against one warden in 2009.

306. The number of complaints against wardens using force against prisoners has been declining over the past four years, relative to earlier years. In 2014 (until the end of June) 25 cases were investigated by the Unit for the Investigation of Wardens (UIW) which is a part of the Police, resulting in the filing of four disciplinary statements of claim. In 2013, 57 cases were investigated by the UIW, resulting in the filing of six disciplinary statements of claim. In 2012 (until the End of October) 98 complaints were handled by the Unit for the Investigation of Prison Wardens which is a part of the Police, resulting in the filing of two disciplinary statements of claim. The most common disciplinary measures imposed upon wardens were severe reprimands, fines, confinement and suspended imprisonment. In 2011, 132 complaints were handled, resulting in three disciplinary statements of claim and one disciplinary procedure before the IPS Disciplinary Tribunal. In 2010 the unit handled 109 complaints which resulted in nine indictments and four disciplinary procedures before the IPS Disciplinary Tribunal. Finally, during 2009, the UIW handled 185 complaints which resulted in three disciplinary charges in the IPS Disciplinary Tribunal and two disciplinary procedures before the IPS Disciplinary Tribunal. The most common disciplinary measures imposed by the Tribunal were severe reprimands, fines, confinement to their place of employment and suspended imprisonment.

307. For example, on June 3, 2012 the IPS Disciplinary Tribunal sentenced a warden who was convicted of unlawful use of force, to five days of detention and seven days suspended imprisonment. On June 11, 2012 the IPS Disciplinary Tribunal convicted a warden of unlawful use of force and sentenced him to a fine and five days suspended imprisonment. On July 9, 2012 the IPS Disciplinary Tribunal sentenced a warden who was convicted in unlawful use of force to seven days suspended imprisonment and a fine.

IDF soldiers accused of abuse

308. In November 2012, the Military District Court convicted two IDF soldiers of assault under aggravated circumstances, and sentenced one of them to six and a half months imprisonment and the other to five and a half months imprisonment. The soldiers were also sentenced to suspended imprisonment and had their ranks demoted. This case involved circumstance in which a military unit was responsible for capturing and holding a Palestinian who had infiltrated Israel from the Gaza Strip. However, two of the soldiers, instead of holding the Palestinian as required according to the IDF regulations, beat him, while filming the incident with their cellular phone. The Military Court ruled that these soldiers exploited the helplessness of the Palestinian who was handcuffed and blind folded and harmed the integrity of his body and his human dignity. The Court approved a plea bargain reached by the parties while taking into consideration the defendants' personal circumstances. Additional two soldiers who were involved in this incident were also charged with assault under aggravated circumstances.

309. In another case, an IDF soldier was charged with assault and improper conduct by a soldier. According to the indictment dated October 2012, after legally detaining a Palestinian at a checkpoint and handcuffing him, the soldier proceeded to beat and kick the detainee unlawfully.

310. For further information regarding the Inspector for Complaints against the ISA Interrogators please see Israel's reply to Question 29 above.

311. Please see Israel's reply to Question 7 above.

Question No. 38

312. Israel is unable to provide additional data regarding this matter since this information is classified for national security reasons. Note that all proceedings concerning this matter are under close judicial scrutiny.

Question No. 39

Submission of complaints regarding alleged ill-treatment at IPS facilities

313. The IPS allows prisoners to file their complaints directly to the Unit for Investigation of Wardens (UIW) within the Police, either by phone, in writing via a closed envelope which can be placed in a designated mailbox inside the prison, or through the Prison Director. Please see Israel's reply to question 35 above for further information on this matter.

314. During 2011 the Unit for Investigation of Wardens (UIW) within the Police was connected to the IPS computer systems to enable the Unit's access to videos and photographs of the public areas of various prisons. The measure provides the UIW access to the best material available to fulfill its role in investigating any misconduct by prison wardens.

315. Additionally, over the past few years, digital cameras have been placed in all IPS medical clinics, and according to prison orders, any prisoner who complains about physical injury resulting from an alleged use of force (by another prisoner or by a warden) is photographed by the medic, and the documentation is maintained in the IPS computer system.

Submission of complaints regarding alleged ill-treatment by the police

316. The Police and the DIPO in the Ministry of Justice views instances of police officers' ill-treatment and disproportionate use of force against detainees with the utmost severity and if found guilty of such conduct, are dealt with accordingly, as described in Israel's reply to Question 35 above.

317. State Attorney's Guideline number 2.18 "Prosecution Policy in Cases in Which a Suspect of an Offence against an Officer Complains of Use of Force by an Officer" stipulates several principles which improve the complaint mechanism process and the review of complaints regarding police officers' violence. First, a complaint regarding use of force by police officer will be prioritized, in terms of handling, over an opposite investigation, in which a person is claimed to have used force against a police officer (i.e. forceful resistance of arrest, escaping legal custody, etc.). An indictment will not be filed against a person who used force against a police officer, until permission is obtained from the DIPO. Second, the prosecutor handling the case of a complaint by an individual against a police officer must verify that the Police have transferred all the relevant materials to the DIPO to investigate the complaint.

318. For further information regarding the Inspector for Complaints against the ISA Interrogators please see Israel's reply to Question 29 above.

Obtaining medical records in cases of abuse

319. A complainant, who claims to be a victim of ill-treatment or torture and wishes to obtain medical records, can do so in two ways. One is receiving medical documentation from the medical facility in which she/he was treated. If the complainant was detained, there is an obligation that the detainee be examined upon entering the facility and the detainee is also subsequently entitled to receive medical care at any time upon request. The documentation of these examinations is included as investigation material, if any suspicion of abuse or torture is being investigated. The second method is conducting a "Clinical Forensic Examination" within the Forensic Institute (or an autopsy, if the complainant is deceased). The examination by the Forensic Institute depends on the suitability of the case for such an examination: for legal conclusions cannot be reached for each and every physical injury. The investigation authorities, including the DIPO, maintain a direct connection with the Forensic Institute, including consultation regarding any conclusions which may be adduced from a pathological examination.

Question No. 40

Israeli Prisons Service (IPS)

320. According to Israeli Prisons Service Directives, in any case where a prisoner alleges she/he had been harmed through use of force, she/he is almost immediately questioned by the Prison Director or the Deputy Director, and any claim of unlawful use of force is immediately and directly reported to the Unit for Investigation of Wardens (UIW) within the Police, and to the relevant staff.

321. Furthermore, when the UIW opens an investigation against a warden pursuant to a complaint by a prisoner, simultaneous measures are taken according to instructions, to guarantee separation between the complaining prisoner and the warden.

Israel Police

322. Detainees and prisoners in Israel are under the responsibility of the IPS. Therefore, if they exercise their rights and lodge a complaint against police officers while in a detention facility or prison, they are not under the authority of the subjects of complaint, consequently there is no fear of retaliation.

323. Moreover, Section 249 of the Penal Law stipulates that harassing any witness in an investigation or a trial constitutes a criminal offence. Consequently, if such crimes are committed, a complaint can be filed, and will be addressed accordingly.

Independence of the judiciary in Israel

324. According to Basic Law: The Judiciary, the courts and tribunals throughout Israel must adhere to strict principles of independence from the two other branches of government. The Basic Law: The Judiciary further provides that all judges must be independent from political and financial persuasions, and are subject only to the law; “[a] person in whom judicial power is vested shall, in judicial matters, be subject to no authority but that of the law.” This applies to any person vested with judicial power (i.e. in administrative tribunals).

325. Other principles the judiciary in Israel must abide by are neutrality, fairness, impartiality, and objectivity. There is no trial by jury in Israel and court sessions are open to the public, with only a few exceptions in cases requiring the protection of a victim or witness, national security issues or discretion of the judge in circumstances of a particular case.

326. The independence of the Israeli judiciary is further demonstrated through the selection process of judges. Judicial appointments are a-political. According to the Basic Law: The Judiciary, selection is carried out by the Judicial Selection Committee, which is chaired by the Minister of Justice and further composed of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, two other judges of the Supreme Court, a Government Minister (chosen by the Government), two Members of the Knesset (chosen by the Knesset) and two representatives of the Israel Bar Association. The cross-section of the Committee ensures that there are representatives from all three branches of government and the legal profession.

327. The process of electing judges is regulated by the Judiciary Rules (Working Procedures of the Judicial Selection Committee) 5744 – 1984. As part of the process the candidates list is published in the Israeli Official Records, following which, every citizen may contact the Committee within 20 days with a reasoned explanation of opposition to a particular candidate. Only after the publication interviews are conducted with the candidates by a subcommittee of the Judicial Selection Committee. Following this, a final decision over whether to confirm or reject a candidate is made by the Committee.

328. Judicial independence continues through the judge’s term of office. The Basic Law: The Judiciary guarantees that judicial appointment is permanent. According to the Courts Law, the term expires when a judge reaches the age of 70 or upon resignation. According to Section 7(4) and 7(5) of the Basic Law: the Judiciary, a judge may only be removed from office following a decision by the Disciplinary Court or upon a decision of the Judicial Selection Committee at the proposal of the Minister of Justice, the Ombudsmen of the Israeli Judiciary or Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Such a decision must be supported by seven of the nine Committee members.

Training on the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment for lawyers and judges

329. The Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the Ministry of Justice (“Institute”) has frequently conducts many seminars, courses and vocational training days attended by hundreds of legal practitioners, to raise the awareness within the legal profession about human rights issues including those related to torture and ill-treatment. Various training courses during 2009-2014 focused on the following issues:

(a) Trafficking in persons – Legal aid to trafficked victims, treatment of trafficked victims, economical aspects surrounding the trafficking in persons phenomenon, brokers fees as a trafficking against persons offence for the purpose of slavery, NGOs whose work relates to trafficking in persons (October 22, 2009; March 16, 2010; October 16, 2013);

(b) Women and the law – Women in incarceration, women as offenders/in crime, women and terrorism (January 26, 2012; March 20, 2014);

(c) Domestic violence and sex crimes – release on probation and the protection of the public from sex offenders, the prevention of violence, rehabilitation of prisoners convicted of domestic violence or sex crimes, domestic violence and the issue of protective orders, violence against immigrants, supervision of sex offenders and assessment of the danger they pose, (March 11, 2010; November 15, 2012; December 14, 2014);

(d) Rights of the child – The civil and international perspectives, children involved in crime, child representation, children and terrorism, investigations of minors, minors as suspects, detainees and defendants in the criminal process, children victims of sex crimes (May 13, 2010; December 2, 2010; April 1, 2014; September 18, 2014);

(e) The struggle against racism and discrimination – Prevention of discrimination in public services, equality in the workplace, the Arab minority in Israeli law, offenses that concern incitement to racism, equality in law (January 30, 2014; October 30, 2014);

(f) Human Rights and the criminal process – Rehabilitation of former prisoners, punishment and alternative to punishment (February 27, 2014; July 7, 2014).

330. Similarly, the Institute of Advanced Judicial Studies for Judges also holds lectures, seminars and courses for judges of all instances on various human rights issues. Courses include topics such as trafficking in persons, equality and discrimination, Israeli Arabs (culture and customs), labor laws, social security, and immigration and refugee law.

Question No. 42

331. Persons convicted of terrorism related crimes have the same right to appeal as other individuals, as enshrined in Israeli Law.

Right to appeal in Israeli law

332. The right of appeal is enshrined in the Courts Law (Consolidated Version) 5744-1984 (“Courts Law”), and is considered to be one of the fundamental principles of the Israeli legal system (Section 17 of the Basic Law: The Judiciary; Sections 41(a) and 52(a) of the Courts Law). As a rule, the right to appeal exists regarding any criminal and civil procedure, in every instance, including military instances. There is also a possibility to request permission for a second appeal; so if a proceedings begins in the Magistrate Court, it is possible (if a second appeal request is accepted) to continue a proceedings up until the highest court in the country, the Israeli Supreme Court (Section 41(b) of the Courts Law).

333. Relating to the appellant jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, judges can sit singly on appeals of the following lower court decisions: an interim ruling of a District Court, a sentencing decision of a single District Court judge, or a sentencing or substantive decision of the Magistrate Court. Generally, however, as an appellant court, the Supreme Court will sit as a three judge panel, with a possibility for requesting re-deliberation by an extended quorum (of uneven numbers of judges of five or more) when the case includes fundamental legal questions and constitutional issues of particular importance (Section 18 of Basic Law: The Judiciary, Section 30 of the Courts Law). Another possible way is to request a re-trial for various reasons, including a fear of abuse of the law (Section 19 of Basic Law: The Judiciary, Section 31 of the Courts Law).

334. In practice, the courts mention the option of appeal and the time in which the defendant may make such an appeal, in the written judgment provided to the defendant and her/his lawyers.

335. On March 27, 2011, the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers – Arrests) was amended so that an appeal of a District Court decision concerning arrest and release must be subject to the Supreme Court's approval (Amendment No. 8). Before Section 53(a)-(a1)(1) was amended, appeal to the Supreme Court was not subject to such an approval.

Question No. 43

Compensation for victims of torture and ill-treatment

336. Israeli legislation provides the same monetary compensation regime and relevant rules for all victims; irrespective if they are victims of an offence whose circumstances contained torture or any other form of abuse and ill-treatment, or other offences.

337. Section 77 of the Penal Law authorizes the courts to include as part of sentencing, monetary compensation to the victim of an offence, up to the limit of 258,000 NIS (67,716 USD). The victim has a right to write a Victim Impact Statement which describes her/his damages including relevant documentation according to Section 18 of the Rights of Victims of Crime Law. Furthermore, the prosecutor may, when necessary, inform the victim as to ways to obtain the documentation and evidence required for determining the damages.

338. A convicted person can be required to pay compensation for the damage or suffering caused to the victim, depending on the offences which were committed, the extent of damage or injuries caused and other relevant circumstantial factors of the case. The amount of compensation to be provided will be either the value of the damage or suffering caused on the day the offence was committed, or alternatively the value of such damage and suffering on the day the decision of compensation is rendered, whichever is greater. For purposes of collection, compensation under this section is treated like a fine. Furthermore, any amount paid or collected on account of a fine when compensation is also due, shall first be allocated to compensation.

339. It should be noted that a convicted person who is required to pay compensation according to Section 77 of the Penal Law does not pay directly to the victim of the crime, but rather through the court. Hence, there is no direct contact created between the perpetrator and the victim. If the convicted person fails to pay the compensation on schedule, the Center for Collection of Fines, Fees, and Expenses, an auxiliary unit of the Ministry of Justice, proceeds to collect the relevant sum and the victim is not required to take action through the Executions Office.

340. The provision of compensation as part of sentencing is aimed to ease the victim's suffering and to prevent the need to conduct a separate civil procedure for compensation and from enduring once again the difficulties of the legal process, including testifying and cross examination.

341. Since January 2013, according to section 3A of the Center for Collection of Fines, Fees, and Expenses Law 5755-1995, if the court includes compensation under section 77 of the Penal Law to a victim who is a minor, the Center for Collection of Fines, Fees, and Expenses will pay up to 10,000 NIS (2,624 USD) immediately to the victim, regardless of whether the offender paid the money.

342. It should be noted that compensation available under Section 77 of the Penal Law does not restrict the victim's right to seek compensation under any other laws, such as under the Tort Ordinance [New Version] 5728-1968. More so, Section 77 does not restrict a victim from receiving representation from the Legal Aid Administration in such civil suits (depending on eligibility criteria).

343. If a victim of an offence believes that the amount of compensation the court awarded under Section 77 of the Penal Law is inadequate, and wishes to file a civil lawsuit against the convicted person, with or without others, she/he is entitled to do so through two different procedures. First, the victim may file a civil lawsuit according to Section 77 of the Courts Law. Such a lawsuit can be filed only against the convicted person and is submitted to the court that convicted the perpetrator and to the same judge. All factual determinations made during the criminal proceedings are admissible in the civil case without the need for the victim to reprove them. The second option is to file an ordinary and independent civil lawsuit, whether against the convicted person or against him/her and others parties who might also be liable for compensation to the victim.

Committee on claims by medical staff regarding alleged damages caused to detainees

344. In January 2012, the Ministry of Health's Deputy Director General appointed a committee to examine medical staff reports of injuries sustained by detainees, which medical staff claimed had occurred during interrogation procedures. Five distinguished members were appointed to take part in this committee, headed by Professor Tzvika Shtern. On May 2014 the appointment was revised to include four distinguished members, still headed by Professor Tzvika Shtern.

345. The committee is authorized to examine medical staff complaints by approaching relevant organizations and authorities in order to receive their responses and to recommend to the Ministry of Health the proper procedures required to handle the case. The committee is further authorized to forward such reports to the relevant authorities and to make recommendations to the Ministry of Health and the Israeli Medical Association's Ethics Board, as to continued inquiries and procedures into the matter. The committee received and examined a complaint from an NGO, after which the committee found that there was no need for it to continue handling the particular matter because the incident had already been reported to the DIPO and an indictment was filed.

346. Please see Israel's reply to Question 43 above regarding compensation to victims of torture and ill-treatment.

347. As for Israel's pardon policy, Israel's Law does not make any reference to alleged torture or abuse of detainees or prisoners and the issue of their ability to claim compensation as part of their pardons.

Question No. 45

348. The Supreme Court ruling in C.A. 5121/98 Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4.5.06) created new case law regarding the admissibility of evidence obtained illegitimately in Israel. In that case, the Supreme Court recognized two avenues for examining the admissibility of a suspect's confession. Firstly, via Section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance which stipulates that a confession by a suspect, and later a defendant, which was obtained through illegal measures impairing her/his free will to admit the commitment of the crimes of which she/he was accused, cannot be admitted as evidence in her/his trial. Secondly, a doctrine by which the court has discretion to invalidate the admissibility of evidence in a criminal proceeding, if it ascertained that it was obtained illegally and that using it during the trial would be a serious infringement upon the accused's right to a fair trial. The Yisascharov ruling was later developed in several other fundamental Supreme Court cases, and the development of the doctrine of inadmissibility of evidence is still an ongoing process within the Israeli legal system, as stated by the Supreme Court (C.A. 2939/09 Filza v. The State of Israel (15.10.09)).

349. On August 1, 2011, the Supreme Court denied an appeal filed by Mr. Eitan Farhi against The State of Israel, in which the petitioner appealed against his conviction by the Tel Aviv District Court for severe sexual offences and, in the alternative, against his sentence. The petitioner claimed that his conviction was based on, inter alia, central evidence that was obtained illegally since he agreed to give a DNA sample to the Police on condition that this sample only be used for the investigation of a particular murder case and not for the investigation of any other crimes.

350. The Court determined that using the DNA sample as evidence would infringe upon the petitioner's right to due process and to privacy and therefore concluded that the evidence should be excluded for use as evidence for deciding other crimes committed. Furthermore, the Court determined that a different DNA sample that was taken from the petitioner's cigarette in a later stage of the investigation should also be excluded, since it was taken with the purpose of legalizing the earlier DNA sample and to ensure its admissibility. The Court relied on the Yisascharov ruling and the evidentiary doctrine of relativism, which provides the Court with discretion to exclude evidence which stems from the central evidence. However, even after excluding both DNA samples, the Court ruled that the evidential basis was well established in this case, and so the appeal should therefore be denied (Cr.A. 4988/08 Eitan Farhi v. The State of Israel (01.8.11)).

351. On November 4, 2009 the High Court of Justice accepted an appeal filed by Mr. Assaf Shay regarding his conviction in the District Court of manslaughter, where he had been found responsible for a fatal car accident. The conviction was based on his statements made in the police station after the accident. The Supreme Court found that the statements were given contrary to the Yisascharov ruling, as the right to consult a lawyer was breached in two main aspects. First, the police investigator did not notify the accused before he was questioned, regarding his right to consultation with a lawyer. Second, the investigation continued despite the accused's request to consult with a lawyer. The Court ruled that this constituted a grave violation of the right to legal consultation, and so the statement was inadmissible as evidence. Following the Court's exclusion of such illegally obtained evidence, the accused was convicted of the lesser crime of causing death by negligence (Cr.A. 9956/05 Assaf Shay v. The State of Israel (04.11.09)).

352. On September 22, 2009, the Supreme Court acquitted the late Mr. Yoni Elzam who had been accused of murder, after disqualifying his confession, which the Court held had been obtained by illegal methods. Mr. Elzam had confessed the crime to uncover police officers, who had pretended to be his cellmates in order to extract a confession. The Court held this was a violation of the defendant's rights to remain silent, to legal consultation, and to a fair trial. The defendant was subsequently murdered after his confession and several hours before he was scheduled to testify against another detainee. The Court further criticized the police investigators for not allowing the defendant to meet with his new lawyer when he had requested to do so. Section 34(6) of the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers – Arrests) allows the meeting with legal counsel to be postponed under unique circumstances, and pursuant to a detailed decision in writing providing the reasons for such a delay. In this case, the Police had decided to postpone the meeting because they suspected that the suspect was on the verge of confessing to investigators (after he had confessed to the undercover policemen). However, the Court held that this was not a legitimate reason for postponing consultation with a lawyer, and thus acquitted the defendant posthumously (C.A. 1301/06 Yoni Elzam's Estate v. The State of Israel (22.9.09)).

353. In regard to Mr. Islam Dar Ayoub, please see Israel's reply to Question 7 above.

Question No. 46

354. This issue is being discussed by an Advisory Committee to the Minister of Justice on the issue of criminal procedure and evidence. The committee, headed by Supreme Court Judge Edna Arbel, has held several meetings regarding the amendment of Section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance and the discussions are ongoing.

355. Please see Israel's reply to Question 45 above regarding the current legal position of the inadmissibility of evidence (and specifically confessions) obtained by illegal methods.

Article 16

Question No. 47

356. In regard to the Jahalin tribe, please see Israel's reply to Question 7 above.

Rights of minorities in Israel

357. Rights of minorities in Israel are protected in various ways, by a series of legislative acts, regulations, case law and Government Resolutions. These legal measures ensure that, in addition to other rights, minorities are guaranteed equality under Israeli Law.

Equality in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty

358. The principle of equality is a fundamental principle in the Israeli legal system as apparent both in legislation and case law.

359. The Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, protects basic guarantees of personal freedom within the framework of Israel's Jewish and democratic character. This Basic Law stipulates, inter alia, that: There shall be no violation of the life, body or dignity of any person; There shall be no violation of the property of a person; All persons are entitled to protection of their life, body and dignity; There shall be no deprivation or restriction of the liberty of a person by imprisonment, arrest, extradition or otherwise (unless as provided by law); There shall be no violation of rights under this Basic Law except by a law befitting the values of the State of Israel, enacted for a proper purpose, and to an extent no greater than is required.

360. The Israeli judiciary, spearheaded by the Supreme Court, has a significant role in interpreting, guiding and promoting the principle of equality and the prohibition on discrimination, in the context of contentious and politically-charged or security-related issues.

Legislation

361. The right to equality, to be enjoyed by all populations in Israel, is enshrined in several legislative acts, in order to relay a clear and unequivocal message regarding the importance of this right and, accordingly, the importance of the duty to exercise equality and the prohibition of discrimination within the Israeli legal system.

362. For example, The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law 5761-2000 (“Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law”) prohibits discrimination by an individual operating a public place, to exclude certain groups from use of such a venue. Violation of the Law is both a civil wrong and a criminal offence punishable by fine. The Law applies to the State and has been applied broadly to a host of public places, including schools, libraries, pools, stores, and other places serving the public. Court decisions have upheld this broad interpretation of the Law.

363. Section 3 of the Law prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, religion or religious affiliation, nationality, country of origin, gender, sexual orientation, views, political affiliation, personal status, or parenthood, in the provision of public products or services, and in the permission of entrance to a public place, by an individual who provides such products or services, or operates a public place. Amendment No. 2 of March 30, 2011, broadened the Law’s definition for prohibited discrimination by including the act of setting irrelevant terms conditioning the enjoyment of public services or products. In addition, the Law is presumed to be violated, where it has been proven that a defendant delayed the provision of a public service or product or the entrance to a public place for persons related to a certain group indicated in Section 3, while providing without delay, in similar circumstances, for persons who are not related to that group.

364. In addition to this legislation which enshrines the obligation to ensure equality and to prohibit discrimination, and which applies to all citizens of Israel, there are also several laws which offer affirmative action, providing special opportunities for certain minority or disadvantaged groups, which suffer from discrimination. This affirmative action is intended to promote opportunities for minority groups who have historically been discriminated, to provide them with equal access to the rest of society. In the Israeli case such groups include, inter alia, Arab, Druze and Circassian and Ethiopian populations.

365. The Expansion of Adequate Representation for Persons of the Druze Community in the Public Service (Legislative Amendments) Law 5772-2012 is an example of such legislation. This Law further expanded the already existing affirmative action scheme applicable to persons of the Druze community, by requiring government corporations with more than 50 employees, as well as municipalities in which at least one tenth (but no more than 50%) of the residents are Druze, to apply the Law’s affirmative action requirements with respect Druze, for all the positions and ranks within these corporations. The amendment further mandates corporations and municipalities to actively promote the appropriate representation of their employees, by designating specific positions to be fulfilled by Druze candidates and by guiding the corporations and municipalities when considering candidates with equal credentials, to give preference to the applicant belonging to this minority group. These requirements apply to all types of job openings as well as internal promotions within government corporations and municipalities.

366. The Expansion of Adequate Representation for Persons of the Ethiopian Community in the Public Service (Legislative Amendments) Law 5771-2011, is a similar law to provide greater employment opportunities for the Ethiopian community in the public service. Enacted in March 28, 2011, this Law drastically expanded the already existing affirmative action scheme applicable to individuals who were born in Ethiopia or who have at least one parent born in Ethiopia, by requiring Government Ministries and agencies, government corporations with more than 50 employees, and municipalities, to apply the Law’s affirmative action requirements with respect to persons of Ethiopian descent, for all the positions and ranks within these bodies. Similar to the equivalent Druze legislation, the amendment requires that such governmental bodies designate specific positions to be fulfilled by candidates of Ethiopian descent and provides guidance to these bodies about preferential allocation of jobs to Ethiopian candidates, both as new roles and internal promotions.

367. On June 12, 2013, the Haifa Magistrate Court validated an agreement between the plaintiffs and respondents and awarded each of the plaintiffs 25,000 NIS (6,561 USD) as they were refused by a contractor to purchase an apartment in Acre, allegedly due to the fact they were Arab Israelis. The suit was filed in accordance to the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law. Israel Land Authority was also one of the respondents and as part of the agreement stated that it would, within 90 days, add to its contracts with the entrepreneurs of building projects a sanction of agreed compensations whenever it would find that the entrepreneurs have violated the obligation not to wrongfully discriminate in the process of marketing the apartments to the public (C.M. 12-12-1749 Sami Huari et. al. v. Moshe Hadif Building and Investments LTD (12.6.13)).

368. On May 22, 2012, the High Court of Justice accepted petitions filed against the Government of Israel by residents of the Arab and Druze localities of Mazra'a, Kisra-Smia and Beit-Jann. These petitioners challenged the fact that they had not been included among localities eligible for tax benefits, and that the criteria for such eligibility was not defined. The Court ruled that the lack of criteria for determining the tax benefits discriminated the residents of Mazra'a, Kisra-Smia and Beit-Jann, since they were not eligible for tax benefits while adjacent Jewish localities were eligible. This arbitrary distribution of public resources contradicted the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and infringes upon their basic right to equality. Subsequently the Court granted tax benefits to the residents of Mazra'a, Kisra-Smia and Beit-Jann. However, the Court suspended its Judgment for one year in order to allow the Government and the Knesset to establish clear criteria for eligibility for tax benefits until May 23, 2013. In the absence of new legislation, the three Druze localities: Mazra'a, Kisra-Smia and Beit-Jann have since been receiving tax benefits (H.C.J 8300/02 Gadban Nasser et. al. v. The Government of Israel et. al. (22.5.12)).

Demolition of homes of perpetrators of suicide attacks

372. The demolition of houses resided in by those who committed grave terrorist attacks, such as suicide bombings or kidnappings is a lawful method used in accordance to Regulation 119 of the Defense Regulations (State of Emergency) 1945. The legality of this method, used deterrence and not as a punitive measure, was upheld in numerous cases by the Israeli High Court of Justice, relating both to houses situated in the West Bank as well as in Israeli territory.

373. For further elaboration on this matter, see Follow-up responses of Israel to the concluding observations of the Committee against Torture (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4/Add.1), paras. 70-75.

Demolition of structures due to planning violations

374. Urban and regional planning law and polices exist in order to provide structure and facilitate the needs of local populations, both current and future. In Israel, local municipalities, together with the Government, implement urban and regional planning law and polices in order to ensure both individual and public needs are fulfilled. However, there are many houses built without required permits and contrary to various planning laws and planning policies. Illegal constructions have a harmful effect on the broader local population interests, and consequently in some situations the Government and/or local municipalities must decide whether or not to deal with the illegal construction by demolition.

375. All demolitions are decided upon without distinction on the basis of race or ethnic origin of the owner or the tenant of the structure. If demolition of a structure is decided, it is conducted in accordance with due process guarantees. These include the right to a fair hearing, which is subject to judicial review and the right to appeal. Those affected by a demolition order are entitled by law to appeal to the Supreme Court.

376. In 2013 (until August 15), 13 demolition orders against illegal construction were implemented in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. In one case, the demolition was carried out by the illegal structure's owner. For comparison, in 2013, 46 demolition orders were implemented in the western neighborhoods of Jerusalem. In 2012, 24 demolition orders against illegal construction were executed in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. In six cases the demolition was carried out by the illegal structure's owner. For comparison, in 2012, 48 demolition orders were implemented in the western neighborhoods of Jerusalem. During 2011, only several demolitions were carried out in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. In addition, during 2010, 23 structures were demolished.

Other Issues

Arrangement to release Corporal Gilad Shalit in exchange of prisoners

378. During October 2011, Israel agreed to exchange with the Hamas terrorist organization, prisoners convicted of planning, participating in and executing terrorist activities, in order to secure the return of Corporal Gilad Shalit, an IDF soldier who had been kidnapped by Hamas and kept in captivity for over five years.

379. As part of this exchange, certain prisoners, serving life sentences for terrorist related activities, which had not yet finished serving their time (some were released after serving short periods of time), were released upon their consent on condition that they would voluntarily leave for other countries instead of returning to the West Bank or Gaza. The periods during which they would not return to the West Bank or Gaza were stipulated in the release arrangements. The exchange did not require them to forgo any of their rights, and deportation orders were not issued. It should be stressed that no one was subjected to forceful exile, and the entire process was based on consent.

380. The arrangements also included provision for some of the released prisoners to gradually return over the course of a few years, subject to coordination with Hamas.

Question No. 53Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003

381. Following the incessant wave of terrorist attacks in March of 2002, when 135 Israelis were killed and 721 were injured, the Government decided in May 2002 to temporarily suspend the granting of legal status to Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza living with their Israeli citizens or residents' spouses in Israel. This had previously been recognized through the process, and intention, of creating family unification. Subsequently, the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003 ("Citizenship Law (Temporary Provision)") was enacted in July 2003, limiting the possibility of granting residents of the West Bank and Gaza Israeli citizenship, even in situations which had previously called for family unification. Prior to the implementation of the Citizenship Law (Temporary Provision), in dozens of cases, people who had received Israeli status based on family unification reasons, were found to have been involved in various terrorist activities against the Israeli population.

382. The Law enables entry to Israel for the purposes of medical treatment, employment, or other temporary grounds, for an overall period of up to six months.

383. The Law's constitutionality has been scrutinized twice and in January 2012 been upheld by a majority of the High Court of Justice sitting in an extended panel of eleven judges (H.C.J. 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07 MK Zehava Galon et. al. v. The Minister of Interior et. al. (11.1.12)).

384. The Law has been extended several times and it is currently in force until April 30, 2015.

Question No. 56

391. Despite periodic consideration of its position on the matter, Israel is not planning on ratifying the Optional Protocol at this stage as it is not persuaded that this will provide substantial added value to the eradication of torture or ill-treatment, given the well-established mechanisms that already exist in Israel for these purposes. As detailed above and in the previous reports, Israel's legal system affords numerous opportunities, for individual and groups alike, to seek remedies and redress for any alleged violations of CAT. This equally applies to people in detention or imprisonment, who have various internal and judicial mechanisms available should they feel their rights have been infringed.

Question No. 57

Significant developments in the legal and institutional Framework regarding human rights

Ratification of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities

392. Israel is pleased to report that in September 2012, the Israeli Government ratified the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (“CRPD”).

393. Israel signed the CRPD on March 30, 2007, and since then undertook extensive work in order to ratify this important Convention, including the examination of relevant legislation and preparation of required legislative amendments.

394. The ratification procedure was led by the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities in the Ministry of Justice, with the participation of other relevant Government Ministries, among them the Ministries of Social Affairs and Social Services, Foreign Affairs and Finance.

395. This ratification is an important step in enhancing the protection of human rights in Israel, particular those of persons with disabilities.

Legislation – general

396. On June 10, 2013, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 26 to the Religious Judges Law (Dayanim) 5715-1955, which stipulated at least one of the two representatives (from the Government, Knesset and the Israeli Bar Association) of the Committee in charge of appointments of Religious Judges for the religious Jewish courts in Israel, must be female. Additionally, the 11th member of the Committee must be a rabbinic advocate that will be elected by the Minister of Justice. These amendments are intended to provide better representation for women in this important Committee.

397. In August 2011, Amendment No. 4 to the Student’s Rights Law 5767-2007 was enacted, which provided that every academic institution must determine modifications accorded to students on account of fertility treatment sessions, pregnancy, childbirth, adoption or receiving a child for foster care or custody. This amendment is intended to promote gender equality and provide solutions for a variety of family units, by increasing the flexibility related to filling academic assignments.

Police detention and search

398. On October 14, 2012, the Tel Aviv Magistrate Court criticized the Police for an unnecessary detention of a person suspected of theft for 24 hours. The suspect was held in custody on the grounds of potential foiling of investigation efforts and causing risk to a person’s security, despite the fact that his questioning had been completed, and thus the investigation had been concluded. The Court held that although this was not a case of false detention (as the detainee was, indeed, a suspect), the arrest was unnecessary and the detainee could have been released by the police officer on duty at the station, without a request for release being filed to the Court (which was what caused such a delay in the release). The Court emphasized that the Police, in its enforcement capacity, should serve as a role model for all other State authorities in adhering to the letter of the law and not abusing or neglecting to use its authority. The Court reiterated that suspects should be considered innocent until proven guilty, and that mere suspicions should not lead to detention, or unnecessary extended detention, except in unique circumstances stipulated by law (Re.R. 4082-10-12 The State of Israel v. Shimon Haliyah (14.10.12)).

399. On January 9, 2011, Haifa's Magistrate Court ruled concerning a lawsuit filed by Dina and Eduard Zorkin against the Police, in which they claimed for compensation due to their psychological injuries caused by the police officer during a search of their apartment. The Court determined that the claimants were unlawfully assaulted by the policemen, and emphasized that the authorities are not exempt from tort liability. The Court ruled in favor of the claimants and awarded them 35,000 NIS (9,186 USD) and 25,000 NIS (6,561 USD) respectively in compensation (C.C. 2599-08 Dina Zorkin et. al. v. The Israel Police (9.1.11)).

Due process

400. On April 3, 2013, the High Court of Justice ruled on a petition in which the petitioner claimed he had a right to question, during a judicial review before the Military Court, the ISA interrogator in his case about the extension of his administrative detention. The Military Court denied the request to do so, suggesting rather that the defense lawyer direct his question to the Military Prosecutor, and stated that the decision whether to subpoena an ISA interrogator would depend on the answers provided. The Court ruled that although ISA interrogators could be subpoenaed to appear before a Military Court for the purpose of judicial review, the procedure is a unique one and there is no obligation to do so. The Court commended the Military Court's discretion in offering a gradual solution (questioning the Prosecutor and then making a decision whether to subpoena the ISA interrogator) and dismissed the petition (H.C.J.1738/13 Abid Al-Hakeem Bawatnee v. Justice of the Military Court of Appeal (3.4.13)).

401. On December 12, 2012, the Supreme Court addressed the issue of paraphrasing confidential material in order to assist the defendant in criminal cases. In this case, the State based its indictment on confidential materials, and the defendant received a paraphrase of this material while his appeal (regarding the confidentiality of the materials) was pending. The State claimed that this paraphrase was granted ex gratia. The Court held that receiving a paraphrased version of the confidential material used to indict the defendant is part of the defendant's entitlement to any material which may assist him/her in preparing his defense. The Court determined that the State's protecting against the disclosure of confidential evidence is subject to the principle that in cases where evidence is necessary for the accused's defense, the confidentiality of the evidence must be lifted; which in turn may lead to the cancellation of the criminal procedure and to the acquittal of the accused, if such confidential evidence is required to be revealed. In this particular case, the Court did not find that the confidential material contained necessary information to the accused's defense (excluding one issue on which the Court did reveal more information) and therefore denied the appeal (Cr.C. 3811/12 Muhammad Agabaria et. al. v. The State of Israel (10.12.12)).

Foreign workers rights

402. On June 22, 2014 the High Court of Justice decided that within a year, the State must establish special health arrangements that would approximate the rights and guarantees of foreign domestic workers who have resided in Israel over a lengthy period of time, to those that apply to Israeli residents.

403. Justice Edna Arbel, in her ruling, stated that foreign workers could not be treated merely as a means that produce certain social benefits, while turning a blind eye to their own rights and requirements. The Court ruled that the right to health constituted a basic human right that is in the core of the right to live with dignity. Accordingly, the Court concluded that a failure to issue regulations that apply the health rights of National Health Insurance Law 5754-1994 to foreign domestic workers who have resided in Israel over a lengthy period of time was unreasonable (H.C.J. 1105/06 Worker's Hotline v. The Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services et. al. (24.6. 14)).

Discrimination

404. On September 9, 2013, the Haifa District Court sentenced a man to four years in prison after he was convicted of arson and threats of a racial nature against a group of Ethiopian tenants of a residential building in Haifa where the convicted person's mother lived. At four different occasions the accused threatened the tenants by calling "to burn the Ethiopians down" and in two occasions he set fire to one of the tenants' car and to the building's entrance. The Court noted that: "there exists a clear sense of hatred and racism manifested in the accused's actions and words. This phenomenon must be rejected and uprooted." (C.C. 40112-07-12 State of Israel v. Logasi (9.9.13)).

405. On November 10, 2011, the Tel Aviv-Jaffa Magistrate Court accepted a suit filed by a man, claiming he was refused entry into a nightclub in Tel Aviv-Jaffa due to his skin color. The Court stated that the club violated the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law, since no reason regarding the refusal of entrance was given. Moreover, the respondents failed to prove that their business' policy did not constitute prohibited practice of costumers' discrimination on the grounds of race and/or origin, as required by the Law. The Court stated that according to the Law, the club's owners were liable for the violation, since they did not prove they have taken reasonable steps to prevent discriminative behavior at their business. The Court awarded the plaintiff compensation of 17,000 NIS (4,461 USD) (C.M. 969-03-11 Jacob Horesh v. Tessa Bakikar LTD (10.11.11)).

406. In 2011, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission represented 21 Arab employees who claimed they had been fired by their employer, a supermarket chain, because of their Arab nationality. The Commission claimed that the law prohibited dismissal based on this ground. The Court accepted the petition and annulled all 21 dismissals, and determined that the employer had to conduct a hearing for each of the aggrieved employees prior to any possible dismissal (58041-03-11 Sawiti Anas et. al. v. Almost Free Warehouse Chain Store R.A. Zim Direct Marketing L.T.D.).

407. An additional case that was examined by the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission concerned indirect discrimination against Arab taxi drivers. Following receipt of a complaint by an Arab taxi driver who was denied employment by a taxi company which provided a transport services to Ben Gurion Airport, the Commission investigated the basis for such exclusion. As part of its review, the Commission discovered that the tender for such transport services between the Airports authority and taxi company, included a clause which required that taxi drivers had to have completed national army service. This precondition for employment automatically disqualified Arab drivers, who do not (unless they voluntarily chose to) complete military service in Israel. Following its inquiry, the Commission called for the discriminatory clause to be cancelled. The taxi company did so and subsequently hired the Arab driver who had submitted the case to the Commission; and other Arab drivers were invited to apply for additional similar positions.

408. On September 6, 2009, the Tel Aviv-Jaffa Labor Court ruled that the prerequisite of serving military service set by Israel Railways Company as part of its requirements for employment of new supervisors constituted discrimination against citizens who do not serve in the IDF. The Court emphasized the importance of the right to equality and the prohibition of discrimination, which form the basis of all other basic rights, as well as the values of democracy, and noted that the law also prohibits indirect discrimination (C.M. 3863/09 Abdul-Karim Kadi et. al. v. Israel Railways et. al. (6.9.09)).

Same-sex couples

409. The prohibition of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is an important part of the Israeli legislation and can be found in several laws, including the Patient's Rights Law 5756-1996, Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5748-1988 and Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law.

410. On September 3, 2012 the Jerusalem Magistrate Court ruled in favor of a lesbian couple, which sued the Yad HaShmona Guest House for its refusal to provide venue for the couple's nuptial party. The guest house stated the couple's sexual orientation as grounds for its refusal and claimed that Yad HaShmona, the owner of the guest house, is a locality of Messianic Jews, which regard homosexual relationships as contradicting their religious beliefs. The Court held that the Guest House meets the definition of "public place" under the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry to Public Places Law. Therefore, the owners are prohibited from refusing to hold an event on grounds of sexual orientation. The Court addressed the balance between religious freedom and the prohibition of discrimination and rejected the defendants claim that this instance may be construed as an exception under Section 3(d)1 to the Law, which states that religious discrimination is permissible "where it is required by the character or nature of the ... public place". The Court ruled that this exception should be interpreted carefully so as to allow discrimination only in limited situations, such as in public places of worship. The Court ruled that the appellants will be compensated with 30,000 NIS each (7,874 USD) that will serve both for restitution and for education and awareness raising to human dignity and equality (C.C. 5901-09, Yaacobovitch et. al. v. Yad HaShmona Guest House and Banquet Garden et. al. (3.9.12)).

411. On June 17, 2014 the Jerusalem District Court rejected an appeal filed by Yad HaShmona and reaffirmed that appellants could not rely on the said exception, as the business was not religious in character and did not provide religious services. Moreover, the Court noted that the appellant operated a business that depicted itself as open to the entire public and was therefore committed to the obligations this entailed. The Court stressed that the principle of equality was a fundamental principle of Israel's legal system and that discrimination seriously harmed human rights, as it could lead to humiliation and undermine human dignity (C.A 5116-11-12 Yad HaShmona Guest House and Banquet Garden v. Yaacobovitch et. al. (17.6.14)).

412. On September 7, 2012, the Tel Aviv District Labor Court recognized three children (twins and a boy), who were born to a homosexual couple in two different surrogacy procedures within two months from each other, as triplets for the purpose of an enlarged birth grant payment from the National Insurance Institute. The Court interpreted the National Insurance Law 5755-1995 so that the intention of the legislator was to relieve the burden on parents and support them when having more than two babies. The Court emphasized that the law should be adapted to the modern social reality in which there are different family units and parenting options, as outlined in legislation in the Agreements for Carrying Embryos (Approval of an Agreement and Status of an Infant) Law 5756-1996. (L.C. 12398-05-11 S.S.K et. al. v. The National Insurance Institute (7.9.12)).

413. On September 14, 2010, the Supreme Court ruled that the Jerusalem municipality had to allocate financial support towards the Jerusalem Open House for Pride and Tolerance activities. On appeal by the Open House, the Court emphasized that the Municipality was to provide support, as it would to any other social organization, and that the funding was not specifically to fund special needs of gay community members

414. On January 31, 2010, the Regional Labor Court held that a same-sex spouse, who becomes a widower, is entitled to receive dependent's pension under the law. The Court held that it could come to this decision, despite the fact that the couple had not disclosed their relationship to their families or friends. The Court stated that in examining whether the couple should be recognized as a couple by the test at common law, the Court should take into consideration the special circumstances of this type of relationship, and in such cases, it should adapt the burden of proof for establishing their relationship. In this case, the Court recognized the spouses as a couple based on the common law definition, on the basis of mutual residence and joint household, and consequently the widower was entitled to receive his spouse's pension (La.C. 3075/08 Anonymous v. "Makefet" Pension and Compensation Center LTD (31.1.10)).

Representation of women in the civil service and in decision-making positions

415. The advancement of gender equality and the promotion of women's rights have been on the agenda of every Israeli Government since the foundation of the State of Israel. The Equal Rights for Women Law 5711-1951 ("Equal Rights for Women Law"), enacted only three years after the State was founded, is a testimony to the emphasis placed on gender-related issues dating back to the State's inception.

Legislation

416. On June 23, 2014 the Knesset approved an amendment to the Local Authorities (Election Financing) Law 5753-1993. According to the amendment, a party list, which at least one third of its elected council members are women, shall receive 15 percent more public financing (a sum determined by the number of seats the party list has received in the election proportionate to the total number of council seats). The amendment applies to municipalities as well regional and local councils.

417. On March 30, 2011, the Knesset enacted the Expansion of the Appropriate Representation of Women Law (Legislative Amendments) 5771-2011 ("Women Representation Law"). This law amended both the Equal Rights for Women Law and the National Commissions of Inquiry Law 5728-1968, to obligate appropriate representation of both men and women in national inquiry committees of the Government. The new Female Representation Law amended the Equal Rights for Women Law such that the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in the Prime Minister's Office (the "Authority") must establish a list of women who are suitable and qualified applicants to take part in such committees. According to Section 3(4)(3) of the Amendment, a woman who considers herself suitable to be included in the Authority's list, may apply to the Authority to be included. According to Section 3(4)(5)(a) of the Amendment, in cases where the appointing body is unable to locate, on its own initial search, an appropriate female candidate to become a committee member, the appointing body must then enquire with the Authority for details concerning appropriate female candidates for the committee's area of specialization.

Arab population within the civil service

418. Since 1994, the Government has implemented measures to enhance the integration of the Israeli Arab and Druze populations into the Civil Service, such as issuing of tenders for mid-level positions solely to members of these minorities.

419. On September 14, 2011, the Civil Service Commissioner ("Commissioner") applied to all the Government Ministries' General Directors as well as to the National Hospitals'

Directors, regarding the promotion of appropriate representation of the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations within the Civil Service. In its letter, the Commissioner referred to both Civil Service (Appointments) Law 5719-1959 and Government Resolution No. 2579 as legal duties obligating the General Directors to implement appropriate representation of the said population among their employees. The letter further mentioned that the Civil Service Commission is operating in accordance with these duties and cooperating with the Government Ministries towards the integration of the Arab population within the Civil Service.

420. In order to achieve the objective set by the Government, the Commissioner requested each Ministry to consolidate, in collaboration with the Civil Service Commission Planning and Supervision Department, a detailed plan regarding the advancement of appropriate representation for Arab, Druze and Circassian populations within the timetable set by the Government. According to the Commissioner's request, the Ministries must designate positions for these minority populations and specify the measures that will be taken by them in order to encourage appropriate candidates to apply for positions at the Civil Service.

421. In January 2012, the Civil Service Commission issued a letter to all Government Ministries and State Hospitals' Director Generals, regarding a new procedure for hiring employees to conform with Government Resolution No. 2579, by which at least 10% of the Civil Service employees should be of the Arab population. According to the new procedure, every Ministry or auxiliary unit must refer to the Planning and Supervision Department any request for the hiring of new employees. The Department will then determine the minimum number of positions that will be manned by people from the Arab population. Any Ministry or unit that meets the 10% requirement is then exempt from this procedure. According to the procedure, the allocation of the new positions to be manned by Arab candidates will be as follows: If there is a request for three or more new positions – at least 30% shall be designated for Arab employees. If there is a request for two new positions – at least one of them (50%) shall be manned by Arab employee and if there is a request for only one new position – it shall be manned by an Arab candidate.

422. In 2011, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission (part of the Ministry of Economy) established a project with the European Union, to focus in 2012-2013 on integrating Israeli Arabs into the Israeli work force. The project included seminars, awareness raising activities and research activity on the following key topics: the promotion of diversity and integration of all Israeli populations to finding employment in the public sector; the integration of the Arab population in the private sector, and the required decrease in the salary gaps between men and women.

Data regarding current representation of Arab, Druze and Circassian employees in the civil service

423. The percentage of Arab, Druze and Circassian employees in the Civil Service has steadily increased over the last few years: from 6.97% in 2009, 7.52% in 2010 and 7.78% in 2011. By 2012, 8.37% of all the Civil Service employees were Arabs, including Bedouins, Druze and Circassians (5,520 employees out of 65,953). In April 2014, 8.82% of all the Civil Service employees were Arabs, including Bedouins, Druze and Circassians – 6,451 employees out of 73,100 – an increase of 1,469 Arab employees (26.6%) within two years.

424. As of June 2013, 1,730 positions in the Civil Service had been specifically designated for members of the Arab population (309 of which were new positions created and were in various stages of manning).

425. Furthermore, in order to better inform Israeli Arabs of the specialized tender positions available in the Civil Service and to improve working conditions of these populations, the Government ran a media campaign in 2012 through the “Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and Circassian Populations” in the Prime Minister’s Office. Simultaneously, a specialized website was established in which tenders, information and successes stories were published – to make the Civil Service more accessible to the Arab population.

426. An increase of Arab population representation in the Civil Service is also evident in percentages of Arab employees in Government Ministries. In 2012, 38.5% of employees in the Ministry of Interior were Arab. In 2012, 13.04% of employees in the Ministry for Development of the Negev and Galilee were Arab, and prior to that in 2011, 16.28% were Arab (in increase from 12.1% in 2009). In 2012, 10.09% of employees in the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services were Arab; whilst in 2012, 7.33% of employees in the Ministry of Justice were Arab, an increase from 6.94% in 2011. In 2012, 6.75% of employees in the Ministry of Tourism were Arab. In 2012, 6.56% of employees of the Ministry of Transportation were Arab, an increase from 5.47% in 2011.

427. In 2012, an overall percentage of 14.28% of all new employees integrated into the Civil Service were Arabs, Druze and Circassians, a continued increase from 12.77% in 2011, 11.09% in 2010, and 9.3% in 2009.

428. The number of Arab women employed in the Civil Service has also increased in recent years. In 2012 there has been an increase of 14.4% compared to 2011 (2,140 in 2012 compared to 1,869 in 2011). The rates of Arab, Druze and Circassian newly integrated female employees are also on the rise. In 2011, 44.8% of all recently accepted Arab, Druze and Circassian employees were women (compared to 35.9% in 2011).

429. An increase is also evident in the number of Arab, Druze and Circassian individuals with academic degrees being employed by the Civil Service (53.7% in 2012, 52.58% in 2011 and 50.37% in 2009). This trend correlates with the general governmental position to specifically allocate Civil Service positions to be filled by Arab, Druze and Circassian individuals with higher education.

430. Many of the Arab-Israeli employees within the Civil Service obtain and maintain senior level positions, with decision-making capacity. Civil Service employees from this population fulfill important roles such as investigative engineers, clinical psychologists, senior tax investigators, senior economists, senior electricians, geologists, department comptrollers, lawyers and educational supervisors. Data indicates an increase of 6.6% in the number of Arab employees holding senior positions in 2012 (543 compared to 509 in 2011). These employees serve the good of the Israeli community as a whole and are a driving force behind the integration of the Arab minority into the Israeli society.

Persons with disabilities in the civil service

431. In 2012, the Civil Service designated for the first time 90 positions for persons with disabilities. A circular regarding these positions were disseminated to all Government Ministries. This was done in order to better integrate people with disabilities into the Civil Service and workforce generally.

Persons of the Ethiopian population in the civil service

432. The Ethiopian population constitutes approximately 1.5% of the Israeli population; this number paralleling the percentage of Ethiopians who are represented in the Civil Service (approximately 1.4%). In order to increase Ethiopian representation in the Civil Service, particularly for those with higher education, Government Resolution No. 2506 of November 2010 created 30 positions (13 of which were new), specifically to be fulfilled by people of Ethiopian decent. The resolution was implemented in 2013, and has increased the Ethiopian population representation in Civil Service. The current increase of Ethiopian workers in Civil Service, in a variety of positions, is ongoing.

Question No. 58

Administrative measures

Segregation of women in the public sphere

433. On January 5, 2012, the Attorney General appointed an inter-ministerial team headed by the Deputy Attorney General (Civilian Affairs) to examine the marginalization of women from the public sphere in certain places across the country. The team was established following an increasing number of instances reported of discrimination against women and their exclusion from the public sphere, often through verbal and physical violence. The establishment of the team followed the creation of a separate, but connected, inter-ministerial committee for the prevention of exclusion of women from the public sphere, that was headed by the Minister of Culture and Sport.

434. The team appointed by the Attorney General was directed to examine the legal aspects surrounding this phenomenon and to provide recommendations (including any possible legislative amendments) to combat this discrimination, either through criminal or administrative measures.

435. Representatives from the Ministries of Transportation and Road Safety, Health, Interior, Communication, and Religious Services appeared before the team; as did representatives from the Police, the Commission for Equal Employment Opportunities, and the Second Authority for Television and Radio. The Legal Advisor to the Municipality of Beit Shemesh also presented to the team, as some of the reported incidents of segregation of women in the public sphere were in this municipality. The team also received applications from various individuals, organizations and Knesset Members regarding the issue. These applications presented a variety of views and opinions about the discrimination and the public segregation between men and women which sometimes occurred in Israel. The team examined all the views presented to it.

436. The Ministry of Justice team submitted its report with recommendations to the Attorney General in March 2013 (following the inter-ministerial committee's report provided to the Government on March 11, 2012). As a preliminary remark, the team emphasized that discrimination of women, which sometimes manifested itself as an "exclusion of women", is a grievous phenomenon characterized by discrimination against any and all women. This discrimination, it submitted, undermines the foundations of the democratic State of Israel, which recognizes the human value of all people.

437. The team then continued to provide recommendations on specific issues:

(a) The separation between men and women during funerals in certain cemeteries, and the prohibition on women to give a eulogy, amounts to wrongful discrimination. The team recommended that the Ministry of Religious Services provide for the immediate cessation of these prohibitions on women (with an exception in cases where the deceased's family expressly requests the implementation of such measures, following which the Jewish burial society should be permitted to provide for this temporarily);

(b) The segregation between men and women in certain national ceremonies and events. The team explained that the responsibility to protect human rights is entrusted first and foremost on the public authorities. Therefore, a Government Ministry or another public authority is not authorized to conduct a governmental or national event where men and women are separated. The committee noted that women have a full and equal right to take part in these events, both as audience members and as participants. The team also noted that at such public events, the posting of any signs, placing of any barriers or any other measures taken in order to direct a crowd for separate seating or participation, is also prohibited. This is so, even if it is requested by some of the participants. The team noted that the only exception to this recommendation relates to events of a religious nature, and when the public authority believes that the vast majority of the attendees desire such separation for religious reasons;

(c) The team recommended that the Ministry of Health undertake to end any segregation in Health Funds branches where segregation between men and women occurs. The committee held that such separation is unwarranted given the focus on medical care provision to a patient should be done only using medical considerations. The team also recommended that the Ministry of Health should act immediately to ensure the relevant Director General issues a circular on this matter;

(d) The team noted that the problem of separation on certain public bus lines still persists, and is occasionally accompanied by verbal insults, and sometimes threats, towards women. The team recommended that on all public bus lines, women's boarding of buses through the back door (as is done in segregated lines) be prohibited and that all passengers be required to board through the front door and pay the driver directly. Additionally, the committee noted that all passengers must be allowed to freely choose their seat. The team recommended that the Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety order operators of public buses to immediately cease from allowing any passenger to board through the back door. In addition the team recommended that the Ministry increase the enforcement and supervision of public transportation companies, to ensure equal and non-discriminatory use of public transportation services;

(e) The team noted that signposts calling for women to choose different routes or dress modestly express a message that women are not free to use any area of the public sphere equally; and infringes upon women's human dignity. The team recommended that municipalities which hold the authority to regulate the matter of posting signposts in the public domain and provide licenses for such signposting must refrain from allowing such posts calling for segregation under its control. The team recommended that when considering whether to call for removal of certain signposts, the municipality shall attach great importance to the harm the signs will likely cause, and if found to be severe, should act not only for their removal but also for the prosecution of the people responsible for placing, according to the law. The team also recommended that the Ministry of Interior should exert its monitoring and supervising authorities in order to ensure that the municipalities will uphold their duties regarding this issue;

(f) According to the team, the policy of the "Kol Ba-Rama" radio station not to broadcast women's voices or hire women as broadcasters infringes the fundamental rights of equality and freedom of expression. The team noted that the fact that this station is intended for a religious public does not mitigate these discriminations. The team advised the Second Authority for Television and Radio to end this policy within a six month time frame and to remove this discriminatory platform.

438. The team members were divided whether a legislative amendment for criminal sanctions was required to deal with this discriminatory phenomenon. On the one hand, some held that the severity of the phenomenon warranted stricter effective sanctions, by characterizing these actions as criminal offences. On the other hand, some advocated that the use of criminal law, which is one of the strongest tools that the Government has to control the public, is too powerful and intrusive to be used in situation where such behavior which, although wrong and offensive, may not necessarily be characterized as criminal. These advocates instead suggested that administrative measures should be implemented.

The team recommended leaving this decision for the Attorney General to decide, together with the other recommendations specified throughout the report.

439. Recently, the Attorney General decided to promote a draft bill containing criminal offences on the issue. The draft bill is still in legislation stages.

Circulars of the Ministry of Education Director-General on the prevention of abuse of helpless minors

440. The Ministry of Education has a clear policy regarding the prevention of the abuse of helpless minors. The Ministry policy is automatically activated when any information regarding pupils who have been abused is received, such that the social services or to the Police are contacted to enable intervention and treatment to the pupil who was allegedly abused.

441. The Ministry of Education's policy is stipulated in Circulars of the Ministry of Education Director General:

(a) Circular of the Ministry of Education Director General 5769/3(b) "The Duty to Report a Crime Committed against a Minor According to The Law and The Questioning of Pupils as Victims or Witnesses" provides for reporting requirements the supervisor of the minor within the family or from outside the family, of any suspicion of an offence committed against a minor. The Circular emphasizes the responsibility of the education system to report of any injured pupils and to respond in a professional manner when the information is received.

(b) Circular of the Ministry of Education Director General 5763/6(b) "Educational System's Mandatory Reporting Mechanism for Dealing with Teachers who have Injured Pupils" stipulates the required instructions when a suspicion regarding pupils injured by a teacher arises. The Circular states that a duty to report is applicable in cases where a suspicion arises that a pupil is being abused. According to the Circular, corporal punishment is considered physical violence, and there is a duty to report it.

442. Furthermore, the Circular of the Ministry of Education Director General 5770/a(3) "Promoting Safe Climate and Coping with Violent Incidents in Educational Institutions" expressly and comprehensively outlines the prohibition of corporal punishment in schools. This Circular conforms to the Pupils' Rights Law 5761-2000 ("Pupils' Rights Law"). The Circular emphasizes that a teacher or school's response to a pupil's violation of disciplinary rules, needs to be proportionate, reasonable and suitable to the level of the violation. In any case where discipline actions may be taken against the pupil, the accusations must be explained to the pupil and she/he must be given the opportunity to respond. This opportunity for the pupil to be heard must take place, to every extent possible, before a decision is made regarding possible disciplinary actions against the pupil. Contrary to this requirement, the Circular provides that the school staff may take disciplinary actions without first hearing from the pupil, if an immediate response is required or when there are other justified circumstances.

443. The Circular further stipulates that the school code must be in accordance with the Pupils' Rights Law and in particular with Section 10 of this Law, which provides that a pupil should be disciplined, when necessary, in a manner that respects human dignity. This includes not being subject to physical or degrading disciplinary measures.

444. The Circular forbids the punishment of pupils in any of the following forms: any types of corporal punishment, degrading punishment (insult in public, verbal abuse that might include mockery, insult or humiliation), transferring a pupil temporarily to a lower grade, reducing a grade for inappropriate behavior, responding in a way that might jeopardize the pupil or harm her/his safety or health, and punishing a pupil for something her/his parents did or did not do.

Additional measures

Additional vocational days for non-Jewish religious holidays

445. Haifa is Israel's third largest city in population and has residents of Jewish, Islamic, Christian and Druze faiths. The Haifa University student population is a reflection of this multi-faith community. In May 2013, the Haifa University Senate decided to institute three additional days of university vacation according to the most important holidays of the Christianity, Islam and the Druze religion – Christmas, Eid Al-Fitr (Feast of Breaking the Ramadan Fast), and Eid al-Adha (also called Feast of the Sacrifice). The holy days are in addition to other days of existing holidays of other religions. This decision was made following the work of a special committee established by the University, with the participation of students' representatives. According to Haifa University's President, this decision reflects the University's vision to promote academic excellence in research and teaching, whilst simultaneously maintaining tolerance and acceptance.

Question No. 59

Implementation of the Committee's previous concluding observations

446. The State of Israel adheres to the Convention and the values it upholds, including the implementation of the CAT Committee's Concluding Observations, as demonstrated throughout this 5th Periodic Report by the State of Israel to the CAT Committee.

447. The seriousness which the State of Israel attaches to human rights matters is demonstrated by the establishment in 2011 of a joint inter-ministerial team, headed by the Ministry of Justice's Deputy Attorney General (Legal Advice), specifically to review and implement the Concluding Observations of the various Human Rights Committees, including those of the CAT Committee.

448. This inter-ministerial team meets to examine the various U.N. Human Rights Committees' Concluding Observations and following its work since its establishment has made several significant changes with regards to human rights legislation in Israel.

449. Currently the inter-ministerial team is headed by the Ministry of Justice's Deputy Attorney General (International Law) and only recently was convened to further discuss the last CRC Concluding Observations.

Cooperation with civil society in the preparation of periodic reports to the Committee

450. When preparing its periodic reports to the CAT and other UN Human Rights Committees, Israel makes a concerted effort to involve civil society in the process, to every extent possible. Prior to commencing the drafting of such a periodic report (such as this current one) – the various UN Human Rights Committee's documents are studied, including the previous reports of other countries, Concluding Observations and General Comments issued by the Committee since the last Israeli report was submitted. In addition to letters that are sent out to all the relevant Ministries and Governmental bodies, letters are also sent out to the relevant and leading NGOs, inviting them to submit comments prior to the compilation of the report, both through direct application, and a general invitation to submit remarks posted on the Ministry of Justice web site. Civil Society contributions are given substantial consideration during the drafting of the Report. In addition, the Ministry of Justice actively seeks data and information on the relevant NGOs' websites, such information may include legal action taken by these NGOs as well as also opinions and reports on various issues.

451. Since 2012, the Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs participate in a joint project which aims to improve cooperation between State authorities and civil society organizations, specifically relating to the reporting process to the UN Human Rights Committees. This joint project was initiated by the Minerva Center for Human Rights at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Faculty of Law. The ultimate goal of this project is to enhance the cooperation between the parties in implementing Human Rights Conventions in Israel in the best possible manner.

452. The first stage of this joint project entailed creating a joint forum, attended by representatives of various State authorities and civil society organizations, as well as academics. The forum continues to meet occasionally in order to improve the cooperation and knowledge-sharing between the parties, and to discuss the preparation of Israeli reports submitted to UN Human Rights Committees, as well as the Concluding Observations implementation in Israel. Once an Israeli draft report to the UN Human Rights Committee is concluded by the State, civil society organizations are invited to comment on it prior to its submission.

453. The first periodic report that was chosen for this project was the 4th Periodic Report by the State of Israel to the ICCPR Committee. The second periodic report that was chosen was this report, the 5th Periodic Report by the State of Israel to the CAT Committee. This Periodic Report's draft has been sent to the relevant civil society organizations in order to receive their input on it.

Dissemination of human rights conventions to the general public

454. All of the Human Rights Conventions and Protocols that Israel is a party to can be found on the website of the Ministry of Justice in Hebrew, English, and Arabic. Also, the full body of work with the United Nations human rights committees, including Israel's initial and periodic reports, lists of issues adopted by the committees, replies to the lists of issues, concluding observations adopted by the committees, follow-up to Israel's oral presentations as requested by the various committees in their concluding observations and other related documents can also be found on the Ministry of Justice's website.

455. In 2012, all the concluding observations relating to Israel adopted by all the human rights committees were translated to Hebrew and published on the Ministry of Justice website. Where available, links to the United Nations translation into Arabic of those concluding observations are also published.

456. In 2012, Israel also began the process of translating its periodic reports to the United Nations human rights committees into Hebrew, and, once completed, those will also be published on the Ministry of Justice website in due course.

Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Distr.: General
3 June 2016

Committee against Torture

Concluding observations on the fifth periodic report of Israel*

1. The Committee against Torture considered the fifth periodic report of Israel (CAT/C/ISR/5) at its 1416th and 1419th meetings (CAT/C/SR.1416 and 1419), held on 3 and 4 May 2016, and adopted the present concluding observations at its 1428th and 1429th meetings, held on 12 May 2016.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee expresses its appreciation to the State party for accepting the simplified reporting procedure and submitting its fifth periodic report under it, as it improves the cooperation between the State party and the Committee, and focuses the examination of the report as well as the dialogue with the delegation.

3. The Committee appreciates the dialogue with the State party's delegation and the responses provided orally and in writing to the questions and concerns raised during the consideration of the report.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the ratification by the State party of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, on 28 September 2012.

5. The Committee also welcomes the legislative and judicial measures taken by the State party in areas of relevance to the Convention, including:

(a) The adoption of Amendment No. 14 to the Youth (Trial, Punishment and Modes of Treatment) Law 5731-1971, in July 2009, which, inter alia, gives precedence to rehabilitation over punishment for children accused and/or convicted of a crime;

(b) The Supreme Court ruling in Ad.P 7079/12 The State of Israel v. Asmara Ahunum Germey (10.12.12), in which it reiterated its previous jurisprudence that the authority to deport may not be exercised if the deportee's life or liberty is threatened, and determined that the authority to deport is subject to the principle of non-refoulement.

* Adopted by the Committee at its fifty-seventh session (18 April-13 May 2016).

6. The Committee further welcomes the initiatives of the State party to adopt policies and administrative measures to give effect to the Convention, including:

(a) The establishment in 2010 under government resolution 1796 of an independent public commission mandated, inter alia, to assess whether the existing mechanisms for investigating alleged violations of the laws of armed conflict meet the State party's obligations under international law (Turkel Commission);

(b) The establishment in 2011 of a joint interministerial team, headed by the Ministry of Justice Deputy Attorney General, to review and implement the concluding observations of human rights treaty bodies;

(c) The adoption in 2012 by the Israeli Prison Service of a formal procedure to ensure a uniform and streamlined method for identifying signals raising suspicion of possible trafficked persons and relaying such information to the police and legal aid administration;

(d) The appointment in 2012 by the Deputy Director General of the Ministry of Health of a committee to examine medical staff reports of injuries sustained by detainees;

(e) The transfer in 2013 of the role of the Inspector for Complaints against Israel Security Agency interrogators from the Israel Security Agency to the Ministry of Justice;

(f) The establishment in 2014 under government resolution 1143 of a team to review and implement the recommendations contained in the second report of the Turkel Commission.

C. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

Pending follow-up issues from the previous reporting cycle

7. While noting with appreciation the information provided by the State party under the follow-up procedure (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4/Add.1), the Committee regrets that the recommendations identified for follow-up in its previous concluding observations concerning basic safeguards for detainees, allegations of torture and ill-treatment by Israeli interrogators, and house demolitions (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, paras. 15, 19 and 33, respectively), have not yet been fully implemented.

Scope of applicability of the Convention

8. The Committee regrets the State party's continued argument that the Convention does not apply in all the Occupied Territories and notes that this position is contrary to the views of the Committee as set forth in its previous concluding observations (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 11), other treaty bodies and the International Court of Justice. The Committee notes with appreciation the statement by the delegation that the comments made by the Committee regarding the scope of applicability of the Convention "will be brought to the attention of the highest levels of [the] Government, and will be given serious consideration". While acknowledging that during the dialogue the State party's delegation addressed the Committee's questions relating to the Occupied Palestinian Territory, the Committee regrets that the written report did not contain detailed information on the implementation of the Convention in it (art. 2).

9. Recalling its previous concluding observations (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 11) and its general comment No. 2 (2007) on the implementation of article 2 by States parties, the Committee calls on the State party to immediately reconsider its position and acknowledge that the Convention applies to all individuals who are subject to its jurisdiction. In this respect, the Committee reaffirms that the Convention applies to all territory and persons under the jurisdiction of the State party, including the Occupied Territories, in accordance with the Committee's general comment No. 2 (2007), the views of other treaty bodies and the jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice.

National human rights institution

10. While noting the State party's support for the establishment of a national human rights institution in line with the Principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (the Paris Principles) expressed in the context of its universal periodic review by the Human Rights Council (see A/HRC/25/15, para. 136.25 and A/HRC/25/15/Add.1, para. 9), the Committee is concerned that such an institution has not yet been established (art. 2).

11. The Committee recommends that the State party establish an independent national institution for the promotion and protection of human rights in full compliance with the Paris Principles.

Definition and criminalization of torture

12. The Committee remains concerned that a specific offence of torture based on the definition in article 1 of the Convention has not yet been adopted. It notes that a bill incorporating a separate offence of torture into Israeli law is in the process of being drafted by the Ministry of Justice at the instruction of the Attorney General (arts. 1, 2 and 4).

13. Recalling its previous recommendations (A/57/44, para. 53 (a), and CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 13), the Committee calls upon the State party to take the measures necessary to speed up the process aimed at incorporating a specific offence of torture into domestic law and to ensure that the offence provides for a definition of torture that is in full conformity with the definition contained in article 1 of the Convention and for penalties that are commensurate with its grave nature, in accordance with article 4 (2).

Necessity defence

14. The Committee regrets that the State party has not provided the information requested by the Committee on use of the necessity defence in the context of interrogations. The Committee recalls that article 2 (2) of the Convention provides that the prohibition of torture is absolute and non-derogable and that no exceptional circumstances whatsoever may be invoked by a State party to justify acts of torture. In this respect, the Committee is concerned that the necessity defence, which is contained in section 34 (11) of the Penal Law as a defence afforded to any defendant in criminal cases, has not been explicitly excluded for cases involving torture. Thus it could still be invoked post factum as a possible justification for torture in the context of interrogations carried out in situations involving impending threats to human lives and as a result lead to a lack of proper accountability (art. 2).

15. The Committee recommends that the State party incorporate into domestic law the principle of the absolute prohibition of torture in conformity with article 2 (2) of the Convention and, recalling its previous recommendations (A/57/44, para. 53 (i) and CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 14), that it completely remove necessity as a possible justification for torture.

Access to a lawyer and arraignment before a judge

16. While noting that as a general rule persons deprived of liberty are enabled to meet with their lawyer without delay, the Committee remains concerned that legislation still permits that these meetings be delayed under certain conditions, which in the case of detainees accused of security-related offences could extend for a maximum of 21 days under the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers — Arrests) Law 1996-5756 and for a maximum of 60 days under the law applicable in the West Bank. While noting that as a general rule persons arrested without a warrant must be brought before a judge as soon as possible and no later than 24 hours following the arrest, the Committee is also concerned that legislation still allows that this period be delayed for up to 96 hours in relation to persons accused of security-related offences (art. 2).

17. The Committee recalls its previous recommendations (A/57/44, para. 53 (c) and CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 15) and recommends that the State party adopt the measures necessary to ensure, in law and in practice, that all persons deprived of liberty, irrespective of the charges brought against them, the law applicable to them or wherever they may be located, are afforded all legal safeguards from the very outset of the deprivation of liberty, including the rights to be assisted by a lawyer and to be brought before a judge without delay.

Audio-visual documentation of interrogations of security suspects

18. Recalling its previous recommendation (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 16), the Committee is concerned that the requirement under the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law 5762-2002 that the police carry out audio or visual recording of criminal suspects' interrogations does not yet extend to the interrogation of persons accused of security-related offences owing to several extensions of temporary section 17 of the law, which provides for such exception. While regretting that the said law does not apply to interrogations by the Israel Security Agency, the Committee notes with interest that the Ministry of Justice is conducting staff work regarding the implementation of the recommendation made by the Turkel Commission and the Implementation Team (Ciechanover Commission) relating to the installation of cameras in all Israel Security Agency interrogation rooms, which will broadcast to a control room, regularly and in real-time, via closed-circuit. However, it regrets the lack of clarity about whether such interrogations will also be recorded so as to be available to be used as evidence in courts (arts. 2 and 11).

19. The State party should adopt the legislative and other measures necessary to ensure the compulsory audio-visual recording of all criminal suspects' interrogations, including those of persons accused of security-related offences. Audio-visual footage should be monitored by an independent body and kept for a period sufficient for it to be used as evidence in courts.

Independent medical examinations of persons deprived of liberty

20. The Committee is concerned at allegations of instances in which physicians of the Israeli Prison Service have failed to report injuries indicative of abuse and regrets not receiving information about the number of cases of suspected torture or ill-treatment identified and reported by Israeli Prison Service medical staff to the police during the reporting period. While taking note of the statement by the delegation that physicians serving in Prison Service facilities perform their duties as required by the law and the universal rules of medical ethics, the Committee notes that these professionals are directly employed by the prison services, which may compromise their independence (art. 2).

21. The State party should urgently take the measures necessary to guarantee in practice that physicians and other medical staff dealing with persons deprived of liberty duly document all signs and allegations of torture or ill-treatment and report them without delay to the appropriate authorities. It should also consider transferring responsibility for all types of health care of persons deprived of liberty to the Ministry of Health in order to ensure that medical staff can operate fully independently from the custodial authorities.

Administrative detention and Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law

22. The Committee reiterates its previous concerns regarding administrative detention and detention under the Unlawful Combatants Law 5762-2002 in the State party (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 17). In particular, it is concerned that, pursuant to relevant legislation, detainees may be deprived of basic legal safeguards as, inter alia, they can be held in detention without charge indefinitely on the basis of secret evidence that is not made available to the detainee or to his/her lawyer. The Committee takes note of the affirmation by the delegation that the number of people in administrative detention increased since September 2015 with the escalation of violence. In this connection, the Committee is gravely concerned that at the time of the dialogue there were 700 persons, including 12 minors, in administrative detention. It is further concerned that three of those persons have been held in administrative detention for more than two years. The Committee also notes that at the time of the dialogue there was one person held under the Unlawful Combatants Law (arts. 2 and 16).

23. The State party should:

(a) Urgently take the measures necessary to end the practice of administrative detention and ensure that all persons who are currently held in administrative detention are afforded all basic legal safeguards;

(b) Take the measures necessary to repeal the Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law 5762-2002.

Solitary confinement and other forms of isolation

24. While taking note that a prisoner can be held in solitary confinement as a punishment for infractions to the Prisons Ordinance for a maximum of 14 non-consecutive days, the Committee is concerned that persons can also be held in separation, allegedly in conditions of isolation that are similar to those prevailing in solitary confinement, during significantly longer periods for interrogation purposes or for other reasons such as State or prison security. In this respect, the Committee notes with concern the reports that persons who suffer from mental health problems can also be held in separation if they are deemed to pose a threat to themselves or other inmates. The Committee is further gravely concerned that solitary confinement and separation can also be applied to minors and, in this respect, it expresses concern at allegations that many children have been held in separation for interrogation purposes. The Committee regrets the lack of statistical data from the State party on the use of separation during interrogation (arts. 2, 11, 15 and 16).

25. The State party should:

(a) Ensure that solitary confinement and equivalent measures are used only in exceptional cases as a measure of last resort, for as short a time as possible and subject to independent review, in line with international standards;

(b) Put an immediate end and prohibit the use of solitary confinement and equivalent measures for juveniles and persons with intellectual or psychosocial disabilities;

(c) Compile, provide to the Committee and regularly publish comprehensive disaggregated data on the use of solitary confinement and equivalent measures.

Hunger strikes

26. While taking note of the affirmation by the delegation that hunger strikes are handled with the utmost sensitivity to the prisoners' rights, the Committee is concerned at allegations of instances in which prisoners who engaged in hunger strikes were punished or subjected to ill-treatment. It is also concerned that, on 30 July 2015, the Knesset passed the Amendment to the Prisons Ordinance Law (Prevention of the harm caused by hunger strikes), which, according to the information provided to the Committee, allows the President of the District Court or his/her Deputy to authorize, under certain conditions, medical treatment of hunger strikers, including feeding, without their consent. While taking note that to date this amendment has not been applied and that its validity is currently under consideration by the Supreme Court, the Committee considers that feeding against the will of persons deprived of liberty on hunger strike who are able to take informed decisions would constitute ill-treatment in violation of the Convention (art. 16).

27. The State party should guarantee that persons deprived of liberty who engage in hunger strikes are never subjected to ill-treatment or punished for engaging in a hunger strike and are provided with necessary medical care in accordance with their wishes. It should also take the legislative and other measures necessary to ensure that persons deprived of liberty, competent to take informed decisions, who engage in hunger strikes are never subjected to feeding or other medical treatment against their will, as these are practices that may amount to torture or ill-treatment.

Juvenile detainees

28. While taking note of the provisions of the Youth Law (Trial Punishment and Modes of Treatment) 5731-1971 relating to the arrest and detention of minors and of positive developments in the juvenile military justice system applicable in the West Bank, including the establishment of a juvenile military court in 2009, the increase of the age of majority from 16 to 18 years for the purposes of adjudication in 2011 and other measures providing for safeguards and guarantees for minors, the Committee is concerned at reports that such legal developments are not always implemented in practice, in particular with respect to Palestinian minors accused of security-related offences. In this respect, it is concerned at allegations of many instances in which Palestinian minors were exposed to torture or ill-treatment, including to obtain confessions; were given confessions to sign in Hebrew, a language they do not understand; and were interrogated in the absence of a lawyer or a family member. The Committee is also concerned that many of these children, like many other Palestinians, are deprived of liberty in facilities located in Israel, thus hindering access to visits of relatives who live in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. The Committee is further concerned that at the time of the dialogue there were 12 minors in administrative detention and 207 Palestinian minors residents of the West Bank in detention for security-related offences (arts. 2, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16).

29. Recalling its previous recommendation (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 28), the Committee calls upon the State party to redouble its efforts with a view to:

(a) Ensuring that the deprivation of liberty of minors, irrespective of the charges brought against them, is a last resort, limited to the shortest possible period, and that it is reviewed daily with a view to eliminating it;

(b) Systematically ensuring that all minors deprived of liberty are afforded all the basic legal safeguards from the very outset of the deprivation of liberty; that they have a lawyer and/or a trusted adult present at every phase of the proceeding, including during interrogations; and that evidence obtained without observing these provisions are inadmissible in court;

(c) Preventing, investigating and adequately sanctioning practices involving torture or ill-treatment. It should also ensure that minors who were victims of torture or ill-treatment are afforded appropriate redress, including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible;

(d) Facilitating visits from relatives and friends, in accordance with international standards.

Allegations of torture and ill-treatment

30. The Committee is concerned at allegations of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment of persons deprived of liberty, including minors. According to these allegations, torture and ill-treatment are mostly perpetrated by law enforcement and security officials, mainly from the Israel Security Agency, the police and the Israeli Defence Forces, particularly during arrest, transfer and interrogation. In addition, the Committee remains concerned at allegations that Israel Security Agency interrogators continue to resort to interrogation methods that are contrary to the Convention, such as stress positions and sleep deprivation, and regrets the lack of clarity about the use of restraints during interrogations. The Committee is also concerned at information received that there is no proper accountability for torture and ill-treatment. In this respect, while taking note of the assertion by the State party that all complaints submitted to the Inspector for Complaints against Israel Security Agency interrogators are examined independently, impartially and properly, the Committee is particularly concerned that so far none of the hundreds of complaints brought against them have resulted in prosecution (arts. 2, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16).

31. The State party should:

(a) Reaffirm the absolute prohibition of torture and publicly warn that anyone committing such acts or otherwise complicit or acquiescent in torture will be held personally responsible before the law for such acts and will be subject to criminal prosecution and appropriate penalties;

(b) Take effective measures with a view to ensuring that interrogation methods contrary to the Convention are not used under any circumstances and avoid the use of restraints during interrogation as much as possible or apply them, only if strictly regulated, as a measure of last resort, when less intrusive alternatives for control have failed and for the shortest possible time;

(c) Ensure that all instances and allegations of torture and ill-treatment are investigated promptly, effectively and impartially and that alleged perpetrators are duly prosecuted and, if found guilty, punished with sentences that are commensurate with the gravity of their acts;

(d) Ensure, without prejudice to the presumption of innocence, that officials who are suspects of having perpetrated torture and ill-treatment are immediately suspended from duty for the duration of the investigation, particularly when there is a risk that they might otherwise be in a position to repeat the alleged act, to commit reprisals against the alleged victim or to obstruct the investigation;

(e) Provide effective remedies and redress to victims, including fair and adequate compensation, and as full rehabilitation as possible.

Allegations of excessive use of force

32. The Committee is concerned at allegations of excessive use of force, including lethal force, by security forces, mostly against Palestinians in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the access-restricted areas of the Gaza Strip, particularly in the context of demonstrations, in response to attacks or alleged attacks against Israeli civilians or security forces, and to enforce the access-restricted areas of the Gaza Strip. In this respect, the Committee notes with concern that, when referring to the responses of the State party's security forces to attacks or alleged attacks by Palestinians against Israelis, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights noted that "some of these responses strongly suggest unlawful killings, including possible extrajudicial executions" (A/HRC/31/40, para. 10). The Committee is also concerned at reports that accountability for instances of excessive use of force is rare (arts. 2, 12, 13, 14 and 16).

33. The State party should make more vigorous efforts to effectively prevent and sanction incidents of excessive force, including by ensuring that:

(a) Law enforcement and security officials are adequately trained in and comply with the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials, including in the access-restricted areas of the Gaza Strip;

(b) The rules of engagement or regulations on opening fire are fully consistent with the Convention and other relevant international standards. In this respect, the Committee encourages the State party to implement the recommendation made by the Secretary-General to "[carry] out an independent review and any necessary revisions of rules of engagement or regulations on opening fire to ensure their consistency with international law" (see A/70/421, para. 72 (b));

(c) All instances and allegations of excessive use of force are investigated promptly, effectively and impartially by an independent body, that alleged perpetrators are duly prosecuted and, if found guilty, adequately sanctioned.

Prohibition of coerced evidence

34. The Committee is concerned at allegations of instances in which coerced evidence was used in courts, including in military courts to sentence children, despite the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court regarding the inadmissibility of evidence obtained illegitimately. Recalling its previous recommendation (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 25), the Committee observes with interest the information provided by the delegation that a bill has been drafted that, inter alia, will expressly establish the inadmissibility of a confession procured under torture (art. 15).

35. The state party should:

(a) Take effective measures to ensure in practice, where there is an allegation that a statement was made under torture, that such a statement is not invoked as evidence in any proceeding, except when invoked against a person accused of torture as evidence that the statement was made;

(b) Speed up the process to adopt the bill referred to by the State party and ensure that it explicitly prohibits the use as evidence in any proceedings of any statement (either confession or any other type of statement) which is established to have been made as a result of torture, except when invoked against a person accused of torture as evidence that the statement was made.

Checkpoints

36. Recalling its previous concluding observations (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 31), the Committee remains concerned at allegations of instances of degrading treatment at checkpoints and of undue delays or denials of passage, including in emergency cases (art. 16).

37. The State party should take effective measures, including adequate training for relevant personnel, to ensure that security controls at checkpoints are carried out in a humane and respectful way, in accordance with the Convention. It should also ensure that there are no undue delays or restrictions for the passage of persons, in particular in emergency cases.

Allegations of acts of violence by State party's settlers

38. While taking note of the measures taken by the State party to address settler-related violence, including the establishment in March 2013 of the Nationalistic-Motivated Crimes Unit, a special police unit operating within the West Bank, the Committee is concerned at allegations that acts of violence by settlers of the State party against Palestinians continue to be committed in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem (art. 16).

39. The State party should take more effective measures to prevent acts of violence by settlers. In line with the Committee's previous recommendation (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 32), the State party should also redouble its efforts with a view to ensuring that all allegations of acts of violence perpetrated by settlers are promptly and impartially investigated; that the alleged perpetrators are brought to justice and, if found responsible, appropriately punished; and that victims are afforded appropriate redress.

House demolitions

40. Recalling its previous concluding observations (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 33), the Committee is concerned that the policy of punitive demolitions of houses resided in by perpetrators or alleged perpetrators of attacks against Israelis was resumed in July 2014 after having been suspended and not used, with two exceptions in 2008 and 2009, since 2005 (art. 16).

41. The State party should take all the measures necessary to put an end to the policy of punitive house demolitions, as it violates article 16 of the Convention.

Postponement of return of bodies

42. The Committee is concerned at information that, at the time of the dialogue, the State party was postponing, on the basis of security concerns the return of the bodies of 18 Palestinians to their families. In this respect, the Committee notes the information provided by the delegation that, after a new evaluation of all the relevant circumstances, the State party has agreed to initiate the return of the bodies for the purpose of burial, subject to arrangements to guarantee that the burial process would be conducted in a secure and non-violent manner (art. 16).

43. The State party should take the measures necessary to return the bodies of the Palestinians that have not yet been returned to their relatives as soon as possible so they can be buried in accordance with their traditions and religious customs, and to avoid that similar situations are repeated in the future.

Detention of persons entering the State party irregularly

44. The Committee takes note of the decisions adopted by the High Court of Justice in 2013-2015 relating to the detention regime under the Prevention of Infiltration Law and of the amendments that were made to the law as a result. However, it is concerned that the current text of the law provides that a person who enters Israel irregularly, with certain exceptions, is to be detained for a period of up to three months. The Committee notes that, according to the law, if the person cannot be deported, that period is followed by up to 12 months of mandatory residence in the “Holot” open facility, of which certain groups of persons, such as women and children, are exempted (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

45. The State party should take the legislative and other measures necessary with a view to ensuring that the detention of persons entering its territory irregularly is only used as a last resort, when determined to be strictly necessary and proportionate in each individual case, and for as short a period as possible.

Asylum seekers and refugees

46. The Committee is concerned at the low recognition rate of refugees and regrets not receiving clarifications about the “prima facie rejection procedure”. The Committee takes note of the information provided by the State party concerning the criteria to be met before signing agreements with third countries for the relocation of nationals of Eritrea and the Sudan who entered the State party irregularly; however, it regrets that these agreements are made confidential by the countries involved, which hinders public scrutiny of whether the protection needs of the persons to be relocated would be adequately covered. While noting that the State party’s delegation stated that, according to the information available to them, there were no violations to the principle of non-refoulement with regard to the persons relocated in the context of the said agreements, the Committee is concerned by information that some of the Sudanese and Eritrean nationals who were relocated in 2014 and 2015 pursuant to these agreements did not receive permission to stay in the third countries and therefore faced a risk of being sent to their countries of origin. While taking note that the “coordinated return procedure” with Egypt was put on hold in March 2011, the Committee is also concerned at allegations of incidents taking place after that date when Israeli Defence Forces reportedly returned people to Egypt shortly after they crossed the border without conducting an interview. The Committee notes with appreciation the procedure in place for the identification of victims of trafficking and the rights afforded to them, including shelter and free legal aid. While noting that victims of trafficking could have also been victims of torture and that upon arrival at “Saharonim” detention centre all persons are examined by a physician, the Committee is concerned that the measures taken by the State party do not seem to fully ensure the effective identification of victims of torture among asylum seekers and to guarantee that they receive adequate State-sponsored holistic rehabilitation support and free legal aid when they do not qualify as victims of trafficking (arts. 2, 3, 14 and 16).

47. The State party should:

(a) Guarantee in practice that all asylum seekers have access to efficient refugee status determination procedures that include a thorough examination of the merits of each individual case under article 3 of the Convention;

(b) Ensure that effective procedures are in place to identify as early as possible all victims of torture among asylum seekers, in particular by conducting thorough medical and psychological examinations, and that, when signs of torture or traumatization have been detected, victims have immediate access to specialized medical and psychosocial services;

(c) Guarantee that all asylum seekers have access to independent, qualified and free-of-charge legal assistance during the entire asylum procedure;

(d) Refrain from removing any person from the State party without previously conducting a thorough risk assessment of situations covered by article 3 of the Convention;

(e) Ensure that relocation agreements with third countries are transparent and establish effective guarantees against refoulement and post-return monitoring mechanisms.

Redress and rehabilitation

48. While taking note of the information provided by the State party on the legislative provisions governing monetary compensation for victims of offences, the Committee regrets the lack of sufficient information on other forms of redress available for victims of torture and ill-treatment, in particular rehabilitation programmes or services. In this respect, the Committee notes with appreciation the system of rehabilitation for victims of trafficking, but regrets that a system of similar characteristics for victims of torture does not seem to have been set up (art. 14).

49. The State party should take the measures necessary to ensure that all victims of torture and ill-treatment who are subject to its jurisdiction obtain redress and have an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation, including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible, as required by article 14 of the Convention and elaborated in the Committee's general comment No. 3 (2012) on the implementation of article 14 by States parties. It should also ensure that specialized, holistic rehabilitation services, including medical and psychological assistance, are available and promptly accessible to all victims of torture and ill-treatment.

Training

50. The Committee takes note of the human rights training provided to members of the police, Israeli Defence Forces, the Israeli Prison Service, the Israel Security Agency, the Population and Immigration Authority, the judiciary and legal practitioners. It also notes that, during general medical training, physicians and medical staff are taught how to detect and provide special treatment to victims of violence, including torture. However, the Committee regrets the lack of specific and regular training on how to detect and document cases of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in accordance with the Manual on the Effective Investigation and Documentation of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (the Istanbul Protocol) (art. 10).

51. The State party should:

(a) Redouble its efforts with a view to ensuring that all persons involved in the custody, interrogation and treatment of persons deprived of liberty are well acquainted with the provisions of the Convention, in particular with the absolute prohibition of torture, and are fully aware that violations will not be tolerated and will be investigated, and that those responsible will be prosecuted;

(b) Ensure that all relevant staff, including medical personnel, are specifically trained to identify and document cases of torture and ill-treatment in accordance with the Istanbul Protocol;

(c) Take the measures necessary to evaluate the effectiveness and impact of educational and training programmes relating to the Convention and the Istanbul Protocol.

Follow-up procedure

52. The Committee requests the State party to provide, by 13 May 2017, information on follow-up to the Committee's recommendations on independent medical examinations of persons deprived of liberty, administrative detention, solitary confinement and other forms of isolation, and allegations of torture and ill-treatment (see paras. 21, 23 (a), 25 (b) and 31 (b) above). In that context, the State party is invited to inform the Committee about its plans for implementing, within the coming reporting period, some or all of the remaining recommendations in the concluding observations.

Other issues

53. Recalling its previous concluding observations (CAT/C/ISR/CO/4, paras. 35-37), the Committee again encourages the State party to:

- (a) Become a party to the Optional Protocol to the Convention;
- (b) Consider making the declarations under articles 21 and 22 of the Convention, in order to recognize the competence of the Committee to receive and consider inter-State and individual communications;
- (c) Withdraw its reservation to article 20 of the Convention.

54. The Committee invites the State party to consider becoming a party to the core United Nations human rights treaties to which it is not yet party, namely, the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance; and to the protocols to the core United Nations human rights treaties to which it is not yet a party, namely, the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty; the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on a communications procedure; the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; and the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

55. The State party is requested to disseminate widely the report submitted to the Committee and the present concluding observations, in appropriate languages, through official websites, the media and non-governmental organizations.

56. The Committee requests the State party to submit its sixth periodic report by 13 May 2020. For that purpose, and in view of the fact that the State party has agreed to report to the Committee under the simplified reporting procedure, the Committee will, in due course, submit to the State party a list of issues prior to reporting.

Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Distr.: General
27 September 2017

English only

Committee against Torture

Concluding observations on the fifth periodic report of Israel

Addendum

Information received from Israel on follow-up to the concluding observations*

[Date received: 19 September 2017]

1. As requested by the Committee against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment in its concluding observations dated May 13, 2016, the State of Israel respectfully presents the following information.

Independent medical examinations of persons deprived of liberty (concluding observation No. 21)

GOI Reply:

2. General — Every Israeli Prisons Service detention facility employs a general physician, a dentist, a narcology specialist and a professional medic who provide regular services. A medical examination is available daily in all Israeli Prisons Service facilities and prisoners may be examined upon request. Examinations by specialists are also provided in prison infirmaries, Israeli Prisons Service medical centers, and hospital clinics. Gynecological examinations are performed when necessary and upon the request of female prisoners.

3. In addition, a prisoner may request to have an examination done by a private physician at her/his own expense. Such a request is considered by the prison's medical team, which conducts a preliminary medical examination, in accordance with criteria set out in Israeli Prisons Service Commission standing order No. 04.46.00.

4. On May 3, 2017, the Lod District Court rejected a petition submitted by two petitioners who requested that specialists be present in prisons regularly, based on recommendations made by the Committee for the Examination of Medical Services Provided to Prisoners of 2002 ("the report"). This report referred to issues such as doctors' training, subordination and supervision of IPS medical staff, appointment of an ombudsman for prisoners' complaints regarding medical issues in the Ministry of Public Security, treatment of prisoners with disabilities, nutrition etc.

* The present document is being issued without formal editing.

5. The respondents argued that the report does not require a specialist to be placed in every prison and that prisoners may be seen by specialists at medical centers and nearby hospitals.

6. The Court accepted the respondents' position that the report does not require specialists to be placed in every prison. It also noted that during the lengthy deliberation period, new clinics and medical centers staffed by specialists were established in the Israeli Prisons Service southern, central and northern districts. The Court therefore rejected the petition, but ordered the Israeli Prisons Service to publish the dates on which specialists would be available in the prisons and their area of expertise every month. (Pr.P.C. 5236-11-12 Mahmud Magadba v. Israel Prison Service, (03.05.16)).

7. Following this decision, one of the petitioners appealed to the Supreme Court. In its response to the petition, the State reiterated its position that the report does not require a specialist to be permanently present in each prison. Moreover, it stressed its commitment to implementing the recommendations of the report. For example, the State noted that it had authorized the budget for the establishment of a medical center staffed by specialists in the "Hadarim" compound, which is to be renovated this year, and that the IPS is negotiating with one of the nearby hospitals regarding the operation of specialist services in this IPS compound. The State further noted that the IPS is publishing the monthly schedules of specialists, as ordered by the District Court. This petition is still pending. (Ap.R.P. 4026/16 Mahmud Magadba v. Israel Prison Service, (14.02.2017)).

8. In addition, prisoners with chronic illnesses are treated in a detention facility that the Israeli Prisons Service operates for prisoners with physical and mental disabilities.

9. Israeli Prisons Service Physicians — The duty of physicians working in Israeli Prisons Service facilities is to respond to the medical and health care needs of inmates. These duties supersede any other need or requirement of the Israeli Prisons Service system. Israeli Prisons Service physicians do not approve or take part in the investigation or punishment of an inmate.

10. Examining Medical Staff Reports on Detainees' Injuries — In January 2012, the Ministry of Health's Deputy Director General established a Committee to examine medical staff's reports of injuries allegedly sustained by detainees during interrogation procedures. The Ministry of Health notified all hospital staff in Israel of the establishment of the Committee. The Committee is authorized to approach the relevant authorities for their responses to the claims raised and to make recommendations to the Ministry of Health and the Israeli Medical Association's Ethics Board as to the necessary and proper procedures to handle the case. In one instance, the Committee received and examined a complaint from an NGO, after which it found that there was no need for it to continue handling the particular matter because the incident had already been reported to the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice and an indictment was filed.

Measures necessary to end the practice of administrative detention and ensure that all persons who are currently held in administrative detention are afforded all basic legal safeguards (concluding observation No. 23 (a))

GOI Reply:

11. Administrative detention is a security measure recognized in international law, and explicitly in Article 78 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. It allows for the temporary internment of an individual when required by security exigencies. In accordance with the requirements set out in both international and domestic law, administrative detention orders are used as a preventive measure where there is a reasonable basis to believe that the detention is absolutely necessary for clear security purposes. Administrative detention is not employed where the security risk can be addressed by other legal alternatives, especially criminal prosecution.

12. Note that prior to the issue of an administrative detention order, an internal supervisory procedure is conducted regarding both legal and operational aspects, and only following this procedure, when it is determined that administrative detention is the only way to prevent the threat posed by the relevant person, the Military Commander signs the order. After an order has been signed, a judicial review is conducted before a military judge, in which the detainee is represented by an attorney and may present his/her arguments. The judge receives all the materials, including any confidential materials, upon which the order was issued. The Court may hold an ex-parte in-camera hearing in order to hear additional details from security authorities, in which he/she can ask the State representatives any question. The judge has wide discretion concerning the approval of the order and may approve the order for its entire duration, order to shorten it or not extend it without new intelligence information or a change in circumstances, or cancel the order. Following this decision, each party may file an appeal to the Military Court of Appeals, in which the order is re-examined by a judge. Here, the detainee is again represented by an attorney. Following the Court's decision, each party may appeal to the High Court of Justice (HCJ).

13. In 2017 (until September 10th), about 395 such appeals were filed to the HCJ. Several other aspects, regarding the maintenance of due process when applying this measure, are put in place in the relevant legislation, such as a six (6) months maximum period per order, and a mandatory judicial review of each order.

Solitary confinement and other forms of isolation (concluding observation No. 25 (b))

GOI Reply:

14. During the dialogue with the Committee on May 3rd and 4th, 2016, Israel gave a presentation regarding "Solitary Confinement and Separation within Israeli Prisons Service facilities".

15. Solitary confinement — The manner and the extent of the use of solitary confinement with regard to Israeli prisoners comply with international law standards and must be strongly distinguished from incommunicado detention.

16. Solitary confinement is used only in a limited and closed list of 41 disciplinary offences set in Section 56 of the Prisons Ordinance 5732-1971; thus, the Israeli practice adheres to the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Mandela Rules).

17. Solitary confinement is employed in an extremely restricted manner and for short and limited periods of time, with a maximum of 14 days. Where solitary confinement is prescribed for a period of time exceeding seven (7) days, there must be a seven (7) day break immediately following the first seven (7) days of confinement, such that a prisoner will not spend more than seven (7) consecutive days in solitary confinement. In addition, a period of more than seven (7) days in solitary confinement can be imposed only by the Prison Director or his/her deputy, and must follow a disciplinary hearing. Prior to the disciplinary hearing, the prisoner receives a 48-hour notice, during which he/she can prepare his/her arguments and summon witnesses, if he/she chooses to do so. Thus, the confinement would never be "Indefinite or exceptionally prolonged", in accordance with Rule 43 of the Mandela Rules.

18. During the course of the solitary confinement, contact is maintained with the officials in the ward — prison guards and social workers as well as with physicians/paramedics upon request, and the prisoner's attorneys, unless in exceptional circumstances. A minor will see a social worker every day that he/she spends in solitary confinement. This again differs from incommunicado detention, where no one, apart from the authorities, may have contact with the detainee.

19. These rules apply equally to criminal as well as security prisoners. Security prisoners also receive regular visits from the ICRC.

20. Separation is not a punitive measure but rather a preventive procedure which is intended to prevent prisoners from harming themselves or other prisoners, as well as for other reasons such as state or prison security. A prisoner held in separation may be held alone or together with another prisoner (“separation in a pair”), as decided according to the grounds for his/her separation as well as the prisoner’s characteristics.

21. The conditions provided in separation are similar to the conditions provided to all other prisoners, including: medical care, meetings with his/her attorneys, social workers and family visits. The separation ward is equipped with a television, video game consoles, telephone, books and newspapers.

22. This preventive measure of separation is subject to reconsideration procedures, judicial review and appeal.

Effective measures to ensure that interrogation methods contrary to the Convention are not used under any circumstances ((concluding observation No. 31 (b))

23. According to the Security Agency Law 5762-2002, the Israeli Security Agency (ISA) internal rules and procedures, as well as its methods of interrogation, are confidential, for security reasons.

24. It should be emphasized, that the Israel Security Agency and its employees are required to act within the limits of the law and are subject to both internal and external supervision and review. This includes the Inspector for Complaints against Israeli Security Agency (ISA) Interrogators, the State Attorney, the Attorney General and every instance of the courts, including the High Court of Justice.

Additional Information

The Counter-Terrorism Law 5776-2016

25. On June 15, 2016, as part of Israel’s ongoing battle against terrorism, the Government of Israel enacted the Counter Terrorism Law 5776-2016. This detailed and carefully-designed new law is part of an effort to provide law enforcement authorities with more effective tools to combat modern terrorist threats while incorporating additional checks and balances necessary to safeguard against unreasonable violations of individual human rights. The Law provides, among other things, updated definitions of “terrorist organization”, “terrorist act” and “membership in a terrorist organization”, detailed regulations for the process of designating terrorist organizations, and enhanced enforcement tools, both criminal and financial. This Law allows the relevant authorities to fight terrorism without being dependent on a declaration on a state of emergency. The Law nullified previous legislation in the field of counter-terrorism such as the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance 5708-1948, which was linked to a state of emergency. Additional legislation is currently being reviewed and amended in order to disconnect it from the requirement of having a declared state of emergency.

Positive updates concerning the Inspector for Complaints against Israel Security Agency Interrogators:

- In July 2016, the Israeli Prisons Service Commission published an amendment to its standing order titled “Rules of Conduct for Israeli Prisons Service wardens”, in which Section 12 was added. This Section lays out the obligation of prisons to transfer any complaint against Israel Security Agency interrogators, or information that has otherwise come to their attention, to the Office of the Inspector in the Ministry of Justice.
- The leaflet of rights provided to every Israel Security Agency interrogate was updated recently to include a woman’s right to the presence of another woman during her interrogation.
- The Inspector’s Case Status — as of June 2017, there were 139 open cases. The complaint in 50% of these cases was received in 2016-2017, in 47% of these cases the complaint was received in 2014-2015, and in 3% of these open cases the complaint was received in 2013.

Audio or Visual Documentation of Interrogation

Israel Security Agency Israel Security Agency Interrogations

26. The Turkel Commission¹ recommended that there be full visual documentation of Israel Security Agency interrogations, according to rules that will be determined by the Attorney General in coordination with the Head of the Israel Security Agency (Second Report, Recommendation No. 15).

27. In this regard, the Implementation Team recommended that cameras be installed in all Israel Security Agency interrogation rooms. According to the recommendation, these cameras are to broadcast, regularly and in “real-time”, via closed Ministry of Justice-circuit, to a control room located in an Israel Security Agency facility in which interrogations are not conducted. The broadcast is to be accessible and available to a Ministry of Justice supervisor at any time without prior notice. The interrogators will have no indication of when the Ministry of Justice supervisor is watching them in the control room. In the event that the Ministry of Justice supervisor believes that illegal means have been used during the interrogation, he or she has an obligation to immediately report the matter to the Inspector for Complaints against Israel Security Agency Interrogators.

28. The Israeli Security Cabinet adopted the recommendations of the Implementation team. Consequently, the Ministry of Justice is currently conducting advanced stages of the staff work required to implement this recommendation.

Police Investigations

29. The Criminal Procedure (Investigation of Suspects) Law 5762-2002 (Sections 7 and 11) requires Israeli Police to carry out audio or visual recording of criminal suspect questioning, where the crime carries a penalty of imprisonment of ten years or more. A temporary provision in the law, which has been extended several times, states that this obligation to document does not apply to the investigation of a suspect relating to a security offence. Note that the Law does not apply to Israel Security Agency interrogations.

30. On December 12, 2016, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 8 to the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law whereby the questioning of a suspect in relation to a security offence is subject to random inspections and supervision according to police procedures that are to be approved by the Minister of Public Security and the Attorney General. The Amendment provides that the supervising authority will be allowed to conduct such inspections in regard to all ongoing interrogations, at any time, without any advance notice and without the interrogators being aware of such inspections. The Knesset’s Constitution, Law and Justice Committee is to receive annual reports on the implementation of this Amendment.

31. Several NGOs filed a petition to the High Court of Justice against the constitutionality of this temporary provision. On January 15, 2017, the Court ruled that the petition was not ripe for adjudication, noting that the required implementing procedures were yet to be formulated. The Court stressed that these procedures must be strict, both in regard to the number of inspectors and the working procedures. The Court therefore dismissed the petition without prejudice. (H.C.J. 5014/15 Adalah v. The Minister of Public Security (15.1.17)).

Hunger Strikes by Prisoners

GOI Reply:

32. On July 30, 2015, the Amendment to the Prisons Ordinance Law (Prevention of Harm Caused by Hunger Strikes) 5775-2015 (Amendment no. 48) was approved by the Knesset. To date, the Law has not been applied, even though several long and life threatening hunger strikes have since taken place, including in the last few months.

33. On September 11, 2016, the High Court of Justice ruled on a petition filed by the Israeli Medical Association and several additional NGOs against the constitutionality of this Amendment. The Court ruled that the Amendment is constitutional as it delicately balances the values of sanctity of life and public interest on the one hand and the right of the individual to human dignity, including autonomy and freedom of speech on the other hand.

34. In regard to Section 19 (14) (e) of the law, the main purpose of which is to safeguard security, the Court ruled that this section is constitutional but that it must be used very narrowly and is subject to appropriate evidence. (H.C.J. 5304/15 The Israeli Medical Association v. The Israeli Knesset (11.9.16)).

Procedure for Handling Asylum Seekers in Israel

GOI Reply: Gender Sensitivity in Request for Asylum

Gender Sensitivity in Request for Asylum

35. In February 26, 2017, the Government of Israel Regulation processing Asylum Requests (Population and Immigration Authority Regulation No. 5.2.0012) was updated as follows. A section entitled “Gender Sensitivity in the process of refugee status determination (RSD)” was added to existing regulations and procedures, with the aim of highlighting gender sensitivities. The underlying idea of the Gender Sensitivity Section is the acknowledgement that gender is an important attribute in asylum requests and their processing, and thus, the Population and Immigration Authority’s policy must be adjusted accordingly. Please note that the Gender Sensitivity Section does not create an additional form of persecution under the 1951 Convention.

36. This Section provides that RSD interviews will be conducted with sensitivity to gender issues that might affect the interviewee’s feelings or behavior or impact on his/her testimony. Furthermore, the Section stipulates that victims of gender-based violence, including sexual violence, must be treated with the utmost respect and sensitivity.

37. The Section further requires the following: (1) The training program of RSD Unit employees must include training regarding gender issues such as: the psychological effect of traumatic experiences (unwillingness to provide all details, difficulties in remembering past events and in providing testimony, etc.); cultural perceptions of women in countries of origin and their influence on asylum seekers; (2) Guidelines for the interview process: (a) The interviewer must inform the interviewee at the beginning of the interview of her/his right to request an interviewer of the same gender, subject to personnel availability at the RSD Unit; (b) Family members, including spouses should not be present at the interview, and each interview should be held individually; (c) The interviewee shall be given a proper opportunity to share her/his experience of any gender-based persecution or gender-based violence that she/he has suffered. This testimony shall be taken into consideration in the deliberation of her/his asylum application; (d) Additional caution should be taken in order to prevent repeated trauma to the interviewee; the interviewer must abstain from any request for extensive description of the traumatic event which is unnecessary for the final decision. An interviewee that has difficulty in completing her/his testimony shall be given an opportunity to complete the interview at another time.

Part I. General information

A. Introduction

1. This report, which is the official initial report for the State of Palestine, was prepared in accordance with obligations arising under article 19 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Degrading or Inhuman Treatment or Punishment. The State of Palestine acceded to the Convention, without any reservations, on 1 April 2014. It has also acceded to numerous other conventions and treaties on human rights and international humanitarian law that also prohibit all forms of torture.

2. During the preparation of this and other treaty body reports due for submission, the Government of the State of Palestine provided a sound constitutional, legislative and procedural environment in line with the Committee's general comment No. 2 of 2002 on the establishment of national institutions to facilitate the implementation of the Conventions. On 7 May 2014, the President of the State of Palestine, Mahmoud Abbas, issued a decree on the formation of a standing national committee at the ministerial level to follow up on the accession by the State of Palestine to those international conventions and treaties. The committee is chaired by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants and its members are drawn from other ministries and competent government institutions. The Independent Commission for Human Rights acts as an observer to monitor the fulfilment of obligations arising from accession to the treaties in question. Moreover, a committee was set up in 2017 to harmonize existing legislation with international treaties and conventions. It is chaired by the Ministry of Justice and composed of members from the competent government institutions and civil society organizations. Its mandate is to review legislation and the compatibility of its provisions with those of international conventions to which the State of Palestine has acceded.

3. After acceding to the human rights conventions, the State of Palestine adopted a national policy agenda for the period 2017–2022 and announced its commitment to the United Nations 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Those commitments have been incorporated into the national policy agenda out of a sense of duty to the Palestinian people and in order to guarantee their fundamental freedoms and human rights, justice and equality, as well as providing opportunities for and protecting marginalized groups.

4. On 28 December 2017, the State of Palestine signed the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, demonstrating the seriousness of its political will to prevent torture and ensure accountability in that regard. It is one of the most important steps taken by the State of Palestine since its accession to the United Nations human rights treaties in 2014. Thereafter, the Palestinian Government announced its commitment to establishing an independent national preventive mechanism for the prevention of torture, as stipulated by the Optional Protocol. The core mandate of the mechanism will be to visit all places of detention in order to prevent torture and ensure that living and health conditions in them are proper, and to coordinate with the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. The State of Palestine is currently working with national and international partners, including Palestinian civil society organizations, to set up the mechanism.

5. This report was prepared by a committee of government institutions formed at the behest of the standing national committee and chaired by the Ministry of Interior. Its members were drawn from the Ministry of Justice, the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the Commission on Detainees Affairs, the Ministry of Social Development, the Ministry of Health, the Military Justice Commission and the Supreme Judicial Council.

6. In preparing the report, the committee benefited from information and reports provided by civil society organizations working in related areas. As part of its ongoing cooperation with those organizations, the committee also held two national consultation sessions to present and discuss the report in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The latter had to be held because participating organizations encountered difficulties in travelling from the Gaza Strip owing to discriminatory measures taken by the occupying Israeli authorities. The committee used the comments of those organizations to enrich and amend the report.

7. The report contains a general overview and a detailed picture of the existing national laws and regulations in the State of Palestine relating to the implementation of the provisions of the Convention. It also contains data, information and statistics regarding efforts at the national level to stop torture and inhuman and degrading treatment.

8. The legal situation and reality on the ground in the Gaza Strip are also examined in the report. Since they imposed a stringent and unlawful blockade in 2007, the occupying Israeli authorities have increasingly detached Gaza, which is an integral part of the territory of the State of Palestine, from its natural anchorage. To this day, they have continued to subject it to measures that flout international law, repeated aggression and unrelenting collective punishment. They have split the Palestinian people demographically, curtailing freedom of movement and contact between the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip, in direct, systematic and broad violation of the human rights of all Palestinians. At the same time, Israel, the occupying Power, has targeted the institutions of the State of Palestine and its officials, thereby limiting its capacity to meet its obligations and responsibilities to the people with a sufficiently high degree of professionalism and effectiveness. Violations by occupying forces against the security authorities are set forth in an accompanying table.

9. In mid-2007, the Hamas movement led a coup d'état in the Gaza Strip by, the most serious consequence of which has been to split the Palestinian political system. The Gaza Strip is legally subject to the authority of the State of Palestine and the actions taken by Hamas there since that time are inadmissible and illegal in the eyes of the Government of the State of Palestine. This has been underlined repeatedly in statements by the President of the State of Palestine, numerous government officials, faction heads and civil society leaders.

10. Violations of the Convention by Israel, the occupying Power, are also addressed in the report. Since occupying Palestinian territory in 1967, it has systematically violated the human rights of Palestinians on a large scale. The living conditions of Palestinian detainees held in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers are addressed, with supplementary data and statistics on the racist policy pursued by the occupying Israeli authorities in their torture and inhuman treatment of those detainees. The information contained in the report regarding the systematic violations by Israel, the occupying Power, must be seen in the light of its legal and moral responsibility and international obligations vis-à-vis the Palestinian people, who have been subjected to its colonial authority and are afflicted by its repressive and arbitrary practices, and the need for legal accountability. One of its greatest obligations, as a party to the Convention, is to ensure that people it has subjugated are not tortured. The violations by the occupying Israeli authorities include even the refusal to release the bodies of Palestinian martyrs, which amounts to collective punishment and a violation of the Convention. Moreover, Israel, the occupying Power, continually places obstacles in the way of the State of Palestine, thus preventing it from developing its justice and security sector.

11. The State of Palestine wishes to stress that the submission of this report does not absolve Israel, the occupying Power, of its legal responsibility under international law, in particular international humanitarian law and human rights law. That includes its obligation to uphold the provisions of the Convention and submit a report on its compliance with those provisions in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem. That obligation is alluded to in the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice, issued in 2004, on the legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

B. Legal framework

12. The State of Palestine declared its commitment to abide by the principles and purposes of the United Nations and its Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in the Palestinian Declaration of Independence, issued in 1988 by the Palestinian National Council. The Declaration also served to announce the creation of the State of Palestine as a free and independent State based on the principle of full equality of rights and freedoms among all Palestinians, wherever they might be, within a democratic parliamentary system based on principles of social justice, equality and non-discrimination in public rights. The Declaration of Independence thereby also served to set forth the intention of the State of Palestine to adhere to the human rights system as enshrined in international treaties and conventions, including the Convention against Torture, and, in order to safeguard that commitment, laid the groundwork for a legal system rooted in the rule of law and an independent judiciary.

13. Torture and maltreatment are explicitly prohibited under the Amended Basic Law of 2003, as further amended (art. 13).¹ A range of other guarantees to ensure the right of persons to be protected from torture and the commitment of the State of Palestine to prevent it are also set forth, specifically in article 11.²

14. Torture is prohibited under the criminal, procedural, security and administrative laws of Palestine. Perpetrators of torture are subject to criminal penalties such as imprisonment and fines and/or disciplinary penalties ranging up to dismissal from service. Key legislation in this regard includes: the Jordanian Criminal Code No. 16 of 1960, in force in the West Bank; the British Mandate-era Criminal Code (No. 74 of 1936), in force in the Gaza Strip; the Palestine Liberation Organization Revolutionary Criminal Code of 1979, in force in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip; the Military Code of Criminal Procedure of 1979; the Palestinian Code of Criminal Procedure (No. 3 of 2001); the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act (No. 6 of 1998); the Palestinian Security Forces Service Act (No. 8 of 2005), the Decree-Law of 2016 on the protection of juveniles and other laws to which reference is made throughout the report.

15. With regard to measures and policies relating to the prohibition of torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment, on 14 May 2013 (prior to accession to the Convention), the President of the State of Palestine issued instructions prohibiting any form of torture and all practices that violate human rights and dignity to all bodies authorized to carry out arrests, detention and investigations. He also stressed the need for measures to develop monitoring tools and make them operational in order to ensure the application of those instructions and laws on human rights and the prohibition of torture and inhuman treatment.

16. On 19 April 2010, the Director-General of Police issued circular No. 6 of 2010 on refraining from the use of violence, torture and all forms of cruel and degrading treatment in dealings with the public. In 2011, the Ministry of the Interior issued a rule book governing the use of force and firearms by members of the Palestinian security forces. Similarly, under the code of ethics and public conduct for members of the Palestinian security forces, which was approved by the President of the State of Palestine on 26 February 2018, the use of violence, torture and all forms of cruel and degrading treatment in their dealings with the public is prohibited; the definition of torture contained in the Convention was adopted in the code. The Ministry of the Interior has held numerous training courses on the subject to raise awareness among security personnel, including those who carry out arrests and administer detention in places of deprivation of liberty, of human rights and about combating torture on the basis of the aforementioned codes and other guidelines developed by the Ministry.

² Article 11 stipulates that: Personal freedom is an inalienable, guaranteed natural right, and no one may be arrested, searched, detained or have any restriction or prohibition placed on his or her freedom of movement, except by a warrant issued by a court in accordance with the law. The duration of pretrial detention is determined by the law and no one may be detained or imprisoned in places other than those subject to the laws regulating prisons.

Part II. Articles of the Convention

Definition of the offence of torture

17. Torture is not defined as a crime in the legislation in force in the State of Palestine, under which it is merely classed as a misdemeanour and not a felony. This is set forth in article 208 of the Jordanian Criminal Code,³ article 108 of the British Mandate-era Criminal Code⁴ and article 280 of the Revolutionary Criminal Code.⁵ Under article 7 of the Decree-Law of 2016 on the protection of juveniles, it is prohibited to subject juveniles to physical or mental torture, cruel and degrading punishment or treatment, or such that is demeaning to human dignity. In a similar vein, torturing inmates and using lewd language with them is prohibited under articles 37 and 40 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act, which stipulate that prisoners must not be subjected to public vilification or poor ventilation and lighting conditions while being transported.

Article 2 (para. 1)

Measures necessary to prevent torture

18. The laws in force contain numerous safeguards and measures aimed at preventing acts of torture or other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and punishment, ensuring that their perpetrators do not go unpunished, overseeing places of detention and correctional and rehabilitation facilities, and setting forth the terms and conditions for arrest and detention. Under the Basic Law, no one may be arrested, searched, detained or have any restriction or prohibition placed on his or her freedom of movement, except by a warrant issued by a court. No one may be detained or imprisoned in places other than those designated for that purpose in article 11 (para. 2). Under article 105 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the duration of pretrial detention may not exceed 24 hours. The director of the centre or place of detention must hand over the accused to the Office of the Public Prosecutor for investigation within 24 hours. After questioning, the Prosecutor may detain the accused for 48 hours where so determined by the courts in accordance with the law. Under articles 99 and 100 of the Code, the Prosecutor has the obligation to perform a physical examination of the accused and officially record any visible injuries and their causes.

³ Article 208 of the Jordanian Criminal Code provides that: 1. Anyone who subjects a person to any form of violence or force for the purpose of obtaining a confession of an offence or information pertaining thereto shall be liable to imprisonment for a term of between three months and three years. 2. Where such acts of violence or force cause illness or injury, the penalty shall be imprisonment for a term of between six months and three years, unless such acts warrant a more severe penalty.

⁴ Article 108 of the British Mandate-era Criminal Code provides that any person employed in the public service who subjects or orders the subjection of any person to force or violence for the purpose of extorting from him or from any member of his family confession of an offence or any information relating to an offence, is guilty of a misdemeanour. Crimes are divided into categories by their degree of gravity:

1. Felony: this is the most serious type of offence and is punishable under the law by the death penalty, hard labour for life or a shorter term, or imprisonment for a term of not less than three years;
2. Misdemeanour: less serious than a felony, it is punishable under the law by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, a fine, or both, depending on the nature of the offence;
3. Contravention: the simplest and most minor type of offence, it is punishable under the law by imprisonment for a term of 1 to 10 days and a fine.

19. Under article 7 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act, any person who is detained or arrested or has restrictions otherwise placed on their liberty in accordance with the law shall be held in a place of detention designated for that purpose by decision of the Minister of the Interior. He or she shall be informed of the reasons for their arrest, the charges against them, their right to appoint defence counsel for the duration of proceedings and their right to contact family members. The article underscores the legal principle of the presumption of innocence until the accused's guilt is established in a definitive ruling handed down in a trial held in accordance with the legal procedures, as set forth in article 14 of the Basic Law.

20. Article 13 of the General Intelligence Service Act (No. 17 of 2005) and article 8 of Decree-Law No. 11 of 2007 on preventive security contain general provisions stipulating the obligation to uphold the rights, freedoms and legal safeguards provided for in Palestinian legislation and international treaties, including the right to physical integrity and freedom from torture and inhuman and degrading treatment.

Article 2 (para. 2) Provisions in cases of necessity and emergency situations

21. Under the Amended Basic Law (art. 110, para. 1), threats to national security arising from war, invasion, armed insurrection or natural disaster constitute states of emergency. Article 111 stipulates that no restrictions may be imposed on fundamental rights and freedoms except where necessary in order to achieve the aim stated in the decree declaring the state of emergency. In other words, any arrest or detention carried out under a state of emergency is reviewed by the Office of the Public Prosecutor or the competent court within 15 days of the date of arrest. The person arrested has the right to appoint counsel of his or her choice.

22. In 2007, the President of the State of Palestine, in accordance with the Amended Basic Law and the emergency powers vested in him by it, issued presidential decrees declaring a state of emergency throughout the State of Palestine and the formation of a Government to implement it, following the military coup d'état carried out by the Hamas movement in the Gaza Strip.

Article 2 (para. 3) Invoking orders by superiors as justification

23. Under the Security Forces Service Act, any member of the security forces who, in the discharge of their duties, acts in a manner that is incompatible with their functions or whose conduct or comportment brings disrepute to the office is liable to be punished. There are no exemptions, except where it is established that the official acted on the orders of a superior who insisted that the orders be carried out, despite having been warned by the official that such orders contravened the law. In such cases, the superior alone shall be liable in accordance with articles 173 and 194 of the Act. Under article 4 (para. 3) of the code of ethics and rules of public conduct of the Palestinian security forces, neither orders from superiors nor exceptional circumstances, such as war or the threat thereof, internal political instability or any other public emergency situation, may be invoked to justify torture or maltreatment, cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment, or other forms of abuse.

State of necessity and Israeli occupation law

24. Torture is prohibited under international law under all circumstances, including in times of war or public emergency. It is a basic principle of international customary law that applies to all States, including those that have not ratified or acceded to any of the international treaties expressly prohibiting torture and its use on any person under any circumstances. Despite this and the fact that Israel, the occupying Power, is a party to the Convention, it continues unabated to torture and inflict other inhuman and shameful treatment on Palestinian prisoners and detainees in prisons of the occupying authorities. Palestinian inmates, in particular children, face cruel and inhuman prison conditions and numerous practices on the part of the occupying Israeli forces that are demeaning to their human dignity and designed to break and humiliate them.

25. The prison authorities and investigators invoke the requirements of “necessity”; according to some interpretations of the outcome of the torture case heard by the Supreme Court of Israel in 1999, Palestinian detainees can be seen as “ticking time bombs” on whom moderate physical pressure may be brought to bear by the occupation authorities in investigations in order to extract confessions and information from them. The “ticking time bomb” label is applied to any case in which a detainee is believed to have information, the disclosure of which would prevent a potentially fatal imminent attack from taking place. In 1999, therefore, the Supreme Court (an arm of the colonial occupation authorities) ruled, with regard to torture, that reasonable means of pressure could be used on Palestinian detainees during their interrogation. That ruling is in addition to the many other decisions taken by the occupying authorities with regard to prisoners that permit and legalize torture.

26. The Supreme Court ruling left the door wide open to the use of torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment against Palestinian prisoners on the pretext of necessity. The Israeli occupation prison authorities and investigators, including those attached to Shabak, are exploiting the Court’s ruling cynically to use cruel physical methods on anyone being investigated in connection with allegedly serious security matters. Thus, under the ruling, the “necessity” defence exempts investigators who employ prohibited interrogation methods from criminal responsibility, because the physical methods used are deemed to be nothing more than a necessary by-product of such interrogations, which, as a rule, are kept secret and not reviewed by any independent external body.

Prohibition of the extradition, expulsion or return of any person to a State where they might be subjected to torture

27. The extradition, expulsion or return of a person to another State where he or she might be liable to be tortured is not explicitly addressed in Palestinian extradition laws, since the extradition of any Palestinian national anywhere for any reason is prohibited under article 28 of the Amended Basic Law.⁶

28. Under article 6 of the Extradition Act of 1927, in force in the West Bank, and article 7 of the Extradition Act of 1926, in force in the Gaza Strip, a fugitive criminal shall not be extradited if the crime requesting his extradition is of a political nature. The extradition of fugitive criminals in cases where they might be liable to be tortured is not prohibited under either Act. Extradition is addressed in the General Intelligence Service Act, article 16 of which provides that provisions regarding persons accused of extraditable crimes contained in treaties between the State of Palestine and other States must be observed in a manner that is not at variance with the law.

29. Under article 9 of the Extradition Act in force in the Gaza Strip, read together with article 2 of the Act, the justice of the peace is competent to consider extradition and expulsion cases, whereby the justice of the peace is the chief magistrate of the court of first instance, which is thus the competent court for the consideration of such cases. No requests for extradition, expulsion, deportation were recorded or appealed before the courts in the period covered by this report.

Legislative provisions criminalizing torture

30. The provisions of the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials, which was adopted under General Assembly resolution 34/169 of 1979, apply in the State of Palestine and establish the responsibilities of all law enforcement officials, including the police and military: serving the community (art. 1); respecting human dignity and human rights (art. 2), including confidentiality (art. 4); prohibiting torture (art. 5); and fully safeguarding the health of persons held in their custody (art. 6).

31. The prohibition of torture and measures to counter it in the State of Palestine are also addressed in article 4 (para. 1) of the Code, which stipulates that, in line with the law and international instruments, members of the security forces shall refrain from carrying out any acts of torture or cruel, degrading or inhuman treatment, whether physical or mental, consenting to such acts or tacitly permitting them to be carried out, whether directly or through third parties.

32. Under the Criminal Code in force in the West Bank, acts of violence or force committed for the purpose of obtaining a confession to an offence or information pertaining thereto, whether or not committed by a public official, are punishable by imprisonment for a term of between three months and three years. The Code further stipulates that, where such acts cause illness or injury, the penalty shall be imprisonment for a term of between six months and three years.

33. Under the Criminal Code in force in the Gaza Strip, any person employed in the public service who subjects or orders the subjection of any person to force or violence for the purpose of extorting from him or from any member of his family confession of an offence or any information relating to an offence is guilty of a misdemeanour. Such a person shall be liable to imprisonment for a term of between one week and three years, a fine ranging from 5 to 200 dinars or bail bond.

34. Under the criminal laws, any person who intentionally strikes, injures or harms a person through any act characterized by violence or assault that results in illness or leaves the person unable to work for a period exceeding 20 days is liable to imprisonment for a term ranging from three months to three years.

35. Where the act in question leaves a person unable to work for less than 30 days, the penalty increases to a term of imprisonment not exceeding one year or a fine not exceeding 25 dinars or both. Under articles 333–345 of the Criminal Code in force in the West Bank and articles 238–244 and 248–251 of the Criminal Code in force in the Gaza Strip, the penalty is even more severe where the act results in the amputation or incapacitation of a limb or extremity or sensory disability, causes severe disfigurement or any other permanent disability or triggers a miscarriage. Under article 330 of the Criminal Code in force in the West Bank, the offence of manslaughter as a result of striking or injuring a person with a non-lethal instrument shall be punishable by hard labour for a term of not less than five years.

36. Under article 280 of the Revolutionary Criminal Code of 1979, illegal acts of violence with a view to obtaining a confession to an offence or information pertaining thereto are punishable by imprisonment for terms of not less than three months. Where such acts of violence cause illness or wounds, imprisonment shall be for a term of not less than six months. Where torture causes death, the penalty shall be hard labour for a term of not less than five years.

37. Pursuant to article 4 of Decision No. 172 of the Minister of the Interior, dated 20 August 2009, it is incumbent on all direct superiors and persons in leadership positions, within the limits of their authority, to apply penalties decided by the courts to any members of the security forces found to have subjected detainees to torture or inhuman treatment.

38. As for holding law enforcement officials accused of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment to account, the aforementioned penalties are insufficient to constitute a deterrent, are not commensurate with such criminal acts and do not conform with international conventions.

General guarantees

39. Under article 32 of the Amended Basic Law, the crime of torture is not subject to any statute of limitations; it provides that any violation of public rights or liberties guaranteed by the Basic Law and the laws in force constitutes an offence not subject to any statute of limitations with respect to civil or criminal proceedings that may ensue. By law, victims may therefore assert their rights at any time. Current criminal legislation also provides that the statute of limitations for misdemeanours is three years. In that case, the provisions of the Basic Law, which is the cornerstone of legislation, take precedence.

40. Under article 207 of the Criminal Code in force in the West Bank, any public officials entrusted with the investigation and prosecution of crimes who neglect or delay reporting a crime of which they have become aware in the course of their work are liable to a penalty of imprisonment for a term ranging from one week to one year. Similarly, such officials who neglect or delay notifying the competent authority about a felony or misdemeanour of which they have become aware in the discharge of their official duties are liable to imprisonment for a term ranging from one week to three months. Medical professionals who, while assisting an apparent victim of a felony or misdemeanour, fail to inform the competent authorities are also liable to such penalties. Such acts are exempt from penalties where the offences require that a complaint be filed in order to be prosecuted.

41. With regard to disciplinary accountability, where law enforcement officials commit illegal acts they are held accountable in accordance with the general provisions on administrative and legal accountability stipulated by the law. For example, under articles 47–59 and 72 of the Judicial Authority Act (No. 1 of 2002), an official of the Office of the Public Prosecutor may receive a warning if he or she commits a breach of his or her professional duties. Disciplinary proceedings may ensue where the official fails to heed the warning. In such cases, proceedings may be conducted only on the basis of an inquiry by a judge of the Supreme Court. Such proceedings result in either the official's resignation or retirement.

42. The accountability of other law enforcement officials not employed by the Office of the Public Prosecutor is governed by articles 19–21 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, under which the Public Prosecutor, in his or her capacity as overseer of the work of law enforcement officials, has the authority to institute disciplinary measures that may include separation from service for any official who commits a breach or dereliction of his or her professional duties. Under the Security Forces Service Act, any member of the security forces who, in the discharge of their duties, acts in a manner that is incompatible with their functions or whose conduct or comportment brings disrepute to the office is liable to be punished, without prejudice to eventual civil or criminal proceedings, as is deemed to be necessary. There are no exemptions, except where it is established that the official acted on the orders of a superior who insisted that the orders be carried out, despite having been warned by the official that such orders contravened the law. In such cases, the superior alone shall be liable in accordance with articles 173 and 194 of the Act. This provision applies to all law enforcement personnel. Under article 218 of the Act, judicial rulings regarding administrative liability may be handed down under the Civil Service Act where there is a failure to hold perpetrators to account administratively under the aforementioned laws.

43. Members of the Palestinian security services who are alleged to have abused detainees are investigated and the completed files submitted to the competent court for due processing upon receipt by the Office of the Military Prosecutor in the West Bank of the relevant complaints. In 2015, four convictions were handed down, with sentences ranging from three to six months. Two cases resulted in acquittal for lack of evidence and another in a disciplinary penalty. Two further cases are pending before the courts and 12 others remain under investigation by the Office of the Military Prosecutor.

Situation of women inmates

44. With regard to the rights of female prison inmates, article 24 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act stipulates that male inmates be housed separately from their female counterparts, thereby rendering spoken or visual contact between them impossible. Juvenile detainees are held in separate facilities altogether. Under article 27, special allowance is made for pregnant inmates. It provides that, from the time pregnancy becomes apparent until 60 days after delivery, pregnant inmates receive special treatment in terms of food, rest and work schedules. They are looked after and provided with medical care under a physician's supervision and the necessary arrangements are made for delivery to take place in hospital. Article 28 provides that, where a woman gives birth in a correctional centre and that is noted neither in the official records nor in the birth certificate, it shall be deemed that the child's place of birth was the hospital. The child remains in the care of its mother until it reaches 2 years of age. The facility director ensures that nursing mothers are housed separately from other inmates. Under article 402 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a custodial sentence may be stayed in the case of a pregnant woman until three months after she has given birth.

45. Women inmates are accorded special treatment, in that they are entitled to more frequent external contact, including two visits a week without dividers between them and their visitors. They may also make telephone calls periodically. All their personal hygiene and other needs are met by the administration of the correctional and rehabilitation facilities. All the needs of any children born in the facilities, such as clothing and medical treatment, are also covered, as indeed are any other needs that women inmates and their children may have.

Women detainees in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers

46. The health conditions experienced by Palestinian women inmates in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers are extraordinary. They are systematically subjected to various forms of physical and mental torture and a policy of medical neglect. They are deprived of even the most basic health-care services and healthy food. The ill are made to wait for treatment and are given medication past its use by date. Inmates with chronic illnesses are deprived of their medication while others are denied essential surgery.

47. The conditions of detention in which Palestinian women are held are wretched, with poor ventilation, high humidity and significant overcrowding. They are sorely lacking in general cleaning materials and insecticides, and there is no separate housing for inmates with contagious diseases. They lack access to gynaecological care, which is especially problematic for those who were pregnant when detained and require medical follow-up. They are forced to give birth with their hands bound, regardless of the pain they endure in labour and childbirth.

Prohibition on the torture of juveniles

48. Under Palestinian law, the rights of children in conflict with the law are safeguarded to the same degree as for adults. That is set forth explicitly in article 5 of the Decree-Law on the protection of juveniles with regard to their arrest, detention and trial.⁷ Juveniles are guaranteed legal representation under article 10⁸ and the right to humane treatment under article 7,⁹ under which it is also prohibited to submit them to physical or mental torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Under the Decree-Law, the juvenile prosecution service may hold a juvenile in a social welfare centre under the supervision of a child protection officer for not more than 48 hours, unless the court orders otherwise under the rules set forth in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Under articles 68 and 69 of the amended Palestinian Children's Act, the torture or inhuman or degrading treatment of juveniles is prohibited.¹⁰

49. The provisions of the Decree-Law on juvenile protection are consistent with international standards, in particular with regard to the principle of safeguarding the best interests of the juvenile throughout the preliminary investigation, investigation and sentencing stages, the jurisdiction over which is entrusted to the special police unit for juveniles under article 15.¹¹ Article 16 stipulates the establishment of a specialized juvenile justice unit.¹² The jurisdiction ratione materiae and ratione personae of the juvenile court is enshrined in article 26,¹³ while article 24 addresses juvenile justice procedures.¹⁴ Under Palestinian law, juveniles may not be sentenced to death, life imprisonment or hard labour under any circumstances. The sensitive age of juveniles and international principles were

¹³ Article 26 stipulates that: 1. The court alone has jurisdiction over matters concerning juveniles and children in situations of difficulty that pose a threat to their physical or mental well-being or who are at risk of delinquency, in accordance with the Palestinian Children's Act. 2. Where a criminal offence is attributed to a juvenile acting in conjunction with an adult, the juvenile shall be tried separately.

¹⁴ Article 24 stipulates that: 1. Each court shall have one or more chambers to hear cases involving juveniles. 2. The court shall sit on weekends, official holidays and evenings when necessary or the best interests of the child so require. 3. The court may sit where the social welfare centre is located.

both taken into account in the drafting of the Decree-Law on juvenile protection (or Juvenile Protection Act) in 2016. Under the Decree-Law, prevention and education are favoured to the degree possible over preventive arrest.

50. The court, therefore, is not concerned merely with establishing the facts of the crime and applying the law. An integral part of its jurisdiction is to take measures to protect minors in situations of difficulty that pose a threat to their physical or mental well-being and to shield them from delinquency. This area of jurisdiction, which is novel in Palestine, has a positive impact on minors and society. It is administered at the political, legislative and judicial levels, alongside measures taken by other specialized bodies designated by a number of institutions, primarily the Ministry of Social Development, and dovetails with current approaches to combating crime. The Ministry of Justice continues to develop plans for such specialized courts in order to meet its desired goals in this regard. Among the main raison d'être for the court is to simplify trial proceedings and ensure that they remain confidential, prohibit hearings from being made public, ensure that the testimony is heard from persons concerned with the juveniles' best interests, and provide legal aid. Sentences handed down by the court are not recorded as prior convictions once juveniles reach adulthood.

51. The term "penalties" is avoided in the Decree-Law. Instead, in article 46,¹⁵ reference is made to special measures for juveniles over the age of 15 years. The system of juvenile justice is thus not based on the notion of punishing juveniles for their acts. Rather, decisions are taken on the time needed to rehabilitate and integrate them into society. One of the measures stipulated in article 36¹⁶ may be applied or they may be sentenced to community service, as provided for by the law.

52. With regard to policy, the legislative, executive and judicial branches in the State of Palestine, together with human rights institutions, are united in their determination to continue work on building a legislative and judicial environment for the rehabilitation of young people in conflict with the law. That in itself demonstrates the awareness in Palestine of the importance of protecting young people from delinquency, treating them properly and rehabilitating them. Palestinian legislators have not ignored restorative justice with regard to young people in conflict with the law, or alternatives to placement in welfare facilities. Also worthy of mention are: the children's protection division and child protection officers in the Ministry of Social Development; social welfare facilities; the priority given to prevention, education and rehabilitation; the avoidance of punishment involving the deprivation of liberty, except as a last resort and for the shortest possible term; ensuring equal rights between the sexes and guarantees of due process.

Progress achieved

53. After the adoption of the Decree-Law on the protection of juveniles, a completely separate criminal justice system for juveniles and children at risk of delinquency was introduced. It includes special police units for juveniles, a special juvenile division of the Office of the Public Prosecutor and a special juvenile court of first instance.

¹⁵ Article 46 stipulates that: 1. If a juvenile aged not less than 15 years and not more than 18 years commits a felony, the court may rule that he or she be placed in a social welfare facility, as follows: (a) For a term not exceeding nine years for offences punishable by death; (b) For a term not exceeding seven years for felonies punishable by life imprisonment; (c) For a term not exceeding five years in the case of other felonies; (d) A juvenile who commits a misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment shall be confined in a social care facility for a period not exceeding one third of the maximum prison term under the law. The court may, instead of confinement, apply one of the measures set out in article 26 with respect to the juvenile; (e) The foregoing provisions notwithstanding, the court may apply provisions on mitigating judicial circumstances set forth in the Criminal Code, within the permissible legal limits applying to criminal acts committed by juveniles.

Conditions of detention for Palestinian children in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers

54. Under the Israeli occupation, Palestinian children suffer from an ongoing policy of arbitrary detention and torture, even though, under international law, the United Nations Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty, which were adopted under General Assembly resolution 45/113 of 14 December 1990, and Israeli law, persons under the age of 18 are deemed to be juveniles. Under current Israeli military law and the Israeli justice system in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, however, persons under the age of 16 years are treated as adults. Pursuant to Military Order No. 132, the Israeli occupation authorities may even arrest children as young as 12 years of age. As a result, they are tried by military tribunals under laws applying to adults, not those in force for juveniles. No account is taken in the courts of their age, nor are there specific courts for them. The result, of course, is that they are not treated as minors as stipulated under international guarantees, in particular those relating to the protection of juveniles deprived of their liberty and, specifically, under article 16 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which provides that: “No child shall be subjected to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to unlawful attacks on his or her honour and reputation. The child has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.”

55. Since the onset of the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories, the matter of arrests has been a source of grave concern not only because of their significant and growing number, but also because all age groups and both sexes are affected. Not only are adult men and women being arrested, but also minors, both boys and girls. Perhaps the most worrying aspect is that the authorities are increasingly targeting young Palestinians below the age of 18 years. More than 1,200 Palestinian children have been arrested and imprisoned by the occupying Israeli authorities since 2000; more than 240 continue to languish in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers today. In 2018 alone, more than 900 Palestinian children aged between 11 and 18 years were arrested.

56. Most of them are held in the prisons of HaSharon, Ofer and Megiddo. A number are also held in detention centres such as Huwwarah, Gush Etzion and Maskubiyah. Children from Jerusalem and the 1948 zones are held in Giv'on prison in Ramallah, in spite of the fact that the transfer of Palestinian prisoners to prisons inside the occupied territories is a grave breach of international humanitarian law.

57. The suffering of Palestinian child prisoners starts from the moment of their arrest. They are routinely detained at military checkpoints, taken from their homes in the middle of the night or picked up when they are on their way to school in the early morning or on their way home. Their hands are bound, and they are blindfolded. The occupying Israeli police usually begin interrogating them as soon as they arrive at the police station, subjecting them to considerable psychological and physical pressure and a torrent of threats and insults. The aim is to intimidate and unnerve them and extract confessions. Most end up by confessing to having thrown stones and sign statements and other documents, the purport of which they do understand, that are written in Hebrew, a language that they do not understand.

58. The occupying Israeli authorities deprive Palestinian child prisoners of their most basic rights, enshrined in international instruments, including: the right not to be subject to arbitrary arrest, the right to be notified of the charges; the right to a lawyer; the right of the family to be notified of the charges and the place of the child's detention; the right to appear before a special juvenile court; the right to deny and appeal against the charges; the right to make external contact and the right to humane and decent treatment. Aside from the oppressive isolation that children experience in prison and the difficult living conditions in their approximately one-and-a-half-square-metre, dank, putrid and gloomy cells, they are deprived of sleep for days on end and poorly fed. All of that flies in the face of the United Nations Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty.

59. While in arbitrary detention, child prisoners are subjected to various forms of torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. They are completely isolated from their families and lawyers, especially during the preliminary investigation phase. Torture is also used to extract confessions from children. They are held for an initial period of four days, extended thereafter for another four days by order of the investigation unit (they must appear before a military tribunal within eight days of their arrest). All of this constitutes a violation of Principle 21 of the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment and article 40 (2) (b) (iv) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, under which it is forbidden to abuse the position of detainees in order to compel them to confess or implicate themselves in a crime or provide information implicating others. It also violates article 37 (c), which stipulates that every child deprived of liberty shall be treated with humanity and respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, and in a manner which takes into account the needs of persons of his or her age.

60. Israeli military tribunals have not shrunk from handing child prisoners harsh sentences, including exorbitant fines. Children in occupied Jerusalem have been targeted for arrest since 2014. The tendency has been to release them on payment of a fine or bail by a third party, to place them under house arrest or to remove them from their place of residence. Penalties imposed on Palestinian children were stiffened recently with the adoption by the Israeli Ministerial Committee for Legislation of tougher penalties for stone-throwing. Under the first part of the new law, stone-throwing is punishable by imprisonment for a minimum term of four years. Under the second part, the families of anyone convicted of an offence under the law shall be stripped of their economic and political rights, such as national insurance benefits, child benefit, allowances for disabled children and any other benefits. This is a form of collective punishment designed to push Palestinians out of their territory.

61. The most common forms of torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment to which Palestinian child prisoners are subjected while in arbitrary detention in Israeli prisons include:

- The denial of their right to education;
- The absence of mental health care and professionals in prison facilities;
- The denial of regular visits by family members because they live in the occupied territories;
- Intimidation and harassment in detention;
- The sense of solitude and isolation;
- Attempts by the Israeli occupiers' intelligence services to recruit them;
- The denial of parental visits and its psychological impact on them;
- Medical neglect and the lack of health care;
- Beatings, intimidation and threats of beatings by investigating officials of the Israeli occupation prison authorities;
- Sexual harassment of some children, who are threatened with beatings if they attempt to complain to the prison authorities. In one instance, a child who did complain was assaulted by convicted criminals who slashed his legs with knives;
- Imprisonment together with convicted criminals;
- Subjection to attempted sexual harassment and verbal and physical abuse.

Article 5 Jurisdiction

Military tribunals

62. The Palestinian Military Justice Commission is an independent judicial body that deals with crimes committed by members of the Palestinian security forces. It consists of military tribunals established under article 101 (para. 2) of the Amended Palestinian Basic Law and the Office of the Military Prosecution,¹⁷ which reports to the head of the Military

¹⁷ Article 101 (para. 2) of the Amended Basic Law provides that military tribunals shall be established by specific laws and that they shall have no jurisdiction beyond military matters.

Justice Commission. The Office is headed by the Military Prosecutor, who is assisted by a team of prosecutors in the investigation of complaints of offences committed by Palestinian security forces personnel pursuant to articles 13–24 of the Palestine Liberation Organization Revolutionary Code of Criminal Procedure of 1979, as amended. The structure of the system of military tribunals and their areas of jurisdiction are set forth in articles 119–123 of the Code, which provide for a Central Military Tribunal, a Standing Military Tribunal, a Military Court of Appeals, a Special Military Tribunal and the Military Field Court.

63. The jurisdiction of the military tribunals is as follows:

- The Central Military Tribunal tries offences for which the penalty does not exceed one year, except in the case of those committed by officers. Appeals against its rulings may, in accordance with article 240 of the Code, be lodged within 10 days before the Chief Military Justice;
- The Standing Military Tribunal is mandated to deal with all offences except where otherwise stipulated. That includes all misdemeanours committed by personnel and officers of the security forces punishable by prison terms of more than one year and terms of hard labour, pursuant to articles 121 and 126 (b);
- The Military Court of Appeals is competent to hear any appeal against judgments and rulings handed down by the Standing Military Tribunal as a court of first instance and those handed down by the Special Military Tribunal, which examines offences committed by officers with the rank of major and above and other cases referred to in the decision regarding its establishment, as well as offences committed by officers from the rank of second lieutenant to major. The Court's rulings are subject to appeal within one month of their being handed down;
- The Military Field Court has jurisdiction for offences committed in the course of military operations, as set forth in the decision regarding its establishment and in accordance with the law.

Territorial, personal and extraterritorial jurisdiction of Palestinian law

64. Under article 14 of the Judicial Authority Act, regular Palestinian courts have jurisdiction to hear all disputes and try all offences except where specifically stipulated otherwise. Under articles 7, 8 and 10 of the Criminal Code in force in the West Bank, the provisions of the Code apply to anyone who commits an offence set forth therein in Palestine and to any Palestinian national who, when outside the State of Palestine, commits, takes part in, instigates or is an accessory to a felony or misdemeanour punishable by law. They apply equally to offences committed by Palestinian officials outside the State of Palestine in the discharge of their duties and by members of the Palestinian foreign service and consular staff who do not enjoy diplomatic immunity, as well as to offences perpetrated on board foreign aircraft passing through Palestinian airspace where either the offender or the victim is Palestinian, or where the aircraft lands in Palestinian territory after the offence is committed.

65. Under the Code, Palestinian courts also have jurisdiction for offences that occur at the instigation of or with the complicity of foreign nationals, provided that the offence is punishable under Palestinian law and the State of which they are nationals has not requested their extradition. The provisions of the Code apply to any Palestinian or foreign national who commits, takes part in, instigates or is an accessory to a felony or misdemeanour abroad that threatens the security of the State or who forges the State seal, currency, banknotes or securities issued by Palestinian or foreign banks that are legal tender or traded in Palestine. It follows, therefore, that Palestinian courts may exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction and try foreign nationals charged with offences committed outside Palestine, including crimes against physical integrity, provided that such foreign nationals are resident in the State of Palestine, that the State of which they are nationals has not requested their extradition or that such a request has been turned down and the offence is punishable under Palestinian law.

66. Under articles 6 and 7 of the Criminal Code in force in the Gaza Strip, the courts do not have extraterritorial or personal jurisdiction over nationals or foreign nationals who commit any offence, regardless of its nature, outside Palestine. The Code stipulates that the jurisdiction of Palestinian courts extends to all of Palestine and its coastal waters to a distance of three nautical miles.

67. Article 165 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in force in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, on spatial jurisdiction, stipulates that where an offence that is punishable under Palestinian law occurs abroad and the perpetrator has no fixed address in Palestine, he or she shall be prosecuted before the competent court.

68. The jurisdiction of Palestinian courts is addressed in article 163 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, where it is stipulated that the jurisdiction of the courts shall be determined by the place in which the offence occurred or the place in which the offender resides and where he or she was apprehended. Article 166 stipulates that, where an offence punishable under the provisions of the Palestinian Criminal Code falls only partly within the jurisdiction of the Palestinian courts, it shall be treated as if it fell wholly within their jurisdiction.

69. Under article 28 of the Basic Law, the extradition of Palestinian nationals who are charged with an offence is totally prohibited. Under article 10 (para. 1) of the Criminal Code of 1960, such persons shall be tried before Palestinian courts. The procedures set forth in the Code of Criminal Procedure apply to court proceedings, evidence and other procedural matters. Where the perpetrator is a foreign national residing in Palestine whose extradition has not been requested, he or she comes under the jurisdiction of the Palestinian courts and is subject to Palestinian law in accordance with article 10 (para. 4) of the Code.

70. The Supreme Judicial Council has no record of any cases involving foreign nationals being brought before Palestinian courts because their extradition to another State had been refused; the trial of foreign nationals accused of the crime of torturing Palestinians outside Palestine; or the acceptance or refusal of any extradition requests in Palestine.

71. Through its occupation of Palestinian territory, Israel, the occupying Power, exercises illegal control over the crossing points and land, sea and air borders of the State of Palestine. It thus controls the flow of persons and imposes restrictions on the movement of Palestinian and other travellers entering or exiting the State of Palestine. The Israeli occupation also constitutes a stumbling block for the exercise by Palestinian courts of their territorial and personal jurisdiction in Area C, which accounts for 61 per cent of the West Bank, and in occupied East Jerusalem.

Jurisdiction over accused persons who are foreign nationals

72. Under articles 11 and 12 of the Extradition Act of 1927 and articles 10–12 of the Extradition Act of 1926, the competent judge may order the arrest of a person accused of committing an offence requiring extradition to a foreign State, where the arrest warrant issued by that State is duly certified and evidence has been submitted to the court in compliance with the law. If the person has been found guilty of the offence, the competent judge may order the person's arrest or release. In any case, such rulings may be appealed within 15 days of their issue and appeals may be appealed against within the same period under the rules set forth in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Upon issuing the arrest warrant, the judge must place the offender in custody, in a prison or other place of detention, until an order for his or her extradition is issued. Under the laws referred to above, the judge must inform the fugitive offender that he or she will not be extradited for 15 days and has the right to challenge the ruling before the Court of Appeals.

73. A foreign national who is detained in the State of Palestine shall by law be able to contact representatives of his or her country. Under article 123 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a person charged with an offence also has the right to contact his or her family and a lawyer. Nothing in the law prohibits that.

Due process measures for foreign nationals

74. The constitutional and legal rights of detainees and persons charged with offences to proper treatment and due process throughout the judicial and legal proceedings (questioning, investigation and trial) are guaranteed under the Basic Law, Code of Criminal Procedure and Judicial Authority Act, regardless of whether the accused is a Palestinian or foreign national. This is also affirmed in articles 15¹⁸ and 16¹⁹ of the General Intelligence Service Act.

Safeguards for the accused during questioning

75. Before trial, the accused enjoy such safeguards as the inadmissibility of being arrested, searched, imprisoned, detained or held in custody, or having their freedom of movement curtailed or prohibited except by a warrant issued by a court in accordance with article 11 (para. 2) of the Basic Law. Article 29 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides that arresting, imprisoning or curtailing the freedom of a person without a warrant shall be deemed arbitrary except, as provided for in article 30 of the Code, where a person is caught in the act of committing felonies or misdemeanours that are punishable by prison terms of more than six months or where the offender or person charged with committing an offence refuses to provide his or her name and address or has no fixed abode. The Code also stipulates that the accused shall be treated with dignity and come to no physical or mental harm. The period for which the accused may be held in custody is also regulated by law, as indicated earlier in this report.

76. Under the Criminal Code of 1960, the imprisonment or detention of a person in circumstances other than those stipulated by the law constitutes a punishable offence. Under article 12 of the Basic Law, the accused is entitled to have access to information concerning him or herself and, under article 112 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a person who is arrested or detained has the right to be told of the reason for the arrest or detention and to be informed promptly of the charges in a language that he or she understands. With regard to the pretrial questioning stage, safeguards are built in to Palestinian law ensuring that, inter alia, the accused shall only be questioned when cognizant of the charges and presented with the evidence against him or her. Moreover, under article 12 of the Basic Law and article 102 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the accused has the right to obtain the assistance of a defence lawyer without delay and questioning must take place within 24 hours of arrest.

Safeguards for the accused in court

77. Under Palestinian law, defendants are assured of a fair trial and decent treatment during court proceedings. The judiciary and judges are independent and subject only to the authority of the law. Interference by any other authority in their work or in matters of justice is not permitted. Defendants on trial are guaranteed the constitutional and legal safeguards enshrined in Palestinian laws, as stipulated in articles 97 and 98 of the Basic Law and articles 1 and 2 of the Judicial Authority Act. Under Palestinian law, the defendant is presumed innocent throughout the investigation and trial stages until found guilty in a definitive ruling by the competent court. The presumption of innocence places the burden of proof on the prosecution (Office of the Public Prosecutor) and the principle of dubio pro reo applies. Moreover, the defendant shall not appear in court shackled or in a cage for defendants. He or she shall appear wearing his or her own clean clothes.

78. The defendant has the right to a public hearing, except in limited cases where considerations of public order or morals justify the closure of proceedings. The defendant has the right to be represented by defence counsel throughout the hearings. Where he or she has not appointed counsel, the court shall assign him or her a lawyer with not less than five years of professional experience (article 244 of the Code of Criminal Procedure), where the court of first instance holding the hearings is constituted as a criminal court competent to rule on all the felonies and associated misdemeanours contained in the indictment (art. 168). Under the law, the defendant may not be removed from hearings unless he or she disrupts them in a manner that necessitates such action. The court, however, shall keep the defendant apprised of all measures taken in his or her absence.

¹⁸ Article 15 stipulates that: 1. If the arrested person is a foreign national, he or she shall be assisted in contacting the nearest representative of the State of which he or she is a national. 2. The General Intelligence Service shall notify the other country concerned where the circumstances dictate.

Other safeguards to curb torture and maltreatment

79. Under Palestinian law, persons accused of offences have the right not to be held in custody or imprisoned in any place other than those designated by specific legislation on the prisons system, i.e., correctional and rehabilitation centres and places of detention facilities established by the law. Prison directors may only admit inmates on receipt of a signed order by the competent authorities. They must abide by the specified term of detention and not hold inmates thereafter. Under articles 99 and 100 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a representative of the Office of the Public Prosecutor shall carry out a physical examination of the accused prior to the commencement of questioning and take note of any visible injuries and their causes. The representative also has the authority to order medical and psychological examinations of the accused where he deems it necessary or at the request of the accused or their counsel.

Article 8

Extradition of perpetrators of the offence of torture

80. Although torture and maltreatment, as per the Convention, are not explicitly referred to in Palestinian law as extraditable crimes, there is nothing in the law exempting the perpetrators of such crimes from extradition. Under the Extradition Act of 1926, in force in the Gaza Strip, and the Extradition Act of 1927, in force in the West Bank, the offence of unlawful arrest is extraditable, and unlawful arrest is a form of maltreatment.

81. Under the Act of 1927, for an offence to be extraditable, it must be punishable as if it had been committed on Palestinian territory, defined as the West Bank, and included in the list of extraditable offences contained in the Act. Under the Act of 1926, on the other hand, all offences, whether punishable by law or merely referred to in the list of offences in the Act, even if they are not punishable under Palestinian law, are extraditable. The crime of torture is not among them.

82. Article 28 of the Basic Law stipulates an exception to the obligation of the State of Palestine to extradite, whereby the extradition of Palestinian nationals to a foreign country is prohibited. Further exceptions are set forth in the two aforementioned Extradition Acts in force in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Judicial cooperation in matters of criminal procedure related to the offence of torture

83. The State of Palestine is a signatory to the Riyadh Arab Agreement on Judicial Cooperation, which forms the bedrock of judicial and legal cooperation between the Arab States parties with regard to the gamut of offences and guarantees mutual judicial assistance. Part 2 of that Agreement addresses the publication and notification of judicial and non-judicial documents and papers, while Part 3 regulates the matter of rogatory commissions. The State of Palestine has become a member of the Arab Criminal Police with a view to working with Arab police entities to combat crime. The European Union Police Mission has also worked with the Palestinian police on the legal and professional development of the international police unit within the Palestinian police force and the training of its personnel.

84. In the area of international cooperation to combat crime, the State of Palestine acceded to the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime in 2015 and joined the International Criminal Police Organization (INTERPOL) on 27 September 2017. Thereafter, it established INTERPOL Palestine (the National Central Bureau of INTERPOL). It has been given the equipment that it needs to do its work and staffed with a group of experienced police officers who are proficient in the foreign languages required for their assignment, and several courses have been held on how to use the INTERPOL network and on article 3 of the organization's constitution, as set forth below:

Policies and measures

1. Ministry of the Interior

A. Instructions

85. In 2003, the Ministry of the Interior issued standing binding instructions to all training departments at security agencies to incorporate human rights training as a mandatory component of all training courses, regardless of the subject or nature of the training. The Ministry of the Interior and the security agencies began to develop a Democracy and Human Rights Unit at the Ministry of the Interior and complaints departments at the Ministry and all security agencies. The purpose was to promote awareness of human rights concepts among the staff of the security agencies so that they would be mindful of those concepts when dealing with the public.

86. The Ministry of the Interior has issued instructions to circulate the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment to all security agencies and their staff so that they can become acquainted with its provisions and comply with them in the course of dealing with the public. A CD has been produced containing the Convention, its Optional Protocol and the Istanbul Protocol, and has been adopted as part of the training curriculum for all Palestinian law enforcement agencies.

- In 2017, the Minister of the Interior issued a decision creating a special team to monitor the Ministry's compliance with human rights principles and the rule of law. The goal was to increase human rights awareness within the Ministry and security agencies and ensure that human rights are protected. That team works on the sections of periodic and annual reports and other publications required by conventions to which the State of Palestine is a party that relate to the work of the Ministry. It collects information related to legislation regulating the work of the Ministry and the Palestinian security forces and submits the draft laws and other information that are relevant to the strategic plans and policies followed by the Ministry and the security forces. It monitors human rights violations by the Ministry and the security forces and suggests mechanisms to limit such violations and prevent them from turning into systematic practices.

87. The Ministry of the Interior and the security forces, in collaboration with national partners from Government agencies and civil society institutions, as well as the relevant international agencies, has produced a manual of standard operating procedure for health-care services at correctional and rehabilitation centres. The goal is to increase awareness among staff at detention facilities and correctional and rehabilitation centres of the most advanced treatment methods, in accordance with national legislation and international agreements to which the State of Palestine has acceded, so that standardized up-to-date health-care services are provided to all inmates at correctional and rehabilitation centres.

Similarly, legal units at the Palestinian security agencies have been standardized through the adoption of a manual of operating procedure in collaboration with the relevant civil society and human rights institutions.

88. In partnership with the Hurriyyat Centre, the bill of detainee rights has been developed for interrogation, detention and correctional and rehabilitation centres, both civilian and military.

89. In 2018, the President of the State of Palestine signed a code of ethics and public conduct for members of the Palestinian security forces. It is to be used as a reference for the security forces in the course of carrying out their duties, in order to ensure that they are able to achieve a balance between protecting public rights and freedoms and the need to maintain security and order, consistent with international standards.

B. Memorandums of understanding

90. In 2017, the Ministry of the Interior signed a memorandum of understanding with Najah University to provide academic training on torture prevention for Ministry and security service staff using the Istanbul Protocol as a training tool. There have also been efforts to raise awareness about the Convention and torture prevention in all incarceration institutions, as well as within the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministry of Justice, and the forensic and military medical services agencies. The goal is to develop a national team that specializes in torture prevention on the basis the Istanbul Protocol standards.

91. A study was prepared in cooperation with the Treatment and Rehabilitation Centre for Victims of Torture on the compliance of Palestinian legislation with the Convention against Torture and the adoption of that Convention for the purposes of both harmonizing legislation and training.

92. In 2018, the Ministry of the Interior signed a cooperation agreement with the Muwatin Institute at Birzeit University to implement a training curriculum, entitled “Human Rights and Democracy Guide for the Security Forces and State Institutions”. Some 50 staff from the Ministry of the Interior and the security forces received training in the preparation of human rights training guides, and trainers were trained to transmit their experience to their agencies through ongoing education and by incorporating human rights issues into their annual plans and field activities.

93. A letter of commitment was signed between the General Intelligence Service and the Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces (DCAF) to strengthen channels of communication with civil society and the media on the methods for addressing complaints that are followed by the enforcement authorities and security services, and to enhance the capacity of enforcement agencies and security services to handle complaints of torture and abuses of physical integrity.

94. In April 2017, the State of Palestine renewed its memorandum of cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), reaffirming the authority granted to ICRC to make periodic visits to correctional and rehabilitation centres.

C. Training

95. The Ministry of Interior conducts ongoing human rights training for all members of the security forces, including raising awareness about obligations stemming from the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture.

96. The various Palestinian security services held over 416 training courses, lectures and workshops on a range of human rights issues, including torture, dealing with children and women victims of violence, psychological and social counselling, family protection, categorization of inmates, and relevant laws. Human rights training sessions were also held for Palestinian judges and prosecutors. Details are provided in the tables below.

2. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates

97. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, in its capacity as Chair of the national standing committee that follows up the accession of the State of Palestine to international conventions and treaties, and the Independent Commission for Human Rights, as the national human rights institution and an observer in the national committee, have signed a memorandum of understanding with a view to combining in a joint national effort to raise awareness within Palestinian society of the rights and duties entailed by accession to international agreements. That effort would be in parallel with the work being done by each of them separately. They would provide the necessary training to the relevant parties with a view to improving understanding of agreements and developing capacities to make use of international mechanisms and benefit from the best experiences of the Independent Commission for Human Rights in the area and from the foreign relations of the State of Palestine.

98. The Independent Commission participates in the drafting of reports submitted to international bodies by providing information and advice that is needed to compile such reports, and by ensuring that they are transparent and inclusive. It takes part in national consultations on drafting the periodic reports required by human rights conventions. The Ministry engages in ongoing consultations with the Independent Commission for Human Rights on legislative, legal and political reforms, and harmonizing legal provisions with the commitments of the State of Palestine under international agreements. It sets up cooperation mechanisms for implementing obligations stemming from accession to those agreements and ensures that they guarantee the rights and freedoms of the Palestinian people, especially with respect to accountability for the occupying Power and justice for victims.

99. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates, in collaboration with the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education and the Independent Commission for Human Rights, celebrated International Human Rights Day on 10 December 2015 by creating a poster containing the articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in simplified language for schoolchildren. It was distributed in all schools in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. That was in addition to taking part in a morning radio programme at a Palestinian school that is affected daily by violations committed by the Israeli occupiers, and participation in an awareness-raising programme on the state of human rights in Palestine.

100. The Ministry created and distributed a booklet containing the basic human rights agreements to which the State of Palestine had acceded in 2014, with a view to raising public awareness of the content of those agreements.

3. Ministry of Justice

101. The Ministry of Justice is the entity responsible for taking measures to protect the basic freedoms of citizens in accordance with the Palestinian Basic Law, ensuring implementation of regional and international conventions and treaties having to do with basic rights and freedoms, and proposing policies, plans, programs and measures to ensure the promotion, protection and realization of human rights in coordination with the competent authorities.

102. Article 10 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centre Act grants the Ministry of Justice the power to inspect correctional and rehabilitation centres by making field visits and hearing prisoner complaints, in addition to following up coordination with the relevant official parties to draft the relevant plans, studies and legislation.

103. The Ministry's Department of Forensic Medicine conducts examinations to detect torture of inmates in correctional and rehabilitation centres and detention facilities.

104. Among the achievements of the Ministry of Justice was the signature of a memorandum of understanding with the Treatment and Rehabilitation Centre for Victims of Torture on improving the capacities of human rights and legal staff to document allegations of torture and other violations in Palestine with the General Directorate of the Police. The goal was cooperation to facilitate implementation of the provisions of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act, and to study ways of improving operations in compliance with international standards for prisoners.

105. The Ministry of Justice and the Italian Agency for Development Cooperation signed a memorandum of understanding to support a human rights unit as part of a training programme on monitoring correctional and rehabilitation centres and compliance with international instruments.

4. Office of the Public Prosecutor

106. The human rights unit of the Office of the Public Prosecutor is working to mainstream and instil principles and standards of international law. It operates in accordance with the provisions of the Basic Law and the national justice sector strategy for 2018-2022, and in the context of a comprehensive vision for the State of Palestine after it had acceded to numerous treaties and protocols and join various international organizations. The office has prepared a handbook on operating procedure and another on the competencies of its various departments, divisions and branches, to be used in workshops for prosecutors and staff. The unit provides training courses to meet the needs of prosecutors in areas of their work relevant to international agreements to which the State of Palestine is a party, especially as regards juvenile justice, gender equality and guarantees for fair trials.

107. It develops and prepares methods and standards for monitoring prisons and detention facilities to ensure compliance with human right standards under the Mandela Rules. It ensures follow-up of periodic inspections of prisons and detention facilities. It prepares relevant reports and monitors violations so that they can be addressed in accordance with procedures and the law. It conducts its work through prosecutors' offices throughout the governorates.

108. It investigates complaints, including complaints submitted electronically and any complaints having to do with torture and maltreatment.

5. Ministry of Health

109. In accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act, the Ministry of Health provides mental health services at 14 community clinics in health directorates in the West Bank. They include a centre specializing in the psychological health of children and adolescents. Mental and psychological health services are also offered at the Bethlehem Psychiatric Hospital. Health services are also provided to persons released from Palestinian correctional and rehabilitation centres. When needed, specialists are called in to examine, analyse and treat cases at correctional and rehabilitation centres. That is done in coordination with the General Directorate of Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres. These services are provided free of charge and are included in the Government health insurance scheme.

110. Government clinics also provide mental health services to persons who have been released from the prisons and detention facilities of the occupying Israeli authorities.

6. Ministry of Social Development

111. The Ministry of Social Development takes the lead in regulating and administering the social protection sector. It develops the relevant policies via active coordination and partnership with all relevant agencies. It carries out the tasks of monitoring, supervising and providing services to all the groups covered under the social protection sector in the State of Palestine.

112. The Ministry has assigned a special section within its organizational structure made up of qualified counsellors to supervise and follow-up conditions among prisoners of both genders in the correctional and rehabilitation centres. It offers the following services:

- It provides social welfare and psychological counselling services for inmates. These are provided to prisoners by a welfare counsellor during a visit to a correctional and rehabilitation centre. A qualified counsellor makes at least one weekly visit, during which he provides individual and group counselling services to inmates. He helps them stay connected with the outside world and overcome any psychological problems from which they may be suffering.

- It organizes meetings and recreational activities for inmates on special social and national occasions.
- It provides cash assistance to a number of inmates who are suffering from economic hardship.
- It provides recommendations on home visits for prisoners who have demonstrated good behaviour.
- It helps inmates contact their families and it contacts family members about visiting their incarcerated relatives.
- It arranges visits by children to their mothers imprisoned in correctional and rehabilitation centres.

113. Activities have been conducted to promote the rule of law as part of the Justice and Security for the Palestinian People programme (SAWASYA) with the support of UN-Women. Women inmates in correctional and rehabilitation centres in Jericho, Ramallah and Janin were supplied with personal items for themselves and their children, including basic hygiene supplies and other necessary items. First-class transportation was provided for their families.

114. A special department has been established to protect children victims of violence, abuse and neglect, as well as children who have committed violations of law. It is staffed by qualified counsellors, who follow up cases of juvenile delinquency in accordance with the 2016 decree-law on protecting juveniles. There is also the 2017-2020 strategy for protecting juveniles, which was drafted in cooperation with partners in the juvenile justice sector. It provides for the needs of the centres, including special standards for the court developed by House of Hope that meet international standards. There is also a code of conduct for people who work with children and juveniles in coordination with juvenile welfare centres and local community institutions that offer vocational training to juveniles.

115. The Ministry of Development also provides centres for the protection of children victims of violence, abuse and neglect. Those centres provide care, protection and psychological support services for children. The Ministry also provides centres for the care and protection of juvenile delinquents, such as House of Hope in Ramallah. In that connection, the Ministry has prepared an instructional handbook for juvenile centres. It provides detailed instructions on handling juveniles from the moment they are taken in by a centre to the moment they leave.

116. A special unit was established to protect and enable marginalized women, especially those who are victims of violence, and to provide shelter for women who are victims of violence and abuse, and whose lives are under threat. In the West Bank, there are three centres devoted to that purpose. One of them, the Mihwar Centre in Bethlehem, is affiliated with the Ministry of Social Development and operates under its supervision. The Ministry also oversees centres for the protection of women affiliated with non-governmental institutions. That includes three centres, two of which are in the West Bank and one of which is in the Gaza Strip.

117. These centres provide protection for women and children victims of violence and empower the Palestinian family and society in general. Operation of the protection centres is covered by the 2011 statute for the protection centres and 2013 national referral system. A national team was formed to ensure implementation of the statute by all partners. A handbook was prepared to clarify roles and ensure integrated operations based on human rights principles. Efforts are now under way to establish protection networks for women victims of violence in cooperation with partners, and in particular the Ministry of Women's Affairs and the Women's Centre for Legal Aid and Counselling. That includes the provision of health care free of charge for victims of violence and abuse in coordination with the Ministry of Health.

118. The Ministry also supervises and monitors the work of centres that provide residential and day services to persons with special needs, including monitoring the condition of residents.

119. With a view to coordinating Government and non-governmental efforts to ensure a life of dignity for persons with disabilities, a Presidential Decree was issued in 2012 amending the Presidential Decree of September 2010 concerning the Supreme Council for Persons with Disabilities. The Decree provides that the Council would consist of 16 agencies, including government agencies, civil society agencies, organizations of persons with disabilities and the private sector, together with the Independent Commission for Human Rights as an observer. It follows up implementation of the law and international agreements that the Palestinian Authority has acceded to concerning persons with disabilities.

120. The Ministry also supplies inclusiveness and disability counsellors in all the governorates. Their job is to provide protection, support and interventions in cases of violations committed against persons with disabilities.

Article 11

Interrogation rules, instructions and methods

121. Legislation in force provides for legal guarantees with regard to methods used in the interrogation, arrest and treatment of detainees. That helps to prevent torture and inhuman treatment. We note in particular the provisions of article 11 of the Basic Law.²⁰

122. The Code of Criminal Procedure defines interrogation as the detailed questioning of the accused in connection with the acts attributed to him, during which he shall be confronted with inquiries, questions and suspicions related to the accusation and asked to respond thereto. The Code restricts the authority to conduct interrogations in felony and misdemeanour cases to the Office of the Public Prosecutor. When the suspect appears for interrogation, the prosecutor must ascertain and confirm his personal details, including his name and identity. Then he may interrogate and question him about the charge made against him. The statements of the accused are recorded in the interrogation file. This all happens after he has undergone a physical examination and note has been made of all external injuries and the causes thereof. In addition, the necessary medical and psychological examinations are conducted on the suspect upon his demand, the demand of his attorney or the demand of the prosecutor.

123. The Code charges members of the Office of the Prosecutor with the task of supervising and overseeing officers of the court, as well as identifying and investigating crimes committed within their areas of competence. The Public Prosecutor has the right to request that the competent authorities take disciplinary action against anyone found to be in violation of their obligations or in dereliction of their duties, without prejudice to their further criminal accountability. Military judicial officers are subject to the authority of the Chief Military Prosecutor, as are all members of the Office of the Military Prosecutor. He has the authority to oversee judicial proceedings and supervise correctional and rehabilitation centres and detention facilities in accordance with the provisions of articles 16 and 17 of the 1979 Code of Military Justice.

Government oversight

124. The Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act (No. 6 of 1998), article 10, grants authority to oversee correctional and rehabilitation centres to the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Justice, the Public Prosecutor and the Justices of the Supreme Court. They are supposed to make sure that health and living conditions in detention facilities and correctional and rehabilitation centres meet the requirements stipulated in laws and international instruments and that the rights of inmates and detainees are protected, including their right to continuous attention to their health, their right to their sleeping quarters and cells inspected periodically by a doctor and the right to be transferred to a clinic or hospital when necessary. The Act also grants the Minister of the Interior the right to coordinate with the Minister for Social Development in the appointment of qualified inspectors and social workers to study the psychological and social condition of inmates.

125. Article 354 of the 1979 Code of Procedure of Revolutionary Criminal Tribunals provides that members of the Office of the Public Prosecutor are accessories to the crime of deprivation of freedom and should be prosecuted if they neglect their duty to oversee correction centres. The Code stresses the individual responsibility of members of the Office of the Prosecutor to ensure that rights and freedoms are protected and their obligation to inspect places of detention. That duty is confirmed by article 126 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and article 70 of the Judiciary Act (No. 1 of 2002).

126. The Executive Authority has issued several sets of standing instructions urging officials to comply with laws and instructions issued to ensure the right of detainees and inmates to dignified living conditions in which their rights are protected. Those instructions include their right not to be subject to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment. Those sets of instructions include the following:

- Instructions issued by the President the State of Palestine on 13 September 2009 addressed to all agencies that detain persons. Those instructions stressed the need to refrain from any form of torture and all practices that violate human rights and dignity. They have been circulated to the heads of the security agencies.
- Decision No. 149 of 2009 concerning compliance by the security services with rules and standards for treating detainees. Article 1 of that Decision provides that all members of security services must comply with legal provisions regarding arrest, detention and search, and must respect the human rights, public freedoms and human dignity of detainees. Article 2 provides that all detainees shall at all times be treated humanely by the security services and with respect for their basic human dignity. They may be detained only in properly equipped detention centres that meet all health requirements. Under article 3 of that Decision, members of the security services are under an obligation to refrain from permitting or approving any physical or psychological punishment of detainees, and also to refrain from taking part in any kind of torture of detainees.
- Decision No. 172 issued by the Minister of the Interior on 17 September 2009 concerning security detainees in Junayd prison in the city of Nablus. That decision provides that for the purposes of operation and in the public interest, the interrogation system should be reformed and no form of torture or any other method that detracts from human dignity should be employed. The detention system should be reformed, and detainee contentions should be improved, including food, medical services, lodging and recreation.
- Decision No. 192 issued by the Minister of the Interior on 1 December 2009 concerning disciplinary offences committed by members of the Palestinian security forces that involve harming, torturing or abusing others in violation of humanitarian values and legislation in force. First-degree violations are punishable by the administrative penalty of separation from service.

- Circular No. 6 of 2010 issued on 19 April 2010 by the Director-General of the Palestinian police prohibiting the use of violence, torture or any other form of cruel or degrading treatment when dealing with citizens.
- The written instructions issued by the heads of the security agencies to law enforcement officials urging them to comply with legal procedures when apprehending, detaining, interrogating, searching or taking statements from suspects, or remanding them for prosecution. The instructions also stressed the need to take measures to prevent detainees from being subjected to torture or maltreatment.
- The instructions issued by the Military Prosecutor General to military prosecutors requiring them to visit and inspect correctional and rehabilitation centres and detention facilities at least once per month, submit reports, and provide monthly disclosures of the names of detainees. He also issued instructions prohibiting detention, or any other form of confinement outside of correctional and rehabilitation centres.
- The administrations of all the security agencies intend to approve and adopt codes of conduct governing the conduct of their members that will ensure proper treatment of detainees and suspects. The codes require compliance with legal provisions and human rights principles when conducting any legal procedures and when dealing with detainees, especially during apprehensions, detentions and searches. They also stressed the need to refrain from excessive use of force.
- The organizational structure of each of the law enforcement agencies includes a department for the receipt and consideration of complaints. That includes complaints about torture or maltreatment. That is in addition to a department of inspection and supervision. The State of Palestine has tried to strengthen the oversight mechanisms for enforcing rules on detention, preventive detention and the treatment of detainees with a view to preventing any instances of torture or inhuman treatment.
- Human rights units have been created in ministries and Government departments. That includes complaints departments at the Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of Justice. Those departments receive and address complaints from citizens on human rights matters in general and torture in particular.

Supervision of detention facilities is carried out through surprise visits that are conducted regularly by inspectors from the Palestinian Ministry of Justice. They send their observations to the Ministry of the Interior, the director of the relevant correctional centre and the director of the police on an ongoing basis.

Civil oversight

127. Pursuant to the Palestinian Basic Law, article 31, and Presidential Decree No. 59 of 1994, the Independent Commission for Human Rights was granted the authority to monitor and ensure that the basic requirements for the protection of human rights are incorporated in all Palestinians laws, legislative acts and regulations, and are observed in the operation of the agencies and institutions of the State of Palestine. That Commission handles cases and complaints involving any human rights violations committed against citizens by the executive authority. It conducts periodic inspection visits to detention facilities and correctional and rehabilitation centres to make sure that there are no legal violations.

128. The Ministry of the Interior and the Independent Commission signed a memorandum of understanding to facilitate the work of the Independent Commission's inspectors during their visits to correctional and rehabilitation centres and detention facilities, and to guarantee that they can exercise their periodic supervision authority, on the understanding that the Commission will record its observations and inquiries, and submit them to the director of the prison and the Minister of Interior.

129. The Ministry of the Interior and Palestinian civil society institutions signed several memorandums of understanding allowing the latter to visit and inspect places of detention and correctional and rehabilitation centres, view prisoner conditions and talk and listen to prisoners. One of those institutions is the Treatment and Rehabilitation Centre for Victims of Torture. There have also been a number of oral understandings between the heads of security agencies and the Al Haqq organization, as well as other organizations, on conducting surprise inspection visits to detention facilities.

130. Among the initiatives of the State of Palestine for cooperation with international human rights organizations, we note the agreement that was signed by the Ministry of the Interior and the International Committee of the Red Cross and the agreement that was signed by the Ministry of the Interior and the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in Palestine. Those agreements grant those two institutions the authority to visit all correctional and rehabilitation centres and detention facilities, view conditions of detention, interview detainees without a representative of the correctional centre present and submit observations and recommendations to the relevant authorities.

International oversight

131. On 28 December 2017, the State of Palestine signed the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, thereby demonstrating the seriousness of its political will to prevent torture and ensure accountability in that regard. It is one of the most important steps taken by the State of Palestine since its accession to the United Nations human rights treaties in 2014. Thereafter, the Palestinian Government announced its commitment to establishing an independent national mechanism for the prevention of torture, as stipulated by the Optional Protocol. The core mandate of the mechanism will be to visit all places of detention in order to prevent torture and ensure that living and health conditions in them are proper, and to coordinate with the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. It can also make visits to Palestinian correctional and rehabilitation centres. The State of Palestine is currently working with national and international partners, including Palestinian civil society organizations, to set up the mechanism.

132. On 7 March 2019, the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture sent a letter announcing its intention to visit the State of Palestine in accordance with articles 11/1 (b/i) and 13/2 of the Optional Protocol. It also requested the State of Palestine to supply it with information and data on places of detention. The visit was to take place between 5 and 12 April 2019. The State of Palestine assigned a contact person for the Subcommittee to make arrangements for the visit and submitted the requested data and information. However, on 5 April 2019, the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in occupied Palestine informed the Palestinian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Expatriates that Israel, the occupying Power, had refused to grant entry visas to the members of the Subcommittee. That prevented them from making their visit and thereby deprived Palestine of its right to receive recommendations from the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture that might have made a major contribution to improving Palestinian detention facilities and correctional and rehabilitation centres. In keeping with the political will of the State of Palestine to combat torture in cooperation with local partners from civil society institutions (especially rights organizations), as well as international partners (above all the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture), the State of Palestine hereby renews its invitation to the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture to visit the State of Palestine.

Regulation of places of confinement and detention

133. The Basic Law provides that imprisonment or detention is permitted only in places that are subject to the laws regulating prisons. Articles 1-3 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act provides that such centres shall be established and their locations determined by decision of the Ministry of the Interior. They are attached to the Ministry and are overseen and supervised by the General Directorate of Correctional and Rehabilitation centres. Article 125 of the Code of Criminal Procedure prohibits the confinement of any person anywhere other than correctional and rehabilitation centres and places of detention designated by law.

134. Articles 1 and 9 of the Decree-Law on preventive security grant the Minister of the Interior the authority to establish fixed detention facilities affiliated with the General Directorate of Preventive Security independent of the correctional and rehabilitation centres, provided that he keeps the Minister of Justice and the Public Prosecutor informed of their status and any alterations made to them. Those articles also stipulate that those centres are to be treated as legal detention facilities run by preventive security personnel. In that connection, we note that the State of Palestine does not have non-public or secret prisons. However, Israel, the occupying Power, has set up illegal prisons on Palestinian territory that are not subject to any human rights standards. Israel also perpetrates all kinds of violations against Palestinians arrested by the occupying forces. In addition, the illegal settlements contain numerous detention facilities in which torture and abuse are practiced with complete impunity.

Qualifications for law enforcement personnel and correctional and rehabilitation centre staff

135. Article 86 of the Basic Law provides that the appointment of all public officials in the State, whether civilian or military, and the conditions of their employment must be in accordance with the law. The provisions of the Palestinian Security Forces Service Act are applicable to persons responsible for the confinement and protection of detainees. They are security officials appointed to military service. This is provided that there is no legislation containing other special provisions regulating their work as a special category. The Palestinian Security Forces Service Act specifies as conditions for the appointment of military personnel that they must not have been convicted by a court or disciplinary committee for a dishonourable act, even if they were subsequently reinstated or covered under a general amnesty, and that they be of good conduct, good reputation and medically fit for the post.

136. Articles 107 and 108 of the Basic Law provide that the Public Prosecutor shall be appointed by the President on the recommendation of the Supreme Judicial Council. The law specifies the conditions for their appointment. Articles 16, 61 and 63 of the Judiciary Act provide that anyone appointed as a prosecutor must not have been convicted by a court or disciplinary committee for a dishonourable act, even if they were subsequently reinstated or covered under a general amnesty, that they be of good conduct and good reputation, that they terminate any membership of any political party or organization, and that they be proficient in the Arabic language.

The condition of correctional and rehabilitation centres in the West Bank

137. There are three types of detention facilities in the West Bank, depending on period of detention and affiliation. The first type are permanent detention facilities. Persons are placed in them in accordance with the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act. They are affiliated with the General Directorate of Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres. Living conditions and other aspects of those centres are subject to the provisions of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act. The second type are temporary detention facilities (police holding facilities) where people are held for no more than 24 hours. They are subject to oversight by the police directorate where the facility is located. Detention conditions in those centres are subject to the provisions of the Palestinian Code of Criminal Procedure. The third type are detention facilities affiliated with the security services. Those facilities are affiliated with one of the security services in the West Bank, which are Preventive Security, General Intelligence and Military Intelligence.

138. There are 13 detention facilities affiliated with Preventive Security. That service has a main detention centre in each governorates of the West Bank where suspects are held and interrogated. Those centres are subject to central oversight by the service's General Directorate in Ramallah. They are not subject to judicial oversight. However, they are subject to periodic visits from the Independent Commission for Human Rights and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

139. There are 11 centres affiliated with the General Intelligence Service. That service has a main detention centre in each governorate of the West Bank, with the exception of Jericho, where the central detention and interrogation facility is attached to the Jericho detention facility. Suspects are held and interrogated in those centres. Those centres are subject to central oversight by the service's General Directorate in Ramallah.

140. The detention and interrogation procedures of the Military Intelligence Service are conducted in accordance with the memorandum issued by the Military Prosecutor. Detention of suspects may be extended in accordance with the 1979 Revolutionary Act. They are military personnel and are brought before military courts. From a legal standpoint, there is no law that deals specifically with the arrest and detention of military personnel by the Military Intelligence Service. There are instructions issued by the President of the State of Palestine on 10 July 2011, which were circulated to all the security services. Those instructions require all soldiers brought up on military or criminal charges to be remanded to the Military Intelligence Service. The Minister of the Interior and National Security also issued instructions on 19 August 2007 that require soldiers accused of offences to be remanded to the Military Intelligence service. They were circulated to the heads of the security agencies. From an administrative standpoint, this kind of detention is subject to oversight by the Ministry of the Interior.

The condition of correctional and rehabilitation centres in the Gaza Strip

141. The Ministry of the Interior in the Gaza Strip has established a number of detention facilities in various governorates in the Gaza Strip to alleviate overcrowding in the main centres. Those facilities are as follows:

- The Southern District correctional and rehabilitation centre located in Khan Yunus Governorate, where prisoners from the southern governorates of the Gaza Strip (Rafah and Khan Yunus Governorates) are housed;
- The Central District correctional and rehabilitation centre located in Central Governorate, where prisoners from Central Governorate are housed;
- The North Gaza correctional and rehabilitation centre located in the town of Bayt Lahiya in North Gaza Governorate, where prisoners from North Gaza Governorate (Jabaliyah, Bayt Lahiya and Bayt Hanun) are housed.

142. In all the correctional and rehabilitation centres in the Gaza governorates, prisoners are taken in based on orders from the Office of the Public Prosecutor or the competent courts. That happens after they have been arrested in accordance with procedure. They may also be taken in based on a judicial ruling from the competent court. The operation of all the centres is overseen by male and female officers and police personnel from the General Directorate of Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres.

Violations perpetrated by the Israeli occupiers against Palestinian security and law enforcement institutions and personnel

143. Israeli violations against Palestinian security and law enforcement institutions and personnel are standing in the way of the rule of law in the State of Palestine. Ever since Israel began its occupation of Palestinian territory, it has been trying to undermine the Palestinian justice and security sector. It has enacted racist laws that infringe on the sovereignty of the State of Palestine. That is in addition to the direct violations it perpetrates on the ground. Most notably, it has targeted Palestinian security, justice and law enforcement institutions and arrested and imprisoned their personnel.

Article 12
Investigation procedures

144. Palestinian legislation in force ensures that any incident or anyone accused of torture is investigated promptly and impartially, in accordance with article 12 of the Palestinian Basic Law, which provides that the accused must be tried without delay. With regard to criminal investigations, the Office of the Public Prosecutor alone has the authority to initiate criminal proceedings under article 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which grants the power to institute proceedings to the Public Prosecutor or a prosecutor within the Office of the Public Prosecutor. Pursuant to article 56, the Office of the Public Prosecutor must initiate and complete the investigation and then commence proceedings as soon as it becomes aware that the crime has been committed. Under articles 18-21 of the Revolutionary Criminal Code, the Military Prosecutor General and his deputies are authorized investigate crimes committed by military personnel as soon they become aware of the commission thereof and to take the measures required by law.

145. With regard to disciplinary investigations, we referred earlier in this report to the provisions of the Palestinian Security Forces Service Act and the Civil Service Act related to the opening of an investigation, and also to the provisions concerning which authorities have the power to order that an investigation be conducted, the composition of investigative and disciplinary commissions, and suspension of employees who are being investigated. We have also provided information on procedures currently in effect, including the ability to conduct medical examinations without delay and the availability of forensic expertise.

146. Persons who have been tortured or maltreated may lodge a complaint directly with the security services, the legislative and governmental oversight authorities, or the relevant civil society organizations. They may also lodge a complaint with the Independent Commission for Human Rights, which treats with great seriousness any allegations received concerning maltreatment or torture during arrest or detention. It seeks to verify claims by requesting medical reports, conducting physical examinations of complainants and hearing witnesses. When the Independent Commission is convinced that an allegation is genuine, it communicates and corresponds with the director of the relevant agency. The Independent Commission has received many written responses from the security services with regard to several complaints. The quality of the responses from the security agencies has improved, in particular those provided by police in the West Bank.

Lodging and addressing complaints

147. The State of Palestine guarantees any person who has been tortured or subjected to maltreatment or inhuman treatment in its territory the right to lodge a complaint with the competent authorities and agencies. The State also guarantees the right of such persons to have their complaints considered seriously, expeditiously and impartially. Looking at the procedures in effect, the nature of complaints made and the organizational structures of the law enforcement agencies, we find that those agencies are constantly evolving thanks to the strong desire of the State to protect rights and fulfil its obligations under the Convention.

148. Under Palestinian law, certain authorities are authorized to visit and inspect Palestinian correctional and rehabilitation centres, as stated earlier in the report. Under article 12, the Director-General of the correctional and rehabilitation centres must review and inspect all detention centres periodically. Moreover, under article 18, the Director-General is authorized to accept complaints from inmates and make comments. That same article provides that inmates have the right to lodge a complaint or make a request, which is then entered into a special register and sent to the competent authority, and it provides that the response thereto shall be conveyed immediately upon receipt.

Judicial disputes

149. Judicial remedies can be sought through the Public Prosecutor and the courts, the independence and impartiality of which are guaranteed under the Basic Law. Article 6 of the Basic Law provides that the rule of law is the basis of governance in Palestine, and that all organs, agencies, institutions and persons are subject to the law. Moreover, article 9 provides that Palestinians are equal before the law and the judiciary, without discrimination on the grounds of race, sex, colour, religion, political opinion or disability, while article 30 provides that the right to litigate is guaranteed to all people, that all Palestinians have the right of recourse to the courts and that judicial proceedings shall be regulated by law so as to ensure that cases are settled expeditiously.

150. Pursuant to articles 1 to 7 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the victim of an act of aggression, torture, maltreatment or inhuman treatment has the right to lodge a complaint with the competent judicial authorities (Office of the Public Prosecutor). Under article 22 of the Code, judicial police commissioners are authorized to receive reports and complaints about crimes, which they must refer to the Office of the Public Prosecutor without delay. They are also authorized to conduct inspections and obtain the information and clarifications required to facilitate investigations, and to consult specialized experts. Article 23 of the Code furthermore provides that judicial police commissioners must provide the competent court with any transcripts and items seized that are relevant to the offence and that they must follow up thereon with the court. Once the investigation of a complaint has been concluded, the Office of the Public Prosecutor must act upon the outcome, whether that be that the act is not punishable or that the case should be kept on file. In the latter case, the prosecutor must submit his opinion on the matter to the Public Prosecutor by means of a memorandum. If the act is deemed to be a violation, the case is referred to a justice of the peace, and if it is deemed to be a misdemeanour, it is referred to the competent court. However, if the act constitutes a felony, the accused is indicted and the case is referred to the Public Prosecutor or one of his deputies.

151. Article 127 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that a detainee or prisoner has the right to file a written or oral complaint with the Office of the Public Prosecutor through the director of the correctional and rehabilitation centre, who must accept the complaint and, after entering it into a special register maintained at the centre, forward it to the Office of the Public Prosecutor. Under article 153 of the Code, the complainant has right to appeal against the decision to keep a case on file by making a request to the Public Prosecutor, who must take a decision thereon within one month of its submission. The complainant may appeal against the decision of the Public Prosecutor with the competent court that is hearing the case, the decision of which shall be final. In any event, the Public Prosecutor may reopen the case file if new evidence becomes available or the perpetrator is identified.

152. Articles 40-51 of the Revolutionary Code of Criminal Procedure (1979) set out the procedures for making, investigating and referring complaints. The victim of a felony or misdemeanour may submit a complaint to the Public Prosecutor, who must initiate an investigation immediately. If the Public Prosecutor determines that the complainant does not set out clear reasons, that the perpetrator is unknown or that the documents provided by the complainant do not support adequately the complaint, he must initiate an investigation in order to identify the perpetrator. The Revolutionary Code, in its article 103, enumerates the decisions that the Public Prosecutor can take upon completing investigation of a complaint. He may halt prosecution, order that further investigations be conducted or refer the accused to his commander, if the act constitutes a disciplinary offence. If the Public Prosecutor concludes that the act is a felony or misdemeanour, he will then indict the accused and refer him to the competent court. The decisions of the Public Prosecutor in such matters may be challenged within five days before the Chief Military Justice.

Administrative disputes

153. The State of Palestine has strived to enhance the effectiveness of the complaints units of government ministries, institutions and departments. To that end, the Cabinet adopted decision 09/03/05/mim waw/alif qaf (2005), pursuant to which public complaints units were established in the various ministries to receive complaints from citizens and employees, and Decision No. 8 regulating the complaints units was issued on 22 September 2019. The complaints units operate as part of an approved, centralized and unified governmental system for complaints that regulates the operations of the complaints units of the various ministries, which report to the complaints directorate of the Cabinet. A common set of regulations and a procedural manual have been developed for the units of the various ministries that outline the procedures for lodging, addressing, considering, following up on and deciding whether to accept or reject a complaint. Should a complaint be rejected, the complainant has the right of resort to the judiciary, which will adjudicate his complaint.

154. Human rights units have been established in the criminal justice system of the State of Palestine (Ministry of the Interior, Ministry of Justice, Office of the Public Prosecutor, Supreme Judicial Council and the Cabinet). Those units have helped the authorities to respond better to citizens' complaints about abuses committed by law enforcement officers. The existence of such units enables citizens to lodge a complaint about any crime of torture or maltreatment committed by any employee.

Civil disputes

155. The Independent Commission for Human Rights of Palestine is an important and effective body. It receives communications from citizens concerning allegations of human rights violations, including allegations of torture or maltreatment. The Independent Commission follows up with the competent authorities on complaints and allegations that it has received. In addition, as stated earlier in this document, it visits and inspects detention centres in the State of Palestine.

Independent National Commission of Inquiry

156. On 1 July 2015, the President of the State of Palestine, Mahmoud Abbas, issued a decree establishing the Independent National Commission of Inquiry and mandated it to follow up on the report of the international independent commission of inquiry on the 2014 Gaza conflict, which was established pursuant to Human Rights Council resolution S-21/1, adopted on 23 July 2014. In that resolution, the Human Rights Council decides to urgently dispatch an independent, international commission of inquiry to investigate all violations of international humanitarian law and international human rights law in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, particularly in the occupied Gaza Strip. After that presidential decree was issued, the Palestinian Cabinet issued its resolution (No. 17/65/05 mim waw/ra' ha') endorsing the establishment of the Independent National Commission of Inquiry to review and study the report of the international independent commission of inquiry on the 2014 Gaza conflict.

157. The international commission was established in order to determine the facts and circumstances of the violations and the crimes perpetrated and identify those responsible, and to make recommendations, in particular on accountability measures, all with a view to avoiding and ending impunity and ensuring that those responsible are held accountable. The international commission called upon the occupying Israeli authorities to conduct a thorough, transparent, objective and credible investigation and review of the policies governing military and law enforcement operations, with a view to ensuring compliance with international humanitarian and human rights laws. However, the occupying Power refused to deal with the international commission and did not allow it to enter the State of Palestine.

158. In addition, the international commission called upon the Government of the State of Palestine and the de facto authorities in the Gaza Strip to carry out genuine investigations into violations of international humanitarian and human rights laws and to ensure meaningful accountability for the perpetrators. It also called upon them to ensure that human rights are protected, and victims are given redress; take measures to prevent extrajudicial executions, eliminate torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment; and cooperate with national investigations aimed at bringing to justice those responsible for violations of international law.

159. The international commission, in the course of its dealings with Palestinian agencies, including requests for information and the taking of testimony and recording of statements, noted that the working methods of some official Palestinian institutions had improved and that they were showing greater respect for human rights. That was particularly true with regard to the Palestinian police, thanks to the advancements made by its departments, its adherence to the rules and procedures set out in local and international law, and its compliance with the instructions of the Palestinian leadership to respect human rights. In addition to existing coordination arrangements with other security agencies aimed at maintaining public security, the accession of the State of Palestine to the relevant international conventions has helped to consolidate and promote human rights concepts in the State of Palestine.

160. In that connection, the Independent National Commission of Inquiry submitted its report, in which it states that Israel, the occupying Power, had committed war crimes and crimes against humanity, including torture, and had pursued a policy of systematic and widespread collective punishment against Palestinians.

Arbitrary detention is a form of inhuman treatment

161. Under the penal laws of the State of Palestine, in particular article 346 of the Criminal Code (1960), which is in force in the West Bank, and article 262 of the Criminal Code (1936), which is in force in the Gaza Strip, depriving any person of his liberty without justification and unlawfully is an offence that is punishable by a term of not more than one year imprisonment or a fine. The penalty is increased if the offender falsely claims that that he holds an official position or is in possession of a legal warrant for the arrest of the victim, or if the offence is committed against an official who is performing his duties or as a result of what he has done in the performance of duties.

Arbitrary administrative detention of Palestinians in Israeli occupation prisons, a form of inhuman and degrading treatment

162. The occupying Israeli forces continue to issue arbitrary administrative detention orders against Palestinians, without charge or trial, relying on so-called secret files and secret evidence that the detainee or his lawyer are not allowed to examine. An administrative detention order can be renewed an unlimited number of times. It is a form of punishment and a political measure that reflects the official government policy of the occupying Power of using administrative detention as collective punishment against Palestinians.

163. According to the data, since 1967, the occupying Israeli forces have arrested more than 50,000 Palestinians under administrative detention orders, without charge and without trial. In 2018, more than 482 Palestinian detainees continued to be arbitrarily detained in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers pursuant to administrative detention orders.

164. Palestinians living in the occupied city of Jerusalem and Palestinians who are within the 1948 territories are arbitrarily arrested pursuant to the provisions of the Emergency Powers (Detention) Act of 1979, which is part of Israeli legislation. The Act empowers the Minister of “Defence” to order administratively that a person be detained for a period not exceeding six months, without limitation on the number of times that the validity of the order may be extended.

165. The Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Act is applied to Palestinians from the Gaza Strip, who can be arrested and held without trial. Under that Act, an unlawful combatant is defined as any person who participates in operations against Israel, the occupying Power, even indirectly, or any person who belongs to a force that is fighting against Israel, the occupying Power.

166. Most detainees are held in the Ofer, Negev and Megiddo camps, and female Palestinian prisoners who have been placed in administrative detention arbitrarily are held in Hasharon prison. A person who has been placed in administrative detention can be brought before a judge within eight days from the date on which the administrative detention order was issued, whereas that period is 48 hours under Israeli law. This period is established at the discretion of the occupying Power and the so-called military commander, who is authorized to make adjustments whenever necessary. Accordingly, in April 2002, the period was extended to 18 days. It used to be the case that a six-month order had to be legally reviewed by a military judge twice during that period, and there was a right to lodge an appeal against every decision handed down by a judge. However, since April 2002, that procedure is no longer in effect. An order is now reviewed only once, but the right to appeal against the decision was maintained.

167. In most administrative detention cases, the representative of the occupying Power, who is called the “Israeli military commander”, relies on classified material, which is the principal form of evidence used against detainees. The Israeli authorities claim that such evidence cannot be disclosed in order to safeguard the sources of the information or because its disclosure might reveal the manner in which it was obtained. In several cases, the Israeli Supreme Court has ruled that it is possible not to disclose such evidence and allowed the authorities to disregard the suspect's right to fair trial. That position violates the right of the person who has been placed in administrative detention to know the reason for his arrest and his right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily. Administrative detention review hearings are classified as non-public hearings, that is to say closed sessions that the public or family members are not allowed to attend. Only the lawyer, the detainee, the judge, the military prosecutor of the occupiers and, occasionally, the representatives of the occupiers' intelligence services are present at those hearings, thereby depriving the detainee of his right to a public trial.

Redress and compensation

168. Palestinian law guarantees the right to justice for victims of torture, inhuman or degrading treatment, and their right to claim appropriate compensation. If the torture leads to the death, the victim's heirs and those who inherit his rights are also entitled to claim compensation. Article 32 of the Palestinian Basic Law is one of the primary pieces of legislation that guarantees this right.²¹

169. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure, the victim of any crime or infringement may bring a civil action in order to obtain fair compensation for the harm suffered as a result thereof. Pursuant to articles 3 to 7 of the Code, the Public Prosecutor must initiate a criminal action if the victim brings a civil action in accordance with the rules set out in the law. Cases that have been suspended by law owing to the filing of a complaint or the initiation of civil action by the victim may be deferred until a final judgement has been handed down. If there are multiple victims, it is sufficient for one of them to file the complaint; if there are multiple accused and the complaint is filed against one of them, it is considered as having been filed against the rest.

170. Articles 194-204 of the Code of Criminal Procedure set out the procedures that must be followed in a civil action that is brought by the victim of a crime in order to obtain compensation. The victim's right to compensation is established in article 194 (1).²²

171. The law guarantees the right of detainees who have been found innocent to be compensated. That is one of the most important additions to the Palestinian Criminal Code; a person who is found innocent after retrial has the right to claim compensation from the State, as provided in article 387 of the Code.²³

172. Article 94 of the Palestinian Security Forces Service Act provides that an officer who violates orders shall bear civil liability therefor. Such violations may include committing the crimes of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment. Article 173 of that Act addresses offences committed by non-commissioned officers and members of the security services.²⁴

²¹ Article 32 provides that any violation of personal freedoms, the sanctity of human life or any other public rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Basic Law or the laws in force constitutes an offence that is not subject to any statute of limitations with respect to civil or criminal proceedings, and that the National Authority shall provide fair compensation to anyone who suffers harm as a result thereof.

²³ Article 387 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides as follows: 1. A person who has been acquitted after retrial is entitled to claim compensation from the State for the harm suffered as a result of the earlier judgement. 2. If the convicted person is deceased, the request for compensation can be made by the spouse and the lineal ascendants and descendants. 3. The State may retract compensation from civil rights plaintiffs, informants or those who bore false witness that led to the handing down of a sentence.

173. It should be noted that the Civil Wrongs Ordinance (1944), which is in force in Palestine, provides that anyone who has suffered any injury or damage by reason of any civil wrong committed in Palestine shall be entitled to receive compensation from the perpetrator of the offence. Under that Ordinance, damage is defined as loss of life, or loss of, or detriment to, any property, comfort, bodily welfare, reputation or other similar loss or detriment. Fault is defined as any act of any person, or failure by any person to do an act, or failure by any person to use proper skill or to take proper care:

(a) being an act or failure which, if damage is caused thereby, constitutes the civil wrong mentioned in section 50 or 55A, or any other civil wrong for which provision is made in this Ordinance; or

(b) being an act or failure referred to in paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (1) of section 50, which is the cause, or one of the causes, of damage to himself.

174. The Ordinance also addresses damages to persons as a result of negligence, which is defined as consisting of: 1. Doing some act which in the circumstances a reasonable prudent person would not do, or failing to do some act which in the circumstances such a person would do, or 2. Failing to use such skill or to take such care in the exercise of a profession, trade or occupation as a reasonable prudent person qualified to exercise such profession, trade or occupation would in the circumstances use or take.

175. Breach of statutory duty is defined as the failure by any person to perform a duty imposed on him by any law other than this Ordinance, being a law which, on proper construction thereof, was intended to be for the benefit or protection of any other person, whereby such other person suffers damage of a kind or nature contemplated by such law.

176. Under article 925 of the Ottoman Civil Code (Mecelle), which is in effect in Palestine, compensation may be demanded for damage wrongfully caused to a person.²⁵

177. In 2015, the first lawsuit was filed in Palestinian courts in the West Bank seeking compensation for a citizen who claims to have been tortured. No verdict had been handed down in the case as of the date on which this report was prepared.

Accession to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court

178. On 1 January 2015, the State of Palestine, acting pursuant to article 12, paragraph 3 of the Rome Statute establishing the International Criminal Court, deposited a declaration that granted retroactively to the Court the power to consider the crimes that have been committed by the Israeli occupying authorities since 13 June 2014. The State of Palestine then deposited its instrument of accession to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, and it entered into effect on 1 April 2015.

179. On 16 January 2015, the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court opened a preliminary examination into the situation in the State of Palestine in order to determine the extent to which the criteria for an investigation established by the Rome Statute are applicable to the situation in the State of Palestine.

180. The accession of the State of Palestine to the Rome Statute underscores that it agrees with the international community's view that torture in certain circumstances and cases can be considered a war crime and a crime against humanity. Committing torture is a serious crime and the perpetrators thereof must be held accountable.

proceedings, where necessary. An officer who was following orders shall not be exempt from punishment. 2. An officer who was following the orders of his commander or supervisor shall not be exempted from punishment unless it is established that the offence was committed as a result of executing an order given to him by this commander or supervisor, despite the fact that the latter had been informed that the order would result in a violation. In such cases, the responsibility rests solely with the person who gave the order. 3. The officer bears civil responsibility only for his own mistakes.

²⁵ Article 925 of the Ottoman Civil Code provides that the liability of a person who is the cause of an act, as referred to above, to make good any loss sustained thereby depends upon such act being of a wrongful nature. Any act by any person that causes harm to others must be compensated.

Violations committed by Israel, the occupying Power, of the Convention against Torture during the Israeli aggression against the occupied Gaza Strip in 2014

181. The consequences of the 2014 Israeli aggression against the occupied Gaza Strip were devastating at various levels, whether economic, social, political, material or human. During that aggression, Israel, the occupying Power, committed various war crimes: it killed civilians, destroyed civilian property and used prohibited weapons, including white phosphorus, indiscriminately burning, maiming and permanently disabling hundreds of Palestinian civilians in the Gaza Strip. The Israeli aggression and the subsequent collective denial of Palestinian human rights in the Gaza Strip have created harsh living conditions characterized by extensive pain and suffering. Living in the Gaza Strip, which has been subjected to an illegal blockade by Israel since 2007, has become a form of physical and psychological torture. Following are some of the most notable direct or indirect violations of the Convention against Torture that Israel has committed:

- 1,410 Palestinians, including 355 children, 240 women, 134 civilian police and 1,032 other civilians were killed, 18 of whom were assassinated, and 5,380 persons were injured, including 1,872 children and 800 women.
- A total of 11,122 homes were destroyed in the war, of which 2,627 were totally destroyed and 8,495 were partially destroyed, displacing their inhabitants and dispersing them among their relatives or friends, or forcing them to take refuge in schools or set up tents on the ruins their homes.
- A total of 581 public institutions were destroyed, of which 149 were totally destroyed and 432 partially destroyed; the facilities of 31 non-governmental organizations, 53 United Nations institutions and 60 health-care institutions, including 15 hospitals, were struck by shells and 29 ambulances were destroyed.
- Half of all water networks and 55 per cent of electricity grids were destroyed.
- A total of 3,900 manufacturing establishments ceased operations, more than 40,000 persons in the agricultural sector lost their jobs and 90,000 persons in various other sectors lost their jobs, pushing the poverty rate in the Gaza Strip to 79 per cent. According to United Nations statistics, 88 per cent of the total population of the Gaza Strip have applied for food aid.
- A total of 396,599 fruit-bearing trees and 51,699 non-fruit-bearing trees were uprooted and 999,785 dunums of vegetables were destroyed.
- A total of 695 commercial establishments were destroyed, of which 165 were totally destroyed and 528 partially destroyed.
- A total of 650 vehicles were destroyed, of which 334 were totally destroyed and 316 partially destroyed.

Violations of the Convention committed by Israel, the occupying Power, in response to protests in the Occupied Palestinian Territory

182. At the end of March 2018, Palestinians in the Gaza Strip began protesting peacefully near the border fence against the blockade that has been imposed on Gaza for years. The United Nations commission of inquiry on the 2018 protests in the Occupied Palestinian Territory confirmed in its report that the occupying Israeli forces had committed murder and deliberately caused severe suffering, which is a form of torture that is banned under the Convention. In addition, the commission reported that the occupying Israeli forces had killed civilians who had not been directly involved in protests and that Israeli forces had engaged in other inhuman practices that could be characterized as crimes against humanity and war crimes, because 189 civilians were injured as a result of their actions. Moreover, 6,103 Palestinians had been struck by live rounds and 23,313 others injured by the end of 2018, with Israel having deliberately targeted protected groups, including children, persons with disabilities, journalists and medical personnel.

Inadmissibility of statements obtained through torture

183. Palestinian law prohibits the use of statements obtained by force or coercion as proof of crimes. Article 13 of the Palestinian Basic Law provides that confessions obtained through torture or coercion are invalid. That prohibition is reaffirmed by article 214 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides that in order for a confession to be valid, it must be: 1. Made freely and voluntarily, and without material or moral pressure, or promises; 2. Consistent with the circumstances of the incident; 3. Constitute clear and unequivocal admission of having committed the crime. Accordingly, convictions based on such confessions are considered invalid under article 477 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides that actions arising from a wrongful action are invalid.

Conviction of Palestinians by the courts of the Israeli occupiers on the basis of statements and confessions obtained through torture

184. Israeli investigators who interrogate Palestinian detainees torture them and treat them inhumanly, in order to weaken them and pressure them psychologically. Detainees are prevented from seeing a lawyer for up to 60 days or having contact with their families and informing them that they have been arrested or transferred from one investigation centre to another. In addition, they are placed in cells with asafir (birds), misled, threatened with death and deprived of sleep. Palestinian detainees are then forced, under psychological pressure, to sign a statement in Hebrew that they do not understand, despite the fact that they have a right to obtain a translation of the statement and be informed of the charges against them. Such statements are used against them later, when they appear before the military judge, in order to ensure that they are convicted.²⁶

Article 16

Cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

16.1 Prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

185. Beating, wounding, committing any act of violence against or assaulting inmates or detainees while they are in a detention or correction and rehabilitation centre is considered to be an inhuman and degrading act. Under articles 333 and 334 of the Jordanian Criminal Code, should such an act cause a person to become ill or unable to work for a period of more than 20 days, the perpetrator shall be sentenced to a term of three months to three years in prison, and if the aforementioned period is less than 20 days, the punishment shall be internment for a term of one year. Under article 335 of the Code, if the act results in the injury or removal of an organ, the amputation or loss of use of a limb, the loss of one of the senses, or a serious deformity or any other disfigurement, the perpetrator shall be sentenced to a term of hard labour that is not to exceed 10 years.

186. Under article 5 of the Criminal Code, 1936, grievous harm is defined as any harm which amounts to dangerous harm, or seriously or permanently injures health or comfort, or which is likely so to injure health or comfort, or which extends to permanent disfigurement or to any permanent or serious injury to any external or internal organ, membrane or sense. Moreover, harm is defined as any bodily hurt, disease or disorder, whether permanent or temporary. Under article 238 of that Code, any person who unlawfully does grievous harm to another is guilty of a felony and is liable to imprisonment for seven years, while article

²⁶ Asafir is the term used by Palestinian detainees for agents in the prisons of the occupiers. The term is derived from the manner in which those agents surrender themselves to the prison administration. They wait for prison administrators to conduct a head count or search detainees, whereupon they seize the opportunity to flee to the prison office, like a bird flying away from its nest. When someone surrenders himself to the prison administration, it is said that he is a bird.

Israeli intelligence puts these birds in prison cells and wings, in order to obtain information about the detainees. Those agents extract confessions from the detainees in several ways, including but not limited to provocation, enticement, pressure, threat, tricks and deception.

250 provides that any person who commits an assault occasioning actual bodily harm is guilty of a misdemeanour.

187. Inmates and detainees may experience various forms of abuse, including verbal violence, such as the use of defamatory and degrading language. Under the laws in force, such conduct is punishable. For example, pursuant to article 358 of the Jordanian Criminal Code, defamation is a crime that is punishable by a term of imprisonment ranging from 2 months to 1 year, while denigration, whether in words or deeds, verbal insults or use of lewd language is punishable by a term of imprisonment that is not to exceed one month. On the other hand, the British Mandate-era Criminal Code provides that the offence of defamation is punishable by imprisonment for one year, while article 37 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act (1998) prohibits using lewd or degrading language with inmates.

188. Article 343 of the Jordanian Criminal Code provides that any person who causes the death of another person as a result of negligence, lack of care or failure to observe laws and regulations shall be punished by a term of imprisonment ranging from six months to three years. On the other hand, article 218 of the British Mandate-era Criminal Code provides that any person who unintentionally causes the death of another person is liable to imprisonment for two years.

189. Inmates or detainees may be threatened while they are in correctional and rehabilitation centres. That is an inhuman and degrading practice, and the criminal codes in effect consider such acts to be punishable crimes. The threat can take the form of doing unjustified harm, whether in words or by one of the means set out in the law, with a view to having a profound effect on the victim.

The arbitrary refusal of the occupying Israeli authorities to hand over the bodies of Palestinian martyrs as a form of harsh collective punishment

190. In March 2016, the Government of the Israeli occupiers announced that it was prohibiting the handover and return of the bodies of Palestinian martyrs to their families amid Israeli demands that their bodies should be interred in numbered cemeteries.²⁷ Although the occupying authorities are negotiating with the families or the lawyers of the victims and with representatives of the State of Palestine, they are setting illegal and unacceptable conditions for the handover of bodies, including the requirement that a forensic autopsy must not be carried out. They are even preventing medical teams and representatives of the Office of the Public Prosecutor from examining a body while it is in the hospital.

191. The occupying authorities' decision not to hand over the bodies of the deceased is an international crime that is punishable by international law. The decision to retain the bodies of the deceased clearly contravenes article 130 of the Fourth Geneva Convention and article 34 of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions, which imposes a legal obligation on the occupying authorities to bury persons who have died for reasons related to occupation or in detention in a manner that accords with the deceased's religious practices. The occupying authorities are also obliged, as soon as circumstances permit, to provide accurate data and information about the deceased, protect and maintain their graves, facilitate access to their gravesites by relatives and regulate the practical arrangements for such access, and facilitate the return of the remains of the deceased and of personal effects to the next of kin.

192. The Israeli policy of systematically retaining the bodies of martyrs is part of the policy of collective punishment that is practised by the occupying authorities against the Palestinian people. The most serious consequence of that policy is the impossibility of conducting a forensic autopsy, thus helping to conceal, in part, evidence of extrajudicial killings.

²⁷ Numbered cemeteries are a code name for the large number of secret cemeteries in which Israel, the occupying Power, has been burying the bodies of victims and prisoners. Numbered cemeteries, which have been around for some time, currently hold the bodies of a large number of Palestinian prisoners who died in Israeli prisons.

193. The Israeli occupiers continue to belittle the dignity of martyrs by inhumanly retaining their bodies for long periods of time. The inhuman manner in which the bodies of the victims had been handled and stored became apparent when they were handed over to the Palestinian Ministry of Health. The bodies had been frozen and stored at a temperature of -60° C, and there were more than 10 bullets in each body.

194. The occupying Israeli authorities are still holding the bodies of more than 20 Palestinian martyrs who were killed in 2018 alone, bringing to 294 the total number of bodies that have been detained since the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories began. They refuse to surrender the bodies of the deceased to their relatives for burial in accordance with religious practices and in a dignified manner. Such conduct constitutes torture and inhuman and degrading treatment that belittles the dignity of the martyrs and their relatives, and it is another form of collective punishment.

The Israeli occupiers' policy of demolishing the homes of Palestinian civilians as a form of harsh collective punishment

195. Israel, which has been the occupying Power since 1967, has pursued a policy of demolishing the homes of Palestinians in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, as a means of collectively punishing the Palestinian population. The aim of that policy is to harm the relatives of Palestinians accused of carrying out martyrdom operations against occupying Israeli forces, or the families of Palestinian prisoners, in order to deter Palestinians from carrying out such operations.

196. Since 2009, the Government of the Israeli occupiers has stepped up its policy of demolishing homes and buildings as a means of collectively punishing the Palestinian families of the accused. These demolitions are part and parcel of its policy of forcibly displacing the population and increasing its occupation of Palestinian land. As at March 2019, Israel had demolished 5,884 Palestinian buildings and structures, displacing 9,210 Palestinians and affecting the lives of 71,672 Palestinians.

Solitary confinement of Palestinian prisoners in the jails of the occupying Israeli authorities

197. Solitary confinement is one of the cruellest forms of punishment that the occupying Israeli authorities use in respect of Palestinian detainees, who are placed in solitary confinement for extended periods in cells that fail to meet the minimum standards and requirements of dignified human existence. Cells are usually dark, cramped and filthy, their walls constantly moist and covered with mould and they are equipped with old squat toilets out of which rats and rodents emerge. All of this causes serious health and psychological problems for Palestinian detainees.

198. The policy of placing prisoners in solitary confinement has become a systematic practice that is authorized by the so-called legislative authority of Israel, the occupying Power, and implemented by its executive authority, which sets out procedures and rules specifically for that purpose. The policy of placing Palestinian prisoners in solitary confinement has been in effect for as long as Palestinians have been held in Israeli prisons. Dozens of Palestinian detainees have been placed in solitary confinement for extended periods of time, and the application of this policy has increased over time. The purpose of prolonged solitary confinement is to humiliate and physically and psychologically destroy Palestinian detainees.

199. On 20 July 2015, Israel, the occupying Power, adopted the "force feeding" act, under which prisoners on hunger strike can be force-fed. The act gives the courts the power to authorize the force-feeding of a prisoner, in order to break his will. This act gives the occupiers a pretext for torturing prisoners who are on hunger strike. By violating their right and freedom to control their own bodies, they deprive them of the last means of legitimate, peaceful protest available to them. Moreover, the act allows the Israeli occupying authorities not to bring the detainee before a judge for a period of 96 hours, while preventing him from seeing his lawyer or a family member. It also allows the courts to extend the detention period in the absence of the detainee and exempts the occupying security forces from the requirement to make an audio-visual record of the interrogation of detainees, thus giving the occupiers the ability to interrogate them by using torture and inhuman and cruel treatment and to pressure them into making false and invalid confessions.

16.2 Measures taken by the State of Palestine to reduce the incidence of inhuman and degrading treatment

200. Earlier in this report, in our comments on the implementation of articles 10, 11, 12 and 13 of the Convention, we stated that the laws in effect in the State of Palestine criminalize and prohibit any act of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. To that end, we drew attention to the relevant articles of the Jordanian Criminal Code (1960), the British Mandate-era Criminal Code (1936) and the Military Criminal Code (1979). In addition to the above, the State of Palestine has taken many other measures to prevent the criminal acts mentioned in article 16 (2) by adopting codes of conduct for law enforcement personnel, including the following:

- Civilian Police Act and its amendments;
- Security Forces Judicial System Act;
- Bill on supply and logistics (third reading in the Cabinet);
- Code of conduct for judges;
- Code of conduct for staff of the Office of the Public Prosecutor;
- Code of conduct and ethics for members of the police;
- Code of conduct for members of the Civil Defence;
- Code of conduct for members of the Preventive Security Service;
- Code of conduct and ethics for employees of General Intelligence (updated);
- Code of conduct for civil servants;

16.3 Living conditions in police stations and correctional and rehabilitation centres

201. The laws in effect set out measures to ensure that individuals and inmates who are detained in police stations and correctional centres are provided with appropriate living conditions. Those measures are as follows.

Services available to inmates at correctional and rehabilitation centres in the West Bank

202. Health services: Pursuant to articles 13-15 and 27-29 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act, the Correctional Centres Department, in cooperation with military medical services, provides inmates with health-care services and, in cooperation with the Ministry of Social Development and civil society organizations, gives them access to psychologists and social workers. The aim is to assess the social and psychological situation of inmates and provide them with social and psychological support. A doctor must inspect the areas in which inmates sleep or are held in solitary confinement, and he must evaluate the inmates' health, treat the sick, transfer those whose condition requires to a clinic or a specialized hospital, isolate those suspected of having an infectious disease until they recover and have their clothing, bedding and food disinfected.

203. Rehabilitation services: Palestinian correctional and rehabilitation centres, in cooperation with civil society organizations, run educational, vocational and rehabilitation programmes for inmates, so that they can improve themselves and reintegrate into society. Such programmes including mosaic-making, tailoring and shoemaking.

204. Sports services and programmes: Correctional and rehabilitation centres offer sports programmes and equipment for inmates, so that they can take part in recreational activities and maintain their health.

205. Legal aid programme: The Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Department, with the support of UN-Women, and as part of a project entitled “Security and justice for the Palestinian people”, which is aimed at promoting the rule of law in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, has organized a number of activities that are aimed at preserving the rights of women inmates in correctional and rehabilitation centres. Those activities include providing women inmates with psychological support, offering training workshops on how to generate income, hiring lawyers to provide legal support to women inmates who do not have a lawyer, providing counselling to impoverished women and meeting the personal needs of women inmates.

206. Food services: Correctional and rehabilitation centres provide nutritionally diverse meals, so that inmates can maintain their health, and they offer a special food programme for pregnant inmates.

207. Under the law, an inmate is guaranteed the right to bathe at least twice a week in summer and at least once a week in winter; wash his face and limbs twice a day, once in the morning and once in the evening; wash his clothes at least once a week; cut his hair once a month; and shave his beard at least twice a week. The management of correctional and rehabilitation centres must provide inmates with lighting, heating on cold days and deliver meals to them in the designated location in their quarters and at the scheduled time.

Challenges related to delivery of health-care services in correctional and rehabilitation centres

208. Despite the improvements that correctional and rehabilitation centres have made in relation to health care, some correctional centres still lag behind. Some centres do not have medical clinics or full-time doctors and nurses, and most centres do not have a dentist or a psychologist. This forces the management of those centres to transfer sick inmates to government hospitals or military medical services facilities.

209. Most correctional and rehabilitation centres in the State of Palestine were destroyed by the occupying Israeli forces after the outbreak of the Aqsa intifada in 2000. This has had a significant impact on their performance and limited their ability to fulfil their basic purpose. This led the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Department to seek alternative solutions to the problem, including repairing some of the centres, such as the ones in Janin, Nablus and Zahiriyah.

Living and health conditions of prisoners in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers

210. Israel Prison Service forces continue to deny Palestinian prisoners and detainees their fundamental rights. Hundreds of Palestinians prisoners and detainees are still unable have family visits, while dozens remain in solitary confinement cells on the grounds that they violated prison regulations or for security reasons. Those forces also continue to deny detainees the right to education, in an ongoing effort to avoid honouring their obligations under the agreement of 14 March 2012. Under that agreement, prisoners were to be removed from isolation wings, the living conditions of all prisoners were to be improved, and prisoners and detainees were to be allowed to receive regular visits from their relatives. Moreover, verbal commitments were made to curtail the arbitrary application of the administrative detention policy.

211. From 1967 to 7 February 2019, a total of 218 Palestinian prisoners died in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers. Of that number, 75 were murdered, 7 were shot inside prisons, 63 died as a result of deliberate medical negligence, a form of torture and maltreatment that is practised systematically and broadly by Israel against Palestinian prisoners, and 73 died under direct torture.

Ill prisoners

212. There are more than 1,800 ill prisoners, or nearly a quarter of all inmates, in the occupiers' prisons. Among them are 26 prisoners suffering from cancer, 80 who have various disabilities (physical, psychological and sensory) and others suffering from chronic and serious diseases. They live in deplorable conditions because of deliberate neglect, cruel torture, abuse of patients, lack of assistive devices, disregard for pain and indifference to suffering and needs, all of which exacerbates their condition and gives rise to the possibility of developing permanent disabilities as a result of the circumstances that they must endure. They need continuous health care, yet they do not receive any treatment or the minimum level of health care. The prisoners suffering from the most serious and incurable diseases reside in the Ramla Prison Clinic, which always lacks the capacity to provide the minimum level of health care.

213. In addition to the suffering that they endure as a result of the policy of deliberate medical negligence, some prisoners were arrested after they had been wounded by bullets fired by the occupying authorities in the course of their broad-scale and intensive detention campaigns, while other prisoners were abducted from ambulances and hospitals.

Conclusion

214. The State of Palestine is a peace-loving country that believes in justice, democracy and human rights and abides by the Charter of the United Nations and the international conventions to which it has acceded. In keeping with the efforts of the State of Palestine to establish human rights in the country, the Convention against Torture was the first of the human rights instruments to which it became a party, having acceded thereto in 2014. It then proceeded to accede to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

215. The State of Palestine has adopted a national policy agenda for the period 2017–2022 that incorporates its undertakings pursuant to the human rights instruments to which it has acceded. That decision reaffirms the determination of the State of Palestine to fulfil to the utmost its responsibilities towards its citizens and to guarantee their fundamental freedoms, safeguard their human rights and ensure that they enjoy justice and equality, and to protect marginalized groups and provide them with opportunities. The State of Palestine has implemented various reforms, which are detailed in this report, since it acceded to the Convention. Those reforms, which include legal measures, such as the adoption of new laws and the amendment of existing ones, and administrative measures, such as the issuance of various instructions, orders and regulations, are an embodiment of the national political agenda and vision of the State of Palestine, of which respecting human rights, in particular those that are set out in the Convention, is of paramount importance.

216. On 29 December 2017, the State of Palestine acceded to the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture, thereby reaffirming that it is making progress in its efforts to combat torture. Moreover, its unstinting and ongoing efforts, in collaboration with national partners from civil society institutions that focus on human rights, the Independent Human Rights Commission and international partners, including the Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture, demonstrate that it is continuing to make progress towards fulfilling its commitments under the Convention.

Committee against Torture

Sixth periodic report submitted by Israel under article 19 of the Convention pursuant to the simplified reporting procedure, due in 2020* ****

[Date received: 30 December 2020]

* The present document is being issued without formal editing.

 The annex to the present report may be accessed from the web page of the Committee.

Introduction

1. Upon submission of its Sixth Periodic Report to the Committee against Torture (CAT), the State of Israel wishes to make the following clarification.
2. The COVID-19 pandemic has struck the State of Israel on March 2020. In order to mitigate the damages caused and threats posed by the pandemic, the Government has adopted several temporary orders and regulations for time of emergency. While addressing some of these orders and regulations throughout this report, given their temporary nature, the State of Israel will hereby focus on the legal situation applicable regardless of the pandemic.

Medical Care

3. For general information on medical treatment of detainees, please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to CAT (Question No. 6).
4. A prisoner would be allowed the option of getting a second medical opinion from a private medical practitioner, if the practitioner is a specialist in the relevant area of medicine, after he/she received a medical opinion from an Israeli Prison Service (IPS) physician, in accordance with IPS Commission standing order No. 04.46.00 – Private Medical Practitioner Visits in Prisons for Second Medical Opinion. The same applies to psychiatrists. The order refers to the entrance of physicians into IPS facilities in order to receive a second medical opinion, and not visits of specialists in order to corroborate or refute claims of torture or abuse. For further data, please see Question No. 34 below.
5. Additionally, all claims of violence inside IPS facilities reach the highest ranks and mandate a medical examination of the complainant, all in accordance with IPS Commission standing order No. 02.04.00 – Rules on Reasonable Use of Force in the Line of Duty, which includes rules on handling and documenting the injury. The IPS medical staff must thoroughly document the physical state of the prisoner following a claim of reasonable use of force towards a prisoner, regardless of whether or not a complaint was submitted. Criminal issues are examined by the Unit for Investigation of Wardens (UIW), an independent Police unit.

Solitary Confinement

6. Incommunicado detention is not practiced in Israel.
7. For general information on solitary confinement, please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to CAT (Question No. 10).
8. Separation is not a punitive measure but rather a preventive procedure regulated by the Prisons Ordinance (New Version) 5731-1971 (the "Prisons Ordinance") and by IPS Commission standing order No. 04.03.00, which is intended to prevent a prisoner, including prisoners with mental disabilities, from harming themselves or harming other prisoners or the prison's staff, among other reasons. Separation may also be used due to state or prison security. A prisoner held in separation may be held alone or together with another prisoner (group separation), according to the reasons for separation as well as the prisoner's characteristics. The conditions provided in separation include: medical care, meetings with an attorney, an hour in the prison yard, meetings with a social worker and visits. The living conditions in the separation ward include a television, telephone, books and newspapers. This preventive measure of separation is subject to re-examination procedures, judicial review and appeal. It is used only when there is no other way to accomplish the aims of a separation. The authority to hold a prisoner in separation is constantly monitored and requires timely reevaluation in order to minimize the separation time.

Solitary Confinement with Regard to Israel Security Agency (ISA) interrogations

9. Solitary confinement is not used as an interrogation method nor as a punitive measure by the ISA. However, naturally, during interrogations there might be a need to separate between several detainees for the purpose of the investigation.

10. The detainees have continuous and frequent contact with the IPS personnel, as well as the medical personnel. They also meet with representatives of the ICRC and relevant diplomatic representatives and are arraigned to extend their arrest, where they are represented by their attorneys, all in accordance with the law.

11. Meeting with a lawyer during this period of time may be suspended for up to twenty-one (21) days regarding interogatees held in accordance with Section 35 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law 5756-1996 (the "Criminal Procedure (Arrests) Law"), due to the risk of potential harm of the suspect to the arrest of other suspects, to the revealing of an evidence or to its capture, to the prevention of crime or for the protection of life. Postponing the meeting with a lawyer for more than ten (10) days and up until the maximum period of twenty-one (21) days requires an approval by the court.

12. When an ISA interogatee is under investigation, his/her family or their lawyer are informed of their arrest and location.

Solitary Confinement and Separation of Minors

13. Holding a minor in solitary confinement is done only in extreme cases. When considering holding a minor in separation, such decision is reviewed prior to the beginning of the separation itself by four (4) professionals of the incarceration facility, including a social worker when it is a single separation. The use of such separation is only permitted when based on professional considerations and according to the child's best interest.

Reply to paragraph 2 of the list of issues

14. The inter-governmental team's work on the Draft bill on Torture is ongoing.

Reply to paragraph 3 of the list of issues

15. According to the Israeli legal system, international conventions (as opposed to customary international law), only become part of the domestic law if they are formally legislated by the Knesset (the Israeli Parliament). This is the case with the CAT, which is fully implemented through a wide range of legal instruments, including the country's Basic Laws, laws, orders, regulations, municipal bylaws, and Court rulings.

16. The applicability of the human rights conventions to the West Bank has been the subject of considerable debate in recent years. In its Periodic Reports, Israel did not refer to the implementation of the Convention in these areas for several reasons, ranging from legal considerations to the practical reality.

17. Israel's position on the inapplicability of CAT beyond its territory has been presented at length to the Committee on previous occasions and remains unchanged.

Reply to paragraph 4 of the list of issues

The "Necessity" Defense

18. The "necessity" defense, as stipulated in Section 34(11) of the Penal Law 5737-1977 (the "Penal Law"), is one of the defense claims for a defendant in the criminal proceedings in Israel. In H.C.J 5100/94 The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel et. al. v. The State of Israel et. al. (6.9.99), the High Court of Justice (HCJ) held that this defense could apply to a defendant accused of using unlawful physical pressure during interrogation.

19. The number of ISA interrogations with respect to which the “necessity” defense was raised is scant and represents a minute percentage of all ISA interrogations of persons that were suspects of terrorist activity.

20. According to the Israel Security Agency Law 5762-2002, the ISA internal rules and procedures as well as methods of interrogations are confidential.

21. A petition for disclosure of similar details was submitted to the Jerusalem District Court, in pursuance to the Freedom of Information Law 5758-1998, and rejected by the Court (Ad.P. 8844/08 The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. The Supervisor of the Freedom of Information Law within the Ministry of Justice (15.2.09)).

22. For further examples for relevant cases, please see our Reply to Question No. 30 below, concerning H.C.J. 5722/12 As’ad Abu-Gosh v. The Attorney General (12.12.2017) and H.C.J. 9018/17 Fares Tbeish et. Al. v. The Attorney General et. al. (26.11.18). For further elaboration, please see Israel Fifth Periodic Report to CAT (pp. 5-6).

Access to a lawyer

23. The right to counsel was recognized as a basic right in a 2006 Supreme Court decision, where the Court held that “[t]here is no dispute as to the high standing and central position of the right to legal counsel in Israel’s legal system.” (Cr.A. 5121/98 Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4.5.06)). The Court in this case adopted a relative exclusion doctrine, according to which the Court may rule on the inadmissibility of a confession due to the interrogator’s failure to notify a soldier of his right to legal counsel.

24. On August 2, 2018, the Supreme Court in the Cr.A. 2868/13 Haybavtov v. The State of Israel case acquitted the appellant of murder and other offenses due to the violation of his rights during the investigation, and in particular a severe violation of the right to counsel, which resulted in the appellant’s inadmissible confession. The Court therefore held that the confession should be excluded, and acquitted the appellant. The Supreme Court further held that in light of the importance of the right to counsel, investigators must verify that the suspect is aware of his/her right, and that in the event they choose to waive this right, it should be done in an informed and explicit manner. Therefore, the Court held that investigators are required to document the waiver of the right to consultation by a suspect using an audio-video recording.

25. The right of detainees to access to an attorney is further anchored in IPS Commission standing order No. 04.34.00 “Provision of Professional Services to Prisoners and Detainees by Attorneys”. The Provision deals, inter alia, with coordinating and arranging prisoners’ meetings with lawyers for the provision of professional service.

The right to consult with a public defender before questioning

26. The right to consult with a public defender before questioning has seen improvement in recent years. Israel has taken several important steps in the field, including: expanding the Public Defender’s Office (PDO) response to detainees for purposes of investigation to a 24/7 format, opening a dialogue with the Police on all levels, and using an available and detailed database gathered by the PDO. For statistics, please see Annex I.

27. For further information, see Israel’s Fifth Periodic Report to the ICCPR (p. 30).

The right of pretrial detainees to have access to a lawyer

28. Section 34 of the Criminal Procedure (Arrests) Law states that a detainee is entitled to meet and consult with a lawyer. Following a detainee’s request to meet with an attorney or the request of an attorney to meet a detainee, the person in charge of the investigation shall enable the meeting without delay, unless, such a meeting necessitates terminating or suspending an investigation or other measures regarding the investigation, or substantially places the investigation at risk. The officer in charge shall provide a written reasoned decision to postpone the meeting for the time needed to complete the investigation, provided this deferment does not exceed several hours.

29. The officer in charge can further delay this meeting if he/she issues a sufficiently reasoned decision to the effect that such a meeting may thwart or obstruct the arrest of additional suspects in the same matter, prevent the disclosure of evidence, or the capture of an object regarding the same offence. Such additional delay shall not exceed 24 hours from the time of arrest. An additional 24-hour deferment (to a total of 48 hours) can be granted, if the officer in charge provides an elaborate written decision that he/she is convinced that such postponement is necessary for safeguarding human life, or thwarting a crime. However, such a detainee shall be given a reasonable opportunity to meet or consult with legal counsel prior to their arraignment before a court of law.

30. Section 11 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) (Terms of Detention) Regulations 5757 – 1997 (the “Criminal Procedure (Arrests) (Terms of Detention) Regulations”), stipulates that the date of a detainee’s meeting with an attorney shall be coordinated in advance, and that the commander of the detention facility shall enable the first meeting of a detainee with an attorney, at their request, even during extraordinary hours.

The right of convicted prisoners to have access to a lawyer

31. The Prisons Ordinance stipulates the conditions for a prisoner’s meeting with an attorney. According to Section 45, the meeting shall be held in private and in conditions allowing for the confidentiality of the matters discussed and documents exchanged, and in such a manner that enables supervision of the prisoner’s movements. Following the prisoner’s request to meet an attorney, or the request of an attorney to meet a prisoner, the director of the prison shall facilitate the meeting in the prison during regular hours and without delay.

32. Section 29(b) of the Prisons Ordinance authorizes the IPS Commissioner and the Prison Director to postpone or stop such a meeting for a set period of time if there is a substantial suspicion that meeting with a particular lawyer will enable the commission of an offence risking the security of a person, public security, state security or the prison security, or a prison offence substantially damaging the prison discipline and that brings about a severe disruption of the prison procedures and administration.

33. According to Section 45A(b) of the Prisons Ordinance, which relates to all prisoners, except for detainees who have yet to be indicted, the Prison Director may delay such a meeting according to reasons elaborated under the Law for no longer than 72 hours, and the IPS Commissioner may order an additional 24 hours’ delay. Another postponement can be approved with the agreement of the District Attorney for up to ten (10) days.

34. Decisions rendered according to section 45A may be appealed to a District Court. This decision will be given only after the prisoner and his/her attorney was given a right to present their arguments before the IPS. Note that according to this section the delay applies only to a specific attorney while the prisoner can meet with another attorney. The decision may be appealed to the Court.

35. A District Court may further extend the above time-periods to up to six (6) months, following an application of the representative of AG, based on one of the grounds specified above. The maximum delay shall not exceed one (1) year, but if it was delayed for more than six (6) months, the decision would be subject to a judicial review every three (3) months (Section 45A(7)). Such a decision can be appealed to the Supreme Court. A Supreme Court judge may further extend these periods based on one of the grounds specified under the law.

36. Medical Treatment of persons deprived of their liberty and the right to request and receive an examination by an independent physician of their choice: Please see our reply to Question No. 1 above.

37. The right of persons deprived of their liberty to be informed of their rights and of the charges against them and to notify a relative of their arrest.

38. According to Section 6(c) of the Police National Headquarters Order 14.01.34 on the clarification of the detainee’s rights, a police officer who has decided to arrest a person is personally obliged to clarify to the detainee, among others, of the reason for his/her arrest, i.e., the suspicions against him/her and the grounds for the arrest, in a language which the detainee understands. Furthermore, according to Section 6(d) of the said Order, information concerning the arrest and the whereabouts of a detainee will be provided without delay to a relative of the detainee's choice, except in such case where the detainee had requested to refrain from doing so.

39. For information on the improper use of handcuffs as a means of investigation, please see Annex I.

Arraignment before a judge and detention registers

40. The rights of the detainees to be brought before a judge immediately and regardless of the reason for their arrest is anchored in Criminal Procedure (Arrests) (Terms of Detention) Regulations. This is conducted according to a regulated work procedure between the IPS and the courts: the Procedure for Handling Summons to Court 06.01. Based on this procedure, the IPS, the Courts and the Police collaborate in order to summon detainees to the courts. This procedure regulates the work of the registration offices and the Court Summons Center, responsible for keeping updated detention registers.

41. For further information, please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to the CAT (Question No. 6).

Juvenile detainees

Representation of Minors in Criminal Proceedings by the PDO

42. Amendment No. 14 to the Youth Law (Trial, Punishment and Modes of Treatment) 5731-1971 (hereinafter: Youth Law (Trial)), which entered into force on July 30, 2009, amended The Public Defender's Office Law 5755-1995, entitling minors to legal representation in all stages of the criminal proceeding by the PDO.

43. Prior to a police investigation, the Police should notify the minor on his or her right to a legal counsel. In addition, a minor is entitled to be investigated with the presence of a parent or other family relative, and to consult with him/her during the investigation, unless in exceptions such as a risk posed to the process of investigation; security offences and more.

The right to ensure the availability of legal aid

Representing children in civil and administrative proceedings

44. The Legal Aid Administration (LAA) at the MoJ is the main provider of legal services for children in child protection proceedings in Israel. The National Child Representation Unit (NCRU) within the LAA is providing high-quality, child-friendly, and accessible legal aid service for children and youth, free of charge; and promotes their right to access to justice, particularly in child protection proceedings.

45. All child legal aid services are provided by the LAA free of charge. Children are represented from birth until they turn eighteen (18). For statistics, please see Annex I.

46. Since August 2018, (following Amendment No. 20 to the Legal Aid Law 5732-1972), the NCRU also provides legal aid and assistance to children and youth victims of severe sexual abuse, both throughout the criminal law proceedings against the perpetrator, as well as during any legal or administrative proceeding connected to the penal proceedings (such as protection orders, civil tort suits, etc.).

47. The NCRU has been designed and operates in accordance with leading human rights principles and criteria: accessibility, affordability, quality and non-discrimination, as designated by the relevant human rights instruments and guidelines.

48. For further information on the LAA, please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to CAT, para. 145.

49. For information on legal aid for family members of victims of homicide, please see Annex I.

The Number of Arrests

50. Police data indicate that during 2018 there was a decrease of about 11.3% in the number of arrests conducted compared to the previous year. Government Resolution (GR) No. 4346 (9.12.2018) established a public committee, headed by the former President of the Jerusalem Magistrate's Court, to examine the arrests of suspects for investigation purposes.

51. The PDO has been implementing a systematic plan of action for decreasing the number of arrests. This issue is addressed through individual tasks, such as: training the defense attorneys; distribution of unique professional guidelines to attorneys representing in arrest proceedings; monitoring of proactive proceedings filed in appropriate cases such as petitions, requests for leave of appeal, periodic reviews, requests for release at the initial detention stage by the officer in charge, and requests for compensation for false arrests.

52. Recent Police data indicate a general decrease in the number of arrests, and a significant reduction in the number of detainees held for 24 hours. These figures indicate an improvement in the rate of cases where the suspects are released at the police station.

53. The Probation Service Administration has been working to reduce the time needed to prepare their report, through adding new positions and cooperation with the PDO. Following these measures, the time period required to file detention reports was shortened to two (2) weeks.

Family Visits

54. For information on family visits, see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to the ICCPR (p. 29).

Reply to paragraph 6 of the list of issues

55. The following information pertains to administrative detainees held in Israeli territory, and is without prejudice to Israel's position on the applicability of CAT beyond its territory, as provided in our Reply to Question No. 3 above.

Administrative Detention

56. Administrative detention is an exceptional measure, applied only where there is clear, concrete and trustworthy evidence that an individual is engaged in acts that endanger the security of the state or human life. It is always used only as a preventative measure of last resort, where the security risk cannot be addressed by other legal means, such as criminal prosecution.

57. The legal basis for administrative detentions in Israel is the Emergency Authorities (Detention) Law 5739-1979. This instrument is designed primarily as a domestic security measure, which typically applies to individuals posing a severe threat to state security, and accords the Minister of Defense the authority to issue such warrants.

58. In addition, the respective local legislation in the West Bank grants all relevant security detainees the right to appeal the order to the Military Court of Appeals, for judicial review. Petitioners may be represented by counsel of their choice at every stage of these proceedings and have a right to examine the unclassified evidence against them. All individuals have the additional right to petition the HCJ for a repeal of the order. The judicial organs reviewing each and every order carefully examine whether the criteria outlined in case law and legislation are fully met.

59. Detainees are given an explanation of the grounds for the administrative order and have a right to examine the unclassified evidence against them.

60. An administrative detention order is limited to a period of six (6) months and its extension requires the reevaluation of the relevant intelligence and enables further judicial review and appeal.

61. Issuance of administrative detention orders against detainees who pose a danger to public security in the West Bank, in those cases outlined above, is recognized by international law and is in full conformity with Article 78 of the Fourth Geneva Convention 1949.

62. Between the end of 2016 and August 2018, the number of Palestinian administrative detainees has dropped by 37%.

63. As of August 19, 2020, there were one (1) Israeli national and five (5) Israeli residents held in administrative detention.

The Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law 5762-2002

64. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to CAT.

65. Over the past several years, there were no individuals detained under the Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law.

ISA Interrogations

66. Following issuance of the Turkel Report, reported in Israel's Fifth Periodic, the Government has steadily worked to implement the various recommendations. Notably, in January 2014, a professional inter-agency team of experts ("the Implementation Team"), was appointed. The Implementation Team thoroughly reviewed the Commission's recommendations and considered the most effective measures for their implementation. The Implementation Team submitted its report to the Prime Minister in September 2015. The Israeli Security Cabinet approved the Implementation Team's Report in July 2016. An inter-agency team continues to regularly monitor the completion of this process and reports to the Prime Minister every six (6) months.

67. In recommendation No. 15, the Turkel Commission recommended strengthening the thoroughness and effectiveness of the investigations of the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators Unit (hereinafter: the "Inspector") by requiring video recording of interrogations conducted by ISA, to be made according to rules that would be prescribed by the Attorney General (AG) in coordination with the Head of the ISA. The Implementation Team recommended the installation of cameras in all ISA interrogation rooms, that will broadcast regularly via closed circuit to a control room located in an ISA facility where interrogations are not conducted. The control room will be accessible and available to an external supervising entity on behalf of the MoJ at any time. The interrogators will have no indication of when the MoJ supervisor is watching them in the control room. The supervising entity must report immediately to the Inspector if he/she believes that illegal means have been used during the interrogation. The Israeli Security Cabinet adopted the recommendations of the Implementation Team and after the completion of the necessary technical arrangements and recruitment of suitable supervisors by the MoJ, along with the completion of a work protocol, the supervisors began their work in January 2018. During 2019-2020, hundreds of control and supervision hours were conducted by the supervisors (with an average of 80 to 100 monthly hours).

Police Investigations

68. For information on audio and visual recording of Police investigations, please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to the ICCPR (Question No. 14).

69. At present, the State of Israel does not intend to amend Section 17 to the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law 5762-2002 (the "Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law").

National Institutions for the Protection of Human Rights in Israel

70. The Unit for the Coordination of the Fight against Racism—In 2016, GR No. 1958 established the Unit for Coordination of the Fight against Racism within the Ministry of Justice (MoJ). The Unit is in charge of supervising the implementation of the recommendations of the inter-ministerial team to combat racism, as well as receiving complaints concerning discrimination and racism from all populations and forwarding them to the relevant authorities, monitoring the handling of these complaints, composing an annual report regarding the Unit's responsibilities and actions, and examining required legal amendments.

Reply to paragraph 9 of the list of issues

74. In the past few years, following a number of Supreme Court decisions, several changes were made in the policy concerning asylum seekers, inter alia, regarding deductions from salaries for deposits, detention and renewal of permits, as detailed below.

Closing of "Holot" Detention Facility

75. Over the past decade, tens of thousands of people have entered Israel illegally, not through a border station. Initially, these people had been placed in custody under the Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952, for a relatively short period of time, given the limitations on the length of custody as set by this law. On December 17, 2014, Amendment No. 5 to the Law entered into force (for further information, please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to the CAT (Question No. 12)).

76. On August 11, 2015, the HCJ rejected the majority of claims in a petition filed against the said amendment and ruled that the new amendment is constitutional except for the provision that enabled illegal migrants to stay in "Holot" facility for up to twenty (20) months. The Court found this period was disproportionate and gave the Knesset a six (6) months period to enact a new amendment to the Law. In the interim, the Court set a twelve (12) months period as the maximum. (H.C.J. 8665/14 Dasseta v. The Knesset (2.2.2015)).

77. Following this HCJ decision, in February 2016, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 6 to the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Jurisdiction) Law which sets the maximum period a person can be held in "Holot" facility at twelve (12) months. On November 19, 2017, the Government approved a Resolution to close the Holot facility within four (4) months and on March 2018, the facility was closed.

Deduction from Salaries

78. On April 23, 2020 the Supreme Court ruled that the obligation requiring people who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian border to deposit 20% of their salary as an incentive to leave Israel is unconstitutional and ordered its nullity (H.C.J. 2293/17 Garsgher et. al. v. The Knesset).

79. The Court determined that the deposit would be based only on the employer component (16%) and approved the operation of the "administrative deduction" mechanism, according to which certain amounts can be deducted from the employee's deposit, if the employee leaves the country after the departure date as set by the authorities is delayed. The law determines deduction levels in accordance with the length of the delay, and states that the deduction will not exceed 33% of the deposit.

80. Since the Court's decision, 13,808 online applications have been processed for the employee's share of the deposit money. So far, as of July 2020, a total of 200,733,008NIS (58,435,668 USD) has been transferred to the employees.

No Deportation to States in which there is a Danger of Torture

81. The State of Israel is fully committed to the principle of non-refoulement and does not return any person to a country where he/she may be at risk of being tortured. We are not familiar with a claim of deportation to a state in which there is a risk of torture.

82. In a case brought recently before the Supreme Court, it was ruled that a fear of being subjected to female genital mutilation (FGM) was a ground for granting asylum. It was agreed by both parties that FGM may establish a well-founded fear of persecution and the main point of discussion was regarding the availability of an internal flight or relocation alternative for the family within Ivory Coast. The Court ruled that in the circumstances of the case (the agents of the persecution, lack of sufficient State protection, the religious and gender-based persecution), the availability of alternative places of living must be examined meticulously. The Court ruled that the relocation alternative offered to the family in this case did not address the concern and therefore they could not be removed to Ivory Coast (Ad.Ap.Rq. 5040/18 Anonymous s. The State of Israel (09.02.2020)).

83. The State filed a request for additional hearing on this matter, which focused on the Court's determination regarding the question of who carries the initial burden of proof for the existence of an internal flight or relocation alternative. The request was rejected by the Court on July 6, 2020 (Ad.Ad.H. 1893/20 The State of Israel v. Anonymous et. al. (6.7.20)).

Renewal of Permits

84. With respect to working permits, according to Section 2(a)(2) of the Entry into Israel Law, the duration of a tourist visa is three (3) months, during which one will not be permitted to work. Eritreans and Sudanese who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian Border and may not be returned to their countries of origin receive temporary residence permit which is renewed periodically. The PIA recently issued several changes regarding the license renewals as detailed below.

85. On October 10, 2019, the PIA declared that Eritrean citizens who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian Border will receive temporary residence permit pursuant to Section 2(a)(5) to the Entry into Israel Law for a period of six (6) months each time and the previous notification in their passports regarding the limit on the possibility to work, will be deleted. Eritrean citizens holding a B/1 visa (temporary employment permit) will receive it for a period of six (6) months at a time.

86. Sudanese citizens who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian Border will receive temporary residence permit pursuant to Section 2(a)(5) of the Law, for a period of one (1) year at a time. Sudanese citizens holding a B/1 visa will also receive it for a period of one (1) year at a time. The previous notification in the passports of persons from Darfur, the Blue Nile and the Nuba Mountains regarding the limit on the possibility to work, will be deleted.

87. Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, the PIA notified on May 12, 2020 that the permits and visas of Eritrean and Sudanese citizens who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian Border and are holding temporary residence permits pursuant to Section 2(a)(5) of the Law or a B/1 visa, will be extended every two (2) months automatically, from the expiry date of their permits, until a new decision is made.

88. Additionally, in the last few years, the Government adopted resolutions granting 800 temporary residence (A/5) visas on humanitarian grounds (in addition to previous 600 recipients) to the Sudanese residents of Darfur, the Nuba Mountains and the Blue Nile who applied for asylum and have met the conditions laid down in the resolutions. This visa grants the recipient social rights, national health insurance and the right to work. Moreover, in July 2019 the Government ordered the granting of additional 300 B/1 visas to the said populations.

Health Services

89. Health services and social security benefits - The National Insurance Law 5755-1995 and the National Health Insurance Law 5754-1994 apply to Israeli residents and citizens. Section 2 of the National Insurance Law defines who is not considered a resident in this regard.

90. People who entered Israel illegally from the Egyptian border are granted National Insurance Institution (NII) coverage in the following designated insurance categories, insofar as they are working in Israel: maternity insurance, work accident insurance and insurance against bankruptcy of the employer. These are all given to the workers regardless of whether or not their employer made the payments to the NII. In addition, they are entitled to health insurance funded by their employer.

91. Following the outbreak of the Covid-19 pandemic, the MoH has instructed all directors of general hospitals as well as the Magen David Adom (the national emergency medical services organization) to provide foreigners staying in Israel with equal medical services as those provided to Israeli nationals in the context of the Covid-19 pandemic. In addition, the MoH's instructions concerning the pandemic are translated into various languages, published at the MoH's website and distributed to relevant NGOs.

Reply to paragraph 10 of the list of issues

94. The State of Israel has been facing a very large number, respective to its size, of asylum applications. Since 2009, approximately 70,000 applications were submitted. The PIA is working to improve the services provided and to shorten the waiting time for processing the applications.

95. According to the PIA procedures, handling of the asylum applications is conducted pursuant to the Israeli law, while observing Israel's obligations under the Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees of 1951 and 1967 respectively, and in accordance with the obligations under Article 3 of the CAT.

96. According to the procedure, the PIA must ensure that information sheets will be available at places of custody, at its offices and on its website. The information includes the manner of submitting an asylum application, the procedure for handling applications, obligations of the asylum seeker and the asylum seeker's right to contact a legal representative of his/her choice and of the scope of representation to which he/she is entitled in the process. According to the procedure, an asylum seeker will not be removed from Israel, until completion of reviewing his/her asylum application, in accordance with the principle of non-refoulement.

97. The PIA has a designated unit that handles asylum applications in Israel – the RSD Unit. The decisions of the PIA and of the Minister of Interior to deny an asylum application are subject to an appeal to the Appeals Tribunal, a specialized tribunal in the field of immigration that has been established within the MoJ in 2014. Such appeals are filed frequently. Additional appeals may be filed to a District Court and with the Court's permission to the Supreme Court.

98. Currently, all foreigners desiring to apply for refugee status may do so through an online application form, available at: <https://govforms.gov.il/mw/forms/RSDform@piba.gov.il>. Following the completion of the online request, applicants are summoned for identification, verification and registration with border control at the PIA branch in the city of Bnei Brak. Afterwards, applicants are invited to a refugee status interview, held at the PIA branch in Tel Aviv-Jaffa.

99. Since the establishment of the Appeals Tribunal, thousands of appeals have been filed against the decisions of the PIA, mainly by foreign nationals whose applications for asylum were denied. Any decision made in the case of a foreign national which denies all or part of the application, must inform the applicant of their right to appeal to the tribunal and bring the matter to judicial review.

100. In the five (5) years prior to the establishment of the tribunal (2009-2013), between 2,560 and 3,070 appeals were filed each year, and in the first half of 2014, 1,163 appeals were filed. Following the establishment of the tribunal, in June of 2014, there was a significant rise in appeals filed: 2,355 in the second half of 2014; 5,195 in 2015; 4,300 in 2016; 6,014 in 2017; 7,034 in 2018; and 2,322 in the first half of 2019. In 2018, more than 50% of the appeals were denied in a ruling, more than 20% became redundant due to the PIA responding or deciding to reconsider its decision, approx. 6% were accepted, and the rest ended with rejection of the appeal, partial acceptance, etc. Of the 5,889 appeals in 2018, 59% regarded asylum seekers and illegal immigrants, 15% regarded family reunification, 12% regarded a humanitarian matter, and 6% regarded entry and visitation. Child registration, residence, work and studies, citizenship, detention in Holot facility and others, each consisted of 3% or less of the total number of appeals. In addition, the decisions of the Appeals Tribunal may also be appealed before the District Court, in its capacity as the Administrative Affairs Court. Additionally, every foreign national placed in custody is brought as soon as possible, and no later than 96 hours, for review before the Detention Review Tribunal (DRT). This Tribunal proactively examines the situation of the foreign nationals, as stated, without the need for a preliminary appeal from the foreign national.

101. With respect to the suspensive effect of the appeal of a deportation decision, usually, when such an appeal is submitted alongside a request for an interim suspension order, the removal of the appellant from Israel is suspended until the end of the proceedings. In addition, even if an interim suspension order is not granted, due to the prompt nature of these proceedings, the decision will be given prior to the date scheduled for the removal. In 2019, 34 appeals out of 202 cases were granted (sixteen (16) cases are still pending); and in 2020 (as of September 2, 2020), seven (7) appeals out of 42 were granted (eleven (11) cases are still pending).

Identification and treatment of vulnerable persons seeking asylum in Israel

102. Gender sensitivity- In February 26, 2017, the Regulation on Processing Asylum Requests (PIA Regulation No.5.2.0012) was updated and a designated section entitled “Gender Sensitivity in the process of refugee status determination (RSD)” was added, with the aim of highlighting gender sensitivities.

103. The Gender Sensitivity Section provides that RSD interviews will be conducted with sensitivity to gender issues that might affect the interviewee’s feelings or behavior, or impact her/his testimony. Furthermore, the Section stipulates that victims of gender-based violence, including sexual violence, must be treated with the utmost respect and sensitivity.

104. A further example for developments in the field of gender sensitivity is the H CJ ruling concerning FGM as a ground for granting asylum (please see our Reply to Question No. 9 above).

105. Victims of trafficking in persons (TIP) - As a rule, TIP victims are not held in detention in Israel. Every identified TIP victim is transferred to a shelter for TIP victims. Victims may leave the shelters at will, unless law enforcement agencies estimate that they are at risk, in which case they are to remain in the shelter until it is assessed that they are no longer at risk. Victims are provided escort to the courts and the State Attorney’s Offices (SAO), as well as to medical institutions. This service is provided to support the victims emotionally and psychologically, as well as for their personal safety.

106. For further information, please see Annex I.

107. The DRT and the Appeals Tribunal Referral Procedure for TIP victims- The DRT and the Appeals Tribunal operate under the MOJ. The DRTs are charged with exercising legal scrutiny of the detention orders that are issued by the Supervisor of the Border Control Administration. The tribunals are not authorized to review deportation orders. The Appeals Tribunal has authority over Appeals against PIA decisions regarding foreign nationals. The Tribunal's decisions may be appealed to the Administrative Courts.

108. The Tribunal notifies the Police Anti-Trafficking Coordinating Unit (PTC) and the LAA of cases they suspect are trafficking related. The LAA provides the alleged TIP victim with a lawyer and the PTC examines the available evidence and decides whether to recognize the detainee as a TIP victim. Once a detainee is identified as a victim, they are released from detention and offered to be transferred to the TIP shelters. Note that in all the court hearings in the Tribunal, a translator is present. If no translator is available, the court session is postponed unless the detainee speaks the same language as the Judge. The DRT and its personnel consider the translator to be a fundamental component of the process, since it allows for a better, more effective identification of the victim of trafficking. In 2018, five (5) cases were referred from the tribunals to the relevant authorities – including the LAA, the PTC, and the National Anti-Trafficking Unit (NATU).

109. Between 2009 to 2019, 64,542 asylum requests were submitted in Israel, of which 55 have been approved. Please see also our reply to Question No. 9 above; For the requested statistics, please see Annex I.

Extraditions

110. Between 2016-2019, twenty-five (25) wanted persons were extradited (as will be detailed below). The majority of the wanted persons had status in the State of Israel, i.e. were Israeli citizens or residents, or were at least entitled to the right to immigrate to Israel and become an Israeli citizen under the Law of Return 5710-1950, and some of the latter even began a naturalization process.

111. For information on extraditions please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to CAT (Question No. 19); for the requested statistics, please see Annex I.

Safe Relocation to Third Countries

112. Israel had reached arrangements with two (2) third countries for the safe relocation of persons from Sudan and Eritrea who entered Israel through the Egyptian border illegally. The Government has considered this plan a more appropriate way to deal with the situation, due to the unique circumstances that Israel is facing and the geo-political context in the Middle East.

113. Ultimately, for various reasons, the arrangements were not fully implemented. Anyone who wishes to leave Israel voluntarily to these countries can still do so with State assistance according to these arrangements. Based on routine exams conducted by PIA, there have been no known cases of violations of the principle of non-refoulement. For further information, please see Annex I.

114. Voluntary departure data over the years 2015-2019- Please see Annex I.

115. Data regarding voluntary departure of persons who entered Israel illegally during 2012-2018- Please see Annex I.

Reply to paragraph 12 of the list of issues

116. In six (6) cases in which Israeli citizens who were also Israeli residents were extradited, the requesting country undertook to allow the wanted persons to return to Israel for the purpose of serving their prison sentence if convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. In some cases, the wanted persons exercised their right to return and some waived it. In addition, in two (2) cases, the requesting country's assurance for a retrial was demanded, after the wanted persons were sentenced in absentia. The monitoring of the fulfillment of the obligation is coordinated with the corresponding authority.

117. Regarding the undertakings made by the State of Israel, in the relevant period, in two (2) cases Israel provided, at the request of the relevant country, assurance to respect procedural rights such as deduction of detention days, and in three (3) cases, it gave assurance to respect procedural rights and respect human rights as required – an assurance that was required under the laws of the requesting country.

118. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to CAT.

Reply to paragraph 14 of the list of issues

119. During the reporting period, extradition agreements with Brazil and India came into effect. Under these agreements, extradition offenses were defined as offenses for which, in both countries, a sentence of at least one (1) year of imprisonment can be imposed. Acts included in the CAT are prohibited under the Penal Law, and penalties of at least one (1) year of imprisonment may be imposed in respect thereof. Therefore, under Israeli law these constitute extradition offenses.

120. Both agreements include a clause that allows countries to refuse extradition for an offense of a political nature. However, the countries have agreed to view as an exception to this rule any offense for which the two (2) contracting countries have an obligation to extradite pursuant to a multilateral international treaty. Brazil, like Israel, is a party to the CAT and therefore, the clause prevents both Israel and Brazil from arguing that any of the offenses included in the CAT is a political offense or political act. India, on the other hand, has signed the convention but has not yet ratified it, and thus the clause of the extradition treaty with India can be seen as a kind of declaration of intent: when India ratifies the CAT, an obligation will be created between the countries to comply with the terms of the Convention.

121. According to Section 18 of the Extradition Law, only after a person is declared by a court to be extraditable, the Minister of Justice may order the extradition of the person to the requesting State.

122. In Israel, a legal infrastructure has been established for the enforcement of a prison sentence in lieu of extradition for the serving of the sentence, when extradition is not possible for reasons of citizenship. In 2018, as part of the Serving a Prison Sentence in Prisoner's Country of Citizenship Law 5757-1996, the State of Israel enforced a prison sentence imposed in France on two (2) Israeli citizens.

Israel Police

124. The Police Education and Information Section operates educational programs aimed at ensuring that human rights values are incorporated into police officers' training and fieldwork, such as tolerance within a multicultural society, elimination of prejudice and awareness of human rights conventions. Special emphasis is given to training police commanders, in light of their direct influence on their subordinates.

125. The Police School for Investigation and Intelligence incorporates into its training the main provisions of the relevant human rights conventions and the law of armed conflict regarding procedures and investigation ethics.

126. In May 6, 2018, the Office of the Deputy to the Attorney General (International Law) in cooperation with the NGO “the Public Committee Against Torture in Israel”, had conducted a one-day training seminar for the UIW in the Israel Police and the Inspector in the MoJ on the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, as well as on the Manual on Effective Investigation and Documentation of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (“Istanbul Protocol”). The following subjects were addressed: the international terms and standard of torture, cruel and degrading treatment and imprisonment conditions; the obligation to investigate such treatment; and conducting interviews with the complainant in accordance with international law.

The IPS

127. IPS officers and wardens undergo regular training at the School for IPS Officers and Wardens, as well as in their respective units. This training includes topics such as prevention of the use of force, warden’s ethics, values of human dignity and liberty, and the rights and liberties of the prisoner. These issues are also routinely addressed during training and guidance of other prison staff members.

The ISA

128. The Legal Department of the ISA and dozens of ISA personnel have undergone specific training on international law, including human rights law, the core human rights conventions, and the work of the UN Treaty Bodies.

129. Moreover, ISA operational personnel are taught, in detail, about the relevant human rights conventions, including their implications in the unique Israeli context. This is done both during preliminary and advanced ISA training, as part of the process of implementing the recommendations of the Turkel Implementation Team. These courses emphasize the importance of fundamental human rights principles, together with upholding the rule of law and practices stipulated by the courts.

The IDF

130. The School of Military Law hosts multiple training exercises for IDF forces on human rights law and the law of armed conflict. These exercises include lectures and academic courses which provide both practical and theoretical applications of international law. They analyze real and fictional operational cases designed specifically for the participants and their military specialty. In addition, commanders and the IDF’s International Law Department take part in operational exercises in order to provide the forces with the professional tools that will allow them to face such challenges in accordance with international law.

131. Every year, hundreds of lectures are given to IDF soldiers and commanders who serve their mandatory service, as well as to reserve soldiers. These exercises place special emphasis on complex issues such as arrest and detention practices, the legal responsibilities of soldiers and their commanders, as well as the laws and rules of conduct during an armed conflict. For further information, please see Annex I.

132. Furthermore, Military Police investigators undergo comprehensive training on various issues related to the manner of conducting an investigation. These trainings focus on investigatees’ rights and how to conduct investigations under reasonable conditions and in accordance with the law. Every soldier being questioned under warning by the Military Police is entitled to legal representation by a military defense attorney free of charge, who will also accompany them in the criminal proceedings, if the investigation leads to the opening of such proceedings.

The Population and Immigration Authority

133. Personnel in the RSD Unit in the PIA undergo a three (3)-week course on topics related to refugees and asylum seekers. This includes the Refugee Convention, human rights conventions, Israeli laws and TIP. The course was co-developed and first conducted in 2009 by the MoI, UNHCR, the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), and the United States Department of Homeland Security.

134. On 16 February, 2017, a designated training of the RSD Unit staff in the PIA regarding women asylum seekers and gender-sensitivity took place. The training included sessions on crime victims' rights, women from Eritrea and Sudan, women asylum seekers in Israel, and on mental health issues among women asylum seekers and the way they are reflected in interviews.

The Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the MoJ

135. The Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the MoJ regularly conducts many seminars, courses, and vocational training, attended by hundreds of practitioners, to raise awareness of human rights issues and eliminate racial discrimination. For further information, please see Annex I.

139. The means and degrees of force utilized by Israeli security forces, including the IDF, are governed by clearly worded and defined Rules of Engagement (RoE), all of which are subject to rigorous and thorough scrutiny by military and governmental bodies.

140. The RoE are written with close legal guidance of the MAG to ensure that they comply with relevant provisions of national law and with treaty and customary international law, and in particular with the relevant rules of the law of armed conflict. These rules are periodically reviewed and updated in accordance with the changing operational needs aimed to ensure that they comply with the relevant requirements of both international and national law. In addition, some of the RoE are also approved by the AG.

141. Weapons systems employed by Israeli security forces, including less-lethal weapons (such as tear gas etc.), are subject to certain restrictions on use and to detailed professional instructions for use. These rules and procedures receive strict and comprehensive scrutiny by the command chain of the military and the Government, including an in-depth assessment of the physical effects of such systems as well as full legal reviews.

142. Training - All Israeli security forces undergo comprehensive training so as to be able to implement these rules and procedures properly and operate the appropriate equipment and weaponry relevant for the required mission, including less-lethal weapons.

143. Issues relating to the Law of Armed Conflict and Human Rights Law, including the use of lethal force, detention powers and the authority to use firearms in different situations are taught and discussed in a variety of lectures and training delivered by the IDF School of Military Law. Additional training regarding these issues is conducted, inter alia, in the Officers course, Company Commanders courses, Battalion Commanders courses, as well as in the different IDF schools and colleges (the Tactical Command College training, Sea Captains training, Command and Staff courses, etc.). In addition, particular training is given to soldiers and officers carrying specific roles which involve direct contact with the population, i.e., combat interrogators and civilian population officers (charged with coordinating with the population in humanitarian issues in times of war).

144. Any allegations regarding the excessive use of force or violations of the RoE by IDF forces are given consideration and are examined in full. Where sufficient information or evidence is brought to the attention of the investigatory authorities that indicates a suspicion of a violation of the law, the authorities will order the opening of a criminal investigation into the matter.

Methods of interrogations

145. According to the Israel Security Agency Law, the ISA internal rules and procedures as well as methods of interrogations are confidential. A petition for disclosure of similar details was submitted to the Jerusalem District Court, and was rejected by the Court (Ad.P 8844/08 The Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. The Supervisor of the Freedom of Information Law within the Ministry of Justice (15.2.09)).

Amendments to the Youth Law (Trial)

146. In the last decade, together with another wave of terrorism, there has been an increase in the phenomenon of stone-throwing related violence (e.g. stones were thrown at cars, buses, pedestrians, and police personnel), oftentimes by minors. Due to the serious nature of this kind of violence, which can result in grave damage to life and limb, offenders are often remanded to custody. However, it is common for offenders who are minors to be released on bail during the legal proceedings, in many instances with the approval of the State.

147. For example, in June 2020, Amendment No. 22 to the Youth Law (Temporary Order), relating to the possibility of sentencing a minor under the age of 14 to a prison sentence, on the condition that she/he be held in a children closed facility rather than a prison until she/he reaches the age of 14, has expired. In addition, the Youth Law was amended in 2015 to extend the court's power to impose a fine on the parents of a minor, in addition to a criminal conviction.

148. For information on the Shapiro Commission appointed to examine the required adaptations of the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law, please see Annex. I.

Minors and Terrorism

149. Israel faces a complex and difficult reality of ongoing terrorism. Unfortunately, serious offenses have been committed by minors, including minors aged 13 and 14, and on occasion, the victims of these crimes have been minors themselves.

150. For further information on this topic, please see our reply to Question No. 5 above.

Criminal Prisoners

General living conditions

152. Section 11B to the Prisons Ordinance specifies the appropriate living conditions of prisoners. The conditions include the following:

- A prisoner will be held in proper conditions that will not harm his/her health and dignity;
- A prisoner will be entitled to: proper sanitary conditions, medical care and suitable supervision in accordance with the instructions of an IPS physician; bed, mattress and blankets for personal use; food and water; clothes, personal hygiene products; reasonable lighting and ventilation conditions in the cell; and a daily walk in the open air. These rights are to be presented in a noticeable place in the detention facility.

153. The Prisons Regulations (imprisonment conditions) 5770-2010, specifies the requirement of living conditions of prisoners, instructing, for example, that every prison cell will have a window that allows ventilation or other means of reasonable ventilation, a toilet and sink in each cell and separation that allows privacy, shower and food requirements, lighting, a prisoner's living space, hygiene conditions, the right to a daily walk in the fresh air etc.

Medical Care

154. Please see our reply to Question No. 1 above.

Visits and Family Relations

155. Generally, family visits are allowed for criminal prisoners and are held according to IPS procedure No. 04.42.00. This procedure specifies the frequency of the visits, the persons who can visit the prisoner, the duration of a visit (30 minutes in general), the number of visitors (up to three (3) adult visitors with which the prisoners' minor children may come along), special instruction regarding minor prisoners, and instructions in regard to the ability to approve additional visits, and special visitors etc.

156. In addition, contact with families is also maintained through letter correspondence and postcards, and there are public telephones in the wings.

157. For information on the case of Pr.Ap.Rq.H.C.J. 4277/20 IPS v. Abed Marai (June 24, 2020), please see Annex I.

Access to Legal Counsel

158. Prisoners are entitled to meet with their lawyers and receive consultations; these meetings are held with or without a divider, depending on the circumstances. The transfer of legal material between the lawyer and the prisoner is subject to attorney-client privilege and the legal material is forwarded directly to the inmate.

Leisure activities

159. According to Section 11C of the Prisons Ordinance, prisoners are entitled to take part in educational or vocational activities conducted within the prison, as determined by IPS regulations. They are also allowed to receive books, magazines and papers, as well as to spend one (1) daily hour in the prison courtyard and the Prison Director is authorized to extend this hour. They are mostly given three (3) daily hours in the prison courtyard.

Religious rights

160. Prisoners are allowed to uphold their religious duties under the prison's security limitations, as elaborated under Regulations 44-46 of the Prisons Regulations 5738-1978.

Security Prisoners

161. Generally, the conditions granted to security prisoners are determined by the IPS Commission standing order No. 03.02.00.

162. Due to ongoing security risks posed by security prisoners, specific limitations are applied to their vacations, visits and conjugal visit rights. The need to impose such limitations was recognized, scrutinized and affirmed by the Supreme Court in several cases (for example: Pr.P.A 1076/95 State of Israel v. Samir Kuntar (13.11.96) and more recently in H.C.J

6956/09 Yuness v. Israel Prisons Service (2010); H.C.J 6314/17 Namnam v. The Government of Israel (2019)).

163. Nevertheless, security prisoners are offered a variety of services and benefits that enable their detention in appropriate and adequate conditions, whilst fully respecting their distinctive needs according to international law standards.

164. With regard to all prisoners (security and criminal), breaches of order and discipline in detention facilities necessitate the use of disciplinary and administrative measures, which are carried out in accordance with IPS procedures.

Medical care and religious rights

165. Please see the abovementioned information regarding criminal prisoners.

Family Visits

166. Generally, family visits are allowed for security prisoners and are held according to IPS procedures.

167. For information on the case of H.C.J 6314/17 Fadi Sammy Namnam et. al. v. The State of Israel et. al. (4.6.19), please see Annex I.

168. In addition to family visits, security related prisoners receive visits from representatives of the ICRC and diplomatic representatives.

Access to Legal Counsel

169. Please see the abovementioned information regarding criminal prisoners.

Living conditions monitoring mechanisms

170. The living conditions of security related prisoners, as with all other prisoners, are inspected by Official Visitors in prisons. Any complaints concerning living conditions raised before ICRC representatives, Official Visitors, and representatives from all the different mechanisms that handle the complaints of security prisoners, such as the State Comptroller's Office, the internal review mechanism of the IPS, the review mechanism of the Ministry of Public Security (MoPS), court petitions, public applications of prisoners etc., are brought to the attention of the IPS authorities.

General Living Conditions

171. Security prisoners are given food provided by the IPS and may, as a privilege, depending upon their behavior, purchase food at the prison's canteen.

172. Prisoners are allowed to hold educational activities, receive books, magazines and papers.

173. Prisoners are allowed one (1) daily hour in the prison courtyard and the Prison Director is authorized to extend this hour. They are mostly given three (3) hours per day.

174. As of May 2019, all ISA interrogation facilities have been adapted with lighting infrastructures allowing dimming the lights in the cells at night.

Judicial Review

175. Any prisoner seeking to contest an individual decision in his/her matter or to challenge a general claim regarding the conditions of detention, may address the prison authorities or petition the District Court in a Prisoner Petition, according to Section 62A of the Prisons Ordinance.

176. Official visitors – please see the reply to Question No. 29 below.

Reducing overcrowding in prisons in the course of the reporting period and imprisonment alternatives

177. During the reporting period, and in particular following the HCJ ruling on prisoners and detainees' living space (H.C.J. 1892/14 The Association for Civil Rights in Israel et. al. v. The Minister of Public Security et. al. (13.6.17); for further elaboration, please see Annex I) the following amendments have been made in the legislation and in GRs in order to address overcrowding in prisons:

(a) Extending the periods of time of community service in lieu of imprisonment: On April 1, 2019, Amendment No. 133 (Temporary Order) to the Penal Law entered into force, according to which, the possibility of imposing a sentence of imprisonment in the form of community service was extended from a period of six (6) months to a period of nine (9) months;

(b) Expanding the deployment of Community Courts: Community Courts began to operate in Israel as a pilot program in November 2014, serving various populations. Community Courts use a judicial and rehabilitative approach, aiming to reduce incarceration and prevent recidivism. These Courts deal solely with criminal proceedings while focused on the cooperation between the courts and the law enforcement agencies, the welfare services, education authorities and the community. In GR No. 1840 (August 2016), The Government ordered the expansion of this program with the aim of operating at least one (1) Community Court in each of Israel's six (6) judicial districts, and to date Community Courts operate in Be'er-Sheva, Nazareth, Ramla, Jerusalem, Haifa and Tel Aviv-Jaffa;

(c) Administrative Release: On November 7, 2018 Amendment No. 54 (Temporary Order) to the Prisons Ordinance was approved by the Knesset. This amendment extended the remaining imprisonment periods under the administrative release arrangement, allowing a prisoner to be released before the end of his/her full sentence. However, according to the amendment, a prisoner will not be released in accordance with this section, unless he/she has completed at least half of his/her imprisonment sentence. This temporary amendment was introduced in order to contribute to the reduction of overcrowding in prisons, and to increase the living area of the remaining prisoners in the short term, so as to comply with the requirements of the HCJ in its decision from June 2017 (see further elaboration below), until the long term solutions agreed upon by the State are implemented. This amendment does not apply to security prisoners, prisoners who were convicted for terrorist offences under the Counter-Terrorism Law 5776-2016 (the "Counter-Terrorism Law") and prisoners who were tried in Military Courts for particular security related offences that may only be prosecuted in such courts. Currently there is a pending petition in this regard (H.C.J. 1406/19, A.A.M (Minor) et. al. v. The Knesset et. al. (pending)). On August 2, 2020, the Government adopted a Resolution on the enlargement of the living area of prisoners and the promotion of imprisonment and rehabilitation alternatives in order to comply with the HCJ's decision, according to which, a temporary amendment bill will be published within the next 60 days, that will propose a new procedure for the administrative release arrangement;

(d) Adopting the recommendations of the committee regarding the implementation of the recommendations of the public committee for the Examination of the Punishment and Treatment of Convicted Offenders: GR No. 3595 (February 25, 2018) adopted the recommendations of the Prosecution Team for examining the implementation of the Dorner Report. The guiding principle of these recommendations is that where considerations of competence or level of risk do not necessitate imprisonment or detention, and when the defendant can be introduced into an actual rehabilitation procedure tailored to his/her needs, outside of jail, the rehabilitation procedure should be favored over imprisonment or detention. Additional budgets and positions were allocated towards the implementation of these recommendations, likely to have an impact on occupancy in prisons and detention centers;

(e) The establishment of new prison facilities and renovation of existing ones: Israel has expanded the living area per prisoner to 3 square meters and is gradually increasing it to 4.5 square meters per prisoner in compliance with the HCJ ruling (H.C.J. 1892/14). Thus far, 45% of the prison cells are in compliance with the standard set by the Court (excluding the Zalmou prison facility, where the cells are sized 3.8 square meters per prisoner, including the toilet but not including the shower). For further information, see Annex I;

(f) Extension of the quota for prisoners and detainees under electronic supervision: The quota of prisoners and detainees designated for imprisonment alternatives with electronic supervision was extended to 1,000 prisoners. A further extension to 1,250 prisoners was confirmed by the Knesset on 26 August, 2020. For further information, please see Annex I;

(g) Conditional early release: A unit for conditional early release of prisoners sentenced to short-term prison sentences was established within the IPS. This unit is certified to discuss and decide on requests for the conditional early release of prisoners convicted for up to one (1) year imprisonment. The unit was established in order to improve the conditional early release mechanism and to alleviate the backlog faced by the release committees.

GR No. 3595 adopted following the HCJ Ruling on Prisoners and Detainees' Living Space

178. On 25 February, 2018, GR No. 3595 on improving prison facilities and living space was issued. It included the above-mentioned means of operation.

179. Subsequently, the Government presented to the Court an elaborated plan to implement the judgment. The State requested the Court to extend the deadlines which were initially decided by the Court. The Court granted the Government an extension of the deadlines (initially set to April 30, 2019 and May 2, 2020).

180. In May 2019, the Government reported to the Court that it had successfully met the first deadline.

181. On April 28, 2020, the State requested the Court to hold a session on the implementation of its decision and to delay the second deadline. On 30 April, 2020, the HCJ agreed to delay the second deadline as per the State's request, while the State's request to have the session is still pending before the Court.

182. On August 2, 2020, the Government adopted GR 291, aimed at reaching full compliance with the HCJ's decision by the end of 2023 at latest. The State submitted an updated request to the Court in accordance with the said timelines, and the hearing is scheduled for December 30, 2020.

Minors

184. In recent years a significant decline is evident in the number of detained and convicted minors in prisons. For statistics, please see Annex I.

185. Minor criminal detainees are held in the Ofek Juvenile Prison and security detainees are transferred to the minors' wings in Ofer, Damon and Megiddo prisons. During their investigation, minors are held in separate designated cells for minors.

186. The IPS' approach towards minors is rehabilitative and treatment-oriented, based on the assumption that every young adult perpetrating an offense can be reformed and has the potential for rehabilitation and that one should do everything possible to help the minor reintegrate back into society in a normative manner.

187. Ongoing contact is maintained with the minors' parents and, if needed, with community authorities, including the parole services, Youth Protection Authority and social care services. IPS takes steps to separate minors from adults in the detention facilities and in the escort vehicles of the "Nachshon" Unit.

188. For further information on the recommendations for legislative amendments on the issue of minors in prison, please see our reply to Question No. 20 above.

Female Inmates in the IPS

189. The IPS has dedicated special efforts in recent years in order to address the issue of female prisoners.

190. Female criminal prisoners are held in the Neve Tirtza facility, and female security prisoners are held in special wings in the Damon prison.

191. There is no separation between criminal prisoners, regardless of their place of residence. Similarly, there is no separation based on religion between prisoners. However, in all prisons there is a strict separation between prisoners with a drug addiction and prisoners without any narcotic background. Division is also based on the classification of the prisoners as criminal or security prisoners; adults and minors; pretrial detainees and convicted detainees.

192. The treatment of prisoners is performed on an individual basis. Special attention is given to every prisoner through professional assistance by physicians, social workers and other officials.

Female minors in IPS facilities

193. As a general rule, there is a strict distinction and separation between minors and adults in prison. As there are very few minor female prisoners, they are treated on an individual basis, strictly following and abiding by laws pertaining to minor's rights. It is important to note that the small number of minor prisoners is a result of a policy that seeks to deal with minor criminals through special institutions and programs for rehabilitation, making imprisonment the very last option.

Births and Child Raising at IPS Facilities

194. Pregnant women prisoners are granted special treatment and are closely monitored by a physician. Women prisoners deliver in civilian hospitals and after labor, mothers are treated by a special joint committee of the prison authorities and municipal social workers. Female inmates are allowed to raise their children in special conditions until the age of two (2); these special conditions include the supervision of expert physicians and mother and child stations. The choice between keeping the child in prison and giving the child to a family is given to the mother.

Nutrition

195. The IPS menus were checked and approved by a nutritionist, according to the updated United States Department of Agriculture recommendations and adapted to the different populations of IPS, inter alia, women inmates, for example by adding milk to increase calcium provided to women.

196. The menu for pregnant women is enriched with vegetables, cheese, milk and supplements according to physician orders.

197. All prisons menus are similar and feedback received from prisoners show satisfaction from the food given.

Physical Search

198. There are very clear instructions and procedures that allow for physical search on female prisoners during entrance and exits from the cells and the different wings. The search is done by female wardens.

Persons with disabilities

199. In every entry of a detainee into a detention facility, an assessment is carried out by the relevant staff members regarding his/her unique needs, based on which his/her integration in the facility is conducted.

200. Pursuant to Section 19A of the Welfare (Treatment for Persons with Intellectual-Developmental Disabilities) Law 5729-1969, where a Court ordered the arrest of a person, and the Court is convinced that that person has an intellectual-developmental disability, the Court shall order that that person be held in separation if possible, or in a closed facility, except in such case where the Court is of the view that the best interest of the inmate does not so require. The inmate shall not be transferred to a closed facility before his/her investigation is completed.

201. According to Section 16 to the Treatment for Persons with Mental Disabilities Law 5751-1991, where a Court orders the arrest of a person, and the Court is of the view that that person is mentally disabled and his/her condition requires hospitalization, the Court may order that that person be held in a hospital determined by the regional psychiatrist or in the psychiatric division of a prison, insofar as the hospital may ensure the conditions required for the investigation of the inmate, if the criminal procedure so requires. The Court shall not issue the said order before it has received a psychiatric opinion. For that purpose, the Court shall order that the person be brought for a psychiatric examination.

Alternative measures for detention of minors

206. Section 26 of the Youth Law (Trial) provides alternative measures which the Juvenile Court may order in lieu of imprisonment, including: placing the minor under probation; receiving a commitment from the minor or her/his parent regarding her/his future conduct; placing the minor in a closed residence facility; charging the minor or her/his parent with a fine, trial expenses or compensation to the injured party.

207. The MoPS, together with the Youth Villages directors and the Ministry of Economy, lead various programs for violence and drug and alcohol use prevention in 24 Youth Villages, and participates in their funding. About 4,500 youth and children at risk are educated in these Youth Villages. The prevention programs included also children and youth who are victims of offenses. Note that Youth Villages often serve as alternative for arrest/detention for delinquent youth, and in this framework the youth are treated in various prevention programs.

208. For further information on imprisonment alternatives, please see our Reply to Question No. 21 above.

Reply to paragraph 23 of the list of issues

209. Separation and solitary confinement- For information on solitary confinement and separation, please see our reply to Question No. 1 above.

210. Solitary confinement is rarely utilized and is supervised within the IPS. The IPS distinguishes between solitary confinement and separation of certain segments of the prison populations as a preventative measure. As part of the implementation of the medical treatment guidelines established by medical professionals at the Department for Legal Psychiatry in the Ministry of Health (MoH), the IPS collects information regarding past disciplinary action taken against inmates with mental or psychosocial disabilities. These guidelines were adopted to provide the relevant treatment to mentally disabled inmates, in accordance with their individual needs.

211. For data on the use of solitary confinement, please see Annex I.

212. For information on solitary confinement and separation of minors, please see our reply to Question No. 1 above.

Protected Prison Wards

213. According to Prison Order 04.66.00, protected prison wards serve as transitional wards for prisoners who were taken out of separation, but are still experiencing difficulties in integrating and interacting with other prisoners. The aim of this temporary stage is to assist the prisoner in his/her future re-integration into the ordinary wards.

214. Most of the prisoners in the protected prison wards are held in the cell together with other prisoners. In addition, the courtyards in the protected prison wards are common and may serve several prisoners at a time.

215. Moreover, the prisoners in the protected prison ward are entitled to private meetings with a social worker, group therapy workshops and group or private educational activities. The religious practices of the prisoners in these wards are also protected and respected.

Reply to paragraph 24 of the list of issues

216. Medical Care for prisoners - please see our reply to Question No. 1 above.

217. All prisoners in custody are treated in accordance with the Prisons Ordinance and IPS Commission standing order No. 04.44.00 on the medical treatment of a prisoner.

218. In 2017, the MoH concluded the Berlovich Committee Report concerning the medical response and services provided to inmates held in IPS facilities. It is the MoH's position that the provision of medical services at the IPS is both reliable and in line with accepted standards. As such, individual complaints are thoroughly reviewed and appropriately handled. Furthermore, on December 11, 2019, a committee, headed by the Ombudsman for the Medical Professions, was appointed with the mandate of examining reports relayed by medical professionals concerning injuries sustained by inmates during interrogations. These Committees were preceded by a committee established by the MoH in 2012 (for further information, please see Israel's Fifth Periodic Report to CAT (pp. 63-64)).

219. With respect to identifying and documenting medical conditions that raise concerns of torture (according to the Istanbul Protocol), the medical team operates according to Medical Procedure 09-1005 on photographing and documentation of prisoners' and/or prison guards' bruises. The procedure instructs photographing and documentation of bruising caused by an unusual event such as: accident, use of force against prisoners, brawl, assault etc.

Detainees on hunger strike

221. Hunger strikers are under continuous medical supervision and monitoring by the IPS medical team, and are transferred to the hospital for examination and hospitalization in the event their medical condition so requires. The treatment is performed in accordance with the procedures of the MoH.

222. 115 security prisoners went on a hunger strike on the last hunger strike during August-September 2019. Three (3) of them also refrained from drinking (dry hunger strike), but received fluids transfusion. Of the 115 security prisoners who went on a hunger strike, 40 were held in solitary confinement due to the hunger strike. As for November 2019, the IPS reported seven (7) hunger-striking inmates.

223. On July 30, 2015, Amendment No. 48 to the Prisons Ordinance (Prevention of the Harm Caused by Hunger Strikes) 5775–2015, was approved by the Knesset. To date, the Law has not been utilized and no hunger-striking inmates have been fed absent consent. Furthermore, no inmates have passed away due to a hunger strike as of the enactment of the Law. Two (2) broad hunger strikes have taken place since. Applying the law will only take place in exceptional circumstances, as a measure of last resort. According to this Amendment, forced medical treatment to a prisoner shall be approved only under specific provisions, stipulated under the Law. Further, no complaints have been registered in the MoH by inmates on hunger strikes concerning the quality of medical services provided to them.

224. Based on a written opinion by a physician which states that there is a substantial risk that a hunger strike may endanger the life of a prisoner, or that he/she may suffer a severe and irreparable disability if medical treatment is not provided, the Prisons Commissioner, with the approval of the AG, can apply to the President of the District Court or his/her Deputy for a judicial approval to provide forced medical treatment to the hunger striking prisoner. Before rendering its decision, the Court shall consider the opinion of the relevant Ethics Committee and hear the prisoner or her/his representative, unless if time does not allow further delays, due to the prisoners' health condition. The prisoner has the right to appeal the Court's decision to the Supreme Court.

225. The prisoner must be represented by a lawyer, and the State is obliged to provide her/him with legal representation if she/he is not represented.

226. It is important to emphasize that even after receiving a judicial approval, the Law does not oblige a physician to forcibly treat a prisoner, but only allows him/her to do so. Thus, the physician is free to act upon her/his own ethical beliefs.

Disciplinary and administrative measures relating to hunger striking prisoners

227. Hunger strikes are seen in the IPS as impeding IPS' goal to protect the life and well-being of prisoners. As such, the IPS applies different disciplinary and administrative measures to minimize and prevent hunger strikes and their damages. Criminal Procedure (Arrests) Law, Criminal Procedure (Arrests) (Terms of Detention) Regulations, Prisons Ordinance and Prisons Regulation 5738-1978 as well as IPS Commission standing orders 04.16.00, 04.13.00 and 04.33.00 regulate these measures.

228. Hunger strikes may lead to disciplinary proceedings and punishment upon conviction. Prisoners may face disciplinary proceedings for a hunger strike under the following offences: avoidance of eating meals, throwing or damaging food or commission of any other act that interferes with the order or discipline. The punishment given to convicted prisoners varies from warnings, severe warnings and fines to fourteen (14) days of solitary confinement (with a break), and in the case of substantive damage a fine not exceeding 2,822 NIS (819 USD) and not higher than the estimated costs of the damage caused.

229. Parallel to disciplinary measures used, administrative measures may also be implemented, after a hearing in which the hunger striking prisoner may present his/her arguments. These measures mainly include the revocation of privileges such as visitations, the use of phones (aside from contacting lawyers), canteen privileges, the use of electronic devices, books, cigarettes, newspapers, etc.

230. Pretrial detainees may face disciplinary proceedings under the offence of interfering with the order and discipline, and due to violation of the obligation to follow orders regarding the daily routine and behavioral practices of the detention facility, both of which include hunger strikes. The punishment given to those convicted varies from revocation of the right to personal belongings, of visitation rights, of the right to receive correspondence and of the right to phone calls, all for six (6) months, to seven (7) days of solitary confinement. Additionally, if the detainee received privileges additional to those mandated by law, those may also be revoked following a hearing.

231. For information on the case of H.C.J. 5304/15 The Israeli Medical Association v. The Israeli Knesset (11.9.16), please see Annex I.

Reply to paragraph 25 of the list of issues

232. As of July 2020, there are 45 illegal immigrants in detention, all held in the Giv'on facility, of them 38 men, seven (7) women and no children. Due to the Covid-19 pandemic, Saharonim facility was vacated in order to serve as a designated facility for infected detainees. Hence, all irregular migrants were temporarily moved to the Giv'on facility. For further elaboration on the conditions of detention and health care provision at Saharonim facility prior to the outbreak of the pandemic, please see Annex I.

233. In each facility, various steps were taken in order to ensure the rights of the detainees as well as to improve their living conditions as much as possible according to the characteristics of each facility, as detailed below.

234. Yahalom is a flight, escort and detention unit located in Ben Gurion Airport. The unit is designated to hold those denied entry as stated in the provisions of Sections 9 and 10(b) of the Entry into Israel Law and a place to hold illegal immigrants before they are removed from the state, as stated in Sections 13a and 13b of the Law, and in the Entry into Israel Order (Special Place for Immigration Detention) 5767-2007.

235. A person whose entry into Israel was denied, will remain at Yahalom until his return flight. In the exceptional case where a person remains at Yahalom for more than fourteen (14) days, his/her matter will be brought before the Supervisor of the Border Control Administration, in order to examine the continuation of his/her detention at Yahalom. In even more exceptional cases, if it is decided to extend that person's stay in Yahalom, a periodic examination will be conducted by the Supervisor of the Border Control Administration, after fourteen (14) days from the date of the recent examination made in his/her matter until his/her departure from Israel. In any event, any person held at Yahalom for such reasons has the right to access judicial proceedings at any point during his/her stay.

236. Illegal immigrants without valid stay permits or whose stay is in violation of the conditions of their permit will be brought before the Supervisor of the Border Control Administration, in order to examine his/her matter. The Supervisor may issue a detention order according to Section 13a(d) of the Entry Into Israel Law. If the Supervisor has found that that person is staying in Israel illegally and is not intending to leave the country independently or subject to the exceptions under Section 13f of the Law, the Supervisor will issue a detention order in the Giv'on facility (or in Yahalom, under certain circumstances). Insofar as a deportation order is issued, the illegal immigrant will remain in the country for three (3) more days, in order to enable him/her to submit an application for judicial review of the decision. In addition, within 96 hours from the beginning of his/her detention, the illegal immigrant will be brought automatically before the DRT for the examination of his/her detention. The illegal migrant may be represented at all times. So long as that person is not removed from Israel, his/her stay in detention will be periodically examined by the DRT every 30 days or according to the decision of the DRT, or pursuant to the request of the illegal immigrant, according to the earliest date. In case where an illegal migrant has submitted an asylum request, his/her request will be examined regardless of the proceedings relating to his/her removal and detention.

Detention Conditions

237. Notices detailing the rights of persons whose entry into Israel was denied are posted in the facility in the relevant languages. Upon their arrival at the facility, each person goes through a reception interview, ascertaining his/her general condition, medical condition and the medications he/she uses. In addition, they receive explanation about what objects they may carry with them and are provided with a sheet, a towel, and hygiene products. The detained person maintains the right to make telephone calls, as well to meet with a lawyer and to be visited by his/her first-degree relatives and by consular representatives from his/her country of origin.

238. The stay at the facility is made in separate rooms for men and women (families are placed together in a designated room). During the stay at the facility, three (3) daily meals are served, while each person may request extra portions, both during the meals and throughout the day.

The Detention of Asylum Seekers

Legislation update

239. In recent years a legal and constitutional debate took place concerning detention of asylum seekers. On November 19, 2017, the Government approved a resolution to close the Holot facility within four (4) months and on March 2018, the facility was closed. As of this decision there are no asylum seekers held in Holot facility.

Saharonim Facility

240. Note that due to the Covid-19 Pandemic, 'Saharonim' was evacuated and most of the foreign detainees were transferred to the Giv'on facility.

241. With respect to the early identification of victims of torture and measures taken to ensure that such individuals are not detained in the context of asylum procedures, please see our Reply to Question No. 10 above and Question No. 35 below.

242. Section No. 56 to the Prisons Ordinance determines that an inmate who, inter alia, fought with another prisoner (56(1)), caused violence and dis-obedience (56(25)), participated in an attack against a warden or another inmate (56(26)), committed an attack or used force that amounts to an offence (56(33)), or committed any other act or behavior [...] harming the prison's order or discipline (56(41)), has committed a prison offence. Sections 57 and 58 to the Ordinance contain instructions regarding the way such offences are to be tried and the available sanctions in such cases. According to Section 58(a) to the Prisons Ordinance, for example, a prisoner that has engaged in violent acts against another prisoner may face myriad sanctions, including, inter alia, being given a warning, a fine, or being placed in isolation for up to fourteen (14) days. Section 58 also includes instructions in regard to cancellation or mitigation of the sanctions by the relevant authority in case there are special reasons that justify doing so.

243. In regard to prevention measures taken against violence between inmates - IPS Commission standing order No. 04.04.00 addresses the protection of prisoners whose life are endangered by other prisoners. This standing order specifies the reasons for defining an inmate in need of such protection and the authority of a district committee of the IPS to so decide. The order also stipulates instruction regarding the place of incarceration of inmate in need of such protection, the ability of an inmate to appeal against such protection and means of monitoring such protection within each IPS facility.

244. In addition, IPS Commission standing order No. 04.13.00 regarding discipline measures against prisoners, instruct that an inmate who, inter alia, fought with another prisoner, caused violence and disobedience, participated in an attack against a warden or another inmate, committed an attack or used force that amounts to an offence, or committed any other act or behavior [...] harming the prison's order or discipline, will be liable to disciplinary measures.

245. IPS Commission standing order No. 04.15.00 includes instruction regarding restraining measures against prisoners, including in an event when he/she is trying to harm themselves or other inmates, including in regard to the authority required for the use of such measure, limitation on the use of restraints, the requirement to report the use of such measure etc.

246. Also, IPS Commission standing order No. 03.09.00 mandates the obligation of reporting any incident that takes place within IPS facilities.

247. With respect to preventive measures, please see our reply to Question No. 1 above.

248. In regards to the transportation of detainees, following a petition filed by nine (9) female security detainees to the HCJ, and at the Court's request, the IPS has initiated an assessment of all transportation of prisoners, including, inter alia, transportation to and from courts and police stations, in order to evaluate the necessary steps for the full separation of female and male prisoners. Alongside the said assessment, the State informed the Court that the remedy sought by the applicants as per the separation of female security prisoners from male detainees, was unequivocally fulfilled with respect to transportation of security inmates to military courts in Salem and Ofer. Seeing as the Court's ruling requires gender-based separation among the entire prisoner population during transport, the State noted that the implementation of said remedy will require intricate and widespread coordination with all relevant actors, as well as designated funds.

249. In regards to detainees' access to laboratories during transportation, the State noted that prisoners may use the toilets at every stop. Further, staff are instructed to actively ask prisoners before every stop if they wish to use the laboratories. The said instruction is regulated in the Prisoners Living Conditions Order, a protocol followed by both IPS staff and the "Nachshon" Unit.

250. On June 18, 2020, the HCJ dismissed the petition on the grounds that the remedies requested by the petitioner are currently under review and are being properly addressed. The Court further noted that individuals will not be estopped from bringing claims in regards to these issues (HCJ 3354/17 Awiji et. al. v. Israel Prisons Service et. al. (18.6.2020) (merged with HCJ 5/19 Roan Dar Abu Matar et al. v. The Israel Prisons Service et. al.).

Death of an inmate within IPS facility

251. According to IPS Commission standing order No. 04.63.00, the death of an inmate will be announced by a physician, and the report on the death to the IPS and the Police is conducted according to IPS Commission standing order No. 03.09.00. The family of the inmate receives the news of the inmate's death through designated personnel, trained for the task, including at least two (2) IPS staff members. In rare cases, when the District Commander considers that the team would be endangered, he/she may allow informing the inmate's family via phone call.

252. In the case of the death of an inmate who is a resident of the West Bank and not an Israeli citizen, the Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories and the ICRC are notified. In the case of the death of an inmate who is a resident or citizen of a State that has diplomatic relations with Israel, the Consular Affairs Department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MoFA) is notified, and shall relay the information to the relevant consulate. In the case of the death of an inmate who is a resident or citizen of a State that does not have diplomatic relations with Israel, the ICRC is informed. In the case of the death of an inmate who was a soldier tried in a military court, the IPS shall inform the Military Police, who shall inform the family of the deceased.

253. An investigative committee, which includes a physician, is formed and tasked with examining the causes of death and the actions of IPS staff. The committee has access to the pathological report, where issued.

254. In addition, every detainee under the care of the IPS can file, inter alia, a complaint to the UIW, either by phone, in writing via a closed envelope which can be placed in a designated mailbox inside the prison, or through the Prison Director. The findings of the UIW are subject to the SAO scrutiny, who decides whether to institute disciplinary measures or criminal proceedings.

Death of an inmate in Police custody

255. The Department for Investigation of Police Officers (DIPO) is authorized to investigate suspected criminal offenses of Police officers for which the punishment exceeds one (1) year in prison. For data provided by the DIPO in this regard, please see Annex I.

IPS

Independent Monitoring of Detention Conditions

257. Every prisoner or detainee under the care of the IPS has access to the following complaint mechanisms concerning grievances regarding the staff and wardens, including claims of excessive use of force:

- Filing a complaint to the Prison Director;
- Petitioning the relevant District Court in a prisoner's petition;
- Filing a complaint to the UIW, through the IPS or directly to the UIW. The UIW was established under the Police so as to ensure a neutral investigation of claims concerning IPS personnel;
- Filing a complaint to the Prisoners Complaint Ombudsman, which is part of the MoPS's Internal Comptroller Unit.

258. For further information, please see Israel Fifth Periodic Report to the CAT (Question No. 30).

259. During the reporting period, the UIW has investigated 94 cases concerning allegations for use of unlawful force by wardens.

ISA

260. The ISA and its employees act within the limits of the law and are subject to both internal and external supervision and review, including by the State Comptroller, the Inspector at the MOJ, the AG, the SAO, the Knesset and every instance of the courts, including the HCJ.

261. The ISA operates in accordance with the ruling of the HCJ, and specifically the ruling concerning ISA interrogations from 1999 (H.C.J. 5100/94 The Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. The State of Israel).

262. Detainees undergoing ISA interrogation receive all the rights to which they are entitled according to Israeli law and international conventions to which Israel is a party, including the rights to legal representation, medical care and visits by the ICRC.

263. Furthermore, any case of alleged wrongdoing by an ISA investigator can be referred to the Courts and the Inspector.

264. Investigations of Alleged Cases of Torture - complaints submitted to the Inspector are examined independently and impartially. The Inspector conducts a thorough preliminary examination of such complaints. The preliminary inquiry process includes reviewing all the relevant documents, and interviewing the complainant and his/her interrogators, as needed. The Inspector's unit concludes its inquiry with a recommendation on the measures to be taken, such as: criminal investigation, prosecution, disciplinary action, drawing conclusions for the organization or recording the complaint.

265. Following such an examination, the Inspector's findings are transferred to the Inspector's supervisor, a senior advocate in the SAO, who examines if there is sufficient evidence to recommend opening an investigation. The decision whether to open such an investigation was delegated to the Deputy State Attorney (Special Affairs). A criminal investigation is opened upon a reasonable suspicion that an offence was committed, based on the existing evidence that were gathered by the Inspector.

266. The Inspector's preliminary inquiry process has been reviewed and approved by the HCJ (H.C.J. 11/1265 The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. The Attorney General (14.2.2011)) and its extensive and comprehensive work has been recognized in its ruling (H.C.J. 5722/12 As'ad Abu-Gosh v. The Attorney General (12.12.2017), H.C.J. 9018/17 Fares Tbeish et. Al. v. the Attorney General et. al. (26.11.18)).

267. The status of cases handled by the Inspector - Please see Annex I.

Positive updates concerning the Inspector

268. Currently, three (3) investigators are employed in the Inspector Unit, as well as an administrative coordinator and three (3) students, in addition to the Inspector.

269. In July 2016, the IPS Commissioner published an amendment to its standing order No. 02.39.00 titled "Rules of Conduct for IPS Wardens", in which Section 12 was added. This Section sets out the obligation of a warden to transfer any complaint or information regarding a suspicion against ISA interrogators, through the prison commander, to the Inspector. To date, several complaints have been filed through this channel.

270. In addition, as of July 2020, the online complaint form at the Inspector's webpage has been made available also in Arabic.

271. The leaflet of rights provided to every ISA interogatee has been updated to include the right of women to the presence of another woman during their interrogation.

272. As a general rule, the deadline for collecting statements from complainants shall not exceed 48 hours as of the moment the complaint was submitted.

273. The following measures were taken with respect to training:

(a) During 2020, one (1) of the unit's investigators participated in a juvenile investigators' training;

(b) Over 2020, the unit's investigators were trained through different simulations of questioning and investigations models. In addition, the investigators have visited the Police's forensic labs.

The Police

274. On November 8, 2020, the AG informed the Minister of Justice of amendments adopted to improve DIPO's procedures and timelines for handling complaints against Police personnel. These amendments include, among others, the shortening of the time for handling a complaint by DIPO's investigations section to 75 days, and the shortening of the time for handling cases by DIPO's prosecution section to six (6) months. In cases concerning hate crimes, racially motivated crimes and crimes against persons with disabilities, a unique arrangement has been agreed upon, according to which the time for handling a complaint by both the investigations and the prosecution sections in DIPO will be limited to four (4) months altogether. Where required, fixed terms were set for extensions of the said time limits, which may be granted subject to the approval of the certified authorities.

275. In addition, on November 18, 2020. The Minister of Justice has ordered the Director General of the MoJ, along with the Head of DIPO, to complete the personnel exchange process, so as to ensure that operating Police officers permanently posted in DIPO will no longer be employed therein. This is in order to ensure the neutrality of the investigations and to restore the public's trust in DIPO. The process is to be completed by the end of 2020, while two (2) high ranking Police officers have already been released from DIPO.

276. In order to improve DIPO's accessibility to complainants, an online complaint form has been published in DIPO's webpage during November 2020. The form is accessible to persons with disabilities, and will also be made available in Arabic.

277. For further information on recent State Attorney Guidelines concerning treatment of complaints made against Police personnel and for statistical data regarding the DIPO, please see Annex I.

Military Police

278. Complaints received regarding the conduct of Military Police officers in the course of their duties, including complaints regarding Military Police investigators, are handled by the Internal Investigation Unit, which is a military unit that is not subordinate to the Military Police Corps. This Unit works alongside the Military Prosecution Office. In addition, the Military Prosecution Office supervises the conduct of the Military Police based on reports it receives. In cases where exceptional events or inappropriate actions taken are revealed, the Military Prosecution examines the admissibility of the evidence, determining whether it should be disqualified from the criminal proceedings against the interrogatee, and whether the proceedings should be avoided altogether.

Reparation programmes for victims of severe violence and heinous crimes and ill-treatment

290. In general, in the offences of TIP and holding a person under conditions of slavery, the Law dictates that the Court must explain its decision to abstain from awarding compensation in the verdict – making compensation the default.

291. Section 77 of the Penal Law authorizes the courts to include, as part of the sentence, monetary compensation to the victim of an offence up to the limit of 258,000 NIS (approximately 72,937 USD). This legislation covers the possibility of monetary compensation for victims of an offence of torture or any other form of abuse and ill-treatment, as well as other offences.

292. At present, there are no specific monetary compensation measures that are available only to victims of torture or their families.

LAA

293. The LAA, operating under the auspices of the MoJ, has been representing victims of TIP (Section 377A of the Penal Law) and victims of the slavery offense (Section 375A of the Penal Law). Victims need not travel to the LAA offices; rather, the LAA staff regularly visits the detention facilities and the shelters, and collects their complaints.

294. Legal aid is granted free of charge, and the victims are exempted from the economic eligibility test as set by the Legal Aid Law 5732-1972, usually required in order to prove one's entitlement for free legal aid services.

295. The LAA represents victims in (1) damages and monetary claims against the offenders and in (2) procedures in accordance with the Entry into Israel Law (which include requests for a one (1) year stay permit for the purpose of rehabilitation, and requests for release from detention and for receiving a legal status in Israel).

296. During 2019, the LAA received a total of 89 referrals based on offenses of TIP and slavery, among them sixteen (16) referrals of Sinai victims.

The SAO

297. The SAO recognizes the importance of compensation for the victims, and works to ensure it is paid in practice. To that end, when making a plea bargain in TIP cases, the prosecution requires that the funds for victim compensation are deposited ahead of time, and before the agreement is presented to the court.

Dedicated Forfeiture Fund

298. The Anti-Trafficking Law (Legislation Amendments) 5767-2006 established a special Forfeiture Fund (hereafter: "The Forfeiture Fund"), where forfeited property and fines from TIP and slavery offenses are deposited and are dedicated to various causes in combating TIP—with a special emphasis on victim protection and compensation. Institutions, Government bodies and NGOs may apply for funds, as well as, uniquely, victims of the offences, who may ask for funds for the purposes of rehabilitation, as well as to request court ordered compensation which they have been unable to collect from the offenders. The Law gives precedence to victim protection, ordering that at least half of the funds each year be allocated to that purpose.

299. In 2018, the Forfeiture Fund was not able to accept requests, as no new assets or funds were deposited. However, it continued to pay out and follow up on requests from previous years. On October 31, 2019 the Committee concluded its assessment of around 60 new requests which were submitted to it, and the total sum of the fund, 420,000 NIS (121,800 USD), was distributed between them.

The inter-ministerial pilot mapping project relating to the victims of severe violence and heinous crimes in the Sinai camps

300. Between 2009 and 2014, a significant number of migrants, mostly from Sudan, Eritrea, and Ethiopia, were kidnapped by foreign nationals to Sinai, some while travelling through Egypt and some from their countries of origin. Their kidnappers would often use severe violence and heinous crimes against their victims to obtain their relatives' phone numbers in order to demand ransoms. Approximately 500 victims of the Sinai camps have been recognized as trafficking or slavery victims since arriving in Israel, and they are thus granted the full protection and aid previously outlined. In 2019, three (3) victims of the Sinai camps have been recognized as trafficking victims. The distinction between Sinai victims who are also recognized as being victims of slavery or TIP, and those who do not fall within that definition, is based on the wording of Section 377a and Section 375a of the Penal Law, which set the legal criteria for TIP and slavery offences, respectively.

301. Between 2017 and 2018, the Ministry of Justice led an inter-ministerial pilot mapping project in order to identify the number, characteristics, and needs of Sinai victims who were not recognized as TIP victims but remain in a severe humanitarian condition. The inter-ministerial team included officials from the MoH, the MoLSAaSS, the PIA and the LAA at the MoJ, and was headed by the NATU.

302. The inter-ministerial team conducted in-depth examinations of 102 Sinai victims referred to it by relevant civil society organizations as being in a severe humanitarian condition. Following these examinations, the team formulated several ministry-specific responses to assist this population, as well as an identification mechanism to determine the total size of the group of Sinai victims who were not recognized as trafficking victims but who are in a severe humanitarian condition. After extensive analysis, in collaboration with the relevant NGOs, it was determined that this group includes less than 300 individuals, and so a rehabilitation program for a maximum of 300 persons was devised to comprehensively treat this population.

303. The rehabilitation program proposed by the inter-ministerial team received ministerial approval, subject to the passing of a GR. However, although the wording of the GR was drafted and agreed upon, and the rehabilitation program was authorized subject to the MoF's approval, the Government was ultimately dispersed for the first election of 2019 before the GR could be voted on. To date, the draft GR is still being discussed, largely due to the electoral events of 2019–2020 and the current Covid-19 Pandemic.

304. Identification of victims of TIP or slavery from the Sinai camps raises certain challenges. This is because, in most cases, the atrocities took place many years ago, outside Israeli borders, so access to evidence is severely limited. Nevertheless, the LAA, the Police and the NATU invest great efforts in order to streamline the screening process, identify the victims and provide them with the appropriate care. For example, the NATU has held a series of inter-ministerial meetings aimed at improving the identification process and interviews held by the PIA officials, making sure the interview is held with maximum sensitivity, including gender-based sensitivity, and privacy, encouraging the victims to supply relevant information. Subsequently, a new questionnaire basis was distributed, enabling the streamlining of a more sensitive interview.

305. In addition, several seminars and trainings on the treatment of Sinai victims have been conducted in recent years, in all relevant bodies and authorities, including judges and court personnel of the DRTs, judges and staff of the Appeals Tribunals, staff of the IPS and officials of the PIA.

Israel's Investigation and Prosecution of Ideologically Motivated Offences Against Palestinians in the West Bank

311. Israel has a deep commitment to the rule of law. In recent years, Israel has taken extensive measures to prevent violence in general, and against Palestinians in particular. In addition, efforts have been made to investigate criminal complaints and to prosecute perpetrators when appropriate. In particular, Israeli officials, including high-ranking politicians and senior officials from law-enforcement bodies, have declared an unequivocal zero-tolerance policy towards the phenomenon of "price-tag" offences by Israeli extremists against Palestinians.

312. In recent years, Israeli authorities made considerable efforts to enhance law enforcement in the West Bank, which have led to a significant decrease in ideologically-based offences and an increase in the number of investigations and the rate of prosecution. These efforts included the establishment of designated taskforces, increased allocation of funds, and the addition of professional manpower.

318. In addition, over the past few years, the annual training program of the Military Law School includes training in the form of a legal lecture on courses and educational conferences of the “Erez” and “Taoz” Crossings battalions in the Military Police Corps; the lecture is aimed at the command level, ranging from the sergeant level to the battalion commander level (Lieutenant Colonel). In the lecture, the following topics are discussed:

(a) The legal framework for the crossings forces activities, with an emphasis on the characteristics of the routine security operations;

(b) Obligations and authorities of the crossings forces, including the powers of holding, detention, search, duty of intervention and prohibition of standing by in the face of a threat to the wellbeing, body or life of a person;

(c) Major offenses and their characteristics, including the prohibition of abuse of authority and the prohibition of inflicting harm on persons in custody;

(d) Obligations relating to crime scene examinations, obligations regarding documentation, reporting and cooperating with investigative institutions.

319. Complaints regarding the conduct of a crossings soldier can be received via two (2) channels: (1) the submission of a complaint to the Internal Investigation Unit; (2) the submission of an inquiry to the military commander through public inquiries. Such inquiries also reach the MAG in the West Bank. Upon the arrival of an inquiry regarding the conduct of a crossings soldier, it is transferred to the examination of the relevant entities – the commander of the relevant crossings battalion and the other relevant commanders, in order to examine the complaints and to investigate them.

320. In accordance with the above, a decision is made regarding the steps to be taken: clarification of procedures, disciplinary action or criminal prosecution.

The return of bodies of deceased Palestinians to their relatives

321. With respect to the burial of the remains of terrorists, on September 9, 2019, the HCJ ruled that the Military Commander is authorized to order a temporary burial of enemy soldiers or terrorists remains, while protecting the dignity of the deceased and of his/her family, for reasons of State security and the safety of its citizens, for the purpose of negotiating the return of Israeli soldiers (dead or alive) and Israeli citizens held by the terrorist organizations. For information on the events leading to this decision in the cases of H.C.J. 4466/16 Mohamad Alian et. al. v. The IDF Commander of the West Bank et. al. (14.12.17) and Ad.H.H.C.J 10190/17 The IDF Commander of the West Bank et. al. v. Mohamad Alian et. al. (9.9.19), please see Annex I.

322. On September 2, 2020, the Security Cabinet adopted a resolution which amended the conditions under which remains of terrorists will be returned. This resolution, along with other issues in this context, is currently the subject of ongoing judicial proceedings before the HCJ.

Amendments to the Counter-Terrorism Law

323. With respect to the Counter-Terrorism Law, which was enacted on June 15, 2016, on March 7, 2018, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 3 to the Law in which, among other things, it vested a Police District Commander with the authority to issue an order authorizing to delay the transfer of a terrorist's body to his/her relatives for up to ten (10) days for one (1) of the following three (3) grounds: a reasonable threat that the funeral will cause serious harm to life; a reasonable threat of the commission of a terrorist act; or a reasonable threat of incitement to terrorism or identification with a terrorist organization or a terrorist act during the funeral. Such an order may be extended from time to time, as necessary, by the Police General Commissioner until the implementation of the terms set for the funeral (Section 70B).

324. Prior to this Amendment, the Police relied on Sections 3 and 4A to the Police Ordinance to delay the provision of a terrorist's remains to his/her relatives for the purpose of protecting public order. However, in the Jabarin case the HCJ ruled that these sections do not constitute sufficient legal basis for such delay and explicit legal authorization is required for such action (H.C.J. 5887/17 Ahmad Moussa Jabarin et. al. v. The Israeli Police et. al. (25.7.17)). In addition, this Amendment also vested the Police with the authority to set terms in regard to a funeral of a person who committed or attempted to commit a terrorist act and subsequently died ("a Terrorist"). According to this Amendment, a Police District Commander is authorized to issue an order setting certain conditions in regard to a funeral of a terrorist, for the purpose of protecting the safety and the security of the public, including the prevention of riots, incitement to terrorism or identification with a terrorist organization or a terrorist act. Such conditions may refer to the number and identity of the funeral participants, the funeral time and date, its route and in certain cases the place of burial, while considering the family's position on this issue. A Police District Commander may also order to deposit a guarantee in order to ensure the implementation of these conditions (Section 70A).

Protection of Journalists

326. The State of Israel attaches great importance to the protection of the freedom of journalism, as part of the freedom of expression, which constitutes a fundamental right in its legal system.

Human rights defenders and aspects relating to freedom of expression in Israel

327. Israel has an active civil society, with hundreds of NGOs operating in a large number of issues, including human rights issues. Israel, as a democratic society, places no legal restrictions on the right of organizations to engage in activities for the promotion and observance of human rights, which fully enjoy the freedom to associate and to pursue their various aims, according to the applicable law.

328. There is no dispute however, that an organization or an individual that presents itself as a human rights organization/activist/defender is not exempt from obeying the law. In any case, each individual is afforded the rights and protections provided by law, including the different aspects of the right to due process.

329. Cooperation with Civil Society Organizations- NGOs in Israel maintain a constructive discourse with different Government authorities, and are active in initiating legislation, in raising awareness and in assisting the promotion of human rights in policy building, inter-ministerial teams and more, in various aspects of life: social economic rights, civil rights, women rights and more. The Government constantly strives to enhance cooperation with human rights NGOs on different issues.

330. Since 2012, the MoJ and the MoFA, together with the Minerva Center for Human Rights at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, have been participating in a project centered on the reporting process to the UN Human Rights Treaty Bodies. Meetings attended by representatives of Government ministries, NGOs and academics are held, in which NGOs are invited to comment on drafts of Government reports. NGOs are also encouraged to submit shadow reports to the committees.

331. In 2017, as part of the ongoing cooperation between civil society and Government authorities, the MoJ and MoFA initiated a “Round Tables” project. This project included six (6) discussion sessions, which offered a unique platform for open discourse between civil society, academics and Government representatives on core human rights issues including LGBT rights; issues affecting Israelis of Ethiopian descent; the Bedouin population; women’s rights; rights of persons with disabilities; and social and economic rights in the periphery.

332. In September 2017, the AG penned a letter to members of the Government and to the CEO of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, emphasizing the importance of professional discourse between state authorities and civil society including by way of participation of public servants in relevant events and conventions. Such collaboration, as the AG stated, contributes greatly to the promotion of the public interest.

333. Freedom of Assembly- please see Israel’s Fifth Periodic Report to the CAT (Question No. 15).

334. In this regard, AG Guideline 3.1200, which was last updated in March 2010, further requires the allocation of Police forces with the objective of protecting the demonstration and its participants from any form of external harassment. For information on the HCJ ruling in the case of The Movement for Quality Government in Israel v. The Police (H.C.J. 6536/17), please see Annex I.

Reply to paragraph 42 of the list of issues

335. Israel’s reservation to Article 20, which pertains to the confidential inquiry mechanism based on information received by the Committee, is reviewed periodically. At present, Israel maintains its position on this matter.

336. Despite periodic consideration of its position on the matter, Israel is not planning on ratifying the Optional Protocol at this stage. As detailed above and in the previous reports, Israel’s legal system affords numerous opportunities, for individual and groups alike, to seek remedies and redress for any alleged violations of CAT. This equally applies to people in detention or imprisonment, who have various internal and judicial mechanisms available should they feel their rights have been infringed.

337. For the reasons mentioned above, at present, Israel is also not planning on making the declarations provided for under Articles 21 and 22 of the Convention.

The Counter-Terrorism Law (and Amendment No. 3)

338. With respect to the Counter-Terrorism Law (and Amendment No. 3), which was enacted on June 15, 2016, as part of Israel’s ongoing battle against terrorism, the law is part of an effort to provide law enforcement authorities with more effective tools to combat modern terrorist threats while incorporating additional checks and balances necessary to safeguard against inappropriate violations of individual human rights. The Law provides, inter alia, updated definitions of “terrorist organization”, “terrorist act” and “membership in a terrorist organization”, detailed regulations for the process of designating terrorist organizations, and enhanced enforcement tools, both criminal and financial. The Law nullified previous legislation in the field of counter-terrorism such as the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance 5708-1948, that was linked to a state of emergency. Additional legislation is currently being reviewed and amended in order to disconnect it from a state of emergency. This law does not create discrimination on the grounds of gender, race, color, decent or national or ethnic origin and does not subject individuals to racial or ethnic profiling or stereotyping.

339. Indictments pursuant to the Counter Terrorism Law- Please see Annex I.

Training provided to law enforcement officers on the Counter-Terrorism Law

340. As part of the ISA training process, lessons, lectures and training sessions are given to employees on all matters pertaining to international law, with an emphasis on human rights relevant to their practice. The same standards are also reflected in the ISA Investigation Supervision Mechanism, which is responsible for thoroughly investigating any claim raised by an interrogatee regarding any deviation from the observance of human rights and human dignity (for further elaboration, see our reply to Question 33 above).

341. In addition, the MoJ has conducted trainings concerning the Law for attorneys working at the SAO in 2016, following its adoption, as well as on May 1, 2018. The MoJ also heads a security forum, composed of all State Attorney's Offices and security bodies, which convenes four (4) times a year, where information and training on subjects relating to security-related offences and, inter alia, the Counter-Terrorism Law, are delivered.

342. With respect to prison conditions and the rehabilitation process of inmates, the case of Pr.P. 4051-01-19 Kariv v. Israel Prisons Service (District Court Lod) (10.5.20) indicates a positive institutional development in this field. For information on the said case, please see Annex I.

Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Distr.: General

Committee against Torture

Concluding observations on the initial report of the State of Palestine*

1. The Committee considered the initial report of the State of Palestine¹ at its 1921st and 1924th meetings,² held on 19 and 20 July 2022, and adopted the present concluding observations at its 1932nd and 1933rd meetings, held on 26 and 27 July 2022.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the initial report of the State party, along with the supplementary information provided during the consideration of the initial report. It regrets, however, that the report was submitted more than four years late.

3. The Committee appreciates having had the opportunity to engage in a constructive dialogue with the State party's delegation and the responses provided to the questions and concerns raised during the consideration of the initial report.

4. The Committee recognizes that the ongoing Israeli occupation of the territory of the State party, the expansion of settlements and the continued blockade of the Gaza Strip, which are illegal under international law,³ pose severe challenges for the State party in fully implementing its obligations under the Convention and lead to grave violations of the rights of Palestinians, such as arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment, excessive use of force and abuse by Israeli security forces, acts of violence by Israeli settlers, restrictions on freedom of movement, forced displacement and evictions, seizure of private land, house demolitions and illegal settlements, restrictions on gaining access to health-care services and denial of access to humanitarian aid. The Committee recalls the obligations of Israel, as the occupying Power, under international humanitarian law and international human rights law.⁴ It recognizes that the above-mentioned challenges limit the State party's effective control of its jurisdiction over its own territory and its capacity to effectively prevent and combat torture and ill-treatment. However, it reminds the State party that the Convention is applicable in its entire territory and that the State party should take all possible measures to implement it in all parts of the territory. In that regard, the Committee regrets that, notwithstanding the agreement between the Fatah and Hamas movements to end Palestinian division signed on 12 October 2017, the State party has made limited progress in resolving internal political issues that negatively affect the full enjoyment by Palestinians in the West Bank, including

East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip of their rights under the Convention and contribute to the political and geographic fragmentation of the State party's territory. It notes that, owing to this fragmentation, Palestinians continue to be subjected to multiple legal systems that impede the full realization of their rights under the Convention.⁵

5. The Committee welcomes the accession to or ratification of the following international instruments by the State party since its accession to the Convention:

(a) The Convention on the Rights of the Child and its Optional Protocol on the involvement of children in armed conflict, on 2 April 2014;

(b) The Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, on 29 December 2017;

(n) The Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, on 29 December 2017.

6. The Committee welcomes the State party's initiatives to revise and introduce legislation in areas of relevance to the Convention, including the adoption of the following:

(a) Amendments to the Personal Status Law, in 2019, which increase the minimum age of marriage for girls and boys to 18 years;

(b) Decree-Law No. 4 on the protection of Palestinian juveniles, in 2016.

7. The Committee commends the State party's initiatives to amend its policies and procedures in order to afford greater protection of human rights and to apply the Convention, in particular the following:

⁵ CERD/C/PSE/CO/1-2, paras. 3-4; CRC/C/PSE/CO/1, paras. 4-5; and CEDAW/C/PSE/CO/1, paras. 9-10.

- (a) The strategic plan for the protection of children (2018–2022) and the sectoral strategy on juvenile justice;
- (b) The intersectoral plan for gender equality and justice (2017–2022);
- (c) The national observatory to study violence against women, in 2016;
- (d) The national strategy for justice and rule of law (2014–2016);
- (e) The strategic plan for combating violence against women (2011–2019);
- (f) The Special Prosecutor’s Office to combat gender-based violence against women and girls.

D. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

Legal status of the Convention

8. While commending the State party for ratifying the Convention without reservations, the Committee is concerned about the interpretation of the Supreme Constitutional Court, in its decisions No. 4 (2017) of 19 November 2017 and No. 5 (2018) of 12 March 2018, according to which international treaties acceded to by the State party take precedence over national legislation only insofar as they are consistent with the national, religious and cultural identity of the Palestinian Arab people, which may impede the enjoyment of the rights set forth in the Convention. The Committee is also concerned that the Convention has not yet been published in the Official Gazette to make it enforceable in the State party⁶ (arts. 2 and 4).

9. The State party should:

(a) Fully and expeditiously incorporate the provisions of the Convention into its national law, including through publication in the Official Gazette, and take all possible measures to ensure its implementation throughout its territory;

(b) Ensure that the interpretation of the Supreme Constitutional Court, in its decisions No. 4 of 19 November 2017 (2017) and No. 5 (2018) of 12 March 2018 and their application, do not prevent people living in the territory of the State party from fully enjoying their rights under the Convention.

Harmonization of legislation and compliance with the Convention

10. While welcoming the establishment in 2017 of a legislative harmonization committee to review all laws to ensure their compliance with the human rights treaties to which the State party has acceded, including the Convention, the Committee is concerned that this committee has only reviewed selected laws and that no timeline has been established to fully harmonize domestic legislation with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee is also concerned that:

(a) The Palestinian Legislative Council was dissolved by the Supreme Constitutional Court, in its decision No. 10 on 12 December 2018;

(b) Since the suspension of the Council in 2006, the State party has legislated by decree-laws issued by the President, which are neither recognized nor enforced in the Gaza Strip, leading to further fragmentation of the legal system and subjecting Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, to multiple sets of laws affording varying levels of protection;

(c) No time frame has been set for the review and adoption of draft laws, such as the draft penal code, the draft criminal procedure code, the draft decree-law on family protection, the draft personal status code and the draft decree-law on the rights of persons with disabilities⁷ (arts. 2 and 4).

11. The Committee urges the State party to:

(a) Restore the democratic legislative process to facilitate the harmonization of the different sets of laws implemented in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, to ensure that all persons living under the jurisdiction of the State party are protected equally under the law;

(b) Adopt a clear time frame for the completion of the review of the existing legislative framework, in collaboration with civil society organizations, to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Convention;

(c) Expedite the review of draft laws, including the draft penal code, the draft criminal procedure code, the draft decree-law on family protection and the draft decree-law on the rights of persons with disabilities to ensure their compliance with the Convention and their adoption.

Definition and criminalization of torture

12. The Committee notes that torture is explicitly prohibited under article 13.1 of the Palestinian Basic Law 2003 and that such prohibition may be inferred from a number of existing laws.⁸ It also notes that a comprehensive definition of torture in conformity with that provided for in article 1 of the Convention was included in Decree-Law No. 25 on the National Commission against Torture, which was published in the Official Gazette on 25 May 2022. However, the Committee is concerned that torture is considered a misdemeanour and that punishments are not commensurate with the gravity of the acts and are subject to amnesty as well as to statutes of limitations (arts. 1 and 4).

13. The State party should ensure that its criminal legislation, including the draft penal code, encompasses a definition of torture that covers all the elements contained in article 1 of the Convention. The State party should also ensure that acts of torture are punishable by appropriate penalties that take into account their grave nature, in accordance with article 4 (2) of the Convention, and are not subject to amnesty or pardon. Moreover, the State party should ensure that the scope of the definition of torture is extended to anyone who attempts to commit torture or who is complicit or participates in torture. In that regard, the Committee wishes to draw the State party's attention to its general comment No. 2 (2007), in which it pointed out that serious discrepancies between the definition in the Convention and the definition in domestic law created actual or potential loopholes for impunity. Furthermore, the State party is invited to amend its domestic legislation to incorporate a provision on the non-applicability of statutes of limitations to the crime of torture.

Absolute prohibition of torture

14. The Committee is concerned that there is no clear provision in the State party's legislation to ensure that the prohibition against torture is absolute and non-derogable. It is also concerned that, according to the Jordanian Penal Code of 1960 and the British Mandate Penal Code of 1936, which are applicable in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, respectively, as well as the Palestinian Revolutionary Penal Code of 1979, which is applicable in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, a person may be exempt from criminal liability for acts of torture or ill-treatment if such acts are perpetrated while obeying an order issued by a competent authority that must be obeyed by law, unless that order is illegal. The Committee regrets the lack of information on whether mechanisms or procedures for protecting subordinates from reprisals exist so as to enable them to refuse to obey illegal orders in practice (art. 2).

⁷ CERD/C/PSE/CO/1-2, paras. 13–14; CRC/C/PSE/CO/1, paras. 8–9; CEDAW/C/PSE/CO/1, paras. 14–15.

15. The State party should ensure that the principle of absolute prohibition of torture is incorporated into its legislation and that it is strictly applied, in accordance with article 2 (2) of the Convention. The State party should also ensure that an order from a superior officer may not be invoked as justification for torture and, to that end, establish a mechanism for the protection of subordinates who refuse to obey such an order and ensure that all law enforcement officers are informed of the prohibition against obeying unlawful orders and are made aware of the protective mechanisms put in place.

State of emergency

16. While taking note of the state of emergency declared by the State party on 5 March 2020 to protect public health, following the onset of the coronavirus disease (COVID-19) pandemic, the Committee is concerned that the continuous extension of the state of emergency to date, through the regular adoption of new declarations by presidential decrees and decree-laws, does not meet the requirements set forth in the Basic Law of 2003,⁹ raising concerns about the legality of the emergency measures taken in response to the pandemic. It is also concerned at allegations that human rights defenders, journalists, political opponents and government critics have been subjected to excessive use of force and arbitrary arrest and detention under such emergency measures (art. 2).

17. The State party should limit the declaration and duration of a state of emergency to situations in which it is strictly necessary and at all times respect the provisions of the Convention, recalling that no exceptional circumstances may be invoked as a justification for torture.

National human rights commission

18. While noting that the Independent Commission for Human Rights has been granted “A” status by the Global Alliance of National Human Rights Institutions since 2015, the Committee is concerned that the draft law formalizing the establishment of the Commission has not yet been adopted, notwithstanding its submission to the Palestinian Legislative Council in 2005.¹⁰ It is also concerned that the resources allocated to the Commission are insufficient to allow it to perform all its functions effectively, notably its role in conducting visits to places of detention and in receiving and investigating complaints about alleged human rights violations. Moreover, the Committee is concerned that the mandate of the Commission does not allow it to conduct unannounced visits to places of deprivation of liberty. It is further concerned about the lack of information regarding concrete measures taken by the State party to ensure effective implementation of the Commission’s recommendations, in particular with regard to follow-up investigations, prosecutions and the outcome of cases referred by the Commission to the prosecution services concerning torture allegations (art. 2 (1)).

19. The State party should formalize in law the establishment of the Independent Commission for Human Rights and take the necessary measures to ensure the Commission’s functional independence by guaranteeing it an adequate budget that allows it to fulfil the mandate entrusted to it, in conformity with the principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (the Paris Principles). The State party should also ensure that the Commission is able to conduct unannounced and regular visits to all detention facilities in the State party. Lastly, the State party should take all necessary measures to ensure effective implementation of the Commission’s recommendations and, in particular, follow up on complaints of torture lodged with the Commission, undertake effective investigations and prosecutions of perpetrators and provide redress to victims.

¹⁰ CERD/C/PSE/CO/1-2, paras. 15–16.

Fundamental legal safeguards

20. While taking note of the procedural safeguards to prevent torture and ill-treatment that are enshrined in the Basic Law of 2003 and Criminal Procedure Code of 2001, the Committee regrets the absence of an explicit provision on the right to have access to a lawyer immediately upon arrest and that articles 97 and 98 of the Criminal Procedure Code allow the interrogation of detainees without the presence of a lawyer “in the event of a flagrant crime, necessity, urgency, or fear that the evidence may be lost”. It is also concerned about reports indicating that persons in custody are not routinely afforded all fundamental legal safeguards from the very outset of deprivation of liberty, in practice in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. In that respect, it has been reported that: (a) lawyers are sometimes not allowed to meet with their clients during the period of the investigation; (b) timely access to an independent medical examination is not a standard practice aimed at uncovering signs of torture and ill-treatment, in particular for persons in pretrial detention; (c) the right to notify a relative or a person of one’s choice is often delayed; and (d) arrested persons are often brought before the competent authority several days or even weeks after their arrest, well beyond the 24-hour legal limit, extendable for another 48 hours, which may leave suspects vulnerable to an increased risk of torture or ill-treatment. The Committee is further concerned about reports that, in February 2022, the President of the State party signed five decree-laws amending the Criminal Procedure Code No. 3 of 2001, the Civil Procedure Code No. 2 of 2001, the Law on Evidence No. 4 of 2001, the Law on Formation of Courts No. 5 of 2001 and the Judicial Authority Law No. 1 of 2002, which raise concerns regarding the protection of the principle of presumption of innocence, the renewal of pretrial detention without the presence of the defendant or his or her lawyer, the right of defence and the imposition of a higher accountability threshold for crimes committed by public servants and law enforcement officials (art. 2).

21. The State party should:

(a) Ensure that all persons deprived of their liberty are afforded, in law and in practice, all fundamental legal safeguards from the very outset of their detention, including notably:

- (i) Being informed of the reasons for the arrest and the nature of any charges against them, in a language that they understand;
- (ii) Being informed of and having their right guaranteed to unimpeded access to an independent lawyer of their choice or, if necessary, to free legal aid of adequate quality, including during the initial interrogation and inquiry;
- (iii) Having the right to request and receive an independent and confidential medical examination, free of charge, or by a doctor of their choice upon request;
- (iv) Having their medical records immediately brought to the attention of a prosecutor as an object of investigation whenever the findings or allegations may indicate torture or ill-treatment;
- (v) Being able to notify a family member, or any other person of their choice, of their detention immediately after apprehension;
- (vi) Being brought before a judge within the time frame prescribed by law;
- (vii) Being registered at the place of detention;
- (viii) Being able to challenge the legality of their detention at any stage of the proceedings;

(b) Establish a central register of detention for all detainees at all stages of their deprivation of liberty, including during transfers to different places of detention, and indicate the type of information recorded and the specific measures taken to ensure accurate record-keeping as an important safeguard against incommunicado detention and enforced disappearance;

(c) Review the five decree-laws amending the Criminal Procedure Code No. 3 of 2001, the Civil Procedure Code No. 2 of 2001, the Law on Evidence No. 4 of 2001, the Law on Formation of Courts No. 5 of 2001 and the Judicial Authority Law No. 1 of

2002, in consultation with the Independent Commission for Human Rights and civil society organizations, to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Convention;

(d) Provide information to the Committee on the number of complaints received regarding failure to respect fundamental legal safeguards and on the outcome of such complaints, including the disciplinary measures taken against officials who fail to afford fundamental legal safeguards, in the next periodic report.

Arbitrary detention

22. The Committee is concerned about reported cases of persons detained in the West Bank under the custody of the Joint Operations Committee¹¹ who have been kept in detention despite release orders issued by the courts. It is concerned that those detainees were only released once a written approval was provided by the President of the Palestinian Authority or the Prime Minister for their release (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

23. The State party should take all necessary measures to ensure that all judicial orders to release individuals from detention are promptly implemented, including those concerning individuals detained under the custody of the Joint Operations Committee.

Administrative detention

24. The Committee is greatly concerned at the continuous recourse to administrative detention by the State party under the Jordanian Crimes Prevention Act of 1954, which is applicable in the West Bank and allows for detention without charge, and raises issues about the separation of powers between the executive and judicial branches. It is particularly concerned at the increasing number of persons held in administrative detention and for long periods, during which detainees are deprived of procedural guarantees. It is also concerned that administrative detention is used against women and girls who are victims of violence, under the pretext of protecting them (arts. 1, 2, 11 and 16).

25. The State party should abolish the practice of “protective custody” in cases of gender-based violence. It should also ensure that all detainees, including those kept in any form of administrative detention, are afforded, in law and in practice, all fundamental procedural safeguards from the very outset of their deprivation of liberty. The State party should develop and implement alternatives to administrative detention and should use detention only as a last resort and, when detention is necessary and proportionate, for as short a period as possible. The State party should take immediate measures to amend or repeal the Jordanian Crimes Prevention Act of 1954 with a view to bringing it into compliance with international human rights standards and with the State party’s obligations under the Convention.

Unofficial places of detention

26. The Committee is concerned about reports that individuals are held in unlawful and incommunicado detention by Palestinian armed groups, including the military wing of the Hamas Al Qassam brigades and the Islamic Jihad military wing Saraya Al Quds, for “collaboration with the enemy” and criticizing armed groups. It is further concerned about allegations of torture and ill-treatment being perpetrated in such unofficial places of detention (arts. 2 and 11).

27. The State party should take all possible measures to ensure that no one is held in unofficial places of detention on its territory, including by non-State actors. The Committee urges the State party to investigate the existence of any unofficial detention places and identify those who establish and maintain them and engage in practices of torture.

¹¹ The Joint Operations Committee (formerly known as the Joint Security Committee) serves as a joint structure of the Palestinian security services, with the stated aim of centralizing the investigation of security-related crimes and those involving members of the security forces.

Allegations of widespread torture or ill-treatment and the lack of accountability

28. The Committee is concerned about consistent reports indicating that persons in custody, including in the facilities under the authority of the security forces and intelligence services in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, are subjected to torture or ill-treatment, in particular during the investigation stage of proceedings. It observes that the mechanisms established by the State party to receive and investigate complaints of torture and ill-treatment by officials lack confidentiality and fail to protect complainants and witnesses, while existing investigation bodies, principally the Public Prosecutor, lack the necessary independence as they belong to the same structure that employs the alleged perpetrators. The Committee is also concerned that only a few complaints of torture and ill-treatment have led to prosecution and almost none to conviction of the perpetrators, which contributes to a climate of impunity (arts. 2, 11–13 and 16).

29. The State party is urged to immediately adopt measures to ensure accountability for all acts of torture or ill-treatment involving all perpetrators by undertaking prompt, impartial and effective investigations into complaints through an independent mechanism that complies with the requirement of institutional independence in order to avoid conflicts of interest in the investigation of complaints by peers, by prosecuting perpetrators of such violence and by punishing them with appropriate penalties. The State party is also urged to ensure, in practice and as required under applicable law, that persons under investigation for having committed acts of torture or ill-treatment are immediately suspended from their duties and remain so throughout the investigation. The State party should conduct investigations on its own initiative, whenever there are reasonable grounds to believe that an act of torture or ill-treatment has been committed, put in place an independent, effective, confidential and accessible complaints mechanism in all places of detention, including police custody facilities and prisons, and ensure that complainants are protected against any ill-treatment, intimidation or reprisals as a consequence of their complaint. The State party should also compile and disseminate up-to-date statistics on the complaints filed, investigations conducted, prosecutions initiated and convictions handed down in cases involving allegations of torture and ill-treatment.

Confessions obtained through torture and ill-treatment

30. The Committee is concerned about reports indicating that, despite the existing legal provisions set forth in article 13.2 of the Basic Law regarding the inadmissibility of evidence obtained by torture and duress, coerced confessions are reportedly admitted as evidence in court. Moreover, the information before the Committee suggests that the allegations of forced confessions under torture or ill-treatment made before a trial or appeal judge are often ignored and not thoroughly pursued and that serious shortcomings in documenting signs of physical and psychological torture are often caused by the lapse of time between the alleged event and its belated investigation (art. 15).

31. The State party should ensure in practice that confessions obtained through torture or ill-treatment are ruled inadmissible, except when they are used as evidence against a person accused of committing torture, and that such cases are investigated. It should expand specialized training programmes for both judges and prosecutors to ensure their ability to effectively identify torture and ill-treatment and investigate all allegations of such acts; develop training modules for law enforcement officers on non-coercive interviewing and investigation techniques; provide the Committee with information on any cases in which confessions were deemed inadmissible on the grounds that they had been obtained through torture or ill-treatment; and indicate whether any officials have been prosecuted and punished for extracting such confessions.

Excessive use of force against demonstrators

32. The Committee is concerned about the allegations of the excessive use of force in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, notably the use of lethal weapons resulting in deaths and injuries, including of children, arbitrary arrests, incommunicado detention and torture and ill-treatment of peaceful protesters by the security forces, as well as by unidentified armed elements in the context of demonstrations that have occurred while enforcing measures designed to control the COVID-19 pandemic and in the aftermath of the postponement of national elections in April 2021 and Nizar Banat's death in custody in June 2021. The Committee is also concerned about the reported excessive use of force by the Palestinian security forces, including the use of tear gas and sound bombs, in Palestinian refugee camps. The Committee takes note of the State party's commitment to ensuring accountability for the above acts. However, it regrets the lack of public reports on the investigations carried out into those incidents, the limited progress made on investigations and the fact that only a handful of prosecutions have been undertaken to date (arts. 2, 12–14 and 16).

33. The State party should:

(a) Review domestic legislation on the use of force and weapons and develop clear guidelines, if necessary, incorporating the principles of lawfulness, necessity and proportionality and the precautionary principle, bring the laws and regulations governing the use of force into line with international standards, in particular the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials and the United Nations Human Rights Guidance on Less-Lethal Weapons in Law Enforcement, and provide systematic training to all law enforcement officers on these international standards;

(b) Ensure that law and order is maintained, to the greatest extent possible, by the civilian authorities and that all officers can be effectively identified at all times when carrying out their functions to help to ensure individual accountability and protection against acts of torture and ill-treatment;

(c) Ensure that prompt, impartial and effective investigations are undertaken into all allegations relating to the excessive use of force by State and non-State actors, and ensure that the perpetrators are prosecuted and that the victims or their families receive full redress.

Human rights defenders, journalists and political opponents

34. The Committee is concerned that human rights defenders, including advocates for women's rights, journalists, bloggers, political opponents and government critics continue to report acts of intimidation, harassment, violence, arbitrary arrest and detention, prosecution and torture or ill-treatment by the security forces and intelligence agencies in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. It is concerned by the lack of effective protection provided by the State party to human rights defenders, journalists, political opponents and civil society actors at risk, including by promptly, effectively and impartially investigating, prosecuting and punishing such crimes. It also regrets the lack of information about measures to ensure the promotion of the civic space, where individuals can meaningfully exercise their right to freedom of expression and association and promote human rights in a safe environment (arts. 2, 12, 13 and 16).

35. The State party should ensure that human rights defenders, including women human rights defenders, journalists, bloggers, political opponents and government critics are protected from acts of intimidation, harassment, violence, arbitrary arrest and detention, prosecution and torture or ill-treatment to which they may be exposed because of their activities, and should take all measures to promptly, effectively and impartially investigate any such allegations and punish those responsible. It should also take additional measures to promote the civic space.

Conditions of detention

36. While acknowledging the steps taken by the State party to improve conditions in places of detention, the Committee is concerned about reports indicating overcrowding and poor material conditions in places of deprivation of liberty, in particular insalubrity and inadequate hygiene, lack of ventilation, water supply and sanitation problems, the poor quality of the food provided, shortages in medical and health-care services, including mental health care, and limited recreational or educational activities to foster rehabilitation. Of particular concern are the unsuitable material conditions of detention for women and girls, notably pregnant women and women with babies, in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The Committee is further concerned about the reported prolonged use of solitary confinement and ill-treatment of those detained in the Gaza Strip for drug-related offences, suspected collaboration with Israel or alleged affiliation with Fatah and Salafist groups. It regrets the lack of comprehensive official data on the number of pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners and the location and occupancy rate of all places of deprivation of liberty, disaggregated by the facilities under the auspices of all relevant ministries or other authorities (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

37. The Committee calls upon the State party to intensify its efforts to bring conditions of detention into line with the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules), the United Nations Rules for the Treatment of Women Prisoners and Non-custodial Measures for Women Offenders (the Bangkok Rules) and the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the Beijing Rules). The State party should, in particular:

(a) Take all measures to reduce overcrowding in prisons, including by making more use of alternatives to detention and continuing to implement plans to develop and renovate the infrastructure of prisons and other detention facilities;

(b) Guarantee that the basic needs of persons deprived of their liberty are satisfied, including with regard to water, sanitation and food, and increase the number of trained and qualified prison staff, including medical staff, to ensure the proper medical and health care of prisoners, in accordance with rules 24–35 of the Nelson Mandela Rules;

(c) Facilitate access to recreational and cultural activities in places of detention, as well as vocational training and education, with a view to supporting the rehabilitation of detainees in the community;

(d) Ensure that female prisoners, in particular those who are pregnant or with babies, have access to adequate health facilities and hygienic services and are detained in gender-sensitive conditions;

(e) Ensure that prisons are adapted to the needs of detainees with disabilities;

(f) Bring its legislation and practice on solitary confinement into line with international standards, particularly rules 43–46 of the Nelson Mandela Rules;

(g) Ensure that prompt, impartial and effective investigations are undertaken into all allegations relating to acts of torture and ill-treatment by prison personnel and that the alleged perpetrators are prosecuted and adequately punished;

(h) Provide the requested data on the number of pretrial detainees and convicts in all facilities in its next periodic report.

Pretrial detention

38. The Committee is concerned about the reported high number of people placed in pretrial detention, many of them in prolonged pretrial detention. It is also concerned that, as a result, inmates on remand are not systematically separated from convicted prisoners, nor women from men or children from adults (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

39. The State party should ensure that the regulations governing pretrial detention are scrupulously respected and that such detention is resorted to only in exceptional circumstances and for limited periods and in accordance with the law, taking into account the principles of necessity and proportionality. It should further ensure the separation of pretrial detainees from convicted prisoners, women from men and children from adults in all places of detention.

Monitoring of detention facilities

40. The Committee welcomes the State party's accession to the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment on 29 December 2017, and that a number of governmental institutions, international organizations and civil society actors are invested with powers of supervision over places of detention and custody. It also takes note of the publication in the Official Gazette of Decree-Law No. 25 on the National Commission against Torture on 25 May 2022. However, the Committee is concerned that the Decree-Law provides for the establishment of a government-led national preventive mechanism whose members are to be selected and appointed by the President of the Palestinian Authority upon the recommendations of the Council of Ministers, which is likely to affect the Commission's functional independence. It further regrets the lack of information on steps taken by the State party to follow up on visit reports and on the measures taken to implement the recommendations put forward by monitoring bodies (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

41. The State party should:

(a) Promptly review, in consultation with the Independent Commission for Human Rights and civil society organizations, Decree-Law No. 25 on the National Commission against Torture to ensure the full operational independence and financial autonomy of the Commission, in line with the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the guidelines of the Subcommittee on the Prevention of Torture on national preventive mechanisms;¹²

(b) Take all possible measures to ensure that international and national monitors are able to undertake regular, independent and unannounced visits to all places of deprivation of liberty in the State party and speak confidentially to all detained persons;

(c) Take appropriate steps to implement the recommendations put forward by monitoring bodies following their visits to detention facilities, in particular where allegations of torture or ill-treatment are raised in the reports.

Deaths in custody

42. The Committee regrets the lack of reliable information and statistical data on the total number of deaths in custody for the period under review, disaggregated by place of detention, the sex, age and ethnicity or nationality of the deceased and the cause of death. It is also concerned about the allegations that causes of death in custody include torture and the lack of health care, and regrets the lack of information on investigations undertaken in that regard. The Committee is particularly concerned about the case of Nizar Banat, who died in custody in June 2021 after being arrested and allegedly severely beaten and tortured in detention by the Hebron preventative security forces. It is further concerned that the State party has so far failed to ensure accountability for Nizar Banat's death, as the 14 officers initially charged with his death by a military court were temporarily released in June 2022 (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

43. The State party should:

(a) Compile and provide to the Committee detailed information on the cases of death in all places of detention, in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, their causes and the outcome of the investigations into the deaths;

(b) Ensure that all deaths in custody are promptly and impartially investigated by an independent entity, including by means of independent forensic examinations, and, where appropriate, apply the corresponding sanctions, in line with the Minnesota Protocol on the Investigation of Potentially Unlawful Death;

(c) Assess and evaluate the existing programmes for the prevention, detection and treatment of chronic, degenerative and infectious diseases in prisons, and review the effectiveness of strategies for the prevention of suicide and self-harm;

(d) Ensure that all those responsible for the torture and killing of Nizar Banat, including higher ranked officials who may have been involved in the incident, are duly prosecuted and punished, with appropriate sanctions imposed by a civil court with due process and fair trial guarantees.

Mental health institutions

44. The Committee is concerned that the State party failed to adopt and implement legislation prohibiting forced medical treatments, physical and chemical restraints and solitary confinement of persons with psychosocial or intellectual disabilities in psychiatric institutions. It also notes with concern that there are no measures taken to enable persons deprived of their liberty in such facilities to have access to mechanisms designed to investigate allegations of human right violations, in particular torture or ill-treatment. Furthermore, it is concerned about reports of ill-treatment and the possible torture of persons with disabilities within residential care settings, including physical violence, intimidation and abuse. Moreover, it regrets the lack of information on the number of persons with disabilities deprived of their liberty, their legal status and the conditions in which they reside, as well as on the work of the oversight mechanisms responsible for inspecting and monitoring psychiatric institutions (art. 2, 11 and 16).

45. The State party should expeditiously adopt the draft decree-law on the rights of persons with disabilities, as well as a comprehensive law on mental health to explicitly prohibit forced medical treatments, physical and chemical restraints and the solitary confinement of persons with psychosocial or intellectual disabilities in psychiatric institutions. It should also train health-care professionals on the rights of persons with disabilities, specifically on the right to free and informed consent. It should further ensure that instruments of restraint and force can only be used in accordance with the law and under appropriate supervision and for the shortest time necessary, and that their use is limited to that which is strictly necessary and proportionate. Finally, it should ensure that psychiatric institutions are adequately monitored and that effective safeguards are in place to prevent any torture or ill-treatment of persons in such facilities.

Juvenile justice

46. While welcoming the adoption of Decree-Law No. 4 of 2016 on the protection of Palestinian juveniles, the Committee is concerned about reports that it is not being enforced in the Gaza Strip. It is also concerned that the Palestinian Children's Act of 2004 (as amended in 2012) and the Decree-Law on the protection of Palestinian juveniles, applicable in the West Bank, set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 12 years, while the Juvenile Offenders Law No. 2 of 1937, applicable in the Gaza Strip, sets it at 9 years. Furthermore, the Committee is concerned that children are sometimes held in detention centres for adults, that children in detention, both in the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip, are reportedly ill-treated and that there is limited information on the use of non-custodial measures¹³ (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

47. The State party should take all possible measures to implement Decree-Law No. 4 of 2016 on the protection of Palestinian juveniles and international juvenile justice standards, in particular the Beijing Rules, in all parts of the State party. It should also: (a) raise the minimum age of criminal responsibility to an internationally acceptable standard; (b) promote non-custodial and non-judicial measures, such as diversion, probation, mediation, counselling or community service, wherever possible, for all child offenders; (c) ensure that ill-treatment of children in places of deprivation of liberty does not occur; and (d) provide qualified and independent legal aid free of charge to children in conflict with the law and offer child-friendly and accessible complaint mechanisms.

Death penalty

48. While welcoming the accession of the State party to the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty, on 18 March 2019, and the de facto moratorium on the implementation of the death penalty in the West Bank, where no executions have been carried out since 2005, the Committee is concerned that Palestinian legislation continues to provide for the death penalty for a range of relatively less serious offences, in contravention of international legal standards that limit its application to crimes of extreme gravity involving intentional killing.¹⁴ It is also concerned that death sentences are still handed down in the Gaza Strip, including by military courts against civilians without due process and fair trial guarantees, and that executions are still held. It is further concerned that death-row inmates face conditions of detention that, in and of themselves, can amount to ill-treatment. Moreover, it is concerned that, given the current political divide between the Palestinian authorities in the West Bank and the de facto authorities in Gaza, those sentenced to death in Gaza may not be able to exercise their right to seek a pardon or have their sentence commuted by the President of the Palestinian National Authority, as provided for in article 109 of the Basic Law of 2003 (arts. 2, 11 and 16).

49. The State party should take affirmative steps to formalize the moratorium on the death penalty, with a view to abolishing it in law in both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, in line with its obligations under the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty. It should also intensify its efforts to commute all death sentences into alternative penalties, ensure that conditions of detention for condemned prisoners do not constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or treatment, strengthen legal safeguards and guarantees of due process in all phases of the proceedings and concerning all offences, and take all possible measures to prohibit military courts from exercising jurisdiction over civilians in the Gaza Strip.

Gender-based violence

50. The Committee welcomes the State party's measures to combat violence against women, including the adoption of Decree-Law No. 5 in March 2018 repealing article 308 of the Jordanian Penal Code of 1960, which is applicable in the West Bank and which exonerated perpetrators of the crime of rape if they married the victim, the repeal of article 340 of the Jordanian Penal Code and the revisions to articles 98 and 99 thereof, which provided for mitigating factors in cases of homicide of women or so-called "honour killings". However, the Committee is concerned about:

- (a) The delay in the adoption of the draft family protection law, although it has already been reviewed by the legislative harmonization committee;
- (b) The increased number of femicide cases since the outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 and the persistence of so-called "honour-killings" and domestic and sexual violence, which remain socially accepted and underreported owing to the stigma suffered by victims;
- (c) The arbitrary arrest and detention of women, including victims of gender-based violence, on discriminatory charges of sexual offences such as adultery and "moral misconduct";
- (d) The lack of family protection units in the Gaza Strip, despite the high incidence of gender-based violence against women, including domestic violence (arts. 2, 12–14 and 16).¹⁵

51. The State party should:

- (a) Expedite the adoption of the draft family protection law and the draft penal code to ensure that all cases of gender-based violence, especially those that engage the international responsibility of the State party under the Convention, in particular femicides, so-called "honour crimes" and sexual and domestic violence, are thoroughly investigated, that the alleged perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished appropriately and that the victims or their families receive redress, including adequate compensation and rehabilitation, and have access to legal assistance, safe shelters and the necessary medical care and psychosocial support;

(b) Intensify efforts to raise awareness among both men and women, including through educational and media campaigns, of the criminal nature of gender-based violence against women in order to challenge its social acceptance and address the stigma discouraging victims from reporting it;

(c) Amend its legislation to ensure that victims of sexual abuse are not punished if they press charges, and immediately release and compensate women and girls who have been convicted of sexual offences such as adultery and “moral misconduct”;

(d) Take concrete steps to establish adequately resourced family protection units in the Gaza Strip to provide services to women and girls who are victims of gender-based violence, including domestic violence.

Redress, including compensation and rehabilitation

52. The Committee is concerned about the lack of explicit provisions in domestic legislation that provide for the right of victims of torture and ill-treatment to fair and adequate compensation, including the means for as full medical and psychosocial rehabilitation as possible, as required under article 14 of the Convention. It also regrets that the State party has failed to provide comprehensive information on the redress afforded to victims of torture or their families by the courts or other State bodies since the entry into force of the Convention in the State party (art. 14).

53. The State party should review its legislation to include explicit provisions on the right of victims of torture and ill-treatment to redress, including fair and adequate compensation and as full a rehabilitation as possible, and ensure that victims may, inter alia, seek and obtain prompt, fair and adequate compensation, including in cases where the civil liability of the State party is involved, in accordance with the Committee’s general comment No. 3 (2012). It should also compile and disseminate up-to-date statistics on the number of victims of torture and ill-treatment who have obtained redress, including medical or psychosocial rehabilitation and compensation, as well as on the forms of such redress and the results achieved.

Training

54. The Committee acknowledges the efforts made by the State party to develop and implement education and training programmes in human rights, including modules on the Convention covering the absolute prohibition of torture, for judges, prosecutors and members of the security forces. However, it regrets the lack of training on the contents of the Manual on the Effective Investigation and Documentation of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (the Istanbul Protocol as revised). The Committee also regrets that no mechanism for evaluating the effectiveness of training programmes has been established, as well as the absence of specific training for the military, the intelligence agencies and relevant medical personnel (art. 10).

55. The State party should:

(a) Further develop mandatory initial and in-service training programmes to ensure that all public officials are well acquainted with the provisions of the Convention, especially the absolute prohibition of torture, and that they are fully aware that violations will not be tolerated and will be investigated, and that those responsible will be prosecuted and, on conviction, appropriately punished;

(b) Ensure that all relevant staff, including medical personnel, are specifically trained to identify cases of torture and ill-treatment, in accordance with the Istanbul Protocol as revised;

(c) Develop and apply a methodology for assessing the effectiveness of educational and training programmes in reducing the number of cases of torture and ill-treatment and in ensuring the identification, documentation and investigation of such acts, as well as the prosecution of those responsible.

Follow-up procedure

56. The Committee requests the State party to provide, by 29 July 2023, information on follow-up to the Committee's recommendations on the definition and criminalization of torture, the national human rights commission and the monitoring of detention facilities (see paras. 13, 19 and 41 above). In that context, the State party is invited to inform the Committee about its plans for implementing, within the coming reporting period, some or all of the remaining recommendations in the present concluding observations.

Other issues

57. The Committee encourages the State party to consider making the declarations under articles 21 and 22 of the Convention.

58. The State party is requested to widely disseminate the report submitted to the Committee and the present concluding observations, in appropriate languages, through official websites, the media and non-governmental organizations and to inform the Committee about its dissemination activities.

59. The Committee also invites the State party to submit a core document in accordance with the requirements for the common core document contained in the harmonized guidelines on reporting under the international human rights treaties, including guidelines on a common core document and treaty-specific documents¹⁶ and paragraph 16 of General Assembly resolution 68/268.

60. The Committee requests the State party to submit its next periodic report, which will be its second, by 29 July 2026. To that end, the Committee invites the State party to accept, by 29 July 2024, the simplified reporting procedure consisting of the transmittal, by the Committee to the State party, of a list of issues prior to the submission of the report. The State party's replies to that list of issues would constitute its second periodic report under article 19 of the Convention.

Introduction

1. Israel ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in August 1991. The Covenant came into force with respect to Israel on 3 January 1992. The following is the combined initial and second reports submitted by Israel in pursuance of articles 16-17 of the Convention and of the guidelines issued by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The aim of this report is to provide a description of the legal and social situation relevant to the implementation of economic, social and cultural rights in Israel.

2. The information contained in this report relies primarily on materials, data and legal research supplied by the relevant government ministries and institutes. Non-governmental organizations (NGOs) also provided valuable information. Independent and academic research has been surveyed and a reading list is provided at the end of the report. Annexed to the report are legal texts and specialized publications.*

I. BACKGROUND INFORMATION

A. Land and people

Geography

3. Israel's area within its boundaries and ceasefire lines is 10,840 square miles (27,800 sq. km). Long and narrow in shape, it is some 280 miles (450 km) in length and about 85 miles (135 km) across at the widest point.

4. The country may be divided into four geographical regions: three parallel strips running north to south and a large, mostly arid zone in the southern half.

Demographics

5. As of October 1997, the total population of Israel numbered 5,863,000 with over 4.7 million Jews (80.2 per cent of the total population), 872,000 Muslims (14.9 per cent), about 190,000 Christians (3.2 per cent) and around 100,000 Druze and members of other faiths (1.7 per cent).

6. The population of Israel increased in 1996 by 140,000, of whom 88,000 were Jews, representing a lower rate of increase than in 1995. In 1990-91, at the height of immigration from the former USSR and the Commonwealth of Independent States, the average annual growth rate was 250,000. Since the beginning of 1990 the population of Israel has increased by 26.3 per cent!

* The reading list and the annexed materials are available for consultation at the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights.

7. The birth rate in 1995 was 21.1 per 1,000, while the infant mortality rate was 6.8 per 1,000. As of 1993, life expectancy for male Israelis was 75.3 years and for female Israelis 79.5 years. The total fertility rate was 2.9 per 1,000. Twenty-nine point seven per cent of the population was under 14 while 9.5 per cent of the population was 65 or older.

8. Israel has a literacy rate of over 95 per cent.

The economy

9. Israel's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in 1996 was 272.8 billion new Israeli shekels (NIS) (approximately US$ 85 billion) in 1995 constant prices. GDP per capita for this period was approximately NIS 48,000 (approximately $15,000). The external debt was $44.28 billion.

10. The dollar exchange rate at the close of 1990 was NIS 2.048 per $1, and at the close of 1995, NIS 3.135 per $1. The annual average of the dollar exchange rate in 1990 was NIS 2.0162, and in 1995, stood at NIS 3.0113. In 1997 the dollar exchange rate was about NIS 3.5 per $1.

Language

11. Hebrew and Arabic are the official State languages. They are primary languages of instruction in compulsory education and either may be used by a member of the Knesset (Israel's parliament) to address the House. Israel television and radio broadcast in Hebrew, Arabic and, to a lesser extent, English, Russian and Amharic.

B. General political structure

Recent history

12. The State of Israel was founded on 15 May 1948. Israel represents the culmination of almost 2,000 years of longing on the part of the Jewish people for the re-establishment of an independent State. A guiding principle for all governments of Israel since its inception has been the "ingathering of the exiles", the historic return of the Jewish people to its ancestral land. This concept was enshrined in the Declaration of Independence and has continued to be a major component of Israel's national life to the present day. In the words of Israel's Declaration of Independence, the State "extend(s its) hand to all neighbouring States in an offer of peace and good neighbourliness".

13. In 1977 the late President of Egypt, Anwar Sadat, became the first Arab head of State to visit Israel. In 1979 a treaty of peace was signed between Israel and Egypt. The Madrid Peace Conference was convened in October 1991. It was the first time that Israel, the Syrian Arab Republic, Lebanon, Jordan and the Palestinians had met in an open and public setting for the specific purpose of negotiating peace. In September 1993, Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) signed the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements in Washington D.C. and in November 1994, Israel and Jordan concluded a peace treaty, formally ending 46 years of conflict. In September 1995 Israel and the PLO signed the Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and by 1999 the Final Status Agreement regarding these territories is due to be signed.

Structure of government

14. Israel is a parliamentary democracy, consisting of legislative, executive and judicial branches. Its institutions are the Presidency, the Knesset (parliament), the Government (Cabinet), the judiciary and the Office of the State Comptroller.

15. The system is based on the principle of separation of powers, with checks and balances, in which the executive branch (the government) is subject to the confidence of the legislative branch (the Knesset) and the independence of the judiciary is guaranteed by law.

The Presidency

16. The President is the head of State and his office symbolizes the unity of the State, above and beyond party politics.

17. Presidential duties, which are primarily ceremonial and formal, are defined by law. Among the President's formal functions are the opening of the first session of a new Knesset, accepting the credentials of foreign envoys, signing treaties and laws adopted by the Knesset, appointing judges, appointing the Governor of the Bank of Israel and heads of Israel's diplomatic missions abroad, pardoning prisoners and commuting sentences on the advice of the Minister of Justice. The President's approval is required prior to the dissolution of the Knesset by the Prime Minister.

18. The President, who may serve two consecutive terms, is elected every five years by a simple majority by the Knesset from among candidates nominated on the basis of their personal stature and contribution to the State.

The Knesset

19. The Knesset is the House of Representatives of the State of Israel; its main function is to legislate.

20. Elections for the Knesset and for the Prime Minister are held simultaneously. They are secret, and the entire country constitutes a single electoral constituency.

21. Knesset seats are assigned in proportion to each party's percentage of the total national vote. A party's surplus votes which are insufficient for an additional seat are redistributed among the various parties according to their proportional size resulting from the elections, or as agreed between parties prior to the election.

22. The Knesset is elected for a term of four years, but may dissolve itself or be dissolved by the Prime Minister, with the President's approval, before the end of its term. Until a new Knesset is formally constituted following elections, full authority remains with the outgoing Government.

23. The Knesset operates in plenary sessions and through 13 standing committees: the House Committee; the Foreign Affairs and Security Committee; the Finance Committee; the Economics Committee; the Interior and Environment Committee; the Education and Culture Committee; the Labour and Social Affairs Committee; the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee; the Immigration and Absorption Committee; the Committee for State Audit Affairs; the Committee on the War against Drug Addiction; the Science Committee and the Committee for Advancing the Status of Women.

24. In plenary sessions, general debates are conducted on government policy and activity, as well as on legislation submitted by the government or by individual Knesset members. Debates may be conducted in Hebrew and Arabic; simultaneous translation is available.

The Government

25. The Government (Cabinet of Ministers) is the executive authority of the State, charged with administering internal and foreign affairs, including security matters. Its policy-making powers are very wide and it is authorized to take action on any issue which is not delegated by law to another authority. The Government usually serves for four years, but its tenure may be shortened by the resignation of the Prime Minister or by a vote of no confidence.

26. The Prime Minister is elected directly by popular vote, simultaneously with the Knesset elections. Until the 1996 elections, the task of forming a government and heading it was assigned by the President to the Knesset member considered to have the best chance of forming a viable coalition government.

27. The ministers are responsible to the Prime Minister for the fulfilment of their duties and accountable for their actions to the Knesset. Most ministers are assigned a portfolio and head a ministry; others serve without a portfolio but may be called upon to take responsibility for special projects. The Prime Minister may also serve as a minister with a portfolio.

28. The number of ministers, including the Prime Minister, may not exceed 18, nor be less than 8. At least half of the ministers must be Knesset members, but all must be eligible for candidacy as Knesset members. The Prime Minister, or another minister with prime ministerial approval, may appoint deputy ministers, up to a total of six; all must be Knesset members.

C. The judiciary

29. The absolute independence of the judiciary is guaranteed by law. Judges are appointed by the President, on the recommendation of a special nominations committee comprised of Supreme Court judges, members of the bar, ministers and Knesset members. Judges' appointments are with tenure, until mandatory retirement at age 70.

30. Magistrates' and District Courts exercise jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases, while juvenile, traffic, military, labour and municipal appeal courts each deal with matters coming under their jurisdiction. There is no trial by jury in Israel.

31. In matters of personal status such as marriage, divorce and, to some extent, maintenance, guardianship and the adoption of minors, jurisdiction is vested in the judicial institutions of the respective religious communities: the rabbinical court, the Muslim religious courts (Sharia courts), the religious courts of the Druze and the juridical institutions of the nine recognized Christian communities in Israel.

32. The Supreme Court, seated in Jerusalem, has nationwide jurisdiction. It is the highest court of appeal on rulings of lower tribunals. In its capacity as High Court of Justice, the Supreme Court hears petitions in constitutional and administrative law issues against any government body or agent, and is a court of first and last instance.

33. Although legislation is wholly within the competence of the Knesset, the Supreme Court can and does call attention to the desirability of legislative changes. It also has the authority to determine whether a law properly conforms with the Basic Laws of the State and to declare a law void.

D. The State Comptroller

34. The State Comptroller carries out external audits and reports on the legality, regularity, economy, efficiency, effectiveness and integrity of the public administration in order to assure public accountability. Israel recognized the importance of State audit in a democratic society and in 1949 enacted a law which established the State Comptroller's Office. Since 1971, the State Comptroller has also fulfilled the function of Public Complaints Commissioner (ombudsman) and serves as an address to which any person may submit complaints against State and public bodies which are subject to the audit of the Comptroller.

35. The State Comptroller is elected by the Knesset in a secret ballot for a five-year term. The Comptroller is accountable only to the Knesset, is not dependent upon the Government, and enjoys unrestricted access to the accounts, files and staff of all bodies subject to audit. The Comptroller's activities are carried out in cooperation with the Knesset Committee for State Audit Affairs.

36. The scope of State audit in Israel is among the most extensive in the world. It includes the activities of all government ministries, State institutions, branches of the defence establishment, local authorities, government corporations, State enterprises, and other bodies or institutions declared subject to audit.

37. In addition, the State Comptroller has been empowered by law to inspect the financial affairs of the political parties represented in the Knesset, including election campaign accounts and current accounts. When irregularities are found, monetary sanctions are imposed.

E. Basic Laws

38. Israel has no formal constitution as yet. However, most chapters of the prospective constitution have already been written, and enacted as Basic Laws.

39. The Basic Laws are adopted by the Knesset in the same manner as other legislation. Their constitutional import is derived from their nature and, in some cases, from the inclusion of "entrenched clauses" whereby a special majority is required to amend them.

40. The following are the Basic Laws of the State of Israel:

The Knesset (1958)

State Lands (1960)

The President (1964)

The State Economy (1975)

The Israel Defence Forces (1976)

Jerusalem (1980)

The Judicature (1984)

The State Comptroller (1988)

Human Dignity and Liberty (1992)

Freedom of Occupation (1992)

The Government (1992)

41. A draft Basic Law: Social Rights Bill has been is pending in the Knesset since 1993, when for the first time in Israel's history the Government agreed to include social rights in fundamental rights legislation. Even though economic, social and cultural rights are recognized in Israel, whether directly by law, regulations or case-law, or indirectly by administrative programmes, they still lack constitutional status. This issue is further dealt with in the part of this Report dealing with article 2 of the Covenant.

II. INFORMATION CONCERNING GENERAL PROVISIONS OF THE COVENANT

Article 1 - Self-determination

42. Israel's recognition of the universal right to self-determination is embodied in its Declaration of Independence, which contains a clear commitment to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The right to self-determination is central to the establishment of the State of Israel, especially after the Holocaust. In the Supreme Court's words:

"Certainly, all the citizens of Israel - Jews and non-Jews - are 'shareholders' in the State, and the proposition that the State is the 'State of all its citizens' does not detract from it being a Jewish State, and if one wishes: the Jewish State. We must remember - how can we forget - that the Jewish people did not have any other state but the State of Israel, the State of the Jews. However, within the State, all citizens enjoy equal rights."

C.A.P. 2316/96 Issacson v Registrar of Political Parties, Takdin-Supreme vol. 96 (2) 306, 319.

Article 2 - State responsibility, non-discrimination, international cooperation

State responsibility

43. Economic, social and cultural rights are widely recognized in Israel, whether directly by law, regulations or case-law, or indirectly by administrative programmes. Since its creation, the State's commitment to the full realization of these rights has never been politically challenged. Moreover, social services of all sorts have dramatically expanded over the years, notwithstanding Israel's security challenges on the one hand and huge waves of immigration on the other, both of which have had an obvious drastic impact on the State's available resources. This commitment is clearly revealed in each of the substantial parts of this report (arts. 6-15).

44. It is worth stressing here the existence of a definite and steady trend of welfare legalization in Israel. The best example is the Assurance of Income Law 1980, which created a legal right to basic income as a safety net to ensure subsistence. This right, implemented by the National Insurance Institute, replaced the previous administrative programme operated by social workers. Under the previous programme, social workers had the authority to decide whether, in their professional judgement, an individual in need was entitled to a basic allowance, in addition to determining the level of such an allowance. Such examples are found in various parts of this report. It is fair to say in general that the majority of the rights covered by the Covenant are today legalized, even though the process has still to be completed.

45. Furthermore, there are definite indications that welfare and labour rights might undergo an even greater change with respect to their status - from regular legal rights to constitutional rights. Such indications can be found both in the legislative and the judicial fields.

Basic Law: Social Rights Bill (1993)

46. A draft Basic Law: Social Rights Bill has been pending in the Knesset since 1993. Its main provisions are:

- "1. The fundamental human rights in Israel are based on the recognition of the importance of a human being, of the sanctity of his life, and of his free existence, and they shall be respected in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence of the State of Israel.

- "2. This Basic Law aims to protect the social rights of man, so as to embody in this Basic Law the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State.
- "3. Every resident is entitled to his basic needs for the protection of a dignified human existence, inter alia in the field of labour, wage and work conditions, in the field of learning and education and in health and social welfare; this right shall be implemented or regulated by governmental authorities in accordance with law, and subject to the financial ability of the State, as determined by the government.
- "4. Workers are entitled to organize in workers' organizations of their choice, and employers are entitled to organize in employers' organizations of their choice; such organizations may conclude collective agreements, all in accordance with the principles of labour law.
- "5. Workers are entitled to strike, in accordance with the principles of labour law, in order to protect their rights and advance their economic and social interests.
- "6. The rights protected in this basic law shall not be impaired, save by way of a law, or through specific authorization in law comporting with the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State, for a proper purpose, and not exceeding what is strictly required.
- "7. Every authority in any branch of government, and all that act in its name, must respect the rights in this Basic Law.
- "8. None of the rights in this basic law shall be invoked in a manner which compromises the State's existence, its democratic regime, or serve to oppress human rights."

47. The future of this draft is not clear. But the fact that for the first time in Israel's history the government agreed in 1993 to include social rights in fundamental rights legislation, is symbolically important. It demonstrates the depth of Israel's commitment to the rights covered by the present Covenant.

The judiciary

48. Constitutional recognition of fundamental rights can come about through case-law, as has happened in Israel in the area of civil rights. This at least means such rights are taken seriously for the purpose of interpretation of statutes or filling legislative lacunae. As far as economic and social rights are concerned, there is yet limited judicial activity, apart from the right to form trade unions and the right to strike, which are regarded as fundamental rights.

49. The Supreme Court made the following interesting remarks as to the State's duty to provide for the weak and poor:

"A democratic government in its very essence, and according to its values, will look after the citizen's present and future welfare. It will strive to provide employment, a minimum wage, and social rights, so that he who has laboured all those years and reached retirement age is insured as much as possible and does not fall as a burden upon society. If a democratic administration can afford to invest the necessary resources, it should provide for citizen pension rights on its own initiative, and in good time ... The Basic Law, as mentioned above, is grounded in the values of the State of Israel as a democratic state. Caring for a citizen's welfare, making sure his needs are met and securing his future comports with the values of the State of Israel as a democratic state and corresponds with the values of Judaism which have always set a priority on caring for the citizen and providing for his basic needs. It has been said, for example, that charity is one of the three most important deeds which constitute the moral basis of this world [cite omitted] ... Open and hidden acts of compassion and charity, being nothing but expressions of care for another, so that he does not suffer hunger or deprivation, are advocated and encouraged in clear and explicit messages rooted in ancient tradition. Ensuring that all the needs of the citizen are met as well as those of the resident and gentile, and preserving their standard of living and quality of life is also amongst the blessed values in Jewish tradition."

H.C. 726/94, 878/94 Klal Insurance Company Ltd. v. Minister of Treasury, P.D. vol. 48 (5) 441, 476.

50. Justice Aharon Barak, the President of the Supreme Court has remarked that the "right to decent living conditions" should be construed from the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (Barak 1994, pp. 416-7), but no case has been brought to the court yet.

51. In sum, since no serious attempt to induce the judiciary to recognize social rights as fundamental rights has yet been made, the exact constitutional status of economic, social and cultural rights under Israeli law still awaits decisive developments, legislative as well as judicial.

Non-discrimination

52. As far as State and public agencies are concerned, the non-discrimination principle is totally binding in Israel. The Israeli Declaration of Independence declares the State's commitment to "civil and social equality". Using this source, among others, the High Court of Justice has long enshrined the right to equality and has repeatedly expressed the following view:

"The rule according to which it is prohibited to discriminate between people on grounds of race, sex, nationality, ethnic sect, state of origin, religion, opinion or social status is a fundamental constitutional principle, inherent to our most basic legal norms."
H.C. 721/94 El Al Israeli Airlines v. Danilovitch, P.D. vol. 48 (5) 749, 760.

53. The courts have created an effective body of jurisprudence, resulting in granting relief to any person able to prove discrimination on the part of any person or body acting under the law. Welfare and other social services are no exception to this rule, as it is clear from the following and representative citation:

"... guaranteeing equal opportunities for the handicapped costs money. A society raised on the values of human dignity, liberty and equality is willing to pay the necessary price ... As we have mentioned, regulations require that special toilets for the disabled be installed in ... the school. The purpose of this provision is to enable the handicapped child to integrate in the school in a manner similar to that of any other child, and to thereby guarantee his dignity and enable him to enjoy equal educational opportunities."

H.C. 7081/93 Botzer v. Municipal Authority Maccabim-Reut, Takdin-Supreme vol. 96 (1) 818, 821-822

54. Statutory entitlements are generally based upon residence, not nationality, let alone race, religion, sex, etc. For example, education rights apply to any "child"; workers rights apply to any "employee"; social security is usually based upon "residence", except for three aspects of social security which apply to all "employees". A detailed account of the application of the non-discrimination principle is given in each chapter of this report. The issue of foreign workers is elaborated on in the chapter dealing with article 6 of the Covenant.

55. Non-discrimination statutory provisions are generally rare in Israeli law. Nevertheless, some of the rights under the Covenant are specifically subject to such provisions, which are discussed in the body of this report. These provisions are the following (the statutes referred to are attached in annex 1A to this report):

The right to work (art. 6) and the right to just and favourable conditions of work (art. 7): Equal Employment Opportunities Law 1988, Article 2 and 2A; Employment Service Law 1951, Article 42 and 42A; (Male and Female) Workers Equal Pay Law 1996, Article 1 and 2; Equal Retirement Age for Male and Female Employees Law 1987, Article 2; Public Service (Appointments) Law 1959, Article 15A; Work and Rest Hours Law 1951, Article 9C;

Health rights (art. 12): National Health Insurance Law 1994, Article 21(a) and 31;

Education rights (arts. 13-15): National Education Law 1959, Article 2.

International cooperation

56. The State of Israel is deeply involved in international cooperation. The Department of International Cooperation of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (DIC) is devoted to promoting assistance programmes in the fields of training, research and consultations. Remaining committed to the universal goal of poverty reduction, the focus has been on the enrichment of human resources and institution-building, to enable individuals to participate in the development of their own society in such fields as market-oriented agriculture, women in the development process, environmental conservation, health care, micro-enterprise and community development. In 1996, there were 4,045 participants in 144 training courses conducted in Israel, and 5,327 participants shared in 120 local courses held in 47 countries worldwide.

57. As aid to Africa comprises approximately 25 per cent of the DIC training activities and long-term projects, a special team of experts has been appointed to study the present Africa-Israel relationship in order to formulate a more positive programme for future cooperation. Aside from designing bilateral development cooperation strategies with client countries, according to specific national priorities, high priority has been given to multilateral activities and increasing cooperation with international organizations. A multilateral agreement between Israel, the Palestinian Council, Luxembourg and Morocco was signed relating to an agricultural project in the Gaza Strip, and agreements were signed in 1996 between DIC, UNDP, UNESCO and FAO on development cooperation and institution-building programmes.

58. Peace in the Middle East will be secured only when it takes root in the everyday lives of people in the region. Therefore, cooperation with countries, authorities, NGOs and the private sector in the Middle East/North African region, as well as with the Gulf States, will continue to be a basic objective of Israel's development programme. Comprehensive regional cooperation will begin to be translated into practice when peace agreements are reached, but there is no need to wait until then to begin working together. DIC hopes to serve as a bridge between the people of the region.

59. Many DIC programmes have been achieved through resources generously provided by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the Kingdom of the Netherlands' Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Additional resources are provided by the Danish International Development Agency (DANIDA); Norway's International Development Agency (NORAD); Sweden's International Development Agency (SIDA); the Federal Republic of Germany's Ministry of Economic Cooperation; the Inter-American Development Bank; the Organization of American States and various United Nations bodies and agencies (the Department of Development Support and Management Services of the Secretariat, UNDP, WHO, FAO, UNESCO, WMO). (The DIC Activity Report, 1996, Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs).

60. All the above accounts for international assistance granted by Israel. Of the international assistance that Israel receives, only a small portion is granted in order to meet social needs and even then, only for the absorption of immigrants. The United States of America grants Israel $8 million each year; Germany provides Israel with loans the sum of which varies over the years according to immigration rates (DM40 million for the years 1997-1998, which is less than in the midst of the last immigration wave). It should be borne in mind that between the beginning of 1989 and August 1997 Israel has absorbed 742,000 immigrants, with a total population of 4,678,000 by the end of 1988 - an increase of 16.6 per cent in the total population in less than a decade!

Article 3 - Prohibition of discrimination between men and women

61. The guidelines issued by the Committee under the present Covenant do not require a general overview of the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of all the economic, social and cultural rights set forth in the Covenant. This topic will be elaborated separately in each part of this report.

62. Further reading with special focus on this subject can also be found in Israel's combined initial and second report concerning the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, submitted in May 1997 to the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and published as United Nations document CEDAW/C/ISR 1-2 of 8 April 1997. Reference to the said report will be made easier by using the following chart:

III. INFORMATION CONCERNING SPECIFIC RIGHTS

Article 6 - The right to work

Related international conventions binding Israel

63. Israel has been a party to the International Labour Organization (ILO) Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) since 1970; Israel's last report relates to 1995.

64. Israel has been a party to the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) since 1955; Israel's last report relates to 1990.

65. Israel has been a party to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) since 1959; Israel's last report relates to the years 1992-1993.

66. Israel has been a party to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination since 1979; Israel's last report was filed in July 1997 and relates to the years 1991-1996.

67. Israel has been a party to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women since 1991; Israel's last report was filed in May 1997.

68. International covenants ratified by Israel are normally not part of Israeli internal law unless given statutory recognition by the Knesset. Nevertheless, international labour conventions, especially ILO standards, have had a tremendous influence on the development of the Israeli Labour Law, both statutory and judicial. These standards are embodied in the content of the labour statutes. The Labour Courts also frequently use such conventions, even those which have not been ratified, for the interpretation of statutes and as a criterion for testing the validity of contract terms.

Employment and unemployment

Level and trends

69. Over the past 10 years, from 1986 to 1996, Israel's economy has expanded at a rapid rate. Gross domestic product increased by 65 per cent in constant prices between 1986 and 1996, with the majority of the growth (42 per cent) concentrated between 1989 and 1995. This is a significant achievement that has brought per capita GDP in Israel to a level not far below the average among western nations.

70. GDP grew in 1996 by 4.5 per cent to reach NIS 272.8 billion (in 1995 constant prices; approximately $85 billion). GDP per capita grew in 1996 by 1.8 per cent, reaching about NIS 48,000 (in 1995 constant prices; approximately $13,000). This growth was at a lower rate than in the previous two years and preliminary forecasts for 1997 indicate a further slowing in the pace of economic activity in the current year.

71. The expansion in economic activity has been accompanied by considerable growth in domestic employment, including the successful absorption of a large wave of immigration which began toward the end of 1989 (generating a rise of 16.6 per cent in the Israeli population by the end of 1997 - less than a decade!).

72. In 1996 there were 2.1 million workers employed in Israel. The unemployment rate was then 6.7 per cent, the lowest since 1992, when unemployment reached 11.2 per cent of the labour force; this was at the height of the influx into the labour market of new immigrants, with some 85 per cent of these coming from the former Soviet Union.

73. Employment trends among particular categories of workers. The following table presents the principal labour force characteristics of various categories of Israeli workers: men, women, Jews, Arabs, younger and older workers, development area residents and new immigrants, showing changes in the number employed and the unemployment rate for these groups in 1986, 1991 and 1996. More extensive data is given table 1 annexed to this section.

	Per cent change in employment		Unemployment rate per cent
	1991-1996	1986-1991	1986	1991	1996
Total population	27.1	15.7	7.1	10.6	6.7
Jews	26.0	14.4	6.6	10.6	6.7
Arabs and others	35.4	26.4	10.5	10.5	6.2
Men	20.4	12.8	6.5	8.6	5.8
Women	37.3	20.4	7.9	13.4	7.8
Aged 15-17	36.7	-1.7	20.5	23.7	19.7
Aged 18-24	52.6	13.8	18.6	22.2	12.8
Aged 45-54	65.8	19.8	3.3	6.9	4.5
Aged 55-64	25.6	9.3	2.0	7.2	4.8
Residents in development areas	60.7	-	-	15.4	10.5
New immigrants	353.0	-	-	38.5	9.3

74. Generally speaking, from 1991 to 1996, the employment of most categories of workers shown above increased more than the average rate and employment among new immigrants rose particularly rapidly. Interestingly, this growth was smaller amongst Jews and men, which constitute the two broader (but not exclusive) categories of workers in Israel. This pattern could already be discerned before 1991, between 1986 and 1991, but was less pronounced.

75. Regarding unemployment rates, the data indicate that over the past 10 years, the highest rates are to be found among the youngest workers, aged between 15 and 24. Unemployment has been high as well amongst workers living in the country's development areas. Unemployment rates of new immigrants were typically high shortly after their arrival in Israel and declined rapidly as they learned the language and adapted their skills to the local labour market. Over the longer term, the most vulnerable groups of Israeli workers are probably young workers (although the large majority of this age group attends school and does compulsory army service) and the residents of outlying development areas where job opportunities may be limited.

76. Initial figures for 1997 indicate that unemployment may be worsening this year. Rising unemployment will, of course, necessitate a re-evaluation of employment and unemployment policies and measures.

Employment policies

77. As can be seen from the data on unemployment in Israel, the unemployment rate has fallen steadily since 1992, when it stood at 11.2 per cent, to 6.7 per cent in 1996. With unemployment at this level, the Government considers the economy to be at near full employment.

78. In general, difficulties in employment management are associated with cyclical variations in economic growth. Therefore, the objectives of economic policy are the encouragement of long-term economic growth and expansion of job opportunities and the implementation of short-term measures to reduce unemployment.

79. Israel has encountered a particular problem as a result of the large influx of new immigrants, mostly from the former Soviet Union, which began towards the end of 1989. Immigration reached a peak in 1990 when about 200,000 entered Israel (and 276,000 more in 1991). Between 1992 and 1996, approximately 75,000 to 80,000 new immigrants arrived annually. Despite the high level of economic activity during most of the period from 1990 to 1996, unemployment rose significantly, from 8.9 per cent in 1989 to 11.2 per cent in 1992. Thereafter, unemployment declined, reaching 6.7 per cent in 1996. This was achieved through short-term programmes of financial assistance to industrial firms willing to increase the numbers of workers employed, the creation of temporary jobs in the public sector and through the expansion of vocational training, in particular, skill-updating and retraining courses for university graduates and on-the-job training. The number of new immigrants in vocational training rose from an average of about 1,300 per month in 1990 to 6,000 per month in 1993. By 1996, the number of new immigrants in vocational courses declined to about 2,000 per month, as the flow of new arrivals slowed and their absorption into jobs in Israel increased. Unemployment among new immigrants fell from 38.5 per cent in 1991 to 9.3 per cent in 1996, an achievement which was due to a combination of the Government's measures and the economy's expansion during the period.

80. Mention should also be made of a temporary employment programme initiated in 1992, when unemployment reached an unusual peak. Projects were initiated to provide employment in the development of archeological and tourist sites and in environmental improvements. By 1993, 3,500 unemployed persons were working in these jobs each month for an average of 17 days each. This rose to 3,800 workers in 1994 (for 18 days per month each) and has since declined as unemployment fell due primarily to the expansion of economic activity in Israel. In the first six months of 1997, only 700 persons were employed for approximately 15 days per month in these temporary jobs.

81. The Government's long-term economic programmes focus on measures to maximize the economy's productivity. Such measures include privatization of Government-owned enterprises, encouragement of competition among domestic producers of goods and services and between domestic and foreign producers through the reduction of trade barriers, and the minimization of the use of employment projects for the temporary relief of unemployment.

Employment and individual freedom

82. At the most basic level, the employee-employer relationship is a contractual one. The fundamental principle of "freedom of contract" (entrenched since 1992 in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom) applies to labour contracts as well. This includes both the freedom to enter a labour relation or to choose not to do so, and the freedom to define the content of such a relation. Hence, as a general rule, the individual right to work exists only where there is an individual labour contract or a relevant collective agreement and its scope is to be determined by them.

83. This contractual approach has led Israeli courts to somewhat restrict the availability of enforcement as a remedy for dismissal in breach of a personal labour contract. Such remedy may be granted by statute or by a collective agreement (as described below). It should be noted that this issue is one of the most controversial in Israeli labour law, and differences exist in its regard within the Supreme Court itself.

84. Nonetheless, "freedom of contract" is not the only principle governing the present topic. In light of the basic inequality between the two sides of a labour contract - the employee and the employer - freedom of contract alone is not enough to protect worker's rights. Protective labour law principles and statutes in Israel have important implications for the protection of the right to work.

85. Protection of job security through collective agreements (and extension orders) is in fact very efficient for organized workers, who constitute the vast majority of workers in Israel. It is so deeply entrenched in the system that it is sometimes criticized, mostly by employers.

86. Many collective agreements include a provision that employees dismissed as a result of cutbacks are entitled, during a given period, to be given priority in any return to work. Furthermore, collective agreements also often set procedures for determining the justification for dismissal by the employer. The most common procedure of this sort is the "bipartite committee", composed of the employer and trade union representatives. Should such committee reach a dead end, the dispute is commonly brought to arbitration.

87. Direct statutory protection of security of employment is exceptional and applies to particular kinds of workers as follows (see full text of the laws referred to in annex 1A to this report):

(a) Female workers during maternity leave (including up to six months after giving birth in case of medical grounds for absence) and pregnancy (under certain conditions) - see the Employment of Women Law 1964, article 9;

(b) Workers serving in the army reserve - the Discharged Soldiers Reinstatement Law 1949, articles 37 and 41;

(c) War invalids - regulations issued under the Discharged Soldiers Reinstatement Law 1949, article 31;

(d) Employees who are members of a "safety committee" and "safety delegates" in connection with the fulfilment of their statutory functions - the Labor Inspection (Organization) Law 1954, articles 17 and 24;

(e) Workers who are relatives of fallen veterans, during a five-year period of statutory extension of their retirement age, or in relation with it - the Rehabilitation Law 1950, Fallen Soldiers Families (Pensions and article 33A);

(f) Civil servants and workers in other public services in relation to complaints they have filed with the State Comptroller - the State Comptroller Law (New Version) 1958, article 45C.

88. In addition, there are three forms of State regulation of recruitment and employment, which indirectly enhance individual opportunities for employment.

89. The first is in the Employment Service Act 1959, which created the Israeli Employment Service. This is a national public corporation under the responsibility of the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs, whose main purpose is to match employment seekers with vacancies as notified by employers. An employment service office is provided for in every urban area throughout the country. According to the National Insurance Law (Revised Version) 1995, reporting to the Employment Service office is a precondition for receiving unemployment allowance where no suitable work was offered (see details under article 9 of the Covenant).

90. "Private Employment Services", commonly called "Placement Agencies", are also regulated by the State under the Employment Service Law 1959 (Part 4). They are required to obtain a permit from the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, who supervises them.

91. Replying to public discontent with the proliferation of private agencies operating in various ways in the area of employment management, the Employment of Workers by Manpower Contractors Law 1996 was enacted. The difference between a "manpower contractor" and a private "placement agency" is that the former remains the employer after placing the employee at work at a third party's workplace. The "manpower contractor" differs, in turn, from a regular contractor in that the contract with the third party is limited to the provision of personnel management services. The Law requires any "manpower contractor" to obtain a permit after depositing a satisfactory financial guaranty, to be used by the State for the benefit of workers in the case of breach of contract by the agency. The Law also compels the "manpower contractor" to provide employees with a written contract. It also nullifies the validity of clauses seeking to limit the employee's freedom to be at some point in the future hired by the third party. A petition to the High Court of Justice is still pending waiting for judgement, seeking to declare unconstitutional the legal provisions requiring financial guarantee as a precondition for issuing a permit.

92. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs is charged with the enforcement of the Employment of Workers by Labor Contractors Law. Since its entry into force in September 1996, almost 200 agencies have requested permits, about 170 of which have obtained such.

93. The "restraint of trade" doctrine is another important instance of protective principle, sometimes reducing the effect of "freedom of contract" and enhancing working opportunities. Under this doctrine, a clause in a contract of employment which seeks to restrict the freedom of an employee to work at any time at a particular kind of occupation is valid only when the said restrictions are deemed reasonable, for example when their purpose is the protection of the employer's trade secrets or other confidential information. Otherwise, the employee's consent is considered void.

94. The enactment in 1992 of the Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation added a constitutional aspect to the issue of choice of occupation in general and to the courts' reasoning in "restraint of engagement in trade" cases in particular. The reasonability of a restraint of engagement in trade clause is now a complex issue of reaching the right balance between "freedom of contract" and "freedom of occupation", taking into account the competing rights of all parties involved (the employer, the employee and the third party who wishes to hire the latter), as well as the public interests normally taken into consideration in such cases under regular constitutional law.

95. Last but not least, freedom of choice of occupation is also indirectly promoted by the legal provisions and principles prohibiting discrimination in recruitment, dealt with in section 3(a) below.

Technical and vocational training programmes

(i) Vocational guidance

96. Psychological and vocational counselling services are provided by the Vocational Guidance Division of the Employment Service (this State institution is described in greater detail in section 3(a) below). Services include vocational guidance for individuals (about 5,000 persons per year), vocational diagnosis and testing, job analysis and classification, collection and dissemination of employment information and instruction for personnel involved in vocational guidance activities in schools, local labour exchanges, etc.

97. No data is available on the operations of vocational guidance by the demographic characteristics of those using the services.

(ii) Vocational and technical education within the formal education system sponsored by the Ministry of Education

98. In general, vocational education is available within the formal education system at the secondary and post-secondary levels, with introductory and exploratory vocational courses provided in grade 9 (intermediate level).

99. The vocational schools offer students a variety of both academic and vocational subjects, including commercial and secretarial studies, fashion and textile design, basic technical skills (metalworking, mechanics and electricity, for example), computer science and electronics. In addition, there are agricultural schools and nautical schools combining specific vocational training with academic studies. In recent years, technological development has given rise to increased efforts to adapt vocational school curricula to the economy's need for an expanding supply of skilled workers training in modern technology. To this end, computer studies have been introduced and twelfth-year students work one or two days a week in industrial plants in order to familiarize themselves with innovations in production methods.

100. There are three paths within vocational schools: a combination of a full academic programme (leading to matriculation) with vocational training; vocational studies (leading to a diploma); and practical vocational education stressing practical application (leading only to a certificate).

101. Within the last 10-15 years, the number of students receiving vocational training in secondary schools has grown by 50 per cent, an increase attributed by the Ministry of Education primarily to the growing number of youngsters remaining in school after the age of compulsory attendance. The majority of such youngsters are being absorbed into the vocational education network as opposed to the academic education network.

102. At the post-secondary level, advanced vocational training is available to students who have completed a full secondary school course of study. In 1993/94 (the latest year for which data is available), there were 224 of these institutions throughout the country (in Hebrew and Arab networks), of which 32 provided teacher training (for primary and intermediate schools) and 101 for training of practical engineers and technicians. The remainder offered qualified nurses' training, training in paramedical occupations, business and clerical courses and arts courses (fashion, design, graphics, etc.). In 1993/94, 59,000 students were studying in post-secondary (non-academic) institutions, an increase of 67 per cent over 1985/86, with substantial growth in all fields of study.

(iii) Vocational training for adults and youth sponsored by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs

103. In addition to the vocational education frameworks described above, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs sponsors an extensive network of vocational training courses for adults (aged 18 and over) and youths (aged 15-18) for the purposes of assisting workers in expanding their employment horizons, enlarging the pool of skilled workers available to the economy and implementing the training aspects of national economic policy in the field of manpower. Training activities are undertaken in close cooperation with industries, employers' organizations and the trade union movement.

104. Adult training activities include:

- (a) Courses for the acquisition of basic skills;
- (b) Short extension and evening courses for supplementing training and refreshing skills;
- (c) Vocational rehabilitation for the handicapped;
- (d) Training of manpower for emergencies;
- (e) Training of practical engineers, technicians and instructors in these subjects;
- (f) Training and retraining programmes for new immigrants, returning Israeli residents and other special groups, as required;
- (g) On-the-job training programmes to train manpower in new and advanced techniques.

105. Training activities are mainly conducted in vocational training centres located throughout the country. Most courses are run by established schools selected by the Ministry, which supervises their operation and subsidizes the trainees (usually unemployed, referred to the schools by the Employment Service). Occupational standards are determined and maintained by the Ministry through supervisors and Ministry licensing examinations. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs also offers financial incentives (such as transportation and subsistence allowances, tuition exemptions and scholarships) to students studying preferred trades.

106. In addition to its regular, ongoing training activities, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs also initiates and carries out programmes to meet the needs of specific groups in the population requiring special assistance in preparing themselves to join the labour market. Currently, there are special programmes in operation and in the planning stages to offer vocational training to immigrants from Ethiopia, from the former Soviet Union (both adults and young people) and women.

107. In 1996, about 130,000 adults were studying in Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs-sponsored programmes, receiving basic and supplementary vocational training in such fields as practical engineering, metalwork, electricity and electronics, mechanics, domestic economy, hotel management, paramedical occupations and computer science.

108. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs is obligated by law to provide training for young people, aged 15 to 18, who have dropped out of the formal education system (see the Youth Labor Law 1953, Part Six and the Apprenticeship Law 1953 in annex 1 to this report - "Labour Laws"). The Ministry has developed several training frameworks to meet the laws' requirements and to suit the needs of those youngsters coming under Ministry care. Youth Training activities include:

1. Apprenticeship programmes combining practical occupational instruction in craft shops and industrial plants with general school studies one or more days a week.
2. Industrial schools, providing post-elementary general and vocational training. The students acquire their vocation through practical work combined with general studies and theoretical training in their vocation. These schools function in cooperation with automotive repair shops, industrial plants and hotels.
3. Other frameworks for skill acquisition:
 - (a) Work groups, which are intended for young people who, for various reasons, cannot be absorbed into regular employment. This framework also combines work with general studies.
 - (b) Pre-military service courses, coordinated with the army, intended for 16-17½ year-olds to acquire a vocation useful both during the period of army service and after discharge from military service.
 - (c) Programmes for problem youngsters combining vocational training with general studies and social adjustment training.

109. In 1996, approximately 12,500 youngsters aged 15 to 18 studied in programmes sponsored by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, more than 75 per cent of them in industrial schools.

Employment opportunities among particular categories of workers

Prohibition of discrimination

110. Certain labour laws prohibit discrimination among candidates for employment or employees.

111. The Employment Service Law 1959 states (see the full text in annex 1 to this report - "Labour Laws"):

"42.(a) When offering employment the Employment Service shall not discriminate against a person on account of his age, sex, race, religion, nationality, State of origin, views or membership in a political party, and a potential employer will not refuse to admit a worker on these grounds, whether or not he was sent to work through the Employment Service.

(b) It will not be considered discrimination when the nature or essence of the position or matters of State security prevent the referral or admission of a person to the said position.

42A. An employer in need of employees shall not advertise a job offer which constitutes discrimination under Article 42."

112. This law became less central with the enactment in 1988 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 1988, and even more so when substantially amended in 1995. The latter law includes various norms, the principal one being the following (see the full text in annex 2 to this report):

"2.(a) An employer shall not discriminate between his employees or job-applicants on account of their sex, sexual orientation, personal status, parenthood, age, religion, nationality, State of origin, views or membership in a political party, in relation to all of the following:

1. Hiring;
2. Job conditions;
3. Job promotion;
4. Vocational training or advanced studies;
5. Firing or Termination Compensations;
6. Retirement benefits and payment granted to an employee;

"(b) For the purposes of subsection (a) the introduction of irrelevant conditions will be considered discriminatory.

"(c) It will not be considered discrimination under this article when the act is necessarily linked to the nature or essence of the job or position.

"2A. (a) an employer shall not require from a job applicant or an employee the details of his military health classification and will refrain from using that information, if he learns about it, in any matter enumerated in article 2(a)(1)-(6).

"(d) In this article, 'military health classification' - is the numeric symbol the Israel Defense Force attributes to a person to indicate his medical compatibility to military service in the various units and positions in the Israel Defense Force."

113. The Equal Employment Opportunities Law 1988 is a modern statute, including various enforcement mechanisms, some of which were unprecedented in Israeli labour law. Breach of the Law constitutes both a civil wrong and a criminal offence. Civil proceedings can be initiated by a worker, a trade union or a civil rights movement. The courts are given special competence to grant compensation even when no material damage was caused. Special protection is granted to a worker filing a complaint under the Law. Supervision and enforcement authority is given to the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs.

114. The Enforcement Division of the Ministry examines complaints from individuals and initiates its own investigations. In 1996, workplaces employing more than five persons were investigated for possible violations relating to sexual harassment at work, discrimination in hiring, promotion and wages, exercise of parents' rights and discriminatory advertisements offering employment.

115. Since the enactment of the Law in 1988 relatively few cases of discrimination at work have been brought to the courts, most of these being for unlawful publication of job advertisements. The 1995 amendment brought about a few more cases, but the main deterrent factor has continued to be the apparent lenience of the courts, apparent mainly in the small sums awarded in compensation.

116. The National Labor Court recently issued a decision promising to become a landmark case. Not only was the compensation award significantly upgraded, the Court made important statements that will undoubtedly enhance the importance of this Law:

"Human beings were born in the image of God. However, they did not descend upon this world as identical to each other. Every person possesses an individual character, his own physiological features and different colour of skin. Hence, in some aspects it may be the case that these differences should lead to differentiated treatment. For example, when different physiological features are involved, different medical treatment may be warranted on that account. However, the basic proposition should be that despite the difference between persons, every human should be treated equally as such."

"Equality was considered by our jurisprudence, both that of the Supreme Court and that of the National Labor Court, as a fundamental right, even before the enactment of the Basic Law, 'The right has graduated' and is now a constitutional right. I do not believe that human dignity and freedom can be discussed without equality, and equality on the job even the more so. A substantial part of our lives is spent in work, and discrimination and degradation cannot be tolerated at the workplace.

"... [T]he right to equal treatment is a fundamental value of democratic system of law. When we discuss equality, we address both formal and substantive equality. Formal equality requires prima facie that people of equal virtues shall receive equal treatment. On the other hand, substantive equality requires that people, even if they differ in irrelevant features, shall receive equal treatment - not necessarily an identical job, but an equal opportunity to receive a suitable job.

"In light of the above-mentioned, it can be concluded, that the underlying ideas behind the standard of behaviour required from a potential employer, is that the questions [in the job interview] shall not include any trace of a stereotyped approach. It should be asked whether the mere asking of a question characterized by stereotyped thinking during a personal interview or on tender invitation forms, is sufficient to hold the potential employer liable. I believe it is enough. Furthermore, when the required qualifications are typically better suiting men than women, it must be shown that the required advantage is necessary linked to the position offered, and that it is impossible to settle for any less. The correct avenue is to examine the person on his own merits, and not the features of the group to which he belongs."

National Labor Court case 1997/3-129 Plotkin v. Eisenberg Brothers Ltd., pp. 6, 8-11, 21.

117. The prohibition of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation was strongly promoted in 1995 by a comprehensive Supreme Court decision, in which an employer was ordered to grant an employee's homosexual partner a certain work-benefit intended for a worker's spouse. This ruling has clear implications for cases of discrimination in hiring.

118. Discrimination on the basis of religion is also specifically covered by article 9C of the Work and Rest Hours Law 1951. This provision prohibits refusal to hire an employee who refuses to work on his religious holidays and prohibits forcing such a worker to pledge to work on such days as a condition for being hired.

119. The significance of all the above goes beyond discrimination in recruitment and covers the whole of labour relations, but discrimination in recruitment is one of the contexts where the statute should prove most influential. This is particularly so in view of the known tendency of workers to refrain from suing their employer as long as the relation is ongoing, and in view of the fact that discrimination in recruitment results in no labour relations at all.

120. Most discrimination cases concern gender discrimination. There is in Israel no data relating to other kinds of discrimination, besides the complex issue of foreign workers dealt with below.

Factual situation

121. Presented below are statistics available on the actual situation in Israel regarding vocational guidance, vocational training, employment and occupation, according to conditions relevant to the non-discrimination principle. It should be noted at the outset that statistics by race or colour are not considered relevant to Israel and are not collected.

1/ Includes persons whose occupations are unknown.

125. With respect to the continent of birth, as of 1995, more than half (55 per cent) of the Jewish employed population was born in Israel. Of the remainder, 16 per cent are immigrants from Asian and African countries and 29 per cent from European and North and South American countries. By occupation, almost a third of those Jews born in Europe and the United States worked in academic and professional occupations, compared with 27 per cent of the Israeli-born and 16 per cent of those born in Asia and Africa. Among all three groups, about 20-25 per cent were employed as skilled workers in industry and construction.

126. As apparent from the data in table 2 of this section's annex, among the Israeli Arab working population, of whom the overwhelming majority are men, half worked as skilled labour in industry and construction. Labour force participation is very low among Israeli Arab women. Of those who are employed, a quarter work in academic and professional fields, 35 per cent are clerical and sales workers and an additional 35 per cent are employed in industry as skilled and unskilled labour.

Foreign workers

127. The phenomenon of foreign workers is not unique to Israel. Statistics from the ILO show that around a third of the developed countries have absorbed significant amounts of this workforce. 1/

128. Until recently the bulk of foreign workers in Israel were Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip. With the increase in the number of terrorist attacks and the concomitant need to close off the territories, a large number of workers came to Israel from all over the world, in particular from Romania and other Eastern European countries, the Philippines, Thailand and other countries in South-East Asia, Africa and South America. They are nearly all employed in the building sector, agriculture, nursing and hotels; a small number are employed in industry and public services.

129. Out of around 2,131,400 workers in Israel in 1996, about 118,000 were foreign workers with permits: 94,000 from all around the world and around 24,000 Palestinian workers from the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

130. The exact number of foreign workers without permits is unknown. The estimate of the Israeli Employment Service is that as of summer 1997 there were 100,000 such workers.

131. As the various types of foreign workers now constitute some 10 per cent of the Israeli workforce, the State has been forced to take a number of steps, as set out below, making a definite distinction between the legal and the practical aspects of the problem.

(i) The legal status of foreign workers in Israel

132. It should be noted at the outset that in addition to being a party to the current Covenant, Israel is a party to the ILO. Migration for Employment Convention (Revised) 1949 (No. 97) (Israel's last report covers the years 1988-1994) and to the Maintenance of Migrants' Pension Rights Convention, 1935 (No. 48) (Israel's last report covers the years 1979-1982).

133. As prescribed by international law and the basic principles of the legal system in Israel, one can safely say that the law in Israel does not discriminate between foreign workers and resident Israeli workers:

The Equal Employment Opportunity Law 1988 prohibits discrimination on the basis of "nationality" or "State of origin" as regards granting work opportunities and determining conditions of work;

The labour laws in Israel that determine the basic rights of the worker (minimum wage, hours of work and rest, prohibition on delaying salary payment, severance pay, safety in the workplace, etc.) apply to every "worker", irrespective of his/her citizenship. This is also the case with regard to other rights stemming from collective agreements and extension orders;

Educational services are provided without distinction to the children of Israeli residents and to the children of foreign workers;

With regard to health services, a distinction should be made between emergency services, granted without distinction to anyone arriving at the outpatients emergency ward of hospitals, and health insurance and other services to which the foreign worker is not entitled on the basis of the National Health Insurance Law 1994. The foreign worker is thus required to insure himself. The exception to this are the three branches of National Insurance - work accidents, maternity and childbirth - which apply by law (the National Insurance Law (revised version) 1995) to all "workers", as opposed to the other branches which are dependent on the person being a "resident";

Welfare services are provided to foreign workers and their families without distinction. There is a statutory requirement on the relevant authority to intervene (such as in the event of violence in the family, sexual assault of minors, neglect of minors, adoption, etc.). As regards other services which are provided to Israelis as part of the benefit programme of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare, the policy is to distinguish between legal and illegal workers: legal workers are entitled to the services provided to Israeli residents, while illegal workers are entitled to emergency services only, with the view to assisting them and their families in leaving the country.

(ii) The reality with regard to foreign workers in Israel

134. In reality, as opposed to the legal situation, foreign workers are more vulnerable than other workers to the possibility of being exploited by employers and the various employment agencies.

135. The employing a foreign worker requires a special residence permit which the relevant employer has taken out for the explicit purpose of the worker working with him alone. In applying the Entry into Israel Law 1952, the Ministry of the Interior makes the granting of a residence permit for the purposes of work conditional on receiving a permit from the Employment Service. The Employment Service in this area operates according to a policy which determines those sectors which require foreign workers, setting quotas for each sector. To get a permit from the Employment Service, the employer has to leave a monetary guarantee of several thousand new shekels to guarantee that the worker will remain with him and leave the country on completion of the work. The employer undertakes in writing to provide the worker with adequate housing, to pay his medical insurance, and to give the worker a copy of his employment contract in a language which the worker understands.

136. The authorities are thus faced with a dilemma. On the one hand is the need to reduce the foreign workforce and in particular combat the phenomenon of remaining in Israel illegally. On the other, it is impossible to ignore the vulnerability of foreign workers, including those with proper work permits. Hence government policy is to act on two levels: to improve enforcement and prevent illegal entry into the country, including returning illegal workers to their country of origin; and improving the help provided to legal foreign workers in enforcing their rights.

137. Below are the main steps currently being taken in the legal and administrative spheres so as to achieve the Government's target of reducing the number of foreign workers while combating discrimination against them.

(iii) The Foreign Workers Administration

138. In 1996, the Government decided to set up the Foreign Workers Administration. The move stemmed from the fear of losing control over the number of foreign workers and from the experience of European countries in this area where the increasing number of foreign workers was accompanied by serious social problems (xenophobia, unemployment, crime, etc.). The job of the Administration is to coordinate the activities of the various authorities involved so as to improve both enforcement of the law and the care for the foreign workers themselves, particularly those in Israel with a permit. The Minister of Labour and Social Affairs is the head of the Ministerial Committee dealing with foreign workers. On 1 June 1997 a full-time chairperson was appointed to the Administration and the body began to work.

139. The first goal set by the Government for the Administration is to curb the phenomenon of workers without permits and gradually reduce the number of permits by 500 workers a month. In the four months since its setting up the Administration recorded a drop of 15,000 in foreign workers with permits.

140. The second goal for the Administration is to coordinate the various non-profit organizations on behalf of the foreign workers, in particular those in Israel with permits, and also directly help the workers themselves by providing information on their rights. However, the Administration is currently still preoccupied with trying to curb the increase of foreign workers, so it will be a while before it can concentrate on providing actual help to foreign workers.

(iv) Legal initiatives

141. The Foreign Employees (Unlawful Employment) Law 1991 sets out criminal prohibitions on employers and employment agencies with respect to employment or detention of a worker without a permit.

142. The power of enforcement under the above law resides with the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs. In the enforcement unit of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs 63 inspectors are currently employed, half of whom are assigned to the subject of foreign workers. Eighteen of these are employed in tracking down foreign workers in Israel without permits, 6 investigate the living conditions of foreign workers and 10 investigate their conditions of work and pay. The inspectors are empowered to impose fines on employers who have not paid workers; however, they are unable to compel the employer to pay the unpaid salary. In special cases the inspectors can bring an indictment, such as where the offences are recurrent or particularly serious. For the purposes of tracking down and expelling illegal workers a joint operation is conducted with the Police and the Ministry of Interior, since inspectors of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs are not empowered to deport individuals.

143. A government bill is designed to compel employers to provide proper living conditions for their foreign workers, to issue each foreign worker with a copy of his or her contract in a language the worker understands, and to provide health insurance. The bill increases the severity of the punishments that can be meted out to employers, improves the supervision capacity of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, and confers supervisory powers on the new bodies described above. The bill is currently at an advanced stage of becoming law.

144. It should be noted that the proposed law is exceptional in terms of the duties it imposes on employers in Israel. It is not normally acceptable in Israeli labour law (as elsewhere) to impose such direct duties on the employer by means of legislation. These are normally obligations which employers accept on themselves, as part of collective agreements, if at all. The measure being introduced here stems from regarding legal foreign workers as requiring greater protection than that granted local workers.

145. Thus, government policy is on the one hand to increase supervisory control and enforcement so as to reduce the phenomenon of foreign workers, and on the other to take steps for the protection of the rights and welfare of legal foreign workers.

Distinctions explicitly permitted

146. Article 2 (c) of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 1988 cited above explicitly states that the non-discrimination prohibition does not apply when a distinction is "necessarily linked to the nature or essence of the job or position". It is not clear yet how this rule will be interpreted, but inference can be made by analogy from the famous High Court of Justice decision in the Alice Miller case. The court overturned the Israeli Air Force's refusal to recruit a woman to its air-pilot training course. The argument that the position was inherently suitable for men only was rejected by the court, which forced the Air Force to recruit Mrs. Miller, stating:

"The right to dignity, which encompasses the prohibition of discrimination against women, is one of the most important and fundamental human rights. As a rule, humiliating a woman through discrimination on a gender basis constitutes a grave insult to her person."

H.C. 4541/93 Miller v. Minister of Defense, P.D. vol. 49 (4) 94, 141.

147. There also exist statutory provisions giving priority to military veterans, single mothers and new immigrants in the domains of recruitment and vocational training. Such preferences are considered legitimate in the light of the special difficulties these categories of workers usually face because of their social condition. They have never been challenged in the courts.

Related international conventions binding Israel

148. Israel is a party to numerous related ILO conventions. The following are those of the most general application:

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) since 1965; last report relates to the years 1991-1993;

Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14) since 1951; last report relates to the years 1990-1993;

Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106) since 1961; last report relates to the years 1990-1993;

Labor Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) since 1955; last report relates to the years 1989-1990;

Holidays with Pay Convention, 1936 (No. 52) since 1951; last report relates to the years 1990-1993;

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19) since 1958; last report relates to the years 1991-1995.

Methods for fixing wages

149. The Wage Protection Law 1958 is the legal source in Israel of an employee's right to remuneration for his or her work. This law defines "wages" in the broadest fashion, determines the time for the payment of wages, creates a right to "wage delay compensation" (including "compensation for delay in severance pay"), prohibits certain deductions from wages and creates a supervisory system under the authority of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs (see the full text in annex A to this report).

150. It is fair to say, however, that wages are fixed in Israel primarily by collective agreements and extension orders and only secondarily by individual labour contracts (notwithstanding the Minimum Wage Law dealt with under the next section). The Wage Protection Law does not stipulate the level of remuneration. Even with respect to modes of payments, it leaves much room for collective bargaining to set different arrangements than those prescribed by the law. Moreover, according to section 21 of the Collective Agreements Law 1957, collective agreements can only add to the minimum rights laid down by protective labour statutes - as they in fact do. Similarly, individual labour contracts can only add to the employee's rights laid down by statute or by an applicable collective agreement.

151. As a matter of fact, the vast majority of employees in Israel are covered by collective agreements. The exact number is hard to determine, but it is normally estimated at around 80 per cent. Collective agreements determine scales of wages unique to each trade union. This has created a complex system of occupational and national wage scales. Even when these scales are formally autonomous, they interact with one another in the course of collective bargaining because of workers' demands for adjustments and linkages.

152. The effectiveness of collective bargaining in wage-fixing is enhanced by the use of "extension orders" under sections 25-33G of the Collective Agreements Law 1957 (see the full text in annex A to this report). The most significant example in this respect relates to "cost-of-living increment". This wage adjustment system, essential in a market used to high levels of inflation, is activated by collective bargaining at the national level, between the most representative organizations of employees and employers. The outcome is then extended by administrative order to all employees in Israel.

153. Were it not for the Labor Courts, the complexity of the wage system would lead to abuses of workers. The Courts have already produced a tremendous corpus of case law, and they are still playing a crucial role in securing workers' rights. A good illustration is the complex task of distinguishing the "basic wage" from special "wage supplements". Such supplements come into being for various reasons, some genuinely related to aspects of the work done, others merely bogus. Bogus wage supplements endanger the basis of wages in general, and undermine the wage protection rules laid down by the law. The Courts' contribution here is in looking beyond the denomination of a wage supplement and at its real substance, always bearing in mind the legitimate interests of the employee.

Minimum wages

154. The Minimum Wage Law 1987 imposes a duty to pay no less than the determined minimum wage. Violation of this is both a civil wrong and a criminal offence.

155. The main feature of this statute is that its provisions determine the minimum wage and the mechanism for its adjustment, leaving no room for collective or individual bargaining.

156. "Minimum wage" means, after the 1997 amendment, 47.5 per cent of the "average wage". The "average wage" is in turn determined by the National Insurance Law 1995 according to the actual distribution of income in the market (see further information on "average wage" under article 9 of the Covenant). In setting the minimum wage at 47.5 per cent of the average wage, the Minimum Wage Law takes into account the needs of workers and their families. As recognized by the National Labor Court:

"The machinery for adjusting the minimum wage was also amended in 1997. The basic calculation is made on the 1st of April each year. This basis must be increased in accordance with changes made in wages by general collective agreement, each time such changes occur (section 4)."

157. The table below shows minimum and average wages in 1986, 1991 and 1996 in relation to the cost-of-living index:

158. Since the coming into effect of the Minimum Wage Law in 1987, there has been a serious erosion in the minimum wage. The minimum wage in 1991 was in fact 44 per cent of the average wage and even dropped to 41 per cent in 1996. This failure of the minimum wage to keep pace with the rise in the general level of wages between 1991 and 1996 was a principal factor behind the 1997 amendments, which both raised the minimum wage from 45 per cent to 47.5 per cent of the average wage and improved the machinery of adjustment, mostly by increasing the frequency of adjustments.

159. Another important feature of this law is that it applies to all "employees". A distinction is nevertheless made in the law itself on the basis of age. The legal arrangements described above constitute the general rule and apply to employees aged 18 or over (sect. 2). Employees under the age of 18 also have the right to a minimum wage, but the content of the rules differs. Section 16 of the Law empowers the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs, with the approval of the Knesset Committee for Labor and Social Affairs, to set different standards for young employees. Ministerial Orders issued under this authority in 1987 set a lower minimum wage, ranging from 60 per cent to 83 per cent of the regular minimum wage, according to the youngster's age, the kind of wages paid and whether he or she is an "apprentice".

160. The Minimum Wage Law also gives the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs supervisory and enforcement powers. The Enforcement Division of the Ministry investigates reports from the public of suspected violations of the Law. The Enforcement Division also initiates its own inspections of the various sectors of the economy and in the regions, industries, and enterprises known to be especially problematic with regard compliance with the the Law (i.e. employers of foreign workers).

161. When a violation is discovered, a letter of warning is sent to the employer. If the violation is rectified, including compensation for any prior periods of failure to pay the legal minimum wage, then no further action is taken. Almost all cases (99 per cent) are settled in this way rather than through taking legal action against the employer. The Enforcement Division reinvestigates former violators periodically to check on continued compliance with the Law.

162. During 1996, the Enforcement Division investigated close to 3,000 enterprises, employing approximately 50,000 workers, with respect to compliance with the Minimum Wage Law. As a result of this supervision, more than 3,000 workers received compensation totalling NIS 1.5 million.

163. Finally, various provisions were added to the law in 1997 in an attempt to encourage employees to file complaints, in order to further promote the implementation of this basic right. Section 7A prohibits an employer from harming an employee with regard to his or her wage, promotion or other conditions of work or from dismissing him or her after claiming violation of the terms of this law. Section 8A empowers the courts to enforce the labour contract when compensation only is judged insufficient sanction. Last but not least, section 14A is intended to help workers of "manpower contractors" (see definition and details under article 6 of the Covenant), by rendering liable under the law the actual person for whom the employee works, in addition to the manpower contractor's liability as the legal employer. Considering that this category of workers seems to be one of those most affected by non-compliance with the Minimum Wage Law, this latter amendment should prove significant.

Equal pay for work of equal value

164. The legal history in the domain of equality of remuneration in Israel reveals an evolving public awareness. The Male and Female Workers Equal Pay Law 1996 totally reshaped the Male and Female Workers Equal Pay Law 1964. The main progress to be noted is a change of conception, from "equal pay for equal work" to "equal pay for work of equal value". The concept of "job analysis", crucial for comparing "work of equal value", is now for the first time given legal significance. The new law enables workers to go beyond the commonly used job descriptions, so as to conduct substantial comparisons between apparently different jobs.

165. The Law empowers the Labor Court to appoint a job analysis expert, whether by request of a party or on its own initiative (sect. 5). Discretion is left to the court to decide if the party or the State Treasury will bear the costs. Due to this Law, this field of expertise will undoubtedly develop. Mention should be made in this context of job analysis and classification undertaken by the Vocational Guidance Division of the Employment Service, for the use of individuals as well as the Vocational Training Department of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs.

166. These concepts are relatively new in the Israeli labour market, so it is too soon to evaluate the Law's impact. But the legal development is in itself remarkable. This relative activism on the part of the legislator is due to recognition of the fact that the legal system has traditionally failed to secure equality of remuneration between men and women. The fact that this is the case in most, if not all, industrial countries has not deterred the Knesset from action.

167. Nevertheless, the overall trend in Israel is one of slow improvement. Women's hourly average wages are still lower than those of men. Over the past 20 years, women's hourly wages have risen somewhat on the average relative to those of men: from 77 per cent in 1975 to about 81 per cent in 1995. By occupation, as shown below, women earned most compared to men (89.5 per cent) in the category "other professionals and technicians" which includes principally kindergarten and primary school teachers, practical engineers and technicians, nurses and paramedical workers. Women earned least relative to men (57 per cent) as skilled workers in industry and construction.

168. In the civil service there was a salary gap of 29 per cent between men and women's average monthly salary for full-time work in 1988, slightly diminishing to 28 per cent in 1990 (Efroni 1990). Recent data supplied by the Treasury Department indicates a further decrease down to a gap of 24 per cent in 1996 (CEDAW, pp. 139-142).

Income distribution of employees

169. Shown below are the few data available on income distribution in Israel. No differentiation is made here between workers in the public and private sectors, nor between actual pay and non-monetary benefits.

171. The data shown above is of relative value for the present purposes, but is the best available. It relates to "income" from all jobs held by all earners in a household, together with allowances, overtime, premiums, income from self-employment, property, interests and dividends, pensions, etc. Non-recurrent income is not included. The demographic and educational characteristics detailed in the table refer to the head of household - i.e. the oldest working person. These data are not available by gender.

172. The data in the above table indicate a correlation between income in Israel and both the level of education and age. Income also tends to be higher among Jews than among non-Jews.

Occupational health and safety

173. Occupational health and safety at the workplace are protected in Israel by different legal arrangements. At the most basic level, social security and regular torts law entitle employees to compensation in the event of work-related injuries (see further detail under article 9 of the Covenant). In addition, protection of workers from work risks is promoted by different laws which create a rather complex regulatory scheme of standards and of institutions to monitor these standards.

174. The Work Safety Ordinance (New Version) 1970 is the main law defining standards for an appropriate environment for people to work in (see the full text in annex A to this report). It deals with safety in areas such as machinery, prevention of falls, entry into confined space, means of escape in the event of fire, etc. It also regulates health hazards, including the control of exposure to hazardous materials, medical supervision, the welfare of employed persons and the control of environmental factors such as temperature, ventilation, lighting, etc.

175. Many regulations have been enacted, in addition to this ordinance, which concern work safety and hygiene, including regulations which control exposure by setting occupational standards. These involve the periodic monitoring of the workplace environment and biological monitoring in order to detect early and minor changes of workers' health at a sub-clinical stage and remove workers from further exposure. These regulations refer to: asbestos, arsenic, benzene, noise, ionizing radiation, metals (lead, mercury, cadmium, chromium, etc.), organic solvents, pesticides and other substances. Some regulations prohibit the use of dangerous agents such as certain carcinogens. Others deal with issues such as safety on building sites or in electricity works, protecting workers by the obligatory use of personal protective gear and other measures.

176. The Labor Inspection (Organization) Law 1954 creates the legal basis for most of the organizations which deal with issues relating to safe and healthy working conditions in the State of Israel (see the full text in annex 1 to this report). The law creates regulatory organizations of various sorts: State organs, public corporation and private bodies. The following is a brief survey of this rather complex system.

The Inspection Service of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs

177. The Inspection Service is legally mandated to supervise labour safety, occupational hygiene and welfare in places where people work or are intended to work. The main targets of the inspection service are:

To prevent work accidents;

To prevent occupational diseases which can be caused by exposure to chemicals or physical hazards;

To raise the level of safety in workplaces where there are machines, processes, handling of materials, storage, etc.;

To maintain appropriate working conditions.

178. For these purposes the law empowers the Inspection Service's inspectors to issue safety orders, prohibiting the use of any machine, installation, equipment or material which endangers the welfare or health of a person. Another instrument is the improvement order by which the occupier of a workplace is required to comply with legal provisions relating to the safety, health, hygiene or welfare of persons working in the workplace. The inspectors carry out regular inspections, investigate work accidents and in general seek to use their authority to achieve the above-mentioned goals. They also supply technical information and advice to employers and workers on the most effective means of complying with legal requirements.

179. The Inspection Service employs 75 labour inspectors and runs the Industrial Hygiene Laboratory. In addition, there are 15 assistant labour inspectors whose main role is to visit workplaces to check working conditions; safety and occupational hygiene, and to instruct managers, supervisors and employees on the safety and health aspects of their work.

180. In 1996 the Inspection Service performed 60,761 inspections of workplaces: more than half of the visits were in industry and workshops, about 15,700 of the inspections were made on building sites, while the rest were at agricultural workplaces, harbours, gas and oil storage facilities, etc. The inspectors carried out 957 investigations of work accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Industrial Hygiene Laboratory performed 3,204 environmental tests in places of work measuring the levels of hazardous materials such as dust, gases and fumes in the air inhaled by workers. Other tests were performed to measure the levels of noise, temperature and other environmental factors.

181. There is a serious problem with traditional health and safety inspection techniques, because of the inability to supervise all places of work with the limited staff available. An inspector today has to check and inspect some 1,000 workplaces, a task which is virtually impossible to carry out in full. As a result, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs is now developing a new approach as follows:

Providing the opportunity for workplaces to adopt health and safety management standards which they may maintain themselves, allowing the labour inspectors to take a supervisory "back seat" role;

Emphasizing the prevention of hazards at source by obliging manufacturers and importers to introduce only equipment and materials which meet safety and health standards;

Creating a newly revised and up-to-date information system which will enable inspectors to focus their resources in areas needing priority attention. This information system will also be shared with other institutions like the Institute for Safety and Industrial Hygiene (see below) in deciding upon policy.

The Institute for Safety and Hygiene

182. The Labor Inspection (Organization) Law 1954 also created a specialized public corporation - the Institute for Safety and Hygiene. This institute is legally autonomous from the State but is under the ministerial responsibility of the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs. Its roles are to conduct courses and activities aimed at heightening safety awareness and to carrying out research and publishing its findings.

Private regulatory bodies

183. The law also mandates the occupiers of workplaces of more than 50 workers to appoint safety officers, who must be authorized by the Inspection Service. These officers have an important role. Their duty is to use their professional skills and knowledge to promote safety issues in workplaces. They have the legal power to stop any work, machine or process in the workplace if it creates an immediate danger to a worker.

184. The law also mandates the establishing of safety committees in workplaces with 25 employees or more. The duties of these committees are: to clarify causes and circumstances of work accidents; to propose measures for their prevention; to recommend improvements and to advise regarding safety regulations.

185. In addition, the employer has to provide all workers with updated information about hazards that exist in the workplace, and to instruct them on how to perform their work safely and to avoid occupational hazards. Furthermore, in every workplace with 50 employees or more a safety programme has to be prepared which includes a timetable to perform all changes and improvements needed to raise the level of safety in the workplace and maintain the workplace with minimum risk to workers.

186. All workers in the State of Israel are included in the existing protective schemes provided by law and benefit equally from them.

Equal opportunity for promotion

191. The Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 1988 prohibits discrimination in the area of promotion. This law was discussed above in the context of the right to work. There are only a few additions that need to be made here.

192. The first landmark decision in Israel on the issue of discrimination at work, given by the National Labor Court in 1974, dealt directly with the issue of promotion. In the absence of an immediate statutory source, the Court based its reasoning on the illegality of a collective contract contradicting public policy, discrimination being seen as such a contradiction.

193. Promotion rights are primarily found in collective agreements. Consequently, equality of opportunity in promotion remains a question of non-discrimination in collective agreements. Factual data are hard to gather on such matters.

194. Finally, equal opportunity in promotion should be indirectly enhanced by the development of "job analysis", which is developing for the sake of claims under the Female and Male Workers Equal Pay Law, 1996. This should be so because opportunities for promotion are obviously dependent on the jobs available, which are in turn dependent on the job descriptions considered relevant by the employer. Using job analysis should widen the range of factors to be considered in granting promotion and make it more difficult for employers to discriminate in promoting workers.

Rest and leisure

195. Rest and leisure-related rights are secured in Israel on two levels: several protective laws define binding minimum standards; additional rights stem from collective agreements and sometimes from extension orders.

196. The Hours of Work and Rest Law 1951 defines the length of the working day, the working week, weekly rest and work breaks (see full text in annex A to this report). It sets the procedure for employing workers beyond the quota of hours provided for in the law or during the weekly rest, including the compensation to be paid for such overtime work. Breach of this law is grounds for a civil suit by the employee, and in some instances constitutes a criminal offence of the employer. In addition, the law provides the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs with various powers, mainly for supervision, inspection and the issuance of exceptional work permits.

197. The Annual Leave Law 1951 defines the right to annual leave and its duration, as well as remuneration during such leave (see full text in annex A to this report). It also covers such issues as the amount of leave that may be accumulated and the limitation period for bringing actions to court under the law. The law also includes criminal and regulatory provisions similar to those of the Work and Rest Hours Law 1951.

198. Collective agreements commonly grant more generous rights than those laid down by the above two laws and extension orders are commonly issued. As a result, for about 80 per cent of workers these statutes are of little importance.

199. A shift took place in Israel between 1995 and 1997 from a six to a five-day working week. This shift is one of the best examples of the importance of collective bargaining. A general collective agreement was first reached in 1995 at the national level by the most representative organizations of employees and of employers. This agreement was a year later extended to the vast majority of workers in Israel. Accordingly, the maximum "working week" for most workers went down, firstly to 45 hours a week and, as from 1 July 1997, to 43 hours. The legislator then amended the law in 1997 so that the maximum "working week" was set to 45 hours a week (instead of 47 hours).

200. Neither of the above laws applies to all employees. Each law specifies certain types of workers excluded from coverage (section 30 (a) of the Hours of Work and Rest Law 1951 and section 35 (a) of the Annual Leave Law 1951). But none of the categories is based on discrimination. The exclusions stem from the characteristics of specific sorts of employment, not from personal characteristics of the employee.

201. A distinction between Jews and non-Jews is made in the Hours of Work and Rest Law 1951, which requires explanation. For Jews, weekly rest must include Saturday - the Jewish religious rest day (Sabbath), whereas for non-Jews it must include either Friday, Saturday or Sunday, according to the worker's custom (sect. 7). The Israeli courts have explained this difference by noting the two objects of the law: one, social - to protect workers' health by providing for rest - the other being to conserve the Jewish people's heritage and to respect the religious feelings of broad parts of the population. One should bear in mind that a large number of non-religious Jews still define themselves as "traditionalist" and cherish the fact that Sabbath is a common special day.

202. In addition to the above laws, below are the laws enumerating the public holidays employees are entitled to without pay deduction:

(a) Religious holidays of members of the Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Druze communities in Israel;

(b) Independence Day;

(c) Election Day.

203. The employers' obligation to pay workers for public holidays is stipulated in the collective bargaining agreements for each economic sector.

Article 8 - Collective labour rights

Related international conventions binding Israel

204. Israel has been a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights since 1991. Israel's initial report is to be submitted this year.

205. Israel has been a party to the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), since 1957; the last report relates to the years 1992-1993.

206. Israel has been a party to the ILO Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), since 1957; the last report relates to the years 1993-1994.

207. As already mentioned, the ILO standards have had and still retain tremendous influence on the shape of Israeli labour law. This is even more so as far as collective labour law is concerned. In the first place, a central statute in this field, the Collective Agreements Law 1957, was deliberately drafted so as to comply with the ILO Convention No. 98. Secondly, important issues in this field are not covered by legislation but by judicial precedents, which have always been primarily influenced by ILO conventions and standards.

Formation of trade unions and membership

208. While trade unions in Israel have statutory status and powers (described below), there is no law regulating their formation and the conditions for joining them. Nevertheless, the right to organize in trade unions is recognized by Israeli courts as a fundamental principle, whether as part of the civil right to organize or as a specific worker's right. As the High Court of Justice stated in a recent landmark case:

"The right of association is 'one of the human liberties' [cite omitted], and it is deeply entrenched and well protected in the jurisprudence [cite omitted]. This is so in general, and also in respect of the right to organize in a trade union [cite omitted] ... Indeed, in Israel too, workers of all kinds are entitled to establish an organization of their choice, without any prior authorization requirement.

"The right to freedom of association, and its various components, is not written in a code of legislative acts. This right was recognized in two international labour conventions ... Those treaties were not incorporated into Israeli law. Nevertheless, the trend to reconcile domestic law and the State's international obligations as undertaken in treaties, has led to the recognition that 'according to the international labour law which is binding in Israel, the right of workers to organize is ensured' [cite omitted]. In light of the essence of this right, it can be said that 'the freedom of Israeli workers to form trade associations is one of the fundamental bases of our democratic society ... and the Court has been and will continue to be diligent in securing its existence and giving optimal meaning and validity to its protection' [cite omitted]. It should be noted, that not long ago it was proposed that the right to organize in trade unions be incorporated in the draft Basic Law: Social Rights Bill, and thereby accord it a constitutional status ... Although this proposed legislation was not adopted, the status of freedom of association as a fundamental principle of the system was not impaired."
H.C. 7029/95 The New General Workers' Histadrut v. The National Labour Court, Amit et al., Takdin-Supreme vol. 97 (1), 38, pp. 51 and 89-90.

209. The right thus includes the right to form a union, the freedom of operation of a union, and the right to freely join a union, including the right not to join one.

The right to form a trade union

210. As a general rule, any group of workers can form a labour union, but for this union to have legal power it must meet the recognized characteristics of a workers' organization and it must be representative.

211. The Labour Courts have developed a significant set of tests for the identification of an organization as a trade union:

Stability: the organization needs to be created with no time limit or for a long period, not for a particular bargaining session;

By-laws: the organization has to have by-laws regulating its aims, its institutions and their power, conditions for membership, and the like;

Personal and voluntary membership: a trade union must be based on the personal and free consent of workers to accept membership. This applies to becoming a member as well as to forfeiting membership;

Workers' representation: the vast majority of members have to be employees;

Aims: the organization's aims have to be first and foremost collective bargaining with the employer for the purpose of fixing working conditions and workers' rights within collective agreements;

Independence: a trade union has to be independent from the employer and free to operate without external intervention;

Internal democracy: a trade union has to respect minimal democratic principles such as periodic, free and equal elections of representatives, with the participation of all member workers, public accountability of representatives, freedom of speech of workers and principles of non-discrimination.

Incorporation: there is no requirement to be formally incorporated.

212. Representation requirements are defined in the Collective Agreements Law 1957 according to the type of agreement (see full text in annex A to this report). Section 2 of this law distinguishes between a "special collective agreement", which relates to a particular undertaking or employer, and a "general collective agreement", which relates to branches of employment in the whole country or in a particular area. For both types, the basis of representation is the "greatest number of organized employees to whom the agreement is to apply"; for a "general" agreement, representation is a function of membership only; for a "special" agreement, it is either membership or other form of representation (i.e. by a special decision by workers), but the organization must represent not less than one third of the total number of employees to whom the agreement is to apply (see sections 3 and 4 of the Law).

Number and structure of trade unions in Israel

(i) The Histadrut

213. There exist in Israel a relatively large number of trade unions. The most prominent is the General Federation of Labor - Histadrut. It was created in 1920, long before the creation of the State. Its name was then the General Federation of Jewish Workers in Israel and it was changed in 1966, reflecting the fact that the Histadrut had become representative of all workers, including non-Jews. In 1996 it was renamed again The New Histadrut, reflecting a change in leadership. According to its by-laws, any worker aged 18 or over who is not a member of another labour organization may become a member. In fact, Histadrut membership extends across a broad spectrum: production workers and clerks, blue and white collar workers, urban and rural workers, academicians and unskilled labourers, retired persons and students, Jews and non-Jews, men and women, and so on.

214. The Histadrut's highest legislative institution is its National Conference, whose candidates are elected in proportional and secret elections on the basis of political party lists. The main Israeli parties are represented. The Labour Party retained its majority until 1994, when it had to enter a coalition with a new list that had taken over. The Secretary-General has always been a Labour Knesset member, except for a period of about two years between 1994 and 1996.

215. Histadrut's activities traditionally aim to be of a holistic nature, including trade union, social security and mutual aid, labour economy, culture and education. However, trade union activities are today undoubtedly the most important. These are conducted according to the Histadrut by-laws on three levels: the workers' committee in every plant which represents all workers in the plant; a local or regional worker's council representing the Histadrut at the local level; and the national union, which is organized by profession, occupation or industry. There are 37 national unions operating under the Histadrut umbrella. Each national union is empowered to sign collective agreements on behalf of the Histadrut.

216. The vast majority of Israeli employees belong to the Histadrut. Up until 1995 membership in the Histadrut was linked with membership in the General Health Fund, the main provider of health services in the country, which is affiliated to the Histadrut. As a result there were many members who were not workers and a portion of the General Health Fund was transferred to the Histadrut. This link was severed in 1995 when a new National Health Insurance Law remodelled the system of funding of health providers in Israel, resulting in a certain cut in the Histadrut membership. There is no doubt, however, that the Histadrut still remains the largest and most representative workers' organization in Israel. Exact membership numbers are no longer disclosed by the Histadrut.

217. The prominence of the Histadrut gives it a special status. General collective agreements between the Histadrut and the Coordinating Council of the Economic Organizations (relating to the private sector) or between the Histadrut and the Government (relating to the public sector) are the most influential instruments shaping labour relations and working conditions in Israel today, especially when extended by extension order. Examples of the sort can even be found in various parts of this report, as with regard to "wage fixing" and the "cost-of-living increment", or the shortening of the "working week". A dramatic illustration of the importance of this instrument was in 1985, when the inflation rate had got out of control, reaching around 400 per cent annually, and an emergency economic plan was badly needed. An economic package was eventually finalized at the highest level on a tripartite basis - between the Finance Minister, the Secretary-General of the Histadrut and the Chairman of the Coordinating Council of the Economic Organizations. This deal is considered to have greatly contributed to saving the Israeli economy.

(ii) Labour organizations other than the Histadrut

218. Some of the free professions are organized within the Histadrut, but a few others are organized in independent trade unions: the Medical Federation, the Journalists' Union, the High School Teachers' Union and the University Teachers' Union. Some unions, although organized within the Histadrut, enjoy a high degree of autonomy, such as the Union of Engineers and Architects.

219. Other unions in Israel are of a general character, like the Histadrut, but with far fewer members and less political and social influence. The differences between them and the Histadrut are ideological. The largest such organization is the National Workers' Federation, which offers a more nationalist platform than the somewhat socialist one of the Histadrut. It does not publish numerical information on its membership and usually has not been successful in becoming the representative organization in places of employment. There also exist a few small labour organizations of religious orientation. These organizations have never really competed with the Histadrut, but have come to agreements with it, granting them representation in delimited places of employment.

220. Although one can doubt the significance of the role played by non-Histadrut labour organizations in shaping Israeli labour relations, their continued existence does attest to the reality of freedom of formation and operation of trade unions. Furthermore, national unions within the Histadrut have sometimes threatened to step out and gain independence, affirming their legal right to do so. This aspect of trade unions' rights has had its influence on the Histadrut itself.

Individual freedom to join a trade union

221. No employee in Israel can be forced to join a labour organization. This clearly derives from the norm mentioned above, according to which "voluntary membership" is an inherent characteristic of a labour union. This was stated by the Labour Court on various occasions such as the following:

"Whereas 'freedom of association' is directed, essentially, towards the relevant public, the 'right to associate' is directed at the individual. The 'right to associate' ensures that the individual is always able to join an organization of his choice."

1975/5-1 Markovitz Leon et al. v. Histadrut, PDA 6, 197.

222. As to the meaning of "voluntary membership" the court has made it clear -

"Voluntarism in our context means that membership in the association is the result of the will of the person in question; if he so chooses - he may join the association; if he so chooses - he may leave it. The answer to the question whether membership in an association is voluntary may be found in its code."

1982/5-2 Histadrut v. The Paz Senior Workers' Association, PDA 14, 367, 385.

223. Collective agreements in Israel also reflect this principle. These commonly set arrangements of the "agency shop" type: the employer recognizes the labour organization with which the agreement is made as his or her counterpart for collective bargaining, and agrees that collective agreements with this organization should apply to all workers employed by him or her. But in contrast to "closed shop" arrangements, according to which the employer undertakes not to hire employees who do not join the labour organization with which the agreement was made, "agency shop" arrangements leave the individual workers the choice whether to join the union or not. However, this arrangement requires employees who choose not to be members of a union to pay a "trade union service fee".

224. The said service fee, which is lower than the membership fee and does not confer membership rights or duties, is considered a fair contribution in return for services. One should remember that collective agreements can only add to the workers' rights and may apply also to workers who are not members of the union but who are employed at the workplace covered by the agreement. The trade union service fee gained statutory recognition in 1964, when the Wages Protection Law 1958 was amended to include "trade union service fees" among the permissible deductions from a worker's wages.

225. The legitimacy of "closed shop" arrangements was dealt with in brief by the Labour Court in a relatively recent case.

Freedom of operation of trade unions

226. Labour unions in Israel are free to formulate their constitutions without any interference on the part of the State. This basic principle is clearly recognized by the Labour Court:

"One of the elements of 'freedom of association' is the right of the organization to make its own constitution, in accordance with the laws of the State, as long as such laws are not contradictory to the principle of freedom of association."

1975/5-1 Markovitz Leon et al. v. Histadrut, PDA 6, 197.

227. Freedom to organize goes with its accompanying rights; these together make up the civil liberties necessary to the continuous and routine operation of trade union activities, such as personal freedom, protection from arbitrary arrest or imprisonment, freedom of expression and so on. Labour organizations have always enjoyed such liberties in Israel, and their application to labour relations is taken for granted.

228. A union's freedom also means autonomy in collective bargaining. This would have no meaning without collective agreements being granted recognition. The Collective Agreements Law 1957 not only recognizes collective agreements and grants them the power to determine workers' rights, it also keeps to a minimum the possibility for State interference. Thus, to be recognized a collective agreement need only be filed for registration, the registrar having no discretion on the matter. Furthermore, a claim with regard to representation can only be initiated by another employees' organization (art. 6 of the Collective Agreement Law 1957).

229. Nevertheless, since collective agreements have the effect of law for the workers to whom they apply, commonly recognized restrictive principles apply. Although the content of a collective agreement is left to the parties to define, it is not allowed to contravene the law or fundamental public interests. In this spirit, the Labour Court decided that principles of regular contracts law in Israel - such as the duty of "good faith" in negotiations or the various grounds for nullity of contracts - apply to collective bargaining and agreements. The doctrine of "fair representation" is applied as well.

The right to strike

The status of the right to strike

230. The right to strike as such is not regulated by an explicit legal provision, however, it is uncontested that such a right exists under Israeli law. On countless occasions the Labour Courts and ordinary courts of Israel have recognized explicitly or implicitly the right of workers to strike as a basic liberty. In a landmark case, the Supreme Court of Israel analysed the status of the right to strike:

"The statutory law in Israel does not include a specific provision granting workers the right to strike, but the issue of striking is mentioned in many legislative acts ... [list of provisions omitted]. Despite the lack of a positive legislative provision concerning the 'right' to strike, its existence has been recognized by the Labour Courts and the ordinary courts. In Case 31/4-4 [Labour Court cite omitted], it was stated that 'the view that participation in a strike suspends the labour contract, and does not constitute a breach of contract is derived from the right to strike, and although in Israel this right is not explicitly provided for in a legislative act, it arises from the ILO Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, ratified by Israel, and is supported by the various provisions in labour laws' [additional citations omitted]. In C.A. 573/68, P.D. vol. 23 (1), 516, the Supreme Court (opinion of Judge Berenson) recognized the legality of a strike which 'conformed with and was legal under tort laws'. In C.A. 25/71, P.D. vol. 25 (1) 129, 131, Judge H. Cohen wrote the following: 'It can be said that nothing could be further from the Israeli legislator's mind than the intent to abolish the institution of strikes: if one of the English judges referred in a recent judgement to the right to strike as a "sacred cow", we should consider it at least a sacred tradition which can no longer be doubted.' In C.S.A. 1, 2/86, P.D. vol. 40 (2) 406, 415, [Supreme Court] President Shamgar held that Article 19 of the Collective Agreements Law, 1957 is designed to protect the right to strike. Consequently, it can be said that the 'right' to strike has gained a strong position in Israeli legislation and case law."

C.A. 593/81 Ashdod Car Factories Ltd. v. Chizik, P.D. vol. 41 (3) 169, 191.

231. In parallel, the courts have recognized as a corollary of the right to strike the employer's right to order a lock-out. However, such action on the part of the employer can only be taken as a defensive measure (i.e., as a reaction to a strike) and must be proportional in its effect to the measures taken by the employees.

232. The already mentioned Basic Law: Social Rights Bill addresses the right to strike (in art. 5). Its adoption would build upon the existing recognition of the right to strike and afford it additional constitutional protection, thus securing not only the status of this right but also its scope. Such protection is needed to counter the possible restrictive effects of the existing Basic Laws which gave constitutional status to the rights to property and to freedom of contract.

The content of the right to strike

233. The term "strike" has been defined by judicial precedents. A strike is basically a collective measure applied in the context of a labour dispute between recognized parties. Even though protection is given to the individual employee, the exercise of this right is not left in his hands but to the recognized party to a labour dispute - his or her labour organization. Or, in the wording of the Settlement of Labour Disputes Law 1957 (art. 3):

"In a labour dispute between the employer and his employees or some of his employees, the parties to the dispute are the employer and the labour organization representing most of the employees affected by the dispute, and in the absence of such a labour organization, the representatives elected by most of these employees, whether for general matters or for the specific labour dispute."

234. The right to strike is implemented in Israel by granting special protection to workers and their organizations when going on strike:

(a) First and foremost, participation in a strike shall not be considered a breach of individual labour contract, including individual obligations under a collective agreement (art. 19 of the Collective Agreements Law 1957). The strike only suspends the labour contract, but does not provide legal justification for its termination;

(b) Second, a strike does not constitute a breach of contract for the purposes of presenting a tort claim for "causing a breach of contract" (art. 62 (b) of the Torts Ordinance (Revised Version));

(c) A strike does not interrupt continuity in employment for the purposes of calculating benefits under the various protective labour laws, such as pension (art. 3 (2) of the Public Service (Pensions) Law (Consolidated Version) 1970), severance compensation (art. 2 (6) of the Severance Pay Law 1963), annual leave (art. 4 (4) Annual Leave Law 1951), rights of veterans (art. 4 (b) of the Discharged Soldiers Reinstatement Law 1949) and soldiers in reserve service (art. 7 (c)(3) of the Reserve Service (Benefits) Law 1952);

(d) A strike regarded as legitimate by the courts will not give grounds for an injunction against the strikers' union, and no relief will be granted in favour of a party to a strike who acts unlawfully or in bad faith. The courts are guided in this regard by general principles as well as by the Settlement of Labour Disputes Law 1957. This law places limitations on strikes (described below), hence supporting the view that strikes that meet those conditions are legitimate.

(e) Lastly, the Employment Service may not interfere with strikes, and is prohibited from referring potential employees to replace workers on strike (art. 44 of the Employment Service Law 1959).

Restrictions placed on the right to strike

235. The right to strike in Israel is not unlimited, and certain restrictions have been recognized by the courts based on various sources - legislation, labour organizations' by-laws, collective agreements - and with the guidance of ILO standards. It should be noted that similar restrictions, created by all three alternative sources of law, apply with regard to lock-outs.

(i) Restrictions in legislation

236. Article 5 A of the Settlement of Labour Disputes Law 1957 imposes a technical prerequisite on the right to strike:

"Notwithstanding Article 5, a party to a dispute must give notice [of dispute] to the other party and to the chief official, on every strike or lock out, whichever is relevant, at least fifteen days before their initiation."

This provision has been explained by the Supreme Court as introducing a compulsory "cooling off" period designed to enable the parties to the dispute to resolve their differences through negotiations.

237. The Labour Courts have placed a broad construction on this provision and required prior notice in a range of partial work sanctions such as slow-downs, refusal to work overtime and partial strikes. In the public sector, failure to serve notice would automatically lead to the classification of the strike as unprotected.

238. Article 37 A and B of the Labour Dispute Settlement Law 1957 provides that a strike in the public sector which takes place within the duration of a collective agreement (with the exception of a strike unrelated to wages or social conditions, approved by a qualified labour union), or in the absence of such agreement and not authorized by the qualified labour union organs, will be classified as an unprotected strike.

239. The classification of a strike as unprotected does not necessarily imply that it is also unlawful, but such determination will result in the loss of some of the privileges accorded to participants in a lawful and protected strike.

240. Article 37 A of the Labour Dispute Settlement Law 1957 permits political strikes (i.e. strikes unrelated to wages or social conditions) in the public sector, even during the life of the collective agreement, on condition that they are approved by the qualified union organ. No similar provision can be found with regard to the private sector. Thus, no strike will be recognized as lawful in that sector during the life of a collective agreement.

(ii) Restrictions in union by-laws

241. The labour unions have voluntarily provided, in their constitutive instruments and other by-laws, for certain procedures to be complied with in every case a strike is to be called. For instance, the constitution of the Histadrut lays down a system of consultations and voting procedures involving the national union representatives, the local workers' committees and the Histadrut Workers' Council. Failure to comply with these procedures would lead to the classification of the strike as an unlawful (or a "wildcat") strike.

(iii) Restrictions in collective agreements

242. In many collective agreements a provision prohibiting strikes for their duration can be found. Furthermore, the Labour Courts have held that an implicit presumption of non-strike obligation can be found in any collective agreement. In addition, any difference pertaining to the implementation of the agreement should be resolved through the mechanisms provided for in the agreement, or, in their absence, through the Labour Courts. Thus, unless there is some indication to the contrary in the agreement itself, strikes conducted during the life of a collective agreement are unlawful. This line of decisions of the Labour Courts has been significantly narrowed by the Supreme Court, which has held that the obligation not to strike is valid only if the other party keeps his or her obligations under the agreement.

(iv) Additional restrictions in case law

243. The main restriction imposed by the Courts on the right to strike stems from a Supreme Court decision that the immunity granted under article 62 of the Torts Ordinance (Revised Version), dealing with the tort of "causing a breach of contract", does not extend to encompass other torts. Consequently, strikers can be held liable under several wrongs, such as negligence, trespassing, misappropriation of personal property and nuisance. This decision implies that the right to strike can only be applied subject to the non-commission of a tort vis-à-vis third parties.

244. Another limitation involves the purpose of the strike. A strike cannot be considered lawful if it has nothing to do with labour relations. Hence, a political protest can only lead to a short protest strike. The exact definition of "political strike" in this sense is rather dynamic and hard to grasp.

245. Additional restrictions apply to unprotected strikes in the Public Sector:

(a) The Employment Service may send replacement workers to substitute the strikers;

(b) A strike can be deemed a breach of the collective employment agreement;

(c) Immunity under article 62 of the Tort Ordinance (Revised Version) is lost (but only vis-à-vis the direct parties to the labour dispute).

Statistics on strikes in Israel

246. The following figures amply demonstrate the frequent use made of the right to strike by employees in Israel and of employers' lock-outs.

The armed forces, the police and the administration of the State

247. Any group of workers can form a trade union, with a few exceptions. Members of the police force are prohibited by law from creating an organization of their own, but they are allowed to join regular trade unions. Judges traditionally do not consider themselves ethically free to organize, even though there is no statutory provision on the matter. In any case, the courts have ruled that the status of judges is a special one, and that they are not "employees". Civil servants, on the other hand, are under no limitation whatsoever to organize and they have done so.

248. Furthermore, the courts have held that in circumstances where the exercise of the right to strike would cause detriment to another vital interest in an irreconcilable way, the right to strike may be restricted. Thus, soldiers and policemen cannot strike.

249. Regarding civil servants, the right to strike may be restricted for "indispensable" workers in specific key positions, who perform crucial tasks for the safeguard of vital public interests (i.e. certain medical functions, vital social services, supply of vital public commodities, and so on). Use of governmental emergency powers is then made to order individual workers to stay at work. Breach of such orders can be sanctioned by penal law.

250. It should be stressed, however, that the use of emergency orders is dependent upon specific approval by the Cabinet. Furthermore, according to the Attorney-General's Directives, consultation with the Attorney-General's office is also required, and each individual order to be issued is then checked.

Article 9 - The right to social security

Related international conventions binding Israel

251. Israel is a party to the ILO Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) and regularly submits reports to the advisory committee on the measures taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. Its last report relates to the years 1992-1995.

252. Israel is also a party to the ILO Maintenance of Migrants' Pension Rights Convention (No. 48) since 1963; the last report covers the years 1979-1982.

253. In addition, since 1965 Israel is a party to the ILO Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention (No. 118); Israel's last report covers the years 1991-1993.

Social security branches in Israel

254. Most social security schemes in Israel are public and regulated by the National Security Law (Revised) 1995. The full text of this comprehensive law is attached in annex 2 to this report. The Law combines two kinds of arrangements: insurance-based rights, proportionate to the premiums paid; and arrangements aimed at assisting people in need. The Supreme Court declared the social purpose of this central piece of legislation as follows:

"The purpose is to guarantee sufficient living resources to the insured, their dependants and their survivors, every time their income decreases or disappears due to one of the reasons enumerated in the law, such as injury on the job, unemployment, birth, death, etc."

C.A. 255/77 The National Insurance Institute v. Almohar,
P.D. vol. 29 (1) 11, 13-14.

255. The following branches of social security exist in Israel and are administered by the National Insurance Institute (hereinafter "NII"): maternity benefits; old-age benefits; disability (invalidity) benefits; survivors' benefits; work (employment) injury benefits; unemployment benefits; child allowances (family benefits). In addition, the NII is responsible for administering the following benefits and compensations: long-term care, mobility, income maintenance support, accident injury, rights of volunteers, hostile action casualties, violence in family, "Prisoners of Zion", "Righteous Gentiles", reserve duty service, insurance of employees of bankrupt and liquidated firms, guarantee of alimony payments and others.

256. The NII is also responsible both for collection and distribution of insurance premiums in relation to health services, according to the National Health Insurance Law which came into effect in January 1995. (Full account on this topic is provided under article 12 of this report.)

Maternity benefits

(i) Coverage

257. The following benefits are granted:

(a) Hospitalization grant, maternity grant and birth allowance to:

- (i) Insured woman or wife of insured individual, even if she gave birth outside Israel;
- (ii) Employee or self-employed woman working in Israel or the wife of an employee or self-employed individual working in Israel for at least six months immediately preceding the birth, even if not residents of Israel, provided she gave birth in Israel;

Paragraph (ii) above does not apply to an individual who lives in the territories or within the Palestinian Autonomy and is not an Israeli resident as defined by law;

(b) Maternity allowance and vacation pay to:

- (i) An employee or self-employed woman, aged 18 or over, working in Israel;
- (ii) A woman aged 18 or over in vocational training; a woman employee working abroad under certain conditions;

(c) Risk Pregnancy Benefit to a resident of Israel who is an employee or self-employed woman.

(ii) Nature and level of benefits

258. The maternity grant, given to the mother in the hospital to purchase a layette for the newborn child, is paid at the following rates: 20 per cent of the average wage* for one child, 100 per cent of the average wage for twins, and an additional 50 per cent of the average wage for every additional child born in the same birth. The grant for a multiple birth is determined according to the number of children who remain alive at least seven days; if they leave the hospital before the end of the seven-day period immediately following the birth, the grant is determined according to the number of children who leave the hospital.

259. An adopting parent receives a grant equivalent to the maternity grant, according to the number of children under 10 years old who were adopted on the same day.

260. Maternity allowance is paid at a rate of 100 per cent of the average daily income of the entitled woman in the three months preceding the determining date, from which income tax and (national and health) insurance contributions are deducted.

261. Other benefits under maternity insurance include the birth allowance, paid for six months to a mother who gives birth to three or more children at one birth; the risk pregnancy benefit, paid to a woman who ceases work due to need for precautionary rest as a result of a risk pregnancy; and the special allowance and benefit, paid to the widower of a woman who died while giving birth or within a year of giving birth.

* The reference is to the average wage according to the National Insurance Law, for purposes of benefits and insurance contributions. It is calculated according to a method determined in the Law, on 1 January of every year, and it is updated each time a cost-of-living compensation is paid to employees.

(iii) Method of financing

262. Financing of this branch is based on insurance premiums, or contributions (compulsory payments as percentage of wages or income), as follows:

	Full rate	Reduced rate*
Employee	0.60%	0.33%
Employer	0.15%	0.15%
Self-employed	0.75%	0.48%
Other insured	0.25%	0.11%
Government
- for employee	0.10%	0.03%
- for self-employed	0.10%	-

* Employees, self-employed and insured workers who are non-workers and non-self-employed pay reduced rates of insurance contributions on the part of income which is up to half the average wage according to the National Insurance Law, beginning in January.

Old-age benefits(i) Coverage

263. An Israeli resident, aged 18 or over, unless immigrated for the first time at age 60 or over, is insured for old-age benefits. A new immigrant who is not insured due to his age at the time of his immigration and who has reached pension age is eligible for a special old-age benefit. This benefit is not covered under the National Insurance Law but rather under a special agreement, and is paid at the same rate as the regular old-age pension.

264. A recent enactment which is to be gradually implemented enables a housewife whose husband is insured or a widow receiving a pension to be covered if she does not work outside the home, was born after 31 December 1930, is between the ages of 60 and 65, and is a resident of Israel. A married woman who does not work outside her home and who receives a general disability pension, as well as other individuals not covered in compulsory insurance, may insure themselves through voluntary insurance.

(ii) Coverage and nature of benefits

265. The basic old-age pension is intended to guarantee a minimum level of basic subsistence. Men aged 70 and over and women aged 65 and over are paid at a uniform rate of the average national wage, in accordance with percentages prescribed by law and according to the number of the insurees' dependants. For men aged 65-70 and women aged 60-65, payment of pension is conditional on a means test.

266. The pension rates, as percentage of the average wage, are as follows: single person - 16 per cent; couple - 24 per cent; couple with one child - 29 per cent; couple with two or more children - 34 per cent; single person with one child - 21 per cent; single person with two or more children - 26 per cent. Pension payments are adjusted whenever the average wage is adjusted.

267. The dependants' increment is paid for husband or wife, and for each of the first two children of the person receiving pension on condition that they do not receive a pension themselves. Increment rates are included in the pension rates given above. A housewife is not entitled to a dependant's increment, but to the basic pension only.

268. Other increments include seniority increment (2 per cent of the pension for each year in excess of 10 years' insurance, up to a ceiling of 50 per cent of the pension), deferred retirement income (5 per cent of the pension for each year that the person - aged 65-70 for men, 60-65 for women - was not eligible for a pension because he/she has an earned income, up to a ceiling of 50 per cent of the pension) and income supplement.

(iii) Method of financing

269. The old-age and survivors' pensions are financed by insurance contributions and by government participation, as follows:

(a) Insurance contributions

	Full rate	Reduced rate
Employee	2.70%	1.46%
Employer	1.85%	1.85%
Self-employed	4.55%	2.63%
Other insured	5.42%	2.63%
Housewife	exempt
Government
- for employee	0.87%	0.19%
- for self-employed	0.87%	0.07%

(b) Government participation

The Government provides allocations at the rate of 15 per cent of total insurance contribution receipts, full financing of pensions to new immigrants, and financing of income supplement to pension recipients.

Disability benefits

(i) Eligibility

270. An Israeli resident aged 18 or over and not yet 65 (man) or 60 (woman) is eligible.

(ii) Coverage

271. The monthly disability pension is paid at the rate of 25 per cent of the average wage for a single person whose degree of disability is at least 75 per cent. This pension is increased by 7 per cent. For those with a lower disability degree, the pension is calculated at a rate proportionate to the disability degree. The pension is adjusted whenever the average wage is adjusted.

272. The dependant's increment, as a percentage of the average wage, is as follows: for dependent spouse - 12.5 per cent, based on a means test; for each of the first two children - 10 per cent, with an increase of 7 per cent for each additional child. The dependant's increment is also subject to a means test of the disabled person. A housewife is entitled to dependant's increment for her children only.

273. Other benefits under General Disability Insurance include:

(a) Attendant's allowance: a pension equivalent to 50 per cent, 100 per cent or 150 per cent of the full individual pension is paid to the severely disabled who are dependent on the help of others for the performance of everyday tasks or who are in need of supervision;

(b) Survivor's grant: a one-time grant equivalent to the amount of the average wage paid to the spouse, or in the absence thereof, to the child or children of a deceased person who received a disability pension;

(c) Disabled child benefit: a pension equivalent to 30-120 per cent of the full individual pension, paid to assist parents with the heavy burden of caring for a disabled child at home;

(d) Special benefit for new immigrant: similar to the attendance allowance, paid to severely disabled new immigrants.

(iii) Method of financing

274. Disability benefits are financed from insurance contributions, as follows:

	Full rate	Reduced rate
Employee	1.30%	0.71%
Employer	0.38%	0.38%
Self-employed	1.68%	0.95%
Other insured	1.95%	0.87%
Housewife	exempt
Government
- for employee	0.27%	0.09%
- for self-employed	0.27%	0.02%

Further, the State finances the special benefit for new immigrants.

Survivors' benefits

(i) Eligibility

275. Same as for old-age benefits above, with the following exception: a married woman whose husband is insured or a widow who receives a pension, if she does not work outside her home is not covered by compulsory insurance; there is, however, an arrangement for voluntary insurance.

(ii) Coverage

276. The survivors' pension is paid to the survivors of a deceased insured individual at levels similar to those of the old-age pension. Pension rates (as a percentage of the average wage) are as follows:

For widow/widower with a child, or aged 50 or above	16%
For each child of the above	7.5% increment
For widow/widower aged 40-49 without child	12%
For children for whom the widow/widower is not eligible for an increment	10% for a single child 7.5% for each child if there is more than one child
For children who have no parents or whose surviving parent permanently lives abroad	10% for each child

277. If both parents die, a child is entitled to receive two survivors' pensions by force of these two separate entitlements.

278. Pensions are adjusted whenever the average wage is adjusted. Increments to the pension include seniority increment and income supplement.

(iii) Method of financing

279. See old-age benefits above.

Employment injury benefits

(i) Eligibility

280. Covered for employment injury benefits are the following groups: employees (except for policemen, jailers and defence employees), self-employed persons, vocational trainees, persons undergoing vocational rehabilitation, working prisoners, foreign residents (including residents of the Territories and the Autonomy, working in Israel), Israelis working abroad for an Israeli employer - under certain conditions; persons whose wages are determined by law (such as Knesset members).

(ii) Coverage

281. The main benefits are the injury allowance and the work disability benefit (pension and grant).

282. The injury allowance is paid for the period of incapacity to work as a result of the work injury (work accident or occupational disease), for a maximum period of 182 days beginning from the day after the injury, calculated by day, on the basis of 75 per cent of the injured person's wages liable for insurance contributions in the quarter-year prior to the injury. The daily injury allowance has a maximum limit. Injury allowance is not paid for the first two days after the injury, unless the injured person was not capable of working for at least 12 days.

283. If the person becomes disabled as a result of the work injury and has a permanent disability degree of 20 per cent or over, he receives a monthly work disability pension according to the degree of medical disability, paid at a rate proportionate to the wages and degree of disability. The pension is updated according to the cost-of-living increment and according to the changes that took place in the average wage as it was on the previous 1 January. A person receiving a disability pension who belongs to a low-income group is entitled to an income supplement. Work disabled with a disability degree of 5-19 per cent receive a one-time work disability grant equivalent to "the daily injury allowance x 21 x the disability degree".

284. Other benefits under work injury insurance include a special grant to the disabled with difficulty in walking and benefits to dependants (widows/widowers).

(iii) Method of financing

285. Work injury benefits are financed by insurance contributions, as follows:

	Full rate	Reduced rate
Employee	no payment
Employer	0.53%	0.53%
Self-employed	0.53%	0.33%
Other insured	no payment
Government
- for employee	0.17%	0.01%
- for self-employed	0.17%	0.02%

286. The Government participates in providing an income supplement to the disabled and their dependants under the Income Support Law.

Unemployment benefits

(i) Eligibility

287. An Israeli or temporary resident who is an employee between the ages of 18 and 65, and a soldier within one year of demobilization from regular service are eligible.

(ii) Nature and level of benefits

288. The daily unemployment benefit is calculated at rates determined by law, on the basis of the daily average wage of the unemployed person during the last 75 work days of the qualifying period, up to the wage ceiling that has been determined.

289. For a demobilized soldier, the rate is determined on the basis of the daily average wage, calculated as 80 per cent of half the average wage, but not more than 80 per cent of the minimum wage.

(iii) Method of financing

290. Unemployment benefits are financed from insurance contributions, as follows:

	Full rate	Reduced rate
Employee	0.15%	0.08%
Employer	0.04%	0.04%
Ministry of Defence	unemployment benefit to soldiers released from the standing army
Government - for employee	0.11%	0.07%

Child allowances

(i) Eligibility

291. All residents are covered.

(ii) Coverage

292. The child allowance is a monthly allowance paid to families according to the number of children in the family. The allowance rates, linked to the credit point as in the Income Tax Order, are as follows: for each of the first two children - one credit point (NIS 144 in January 1997); for the third child - 2.0 credit points; for the fourth child - 4.05 credit points; for the fifth child - 3.4 credit points; for the sixth child - 3.75 credit points; for the seventh and each additional child - 3.5 credit points.

293. The allowance rates are updated at the beginning of every fiscal year at the full rate of the previous year's rise in the Consumer Price Index, and whenever a cost-of-living increment is paid.

294. It should be noted that until 1994 there was a Special Increment for Veterans to the children's allowance, paid to families in which one of whose members served in the Israeli Defence Forces or other security branches. In January 1994 began a process of equalization of the level of the children's allowance, irrespective of military service. In the course of this process, which continued until the beginning of 1997, the number of child-allowance points of a family that did not receive Special Increment for Veterans was gradually equalized to the number of points of a family that did receive this increment. This amendment led to a rise in the level of the children's allowance paid to about 220,000 families with three or more children.

(iii) Method of financing

295. Child allowance is financed from insurance contributions, as follows:

	Full rate	Reduced rate
Employee	no payment
Employer	1.88%	1.88%
Self-employed	1.88%	1.18%
Other insured	2.48%	1.10%
Government	0.60%	0.04%
- for employee
- for self-employed	0.60%	0.06%

296. The Government participates at a rate of 160 per cent of total insurance contribution receipts.

Expenditures

297. Social security benefit payments amounted in 1995 to 7.0 per cent of GNP and 12.1 per cent of the government budget, as compared with 5.3 per cent of GNP and 3.5 per cent of the government budget in 1984. The main reason for the increased share of benefit payments in both GNP and the government budget is the massive immigration to Israel from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia, which increased the number of benefit recipients, especially recipients of old-age pensions, children's allowances and unemployment benefits, by more than 60 per cent.

Combined public and private social security schemes

298. In the 50 years since its establishment, the State of Israel has succeeded in building a comprehensive system of social protection encompassing both social insurance and social assistance programmes. The National Insurance Institute is responsible for the administration of the social insurance programmes, as well as for payment of benefits under the social assistance programme, anchored in the Income Maintenance Law, 1990.

299. The majority of the formal social security schemes provide long-term benefits, which guarantee minimum subsistence by means of a flat-rate benefit (e.g. to every elderly person, to the disabled) as well as income supplements for those with no other sources of income. Other schemes (e.g. unemployment, maternity) provide short-term benefits aimed at providing income to persons temporarily out of work, and these are paid at rates relative to previous wages. Thus, in most cases, the formal system is sufficient for providing social protection to all sectors of the population. However, a number of informal arrangements do exist regarding a number of schemes, and these will be briefly outlined below.

The pension system

300. The pension system in Israel today consists of two main tiers: the first is the formal State one, whose main function is to provide the country's citizens with basic economic protection and a minimum level of subsistence. This tier is operated by the National Insurance Institute. The second tier is intended to supplement the income of the worker and his/her family so that he/she may maintain a standard of living similar to the one he/she enjoyed when he/she worked, in terms of a defined percentage of his/her work income. This tier is operated not by the State, but by means of the voluntary public insurance arrangements of the trade unions.

301. The second tier consists mainly of insurance arrangements within seven Histadrut (General Federation of Labor) pension funds and another eight smaller pension funds, together covering over 80 per cent of employees in Israel. Such insurance arrangements are often anchored in collective work agreements between employers and employees, and guarantee pensions related to the workers' wage level. Some pension funds provide their members with additional social rights under these agreements. Some of such collective agreements are extended by extension order (this tool is described under article 8 of this report) to cover all workers in specific branches of labour. This tier also includes all civil servants and municipal employees who enjoy a budgetary pension under a special law.

302. A third, far less comprehensive tier consists of private savings which may amount to a significant share of retirement income for many individuals.

Long-term care

303. The Long-Term Care Insurance (LTCI) scheme in Israel, implemented by the NII, provides a service benefit to the elderly who are largely dependent on the help of others to perform everyday functions (dressing, eating, washing, mobility in the home, etc.). Those entitled to the benefit receive long-term care services from a basket of services defined by law, which includes: assistance of care-givers in the performance of everyday functions in the home and household management, care in day-care centres for the elderly, laundry services, etc. The benefit is paid to the organization providing the services, and not directly to the elderly person.

304. This benefit was enacted in 1986 as a new chapter within the National Insurance Law (chap. 6 E). From its early stages, the purpose of this legislation was not to finance existing formal services, but to complement the then-existing system of service provision in terms of scope and quality, as well as to enhance the family's role as primary care-giver. LTCI was viewed at the first stage of implementation as an additional element in the broader spectrum of long-term care, both institutional and non-institutional.

305. Research has shown that in Israel the family is the primary provider of long-term care to the elderly and is in fact the most important resource in this care. Studies show that prior to the implementation of the law in 1988, approximately 80 per cent of the elderly dependent in functional activities of daily living were receiving care from family members, while formal services provided by Government and public agencies covered a much lower proportion of the aged. The legislators of LTCI were interested in encouraging the continued provision of informal care provided by the family, and thus did not exclude from eligibility for benefit individuals who were receiving adequate care from informal sources, thus recognizing the implied costs of this informal care.

306. Under the law, two rates of benefit are provided: the first, equivalent to a full disability pension, or 10 hours of care per week, for an elderly person who has become dependent to a large extent on the help of others for the performance of everyday functions or who is in need of supervision; and the second rate, equivalent to 150 per cent of a full disability pension, or 15 hours of care per week, for an elderly person who has become completely dependent on the help of others for the performance of everyday functions or who is in need of constant supervision. In any event, the payment of benefit is not higher than the recompense for the actual hours of care provided.

307. Since the law was first implemented, hundreds of service-providers have been set up and consolidated, about half of them public non-profit organizations and half commercial profit businesses. In many cases, the hours of care covered by LTCI are not sufficient, and the elderly persons' families supplement these with additional hours of care paid for privately from their own pockets, often by the same companies. In any case, the care provided by outside help, whether it is financed totally or only partially by social security, does not take the place of the family in the care of the elderly person, but only eases its burden of care.

The Counselling Service for the Elderly and Pensioners

308. In 1972 the NII developed a Counselling Service for the Elderly and Pensioners within its own framework. In addition, a group of friendly home visitors was organized to visit elderly people who were unable to come themselves to the local branches of the NII in order to receive aid and advice. The service is based on the work of volunteers, themselves elderly, who belong to and are supervised by the system which supplies the welfare services, but are not tied to its formal procedures. Thus, they may act as informal mediators between the system and the needy elderly.

309. The aim of the service is to improve the services provided to the elderly by the NII and not to limit itself to the granting of monetary pensions only. The NII recognized the need to place an informal system of advice and mediation not connected with bureaucratic procedures at the disposal of the elderly and pensioners in order to ensure that pensioners maximize the use of their social security rights and welfare services in the community. The project proved itself, and today operates in all NII local branches throughout the country.

Equality in social security

310. The social security system in Israel is universal with most programmes covering all residents of the country. Social security benefits are aimed particularly at the most vulnerable and disadvantaged groups: the elderly (old-age, survivors and long-term care benefits), the disabled (general disability benefits, work disability benefits, mobility allowances), the poor (income maintenance benefits), divorced and separated women (alimony guarantee payments), children (children's allowances) and the unemployed (unemployment allowances). It may therefore be stated that there are no groups which do not enjoy the right to social security at all, or who do so to a significantly lesser degree than the majority of the population.

311. The Government endeavours to ensure that the right to social security, which is both inherent and explicitly guaranteed by law, is indeed enjoyed by all, and the measures it takes in this respect are detailed below. Furthermore, it reviews legislative measures to improve the situation of various sectors of the population.

312. Regarding women, it should be noted that regardless of their personal status, women who work outside of their homes and who are paid for their work are entitled to all the benefits from the NII to which men of similar status are entitled.

313. Women, except for "housewives" (to be discussed separately), are eligible for all the benefits that are set forth in the National Insurance Law (NIL) under the same conditions as men. They are covered by work injuries insurance, vocational training, survivors' benefits, accident insurance, children's allowance, unemployment insurance, disability insurance, insurance of employee in bankrupt and liquidated firms, reserve duty benefits and long-term care insurance.

314. There are no distinctions in the law regarding the contributions (premiums) of men and women to the NII. The amount of contributions of each insured person is set as a percentage of the insured person's income, regardless of gender. It should be pointed out that only housewives (married women whose spouses are insured and who do not work outside their home) are exempt from contributions toward the benefits to which they are entitled to under the law.

315. Housewives are not covered by all types of insurance. Housewives are not considered workers according to the NIL, and therefore are not eligible for income-replacement benefits such as work injuries insurance, maternity allowance, unemployment insurance, insurance of employees in bankruptcy, and to seniority increments to the old-age pension. Women are eligible for old-age pension from the age of 60 and men from the age of 65, subject to a means test, and from the age of 65 for women and 70 for men, regardless of income. This distinction is due to the differences in retirement age that still exist in Israel, and women have the option to retire at the age of 60. All women, including housewives, are insured by long-term care insurance, and the conditions of entitlement are identical to that of men with one distinction: the age of entitlement for women is 60 and for men 65.

316. Distinctions exist between housewives and all other insured persons regarding disability insurance. A housewife requires at least 50 per cent medical disability to qualify for benefits compared with 40 per cent medical disability for other insured persons.

317. Differences also exist between the definitions of widower and widow pertaining to survivor's benefits under work injuries insurance. A widower is defined as (i) someone who has a child living with him or (ii) is unable to support himself or (iii) whose income is not more than a determined sum. A widow is defined as someone who is (i) 40 years or over, or (ii) has a child living with her, or (iii) is unable to support herself.

Administrative measures

318. NII is first and foremost concerned that the individual take full advantage of his/her social insurance rights. Every insured person who dutifully paid insurance contributions during his/her working years is entitled to receive complete and reliable information on his/her rights and to ensure they are drawn on. The NII believes that the insuring body, namely itself, is at least partly responsible for guaranteeing these rights and that it should not be left to the extent to which the individual is capable of doing so. The NII has initiated a number of activities aimed at increasing the awareness of the insured person's rights, providing the means for the person to take full advantage of his/her rights, and minimizing the bureaucratic procedures involved.

319. Following are the main such activities:

(a) Once a year, every beneficiary receives an annual confirmation detailing the types of benefits he/she receives and the monthly sums transferred to his/her account over the past year. This confirmation is recognized by all public authorities, such as government ministries, local authorities and health funds, for purposes of granting a wide range of discounts and benefits to specific population groups; for example, discounts in urban taxes, discounts in rents in public housing, discounts in telephone fees, etc.;

(b) Just before a man reaches the age of 65 or a woman the age of 60, he/she receives a letter in the mail informing him/her of possible rights to an old-age pension, the rules of entitlement and a claims form. This guarantees that the pension is initiated immediately upon retirement, without any unnecessary bureaucratic delay;

(c) The family of every child born in a hospital is automatically entitled to child allowances, without the mother having to submit a claims form to the NII. This automatic registration is made possible due to an agreement signed between the NII, the Ministry of the Interior and the hospitals, according to which the hospitals inform the NII and the Ministry simultaneously of every live birth and the identifying data on the mother. This serves as a basis for including the newborn child in the children's file at the NII and for paying the allowance directly to the mother's bank account;

(d) Many new immigrants are entitled to receive benefits, such as special old-age benefits and child allowances, from the NII immediately upon their arrival in Israel. In order to guarantee immediate commencement of rights, all the demographic information needed by the NII is received on magnetic tape directly from the data file produced at the airport. In this way, new immigrant families receive all benefits due them without having to report personally to a local branch of the NII and submit a claim;

(e) Information booklets on national insurance rights, including amendments in relevant laws, are published regularly in various languages, and distributed to all health and social service agencies in the community;

(f) Intensive use is made of the local and national press, and prime-time spots are purchased on the national radio and television stations to pass on information to the public;

(g) Sophisticated computerized technology has been installed in each of the NII's local branches, so that every claimant can receive immediate information on the state of his/her account and on the benefits being paid him/her.

320. The many and varied methods used in Israel to transfer information to the public on its rights have been proven extremely effective in guaranteeing that persons take full advantage of their rights to the various benefits paid by the NII. An ongoing follow-up study carried out on this topic shows that close to 98 per cent of the entire potential population of beneficiaries receives benefits at the scope and level that they are entitled to under law. In the NII's opinion, it is impossible to ensure that 100 per cent of the population maximizes its entitlement benefits and recognizes the fact that despite all its sincere efforts, there will always remain a marginal percentage of the population that does not receive the benefits to which it is entitled. Its experience has shown that projects aimed at the full implementation of rights has led to rather disappointing results, ones certainly not justifying the high costs entailed.

Legislative measures

321. The following measures taken to implement rights to social security in legislation, should be noted.

322. Women. Housewives traditionally were not entitled to old-age pensions in their own right. They were thus exempt from paying contributions to the NII, and received half of the old-age pension of their spouses. In 1996, in order to achieve greater gender equality in the social security system, the law was amended and housewives now receive the minimum old-age pension although they are still exempt from contributions. As a result, within a few years all women in Israel, regardless of their working status, will be covered by old-age insurance.

323. The elderly. Another vulnerable group which has received careful attention and allocation of resources in Israel are the aged, especially those who are severely dependent due to functional disability, chronic disease and cognitive impairment. The State continues to provide personal care services at home and in day centres to over 8 per cent of its elderly population under its community Long-Term Care Insurance Law of 1988. This law provides personal care on the basis of personal entitlement, thus enabling even severely disabled elderly people to remain at home, with dignity and in familiar surroundings, as long as they are able, and reduces the burden of care borne by the family.

324. The poor. As part of its programme to combat poverty and income gaps, the Government raised the level of old-age pensions by 7 per cent. Various legal provisions exist for the elderly to further improve their economic situation and enhance their quality of life and participation in society by significantly subsidizing municipal taxes, public transportation and medication for low-income groups.

325. The underlying principle of new anti-poverty legislation in Israel has been to equalize the rights to social protection between genders and among various groups of beneficiaries having similar needs, as well as raising the minimum income guaranteed to the most vulnerable groups: the elderly and single-parent families.

326. In order to reduce the number of families living below the poverty line, Israel has continued to expand its Law for Reducing the Scope of Poverty and Income Gaps, aimed at increasing protection of the most vulnerable social groups. Recent legislation significantly increased benefits paid to the elderly, the disabled, as well as single-parent families. In order to reduce poverty among large families, which constitute the most at-risk poverty group in Israel, the Government has completed final steps to raise the level of its universal child allowances to large families which will include groups which previously did not have full coverage.

327. One of Israel's most important recent accomplishments was the implementation of a National Health Insurance Program. Since 1995 there effectively has been universal coverage based on a comprehensive basket of health services. A more equitable system of health tax has been established with especially low health insurance rates set for low wage earners and all recipients of income maintenance benefits. Low contribution rates have also been set for all elderly recipients of old-age pensions. The effectiveness of this law will be measured to a large degree by the degree of equity in the access to quality health care for poor and other marginalized groups, which will be carefully monitored during the next few years.

328. Further review of trends and changes in national legislation, court decisions, etc. is available in the NII's report, Summary of Developments and Trends in Social Security - 1996, submitted to the International Social Security Association (ISSA).

Conclusion

329. Regarding measures taken to improve the lot of the vulnerable groups, it may be concluded that although we have been successful in reducing unemployment levels, pockets of high unemployment remain, especially in outlying development areas. The Government's policy is to continue allocating resources for the reduction of unemployment and poverty in these areas, thus reducing dependency on social support systems.

330. In order to continue Israel's war on poverty it is incumbent on policy makers not only to increase benefits but also to expand funding sources. Therefore, one important direction for policy will be the close examination of our social security system with the objective of increasing the degree of progressivity in our system, both in terms of taxes and the system of benefits targeted at the most vulnerable groups.

International cooperation and assistance

331. The International Labour Organization (ILO) and the ISSA provide the National Insurance Institute with a great deal of technical assistance, mainly by means of study grants abroad to senior employees of the NII. The NII, on its part, endeavours to reciprocate by assisting in guidance and instruction of workers studying abroad, particularly workers from Asia and Africa. Israel belongs to the Asian-African branch of ISSA, and within this framework participates in most regional conferences.

332. Furthermore, Israeli representatives regularly participate in the ISSA General Assembly meetings that take place every three years and in the technical activities of the organization by means of the various permanent committees, such as by replying to questionnaires distributed periodically.

333. However, the main mutual activity of Israel and ISSA is in the field of research. Israel actively participates in ISSA research conferences by preparing research papers and presenting them at almost every conference. In 1979 a research conference on the topic of "The Mutual Relationships between the Direct Taxation System and Social Insurance" took place in Jerusalem in 1979, and in 1989 our capital once again hosted a research conference on the subject of long-term care services for the very old. In January 1998 we are again scheduled to host an ISSA research conference on the subject of the impact of social insurance and other social support benefits on human behaviour.

334. In conclusion, the cooperation between ISSA and Israel contributes considerably to both sides. The experience of other countries has helped us in the development and expansion of various social security schemes, while Israel's contribution is expressed mainly in research and distribution of research findings to other countries through ISSA. Thus, the main goal of ISSA as an international organization - the promotion and development of social security in the world by means of international cooperation - is realized.

Article 10 - Familial rights

Related international conventions binding Israel

335. Israel is a party to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, and in May 1997 submitted its first report to the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women.

336. Israel is a party to the ILO Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). Its last report was submitted in 1996 and relates to the years 1991-1995.

337. Israel is a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and to the Convention on the Rights of the Child since 1991, and will soon be submitting its initial reports on both Covenants.

Meaning of "family"

The definition of the term "family" in Israeli law

338. The term "family" is not uniformly defined in Israeli law, and different definitions can be found in distinct acts of legislation. Depending on their legislative purpose, some acts have taken a wide encompassing approach and defined the term "family" broadly. Hence, in the Domestic Violence Prevention Law, 1991, a "family member" is defined as: "spouse, parent, or parent's spouse, spouse's parent or his or her spouse, grandfather or grandmother, child or spouse's child, brother or sister, brother-in-law or sister-in-law, uncle or aunt, cousin or niece; whoever is responsible for the living, health, education or welfare needs of a minor or incapacitated person who is living with him/her, and a minor or incapacitated person living with such a guardian". For this law's purposes there is no difference between a present and a former family member.

339. A similarly broad definition can be found in the Court for Family Matters Law, 1995. A person's family member is defined there as - "(a) his/her spouse, including a partner for life, his/her ex-spouse, his/her spouse the marriage with whom has been annulled, provided that the subject matter of the proceedings is a consequence of the relation between them in the time period they were man and wife; (b) his/her child, including his/her spouse's child; (c) his/her parents, his/her spouse's parents or their spouses; (d) his/her grandchild; (e) his/her grandparents; (f) his/her or his/her spouse's brothers and sisters. A parent - includes a step-parent or a legal guardian".

340. At the same time, other acts have adopted a stricter reading of the term. For example, in the National Security Law (Revised Version), 1995, a family member is considered to be only "one of the parents, a child, a grandchild, a brother or a sister". Similarly, in the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 1988, family members are narrowly defined as "spouse, parent, child, grandchild, brother, sister or a spouse of any of those".

341. The approach taken by the Israeli courts in ascertaining the meaning of the term "family" or "spouse" is also a functional approach which takes into account the policy goals of the pertinent legislation or agreement. Consequently, the courts have tended in some cases to stretch the concept of family beyond traditional understanding. Thus, the Supreme Court held that a tort victim has the right to claim compensation for services received from the kibbutz (collective farm) he/she lived on, on similar terms to the right to claim for services rendered by family members:

"... [T]he ideological principle and social structure of the kibbutz are unique and universally incomparable ... [L]egally speaking, the structure is based upon collective equality between the individual members ... In theory and in practice, the sum of all individual members constitute one big family"

C.A. 619/78 Hunovitz v. Cohen, P.D. vol. 35 (4) 281, 295-96

342. In another case, which dealt with the term "spouse", the Supreme Court accepted a petition of a homosexual flight attendant to enjoy a work benefit normally accorded to an employee's heterosexual "spouse":

"The desirable test should therefore examine the relevancy of the sexual orientation to the work benefit granted to the spouse. The purpose test meets this requirement. According to that test, there will not be any differentiation between a homosexual and heterosexual spouse if the companionship relations between the couple meet the standards which fulfil the purpose for which the right or benefit is being conferred In our matter, the flight ticket was not intended exclusively for spouses married to employees, and in any case the purpose of the benefit could not have been the encouragement of traditional family life. The benefit was granted to an employee for the spouse with whom he is sharing his life in reality. Although the (airline) did not intend to implement the arrangement on homosexual couples, the companion's sex is irrelevant to the purpose for which the benefit was given."

H.C. 721/94 El Al Israeli Airlines v. Danilovich, P.D. vol. 48 (5) 749, 785-86

Meaning of family in administrative practice

343. Many individual entitlements to social services and benefits are shaped taking into account familial recourses. By "family" one usually means in the present context the nuclear family: parents and children. But the structure of family is in a constant state of flux. On one hand, single parenthood has risen sharply in the last 10 years (1985: 54,600; 1995: 91,900) and the state of non-marital cohabitation is partly recognized by the State for purposes of social security, pension, damages awards under torts law, resident's protection against eviction, income tax regulations, and administrative or legal benefits of various sorts. On the other hand, the concept of "extended family" is used more and more, clearly including grandparents, brothers and sisters, even though it still lacks clarity in public cognition. (The status of the "tribe", for example, is scarcely considered in this context.) In short, the legitimacy of "non-traditional" family types and the dynamic nature of families now seems to be widely recognized, but concepts still have to be shaped and sharpened.

344. In allocating resources the Government aims to support various forms of "family", while not taking a stand on which concept of family is preferable. Some benefits exist for small single-parent families and others provide added financial assistance to those families which have four or more children. At the same time, the weakened ties with extended family are being strengthened through benefits which encourage families to provide care for their ageing relatives within their own homes.

345. The practical nature of allocating resources across the social spectrum, while healing the damage caused by Israel's push into modernity, is a daunting task. Nonetheless, each form of family is legitimate in the eyes of the State and is accorded a considerable degree of both social and financial support under the law.

Majority

346. Majority, for the purposes of civil law, takes place at different ages, depending upon the specific issue. For the purposes of responsibility in civil legal proceedings, it is 18 years old. Upon reaching majority, a person may make a legal contract, sue or be sued, or carry out any other legal action or process. Prior to the age of 18, any legal action or contract entered into by a minor may be voided by his/her parent or guardian.

347. Criminal liability. Generally, majority for the purpose of criminal liability is the age 12. Adolescents by the age of 18 are to be tried at a special juvenile court. There are specific legal provisions for exceptional cases where a youngster may nevertheless be tried as an adult.

348. The right to vote. The right to vote in national and municipal elections is granted to all citizens or residents, respectively, who have reached the age of 18.

349. Military conscription. An individual is eligible for conscription into the Israeli Defense Forces from the day of his/her eighteenth birthday. A person aged 17½ may volunteer for the armed forces providing that his/her parents have given permission.

350. Consent to marry. Women may marry without their parent's/guardian's permission from the age of 17 except for special circumstances. There is no minimum age for males. A revision of the status quo as to the age of consent for males is presently under consideration.

351. Legal capacity and compulsory psychiatric hospitalization. A youth aged 15 or older may appeal an order for his/her compulsory hospitalization in a psychiatric institution. In such cases, the court appoints a legal representative to present the interests of the youth during the appeal process.

Assistance to the family and its protection

The fundamental right to family life

352. The right to family life was addressed by the Supreme Court on several occasions. It has stated:

"Every person has the right to form a family and have children."
A.C.R. 2401/95 Nahmani v. Nahmani, Takdin-Supreme vol. 96 (3) 526

353. The court emphasized in some of its decisions the autonomy of the family unit and its immunity from State intervention:

"In principle, the autonomy to raise a family, plan a family and give birth to children is a matter of personal privacy. Human liberty encompasses the freedom of independent choice on matters of marriage, divorce, birth and any other private matter within the personal autonomy. Judge Ben-Itto has pointed in the said C.A. 413/80 that: 'conception, pregnancy and birth are intimate events which are all included in the realm of personal privacy. The State does not interfere in that area, except for reasons of special weight related to the need to protect individual rights or a significant public interest' [cite omitted]."

"..."

"The aspiration to minimize State involvement in relations within the family unit, whether direct intervention or judicial intervention, emphasizes the unit's right to autonomy, and the protection from interference in the relations between the family and the State and between the different members of the family unit. Situations where intervention is required are normally sensitive and complex, and it is needed where a crisis in the family unit has occurred and State intervention through the courts is designed to solve problems that the parties failed to settle on their own."

C.A. 5587/93 Nahmani v. Nahmani, Takdin-Supreme, vol. 95 (1) 1239, 1241.

354. Furthermore, the court recognized as a constitutional human right the right to parenthood:

"The right to become a parent is a fundamental human right to which everyone is entitled."

C.A. 451/88 Anonymous v. The State of Israel, P.D. vol. 44 (1), 330, 337.

And so is the case of the right of parents to raise and educate their children, as they think best:

"The right of parents to raise and educate their children as they think best is a basic constitutional right, and a natural right which is inherent to, and stems from, the links parents have to their children. The family unit does not exist outside the constitutional system, but it is an integral part thereof. Parents are entitled, within the family unit, to exercise rights recognized and protected by constitutional law. The right of parents to have custody of their children and to raise them, with all this implies, is a natural and primary constitutional right, which gives expression to the natural connection between parents and their children [cite omitted]. This right is reflected in the privacy and autonomy that the family enjoys. Parents are autonomous in making decisions relevant to their children in the areas of education, lifestyle, residence etc. Interference on behalf of society and the State in these decisions is an exception which must be justified [cite omitted]. This approach is based upon the belief that 'the family is the basic and most ancient social unit in human history that has been, and still is, the element that facilitates and secures the continued existence of human society' [cite omitted]."

C.A. 2266/93 Doe v. Roe, P.D. vol. 49 (1) 229, 238-89.

Marriage

355. The Marriage Age Law, 1950, states that the minimum marital age for all women in Israel is 17. No minimum age for men is set. Since the substantive law that applies in matters of marriage is derived from the individual's religious law, the minimum age for men would be drawn from religious law.

356. The minimum age requirement is accompanied by provisions that make the arrangement of under-age marriages a criminal offence punishable by up to two years' imprisonment. The possible offenders include the person who arranges the marriage, the person who conducts the marriage, and the marrying man himself. The under-age woman is excluded. The law also provides that the mere fact that a marriage was conducted in violation of this law is a ground for divorce.

357. Article 5 of the Marriage Age Law, 1950 provides for two alternative grounds for judicial permission of under-age marriage. The first one relates to circumstances in which the under-age woman is pregnant from or has given birth to the child of the man whom she asks permission to marry. No age limit at all is attached to this ground for exception. The second relates to unspecified "special circumstances" that would justify immediate marriage, provided the woman is over 16 years old. Since the legislature has left those "special circumstances" unspecified, the Supreme Court has taken it upon itself to provide instructions as to the substance of those circumstances. In one of the leading cases, then Justice Barak firmly stated that a community's custom and tradition do not justify marital exception, since it is those traditions and customs that the Marriage Age Law, 1950 was set to abolish.

358. Criminal sanctions contribute to the reduction of the phenomenon of marriages involving minors. However, it has not been eliminated altogether, as can be seen from the following tables, which contain data on marital ages in Israel.

359. Since questions of marriage and divorce are determined by religious law alone, the secular legislature cannot decree bigamous marriages invalid when such marriages are recognized by the relevant religious laws, but can only operate against them through criminal law. Section 176 of the Penal Law, 1977, makes bigamy a criminal offence punishable by five years' imprisonment. Sections 181-182 prohibit forcing divorce upon one's wife with no judicial decree of divorce, and makes the arrangement of such prohibited marriages or divorces a criminal offence. Sections 179-180 provide exceptions for the rule against bigamy. Section 180 applies to all individuals whose religious affiliation is other than Jewish, and indicates that incapacitation of one's spouse or seven years' absence therefrom may justify marriage to another person. Section 179 applies only to Jewish people, providing immunity to a person whose second marriage was permitted by a rabbinical court's judgement that underwent the specific Halachic procedure to make it religiously valid.

360. Since religious law accommodates bigamous marriage, further legislative intervention must be made in particular areas of law where the interests of the two wives may conflict. Such accommodations were developed in response to certain population groups who immigrated to Israel. For example, the Successions Law, 1965 specifically states (in section 146) that when a man who dies was married to two women, both of them shall share in the estate, where ordinarily the estate is given to the sole wife of the deceased.

Strengthening and protecting the family

361. The basic premise of the Israeli law is that the primary obligation to support the members of a family lies with the family itself. This principle is anchored in the Legal Capacity and Guardianship Law, 1962, which defines the duties of parents and guardians. As the "natural guardians" of their minor children, parents have both a statutory obligation and a right to attend to their child's needs, including education and upbringing, vocational training, and maintenance of the child's property. Their guardianship also includes the right to custody of the child and the right to represent the child. These rights have been interpreted by the Israeli courts as "the right to fulfil their obligations". (Full text of the law is attached in annex 2 to the present report.)

362. Nevertheless, the State recognizes its obligation to protect families whenever family members substantially fail to fulfil their responsibility. Various laws grant intervention powers to the authorities (at the municipal or national level), requiring judicial approval. These powers range from issuing specific instructions to the child's parent or guardian on how to care for the child to extracting the child from their custody and assuming responsibility for the child's care, whether temporarily or definitively in the form of an adoption order. Such main laws are the Youth (Care and Supervision) Law, 1960 and the Adoption of Children Law, 1981. (Full texts attached in annex 2 to the present report.)

363. In addition, various Israeli penal laws prescribe criminal sanctions against parents or other primary care-givers for abandonment and neglect, assault and molestation (including physical, emotional or sexual molestation), and set grounds for the courts to issue protection orders against a violent family member in the home of either the child or the spouse.

364. The primary consideration in all the above cases involving children is "the best interests of the child". This concept lies at the core of a huge jurisprudence, too complex to be reviewed here. In general much weight is given by the courts to the professional opinion presented in written reports by welfare officers, who are trained social workers appointed under each law.

365. In addition to intervention powers to deal with acute crises, the Government attempts to facilitate and maintain the establishment of a family by means of various social programmes and economic benefits.

366. The main economic benefits granted by the State to aid families are part of the social security schemes provided by law on a universal basis to all families in Israel (these schemes are detailed in this report under article 9). Child allowances, designed to prevent a reduction in the standard of living of families that may result from the burden of raising additional children, provide tax relief and the payment of allowances through the social security system. Increments to benefit for dependent children are paid with old-age pensions, survivors' pensions, disability pensions, in-home care for the elderly. There are no situations in which families do not enjoy any benefit of assistance, or who do so to a significantly lesser degree than the majority of the population.

367. Special assistance to single-parent families are anchored in the Single Parent Law, 1992. (The full text of this law is attached in annex 2 to this report.) This law defines a "single parent" in broad terms applying to both women and men. The law entitles single parents to a special education grant, priority in vocational training programmes and in day-care facilities, and it raises the level of assistance in housing aid schemes. This is also provided for under the Maintenance of Income Law, 1980.

368. There exist other administrative programmes which aid families in need in various ways. For example, low-income working parents may apply to send their pre-school-aged children to government-supported day-care centres; the Health Ministry runs family health clinics in every city, which provide public counselling, self-help groups, parenting classes, and primary health care for toddlers. Such programmes are based on need, whether implied in the qualification criteria of the programme or determined by means tests.

369. Israel also has an active voluntary sector, many of its organizations directed towards family and education-oriented projects.

370. There is a high level of interaction between the Government and the various voluntary bodies. The Government, in line with its policies, encourages volunteerism through support of existing voluntary organizations and involvement of volunteers in government agencies, and encourages residents to participate in the decision-making process on matters affecting their own neighbourhoods and communities.

371. The Government considers welfare services its responsibility, but in some service areas it relies on non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to provide welfare services as well as some of the money that is required.

372. Institutions for children in Israel are supervised by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, under the provisions of the Supervision of Children's Institutions (Care Centers) Law, 1965. By-laws and regulations were drawn up by the Ministry regarding all aspects of the institutions' operations, e.g. structures, plant maintenance, supplies, personnel, professional services, etc. There is extensive supervision of all institutions for children up to the age of 12. All institutions, except for those for delinquent or mentally handicapped children, are run by NGOs. The institution determines the type of child it wants to receive.

373. An interministerial finance committee determines the level of financial support to be provided by the Government. At present, this support accounts for 85 per cent of the cost of the child in the institution. The NGOs must provide the additional 15 per cent. A special government building fund provides funding for the building of day-care centres in cooperation with the NGOs, turning them over to the municipal authority which in turn passes the centre on to the NGO for day-to-day operation. Negotiations take place annually regarding the Government's participation in child support in the day-care centres. Today the Government covers the cost of 75 per cent for each child and the NGO 25 per cent.

Equality of treatment

374. No sector of the population is excluded by law or administrative rule from receiving any of the above services. But many of the services available are restricted by budget, and the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs has received complaints that the amount of resources allocated to the Jewish sector of the population outweighs the amount of money and resources presently directed at the non-Jewish sectors of the population.

375. Unfortunately, differential data regarding budget allocation to municipalities for social services relevant to the present Covenant are still not available.

Maternity protection

376. Labour law protection for working women is a combination of a long-standing system of benefits, provided largely through the social insurance system, for supporting mothers and their families during pregnancy, birth, and post-natal care. The result is an efficient system of maternity protection.

Maternity leave and protection of pregnant working women

377. The Women's Employment Law, 1954, establishes the right of a woman to take a paid 12-week maternity leave. Under special circumstances, including sickness, the birth of more than one child or the need for the baby's hospitalization, the leave may be extended. For four months following her regular maternity leave, a woman who works full-time may leave work for one hour each day without affecting her salary. In addition, this law provides for a woman's right to extend her absence from work - without pay but also without concern that her employment may be terminated - for an additional period which is determined by how long she was employed before the leave.

378. A recent amendment to the said law allows for men to take half of the 12-week maternity period in place of the mother, even if his spouse is not employed. This amendment recognizes the legitimate desire of many fathers to bond with their infants during this crucial period, the shifting burden of parenting upon the male, and the success of women and their legitimacy in the workplace.

379. Maternity leave is mandatory and may be taken at any point after the middle of the seventh month of pregnancy. Both men and women are allowed to take leaves of absence, characterized as sick leave, while undergoing fertility treatments. Likewise, pregnant women are entitled to paid absences from work for routine medical examinations. When high-risk pregnancy causes inability to work, the woman is entitled to her salary from the National Insurance Institute and her seniority rights are protected.

380. This same law ensures the woman's job security. An employer cannot terminate an employee during her pregnancy; if an employee is dismissed during her pregnancy, the employer has committed a crime and is subject to prosecution, while the worker is reinstated. If the worker has not informed her employer of her pregnancy (this is not compulsory until the fifth month) and is terminated, she will be reinstated, but the employer is not guilty of committing a crime.

381. The prohibition on terminating employment has an exception. The Minister of Labor and Social Affairs has the authority to grant permission to an employer if he/she is satisfied that there is no link between termination of work and maternity. The department at the Ministry charged with control powers under the Women's Employment Law also conducts the necessary inquiries for the purpose of deciding on these permission applications.

382. While the employer is not responsible for paying an employee's salary while she is on maternity leave, the employer is legally bound to continue making payments into the employee's retirement fund and any other recognized employer-employee contribution-driven plans.

Coverage and benefits

383. The first benefit is free hospitalization for the baby's delivery. This hospitalization is covered as part of the basket of services in Israel's comprehensive National Health Insurance Law, 1995. The benefit is paid directly to the hospital. Costs are covered also in the event of a stillbirth.

384. After the baby has been born, the parents receive from the National Insurance Institute (NII) a maternity grant, to defray the costs of outfitting their home for the baby. This benefit is equal to 20 per cent of the average wage. In the event of multiple births, the sum rises significantly (see birth allowance below).

385. The maternity grant is paid to all residents or wives of residents, even if they gave birth outside of Israel, as well as to non-resident women working in Israel or wives of non-resident men working in Israel, provided they gave birth in Israel.

386. There is also a grant for adopting parents, equivalent to the maternity grant, based on the number of children under the age of 10 who were adopted on the same day.

387. If three or more children are delivered in the same birth, families receive a birth allowance for six months. The purpose is to alleviate the special costs incurred with multiple births. For the third child, the benefit is equal to 50 per cent of the average salary. For the fourth child, it equals 75 per cent and for the fifth (or more) it equals 100 per cent.

388. The maternity allowance (or vacation pay in the case of adopting parents) is paid to a working mother during her 12 weeks of legally mandated maternity leave. The benefit is equal to 100 per cent of the woman's average salary during the previous three months, up to a ceiling, and is paid by the NII. This benefit is taxed and social insurance payments are deducted.

389. The birth protection allowance is meant for women who, on doctor's orders, must take a leave from work of over 30 days in order to successfully bring their baby to term. This benefit, which is 25 per cent of the average wage, is paid by the NII.

History and development

390. Maternity insurance was embodied in 1954 in the National Insurance Law, and was one of the first divisions of the National Insurance Institute. Maternity insurance was considered of utmost importance to the welfare of the family in general and to the working mother in particular.

391. The changes pertaining to maternity allowance which took place between 1954 and 1995 share a clear common denominator: the widening of the circle of women entitled to maternity allowance, both by changing the calculation of the qualifying period and by changing the definition of the entitled population. The rates of the allowance were not changed until 1995, when it was increased from 75 per cent of the woman's (gross) previous wages to 100 per cent of her (net) wages.

392. The main changes which occurred in the maternity grant since 1954 can be summed up as follows:

(a) 1955: the size of the maternity grant aimed at acquiring a layette in the case of a multiple birth was increased.

(b) 1986:

(i) Distinction was made within the maternity grant between the layette grant aimed at acquiring a layette and the hospitalization grant paid directly to the hospital, except in cases in which the birth took place in a hospital in which there was no payment arrangement with the NII (such as hospitals abroad). In such cases the mother submits receipts and is reimbursed, up to the amount of the grant determined by law. The layette grant is given as a cash payment directly to the mother by the hospital in which she gives birth;

(ii) A method for adjusting the maternity grant was determined: 20 per cent of the average wage for purposes of benefit payments in January every year, with additional adjustments reflecting cost-of-living increments. Thus, the real value of the maternity grant is maintained and anchored in law; its adjustment is automatic and not subject to the discretion of the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs, as previously.

393. The birth allowance was added in 1986 within the framework of maternity insurance: the birth allowance is paid to a family in which three or more children were born in the same birth, of which three or more remained alive for a period of time determined by law, in order to help the family overcome the economic burden of a multiple birth. The risk pregnancy benefit was instituted in 1991. Free hospitalization for delivery prior to the enactment of the National Health Insurance Law in January 1994 was paid by the NII.

Equality

394. All of the above-mentioned maternity protections and benefits are granted to all citizens and residents of the State of Israel, regardless of race or religion. Only those who have not paid their social insurance dues for a minimum number of months in the two years preceding the child's birth are not entitled to full financial benefits granted by the NII. There are no groups of women who do not enjoy any maternity protection whatsoever or who do so to a significantly lesser degree than the majority. (Additional information is provided in this report under article 9 of the Covenant - Social Security.)

Youth protection

395. The Youth Employment Law, 1953, prohibits employment of persons under the age of 15. During summer the minimum age drops to 14, but permission from the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs is required. Moreover, youngsters over the age of 15 who are still under the purview of the Compulsory Education Law may be employed only in accordance with the Apprentice Law, 1953. (Full texts of these two laws are attached in annex 1 to this report.) A labour contract with a person under minimum age is void, even with the consent of his/her parent or guardian.

396. According to official government data, about 30,000 young people aged 15-18 were legally employed in 1995. This figure represents 11 per cent of Israel youth. There are no accurate data describing the distribution of working youth according to sector or type of employment, nor are there data on the extent of employment of youth within the household. Youth on kibbutzim (collective farms) often work there during school vacations, largely in agriculture, service occupations or light industry. The number of youth in this group is small since the total percentage of people of all ages who reside on kibbutzism is less than 3 per cent of the country's population.

397. It is believed that there are a few tens of thousands of children employed illegally in Israel. Their employment is illegal either due to the children's age or because they are working longer hours than the maximum permitted by law. Most of these children and youth are employed as physical labourers in outdoor markets and other temporary jobs. In 1994 the Israeli police established a unit for the enforcement of labour laws. This unit has made concerted efforts to enforce child labour laws.

398. Lately, the distribution of information on child labour laws to both youth and employers has increased. Printed materials have been prepared and distributed by voluntary organizations such as the National Center for the Child and the Union of Youth Workers, an organization created specifically to represent the rights of workers under the age of 19.

399. There are no accurate official data regarding the phenomenon of illegal employment. However, the common perception among government officials is that there has been a slight decrease in illegal child labour in the last two years. It is nonetheless clear that in order to reduce the instance of illegal child and youth labour, better enforcement is needed, as is better awareness of labour laws among children and employers.

400. Finally, legal provisions pertaining to special protection of children within the family, such as protection from neglect, child abuse of all sorts, etc., have been described in paragraphs 352-375 and are relevant in the present context also.

Article 11 - The right to an adequate standard of living

401. The right of everyone to enjoy an adequate standard of living is generally considered as obvious and is recognized under the Israeli legal system. This recognition is not embodied in one single legal text. Instead, there exist various legal entitlements and administrative measures aimed at securing everyone's subsistence, which are described in this chapter. All together, these entitlements and measures embody a definite commitment on the part of the State to securing a decent standard of living for everyone.

402. Furthermore, one can say that the "right to basic needs", as a coherent right standing on its own, is an emerging concept in the Israeli legal culture. There are a few signs to support this statement that should be briefly surveyed before going into the details of housing and food rights.

403. The most evident indication of the emergence of a constitutional right to basic needs is the already mentioned Basic Law: Social Rights Bill (1993). One should also recall the interpretation given to the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom (1992) in one of the Supreme Court President's books, according to which the right to basic needs is part of the constitutional right to human dignity (Barak 1994:416).

404. Also important in this context are various remarks made by the Israeli courts. The Supreme Court has dealt with the right to basic living conditions mainly in the context of providing minimal guarantees to those affected by the exercise of legal rights. One example of such a guarantee is the case of alimony and child support payments. The court has ruled that even when such payments can be normally withheld (e.g. for refusal of the recipient to respect the rights of the supporting party), this rule does not apply when the recipient lacks basic living needs:

"We agree that a minor that refuses to follow a court order, and in the case before us, refusal to attend meetings provided for in the divorce agreement, can be regarded as a rebel. However, even a rebellious child does not lose his (or her) entitlement for child support. The exemption the father enjoys is not definitive in all circumstances because it is not permitted to bring even a rebellious son or daughter to the verge of hunger and leave him or her with nothing."

C.A. 1741/93 Azoulai v. Azoulai, Takdin-Supreme, vol. 94 (2) 1784.

405. A similar problem has arisen in the case of traffic accidents that deprive the victim of living resources before the completion of the legal proceedings. In order to alleviate this problem the legislator amended the Compensation for Traffic Accidents Victims Law 1975 and introduced the possibility of claiming intermediate compensations, on which the Supreme Court remarked:

"The underlying idea of the institution of immediate compensation, and the goal the legislator has set in this legislative innovation, is to provide with great urgency the victim of a traffic accident the sum required to cover his/her expenses, including hospitalization expenses, and his/her and his/her family's living needs, until a final decision is reached concerning the compensation he/she is entitled to. The general thrust is to deliver those funds to the victim as soon as possible, so to provide him/her and his/her family with these basic needs, which cannot be put on hold until his/her claim is being adjudicated in normal proceedings which may take very long ..."

C.A. 387/82 Karnit - Compensation for Traffic Accident Victims Fund v. Assido, P.D. vol. 40 (4) 213, 219.

406. In another case, the Supreme Court discussed the Judgment Execution Law, 1967, which limits the creditor's right of recovery, in light of the social conditions of the debtor:

"The legislator did not wish that the operation of the execution mechanism would cause the debtor to lose all of his possessions and become a burden on society. This is the basis for several provisions stemming from what are essentially social ideas, which were stipulated in the said law and involve taking into account the circumstances of the debtor.

"For instance, [in] Chapter B which deals with seizure of chattels ... Article 22 determines which chattels may not be seized. The enumeration reveals that these are chattels which are necessary for the nutrition needs of the debtor and his/her family, clothing and furniture vital to them, tools and machines which are the source of the debtor and his/her family's livelihood (with certain limits), etc. This is also the case with seizure of property held by a third party ... [T]he provision of Article 50 (a) to the said law lists what are assets held by a third party that may not be seized ... This section encompasses, among other things, minimal monetary sums held by a third party that constitute part of the indebted party's wage ... which is necessary for his sustenance so he will not suffer poverty and hunger-related disgrace ... The common denominator to all the above-mentioned provisions in the law is the degree of consideration given to the circumstances of the debtor, on the basis of the important and worthy social principle we have described."

C.A. 711/84 Israel Discount Bank Ltd. v. Fishman, P.D. vol. 41 (1) 369, 374-375

407. The Supreme Court addressed on several occasions the question of what are minimal standards of living in the context of imprisonment conditions, and held that:

"In Israel, an imprisoned or arrested person is entitled to be incarcerated under conditions which allow civilized human life. We do not attribute any importance to the fact that this right was not codified in an act of legislation. This right is a fundamental human right and in a law-respecting democratic state it is so obvious as if it was formally written and enacted. We have already had the opportunity to emphasize that if incarceration is intended, as an act of necessity, to deprive a person from his/her physical freedom, it does not purport to deprive from him/her his/her self-image and humanity ...

"What are the conditions that allow civilized human life? A civilized human being has spiritual needs in addition to his physical living needs: He can, for instance, survive and live by eating with his bare hands. However, a civilized human being needs a plate, spoon and fork to eat with. A civilized person is not necessarily full of civility, but he is living in a time and place characterized by that civilization ... [I]t is thus necessary to establish minimal standards to meet the 'conditions that allow civilized human life' in prison. At the same time, the more these standards are added upon and improved, the better it is - whereas he who detracts from them and does not meet them, fails to meet a minimal obligation of civilization ...

"[T]he standards should be determined according to the needs of an ordinary person. As long as we force a prisoner - even one that recently arrived as an uninvited guest or an enemy and harasser - to stay in an Israeli prison, he/she is entitled to living conditions according to the minimal standards of people in Israel, and we must secure or grant them."

H.C 221/80 Darwish v. The Prison Service, P.D. vol. 35 (1) 536, 538-40 [minority opinion, rejected on other grounds]

408. The above citations are not representative of a coherent and systematic judicial approach. Examples of disregard of socio-economic factors in judicial reasoning can also be found in Israeli jurisprudence. But these are encouraging signs when evaluated in the context of a growing awareness of social rights as fundamental or constitutional rights.

(ii) Poverty

410. Poverty data in Israel have been systematically collected and published since the early 1970s by the National Insurance Institute (NII). The annual report on poverty submitted to the Government receives wide coverage by the media, raising the major issues on the public agenda as well as helping the Government reassess its policy to reduce poverty.

411. The definition of poverty adopted by the NII is a relative one, by which a family is considered poor when its standard of living falls considerably below the average. Although a family's standard of living is a multidimensional concept, expressed through various aspects (income, housing, health, education, etc.) the poverty measure is based on income data only, which are available on an ongoing basis. The poverty line in Israel is defined as 50 per cent of the net median income, adjusted to family size.

412. According to the NII 1993 report, 16 per cent of all families have net incomes below the poverty lines, with the average net income of a poor family being 75 per cent of the poverty line. Transfer payments, especially NII benefits, play a crucial role in reducing poverty and income disparities. In the absence of transfer payments (mainly NII benefits), 34 per cent of all families would be classified as poor, implying that transfers have reduced the poverty incidence by more than one half. Although transfer payments, mainly to low-income groups, contribute significantly to the reduction of poverty among the elderly, the non-employed and large families, poverty is still more frequent among these groups: almost one fifth of the elderly, one third of the large families and one half of the non-employed are poor. Poverty is also relatively high among non-Jewish families - more than one third are poor.

413. These data should be read in conjunction with the following tables, presenting the resources and their use, including GNP, GDP, per capita GNP and GDP, private consumption expenditure over the years as well as GNP by deciles.

414. One of the factors contributing to the extent of poverty in Israel is the wide variation in family size. A significant percentage of the Israeli population has four or more children and a large percentage of these children grow up in these families. This means that with a given inequality in the wage structure, more poverty and inequality are generated because of the differences in family size. Family size differences are highly correlated with ethnic background. Large families are much more widespread in the Arab population and among certain sub-groups within the Jewish population. This serves to exacerbate inequalities among ethnic groups and the relative concentration of poverty within these groups.

415. Poverty among children and women is of special concern to policy makers: 20 per cent of all children in Israel live in families whose income is below the poverty line. Poverty among families headed by women is more frequent than among families headed by men. Almost one third of the families with children headed by women are poor, compared with 15 per cent of families with children headed by men.

(iii) Physical quality of life index

416. Israel still does not have a physical quality of life index. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs plans to create one, with the help of the National Council for Diminishing Social Gaps and War on Poverty (described below).

The right to adequate food

417. The right to adequate food is fully recognized by governmental and non-governmental organizations in Israel. Food provision for indigent people is part of the social assistance offered by the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare, the National Insurance Institute, the municipalities and various voluntary organizations (e.g. ESHEL - The Association for Planning and Developing Services for the Aged in Israel). This right is implemented in two ways: indirectly, by securing a sufficient basic income, and directly, by either supplying food or food-related services.

Income Maintenance

418. Income for subsistence is provided by the various social security schemes under the National Insurance Law - described in this report under article 9 - supplemented by the Assurance of Income Law 1980.

419. The Income Maintenance Law, 1980 basically provides a "safety net": whoever lacks the defined minimal income, taking into account income from most social security branches, has the right to receive from the NII a monthly allowance up to the allowed minimum. It may be said that anyone in vital need is entitled under the law, except for a person capable of working who refuses to do so (i.e. refusal of a suitable occupation proposed via the Employment Service). The full text of the law is attached in annex A to this report.

420. The Assurance of Income Law does not apply to new immigrants, income maintenance for whom is provided by the Immigration and Absorption Ministry according to the Absorption Basket Law 1994 and the Ministry's detailed administrative directives.

421. The Welfare Services Law 1958 defines the State's duty, together with the municipalities, to provide assistance to residents in need. Regulations issued under this law define the term "in need" for this purpose to include all sorts of personal needs. As to the content of this duty, the law basically refers to the rules issued by the director general of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs. These rules cover all personal social services. Mention should be made here of the "special needs programme". Under this programme, social workers in local welfare services may grant assistance needed for provision of particular vital items like clothes, blankets, heaters and similar basic supplies. This discretionary power is used until reaching the limit of the budget set for this purpose.

Nutrition services

422. Special assistance is provided to those in need of special dietary food due to medical conditions (metabolic disorders, celiac disease, etc.). This assistance is provided by Department of Nutrition in the Ministry of Health in the form of subsidies.

423. Young children and babies are tracked by the Family Health Centers stationed in every neighbourhood throughout the country. Public health nurses, all trained in nutrition, run these centres. In each region and district there are Public Health Services Headquarters, where public health dietitians are part of the team. They are involved in almost all the nutritional aspects of the population, including senior citizens and the very old.

424. Special efforts are aimed at developing health promotion nutrition projects, tailored for the special needs of each community and in consideration of the local characteristics (culture, age, background, needs, etc.).

425. The Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS) has conducted several surveys concentrating on the living conditions in Israel. Some of these provide valuable information on nutrition or have implications for nutrition policy:

426. Review of the food balance sheets collected annually from 1947-1996 reveals an increase in per capita consumption of calories from 2,610 to 3,471 kcal/day, an increase of 33 per cent. Interesting to note are a marked increase in the consumption of fat from 343 to 573 kcal/day, an increase of 67 per cent; the increase in the consumption of vegetables from 65 to 124 kcal/day, an increase of 90 per cent; the increase of consumption of fruits from 105 to 195 kcal/day, an increase of 85 per cent and the increase of consumption of meat from 95 to 336 kcal/day, an increase of 253 per cent.

427. The main data from the latest household expenditure survey were produced above. These surveys, collected every four or five years, have provided data needed for the establishment of nutrition policy: food subsidies and price control, nutrition education and promotion programmes, etc. Six special surveys were done in the past, and six more are ongoing. These surveys are either cross-sectional, small-scaled, or targeted to suspected vulnerable groups. Additionally, there is an ample number of surveys done by academia in different parts of the country, or in diverse sub-groups of the population. These surveys used different methodologies, conducted at different times, and provide non-generalizable information. Therefore, they cannot be directly compared, or lead to a sound national nutrition policy.

428. It is necessary to look beyond the overall per capita aggregate in order to determine how the nutritionally vulnerable groups fare. In order to overcome the lack of data regarding geographical areas, sub-populations etc., a first National Nutrition Survey (NNS) is planned. The NNS will furnish information on food and nutrition intakes, dietary practices, physical activity, smoking habits, anthropometric data, socio-economic status, health status, and nutrition knowledge and attitudes of a representative sample of 4,500 Israelis, aged 12 to 75. The project is the largest and most comprehensive food and nutrition survey of Israel's population ever undertaken. Preparations started in 1997 and data collection will take place continuously from April 1998 to May 1999. This survey will provide information regarding indigent populations and vulnerable groups, and a database for public health policy decisions.

429. On the basis of the available data only the following comments as to potential areas of concern can be made:

While the unemployment rate is fluctuating, there is no available data to show its nutritional effect in all social groups.

The Government is contemplating a reduction in monetary subsidies and price controls. Such reduction, if applied to basic food items, may jeopardize vulnerable populations in the future.

Methods of improvement of production, conservation and distribution of food

430. The Ministry of Agriculture deals with planning of the production of the various categories of agricultural produce and its supply to the population. The Ministry deals with agricultural development and economic consolidation of rural settlements, as well as the development and allocation of the State's water resources, and responsibility for its lands. The following is a brief survey of the Ministry's activities relevant to the present report.

431. The Authority for Settlement, Agriculture and Rural Planning and Development deals with the gamut of problems of agriculture planning in the short and long term, making forecasts of requirements and strategic market research; allocation of growing and production quotas in the various branches; preparation of multi-year programmes, development programmes for agricultural infrastructure, regional plants and settlement patterns; conducting of research in agricultural and rural fields; referral of international projects in the sphere of agriculture and development of weak areas. This sphere of activity also includes contact with international institutions abroad and referral of the agricultural produce of neighbouring areas.

432. The Division for Land Preservation and Drainage is in charge of the development of regional and national economic plans for the utilization of waste water and preservation of the land resources, run-off water and natural vegetation, as well as for drainage and protection from flash floods of agricultural and built-up areas. To this end, the Division collects and analyses the natural data and determines the means for implementing the programmes. The Division is responsible for 42 drainage authorities and eight pasture authorities, which implement the regional and national plans and, through land preservation cells in the districts, instructs and guides farming settlements in the implementation of plans for local drainage and reservoirs. The Division undertakes land and pasturing surveys, land preservation planning research on regional and local drainage, reservoirs and pastures, and applied research (carried out at erosion research stations). The basis for every land preservation and pasturing programme is the land survey and the vegetation survey.

433. The Agricultural Research Administration coordinates the activity of research institutes and agricultural farms throughout the country, and deals with a wide range of subjects, from promotion of new products to the adjustment of mechanization and agricultural technology. The Administration deals also with development of products that can withstand disease and pests and development of innovative storage suitable for today's produce.

434. The Instruction and Professional Service helps farmers with instruction, planning and development of rural settlements. Advice and growing directives are given for the utilization of production elements according to each region's climatic and agricultural character. The Service coordinates the range of actions in the fields of instruction, development and professional promotion in all branches and activities of the agricultural settlement. The professional units of the Service advise the senior echelons of the Ministry in policy formulation, and direct and guide the instruction units in the districts, at the regional instruction offices and in the field services. Ten instruction units in the districts and the offices deal with agricultural instruction and advice, arrange field days and demonstrations, study days, short courses and, of course and primarily, instruction for the farmer at his farm. In conjunction with the other units of the Ministry, special emphasis can be placed on activities to promote exports, replace imports and offer instruction to young settlements in accordance with the trends and work aims of the Ministry.

435. The Agricultural Investments Administration encourages capital investments in agriculture, promotes exports of agricultural produce and works for utilization of the natural conditions and experience latent in the agricultural sector. The administration was set up in order to operate the Encouragement of Capital Investment in Agriculture Law, 1980. The Government appoints the director of the Administration (at the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture) and members of the Administration are appointed by the Ministers of Agriculture and Finance. The administration approves plans in accordance with the planning principles that the Ministry of Agriculture formulates for each budget year, after a branch, economic and professional examination. The law works to encourage investments in two ways: (a) a grant of 40 per cent of the investment; (b) income tax concessions for all the approved programmes - expressed by accelerated depreciation and an income tax ceiling of up to 30 per cent for companies and for an individual who is not a company who keeps separate two-sided books of account for the enterprise; 15 per cent for recipients of dividends from the companies. The concessions are given for the first five profitable years of the project but for not later than the twelfth year from the date on which approval was given for the programme. Farmers with land, water and a production quota are eligible to submit an application for approval of a programme.

436. The Division for Protection of Flora prevents the penetration of new diseases through control over imports and quarantining plants. It issues certificates of health for agricultural produce according to the requirements of the importing countries. It monitors diseases and their incidence and prepares lists of where they are found in the country. It locates and destroys new diseases that have entered the country before they become established here, and fights diseases that have entered and prevents their spread and consolidation. It also licenses and registers the supervision over pesticides for agricultural use and the examination of pesticide remnants; manages a computerized information centre in conjunction with the Agricultural Investments Administration; supervises plant reproductive material and seeds being traded; approves improved seeds; marks and registers mother trees and plants; supervises agricultural produce for export (fruit, vegetables and flowers); supervises and licenses fodder and additives to animal fodder; provides services for farmers for testing for diseases and their prevention and testing of pesticide preparations and fodder testing; and conducts applied research on subjects associated with the foregoing activities.

437. The Veterinary Services see to the health of livestock and other animals. The Veterinary Institute is responsible for health supervision and prevention of diseases and their spread.

The right to adequate housing

438. Throughout its 50-year history, Israel has maintained a steadfast commitment to the goal of a decent home in a suitable living environment.

Although no comprehensive legislation mandates this objective, such as is the case in other countries, all the coalitions that have formed the Government since the establishment of the State have consistently sought to achieve this goal through various administrative programmes.

439. The well-founded objective of adequate housing for all citizens has been expressed differently during the last five decades - both because of the changing scope of housing need and because the variable conditions have led to modified definitions of need and to various forms of government involvement in housing provision.

The "hands on - hands off" policies of government involvement

440. A historical overview of housing policy in Israel indicates a steady decline in government involvement and an increasing reliance on the private sector. This trend has been disrupted from time to time, especially during periods of increased immigration that markedly affected the housing cycle, or when greater emphasis was placed on achieving other national objectives such as population dispersal to peripheral regions.

441. During the first 20 years after independence (1948-1967), national housing policy was implemented by what may be characterized as the State's "mighty hand". During this period, more than two thirds of all dwelling units built were contracted by the Government, as opposed to private developers. Government agencies under the aegis of the Ministry of Construction and Housing (hereinafter "MCH") were mandated with taking charge of the completed units and renting them to eligible families, primarily new immigrants from Europe and North Africa.

442. Over the subsequent 20 years, when the State exerted what may be termed a "guiding hand", about one third of all new construction was government contracted, with the housing market being influenced by means of various government-initiated supply and demand mechanisms. The supply of government-owned units was still increasing and the eligible population groups for public rental units was expanded to include non-immigrant families living in substandard or overcrowded conditions.

443. Beginning in the mid-1980s, government housing policy was characterized by what may be termed a "disappearing hand" - striving to achieve Adam Smith's "invisible hand" - as the State increasingly relied on market forces and operated within the framework of a privatization policy. Concomitant with this policy, the national Government undertook a campaign to sell publicly owned rental units to the tenants. The outcome of this policy was a reduction of publicly owned stock by almost 30 per cent.

444. In the first half of the 1990's, a surge of immigrants from the former Soviet Union resulted in a population increase of approximately 12 per cent and a fourfold rise in annual housing demand. The privatized orientation experienced difficulties in meeting the housing demands of these new arrivals, especially since the immigrants represented a "needy" population group and thus a less profitable sector of the market. As a result, greater governmental incentives were required to stimulate the market to achieve the needed levels of construction. Significantly, these units were built to be sold and, at least initially, were not designated to be rented to individuals or families eligible for public housing.

445. This brief period may be termed the "outstretched hand" by those who justify the intensified involvement, or the "meddling hand" by those who disdain the form of government intervention that was adopted, and the concomitant effects on the housing market.

Housing situation in Israel

446. The first and foremost source of data relevant to this part of the present report is based on a Family Expenditure Survey conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics in 1992/93.

447. The existing data do not always distinguish between different population sub-groups. It is expected that more detailed information on housing conditions of various groups will be available in 1998, when the decennial census results are published.

448. It should be stressed that the MCH conducts periodic surveys of housing needs for different groups. These studies, conducted over the years, have focused on a variety of potentially vulnerable groups, such as the elderly, Arabs, single parents, immigrants, young couples, discharged soldiers, families living in development towns or in disadvantaged neighbourhoods, low-income households, physically challenged persons, etc. The results serve as the basis for calibrating the various parameters and adjusting eligibility criteria for all MCH housing assistance programmes. Since these groups may include both needy and resourceful households, the MCH programmes integrate the socio-economic characteristics of these groups without necessarily formulating a specific programme exclusively for a particular population sub-group.

449. The following is a short summary of the main findings of the Family Expenditure Survey, supplemented by additional data, when available.

(i) Tenure

450. The majority of Israel's households own their own home. In 1991 almost 72 per cent of all households were owner-occupiers. Almost one quarter (23.9 per cent) were renters, while the remaining 4 per cent lived in a variety of arrangements, especially where housing was provided within the context of work. Among the renter households, 2.1 per cent were classified as "protected" tenants under rent control legislation. Renter households may also be classified according to the type owner: 6.7 per cent of the rental households are rented from publicly owned units and 13.9 per cent from privately owned units. A breakdown of these data by deciles is included in the table shown below.

451. Through financial assistance programmes (described further below) 65 per cent of all new households purchase their own apartment within the first three years after marriage, and 91 per cent within 10 years of marriage. Thus young couples (married during the period 1982-1993) achieved the following ownership rates:

Length of marriage (years)	Ownership rate (%)
1-3	64.9
3-5	72.0
5-7	82.4
9-11	90.9
11-13	91.9

452. Of the new immigrants who arrived in Israel between 1989 and 1994 from the former Soviet Union, nearly 70 per cent own their housing today:

Year of immigration	Ownership rate (%)	No. of immigrants
1989	90.5	24 050
1990	84.4	199 516
1991	76.0	176 100
1992	.3	77 057
1993	68.7	76 805
1994	59.2	79 844
1995	47.1	76 362

(ii) Affordability

453. The data based on the family expenditure survey of 1992/93 indicate that the expenditure for housing for the average household was 19.48 per cent of overall consumption expenditures. The average outlay for the lowest two income deciles was 17.41 per cent, compared with 21.15 per cent for the two highest deciles. See a further breakdown in the following two tables.

(iii) Sanitation facilities

454. The level of facilities in dwelling units is an important component of household living conditions. About 71 per cent of all households lived in dwelling units equipped with one toilet, while 28 per cent lived in units with two toilets or more. Similarly 75 per cent of all households lived in units with a bath while almost 25 per cent lived in dwelling units equipped with a shower only. These data refer to a survey of all recognized cities and townships, but did not include "illegal settlements" (dealt with further below). More comprehensive information covering these sites will be available next year, following the processing of the most recent decennial census information.

(iv) Density

455. Housing density, as measured by the number of persons per room, has declined over the years as the size of households has decreased and the average dwelling unit increased. The 1992/93 survey reveals an average of 1.1 persons per room (kitchen and bathroom not included). At the upper end of the density scale 12 per cent of all households live with between 1.5 and 1.99 persons per room, while an additional 11 per cent of households have more than two persons per room.

456. According to recent data for the year 1996 the average number of persons per room is under 1 per cent for Jews and stands at 1.62 per cent for non-Jews:

(v) Public housing eligibility

457. Approximately 120,000 housing units (7.5 per cent of total households in Israel) are administered by public housing companies. Two such companies maintain units in numerous cities and towns throughout the country, while the remaining are primarily jointly owned national-municipal companies. Eligibility for publicly owned rental units is set by criteria described below. The most recent official figures indicate that approximately 2,000 families are on waiting lists for public housing.

(vi) Homelessness

458. Out of a population of over 5.8 million only about 3,000 persons are estimated to be "homeless". Social service agencies at the national level under the aegis of the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare, working in conjunction with the local municipalities, have provided assistance to approximately 1,200 homeless persons since 1990. The Ministry's annual budgetary appropriations for addressing the needs of homeless persons amounts to NIS 4.5 million ($1.3 million). Moreover, the various assistance programmes, described further in this chapter, typically render homelessness in Israel a temporary situation.

459. The special situation of two particularly vulnerable sub-groups need further elaboration: new immigrants from Ethiopia and Bedouins living in illegal settlements.

460. New immigrants from Ethiopia. There are today in Israel a total of about 57,000 Ethiopian Jews, who immigrated in two major waves in the mid-1980s and in 1991. They have large families and about 60 per cent of them are under age 18. There is a high percentage of single-parent families (about 25 per cent), about three times the national rate. Their integration into Israeli society has raised some major challenges.

461. The immigrants who came in the 1980s were settled directly into local communities in which they, for the most part, established permanent residence based on the provision of public housing. By the time the 1991 wave arrived, the public housing stock in the central cities had been used up. It should be taken into account that at that time there were already some 300,000 new immigrants from the CIS in the country. The newcomers from Ethiopia were at first housed in hotels and various absorption centres. Later, they were provided with caravans in 22 mobile home sites. Some 6,930 households from the CIS and 4,920 households from Ethiopia were housed in caravan sites. Efforts to provide these immigrants with permanent housing have proven effective, as shown in the following table:

	The situation in September 1992		The situation in April 1996
	Families	Singles	Families	Singles
Caravan sites	3 720	1 200	450	910
Absorption centres	1 460	500	250	320
Hotels	157	-	-	-
Other	-	-	-	200
Total	5 337	1 700	700	1 340

462. A contributing factor of change was the initiation in 1992 by the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption of an unprecedented mortgage programme (described below).

463. Occupants of illegal settlements (mostly Bedouins). The right to decent housing is recognized in Israel within the legal framework of town planning and local government organization. However, this does not mean having the right to live anywhere one chooses. There exist in Israel about 53,000 people, mostly Bedouins, living in settlements of all sizes, which do not fit in the urban and rural planning schemes designed by the relevant authorities under Israeli law. Such settlers consistently refuse governmental aid proposals for resettling in appropriate locations. The following is a detailed account of the legal and factual situation regarding illegal settlements in Israel.

464. The Bedouins started settling in the land of Israel in the fifth century A.D. This process continued, most notably during the time of the Ottoman Administration over the region, and throughout the period of the British Mandate, preceding the establishment of the State of Israel. This gradual process has continued up to contemporary times.

465. A great deal of the lands which the Bedouins claim are of the legal type named muwat, i.e. land that is not privately owned or possessed. The relevant laws regarding muwat lands were implemented in 1858, in accordance with paragraph 6 of the Ottoman statute over this area. Paragraph 103 of the same law determines that the possession of the muwat land which is not privately owned, is conditioned by an initial permit.

466. During the British Mandate similar laws were enacted. Thus, the Land Ordinance (Mewat) 1921 states:

"Any person who, without obtaining the consent of the Director of Lands, breaks up or cultivates any waste land shall obtain no right to a title deed for such land and shall further be liable to be prosecuted for trespassing."

467. As for cultivating land without a formal permit before the publishing of this Ordinance, it was possible to formalize a legal right to the land by filling out a request with the Land Clerk within two months of the Ordinance's publication. Following the publication of the Ordinance, the Bedouins did not register the lands they were inhabiting. A great many have no written documents proving their rights. Nevertheless, both the Ottoman Administration and the British Mandate officials decided not to evacuate the Bedouin inhabitants from the lands they effectively were inhabiting.

468. Indeed, traditional Bedouin law is significantly different from that implemented by the Ottoman Administration, including different ways of proof with no need to issue formal written documents. However, Israel's law of land rights does require written documents for any land transaction.

469. Nevertheless, the Government finds it hard to meet the basic needs of the people, being obliged to provide services, such as water, electricity, roads, health care, and sanitary and educational facilities, without prior and proper planning.

470. Back in the 1960s and 1970s, a national plan for handling the Bedouin illegal settlement problem in the south had been formed. According to the plan, seven urban towns were to be established for the entire Bedouin population in the south. The Bedouins willing to settle there were to be compensated properly and to be transferred to the towns. Today, around 40,000 people who accepted the national plan reside in those towns. Unfortunately, more than 50 per cent of the Bedouin population still live in illegal settlement locations. Their main demand is to be permitted to form rural settlements, where they could practise traditional habitation.

471. Currently, a Planning and Building Law (Reformation - Demolishing Orders) Bill is being debated in the Knesset. The main goal of this proposed legislation is a total ban on the implementation of any demolishing order in any illegal settlement until a proper solution has been found for the inhabitants.

472. Israel acknowledges that it cannot impose upon the entire Bedouin population an urban solution which would be contrary to its wish and traditional way of life. Hence, in 1995, the Minister of Housing instructed that the existing policy be changed. The Minister developed a new strategy aimed at promoting a better quality of life for the entire Bedouin population while maintaining the traditional Bedouin way of life. Investments in the Bedouin sector have increased from NIS 50 million in 1989, to NIS 138 million in 1993-1995. New guidelines issued by the Housing Minister directed that investments in infrastructure should be on a level comparable to that in Jewish settlements.

473. According to the new guidelines:

(a) The Ministries of Interior and Housing are to plan two or three new urban towns for 20,000 people. Their living would be earned from agriculture and sheep;

(b) Agricultural settlements - two to three new agricultural settlements are to be established, each accommodating 600 families;

(c) Ten agricultural farms are to be planned for around 5,000 people;

(d) Five to seven shepherds' settlements for around 100 families are to be planned.

474. In 1996 a special Knesset commission examined this issue. One of its recommendations was to find a compromise; whereas on the one hand some of the illegal settlements would be recognized, on the other hand, proper compensation for concession of the land would be granted. The commission also agreed that aside from providing compensation, the towns where the Bedouins would reside should meet their needs and characteristics. Resources for additional settlements will be allocated and the number, location and distribution of their inhabitants stipulated. Furthermore, it also recommended that arbitrators be appointed for rapid processing of Bedouin claims, and that Bedouin settlements be connected to electricity and sewage systems more rapidly.

475. The Supreme Court has addressed on several occasions the unique problem of illegal settlement and inadequate housing conditions in the Bedouin sector in Israel, and has expressed its approval of the government policy to encourage the transfer of Bedouins into permanent settlements built on State lands. The following citation sums up the problem from a legal point of view:

"In the State of Israel, the Bedouins constitute an ethnic minority of unique character. The Bedouins are originally nomadic tribes whose economy was based on camel and sheep herding ... In recent decades a gradual process of change has occurred within the Bedouin tribes marking a shift from nomadic life to semi-nomadic life and permanent settlement. The move to permanent settlements was unplanned and unorganized, and was thus characterized through negative phenomena of illegal construction, taking possession of State lands and lack of vital services. Consequently, a governmental policy was determined, in as early as in the 1960s, which stated the need to settle the Bedouins in planned permanent settlement, so that the phenomena of illegal construction and taking possession of State lands would be stopped and the provision of orderly public services such as education, health, hygiene and other municipal services could be facilitated ... The establishment of permanent settlements for Bedouins required therefore unique planning of the settlement to the needs, practices and traditions of the Bedouins, since otherwise the Bedouins would have refused to move to the permanent settlements ... The establishment of the permanent settlements was also intended to offer adequate housing solutions to the Bedouin families living in illegal houses, so that those illegal houses could be demolished and the area of land cleared ... The establishment of permanent settlements could also facilitate and assist future agreements with the Bedouins pertaining to the property rights in lands in dispute ...

"The Bedouin towns are established on State lands and/or land expropriated especially for the purpose of establishing a permanent Bedouin town. The appropriation of land for building the Bedouin permanent settlements in the Negev are for Bedouins only, and is being done at a specially low and State-subsidized price, all this in order to encourage permanent settlement of the Bedouins which comports with the important public considerations described above ... [T]here is a public interest to assist the Bedouins in permanently settling in towns ... and the preferential treatment given to them ... is anchored in reasonable and pertinent considerations ..."

H.C. 528/88 Avitan v. Israel Land Administration, P.D. 43 (4) 297, 300-304

476. Data on settlements in the south. The Bedouin population is spread throughout the northern part of the Negev, mostly in the Sayig area covering 1.5 million dunam. Some 40 per cent of the area is being utilized by the Bedouin for habitation, pasture and agriculture. The total Bedouin population in the south is estimated today to be 100,000 people. About 50,000 live in "illegal" settlements. The yearly natural growth of this population is about 5.6 per cent, at this rate the total Bedouin population in the south will number 120,000 by the year 2000. It is worthwhile noting that the total population of Israel is some 5.8 million people, meaning that the number of inhabitants living in "illegal" settlements in the southern part of the country is less than 1 per cent of the total Israeli population.

477. The "illegal" settlements are excluded from the formal population survey. There are no updated and exact data regarding the size of the population or its composition. Nevertheless, in 1991 the Ministry of Interior conducted a survey to evaluate the size of the population and other demographic data. According to the survey there are 108 tribes divided into several settlements. The total number of temporary settlements is estimated to be 1,213. The total number of housing units in the settlements is estimated to be 9,273. According to these data, the population in the area totals a minimum of 46,000 and a maximum of 93,000 inhabitants (calculated at five people per housing unit minimum, 10 people per housing unit maximum). In addition there are some 64 small settlement points (less than 50 housing units per settlement) with 1,350 housing units, and 40 large settlement points (more than 50 housing units per settlement) with 7,923 housing units. Average density for small settlements is 21 housing units per settlement. Average density for large settlements is 192 housing units per settlement.

478. Data on settlements in the north. The number of Bedouin in the northern part of Israel is estimated to be 38,000 people. Of them the number of people in illegal settlements is 3,000.

479. Prospects for the future. In light of the principle of equality, Israel cannot accept a wide range of illegal housing in the Bedouin settlements. Nevertheless, the Government acknowledges the fact that illegal building in this case is done out of necessity. An effort is being made to reduce the implementation of demolition orders until a permanent solution can be found. Since the beginning of the 1990s there is an ongoing process of accepting the claims of the Bedouin representative organizations.

480. Nine of the 40 settlements legalization - eight were legalized during the years 1995-1996 (government decisions Nos. 4377, dated 14 December 1994; 4569, dated 3 January 1995; and 206, dated 24 December 1995). Today, the administrative planning for the settlements is approaching completion. Government decision No. 206 determined that consultations would continue over the ninth locality.

481. Consultations over other small illegal settlements - mostly comprised of single families - are continuing out of a commitment to the late Prime Minister Rabin's declaration that the Government favoured the integration of smaller illegal settlements into larger legal ones, adopting one of the following alternatives: keeping the rights to their agricultural land, substituting lands, receiving compensation for the lands. In May 1996, the Government also decided on a special allocation of NIS 5 million for providing infrastructure to the newly recognized settlements.

482. The Attorney-General took it upon himself on 15 June 1997 to call upon the Ministry of Interior to find creative solutions to speed up the planning process regarding those settlements which have been legalized, so that basic services as water, electricity, education and so on could be provided soon. As to the other settlements, the Attorney-General decided to urge the Prime Minister to establish an interministerial committee to coordinate the various current governmental activities, with clear instructions to be more sensitive to the humanitarian aspect of the problem. The Attorney-General's main suggestion was to tackle the problem on a practical level, looking for ad hoc solutions, taking into consideration distinctions between old and new homes, small and large settlements, whether houses were placed on already planned lands, etc.

Overview of current housing assistance programmes

483. The Ministry of Construction and Housing (MCH) utilizes various policy tools aimed at creating an adequate supply of affordable housing that meets the needs of the country's various population groups. The Ministry's NIS 10 billion ($2.9 billion) budget covers the entire housing production process from planning and land allocation, via construction and infrastructure provision, to mortgage financing and public housing. The overall strategy is an enabling one whereby the Government makes resources available both on the supply side and on the demand side to provide the means for various types of households to purchase housing.

(i) Supply-side policies

484. The MCH undertakes a variety of measures aimed at increasing the supply of housing. These measures include:

Statutory planning of new cities, towns and neighbourhoods;

Land tenders housing, out of State-owned lands;

Planning and provision of residential infrastructure, including electricity, water and sewage, drainage and communications networks (in peripheral parts of the country designated as national priority zones, discounts covering up to 50 per cent of overall costs are provided for the residential infrastructure);

Planning and financing of public facilities such as schools, day care centres, community centres, libraries, public gardens and parks, etc.

485. Land use falls under the purview of the Planning and Building Law 1965. This law establishes a three-tiered system of statutory bodies and plans at the national, district and local levels. National plans are formulated by the National Planning and Building Board and approved by the Government; district plans are prepared by six District Planning Committees and approved by the National Board; and local plans are prepared by Local Planning Boards or by private entrepreneurs and approved at the local or district levels depending on the scope and complexity of the plan. Building permits and inspection of construction to ensure compliance with the local code is administered by local planning committees. The full text of this law is attached in annex A to this report.

486. Further mention should be made of land tenders for housing. In 1996 the MCH and the Israel Lands Administration (ILA) issued a variety of tenders for land planned for some 46,000 dwelling units. These tenders include: "Lowest Price to the Consumer", in which competition among builders focuses on marketing the finished units to eligible families at the lowest per metre price; "Cooperative Housing" built in conjunction with municipalities for eligible households; "Net Housing" in which the Government coordinates between a contractor, selected by competitive bid, and eligible families who have been selected by lottery; as well as the traditional regular bids for land without any limitations set on price or eligibility criteria. In all cases, the land offered for tender has a site plan approved by the various statutory planning bodies. Furthermore, the land is serviced with residential infrastructure provided either by the MCH, the ILA or a relevant municipal agency.

(ii) Demand-side assistance

487. The MCH provides demand-side housing assistance in a variety of forms. These include:

Mortgages - approximately 50,000 subsidized mortgages annually;

Rent supplements - approximately 140,000 rent supplements monthly;

Public housing - approximately 7,000 new tenants annually.

488. Before providing further details on each form of assistance, it is important to note their common principles:

(a) Building a partnership between the individual and the State in solving housing problems: the assistance is conditioned on the individual's financial participation, according to his/her needs and resources;

(b) Leaving the choice to the individual as to the preferred solution of the available assistance schemes;

(c) Defining qualifications for assistance and the level thereof according to objective criteria;

(d) Providing clear information on the various existing privileges, in order to minimize the level of an individual's dependence on the authorities;

(e) Granting the services within a framework of specialized agencies, such as mortgage banks and public housing corporations. The goal of the MCH is to concentrate on policy-making, allocating resources, delineating rules for achieving its goals and supervising performance.

(iii) Mortgage assistance

489. Mortgages are provided for the acquisition of housing (first- or second-hand), building one's own home, or apartment enlargement. In 1996 more than 52,000 government-sponsored mortgages were provided to the various categories of eligible households, 90 per cent of whom were first-time home-owners. Most of the subsidies for the loans are financed by the national budget. In 1995 over 96 per cent of the loans were financed by the Government; the remaining 3.5 per cent were financed and backed by private banks, with a government subsidy to cover the difference between the market interest rate and the special interest rate for such loans. The overall budget for these loans was in 1996 approximately NIS 6 million ($1.7 million), which represents 3.4 per cent of the 1996 total national budget.

490. The central precondition for eligibility for mortgage assistance is to be a "non-homeowner": this term applies to a household in which neither spouse is currently or previously a homeowner (retainer of property rights in an apartment or house) nor has received in the past governmental assistance for housing. Non-homeowners are then divided into several groups, according to their status (immigrant/non-immigrant) and their family status (singles, couples, single-parent families). The assistance level is defined by different parameters that vary among the different groups (i.e. years of marriage, number of children, size of original family, etc.). In general, these parameters imply situations of socio-economic need and are aimed at quantifying such needs (every parameter determines a certain amount of points, which add up to determine the level of assistance). For the Young Couples Program, for example, the number of children and the number of siblings of both spouses have been found to serve as an indirect measure of equity accumulation, reflecting the local pattern in which parents often help their children in making the initial down-payment for housing.

491. Further differentiation may be made in exceptional cases on the basis of a "severity test" which is determined according to the extent of distress, its length, the size of the family, etc. Finally, the Families of Single-Parent Law and the Absorption of Discharged Soldiers Law 1994 prescribes an increase in the level of assistance to these two specific sectors of the population, also assuming the existence of increased needs. The final, and important, criterion of level of assistance is the geographic site chosen for the realization of the mortgage assistance. The country is divided in four zones, depending on the governmental preferences and based on geo-political considerations. Development towns, for example, are usually included in the zone where the level of assistance is the greatest. As a general rule, assistance in peripheral areas is greater than that in the centre of Israel.

492. In exceptional cases an appeal against refused requests for assistance can be filed to a local Housing Assistance Committee, composed of representatives of governmental and municipal housing officials. A district Housing Assistance Committee exists as a higher appeal instance. Finally, there exists in the MCH headquarters a Central Appeal Committee, which is given discretion to grant assistance in deviation from the rules, in order to address particular and unusual problems.

493. In the last decade there has been a significant growth in the rate of young Israeli couples that have exercised their right to subsidized mortgages. Available data enable comparison between the years 1984-1986 and 1994-1996 and show an average growth of about 40 per cent - from 37 per cent to over 51 per cent. The most dramatic growth of mortgage realization is among the Arab population (680 per cent), and the Druze population (about 59 per cent).

Data	1984-1986	1994-1996	Change
Average number of marriages	29 714	36 229	21.7%
Jews	23 673	27 150	14.7%
Arabs	5 543	8 327	50.2%
Druze	498	752	50.9%
Average number mortgages executed	10 930	18 657	70.7%
Jews	10 481	15 182	50.9%
Arabs	229	2 319	912.7%
Druze	219	526	139.8%
Percentage of realization	36.8%	51.5%	40.0%
Jews	44.3%	58.2%	31.5%
Arabs	4.1%	27.9%	680.1%
Druze	44.0%	70.0%	58.9%

494. Other specialized programmes for mortgage assistance include:

Single-parent - for single parent households;

Immigrants - for new immigrants, especially from the CIS and Ethiopia;

Elderly - for those of retirement age;

Singles - for single-person households;

Development areas - for purchasing housing in designated development areas;

Urban renewal - for purchasing or upgrading units in "Project Renewal" neighbourhoods.

495. Single-parent families. The level of assistance to this group is relatively higher than for most non-homeowners. The Single-Parent Families Law 1992 was enacted in recognition of the fact that this group is especially vulnerable and the chances of a single parent (usually a single mother) purchasing housing are of the lowest. Recently, a special increase in assistance was added for single-parent families which have seniority as such of over five years. The mortgage rates for this group approaches the rate of the highest levels of couples assistance, i.e. who reach these levels after a longer period. The following table illustrates the form and level of mortgage assistance for this group:

Assistance for single-parent families (in NIS)

Status	Mortgage rate	Portion which is a conditional grant	Initial monthly return
Zone No. 1 sing. fam. + child	153 000	47 000	535
+ over 5 years	170 000	53 000	590
Zone No. 2 sing. fam. + child	163 700	50 300	573
+ over 5 years	181 900	56 700	631
Zone No. 3 sing.fam. + 0-3 child	124 000	31 000	468
sing. fam. + 4-5 child	136 000	35 000	508
sing. fam. + 6 + child.	146 000	37 000	647
Zone No. 4 sing. fam. + 0.3 child	138 000	45 000	461
sing. fam. + 4-5 child	149 000	45 000	461
sing. fam. + 6 + child	159 000	52 000	530

496. Singles. Singles over the age of 27 are entitled to assistance with mortgages for housing purchase only. The level of assistance is determined according to age, while individuals over the age of 35 are entitled to almost the same assistance level which is granted to couples. Recently there has been an improvement for individuals over the age of 45, both by raising the level of assistance itself and by increasing the portion which is a conditional grant.

497. The elderly. In general, an elderly person is an individual over the age of 65. A woman can be considered elderly by age 60. At certain assistance levels, elderly persons without children can get the same amounts as families with children.

498. Immigrants. Housing assistance is crucial to Israel's policy of encouraging immigration. Most new immigrants lack a stable financial basis and need some time to obtain a steady and remunerative employment. Hence the assistance made available to new immigrants, which is higher than to most of the non-immigrant groups. Entitlement for assistance as an immigrant is nevertheless basically limited to seven years, after which he/she is considered as a non-immigrant. Concerning new immigrants from Ethiopia, in light of their rather unique situation, there are special criteria which further raise the level of mortgages up to over NIS 365,000, of which about 90 per cent is a grant, with a special initial monthly return of NIS 157. (For comparison, see the table presented above relating to assistance to single parents.)

499. Substitution or enlargement of residence. Although most assistance schemes are intended for "non-homeowners", there are also programmes aimed at solving acute housing problems of homeowners. Improving housing conditions is sometimes vital, such as for health or safety reasons, overcrowding and other hardship conditions. Assistance is offered in such cases to people in need, based on established socio-economic criteria. A main scheme of such assistance exists in the context of Project Renewal, which designates disadvantaged neighbourhoods, establishes a decision-making process designed to empower their residents, and allocates resources for a variety of projects, including improvement of housing conditions. Another important criteria to be mentioned here is over-crowded housing. Assistance to solve problems of overcrowding is available for households with more than 2.2 persons per room or when the apartment's size is too small relative to the number of persons living in it:

Number of persons	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Area (square meters)	22	39	48	58	68	78	88	98

500. The various levels of assistance are described in the next chart (in NIS):

Family size and overcrowding	Mortgage	Portion which is a conditional grant	Initial monthly return
Over 4 persons/room
0-6 persons	58 000	10 000	252
7-8 persons	80 000	32 000	252
9 persons	89 000	41 000	252
10+ persons	98 000	50 000	252
Over 3 persons/room
0-6 persons	46 000	6 000	210
7-8 persons	66 000	26 000	210
9 persons	75 000	35 000	210
10+ persons	84 000	44 000	210

501. Finally, the eligibility for the substitution or enlargement of a residence due to health problems is determined according to the opinion of a medical consultant of the MCH. The level of assistance is identical to other sorts of assistance for housing improvement.

(iv) Rent supplements

502. This programme is aimed to provide assistance in renting private-market apartments. The population groups that are eligible for rent supplements are primarily vulnerable groups. These include: new immigrants, who receive a graduated stipend that decreases over a five-year period; single-parent households - for three years; households whose income falls below a minimum and who exercise their full employment potential; couples who have accumulated 1,400 points or more for three years (according to the criteria of eligibility for mortgage assistance to non-homeowners, as described above), regardless of income. When a means test applies, the main test in use is a proof of eligibility for one of the various subsistence allowances provided by the National Insurance Institute. Aid is also provided to persons in the process of a divorce and responsible for a child/children, and to a single parent who waived her/his housing rights as part of the divorce agreement. The programme is usually aimed as a temporary solution for one to three years, but low-income families according to special criteria, are entitled to unlimited extensions in assistance. The administrative process for realizing the right to rental assistance resembles that provided for subsidized mortgages (described above).

503. Empirical data for 1996 show that rent supplements were made available to more than 140,000 households each month. Of the 142,000 households that received rent supplements at the end of 1996, almost 113,000 (80 per cent) were new immigrants; 13,000 (9 per cent) were young couples with the requisite number of points; 6,300 (4.4 per cent) were single-parent households; and 2,800 (2 per cent) were elderly households, other than those included in the immigrant families.

504. According to the MCH rules there are certain criteria for entitlement to a public housing unit. Priority is given to single-parent households with three or more children, to families whose members have a physical disability and to particularly low income households. Rental rates are set at three different levels, provided that the maximum level of assistance does not exceed 95 per cent of the actual rent. The main criteria under public housing assistance schemes are:

(a) Initial allocation:

(i) Certain non-homeowners - couples, one-person families, single-parent families, elderly persons, handicapped persons - with a means test;

(ii) Residents in unfit accommodation - without any means test;

(b) Change of residence within public housing:

(i) Health problems - without any means test;

(ii) Overcrowded conditions - without any income test.

505. Means tests take into consideration the overall income of the household. The entitlement rate is also influenced by the geographic location of units throughout the country. Generally speaking, there is a large reservoir of apartments held by the MCH and its agents, mostly in peripheral areas of the country. If an appropriate apartment is not available, there is a possibility that the Ministry will finance the acquisition of one to enable placement of an applicant eligible for subsidized rent. Such acquisition is decided according to the financial abilities of the Ministry. In 1996, about 100 such units were purchased to address particularly acute problems.

(vi) Special assistance of the Ministry for Labor and Social Affairs

506. Temporary relief of acute housing crises. There are three different types of such special assistance programmes: participation in rate fees; participation in house-repair expenses; participation in house-moving expenses. The general purpose of the programme is to provide a temporary "safety net" for people with an acute housing crisis. The aid is for a maximum period of two months and its goal is to prevent further aggravation of the situation. It is aimed at persons without any other alternative, who are in extreme personal or familial distress (or in danger thereof) because of exceptional housing conditions. Income tests similar to those used by the MCH is an additional condition. Eligibility is decided on the basis of a report made by a professional social worker. A common factor taken into consideration in this context is the existence or absence of a natural family capable of helping. Assistance is also provided when a judicial opinion recommends or orders separate residences.

507. Special assistance to the homeless. Treatment units in seven municipalities in different parts of the country provide a network of services for homeless persons. These services include: (a) shelter - emergency shelter during which efforts are made to establish eligibility for ongoing assistance; (b) treatment - a rehabilitation centre for treatment and diagnosis to help undertake the process of rehabilitation and the return to a more normal framework of living; (c) satellite apartments serving as "links" to facilitate the return to the community. In addition, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs has established supplementary services and sheltered housing for two small sub-groups with additional needs: (a) alcoholics; and (b) those with emotional or physical disabilities. The services are conducted in cooperation with other national government agencies, including MCH, the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption, and the Ministry of Health, as well as municipal welfare services. This joint effort illustrates the widely accepted commitment on the part of government (both national and local) to taking responsibility for administering the needs of homeless individuals.

The legal framework of housing assistance

508. The Israeli legal framework relating to housing can be divided into two sorts of legal arrangements: (a) administrative directives, which define most of the assistance schemes; and (b) statutes and legal precedents which affect housing rights in the market.

509. The Housing Loans Law 1991 at first sight seems to contradict the validity of the previous distinction, since it creates a legal right to Government-subsidized mortgages. The Law sets a minimum range of mortgage assistance and stipulates maximum levels of interest rate. The Law furthermore authorizes the Minister of Construction and Housing, in conjunction with the Minister of Finance, to provide supplementary assistance at rates to be determined between them. The full text of this law is attached in annex A to this Report.

510. However, the law defines the content of the right by way of referral to the existing rules issued by the MCH. Therefore, no real change occurred since its enactment, and it will remain so until new rules are issued. One can nevertheless say that provisions which until this law was passed were mere "administrative directives", must now be considered as secondary legislation even though they are not published as such. In any case, new rules under this law are in preparation, in the normal format of secondary legislation, and should be issued soon.

511. The legal status of the administrative directives, which define almost all housing assistance programmes described in the previous section, is the following: the Government may modify or abolish them at will, or even deviate from them in particular cases since they are mere "internal directives" guiding the use of discretion in administrative decisions. These directives have, however, legal implications: their content as well as their use or misuse by officials are subject to judicial scrutiny under regular administrative law. Hence decisions according to the said directives may not discriminate, be arbitrary or unreasonable.

512. Mention was made in the previous sections of two laws granting rights to housing assistance to specific groups - the Absorption of Discharged Soldiers Law 1994 and the Single-Parent Families Law 1992. These laws are of limited scope when put in the perspective of all the assistance programmes in place. Furthermore, they merely increase the level of assistance for specific vulnerable groups, as opposed to creating a right standing by itself.

513. The above legal analysis concerns direct assistance to be provided by State or other public agencies. One must keep in mind that there exist in Israel various legal provisions that indirectly affect housing rights and opportunities, often in a way that diminishes the need for direct assistance. Such is the Protection of Tenants Law (Revised Version) 1972. This Law applies only to the housing units it defines (constituting about 2.1 per cent of total rental households). Accordingly, tenants are protected from raises in rent over a certain sum defined by governmental ordinance under the Law. This Law also protects the tenants to which it applies from eviction in contradiction to defined grounds, and gives the courts full discretion to oppose an eviction plea whenever it believes it is needed for "reasons of justice". As a matter of fact, this provision has made eviction from protected tenants almost impossible.

514. Also important in the present context is the Rental and Borrowing Law 1971, which defines the division of responsibility between landlords and their tenants as far as maintenance of the housing unit is concerned.

515. The Sales Law 1968 is a generalized consumer protection-related law. It specifies the rights and responsibilities of the consumer and seller, and outlines the various remedies available in case of breach of the law. The Sales Law (Apartments) 1973 further protects those purchasing new dwelling units from contractors. The Law delineates a standard sales format outlining the physical features of the dwelling unit, and provides for remedies in instances of disparities between the sales contract and the completed unit. The Law additionally defines the minimum guarantee period for various components of the dwelling unit or building. Finally, the Sales Law (Guarantees for the Investment of Purchasers of Apartments) 1974 focuses on providing financial guarantees to the purchasers of apartments from building contractors during the construction process. The law calls for the seller to provide bank guarantees or insurance to the purchaser to protect all payments made before the title transfer is completed.

516. Finally, legal arrangements exist for the provision of substantive reductions or even a total waiver of homeowners' municipal tax in cases involving very low income owners, according to various means tests.

Government policy to combat poverty in Israel - Recent trends and developments

Existing policy

517. Increased resources have been allocated to programmes for promoting social development in the last several years. The areas which have received greatest attention in terms of planning, allocation of funds, and reorganization include improved quality of education and reforms in income maintenance, direct taxation and health care systems. The principles underlying the current government policy to reduce poverty and income disparities are:

- Raising the minimum income guaranteed to the most vulnerable groups: the elderly, the disabled and one parent families.
- Equalizing social security rights of beneficiaries of equal needs.
- Reducing the burden of direct taxes while preserving the delicate balance between efficiency and equity. Equity has been preserved by broadening the tax basis and reducing the marginal tax rates for low income groups.
- Enhancing social protection to new immigrants via the various assistance programmes.
- Guaranteeing by legislation the universal access to health services.
- Allocating more resources to improve the educational system in quantitative as well as qualitative terms.

- Introducing improvements in selected areas of the social services provided to vulnerable populations
- Increasing Social Protection to the most vulnerable groups: The Single-Parent Families Law 1992 and the Reduction of Poverty and Income Disparities.

518. The Single-Parent Families Law, enacted in 1992, has strengthened the social protection for one-parent families with low income, by increasing the level of their means-tested benefit (i.e. the minimum subsistence income), as well as by awarding them child-education grants and priority in vocational training. The law brought about an equalization of rights among the various types of one-parent families, under the principle of "equal treatment for families with equal needs".

519. In 1994, the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs initiated the law for the Reduction of Poverty and Income Disparities. This was enacted in part in response to the publication of data that indicated an increase in the rate of poverty in the last several years. The fact that such a law has been enacted reflects the society's recognition and commitment to alleviate economic hardship and reduce income inequality. Under this law, the means-tested benefits paid to the elderly and one-parent families, as well as the disability benefits for families with children, have been raised significantly and now exceed the poverty line. Also, beneficiaries aged 46 and over received an increment of the benefit, in view of their little likelihood of finding a job. It is estimated that the law will bring about a one third reduction in the incidence of poverty. The resources for financing the increased benefits have been raised mainly by a light cut in the level of the universal child allowances, with the exception of those paid to large families, as well as by an increment in government participation in the financing of social security benefits. A complementary proposal, submitted to the government by the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs and now under discussion, would extend the increased means-tested benefits to all families with children.

Towards universality of Child Allowance Programs

520. In 1993-1994 the Government completed the final steps necessary to establish a universal child allowance scheme, by which a unified allowance would be granted to every family in Israel in accordance with the number of children. These steps included abolishing the income test for small families as a prerequisite for entitlement to child allowances and gradually extending the child allowance increments provided to veterans of the armed services to the entire population. The purpose of these changes was to overcome the low take-up rate of child allowances by small low-income families (only 50 per cent of eligible families had received the allowance) and to base the child allowance level on the number of children alone, irrespective of income and service in the armed forces. This should enhance the equity of the scheme and bring about an improvement in the well-being of families with children, in particular large non-Jewish families, most of whom were previously ineligible for the special increments provided to those who served in the armed forces.

Tax reforms

521. An exceptional number of reforms in the Israel direct tax system took place during the last decade. Since 1984, the Government has undertaken several policy measures to reduce the income tax burden, mainly to enhance work incentives and promote economic growth. These measures, which have been gradually implemented over the decade brought about a reduction in the marginal income tax rates. (The lowest rate has been reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent, and the high from 60 per cent to 48 per cent.) High-income earners have benefited more than low-income earners from these tax changes. To compensate for the adverse effects on equity, complementary steps have been, and will be, implemented in the tax schemes of the social security and health systems, so as to improve overall equity of direct taxes.

522. Under the Reduction of Poverty and Income Disparities Law which came into force in 1995, the social security tax basis will be broadened - by raising the tax basis ceiling and by including income components currently exempt from taxation - and the rate levied on low incomes will be reduced by 50 per cent. This policy has also been adopted as part of the National Health Insurance Law 1995. Its importance lies not only in achieving a more equitable distribution of the tax burden, but also in reducing the poverty trap afflicting many workers who currently straddle the borderline between low paid jobs and unemployment. Furthermore, under the reformed health tax scheme, special attention has been paid to vulnerable groups, such as the elderly or widow/widowers, who will pay only a minimum flat rate contribution.

The National Council for Diminishing Social Gaps and War on Poverty

523. The National Council for Diminishing Social Gaps and War on Poverty was founded by the Government in August 1996 and began operating in May 1997. Its mandate includes defining "poverty", indicating its causes and trends, submitting to the government proposals for a national policy, innovative reform projects and ways to enhance empowerment of disadvantaged groups and finally, running pilot projects.

524. Whereas the Israeli Government has always been deeply involved with social policy and social assistance, it is the first time an attempt is made to provide national leadership with comprehensive and systematic data and approach.

525. The council's composition combines professionalism and empowerment. The Labor and Social Affairs Minister chairs an assembly of about 70 members, of whom 60 per cent represent governmental and public agencies, universities, religious and spiritual circles, and 40 per cent are community representatives (volunteers, representatives of relevant NGO's, local community leaders, etc.). Members of the assembly take part in specialized working committees, headed by prominent specialists. The council is activated and coordinated by a gearing committee and a coordinator, under the direction of the Director General of the Ministry for Labor and Social Affairs. A decision on its budget is still to be made. For the meantime, it is mainly based on volunteer participation and on modest funds provided by the Ministry.

International cooperation

526. The Center for International Agricultural Cooperation and Instruction at the Ministry of Agriculture assists developing countries, mainly in Africa, Asia and Central and South America. The aid is given as direct instruction, conducting courses for further training in Israel, mobile courses in the target countries, and also advice with the planning of different agricultural ventures. The centre coordinates activity in joint research for developing countries. The research is coordinated with academic agricultural research centres in Israel. Thanks to the fruitful cooperation between researchers and research institutions in Israel, by the funding countries and the developing countries, the funding countries are expanding this activity for the coming years. There is also cooperation on the subject with a number of non-governmental organizations overseas, and, in many instances, a funding source for development of the projects, training courses and research, is involved. The contacts with these bodies is fully coordinated with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

527. The centre, together with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, has run courses and trained manpower in various agricultural matters for hundreds of students in Israel, as well as 60 mobile courses in countries in Latin America, Asia, Africa, Egypt and Eastern Europe. The activities include the sending of experts for long-term agricultural projects, setting up a sample farm, consultating in the framework of agricultural projects and providing other advice in coordination with, and at the request of, the various countries.

528. During the last year, joint activities with countries that have recently renewed ties with Israel has increased - among them: China, India and various countries of the former Soviet bloc.

Article 12 - The right to the highest attainable standard of health

Introductory overview

529. Israel is a member party of the World Health Organization (WHO). Israel's last report to the WHO, "Highlights on Health in Israel", was submitted in 1996 and covers data up to 1993. It is attached in Annex 3 of this report.

530. This introductory overview is a reproduction of the summary of the report, updated to 1996, with the addition of the following table, which presents the main data on the indicators of the physical and mental health of the Israeli population and on the change in these indicators over time:

531. The population of Israel is relatively young. This is understandable in light of the fact that the population has increased almost sixfold since the country's independence in 1948, mainly as a result of immigration.

532. Life expectancy at birth in Israel was 76.6 years in 1992, close to the average in the European Union (EU). Male life expectancy was 74.7 years, the third highest among a reference group of 20 European countries*. In marked contrast, female life expectancy was 78.5 years, sixteenth highest and well below the EU average of 80.0 years. Thus, the difference in life expectancy in Israel between men and women is the smallest of the 20 reference countries. The same situation existed in 1994 when life expectancy for men was 75.5 years and for women, 79.5 years. This mortality pattern, where male mortality is among the lowest in the reference countries, while that of women among the highest, also holds for all the main causes of death.

533. Infant mortality declined by 37 per cent between 1982 and 1992, but remained the second highest among the reference countries. By 1995, however, the rate had fallen from 7.5 to 6.8 per 1,000 live births.

534. The Standardized Death Rate (SDR) for cardiovascular diseases in the 0-64 age group was close to the EU average in 1992. The SDRs for ischaemic heart disease were the fifth highest of the reference countries for women but the eighth lowest for men. The SDRs for cerebrovascular diseases in the 0-64 age group were close to the EU average for women and below the average for men. In both these diseases, both male and female SDRs fell sharply from 1982 to 1992.

535. The SDR for cancer in the 0-64 age group was one of the lowest in the European reference countries. The overall cancer rate for men was the lowest of all these countries, while the rate for women was close to the EU average. The SDR for external causes was below the EU average for men and close to the average for women. With respect to suicide, Israeli males show a lower average than general in the EU (its increase of 43 per cent over the last 10 years is, however, one of the highest) but the rate for women is about the average.

536. Nationwide health promotion programmes have gained momentum during the last few years, especially those emphasizing physical activity. The percentage of smokers in the over-20 population declined from 38 per cent in 1973 to 31 per cent in 1992. Among women the drop was even greater. A number of new laws restricting smoking in public areas and workplaces have recently come into force. Alcohol consumption in 1993 was the lowest of all the reference countries.

537. Persons aged 20-74 who were taking medication or following a special diet for hypertension make up 8.5 per cent of the population. The prevalence of high-serum cholesterol (240 mg/dl or more) in the working population aged 20-64 is 18.3 per cent. Some 25 per cent of this population has been estimated to be overweight. Since the 1950s, the intake per head of total calories, fats, animal fats, and protein has increased. The level of leisure-time activity in the general population is low: some 20 per cent of persons aged 14+ participate in such activity at least once a week.

538. Environmental control is the joint responsibility of the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of the Environment. Popular awareness of environmental issues is growing: air and water quality are the key issues.

539. Health expenditure has continued to rise as a percentage of GNP, reaching 8.7 per cent in 1995.

National health policy

540. After years of political and professional debate, the health-care system in Israel is at last in the process of fundamental reform, both of its conceptualization and its services. There are three major elements to the reform:

- a National Health Insurance Law
- the withdrawal of the Government from direct health-care provision
- the internal reorganization of the Ministry of Health.

The National Health Insurance Law

541. The Israeli Government has always assumed its responsibility to ensure universal enjoyment of basic health services. This commitment, which grew in scope over the years, was for the first time legally entrenched, with the enactment of the National Health Insurance Law 1994, which came into effect in January 1995. The following is the main features of this complex piece of legislation. (The full text is attached in Annex 1 to this report.)

542. This new law is based on mandatory insurance. All residents of Israel are insured by one of the four authorized health funds, each of which must provide, at least, the basic package of services and medications, as detailed in the law. Health insurance premiums are centrally collected by the National Insurance Institute, in the same way Social Security Insurance is collected (see under article 9 of the Covenant). These premiums are then distributed to the Health funds according to a capitation formula. It should be stressed that one's right to health services is secured even in case insurance premiums failed to be paid.

543. The basic package of services mandated by the law includes all basic physical and mental primary care, including services and medications. Every insured person has the right to choose his/her health fund and no fund may refuse to enrol an applicant, regardless of age, or physical or mental condition.

544. The State's responsibility under the law is not only to regulate the activities of the Health funds (including recognition, supervision, enforcement, etc.). Actually, regulation powers were always given to, and used by, the Minister of Health in various laws - the People's Health Ordinance 1940, the Physicians Ordinance [New Version] 1976, the Dentists Ordinance [New Version] 1976, the Rights of the Patient Law 1996 (full text of the latter is attached in Annex 2 to this report).

545. The importance of the National Health Insurance Law in the context of the present Covenant, lies in that it imposes on the Ministry of Finance the final responsibility to refund the health funds for any gap between their income from insurance premiums and their factual expenses on all services mandated by the law.

Withdrawal of the Government and reorganization of the Ministry of Health

546. The Ministry of Health's goal is to concentrate on policy-making, long-term planning, setting performance standards, quality control and quality insurance, and the evaluation of essential data. Hence, internal reorganization of the Ministry has already resulted in the establishment of new departments, e.g. a department of performance standards.

547. The Ministry owns and operates a portion of Israeli hospitals - 23 per cent of general hospitals, 50 per cent of mental health hospitals, and 4 per cent of geriatric hospitals. The remainder are profit-making or public non-profit facilities. Under the reformed system, government hospitals will become self-financing, non-profit facilities. The Ministry of Health will supervise their operation but not participate directly in their day-to-day operation.

548. The first steps taken by the Government towards transformation of its hospitals into legally autonomous entities have encountered resistance, especially from trade unions. The process is certainly going to be a long one.

549. At community level, primary health care is provided in Israel by the following:

- Health fund clinics
- Hospital outpatient clinics and emergency rooms
- Private clinics
- Family health centres (also provide preventive care).

550. Most primary care is supplied by the four health funds, either by direct provision through its own clinics and medical staff or by purchase. Member premiums cover the cost of most of these services, both outpatient and in-patient, as well as medications. Each insured person is free to choose any of the general practitioners or specialist physicians from the list employed by his/her health fund. Most affiliated physicians are not paid fee-per-visit but by salary or reimbursement.

551. A national survey of health services utilization, conducted in the first quarter of 1993, showed that 83 per cent of the most recent visits to a general practitioner/family doctor were made to health fund clinics, 12 per cent to private clinics, and 3 per cent to hospital outpatient clinics or emergency rooms. With respect to visits to specialists, 61 per cent took place at health fund clinics, 21 per cent at hospital outpatient clinics or emergency rooms, and 16 per cent at private clinics.

552. Family health centres span the whole country, operated by central government, local government authorities or the health funds, according to an agreed geographical distribution. Some 1,000 cover the urban areas while public health nurses visit small and peripheral localities at least once every two weeks. The services provided comprise physicians' examinations, developmental examinations, monitoring of breastfeeding, vaccination, and guidance and advice to mothers.

Long-term policy

553. In 1989 the Ministry of Health issued its Guidelines for Long-term National Health Policy in Israel, in which it formulated recommendations incorporating and promoting equity in health, health promotion and disease prevention, community involvement, intersectoral cooperation, primary medical care and international cooperation as the six principles underlying health objectives and priorities for Israel.

554. The strategy that follows aims at translating a number of policy goals into specific activities based on solid epidemiological data. The strategy is based on the following principles:

(a) Equity in health: While absolute equity in health is out of reach for biological/genetic reasons, the National Health Insurance Act that came into force on 1 January 1995 at least ensures equity of access to health-care services for the whole population. In addition, emphasis will be placed on reducing the gaps in health status between different population groups, such as new immigrants from specific countries, certain ethnic minorities, and people living in underprivileged areas.

(b) Primary health care: The main means for ensuring equity will be primary health care, as defined by the World Health Organization under its policy of Health for All by the Year 2000. Primary care will include health promotion, health protection, disease prevention, medical care, and rehabilitation and will be delivered by multidisciplinary teams of staffers from medicine, nursing, social work, and other health professions.

(c) Government responsibility: The Government will assume responsibility for the health of the people to the same degree as its responsibility for its welfare in other domains, such as security and education. It will be accountable to the people for the health service it guarantees.

(d) The rights of individuals and the general public: Individuals and the public at large will have the right to participate actively in shaping public health services and in supervising them. The Government will encourage such participation, which will include public debate, including in the mass media.

(e) Appropriate health technology: The Government will take measures to ensure the use of the appropriate technology, from the scientific, technical, social and economic points of view, in all areas of health care. It will encourage all concerned to take similar measures.

(f) Intersectoral and interdisciplinary action: To ensure an appropriate level of health, the Government will foster coordinated action by all sectors and disciplines concerned.

(g) Relationship between divisions of the health-care system: The Government will ensure appropriate mutual relationship between the primary, secondary and tertiary sections of the health system. This will entail removing unnecessary duplication, strengthening primary care, and providing incentives to hospitals to support other divisions of the system.

(h) Command and coordination: The Ministry of Health will provide command and coordination across all components of the strategy. In view of the intersectoral nature of the strategy, it will be approved by the Government as a whole.

555. The strategy has the following components:

- A demographic and epidemiological overview, describing the historical factors and current health situation that led to the strategy.
- The 1995 Health Care System Reforms introducing universal national health insurance and managerial autonomy for public hospitals, and reshaping the functions of the Ministry of Health.
- Substantive health programmes. A number of programmes have been selected for priority attention. Specific targets have been set, and related activities have been allocated to sectors, institutions, professions, and public bodies within the health-care system.
- Monitoring and evaluation are integral parts of the strategy. Inter alia, the degree of observance of strategy principles will be measured. Indicators will be developed to measure quality of life and welfare, including indicators of disability-adjusted life-year gain.

The following is the list of priority programmes:

- (a) Health promotion
- (b) Family health
- (c) Control of cardiovascular diseases
- (d) Control of malignant diseases
- (e) Control of diabetes
- (f) Mental health
- (g) Control of substance abuse and alcoholism
- (h) Prevention of accidents and physical and sexual violence
- (i) Oral health

556. In addition, mention should be made of the National Council for Community Health. This council was established in 1996 with the mandate to advise the Ministry of Health on policy on primary health care. The council has recommended that by the year 2000 each resident should have a designated "personal physician", who will provide for them a coordinated and integrated health package.

Health expenditures

557. Health expenditure as a percentage of GNP reached 8.7 per cent in 1995, compared to 8.9 per cent in 1994, 7.8 per cent in 1992, and 7.8 per cent in 1989. In 1993, households financed 52 per cent of national expenditure on health care via health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket costs, as against 32 per cent in 1984. The difference is explained by the fact that premiums and out-of-pocket costs have been considerably raised. In 1984, households' payments to health funds covered 12 per cent of national health expenditure, in 1993 the amount was 25 per cent. This reduction in the proportion of health-care costs funded from general taxation has put an increasing burden on households. Out-of-pocket costs to households for medications and services from private physicians, clinics, and dentists accounted for 20 per cent of total health-care expenditure in 1984 and for 27 per cent in 1993. In the same period, central government financing decreased from 52 per cent to 44 per cent of total health-care costs.

558. Hospital care continues to consume the greater part of health-care spending. This percentage rose continuously until 1980 when it reached 47 per cent of current spending. It then gradually declined, until 1994 when the percentage spent on hospital care was 41 per cent. For the last decade, spending on community-based facilities and preventive care has remained constant at around 33 per cent, rising to 38 per cent in 1994, of which some 60 per cent-70 per cent goes on primary care.

Health indicators of the World Health Organization

559. The trend in the infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births has been as follows:

Table 1: Infant mortality 1989-1995

560. A large part of the fall in infant mortality is due to the fall in mortality from infectious diseases and pneumonia. Death from congenital disorders is also showing a downward trend. In every population group, the higher the mother's education level, the lower the infant mortality rate. Mothers in the age groups "Less than 20" and "35+" show a higher infant mortality rate than mothers in the 20-34 age group.

Table 2: Infant mortality (rate per 1,000 live births) by religion and age of neonate at death, 1990-1994

	Total		Early neonatal mortality 0-6 days		Late neonatal mortality 7-27 days		Post-neonatal mortality 28-365 days
	Rate	Per cent	Rate	Per cent	Rate	Per cent	Rate	Per cent

Jews	6.8	100	3.6	52.9	1.2	17.6	2.0	29.4
Non-Jews	13.5	100	5.3	39.2	1.9	14.1	6.3	46.7

561. From 1990 to 1994, almost half the deaths of neonates occurred in the first six days of life, this proportion being much lower among non-Jews than among Jews (39.2 per cent v. 52.9 per cent). The disparity in post-neonatal death rates (28-265 days) between Jews and non-Jews is particularly wide (2.0 v. 6.3) and so is the disparity in the percentage of post-neonatal deaths in total infant mortality (29.4 per cent v. 46.7 per cent). The reason for the relatively high rates of mortality in the post-neonatal period among non-Jews should be investigated, as death at this time of life is usually associated with environmental factors, such as infectious diseases and accidents, and is to a considerable extent preventable. (Programmes for dealing with this problem are detailed below, in Section 7.)

562. Israel is currently in 19th place out of the 24 developed countries in the above table (compared to 21st place in 1983), with an infant mortality rate about that of Italy, Belgium and Spain. The rate among Israeli Jews is close to that in Germany, Denmark and Switzerland, ranking 7th out of the 24.

563. Water supply: Almost all Israeli households (99.8 per cent) are connected to the main water supply networks. About two thirds of Israel's water is pumped from the Sea of Galilee and the national aquifer. Galilee water is piped all the way to the south of the country. For about 50,000 Bedouin, the majority in the Negev (south), water is not piped directly to the family home but to Mekorot National Water Co. standpipes, from where it is carried by vehicle, camel, or on foot to the family home.

564. Sewage: Most households (80 per cent) dispose of their sewage via the central sewage system. Some small settlements use septic tanks and cesspools, but they are gradually being connected to the central sewage system.

565. Immunization: The percentage of children immunized against diphtheria, pertussis, tetanus, measles and poliomyelitis is as follows:

(2) Exct. war casualties: see introduction.

(3) For total population and Arabs and others - averages of 1971-1974.

567. The relatively low life expectancy for Israeli women has not yet been explained. It appears to be related to a relatively high mortality from cardiovascular diseases and breast cancer.

568. Access to trained personnel: The entire population has access to trained personnel for the treatment of common diseases and injuries and a regular supply of 20 essential drugs is available within one hour's walking or travelling distance.

569. All pregnant women have access to trained personnel during pregnancy. In 1992, the maternal death rate was 5.45 per 100,000 live births, having risen from the level in 1979-1980. The 1990-1992 rate was the ninth lowest of all European Union countries. All infants have access to trained health care.

Environmental control

570. Environmental control, as far as health protection is concerned, is the joint responsibility of the Ministry of Health and Ministry of Environment.

Water pollution

571. Wastewater from households, agriculture and industry can pollute natural water sources. The Israeli Supreme Court on several occasions has recognized the importance of protecting the environment against industrial harm. It recently called for more severe sentences for offenders:

"With the increase in public awareness to offences related to protection of environment and prevention of water contamination, the legislator has been induced to determine significant penalty levels for these offences. ... Not only is this offence grave by itself, for it might adversely affect the public's standard of living and health, but ... the appellant continued to break the law after having been given a warning ... it is thus time to raise the level of penalties."

P.Cr. A. 244/96 The Chim Nir Air Services Management and Airlines (1991) Ltd. v. State of Israel, Takdin-Supreme, vol. 96 (1) 6, 6-7.

572. Considerable efforts are made to prevent water pollution. Effluents are recycled for secondary use. Administrative authorities have been set up to control the effluent contamination of groundwater and rivers and to promote the restoration of rivers. Treated effluents are mainly kept to agricultural use. Standards of effluent quality are strictly monitored to prevent damage to public health and crops.

573. Water for domestic use is inspected and tested for bacteria and unwanted chemicals in compliance with regularly updated national standards and the recommendations of the WHO. In the past four years, water quality has substantially improved. In 1994, only 4 per cent of all test results showed the possibility of contamination. Fuel disposal and agricultural practice are also causes of water contamination.

Air pollution

574. The main sources of air pollution are energy production, transport, and industrial manufacture. A new national air quality policy was drawn up in 1994, as follows: preventing air pollution by integrating environmental considerations into physical planning, regular monitoring and periodic control systems, legislation and enforcement (including ambient and emission standards), reducing sources of pollution, and reducing pollutant emissions from motor vehicles.

575. The energy economy is based on fossil fuels, mainly oil and coal. The pollution released into the atmosphere by fuel combustion shows that levels of sulphur oxides and lead have fallen, but levels of carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbons have risen. There has been no change in the concentrations of suspended particulate matter.

576. In 1994, 63 air quality monitoring stations were in operation. All monitor sulphur dioxide, most monitor nitrogen oxides and particulate matter, and a few monitor ozone and/or carbon monoxide. New devices monitor airborne chemicals at hazardous waste disposal sites. The limited information available indicates that sulphur dioxide levels are mostly below regulation limits, nitrogen dioxide is significantly above the limit in some areas, and ozone levels in most places exceed recommended limits.

577. As it stands today, the monitoring network is not an adequate basis for formulating a national air quality management programme. Therefore, Israel has just completed the draft plan of a multi-million-dollar national air monitoring network with a central data storage and display centre. The new network will comprise three operational levels - local monitoring stations, regional control centres and a national data processing centre. Monitoring stations will vary according to the pollutants likely to be found. Fifty new stations are planned to reinforce the existing 63. The network is to be constructed over a three-year period.

Farmland contamination

578. Three major groups of pollutants endanger farmland - fertilizers, heavy metals, pesticides and other organic additives.

579. The overuse or improper management of fertilizers results in soil pollution, mostly by nitrates. The pollution of drinking water sources by nitrates leaching from farmland has already been recorded. The accumulation of nitrates in edible crops is an obvious danger.

580. The main source of heavy metals in farmland is irrigation with polluted water or the application of contaminated solid additives. The high pH value of soil in Israel reduces the danger of plant uptake of, and water contamination by, heavy metals.

581. The use of pesticides imposes an obvious danger of toxic traces remaining in edible crops, as well as posing a risk to farmers. Residues in soil may reach water sources or be taken up by crops or other components of the soil biota, and thus reach the food chain.

Preventive care

582. The chief means of preventing infectious diseases is the vaccination programme administered by Mother and Child Clinics to neonates and toddlers. Population coverage is among the highest in the world, as stated above "Immunization".

583. In addition, cases of bacterial meningitis (meningococcal and H. influenza b) or hepatitis A, all the patient's contacts are treated by preventive measures, administered without payment by District Health Office (DHO) staff. The DHOs also monitor sanitary conditions in children's residential institutions and nursing homes to prevent illness spread by fecal-oral routes. On every report of a food-borne outbreak, DHO staff track down the source of the outbreak and take the necessary steps to improve conditions.

584. Under article 15 of the People's Health Ordinance 1940, the Director-General of the Ministry of Health or a District Health Office have the power to have any person infected with an infectious disease placed in a hospital for infectious diseases or other appropriate form of isolation, should his/her current accommodation not permit taking the precautions necessary to contain the spread of the disease.

Vulnerable groups

585. Until the end of 1994, most residents of the State of Israel were insured voluntarily in four health funds which provided medical services to 95 per cent of the population, each fund having its own particular conditions of coverage. About 200,000-300,000 persons (including about 90,000 children) were not insured in any of these funds, some of them of their own free will, preferring a private medical service, and others due to their inability to afford the monthly payment.

586. In addition to these four funds, there were (and still are) voluntary medical services available for the needy, both in the Jewish sector, mainly in ultra-orthodox circles, and in the non-Jewish sector, in charity organizations run by the various churches.

587. In January 1995 the Health Insurance Law came into effect, introducing far-reaching changes in the health system of Israel, especially in terms of equality in enjoyment of health services. One of the foremost changes was that every resident in Israel became obliged to insure him/herself in health insurance. (The definition of "resident" being the one used in the National Insurance Institute.) A person who wishes to be insured above and beyond what is provided by the basic "basket of services" defined in the law may arrange for additional, supplementary insurance by means of programmes offered by the health funds and authorized by the Ministry of Health and by the supervisor of insurance in the Ministry of Finance. The operation of the supplementary insurance programmes is closely followed and supervised by the State authorities in order to ensure that the services included therein are indeed provided in addition to the basic basket, and not instead of them.

588. Furthermore, the health funds very quickly improved their services, especially within Arab communities, in order to raise their number of members and accordingly - their funding (which the law sets by a per capita formula). Since 1993 the Ministry of Health spent about 6.5 million NIS (approximately $1.8 million) in building tens of new Mother and Child Health Care services in Arab towns and villages. The Ministry's budgets during the same period also included a sum of about 9.7 million NIS (approximately $2.7 million), aimed at "closing the gaps within Arab sector" in the field of preventive care.

589. The Ministry of Health is working intensively to reduce the Israeli Arab infant mortality rate, which is higher than among Jewish Israelis. The infant mortality rate is indeed a product of socio-economic conditions. For instance, an important reason for the gap on this indicator between Jews and non-Jews is the much higher rate of marriage between close relatives among Arabs, and particularly among Bedouin, as compared to Jews, so that the rate of congenital defects in Arab neonates is very high.

590. In the framework of the Ministry's education/information project to reduce the incidence of very young wives giving birth and to reduce infant mortality in high risk groups, an information/education campaign is being conducted on the results of inter-familial marriage. Several mobile Family Health Clinics travel among the nomadic Bedouin tribes in the south and Arab settlements of the north in an "outreach" campaign, one of whose main efforts is to raise immunization coverage for neonates and children. It should be noted that immunization coverage among the Arab population as a whole is very high - over 95 per cent.

591. One prong of the project attempts to discourage marriage among close relatives; another attempts to encourage pregnant women to make more use of in utero diagnostic procedures; and a third aims to encourage mothers to make more use of the Mother and Child Health Care services dispersed throughout the country. One cannot measure the short-term results of such projects. More time is required before measurable results are to be expected.

592. Nevertheless, the overall health-care situation of the Bedouin, living mainly in the sparsely populated areas of the south of the country, is worse than that of the general population. The radical solution is their transfer to permanent settlements, which is current national policy. Detailed analysis of this topic is provided in this report under article 11 of the Covenant ("Illegal Settlements").

593. In the interim, the following special measures are being taken:

- Every Bedouin school has running water installed;
- Every Bedouin encampment is connected on request to the Mekorot pipe-system;
- The quality of Mekorot-supplied water is regularly sampled;
- Leaflets are distributed explaining how to prevent infection via the water supply between standpipe and the encampment and within the encampment.

Community participation

594. Eighteen Israeli towns are participants in the Healthy Cities Project, whose objectives are as follows:

(a) To eliminate or reduce health status disparities between population groups;

(b) To help develop preventive medicine;

(c) To promote health.

595. All measures are based on a local needs assessment and are carried out with the cooperation of local citizens. Each participating town prepares a health profile of the town and then appoints a Project Steering Committee, comprising representatives of all health-care service providers in the town (including volunteers) and of the public. The committee reviews the health status profile and then defines needs and the priority between them.

596. Local Community Centres in Israel also run health promotion programmes.

Health education

597. The relatively high rate of HIV infection among Ethiopian Jews in Israel has persuaded the Government to allocate an NIS 4.5 million budget to a multi-project AIDS prevention plan. The planned projects are targeted at three groups of population:

(a) HIV patients and carriers. Coordinators from the Ethiopian community will make contact with all HIV patients and carriers in their local communities. They will help them communicate with the professionals at the local AIDS Treatment Centre and educate them in ways to avoid spreading the disease, principally by teaching safe sex;

(b) The Ethiopian community at large. Health education projects for schools, the army, and higher educational institutions are planned. The mass media will also be used;

(c) Israeli (non-Ethiopian) care-givers. Seminars will be conducted periodically for teachers, social workers, health-care professionals, and workers in immigrant absorption who come into contact with Ethiopians. The aim is to help the professionals understand Ethiopian culture and thus enable them to be more sensitive and effective in their dealings with Ethiopian clients.

598. Projects are under way in the towns Afula, Hadera, and Beersheva, among the non-Jewish population, to discourage marriage between close relatives and to encourage the acceptance of antenatal screening for congenital defects.

Article 13 - The right to education

The legal framework

599. Education constitutes an important value in Israeli society. In the words of the Supreme Court of the State of Israel:

"Education is indeed a social instrument, the importance of which cannot be overstated. It is one of the most important functions of government and of the State. Education is vital for the existence of a free, living and functioning democratic system. It is a necessary element, which is required for anyone's self-fulfilment. It is vital for the existence of society, where people live and take action to improve their personal welfare, and contribute thereby to the well-being of the entire community. ... Education is undoubtedly an important tool in securing the rights and liberties of every individual, and in realizing his basic political rights, including freedom of speech, and the right to elect and to be elected."

H.C. 1554/95 Friends of "GILAT" Association v. Minister of Education and Culture, Takdin-Supreme, vol. 96 (2) 457.

600. The inclusion of "freedom of education" among the values enshrined in Israel's Declaration of Independence serves as further evidence to the importance attributed to education in Israel.

601. The basic components of the right to education - the right of every child to receive free education, and the parents' right to choose the kind of education given to their children, has been guaranteed by one of the first legislative acts of the Knesset, the Compulsory Education Law 1949. According to this law, compulsory education applies to all children between the ages of five (compulsory kindergarten) and 15 (10th grade) inclusive, and it is to be provided free of charge. In addition, the law provides for free education for adolescents aged 16 and 17 (11th-12th grades), as well as for 18-year-olds who did not complete their schooling in 11th grade in accordance with the official curriculum. While the State has sole responsibility for the provision of free education, the maintenance of official educational institutions is the joint responsibility of the State and the municipal education authorities. Parents have the right to choose one of the recognized educational trends of education (State or State-religious) for their children. (See below.) They also have the right to send their children to independent parochial schools, which are not run by the State, but are under its supervision.

602. Important additions to the original version of this law include a prohibition against discrimination on sectarian basis in acceptance, placement, and advancement of pupils as well as a prohibition against punishing pupils for actions or omissions on the part of their parents.

603. Another important law is the State Education Law 1953. This law provides for a six-day school week and determines the content and procedures of State education. State education is defined as education provided by the State on the basis of the curriculum approved and supervised by the Ministry of Education and Culture, without any affiliation to a party, communal body, or any other non-government organization. According to the law, State education is to be based on the values of Israel's culture, the achievements of science, love of the homeland, loyalty to the State and people of Israel, heroism and remembrance of the Holocaust, practice in agricultural work and handicrafts, pioneer training, and building a society on the foundations of freedom, tolerance, mutual assistance and love of mankind.

604. The law establishes two State education trends: State and State-religious education. State-religious education is identical in its structure to the ordinary State education system, but offers a more religious oriented curriculum and usually employs a mostly religious teaching staff. This law enables the Minister of Education, Culture and Sport to approve increasing the existing curriculum by up to 25 per cent, if 75 per cent of the parents request it.

605. Other relevant laws are:

- The Council for Higher Education Law 1958 - which establishes a council responsible for authorizing and accrediting institutions for higher education to award degrees.
- The School Inspection Law 1968 - which regulates the terms for operation of schools existing outside the ordinary school system.
- The Special Education Law 1988 - which establishes a separate education system designed to meet the needs of children with disabilities.
- The Long School Day Law 1990 - which defines the length of the school day.

606. A separate legal regime applies vis-à-vis pupils with physical or mental disabilities. The Special Education Law 1988 prescribes free education for all such children and adolescents from the ages of five to 18. According to this law by 1998, free special education for disabled individuals will be expanded to include those aged 3 to 21.

607. In 1990, the Knesset enacted the Long School Day Law 1990 designed to guarantee more school hours for all pupils in the K-12 grades. The law stipulates that the duration of the school day shall be eight hours, or less as decided by the Minister of Education and Culture. For budgetary reasons, the law is to be gradually implemented over a period of 10 years.

608. In 1996, the total number of children enrolled in the education system under the supervision of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport reached about 1,490,000 - from the pre-primary level to the end of secondary school. Other eligible pupils attend schools supervised by the Ministry of Religious Affairs and by the Ministry of Labor and Social affairs. Combined with the above figures, it is estimated that nearly 100 per cent of the children in the primary school age group attend school, as do over 90 per cent of the adolescents eligible for secondary education.

The constitutional status of the right to education

609. While it is impossible to contest the legal existence of the right to education, the scope of constitutional protection accorded to it has not yet been defined by the courts of Israel. On one occasion, a Supreme Court judge held that the right to education is not a constitutional right, citing the absence of a positive constitutional rule to that effect. However, the President of the Supreme Court in a recent case expressed the opinion that the matter is not yet settled and that the above-mentioned judicial opinion is not binding upon the full court.

Structure of the education system

610. The Israeli education system includes several main levels: pre-primary, primary, secondary, post-secondary, higher education and adult education.

Pre-primary education

611. The pre-primary education system consists of a network of kindergartens. In 1996, the kindergarten system involved 320,000 children ranging from age two to five years, attending municipal, public and private institutions. Younger children normally attend similar day-care institutions, or are put under the supervision of nannies. The goal of early childhood education is to lay an educational foundation, which includes the development of language and thought, learning and creative abilities, social and motor skills.

Primary and secondary education

612. Until 1968, the school system of Israel was divided into primary school (1st-8th grades) and high school (9th-12th grades). In 1968, a reform was decided upon which divided the system into three educational institutions:

- (a) Primary school (1st-6th grade);
- (b) Lower secondary school (7th-9th grade);
- (c) Upper secondary school (10th-12th grade).

613. The purpose of the reform was to improve scholastic achievements and encourage social integration of various sectors of society. At the same time, the period of compulsory education (which used to be 9 years - from compulsory kindergarten to the 8th grade) was extended until the 10th grade (inclusive), bringing the total period compulsory education to 11 years. The reform was, and still is, being implemented slowly, and in 1996 27 per cent of the pupils were still attending schools according to the old system. In upper secondary education, pupils can choose between academic and technological/ vocational tracks. In any case, all tracks are generally available and accessible to all, and are free of charge.

Higher education

614. The higher education system in Israel comprises eight universities (including the Open University in Tel-Aviv). In addition, there are several other non-university institutions of higher education which award Bachelor's degrees in several specific areas only, such as business administration, law, technology, arts and crafts, and teacher training. The system also includes regional colleges which offer academic courses under the auspices and academic responsibility of the universities.

615. A recent feature of the higher education system in Israel is the establishment of general colleges providing a broad spectrum of degree programmes at the undergraduate level. These colleges are being established to meet the increasing demand for higher education which is expected to continue and grow in the first decade of the twenty-first century.

616. Admission to universities and colleges is based upon the high school matriculation certificate and the results of a psychometric examination, without any discrimination on grounds of religion, sex, nationality or any other consideration except academic achievements. Matriculation examinations are administered in Hebrew, Arabic, English, Russian, French and Amharic (Ethiopian), or in other languages if so required. Psychometric examinations are administered in the following languages: Hebrew, Arabic, English, Russian, French or Spanish.

617. University and college education is not free of charge. University tuition is determined in accordance with the decision of a public committee. At present the average undergraduate tuition fees is about 10,000 NIS (approximately $3,000) per annum and may be paid in advance or in instalments. There is a national network of assistance to students in need of aid for socio-economic reasons. This comes in addition to a wide range of public and private foundations that award grants, scholarships and loans. Colleges are considered private institutions and thus their tuition fees are determined by market forces.

Adult education

618. Adult education plays an important role in the educational process. It offers programmes targeted to all population sectors for continuing primary, secondary, pre-academic (university preparatory programmes) and academic education. Furthermore, in Israel, adult education has a special importance since Israel is an immigrant country, absorbing immigration from all parts of the world. Hence, special language and cultural studies are given in new immigrants' schools. All of these activities are carried out by the Ministry of Education, as well as by a wide range of non-governmental organizations and institutions.

619. The objectives of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport in the area of adult education are:

- To inculcate the Hebrew language and its culture in new immigrants, and in particular, to divert specific resources for the absorption of Ethiopian immigrants in the area of language, culture and education within Israeli society.
- To narrow the educational gaps within the adult population in Israel; to expand the frameworks of primary and secondary education in all population sectors.

- To expand the knowledge and horizons of the adult student, and to provide him/her with opportunities to enrich the areas of his/her interest, inter alia, through the development of hobbies and creative talents.
- To provide tools for developing skills that will improve adults' functioning in their various roles within the family and community.

620. As a result of the availability of a complementary system of fundamental education, and due to the improved enforcement of the Compulsory Education Law, the number of persons with four or less years of formal education decreased among the non-Jewish population, from 28.9 per cent in 1980 to 15.9 per cent in 1994, while among the Jewish population, the numbers fell respectively from 10.3 per cent to 5.4 per cent.

Organizational difficulties in realizing the right to education

621. While virtually everyone within the eligible age group attends primary school, as far as secondary education is concerned, there is a drop-out problem, especially in the non-Jewish sector.

622. The policy of the Ministry of Education is to make every effort to prevent youth from dropping out and to raise the percentage of those attending school. The stated objective is that every boy and girl, except in extreme cases, shall complete 12 full years of schooling. Schools are obligated by the Ministry's policy to assist and encourage every pupil to continue his/her studies through 12th grade, despite the fact that school attendance is not compulsory over the age of 16.

623. In recent years, preventing pupils from dropping out of formal studies has become one of the primary tasks of the education system. Schools are required to refrain from past practices of abetting unwanted pupils to leave school. Instead, schools should try to increase the pupils' endeavours in their studies and do all that they can to prevent them from dropping out. To further advance this policy goal, financial incentives are given by the Ministry to schools that succeed in reducing drop-out rates.

624. In cases where placement in an alternative educational framework would be for the pupil's benefit, the school is instructed by the Ministry to assist him/her in finding the most suitable alternative educational framework.

625. One of the main factors which influences the extent of the drop-out phenomenon is the transition between different educational frameworks. The most problematic transitions are:

- (a) From primary schools to lower secondary schools/four-year secondary schools;
- (b) From lower secondary schools to upper secondary schools;
- (c) Between classes in the upper secondary school.

626. One of the stated purposes of the 1968 reform was to postpone the transition from elementary school to high school from 8th to 9th grade. With regard to higher education, budgetary difficulties prevent at present the granting of free education.

Statistical data

Literacy

627. The following tables introduce, in several disaggregated forms, the figures pertaining to the extent of formal education possessed by the adult population of Israel throughout the years 1961-1995. It divides the population by Jews and non-Jews, sex, age and country of origin. According to this data, in 1995 only 4 per cent of the total Israeli population lacked any formal primary education.

Attendance rates in the education system

628. The following tables reveal the gradual increase in the number of pupils in the Israeli education system. The first table shows the current number and rate of attendance in State schools. The second table presents the 1996 figures on the number of primary and secondary education pupils divided into four education sectors (the Jewish, Arab, Bedouin and Druze sectors). The third table reflects the increase in number of students in all educational institutions; the fourth table deals with primary and secondary education only, and illustrates the changes in number of Jewish and non-Jewish pupils in every school grade, throughout the years.

Number of students enrolled in 1996 in the pre-school, primary and secondary education system and their percentage in their total age group population:

Pre-school education	Primary education	Secondary education
Kindergartens (ages 2-5)	Primary School (Grades 1-8)	Lower Secondary (Grades 7-9)	Upper Secondary (Grades 9-12)
320,000 (90%)	690,000 (96%)	193,000	288,000 (90%)

629. The above figures do not include pupils attending Talmud-Torah (Orthodox Jewish) pre-schools, and institutions under the supervision of the Ministry of Religious Affairs and the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs (vocational and industrial schools).

630. There are approximately 1,170,000 pupils in schools: about 80 per cent of them are in the Jewish sector, about 14 per cent are in the Arab sector, about 3 per cent in the Bedouin sector, and about 2 per cent in the Druze sector.

638. The total effect of these figures shows a clear trend of constant increase in the percentage of adolescent pupils who remain in school and a matching decrease in drop-out rates. This trend can be seen both in Jewish and Arab education sectors, and among both boys and girls. Since the 1990s, in both Jewish and Arab education sectors, the percentage of attendance among female pupils has been higher than that of male pupils every year.

643. As the following data illustrate, the amount of government resources spent on education is gradually increasing in absolute terms (exceeding the inflation rate in Israel), in expenditure per pupil, and as a percentage of the total State budget and the GNP:

Construction of new schools

646. In recent years, the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has allocated special budgets for building new schools, and expanding and renovating existing ones. In 1996, NIS 234 million ($66.8 million) were allocated for the construction of new schools and classrooms, 1,743 of which were built that year. The need for such intensive construction originates from absorbing the children of new immigrants into the education system, natural population increase, and the establishment of new neighbourhoods throughout the country.

647. In addition, in 1996, NIS 199 million ($56.8 million) were allocated for the continued construction of 1,168 classrooms; NIS 96 million ($27.4 million) were allocated for the renovation of school buildings (over 200 schools were renovated in 1996); NIS 28 million ($8 million) were allocated for the construction of school gyms; additional NIS 15 million ($4.3 million) were allocated for equipping new classrooms; NIS 16 million ($4.6 million) were allocated for the expansion of regional colleges; and NIS 21 million ($6 million) for fencing and protection of education institutions.

648. In 1996, priority in construction was accorded to confrontation-line localities (settlements near the borders), localities included in supportive-intervention programmes (mainly disadvantaged areas), and cities with a mixed population - especially Jerusalem.

649. The Vicinity of Schools: Under the Compulsory Education Law, the State must ensure that schooling facilities are available to students within their municipal district, and pupils must enrol in a recognized school in that same district. The State Education Law adds a further requirement - that enrolment be made at a school close to the pupil's residence.

650. Due to Israel's small size, an efficient transportation system and the large number and dispersion of schools, education institutions are available, by and large, to everyone within a relatively close vicinity, even in the more rural areas of the country.

Schooling schedules

651. In recent years, the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has taken upon itself to establish an outline programme regulating the schooling schedules of the various components of the education system. An outline programme has been promulgated and implemented in kindergartens and secondary schools (lower and upper). In primary education, however, the organization of studies is in a transitional stage and has not yet been completed.

652. The following table relates to Programmes for Kindergartens:

Elements	Daily time (in minutes) in accordance with age
	2	-	6
Acquisition and consolidation of life skills and habits (including personal hygiene, care of clothes, and meals)	90	-	45
Free Play	90	-	60
Expression through materials	45	-	60
Planned social activity (free movement, using playground apparatus and movement lessons)	45	-	45
Directed learning activity	30	-	60
Total	330 (5.5 hours)	-	330 (5.5 hours)

Source: Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

653. The programme contains six elements which are essential foundations in the work of all kindergartens. Their organization is flexible and adapted to the shared and differing needs of each child.

Primary education

654. The primary education system is currently in a transitional stage, in preparation for a reorganization of the structure of studies in primary schools. The main feature of the proposed change is striking a balance between the previously dominant approach, according to which a single discipline of teaching subjects in conformity with a predetermined schedule of hours is enforced, and a modern inter-disciplinary approach to teaching. According to the latter approach, schools enjoy a greater degree of discretion and the Ministry's role is limited to setting guidelines.

655. It is the current policy of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to encourage school autonomy in establishing the schedule of hours and deciding the curriculum. However, such autonomy is subject to the requirements of the State Education Law 1953 (which mandates a six day school week, unless the Minister of Education determines otherwise), and of the Long School Day Law 1990 (which mandates an eight-hour school day, unless the Minister of Education determines otherwise). Furthermore, Ministry-issued guidelines as to the percentage of hours given to certain topics (e.g., mathematics, language skills, science, human studies, etc.) must be followed.

656. It is estimated that at present only about a third of the primary schools in Israel enjoy an autonomy along the above described lines.

Secondary education

657. The following tables are the official schedule of hours to be followed by the secondary schools in Israel, divided into lower and upper secondary schools and by education sector. The total numbers of hours appearing in these tables under the term "Weekly hours" is the aggregate number of standard hours throughout all grades represented in each schedule.

Ratio of males to females in the education system

658. Whereas in primary education, there is almost universal attendance by the relevant age group, in secondary education, there is a problem of drop-outs. Dropping out is more common with boys, and consequently, the ratio of males to females in secondary education tilts slightly in favour of the latter. The percentage of entitlement to matriculation certificate is also higher amongst female pupils than male pupils (52 per cent in comparison with 41 per cent in 1994/5).

Weak and disadvantaged population groups

660. Since the education laws equally apply to every child and adolescent in Israel, without any discrimination, the right to education belongs to everyone. Furthermore, under Israeli administrative law the education authorities (as any other governmental authority) may not adopt discriminatory policies. However, in practice, certain population groups are found to be in a disadvantageous position and special efforts have been made by the authorities to foster and support their education.

General programmes of assistance

661. The activities of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport, directed to help pupils of all sectors of the population, focus upon two target groups: "pupils with potential" - 12th grade students who complete their education without a matriculation certificate but have the potential to achieve one; and "pupils at risk" - pupils who might drop out, have done so already, or are exposed to other risks.

662. The following programmes are employed to help "pupils with a potential":

(a) Maavar ("Moving on")

This is a programme designed to promote pupils to go from partial to full matriculation. It offers classes in the framework of an upper-secondary school. In 1996, approximately 10,000 pupils attended this programme.

(b) Tahal ("Second Chance")

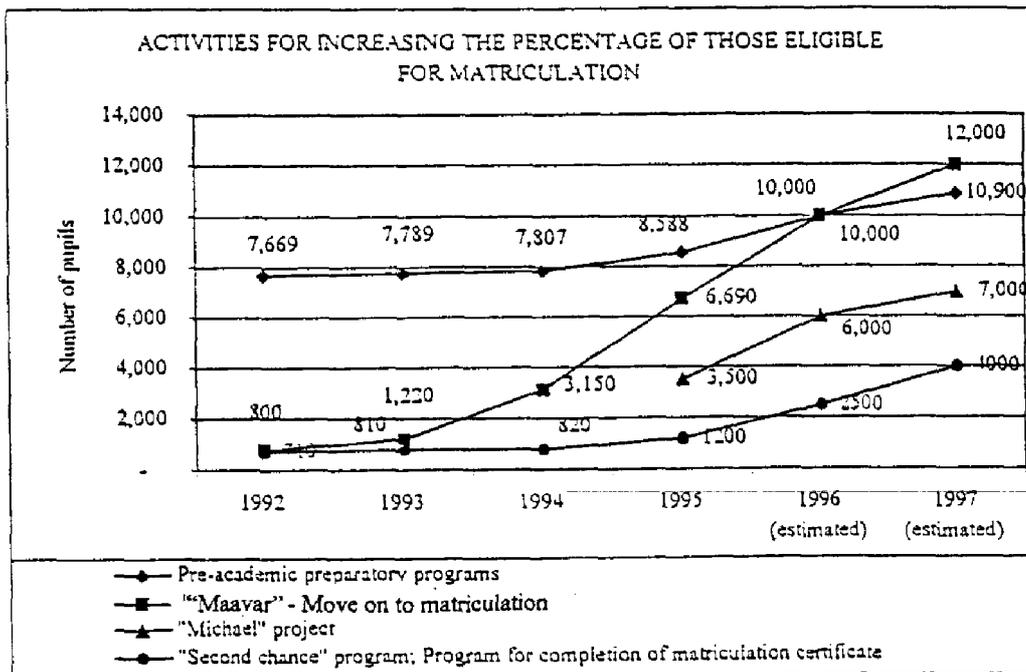

This matriculation completion programme is offered to pupils who attended the 12th grade in a matriculation track, but failed to take or pass between one and three different curriculum subjects necessary for the completion their matriculation certificate. Pupils are given intensive courses on different curriculum subjects (and receive a deferment of their military service). In 1996, about 2,530 pupils participated in this programme.

(c) Pre-academic preparatory programmes

This track provides demobilized soldiers another chance to complete their matriculation certificates and helps them improve their chances of admission into higher education institutions. About 10,000 pupils studied in such programmes in 1996.

(d) Michael ("Utilizing Personal Skills for Excellence")

This programme offers assistance to 10th and 11th grade pupils in development towns (often areas with difficult socio-economic conditions), and other disadvantaged areas in studying for the matriculation examinations. In 1996, approximately 6,000 pupils attended this programme.

Source: Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

* The figures for the pre-academic programmes do not include pupils studying in external schools under the terms of the Demobilized Soldiers Act (1984). From 1995, however, these figures do include pupils in external schools as part of the matriculation completion project (i.e. pupils who lack just one examination).

663. The following programmes and measures are employed to help "pupils at risk":

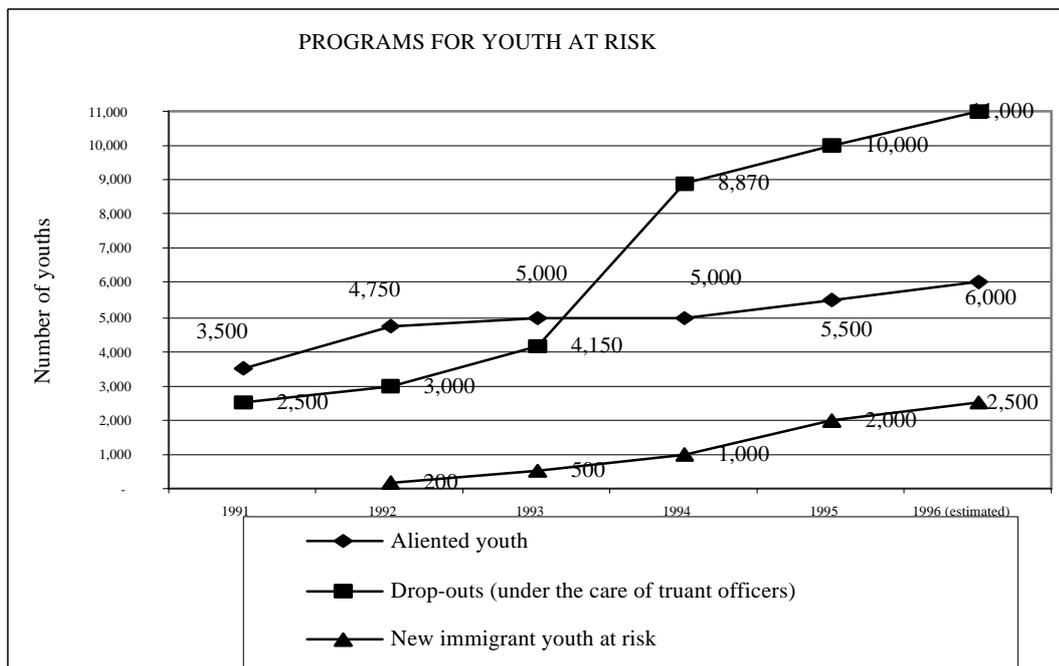

(a) Programmes of preventive intervention and assistance intended to combat the phenomenon of dropping-out have been operating in 1996 in 110 schools.

(b) Truant officers locate and work with drop-outs. In 1996, 11,000 drop-outs were reached by these activities.

(c) Special activities have been undertaken to help reintegration of drop-outs in schools.

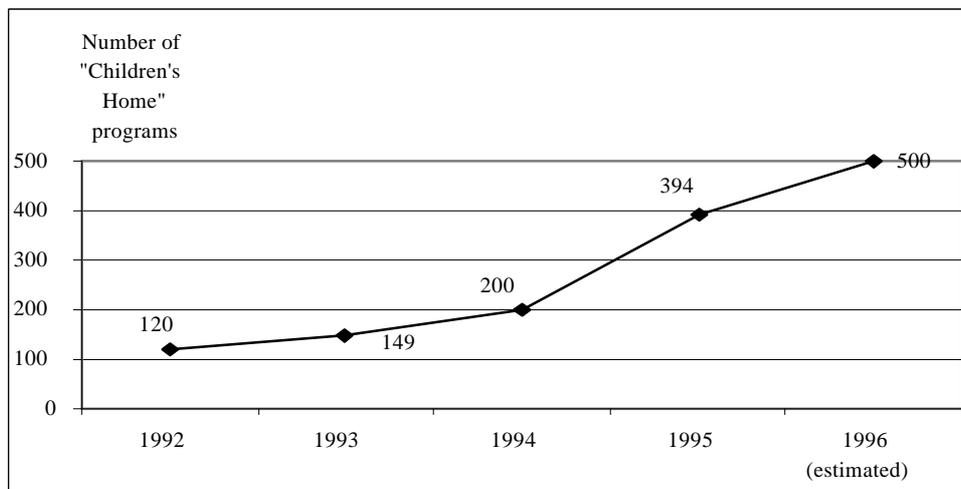

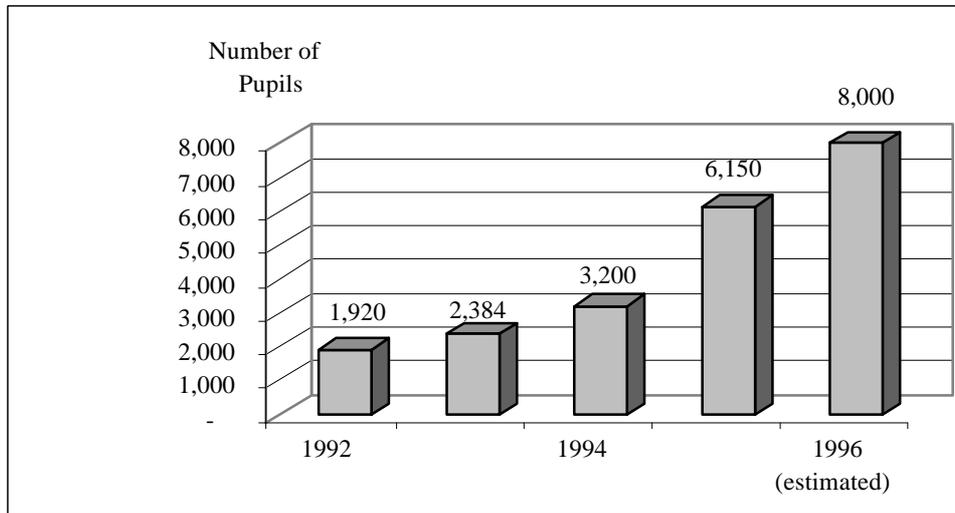

(d) "Children's home" programmes and afternoon-care centres give pupils a place to stay after school hours, until the evening. In 1996 about 500 such programmes and centres were serving approximately 8,000 children.

(e) Differential benefits programme - schools who are successful in preventing drop-outs and increasing the number of pupils taking the matriculation exams and the number of pupils who are eventually entitled to receive matriculation certificates receive special financial benefits from the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

Specific programmes of assistance offered to specified population groups

664. Children with learning disabilities: As mentioned above, a special education system exists alongside the regular system, which is available for pupils aged 3-21. In recent years there has been an increase in the resources allocated to special education and in the 1996 budget the amount reached a record NIS 1.2 billion ($34.3 million). It thus became possible to extend the application of the law to age groups 3-5 and 18-21 prior to the originally estimated date. Furthermore, pupils with serious disabilities were provided with longer school days and classes during ordinary school vacations.

665. It is however the goal of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to encourage the integration of children with mild disabilities into the ordinary school system. Therefore, a special programme was initiated to teach teachers how to help pupils with disabilities and how to create a tolerant atmosphere towards them among the ordinary pupils. Moreover, a special differentiated curriculum is being developed to accommodate the needs of such disabled pupils.

666. In 1996, there were approximately 37,000 pupils aged 3-21 years in the various special education frameworks. In addition, about 40,000 more pupils were integrated in the regular school system, but received special assistance from special education resources. It should be noted that the percentage of all pupils in Israel enrolled in special education has declined in the last 10 years.

Arab and Druze Sectors

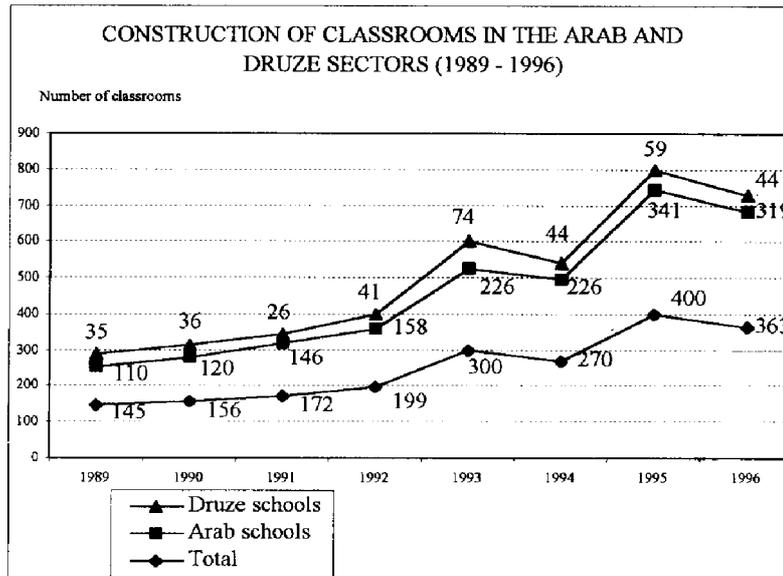

667. The Arab and Druze pupils have achieved, on average, lower scores on past national assessment tests than their Jewish counterparts. Similarly, drop-out rates are higher in these sectors, and matriculation entitlement percentage is lower. This gap in educational achievements is attributed to inadequate channelling of resources to these sectors in the past, to socio-economic problems, and inferior infrastructure. Furthermore, teaching hours used to be fewer in these sectors in comparison with the Jewish sector, and teachers used to be less well-trained.

668. Determined to close this gap, the Ministry of Education in 1991 embarked on a five-year programme intended to equalize the educational and budgetary standards of these sectors to that of the Jewish education sector.

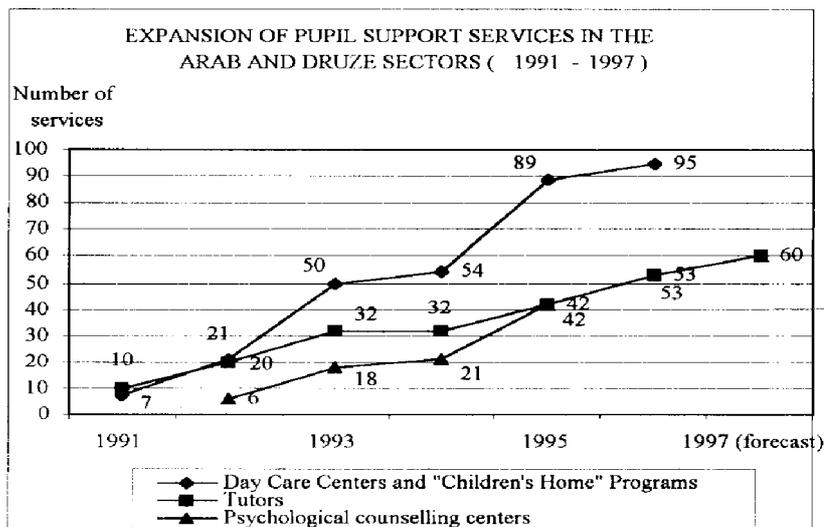

The special measures taken under the programme were as follows:

- Construction of classrooms;
- Adding classroom hours;
- Teacher training and in-service teacher training;
- Pedagogic assistance for teachers - teacher-trainers and pedagogic centres;
- Developing curricula and textbooks, and producing programmes for educational television;
- Nurturing gifted pupils
- Expanding the truant officers scheme and the psychological counselling and guidance services;
- Expanding activities to prevent dropping out;
- Significant expansion of special education;
- Expanding informal education
- Increasing budgets for culture and sport.

669. The five-year programme has been successful in narrowing the gaps between the Arab and Druze and the Jewish education systems, but has failed to close the gap altogether. It should be noted, however, that in one area - academization of teaching staff - the achievements in the Arab sector in upper secondary education have recently surpassed those of the Jewish sector.

New immigrants

670. Being an immigrant absorbing society, Israel's educational system faces the challenge of integrating immigrant pupils who do not know the language, and come from varying educational and cultural backgrounds. The education system offers such pupils additional teaching hours for up to the first three years (sometimes in their native language), and undertakes programmes to smooth the process of their integration.

671. In many cases, due to a lack of previous formal education, immigrants from Ethiopia face unique problems in their absorption in the education system. In order to address this special problem, the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has established a special steering committee to focus on the integration of Ethiopian immigrant pupils. Half of the members of the steering committee are themselves Ethiopian immigrants.

672. Measures already taken by the Ministry in order to facilitate the integration of Ethiopian immigrants include supplementary after-school programmes and the allotment of additional teaching hours throughout their entire education. Special attention has been given to the problem of drop-outs among Ethiopian immigrants. The policies and programmes that have been implemented resulted in considerable success.

Specially targeted action

673. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has identified over 30 municipalities facing special problems in terms of educational achievements, and has developed special programmes involving the participation of the local communities to improve the situation in those targeted towns and villages. The list of targeted municipalities includes Jewish, Arab, Druze, Bedouin and mixed settlements.

674. The following list relates to the geographical Dispersion of Targeted Localities:

Language facilities

675. The language used in the school system and teacher's training is either Hebrew (Jewish sector) or Arabic (Arab and Druze sectors). Some schools have started to offer special language where immigrant pupils are taught some of their courses in their native language.

676. In Arabic-speaking schools, pupils learn Hebrew and English as second and third languages, whereas in Hebrew-speaking schools, English and Arabic are taught as foreign languages. In some schools French is taught as a second language (instead of English or Arabic), and since 1997 other languages, such as Russian were introduced into the elective curriculum.

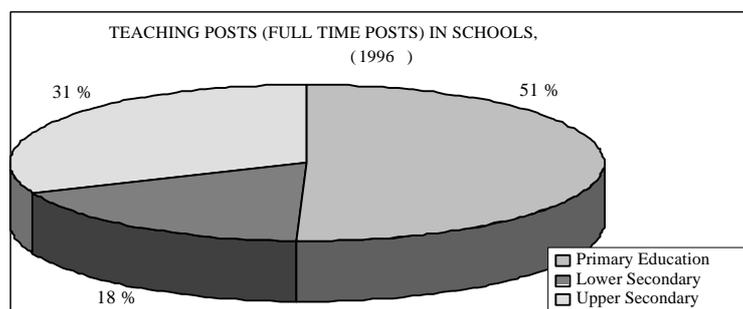

677. Adult new immigrants are offered basic Hebrew-language classes in new immigrant's schools especially created to teach elementary language skills. In 1996, 68,000 persons attended schools.

Conditions of teaching staff

678. There are approximately 80,000 full-time teachers in all levels of the Israeli primary and secondary system. The following table demonstrates their distribution to sectors and school levels:

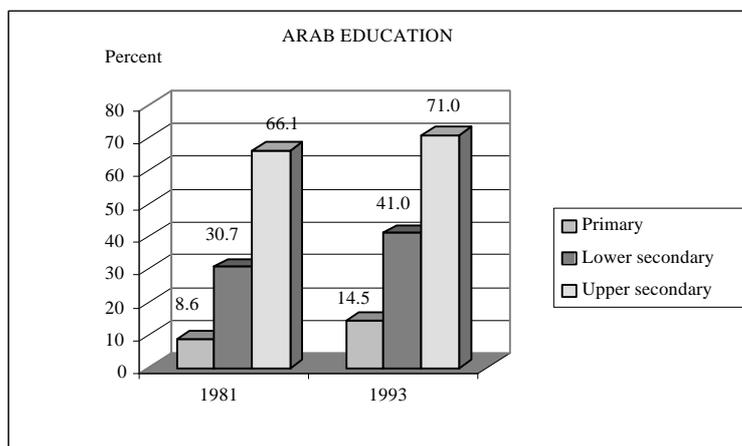

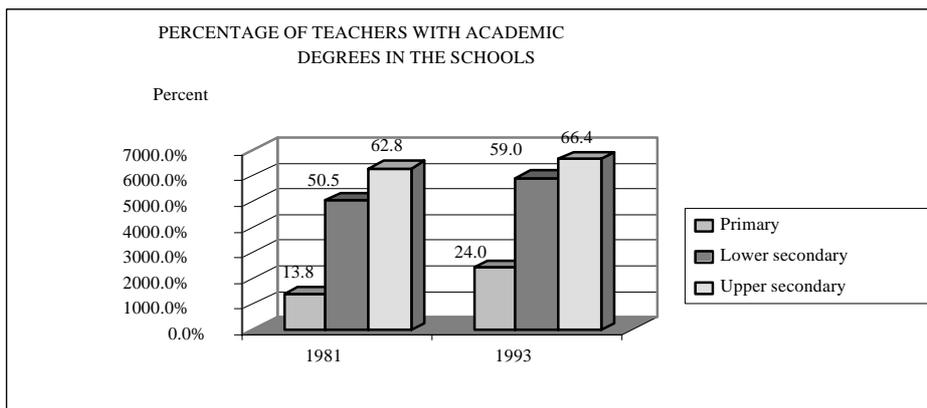

Teaching posts (full-time) in schools, 1996

	Total	Hebrew education	Arab education
Total	79 010	66 050	12 960
Primary Education	39 920	32 600	7 320
Lower Secondary	14 380	11 740	2 640
Upper Secondary	24 710	21710	3 000

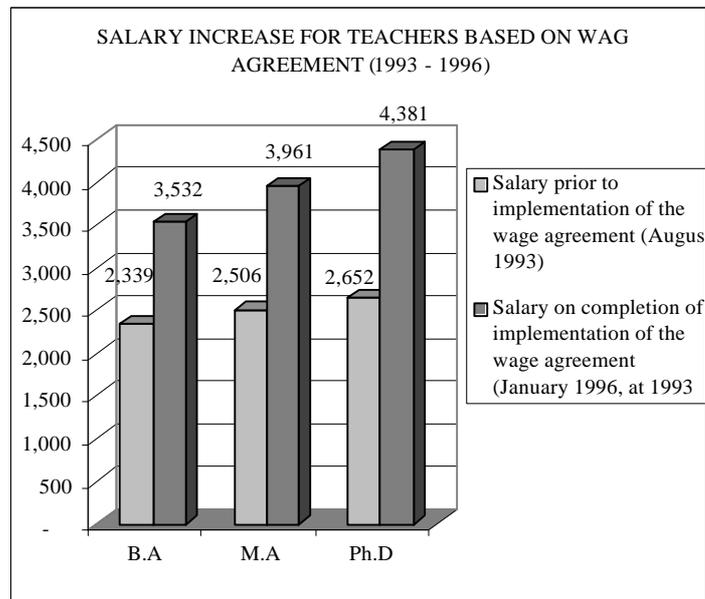

Source: Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

679. In addition there are about 22,000 part-time teachers in primary and secondary schools, and 50,000 teachers in kindergartens and other educational frameworks. It is the policy of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to support the academization of teachers. Most teacher trainees now study toward an academic degree (B.Ed. or B.A.), and practising teachers are encouraged to get such a degree if they do not already have one. By virtue of this policy the percentage of academics among teachers has increased.

Source: Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

680. Another Ministry policy involves the goal of improving the status and social standing of teachers and educators. In this vein, a public campaign was launched in the media, under the slogan "A good teacher is a teacher for life". A special effort was made by the Ministry and teachers' associations to improve teachers' salaries. This effort resulted in a sharp increase in teachers' salaries between 1993-1996

Source: Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

681. Teachers' salaries are negotiated between the two teachers' associations and the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport. They are calculated in accordance with the individual teacher's formal education, length of service in the teaching force, amount of accumulated in-service teacher education, and non-teaching school positions by the teacher.

682. Hence, for example, in June 1996 a kindergarten teacher with 16 years of experience earned NIS 5,386 gross (about $1,800), a primary school teacher with 18 years of experience earned NIS 5,559 gross ($1,850), and a lower secondary school teachers with B.A. degree and 18 years of experience earned NIS 5,784 gross (about $1,930).

683. In 1995, pre-school teachers' average salary constituted over 97 per cent of the average salary in the State administration; primary school teachers earned on average 99 per cent of the average salary in the State administration; and secondary school teachers earned on average 103 per cent of the average salary in the State administration.

Responsibility for the establishment and administration of schools

684. Responsibility for the establishment and administration of schools within the framework of compulsory education is divided between the Ministry of Education and the local authorities. Other bodies that may be involved in the establishment and administration of upper secondary schools are public education networks and private bodies. However, the Ministry of Education is responsible for licensing and supervision of all such schools.

685. A distinction is made between State education, State-religious education, and independent, but recognized, educational institutions. The latter are also supported by the State and subject to supervision over their curricula, in accordance with the curriculum and degree of governmental involvement in their operation. There is an insignificant number of other private schools not included in one of these categories.

686. In order to establish a school, private or recognized, a permit needs to be requested from the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport. The School Inspection Law 1968 requires the Ministry to verify the preservation of adequate educational standards, and to consider the proposed curriculum, schooling schedule, school facilities, safety features, teaching equipment, available financial resources, the type of school and the ages and needs of potential pupils before granting permits.

687. There is no difficulty in moving from one type of school to another, and parents are free to choose the kind of school they wish to send their children to, as long as the school in question operates with State permission.

Funding

688. As an indication of its commitment to the promotion of culture in Israel and to increase the people's participation in cultural life, the Government of Israel invests significant resources in culture-related activities, supporting directly and indirectly a wide range of both public and private cultural activities throughout the country.

689. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport which is responsible for promoting culture in Israel, gives direct financial assistance to some 300 cultural and art institutions, supports culture-related projects, sponsors initiatives in the area of culture, organizes cultural activities in various regions of the country intended for a variety of populations, encourages the artistic endeavours of amateurs, and helps cultural groups preserve their heritage and foster their culture. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, also invests resources designed to promote cultural relations and exchanges between Israel and other countries. The Ministry's budget is presented in the following table.

690. One of the most important tools of cultural promotion in Israel are the 170 community centres throughout the country. These centres offer communities, especially those with weaker population concentrations, various cultural-related activities, such as art classes, dance troupes, choirs, theatre groups, etc. Reflective of the policy of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to give high priority to community-oriented cultural activity is the fact that the largest item on the Ministry's culture budget is the financial support allocated to the Israeli Association of Community Centers, which is responsible for the establishment, supervision and support of the community centres.

691. Allocations for cultural institutions and projects are made objectively, based upon equal criteria, taking into consideration the nature and conditions of the activities, their qualitative scope and circumstances, as well as the special needs of each institution and project. Governmental support is offered either as grants or loans to organizers and producers of cultural events (e.g., public theatres, museums), or as a direct support of the individual artists engaged in the cultural activity.

692. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport offers several prizes as an additional method of supporting artists. They include a prize for painting and sculpture which is awarded every year to five artists (providing for their sustenance for a whole year), and prizes for young plastic artists and teachers, yearly grants for creativity to writers, poets, and translators. Financial support to cultural activities is also provided by municipal authorities, public and private foundations, private persons, endowments and corporations.

693. The municipalities invest part of their budget in improving cultural facilities, supporting local artists, and sponsoring communal cultural activities. The local authorities are often assisted by private contributions raised by private and public foundations (e.g., the Jerusalem Foundation, the Tel Aviv Foundation for Culture and Art, and the Haifa Development Foundation).

694. Several of the public foundations are financed by the Government (e.g., the Fund for Promotion of Israeli Quality Films and the New Fund for Documentary Films), thus reflecting further indirect investment in culture by the Government. Two important methods of support through public foundations are the Loan Fund for Producers, under which a government fund subsidizes interest on bank loans taken by private producers of artistic productions, and the Fund for the Promotion of Writers which supports writers in Israel according to the number of times their books have been borrowed from public libraries.

695. Foundations and contributors are often associated with major cultural institutions and bodies such as the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, Israel Museum and Tel Aviv Museum. Associations of friends of major cultural institutions make an important contribution through fund-raising activities inside and outside Israel, and by way of lobbying for public support.

696. A leading example of the involvement of private corporations in culture is Business for the Arts, a non-profit organization that forges links between the Israeli business community and various cultural and artistic enterprises on a "quid pro quo" basis - mainly by offering advertisement of sponsoring businesses (e.g., by way of an ad in a theatre programme). Banks and other business enterprises also serve as direct sponsors, on a regular basis, of activities in the field of art and culture.

697. A unique project, privately initiated, involves the Omanut l'Am (Arts for the People) association. The association has taken upon itself to provide residents of remote areas (outside the main cultural centres) with equal access to cultural and artistic activities. A further aim of Omanut l'Am is to promote art education and appreciation. It sponsors some 12,000 artistic activities annually in all areas of the arts, throughout the country. The association is also involved in cultural-related activities in schools. As indicated above, the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport directs significant budgetary resources to support the activities of Omanut l'Am.

698. A special Culture Administration was established within the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to further support the proper functioning of art and cultural institutions in Israel, including the formulation of long- and short-term policy. The administration also deals with the promotion of amateur activities, absorbing of new immigrant artists, folklore and ethnic heritage, art festivals, and research and science institutes, such as the Academy of the Hebrew Language, the Ben-Gurion Heritage Institute in the Negev and the Yad Itzhak Ben-Zvi Institute for Eretz Israel Studies and Research.

699. Several consultative public councils operate in affiliation with the Culture Administration: the Public Council for Culture and Art, which is a general policy consultative council composed of public figures from the art community; the Public Council for the Promotion of Culture and Art in Neighborhoods and Development Towns contributes to activity among disadvantaged populations; and the Council for Public Libraries and the Council for Museums, both operating under the provisions of the public libraries and museums laws, respectively.

The institutional infrastructure of cultural life in Israel

700. Two laws have been legislated to regulate the operation of specific cultural institutions: the Public Libraries Law 1975 and the Museums Law 1983.

701. The Public Libraries Law defines the responsibility of the State to establish public libraries and specifies the conditions for according a library the status of a public library (thus making it eligible to receive public funds). There are some 950 public library facilities in Israel, as well as school libraries and other libraries throughout the country. Hence, in almost every city or town there is at least one public library. The libraries house books in Hebrew, English, Arabic, Russian, German, French, Spanish, Romanian and Hungarian. There are also some mobile libraries available, designed especially for the use of the members of the armed forces and to accommodate the residents of remote settlements and neighbourhoods.

702. The Museums Law determines the criteria for establishment and recognition of museums by the Museum Council, composed of public figures. Israel has 180 museums of various kinds: art, nature, science, archaeology, history, technology, and other themes.

703. Many other cultural institutions, while not regulated by law, are actively supported by the State:

704. Theatres - There are 21 established theatre groups in Israel performing in theatres around the country. The larger theatre groups are based in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Beersheva. In addition, special theatre festivals are held annually throughout the country, most notable of which are the Acre Festival for Alternative Theater, the Teatronetto - festival of solo performances in Tel Aviv, and The Jerusalem Puppet Theater. Besides professional theatrical activities, there are several informal community theatres performing in local community centres. In addition to Hebrew-language theatre, there are also theatre groups regularly performing in Arabic, Russian, Yiddish and English.

705. Music - There are some 50 music-oriented organizations in Israel, including 17 orchestras, The Israel Opera, 10 choirs, and various music schools. The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra is counted among the world's best symphony orchestras. At least one concert hall can be found in almost every major town in Israel, hosting various musical performances. In addition, many musical events are held outdoors. Examples of annual music festivals are the Abu Gosh Vocal Music Festival, the Zimria (folk singing festival), the Arad Israeli Pop Music Festival, the Eilat Jazz Festival, and the Rubinstein International Competition for Pianists.

706. The plastic arts - A great number of unique institutions, associations and projects operate throughout the country (e.g., the Ceramic Artists Association, the Association for Jewish Art, professional associations for design, etc.). Art exhibitions are presented in a large number of museums, public and private art galleries, and in private workshops and homes in every part of the country.

707. Films - In recent years, approximately 10 feature films and 30 documentary films are produced in Israel every year. Domestic and foreign films are screened in a large number of cinemas throughout the country. Classic films are being re-screened in the three Cinemateques operating in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Haifa. In addition, international film festivals are held annually in Jerusalem and Haifa. Film-making is taught at the universities and in several film schools.

708. Literature - Some 20 literary periodicals are published every year and some 15 similar literary projects exist, organized by various organizations such as the Association of Hebrew Writers and the Association of Writers. In addition, all major newspapers carry a special weekly section on literature and poetry. Books are readily available in the many book stores and public libraries throughout the country. "Hebrew Book Week", a book fair held in every city, is a popular annual event. Moreover, international book fairs held in Israel, such as the Jerusalem International Book Fair, are also open to the public.

709. Museums such as Beit HaSofer and Beit Agnon in Jerusalem, and Beit Bialik in Tel Aviv host a variety of literary activities, and offer the public information and exhibits on the works and life of important writers.

710. Dance - Twenty dance groups, several dance academies and dance performance centres (e.g., the Susan Dellal Tel Aviv Dance Center) operate in Israel. There are both professional ballet and modern dance companies, most notably Bat-Sheva, The Israel Ballet, Bat Dor and U'dmama (performed mostly by the deaf). Several other troupes focus on popular folklore such as the Jerusalem Dance Company. Israeli and foreign companies perform throughout the country, usually in concert halls. Special dance festivals are held annually in different places in the country. The most notable of these is the Carmiel Folk Dance Festival. Due to the large popularity of folk-dancing in Israel, many community centres throughout the country offer dancing activities and classes.

Cultural identity and heritage of population groups

711. Being a multicultural society, Israel assists various groups in preserving and promoting their culture.

Arab, Druze and Circassian cultural heritage

712. Assistance is given to the promotion of the cultural heritage of Arab, Druze and Circassian minority groups. In these sectors, the State supports, inter alia, oriental orchestras, museums, theatres, and dance groups. Events such as the Arab Culture Month, the Olive Festival (of the Druze in the Galilee) and the Circassian Culture Festival (held in Kfar Kama and Richniya, in the Upper Galilee) have become an important part of the cultural life of those sectors of the population and attract many visitors. In addition, literary works and journals are regularly published in the Arabic language, thus accommodating the needs of the Arabic-speaking sectors.

713. Examples of specific cultural institutions supported in the Arab sector are the professional Arab theatres - such as the Nationwide Arab Theater, and the Beit Hagefen theatre in Haifa - and the Arab Orchestra, which plays Arab classical music. There are various museums dedicated to Arab and Islamic culture, most notably, the Institute for Islamic Art in Jerusalem and the Museum for Arab Folklore (see below). In the Druze sector, the State supports two professional and six amateur theatre companies, four music centres, two professional singing ensembles, and five representative dance companies. Infrastructure has been laid for three Druze museums, and at present there is a library in each of the 16 Druze villages in the country.

Jewish cultural heritage

714. In addition, Israel encourages and fosters cultural activities designed to preserve and promote traditional Jewish heritage of all kinds. Since Jews have come to Israel from 102 countries, different traditions and cultural heritage were introduced in Israel by members of the various Jewish communities. It is the policy of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to support the continued existence of this cultural heterogeneity, which constitutes part of the cultural identity of the nation. Hence, support is given to dozens of professional and amateur performing groups of dancers, singers and music ensembles who preserve the cultural tradition and ethnic heritage of the various communities.

715. Examples of such groups are the Inbal Dance Company, inspired by the Yemenite Jewish heritage; the Ha'Breira Ha'Tivit musical ensemble which draws upon North African ethnic roots; The East and West Orchestra, which also draws upon the heritage of Mediterranean countries and North Africa; and Bustan Avraham, which combines Jewish and Arab cultural elements.

716. Jewish religious scholastic achievements constitute an integral part of the Jewish, and thus Jewish-Israeli, culture. The teaching of its various elements, such as the Bible, Talmud, legends, religious law, and Jewish philosophy, as well as related Jewish music, art and history, is held in several institutional and cultural frameworks.

717. Languages which were developed and used by the Jews in the Diaspora are considered part of the national cultural heritage. In order to preserve two of these languages - Yiddish and Ladino - in which some of the greatest cultural achievements of the Jewish people were created, the Knesset enacted in 1966, the National Authority for Yiddish Culture Law and the National Authority for Ladino Culture Law. Both laws provide for the recognition of these two languages and cultures; the promotion and encouragement of contemporary artistic works in those languages; assistance for institutions in which activity relating to these cultures takes place (e.g., Yiddish-speaking theatre); compilation of cultural treasures, both oral and written, in and relating to these languages; and encouraging the publication of selected works in these languages as well as adequate translations into Hebrew. The annual budgeting allocations for each of these languages amounts to approximately NIS 750,000.

Institutions involved in the promotion of cultural identity

718. Universities and research institutes conduct studies of ethnic cultures, and conferences and symposia are held on the subject. Numerous academic publications dealing with a wide spectrum of topics relating to cultural identity are published every year.

719. Several museums in Israel focus upon various population groups and the preservation of their unique cultures:

- The Museum of the Jewish Diaspora (Tel Aviv) - relates the unique story and culture of the Jewish people since the time it exiled from its homeland and presents its history, tradition and heritage.
- The Center for Babylonian Heritage (Or Yehuda) - presents the culture, art, history and folklore of Iraqi Jewry.
- The Museum for Arab Folklore (Acre) - exhibits traditional arts and folklore items of the Arab population.
- The Institute for Islamic Art (Jerusalem) - houses extensive permanent exhibitions of pottery, textiles, jewellery, ceremonial objects and the like, covering a thousand years of Islamic art, Spain to India, and features temporary exhibits on special themes.
- The Center for the Integration of Oriental and Sephardi Jewish Heritage constitutes another source of information on Jewish culture. This centre, located in the Ministry of Education, is responsible for the integration of Oriental and Sephardi Jewish heritage into the various sectors of education and culture.

The role of mass media and communication in promoting participation in cultural life

720. Legislation in the field of mass communications exists in a number of spheres:

721. The Broadcasting Authority Law 1965 - The law regulates the activities of the Broadcasting Authority responsible for several TV and radio channels. Among the roles of the authority are the broadcasting of educational and informative programmes, as well as entertainment in the areas of culture, science and the arts; strengthening of the links to Jewish heritage; reflecting the life and cultural treasures of Jewish communities in different countries; promoting Jewish and Israeli creative work; and accommodating the needs of the Arab-speaking population. The Broadcasting Authority gives ample expression to Israeli cultural production and creation. In a recent move, one of the authority's radio stations has begun to play Israeli music only.

722. The Second Authority for Television and Radio Law 1990 - This law defines the functions of the Second Authority, which is responsible for the commercial TV Channel 2, and regional radio stations. Among the roles of the authority is the provision of suitable expression to the cultural variety of Israeli society, of Israeli minorities and of the different international cultures. In order to further promote Hebrew and Israeli works, Channel 2 franchise-holders are required to broadcast local productions (i.e., productions made in Israel in the Hebrew language), for at least one third of the air time. The franchise-holders are also required to invest in Israeli cinematic films.

723. The "Bezeq" Law, 1982 - This law addresses, among other things, the operation of cable and satellite TV broadcasting in Israel. It prescribes the taking into consideration of the cultural variety of the Israeli society and the needs of different regions of the country. Consequently, it facilitates the establishment of local community channels and the preparation of programmes on cultural subjects, including those of minority cultures.

724. The media plays an important role in promoting participation in the cultural life of Israel. Many radio and television programmes are dedicated to art, literature, movies, theatre, Jewish culture and other ethnic cultures. Special broadcasts cover cultural and artistic events and report on festivals and shows held inside and outside Israel. In addition, advertisements for cultural performances appear in all media channels. Programmes in Arabic and in other languages used in Israel (English, Russian, and Amharic) are also offered on TV and radio.

725. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport operates an educational television service which is granted by law broadcast time on the private and public channels. Educational television aims, inter alia, to increase participation in cultural life; to provide learning and knowledge in culture and art, science, communications and other fields; to increase involvement in educational, cultural and social matters; and to give expression to all facets of the cultural heritage of Israel's citizens.

726. Further sources of promotion of culture through the mass media are the Open University (a distance learning institution designed to promote academic education among wide populations) which broadcasts classes on radio and TV; foreign TV channels broadcasting in Israel through cable channels; and the Internet.

727. All daily newspapers include special sections and supplements devoted to cultural issues and cover on a regular basis cultural events. In addition, a number of culture-related journals are published on literature, art, photography and other subjects.

Preservation and display of mankind's cultural heritage

728. Much attention is paid in Israel to the preservation and presentation of antiquities and historical sites.

729. Preservation of antiquities - The preservation of antiquities dating from before 1700 CE falls under the jurisdiction of the Antiquities Authority. The latter operates in accordance with the Antiquities Authority Law 1978. The authority deals with the excavation, preservation, development, and restoration of antiquities and antiquities sites; supervision of archaeological excavations; management, safeguarding and supervision of the State's antiquities treasures; and the carrying-out of inspections intended to ensure prevention of infringements of the Antiquities Law.

730. Many important archeological findings, such as the Dead Sea Scrolls, are presented in museums and cultural centres. In addition, many sites such as Massada, Nabatian and Byzantine cities, Roman theatres, ancient synagogues, and prehistoric caves are open to the general public. The maintenance and operation of such sites (as opposed to their excavation and restoration) are the responsibility of the National Parks, Natural Reserves and Commemoration Sites Council.

731. Preservation of other sites - The Public Council for Preservation of Sites is in charge of the preservation of sites and buildings of historical value from after 1700 CE (e.g., the "illegal" immigrants camp from pre-State days at Atlit and buildings in Tel Aviv designed in the Bauhaus style).

732. The State of Israel is involved in professional international cooperation in the field of preservation and restoration of cultural treasures, through the International Centre for the Study of the Preservation and Restoration of Cultural Property and the International Council of Monuments and Sites.

Freedom of artistic creation and performance

733. It is the policy of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to support the protection of artistic creation and performance. Artists in Israel express themselves in various artistic fields and often express political views. However, government support is afforded without any discrimination on the basis of the political views of the artist in question, and some of the artistic projects which are receiving State funds reflect sharp criticism of the Government.

734. Although a film-rating commission with censorship powers still exists in Israel (whereas other forms of official non-security-related censorship have been abolished), the Supreme Court of Israel (sitting as an administrative court) exercises broad powers of review over its decisions, and has nullified on several occasions decisions to censor controversial artistic films (involving pornography). The court has held that freedom of artistic and creative expression is a protected constitutional right which can only be restricted in extreme situations involving a clear showing of severe threat to public order or safety.

735. The Supreme Court has stated that:

"This rule gives constitutional protection not only to the general freedom of expression, but also to the freedom of artistic expression. This last freedom can be regarded as part of the freedom of expression, 'from which, in part, the freedom of artistic creation in literature and in all forms of expression, is derived' [cite omitted]. 'Freedom of expression is the artist's liberty to open his/her heart, fly high and liberate his/her thoughts' [cite omitted] ... It is based on the conception of human beings as autonomous individuals entitled to self-fulfilment as creators and consumers of such creative work. It is the freedom to choose themes and the way of their presentation, and the other person's liberty to hear and absorb them. Of course, the freedom of artistic expression is not an absolute freedom. As is the case with other liberties, it is only of relative value, and it can be limited for a proper cause, provided that the restriction is not excessive."
H.C. 4804/94 Station Film Co. v. The Films and Plays Review Council, Takdin-Supreme, vol. 97 (1) 712, 718.

736. Furthermore, the Court states that:

"... [O]ur perceptions do not permit us to place restrictions upon the freedom of expression because of a non-extreme hardship caused thereby. Only the infliction of a deep, extraordinary and blatant insult may justify limiting the freedom of expression [cite omitted] ... As to the degree of probability that damage will occur ..., we have adopted a rule saying that only proximate certainty that public order or safety will be jeopardized may permit a restriction on the application of the right in a concrete case by a statutory authority ..."
H.C. 806/88 City Studios, Inc. v. The Films and Plays Review Council, P.D. vol. 43 (2) 22, 30.

Professional education in culture and art

737. There are 14 professional post-secondary art schools, recognized by the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport, which provide training in a variety of artistic areas. Seven of these institutions have been authorized by the Council of Higher Education to grant academic degrees to graduates. These include Bezalel - the academy of arts and design - the Rubin Academy of Music, and the Shenkar School of Fashion and Textile. In addition, universities have art departments in which the history of art, art appreciation, film-making, theatre, music and other culture-related topics are taught. Regional colleges also have art departments in which programmes and courses in film-making, theatre, plastic arts, dance, music and other art forms are given.

738. Certain universities and colleges also offer study programmes in the administration of cultural institutions.

Other measures for the conservation, development and diffusion of culture

739. The Mediterranean Culture Forum: In order to improve the coordination activities aimed at integrating cultural preservation, a Forum for Mediterranean Culture has been jointly established by the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, The Van Leer Research Institute and Mishkenot Sha'ananim Cultural Center. The forum initiates various activities to preserve and disseminate a combination of eastern and western Mediterranean culture. At this stage, the forum is initiating 10 projects dealing with topics such as: Jewish, Christian and Muslim relations; relations between Sephardim (Jews originating from Muslim countries) and Ashkenazim (Jews originating from European countries) through theatrical performances, music, journals and films; and the exchange of culture, knowledge and tradition.

740. The Israel Prize: The prize is awarded in the fields of science and art, commemorating the lifetime achievements of renowned personalities, scholarly thinkers, promoters of Israeli heritage, scientists, writers, cultural figures and artists. It expresses the State's gratitude of the recipients' activities and achievements, as well as their contribution to society. The Israel Prize is awarded annually on the basis of the recommendations of a public committee, with the approval of the Minister of Education, Culture and Sport.

741. Special cultural programmes for the disadvantaged: Much attention is being given by the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport to the cultural needs of disadvantaged groups and sectors of the population. This includes supporting cultural activities for the disabled such as dance groups, orchestras and choirs for handicapped youth, the wheelchair-bound and children suffering from Down Syndrome.

742. Promotion of culture within education: Subjects related to the arts and culture are taught in all levels of the education system. Literature, foreign languages, arts, photography, theatre and film are part of both the compulsory and elective curriculum. There are also several adult education arts and culture programmes. Within the framework of secondary education, there are special schools for the arts which place special emphasis on the arts, in addition to the regular curriculum.

743. Cultural enrichment is an important educational element. Schools receive a "culture basket" which includes annual attendance at some five to seven artistic performances per student. Furthermore, a wide variety of cultural activities take place within the schools themselves, including student orchestras and choirs, dance troupes and theatre groups.

744. In addition, many cultural activities for children and youth take place in community centres, in cultural, youth and sports centres, youth clubs, youth and in various other extracurricular activities.

745. With the aid of Mifal Hapayis (the National Lottery), the Government is building 70 centres for science and the arts in lower secondary schools (for the 12 to 14-year-old age group), in consonance with the policy to develop interdisciplinary curricula in science and the arts. Construction of 45 such centres began during 1996-1997. Other cultural facilities in schools throughout the country include performance arenas and art workshops.

746. Another "access to culture" project under way is the computerization of libraries, and the establishment of Internet access in libraries and schools.

International cultural cooperation

747. Israel has cultural agreements with a large number of countries worldwide. Some thirty public festivals are held in Israel, some of which include the participation of many artistic groups from abroad. Many of the world's leading performing artists perform in Israel on a commercial basis. Similarly, important international art exhibitions are presented in Israel from time to time.

748. The State of Israel, Israeli organizations and individuals are members of various international cultural and art organizations. Israeli artists participate on a regular basis in conferences worldwide, some of which convene in Israel. Throughout the years, Israel has obtained valuable cooperation on the part of international organizations and foundations in the field of culture.

The enjoyment of scientific progress

Institutional promotion of research and development

749. The basic structure of the R & D system in Israel was laid down in the late 1950s by a high-level committee headed by Ephraim Katzir, himself a scientist of world renown and later-President of Israel. The committee suggested that each ministry be made responsible for R & D within its own areas of public accountability; and that all R & D activities be directed and coordinated by a Chief Scientist. The committee's recommendations were adopted by the Government in 1968. Hence, a two-tier approach exists wherein each ministry remains free to pursue its own R & D agenda while two high-level forums were created to ensure inter-ministerial cooperation and collaboration. The first is the Ministerial Committee for Science and Technology; and the second is the Chief Scientists' Forum. Both forums are headed by the Minister of Science.

750. In addition, the consultative National Council for Research and Development (NCRD) advises the Government in its consolidation of a comprehensive national R & D policy, and provides it assistance in determining the allocation of resources to scientific institutions and projects. In 1994, a temporary committee, The Executive National Committee for the Development of Scientific and Technological Strategic Research (the "Committee of Thirteen"), was established by the NCRD to identify priority areas. (See below.)

751. The implementation of Israel's R & D policy is divided among three different ministries:

- Basic research is under the responsibility of the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport. The general basic research budgeting policy is not decided by the Ministry itself, but rather by an independent Council for Higher Education (composed largely by public figures in the field of higher education), chaired by the Minister of Education. The Council also has a six-member Planning and Budgeting Committee which authorizes the actual allocation of governmental funds to universities and other institutes of higher education. In the performance of its role, the Ministry of Education receives the advice of yet another consultative committee: the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, a statutory body composed of leading academics. In 1987 the academy submitted to the Government a master-plan for basic research, which has been approved and is being implemented gradually.

- Strategic-generic R & D is supervised by the Ministry of Science. The Executive National Committee for the Development of Scientific and Technological Strategic Research (the Committee of Thirteen) was established in 1994 by the NCRD and the Ministry of Science to identify priority areas, with market potential, suitable for a concerted national strategic R & D effort. Special supervision committees were subsequently assigned the role of supervising the progress in each of the priority areas determined by the Committee of Thirteen. These areas include biotechnology, electro-optics, micro-electronics, advanced materials, and telecommunications and information technologies.

- Applied industrial R & D is within the powers of the Ministry of Industry and Trade. The Ministry, operating through the office of its Chief Scientists, provides support to specific R & D projects of perceived commercial utility.

The national R & D budget

752. Israeli industry has traditionally under-invested in long-term R & D. The business sector in Israel invests on average 36 per cent of the total national expenditure on R & D compared to an average of 51 per cent for Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development countries. Two national programmes attempt to compensate for this failure on the part of industry:

1. The Ministry of Science provides additional R & D funds to high priority fields. The ministry aims to create a critical mass of knowledge, know-how and experience in priority areas to be later diffused in industry and implemented in the creation of new and advanced value-added products.

2. The Ministry of Industry and Trade funds shorter-term industry-motivated R & D, and supports factories and other industry businesses investing in R & D. The Ministry normally funds 66 per cent of the research costs of approved projects.

753. Strategic generic research accounts for only 8 per cent of the government national R & D budget. In comparison, basic research receives 34 per cent of the budget and applied industrial research - through the Office of the Chief Scientist of the Ministry of Industry and Trade - 38 per cent.

Support of scientific activity and dissemination of scientific knowledge

754. Special projects: The Government of Israel supports several programmes designed to promote unique scientific activity and disseminate scientific knowledge.

755. Ministry of Science projects: The Ministry of Science gives support to a wide range of special programmes. Support is normally given for only one year at a time, but grantees are encouraged to re-submit an application for further funding. Applications for support are reviewed according to the Ministry of Science's current criteria for sponsoring public bodies and projects (which were last updated in April 1995). Emphasis is placed on the geographic and demographic dispersion of scientific and technological activities and knowledge, both to peripheral regions and to the populations of immigrants from the former USSR and Ethiopia. The major areas of support are:

756. Regional research and development centres: The Ministry of Science supports regional R & D centres in peripheral areas which strive to create and stimulate science and technology R & D activities intended to benefit the region in which they are situated, and to attend to the needs of local population. Currently, five such regional R & D centres receive Ministry funding: the Golan R & D Center; the Mitzpeh Ramon Center in the northern Negev; the Katif Center for the Study of Coastal Deserts; the Galilee Center for R & D (which promotes R & D by the Israeli Arab scientific community); and the Hatzevah R & D Center, in the southern Arava Negev region.

757. Enrichment activities - science and technology: The Ministry of Science supports a wide range of programmes aimed at advancing the scientific and technological literacy of the general public, with priority given to educating children and youth outside the main urban centres. In particular, support is offered to unique extracurricular activities not available through the education system due to budgetary constraints; programmes for populations who otherwise have limited selection of enrichment activities; programmes for the disadvantaged, and programmes for the Arab and Druze minority sector. Only projects open to all residents of the locality in which they take place, on a non-discriminatory basis, are eligible for support.

758. Some of the programmes under this category which were funded in 1997 are: science workshops, seminars, summer schools and scientific tours for youth and children; the establishment of scientific facilities such as a communication station, a small scale observatory, and scientific activity centres; the publication of the first few issues of a new popular scientific journal in Arabic; scientific exhibitions; and scientific competitions. Overall, 15 projects at a total cost of around $300,000 were funded in 1997.

759. Two national science museums operate under the auspices of the Ministry of Science: The National Museum for Science and Technology of Haifa, and The Science Museum of Jerusalem. These museums receive part of their annual income ($1 million in 1997) from the Ministry.

760. The Ministry of Science also organized in 1996 and again in 1997 a special event - "The Opening of the Scientific Year", the purpose of which was to bring public attention to the importance of scientific activity for improving the quality and standard of living in Israel. On this occasion, and in order to encourage youth involvement with science, the Ministry invited adolescents from all over the country to present their unique projects to representatives of the scientific community, and held a competition on the best popular scientific article. The Ministry of Science is considering to make this event a tradition, and is currently planning next year's competition.

761. Encouragement of scientific interchange: Apart from the support given by the Ministry of Science to bi-national and international conferences and seminars (see infra), it also provides partial financial assistance for national conferences conducted under the auspices of other private or public institutions. This support is aimed at creating opportunities for high-level scientific interchange. The additional support offered by the Ministry encourages, whenever possible, students and young scientists to attend them.

762. Ministry of Trade and Industry projects: The Ministry of Trade and Industry operates several "technology incubators". Their aim is to create a supportive framework that will enable resource-limited scientists and engineers to work on R & D projects. The incubators offer the developer of a scientific research project a broad logistic infrastructure, including laboratories, instruments, economic management, legal advice and other services.

763. Twenty-eight incubators are operating at present around the country, encompassing 230 running projects (half of which were initiated by new immigrants). Some 1,100 workers are employed in incubators (about 80 per cent of whom are also new immigrants). Every month, an average of 10 new projects are approved for funding by the Ministry. Incubator-sponsored projects may last up to two years. Subsequent research may be eligible for other Ministry financing programmes.

764. The Agricultural Research Administration: Of special importance to scientific progress in Israel are the R & D activities of the Agricultural Research Administration, operating within the Ministry of Agriculture. The administration operates seven research institutes and several experiment stations and experimental farms, and has carried out hundreds of research projects throughout the country.

- The Centre for Field and Garden Crops studies cultivation techniques, strains of plants, medical agricultural, agro-technical methods and biotechnology.
- The Institute for Plantations tests new species and strains for marketing qualities, irrigation and fertilization methods, climate and soil adaptability; studying ways of controlling fruit ripening and designing orchards.
- The Institute for Animals studies feeding; reproduction and fertility in cattle and sheep, qualities of eggs and poultry; study of animal hybridization and genetic engineering.

- The Flora Protection Institute conducts research projects for identifying plants' diseases; development of environment-friendly pesticides and of resistive plants.
- The Land and Water Institute studies irrigation methods and water and land quality.
- The Institute for Technology and Storage of Agricultural Produce examines the handling of agricultural products, and the development of healthy food products.
- The Agricultural Engineering Institute carries research projects concerning agricultural machinery and their adaptation to Israeli agriculture.
- The Center for International Agricultural Cooperation and Instruction (operated jointly with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs) runs training courses in agricultural development intended for hundreds of students. Some courses are given outside Israel to foreign agriculturists (e.g. in Latin America, Asia, Africa, Egypt and Eastern Europe).

765. Research grants and scholarships are awarded by several private and public funds, in addition to the regular university funding. This system constitutes an important source of support in scientific activity. Examples of such financial support are the following funding programmes:

766. The Council for Higher Education offers over 20 three-year grants (Alon Grants for Young Scientists) annually, which permit outstanding young scientists to find posts at the universities; The Rashi Foundation, a private fund, partly supported by the public Planning and Budgeting Committee, provides 15 immigrant scientists with annual grants; (the Guestella Foundation); Similar grants are awarded to another 15 senior immigrant scientists by the Berekha Foundation; The Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities supports research programmes concerning the fauna, flora and geology of Israel; and The Rothschild Foundation supports new immigrants studying for a doctorate in natural sciences.

767. Publications: Numerous scientific publications are published in Israel every year. Some of these publications are funded by the academic institutions, whereas others are supported by public and private bodies.

Freedom of scientific research and creative activity

768. The protection of scientific and creative expression is considered part of the freedom of speech, which constitutes a fundamental value of the Israeli legal system. The Supreme Court of Israel has stated:

"The important issues, that the decision in the present case is hinged upon, are freedom of speech and academic freedom. We must protect them in every way, we are obliged to defend them and we must nurture them as if they were 'protected natural treasures'. We need to further recall that the protection granted to these liberties through a Basic Law, or by way of constitutional interpretation that construes them as originating from a Basic Law, or declarations on the part of State authorities committing themselves to those principles, is not enough. A necessary prerequisite to the existence of these freedoms is the existence of public trust in their actual implementation. If a person does not truly believe that he/she is entitled to freedom of speech or academic freedom, subject of course to recognized limitations, he/she is bound to act as if those freedoms do not exist. If the public does not believe in them, the liberties are expected to recede ...

"The reasons for protecting academic freedom are numerous and diverse, and much written about. Research, studying and teaching in every field of the human spirit, without ball and chain, are uplifting for any individual within society, and through their effect upon the individual they affect the society as a whole. It also fulfils a basic human need ... Among the reasons for protecting this freedom, it is possible to refer to the society's interest in promoting values such as: 'knowledge, individual self-fulfilment, curiosity, etc. - values the promotion of which sometimes neglected, since they are outside the centre of attention of the executive social institutions. Therefore, it is the role of universities to research, accumulate knowledge and teach' [cite omitted]. The basic proposition is that a teacher in the academic world is entitled to conduct research and teach in his/her area, in whatever way he/she sees fit, and it is best that non-academic elements will impose minimal restrictions upon him/her, his/her students and their interaction."

Cr.A. 2831/95 Elba v. The State of Israel, Takdin-Supreme, vol. 96 (3) 97, 171-175

769. Hence, scientific publications and interchange cannot be restricted save in extreme situations, i.e. where they almost certainly threaten public safety or order. Furthermore, according to the principles of Israeli administrative law, the Government cannot withhold support from a scientific or creative expression merely by reason of objection to the contents of that expression.

International cooperation

770. Israel's scientists are very much interwoven in the international scientific community. One third of all Israeli scientific papers in international journals include foreign co-authors. Academics receive generous professional travel and sabbatical allowances as part of their terms of employment. Most postdoctoral fellows spend one or two years in world-class research centres abroad before beginning their research careers.

771. International scientific cooperation is particularly vital for Israel in several ways. Joint research programmes and cost-sharing help stretch Israel's limited research budget, and gives Israeli scientists access to large multi-billion-dollar research facilities that Israel cannot afford to duplicate. Collaboration with scientists abroad provides intellectual synergy with a large pool of talent and helps Israel maintain world-class scientific standards despite its small size.

772. In accordance with this approach, the Ministry of Science administers various international programmes which are intended to facilitate and encourage collaboration between researchers from Israel and foreign countries. In particular, it operates programmes of scientific cooperation based on bilateral agreements with 26 countries around the world. Support is given in the following three areas of activities:

- joint research projects;
- exchange of scientists (at different levels of seniority: doctoral students, junior and senior researchers);
- joint conferences.

773. Within the framework of each agreement, and in coordination with the respective country, the Ministry periodically issues invitations to submit proposals, directed for researchers competing for joint funding.

774. Each year the Ministry of Science supports two international scientific conferences, and several bilateral ones. In order to ensure wide dissemination of cutting-edge scientific knowledge the Ministry regularly subsidizes the entrance fee of participants from the general public in such conferences.

775. The biggest international scientific cooperation programme in which Israel is taking part involves the European Union. Israel joined the EU Fourth Framework Program for R & D in 1996. The agreement commits Israel to pay an annual membership fee of $40 million. In return, Israeli scientists are able to participate and compete for grants in the following four activities: research projects with scientists from EU; research projects with scientists from non-EU member States; grants for dissemination and implementation of research results; and, grants for training and mobility of researchers (conferences, mutual visits, scholarships, etc.).

776. The agreement is based on the principle of reciprocity, and entitles researchers from the EU to have access to Israel's national programmes for R & D. This obligation on the part of Israel is currently in the implementation process.

777. The Ministry of Science coordinates Israeli participation in several international organizations and research facilities, such as CERN (European Nuclear Research Center), EMBO (European Molecular Biology Organization), EMBL (European Molecular Biology Laboratory) and UNESCO.

778. In the last two years Israel gained observer status in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development and participates in the organization's activities in the area of science and technology, sharing information and acquiring further knowledge on science and technology policy. Israel has also been invited by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to take part in the organization's scientific activities, under its Mediterranean Dialogue.

779. Additional international cooperation is exercised by the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities. The Academy operates a scientific centre in Cairo, the aim of which is to assist Israeli researchers in work associated with Egypt and its culture, and to encourage cooperation with Egyptian researchers in all spheres of science and research. The academy also has an observer status at the European Foundation for Science and takes part in its activities. Among them are the meetings of the permanent committee of the foundation for humanities, social sciences, the European councils for medical research, the European councils for scientific research and the four "scientific nets" of the foundation. It also represents Israel at the International Council of Scientific Unions (ICSU).

780. The academy runs scientists' exchange programmes with academies in Western Europe and Eastern Europe and promotes contacts with national academies and scientific research communities throughout the world.

The legal protection given to intellectual property

781. Literary and artistic works are protected in Israel by copyright and performers' rights laws. Scientific inventions are protected by the patent laws. The basic principle, according to which intellectual property is protected under Israeli law, was reiterated by the Supreme Court of Israel:

"The right of the creator vis-a-vis his/her creation is also a fundamental principle - the right to protection of property rights. This principle is enshrined in Article 3 of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, according to which it is prohibited to interfere with one's property. In the jurisprudence of this court the principle was enumerated among the fundamental values, on the same level of freedom of speech [cite omitted]. In the framework of property rights, it is natural that intellectual property is also protected."

P.C.A 2687/92 Geva v. Walt Disney Corp., P.D. 48 (1) 251, 269

Copyrights

782. Israel's main copyright law - the Copyright Law is based on the United Kingdom Copyright Act of 1911. However, it forms only a part of Israeli copyright statutory law. The other primary copyright statutory instruments include the Copyright Ordinance 1924; Copyright Order (Berne Convention) 1953; and the Copyright Order (Universal Copyright Convention) 1955.

783. Protection granted to the holder of a copyright includes the exclusive right to (a) copy or reproduce the work; (b) translate or otherwise adapt the work; (c) distribute copies of the work; and (d) publicly communicate the work. It is not necessary to submit a formal application in order to obtain copyright protection in Israel. It is generally recommended that authors mark their works with a copyright notice including the author's name and the date of creation. Copyright protection subsists for the life of the author and for a period of 70 years after his/her death .

784. Both civil and criminal remedies against breaches of copyrights are provided for in the law. The civil remedies include action for damages, accounting for profits, and court seizure orders and injunctions. As to criminal remedies, the Copyright Ordinance 1924, as amended subsequently, provides that commercial infringement of a copyright copies constitutes a criminal offence punishable by up to three years of imprisonment and the possible seizure and destruction of infringing copies. The law also provides for limitations and exceptions to the protection of the copyright: fair use of the protected material is permitted if used for private study, research, criticism, review, or a journalistic summary.

785. Several significant amendments have been introduced in the Copyright Ordinance which have substantially modified the law and brought it to date with recent developments.

1. In 1981, the concept of moral rights was added to the law. Consequently, each author has the right to have his/her name applied to his/her own work, as well as the right to seek relief against distortion, modification or derogatory actions in relation to the work, which may offend the author's reputation or dignity.
2. Since 1988 computer software is also protected by copyright on the same terms as "literary works".
3. Since March 1996 the renting and leasing rights of audio and visual copyrighted works belong exclusively to the copyright holder. Furthermore, the Government was instructed to transfer 5 per cent of the market retail proceeds from the sales of blank audio and video cassettes (deducted from VAT proceeds), to right holders subject to the supervision of a special committee.
4. The protection of copyright laws has been extended to databases and compilations, even if the "raw material" data was a matter of public property.

786. Israel is a member of the following conventions:

- The Berne Convention under its Brussels Act,
- The Universal Copyright Convention under its initial Act,
- The Geneva Convention of 1971 for the Protection of Producers of Phonograms Against Unauthorized Duplication of their Phonograms, and
- The World Trade Organization, and the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS).

787. Lastly, the Copyright Law Reform Committee set up by Israel's Ministry of Justice has completed its work and a new draft copyright bill has been distributed for comment to members of the public.

788. Performers' rights: under the Performers' Rights Law 1984, a singer, actor, music player, dancer, or any other performer of a literary, artistic, dramatic or musical work is entitled to prevent the recording, copying, broadcasting and commercial use of his/her performance without permission. The court may order to confiscate unauthorized copies of the performance.

Patents

789. Patents are protected in Israel by two separate acts: The Patents Law 1967 and the Patents and Designs Ordinance. Under these laws an inventor may register a patent to an invention if he/she can prove innovation, usefulness, commercial applicability and inventive progress. The proprietor of a patent is entitled to prevent anyone from using the patent without his/her permission.

790. The Registrar of Patents is authorized to issue coercion permits, enabling others to use the patented invention, if he/she is convinced that the proprietor is exploiting the monopoly over the patent. Other restrictions imposed upon the scope of protection offered by the patent system is the limited life span of a registered patent (20 years), and the exclusion of inventions constituting bodily medical treatments, and artificial animal and plant species from the system.

791. The policy considerations underlying the institution of patents and its interplay with coercion permits was analysed at length by the Supreme Court of Israel:

"The purpose of the patent system is not a mere consideration granted to the inventor in return for the public benefit derived from his/her invention. The purpose is also to encourage research. Exchange of opinions, information and thoughts is essential to the advancement and fruition of research. But until the research receives protection in the form of exclusivity, it is only natural that inventors will seek to keep their invention confidential, and look for the most efficient use thereof. Early recognition of an invention will not necessarily discourage other researchers, so that they will no longer pursue the same area. On the contrary, in the absence of a patent protection system, it is feared that some will settle for plagiarizing an existing invention. A protection against imitation will encourage additional research, designed to find other uses, advancements, innovations and refinement beyond the existing and protected patent. This is how the patent system offers incentives for originality and creative imagination. Early publicity (which will not be facilitated unless a patent exists) will create interest in the scientific community, bolster team work and encourage further independent research. It is a case of 'writer's jealousy which advocates wisdom'. Furthermore, lacking the incentive created by exclusiveness, which ensures a financial reward for breakthrough findings, the requisite research resources will not be made available ..."

C.A. 665/84 Sanopy Ltd. v. Unipharm Ltd., P.D. vol. 41 (4) 729, 743

"The patent system involves a conflict between two important public interests. On the one hand, the interest of development and inventive creation, and on the other, the interest of free economic activity. To advance the first set of interests, the legislator must provide an economic incentive to the inventor ... Therefore, the legislator decided to establish the patent system and grant the inventor exclusive monopoly on the use of the invention, thereby guaranteeing him/her reimbursement for developing expenses and a certain profit, i.e. an incentive to invest in the invention. But this solution implies compromising the other public interests mentioned above, to the extent that monopoly hinders free competition. And so, in order to protect this interest, the legislator decided to restrict the inventor's monopoly. In this restricted monopoly we can find what the legislator deems to be the optimal balance between the two colliding principles. These restrictions include the power of the patent registrar, in cases of 'monopoly abuse' on the part of the patent owner, to end the monopoly and permit another person to use the patented invention [cite omitted]. Another restriction can be found in the fact that monopoly is given for a limited time only."

COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES
UNDER ARTICLES 16 AND 17 OF THE COVENANT

Concluding observations of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

ISRAEL

1. The Committee considered the initial report of Israel on the implementation of the Covenant (E/1990/5/Add.39), together with the written replies to the list of issues, at its 31st to 33rd meetings, held on 17 and 18 November 1998, and adopted ¹ the following concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the initial report which generally conforms to its guidelines on the preparation of reports. The Committee regrets, however, the delay in the submission of the report.

3. The Committee expresses appreciation for the presentation of the State's representatives and the additional information they provided during the dialogue. The Committee also takes note of the extensive information submitted to it by a large number of non-governmental organizations which was available to the Committee for its dialogue with the State party.

B. Positive factors

4. The Committee welcomes the enactment in 1995 of the National Health Insurance Law which provides for primary health care and ensures equal and adequate health services for each citizen and permanent resident of Israel. The Committee also welcomes the amendment in 1996 of the same law to enable housewives to receive the minimum old-age pension while remaining exempt from contributions.

5. The Committee welcomes the recent establishment of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women which is vested with advisory powers with respect to policies to promote gender equality, eliminate discrimination against women and prevent domestic violence against women.

6. The Committee takes note of the statement by State party's representatives that with respect to the Covenant's applicability in the occupied territories, Israel accepts direct responsibility in some areas covered by the Covenant, indirect responsibility in other areas and overall significant legal responsibility across the board. This conforms to the Committee's view that the Covenant applies to all areas where Israel maintains geographical, functional or personal jurisdiction.

C. Factors and difficulties affecting the implementation of the Covenant

7. The Committee notes that Israel's emphasis on its security concerns, including its policies on closures, has hampered the realization of economic, social and cultural rights within Israel and the occupied territories.

D. Principal subjects of concern

Land and people

8. The Committee notes with concern that the Government's written and oral reports included statistics indicating the enjoyment of the rights enshrined in the Covenant by Israeli settlers in the occupied territories but that the Palestinian population within the same jurisdictional areas were excluded from both the report and the protection of the Covenant. The Committee is of the view that the State's obligations under the Covenant apply to all territories and populations under its effective control. The Committee therefore regrets that the State party was not prepared to provide adequate information in relation to the occupied territories.

Status of the Covenant

9. The Committee notes that economic, social and cultural rights have not been granted constitutional recognition in Israel's legal system. The Committee is of the view that the current Draft Basic Law: Social Rights does not meet the requirements of Israel's obligations under the Covenant.

Discrimination

10. The Committee expresses concern that excessive emphasis upon the State as a "Jewish State" encourages discrimination and accords a second-class status to its non-Jewish citizens. The Committee notes with concern that the Government of Israel does not accord equal rights to its Arab citizens, although they comprise over 19 per cent of the total population. This discriminatory attitude is apparent in the lower standard of living of Israeli Arabs as a result, inter alia, of lack of access to housing, water, electricity and health care and their lower level of education. The Committee also notes with concern that despite the fact that the Arabic language has official status in law, it is not given equal importance in practice.

11. The Committee notes with grave concern that the Status Law of 1952 authorizes the World Zionist Organization/Jewish Agency and its subsidiaries, including the Jewish National Fund, to control most of the land in Israel, since these institutions are chartered to benefit Jews exclusively. Despite the fact that the institutions are chartered under private law, the State of Israel nevertheless has a decisive influence on their policies and thus remains responsible for their activities. A State party cannot divest itself of its obligations under the Covenant by privatizing governmental functions. The Committee takes the view that large-scale and systematic confiscation of Palestinian land and property by the State and the transfer of that property to these agencies constitute an institutionalized form of discrimination because these agencies by definition would deny the use of these properties to non-Jews. Thus, these practices constitute a breach of Israel's obligations under the Covenant.

12. The Committee notes with deep concern the situation of the Jahalin Bedouin families who were forcibly evicted from their ancestral lands to make way for the expansion of the Ma'aleh Adumim and Kedar settlements. The Committee deplores the manner in which the Government of Israel has housed these families - in steel container vans in a garbage dump in Abu Dis in subhuman living conditions. The Committee regrets that instead of providing assurances that this matter will be resolved, the State party has insisted that it can only be solved through litigation.

13. The Committee notes with concern that the Law of Return, which allows any Jew from anywhere in the world to immigrate and thereby virtually automatically enjoy residence and obtain citizenship in Israel, discriminates against Palestinians in the diaspora upon whom the Government of Israel has imposed restrictive requirements which make it almost impossible to return to their land of birth.

Employment

14. The Committee notes with concern the rapid growth of unemployment in Israel as a result of which more and more workers are employed in low-paying part-time work where they have little or no legal protection.

15. The Committee notes with regret that more than 72 per cent of persons with disabilities are unemployed. The new Law of Equality for People with Disabilities 1998 has not set any quota for the employment of such persons.

16. The Committee is alarmed that only half of the workers entitled to the minimum wage actually get it, and that foreign workers, Palestinians and "manpower contractor" workers are particularly vulnerable in this regard.

Closure

17. The Committee regrets that the Government of Israel has maintained "general closures" continuously since 1993, thereby restricting and controlling the movement of people and goods between Israel and the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, between Jerusalem and the West Bank and between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The Committee notes with concern that these restrictions apply only to Palestinians and not to Jewish Israeli citizens. The Committee is of the view that closures have cut off Palestinians from their own land and resources, resulting in widespread violations of their economic, social and cultural rights, including in particular those contained in article 1 (2) of the Covenant.

18. The Committee notes with grave concern the severe consequences of closure on the Palestinian population. Closures have prevented access to health care, first and foremost during medical emergencies, which at times have tragically ended in death at checkpoints and elsewhere. Workers from the occupied territories are prevented from reaching their workplaces, depriving them of income and livelihood and the enjoyment of their rights under the Covenant. Poverty and lack of food aggravated by closures particularly affect children, pregnant women and the elderly who are most vulnerable to malnutrition.

19. The Committee is concerned at the forcible separation of Palestinian families because of closures and the refusal of Israeli authorities to allow students in Gaza to return to their universities in the West Bank.

Permanent residency law

20. The Committee expresses its concern at the effect of the directive of the Ministry of the Interior, according to which Palestinians may lose their right to live in the city if they cannot prove that East Jerusalem has been their "centre of life" for the past seven years. The Committee also regrets a serious lack of transparency in the application of the directive, as indicated by numerous reports. The Committee notes with concern that this policy is being applied retroactively both to Palestinians who live abroad and to those who live in the West Bank or in nearby Jerusalem suburbs, but not to Israeli Jews or to foreign Jews who are permanent residents of East Jerusalem. This system has resulted in, inter alia, the separation of Arab families and the denial of their right to social services and health care, including maternity care for Arab women, which are privileges linked to residency status in Jerusalem. The Committee is deeply concerned that the implementation of a quota system for the reunification of Palestinian families affected by this residency law involves long delays and does not meet the needs of all divided families. Similarly, the granting of residency status is often a long process and, as a result, many children are separated from at least one of their parents and spouses are not able to live together.

Land use and housing

21. The Committee is deeply concerned about the adverse impact of the growing exclusion faced by Palestinians in East Jerusalem from the enjoyment of their economic, social and cultural rights. The Committee is also concerned over the continued Israeli policies of building settlements to expand the boundaries of East Jerusalem and of transferring Jewish residents into East Jerusalem with the result that they now outnumber the Palestinian residents.

22. The Committee deplores the continuing practices of the Government of Israel of home demolitions, land confiscations and restrictions on family reunification and residency rights, and its adoption of policies which result in substandard housing and living conditions, including extreme overcrowding and lack of services, of Palestinians in East Jerusalem, in particular in the old city.

23. The Committee notes with concern the situation of Arab neighbourhoods in mixed cities such as Jaffa and Lod which have deteriorated into virtual slums because of Israel's excessively restrictive system of granting government permits without which it is illegal to undertake any kind of structural repair or renovation.

24. The Committee notes that despite State party's obligation under article 11 of the Covenant, the Government of Israel continues to expropriate Palestinian lands and resources for the expansion of Israeli settlements. Thousands of dunams (hectares) of land in the West Bank have recently been confiscated to build 20 new bypass roads which cut West Bank towns off from outlying villages and farmlands. The consequence - if not the motivation - is the fragmentation and isolation of the Palestinian communities and facilitation of the expansion of illegal settlements. The Committee also notes with concern that while the Government annually diverts millions of cubic metres of water from the West Bank's Eastern Aquifer Basin, the annual per capita consumption allocation for Palestinians is only 125 cubic metres while settlers are allocated 1,000 cubic metres per capita.

25. The Committee expresses its concern over the plight of an estimated 200,000 uprooted "present absentees", Palestinian Arab citizens of Israel most of whom were forced to leave their villages during the 1948 war on the understanding that they would be allowed by the Government of Israel to return after the war. Although a few have been given back their property, the vast majority continue to be displaced and dispossessed within the State because their lands were confiscated and not returned to them.

Unrecognized villages

26. The Committee notes with deep concern that a significant proportion of Palestinian Arab citizens of Israel continue to live in unrecognized villages without access to water, electricity, sanitation and roads. Such an existence has caused extreme difficulties for the villagers in regard to their access to health care, education and employment opportunities. In addition, these villagers are continuously threatened with demolition of their home and confiscation of their land. The Committee regrets the inordinate delay in the provision of essential services to even the few villages that have been recognized. In this connection, the Committee takes note that while Jewish settlements are constructed on a regular basis, no new Arab villages have been built in the Galilee.

27. The Committee regrets that the Regional Master Plan for the Northern District of Israel and the Plan for the Negev have projected a future where there is little place for Arab citizens of Israel whose needs arising from natural demographic growth are largely ignored.

28. The Committee expresses its grave concern about the situation of the Bedouin Palestinians settled in Israel. The number of Bedouins living below the poverty line, their living and housing conditions, their levels of malnutrition, unemployment and infant mortality are all significantly higher than the national averages. They have no access to water, electricity and sanitation and are subjected on a regular basis to land confiscations, house demolitions, fines for building "illegally", destruction of agricultural fields and trees, and systematic harassment and persecution by the Green Patrol. The Committee notes in particular that the Government's policy of settling Bedouins in seven "townships" has caused high levels of unemployment and loss of livelihood.

Other concerns

29. The Committee notes with regret the large gaps within the Israeli educational system. Dropout rates are higher and eligibility for matriculation certificates is lower within certain segments of society: Arabs and Jews in poor neighbourhoods and in development towns, where many of the residents are Jews of Asian and African origin, including Ethiopian Jews. The Committee is particularly concerned about the gap in educational expenditure per capita for the Arab sector which is substantially less than for the Jewish sector.

30. The Committee notes with concern that the recently adopted Arrangements Law has the effect of eroding the principles of universality and equality set out in the National Health Insurance Law. The Arrangements Law imposes payments for medical services in addition to the health tax; a periodic health tax links the amount of tax required to the amount of health services needed, thereby increasing inequality in health care. In spite of assurances that the Knesset sets a cap on such taxes, the Committee is concerned that this provision does not conform to the Government's avowed commitment to an equitable health-care system.

31. The Committee notes with grave concern the high incidence of domestic violence against women which is estimated at 200,000 cases per year. The Committee is concerned about the situation of non-Jewish women who are reportedly worse off in terms of living conditions, health and education. The Committee is concerned at persistent reports that the Dimona nuclear plant could pose a serious threat to the right to health and to the environment unless urgent preventive measures are undertaken.

E. Suggestions and recommendations

32. The Committee requests the State party to provide additional information on the realization of economic, social and cultural rights in the occupied territories, in order to complete the State party's initial report and thereby ensure full compliance with its reporting obligations. Detailed information, including the latest statistical data, is also requested on the progressive realization of economic, social and cultural rights in East Jerusalem, keeping in mind the concerns raised by the Committee in the relevant paragraphs of these concluding observations. In addition, the Committee also requests updated information on the target dates for recognizing unrecognized villages and a plan for the delivery of basic services, including water, electricity, access roads, health care and primary education, to which the villagers are entitled as citizens of Israel. The Committee requests that the additional information also include an update of the Outline Plan of Ein Hod and on progress in the recognition of Arab El-Na'im, as well as an update on the Jahalin Bedouins who are presently camped in Abu Dis awaiting a court decision on their resettlement. The Committee requests the submission of the detailed additional information in this respect in time for the twenty-third session of the Committee in November-December 2000.

33. The Committee calls upon the State party to undertake the necessary steps to ensure the full legal application of the Covenant within the domestic legal order.

34. The Committee calls upon the State party to ensure equality of treatment of all Israeli citizens in relation to all Covenant rights.

35. The Committee urges the State party to review the status of its relationship with the World Zionist Organization/Jewish Agency and its subsidiaries, including the Jewish National Fund, with a view to remedying the problems identified in paragraph 11 above.

36. In order to ensure respect of article 1 (2) of the Covenant and to ensure equality of treatment and non-discrimination, the Committee strongly recommends a review of re-entry policies for Palestinians who wish to re-establish their domicile in their homeland, with a view to bringing such policies level with the Law of Return as applied to Jews.

37. The Committee calls upon the State party to take all necessary steps to reduce unemployment and to ensure proper enforcement of Israel's protective labour legislation, including assigning additional personnel to enforce such legislation. Special attention should be accorded to enforcing the Minimum Wage Law, the Equal Pay for Men and Women Law, and the Equal Opportunities in Employment Law.

38. The Committee calls upon the State party to complete the process of implementing the Law of Equality for People with Disabilities and to address the problem of accessibility to public buildings, including schools, and public transportation by persons with disabilities.

39. The Committee urges the State party to respect the right to self-determination as recognized in article 1 (2) of the Covenant, which provides that "in no way may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence". Closure restricts the movement of people and goods, cutting off access to external markets and to income derived from employment and livelihood. The Committee also calls upon the Government to give full effect to its obligations under the Covenant and, as a matter of the highest priority, to undertake to ensure safe passage at checkpoints for Palestinian medical staff and people seeking treatment, the unhampered flow of essential foodstuffs and supplies, the safe conduct of students and teachers to and from schools, and the reunification of families separated by closures.

40. The Committee calls upon the State party to reassess its Permanent Residency Law with a view to ensuring that its implementation does not result in impeding the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights by Palestinians in East Jerusalem. In particular, the Committee urges the State party to remove the quota system currently in place so that families separated by residency rules can be reunited without delay.

41. The Committee calls upon the State party to cease the practices of facilitating the building of illegal settlements and constructing bypass roads, expropriating land, water and resources, demolishing houses and arbitrary evictions. The Committee urges the State party immediately to take steps to respect and implement the right to an adequate standard of living, including housing, of the Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem and the Palestinian Arabs in the mixed cities. The Committee strongly recommends equal access to housing and settlement on State land for the "present absentees" who are citizens of Israel. The Committee recalls in this connection its General Comment No. 4.

42. The Committee urges the State party to recognize the existing Arab Bedouin villages, the land rights of the inhabitants and their right to basic services, including water.

43. The Committee calls upon the State party to undertake measures addressing the inequalities in the educational system at the secondary and university levels, particularly in terms of budget allocations. The Committee recommends that a study be made of the viability of establishing an Arab university within Israel for the purpose of ensuring equal opportunities and access to higher education in the respective official languages.

44. The Committee urges the State party to adopt effective measures to combat domestic violence against women and to promote equal treatment of women in the field of employment, including in the Government and in education and health.

45. The Committee requests the State party to ensure the wide dissemination in Israel of these concluding observations.

46. The Committee reiterates that the additional information requested in these concluding observations should be submitted in time for the twenty-third session of the Committee in November-December 2000.

ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

Additional information submitted by States parties to the Covenant following the consideration of their reports by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Addendum

ISRAEL*

[20 April 2001]

* At its 31st, 32nd and 33rd meetings held on 17 and 18 November 1998 (E/C.12/1998/SR.31, 32 and 33), the Committee considered the initial report of Israel on the rights referred to in articles 1 to 15 of the Covenant (E/1990/5/Add.39).

As requested by the Committee in its concluding observations (E/C.12/1/Add.27), the Government of Israel submitted additional information relating to the consideration of that report by the Committee, which is reproduced in the present document.

Introduction

1. This document includes:

(a) Additional information requested by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (hereinafter “The Committee”) in its concluding observations (E/C.12/1/Add.27 of 4 December 1998, paragraph 32; hereinafter “concluding observations”);

(b) Replies to the concluding observations of the Committee, based on the relevant parts of the State of Israel’s second periodical report on the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), due to be submitted to the Committee by 31 March 2001 (hereinafter “the second report”). The data in the aforementioned report includes all available data up to August 2000.

I. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

A. Applicability of the ICESCR to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip

2. In its concluding observations on Israel’s initial report, the Committee questioned Israel’s position regarding the applicability of the ICESCR to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel has consistently maintained that the Covenant does not apply to areas that are not subject to its sovereign territory and jurisdiction. This position is based on the well-established distinction between human rights and humanitarian law under international law. Accordingly, in Israel’s view, the Committee’s mandate cannot relate to events in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, inasmuch as they are part and parcel of the context of armed conflict as distinct from a relationship of human rights.

3. Furthermore, pursuant to the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement of 1995,¹ and the consequent documentation and undertakings of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO),² the overwhelming majority of powers and responsibilities in all civil spheres (including economic, social and cultural), as well as a variety of security issues, have been transferred to the Palestinian Council, which in any event is directly responsible and accountable vis-à-vis the entire Palestinian population of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip with regard to such issues. In light of this changing reality, and the jurisdiction of the Palestinian Council in these areas, Israel cannot be internationally responsible for ensuring the rights under the ICESCR in these areas.

4. The fact that the Palestinian Council does not represent a State does not, in itself, preclude its responsibility in the sphere of human rights protection. In fact, this is also evident under article XIX of the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, according to which the Palestinians have taken it upon themselves to exercise their powers and responsibilities “with due regard to internationally accepted norms and principles of human rights and the rule of law”. Similarly, under article II (C) (4) of the Wye River Memorandum, the Palestinian Police is obliged “to exercise its powers and responsibilities with due regard to internationally accepted norms of human rights and the rule of law, and be guided by the need to protect the public, respect human dignity and avoid harassment”.

5. In this respect, it should be noted that without prejudice to its basic position, Israel has been willing - and, in fact, has done so in the context of its oral presentation of its initial report - to cooperate with the Committee and provide relevant information to the extent possible, with regard to the exercise of those powers and responsibilities, which according to the agreements reached with the Palestinians, continue to be exercised by Israel in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

B. The population in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem

6. The Committee showed particular concern for the realization of economic, social and cultural rights by Arab residents in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. This warrants some comment in light of the historical, cultural and demographic background.

7. In the light of some 3,000 years of history, it is somewhat unusual that the distinction between the eastern and western areas of Jerusalem is based solely on the 19-year period between 1948 and 1967, when Jerusalem was divided. From 1948 to 1967, eastern Jerusalem was a cluster of villages with a rural character and was never developed. Since 1967, eastern Jerusalem has developed into a modern urban environment. Western Jerusalem, on the other hand, was throughout the period a modern capital city, whose neighbourhoods had developed since 1914 according to urban plans based on the city's special topography. Thus, in 1967, at the reunification of Jerusalem, significant gaps in urban development existed between the eastern and western parts of Jerusalem.

8. The villages located in the eastern sector of the city developed from family settlements, and the tendency was for small parcels of land to be owned by a variety of private landlords. Land registration was not systematic or up to date, and thus ownership is unclear and there are many instances of more than one claim to ownership of the same parcel of land. Urban planning is based on land ownership; redesigning and updating the registration system prior to preparation of urban plans involves extensive surveying, and this process is as yet incomplete.

9. As a result, there are many cases of inability to prove land ownership, or of two landlords claiming ownership of the same parcel of land. The municipality of Jerusalem has a policy of accepting affidavits regarding ownership from village Mukhtars or neighbours.

10. In these villages, private considerations traditionally take precedence over communal interests. Thus, projects such as road building, which the residents may want, are problematic as they involve taxation and land expropriation. In fact, residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem are not required to participate directly in the cost of developing or renewing the infrastructure of their neighbourhoods, while residents of western Jerusalem are obliged to make substantial contributions towards the costs of such projects.

11. In 1967, residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem used wells to obtain water. The reunification of Jerusalem necessitated the unification of all infrastructure systems. Accordingly effective water and sewage systems have now been set in place.

12. Natural increase in the population in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem has always exceeded the natural increase of the Jewish population. In 1967, the city's population consisted of 197,000 Jews (74.2 per cent) and 68,000 Arabs (25.8 per cent). In 1999, the Jewish population of the city had grown to 429,000 (69 per cent of the population), while the Arab population had grown to 193,000 (31 per cent of the population).

13. The increase in the number of housing units built since 1967 corresponds to the proportions of the population - as do current plans to build 15,000 new housing units in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem and 35,000 in the Jewish sector.

14. The traditional rural buildings in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem consisted of detached homes for the extended family on privately owned land. This proved to be very land-consuming, in comparison with the apartment blocks which characterize Jewish neighbourhoods. In the Arab sector, there is an average of 11 people living in 1.9 housing units per dunam (approximately $\frac{1}{4}$ acre) of land, while in the Jewish sector the figure is 19 people living in 5.9 units per dunam of land.

15. Much of the public building in the western neighbourhoods of Jerusalem has been financed by private donations received from the Jewish Diaspora, whereas the Municipality of Jerusalem and the government finance public building in all parts of the city.

16. The Municipality of Jerusalem has given priority to a development programme for eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, in coordination with the Government of Israel. The total sum required to bridge the gap is estimated at 520 million New Israeli Shekels (NIS). The Government allocated NIS 450 million for this purpose. The sum of NIS 60.1 million was allocated by the Government in 1999 especially for the development of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem.

17. Between 1997 and 1999 a number of important projects were completed in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. This included the construction of roads (NIS 42 million), improvements to existing roads (NIS 40 million), water and sewage systems (NIS 40 million), community centres (NIS 10 million) and other projects (NIS 47 million) for a total of NIS 179 million.

18. Town plans are in the process of being prepared for all neighbourhoods of the city. Whereas in the Jewish neighbourhoods it takes an average of three years to establish such plans, in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, the historical factors outlined above cause the process to take considerably longer.

19. In Jerusalem, the policy has been to plan development in cooperation with the residents of the eastern neighbourhoods; for example in Tsur Baher, near Har Homa, 400 units to be built on government land will be marketed by an Arab association. The area has been re-zoned to allow for more intensive construction: 75 per cent of the land may be built on, as opposed to the 50 per cent which had been originally allocated.

20. At A-Sawaneh, a camp for homeless people had been set up on land belonging to the WAKF (Moslem Charitable Endowment), where a special education school was planned. The WAKF tacitly cooperated with the Municipality in evicting the residents of the camp and gave the land to the school, which was built by the Municipality.

21. All building plans are subject to approval by the District Planning and Building Committee. The rate of application for building permits corresponds approximately with the percentages of the population. In the first half of 1999, approximately 20 per cent of the total number of applications were received from residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. Of the total applications for building permits which were received, approximately 60 per cent of those submitted by residents of the eastern neighbourhoods were approved and approximately 67 per cent of those submitted by residents of western Jerusalem were approved. In western Jerusalem, building infringements almost invariably consist of illegal additions built onto a legal building, such as a room in a courtyard or an attic added in a roof space. In the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, they typically take the form of entire buildings illegally constructed without a permit. Thus, demolitions in the eastern part of Jerusalem are far more extensive than in the western part of the city.

22. With respect to the demolition of illegally constructed buildings, the policy of the Municipality of Jerusalem is to issue a demolition order where the construction of such illegally constructed buildings interferes with plans for public facilities, such as schools or roads, or with the city's historical heritage. The Interior Ministry also has the authority to demolish illegal buildings. During the past years, there has been a growing trend of constructing buildings in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem which have been constructed without a permit. In 1997 the total number of such illegal new buildings was 202, in 1998 it was 485 and in 1999 it was 554. Only a small number of demolition orders are actually carried out each year.

Figures for the period between 1 January 1999–30 June 1999

	The western neighbourhoods of Jerusalem	The eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem
Applications for Administrative Demolition orders	9 orders	50 orders
Administrative Demolition orders carried out	4 orders	11 orders

It should be stressed that all demolitions are conducted with due process and subject to judicial review.

C. “Unrecognized villages”

23. Please refer to section II.M.4 in the Replies below.

D. An outline plan for the delivery of basic services to unrecognized villages

24. The situation regarding delivery of basic services to unrecognized villages is described below in the section II.M.4. As stated there, an outline plan for the villages without basic services has been established in specific governmental decisions and actions.

E. Situation in Ein Hod and Arab El-Naim

25. This issue is addressed below in section II.M.4. The village Arab El-Naim will be recognized when its plans are completed and approved. With respect to Ein Hod, its building plans are completed and await approval. When these plans are approved, it will be possible to go forward with infrastructure plans (electricity, water, sewage and communication).

F. The Jahalin Bedouins

26. The Committee showed particular concern for the situation of the Jahalin Bedouin families. This is a nomad Bedouin tribe which has never had a permanent residence. After the city of Ma'ale Edomim was built, the Jahalin took up residence near the city, on land which had already been purchased by other people.

27. The Jahalin filed a complaint with Israel's Supreme Court in 1996. The Supreme Court rejected their claim for the land. The court determined that the Jahalin came to that site only after the city had been built.

28. The Government then sought to move the Jahalin families to another site approximately one kilometre away from the previous site. The new site is located near a main road and is near a Palestinian settlement, which can provide them with civic services.

29. Each family was given a plot of land, registered in its name. The Government conducted a land-development project, which included connecting the site with the electrical power grid and laying down water lines. The plans were approved, and it was decided not to collect the taxes and fees that each resident would usually have had to pay with the development plan. Despite the fact that the Jahalin families resided in tents, which they retained, they were also given steel containers in which they could put their belongings. They were also encouraged to build permanent housing. The Government also gave each family that voluntarily moved, a sum of money to assist it during the interim period. These arrangements were agreed upon in the context of a settlement reached following a second petition by the Jahalin families to the Supreme Court, which was given force on 7 February 1999 (the full text of the settlement is enclosed herewith*). In sum, the living conditions of the Jahalin families have improved since their move to the new site.

II. REPLIES

30. The following paragraphs are replies to the Committee's "Principal subjects of concern" set out in the concluding observations (paras. 9-31).

A. Land and People (paragraph 8 of the concluding observations)

31. This issue is addressed in the Additional Information in section I.A above.

* Available from the Secretariat.

B. Status of the Covenant (paragraph 9 of the concluding observations)

32. The draft Basic Law: Social Rights was discussed in the initial report. The Committee stated that its wording did not meet the requirements of Israel's obligations under the Covenant. The draft Basic Law: Social Rights is no longer pending in the Knesset. The future of such legislation is not clear. However, the rights protected by the Covenant are a part of the ongoing public debate in Israel and appear in regular curricula of law faculties. Moreover, economic, social and cultural rights are increasingly recognized as constitutional rights in Israeli jurisprudence. Further details will be submitted with Israel's second periodic report.

C. Equality for non-Jewish citizens (paragraph 10 of the concluding observations)

33. The Committee noted its concern that an excessive emphasis upon the Jewish character of the State may encourage discrimination. In this context, it is important to note a decision taken by the Government of Israel in October 2000 directly relating to this issue. This decision followed thorough preparatory work, involving most governmental agencies. The decision states in general that:

“The Government of Israel regards itself as obligated to act to grant equal and fair conditions to Israeli Arabs in the socio-economic sphere, in particular in the areas of education, housing and employment.

“The Government of Israel regards the socio-economic development of the Arab-sector communities of Israel as contributing toward the growth and development of all of Israel's society and economy.

“The Government shall act for the socio-economic development and advancement of the Arab-sector communities and to reduce the gaps between the Arab and Jewish sectors ...”.

34. The gradual implementation of this decision has already begun, but its full realization still awaits the passage in the Knesset of the Annual Budget Law for 2001. This decision reflects the Government's appreciation that progress in closing the gaps between Jews and Arabs has not been satisfactory during the past years.

35. The full text of this decision and further details will be submitted in Israel's second periodic report.

36. Furthermore, during the years 1995-1999 there was a five-year programme of development in the Druze and Circassian sectors. This programme included a budget of NIS 1,070 million (approximately US$ 250 million), which was primarily directed to different objectives, such as sewage, water, roads, electricity, health, housing and others.

37. On 30 July 2000, the Government decided to embark on a programme for the year 2000. This programme gave assistance to 11 local authorities with high rates of unemployment and continuing difficult social-economic conditions. This programme focuses on public utilities, public institutions and infrastructure. Among these authorities are three which contain mixed

Jewish and Arab populations: Lod, Ramla and Acre (which were also mentioned in the concluding observations). In addition, there is also a large Bedouin village included in this programme - Tel Sheva. Further details on this issue will be addressed in Israel's second periodic report.

38. Regarding the status of the Arabic language, under directive number 21.556A of the Attorney-General, concerning the translation of official documents from Arabic, it is prohibited to demand that a citizen must translate into Hebrew an official document which is in the Arabic language, such as a marriage certificate, a divorce certificate, etc. as long as this certificate was issued by an authority which is recognized by the State of Israel. In addition, the Attorney-General's directive prescribes that the Government must make its legal forms available in both Hebrew and Arabic. Furthermore, under a specific directive issued by the Attorney-General to the Ministry of Transportation, new car licence plates may carry the name of the State of Israel in Arabic as well as in Hebrew. The aims of the new directive are to emphasize the official status of the Arabic language in Israel, as well as to increase consciousness to the needs of minorities in Israel.

39. In another directive, the Attorney-General has directed all legal advisers of the civil service that all public tenders are to be published in both an Arabic language newspaper and a Hebrew one, as well as to be made available on the Internet. The directive stresses that it is prohibited to distinguish between public tenders according to their relevance to the Arab sector. Furthermore, the duty to translate the public tenders into Arabic rests with the Government.

40. Further details on the status of the Arabic language will be addressed in Israel's second periodic report.

D. "Institutional equality" (paragraph 11 of the concluding observations)

41. Regarding the comment concerning "institutional discrimination", notice should be taken of a recent decision of Israel's Supreme Court in the case of A'dal Ka'adan. The court ruled that it is the duty of the State and of the Israel Land Commission to give equal treatment for all in respect of land use (HCJ 6698/95 A'dal Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration). The petitioners in this case were an Arab couple wishing to build a home in Katzir, a communal settlement in the Eron River region in the north of Israel. The Jewish Agency, in collaboration with the Katzir Cooperative Society, established this settlement in 1982 on State land that had been allocated to the Jewish Agency (via the Israel Lands Administration) for that purpose.

42. The Katzir Cooperative Society only accepted Jewish members. As such, it refused to accept the petitioners and allow them to build their home in the communal settlement of Katzir. The petitioners claimed that the policy constituted discrimination on the basis of religion or nationality and that law with regard to State land prohibits such discrimination.

43. The Supreme Court ruled that land allocation must be on an equal basis, that allotting land for the sole use of Jews in that area was illegal, and that allotting land to the Jewish agency, when the Agency discriminates, is also illegal as it constitutes indirect discrimination. This ruling reinforced the principle of non-discrimination regarding land use, although it was limited to the particular facts of this case. The general issue of use of State lands for the purposes of settlement raises a wide range of questions. First, the decision in the Ka'adan case was not directed at past allocations of State land. Second, it focused on the particular circumstances of the communal settlement of Katzir. In discussing this issue, the Court did not take a position with regard to other types of settlements (such as commune-based kibbutz or moshav).

E. The Jahalin Bedouins (paragraph 12 of the concluding observations)

44. Please refer to paragraphs 26-29 above.

F. The Law of Return (paragraph 13 of the concluding observations)

45. The Committee noted its concern over the discrimination it perceived in Israel's Law of Return. The Israeli Law of Return personifies the very essence of the State of Israel as a "Jewish and Democratic State". During the period from 1939 onwards, it should be recalled that the gates of Mandatory Palestine, and in fact, nearly all countries, were closed to Jewish immigration, thus contributing to the death of millions of Jews in Europe at the hands of Nazi Germany during the Second World War. In the aftermath of the horrors of the War, and following the establishment of the State of Israel, Israel's founders enacted the Law of Return to give formal expression to the three central tenets underlying the establishment of the State as the only homeland for the Jewish people. That is to say, the creation of a Jewish State in the land of Israel, the ingathering of the Jewish exiles, in particular after the unfolding horrors of the Holocaust, and the preservation of a strong bond between the State of Israel and other Jewish communities around the world.

46. The Law of Return of 1950 and the Nationality Law of 1952 provide a right for Jews to immigrate to Israel and to automatically acquire Israeli nationality. This privilege, granted as part of Israel's immigration policy, is clearly a domestic matter, subject to the sovereign discretion of the State. However, it should also be emphasized that non-Jews are not prevented from immigrating to Israel, nor are there any restrictions on any particular group. Non-Jews who wish to acquire Israeli citizenship may duly apply for such citizenship in accordance with Israel's Nationality Law.

47. In this respect, Israel is not different from most other States which, upon attaining their statehood, and in accordance with the principle of self-determination, granted preference for the purpose of obtaining nationality of that State to individuals with certain social, cultural, or ethnic links to the State.

48. The Committee suggested in its concluding observations that the Law of Return should be placed on an equal footing with a Palestinian claim for a right of return. Israel's position maintains that a clear distinction should be drawn between its Law of Return and any Palestinian claim to a right of return. Further, this subject is part of the outstanding issues under negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

G. Employment (paragraph 14 of the concluding observations)

49. The Committee noted its concern over the rapid growth of unemployment in Israel. In fact, most of the increase in unemployment since 1996 stems from a slowdown in economic activity in Israel and from exposure to globalization. Furthermore, an expansion of economic activity beginning in the second quarter of 1999 was accompanied by a decline in the unemployment rate, which had increased from 1996 to 1999, while employment continued its moderate growth.

50. New immigrants, mainly from the former Soviet Union, continue to arrive in Israel, albeit at a slower pace on the average than in the earlier years of the decade. Between 1996 and 1999, Israel's labour force grew by close to 9 per cent, in good part due to the entry of new immigrants into the labour market.

51. During 1997 to 1999, employment increased relatively slowly compared to the five preceding years (2 per cent per year in 1997-1999 as compared to 4.9 per cent per year in 1991-1996). In the period 1997-1999, the rise in employment was particularly pronounced among new immigrants, averaging 9.5 per cent per year. Employment among the very young, aged 15-17, declined by 8 per cent and remained stable among those aged 18-24. Both of these developments reflected the long-term trends in these age groups towards extended education and army service, as well as the effects of the slower economic activity in those years.

52. With respect to unemployment, the highest rates continue to be found among young workers aged 15 through 24. Unemployment was also particularly high among Arabs and other non-Jewish population groups in Israel, as well as among residents of development areas and new immigrants.

53. As mentioned, unemployment has worsened since 1997. Rising unemployment has necessitated a re-evaluation of employment and unemployment policies and measures. To the extent that data for 2000 are available, the trend seems to have been reversed during the year 2000.

54. Relatively small enterprises and enterprises whose products face competition from imports are particularly vulnerable to the slowdown in economic activity in Israel and from exposure to globalization, mentioned above. The employees of such firms are typically older workers and those with low education levels. It is almost certain that in some of these enterprises labour laws are not observed as they should be. Data show that during the past three years long-term unemployment has risen sharply, from 12 per cent to 16-17 per cent of the labour force.

55. Although data for the end of 1999 and the first half of 2000 indicate the possibility of sustained improvement in the employment situation in Israel, the significant rise in unemployment during 1997, 1998 and most of 1999 required the formulation and implementation of new employment policies and measures.

56. In recent years, there has been a growing awareness of the need for government intervention to assist the unemployed whose chances of returning to work would be hampered without such assistance. Various government ministries are involved in income-maintenance programmes and vocational training to help the unemployed.

57. Unemployment among new immigrants continues to be a problem. Unemployment among new immigrants rose steadily from 9.3 per cent in 1996 to 11.4 per cent in 1999. Such rates were substantially above the average for the economy as a whole in those years. From 1997 through 1999, the influx of new immigrants averaged 66,500 per year. The proportion of new immigrants in the labour force rose from 12 per cent in 1996 to 17 per cent in 1999.

58. Programmes to improve job opportunities for new immigrants, as well as the unemployed among other groups in the labour force, have included principally:

- streamlining of the public Employment Service activities to encourage employers to seek workers through the Employment Service and to improve the matching of job vacancies with job seekers;
- temporary employment programmes in the public sector;
- vocational training, retraining and on-the-job training.

59. Regarding unemployment among the Bedouin population, their rate of unemployment today is more than 20 per cent, as measured by generally accepted international definitions, compared to 8.3 per cent among the population as a whole. In recent years, the Government has undertaken projects to reduce the extent of unemployment among the Bedouin, including vocational training for adults and subsidized employment, particularly in areas related to tourism, such as in national parks and at archaeological sites.

60. With respect to unemployment among women, four authorities are presently actively engaged in Israel in promoting employment opportunities for women: the Authority for the Status of Women in the Prime Minister's Office; the Knesset Committee to Advance the Status of Women; the Unit for the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Civil Service Commission; and the Unit for Advancement of Women in the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs.

61. With respect to women's advancement in government service, in 1999 the Unit for the Advancement and Integration of Women brought before the Civil Service Commissioner recommendations to require each government office to carry out a detailed investigation of women's advancement, to set specific goals on women's appointments for each government office, to include the subject of women's status in all educational activities undertaken by the Civil Service Commission and to promote changes in the State Service Law to make the Director-General of each government office directly responsible for implementing the Law in his or her office.

62. With regard to employment opportunities for women in Israel, the Authority for the Status of Women and the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women focused in 1999 and 2000 on the following areas: an initiative to train women soldiers in new military skills reserved in the past for men; an initiative to open new positions in the police force for policewomen with better prospects of advancement and higher salaries; encouragement of Arab women to join the police force; and encouragement of Arab women to train as social workers in the Arab sector, which currently lacks sufficient social workers.

63. The public works programmes were addressed in Israel's initial report. These programmes have been continued since 1996 in an effort to find temporary solutions for the unemployed. The Government's interest in extending the scope of these projects should be noted, particularly among the long-term unemployed who have lost their skills and work habits. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs is developing programmes which combine vocational training and/or general education courses with employment on public works projects to increase the skills of such persons for the long term. Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs data indicate that in 1997, an average of 870 unemployed were working an average of about 18 days per month. This rose in 1998 to 1,280 persons working 17 days per month and, in 1999, to approximately 1,700 persons employed 17 days a month.

64. Further details regarding various employment issues will be addressed in Israel's second periodic report.

H. Employment of persons with disabilities (paragraph 15 of the concluding observations)

65. Regarding the employment situation of persons with disabilities, unfortunately the unemployment rates for such persons are relatively high. In a survey conducted by the Service for the Blind of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, it was found that the rate of unemployment of blind persons was 72 per cent (March 1997). The estimate of the Rehabilitation Department of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs with respect to the rate of unemployment among persons with severe disabilities, physical illness, mental illnesses and retardation is 70-75 per cent. In a needs survey (1992), unemployment levels among deaf people aged 30-64 were found to be at 18-22 per cent. Moreover, experts in this field have indicated professional flaws in the policies of employment rehabilitation of people with disabilities. In particular, they have indicated that there was insufficient referral towards the free market, as opposed to the segregated employment frameworks which fail to utilize the qualifications and personal employment potential of such employees.

66. Persons with disabilities also earn relatively low wages: the Minimum Wage Law, 5747-1987 does not apply to protected enterprises and employees. Section 17 (a) of the Law authorizes the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs to prescribe in Regulations that the provisions of the Law will apply with respect to employees who have physical, mental or intellectual handicaps and are employed in protected enterprises in which the State Treasury participates in their budget. The Minister has not yet enacted such Regulations. In 1997, the Minimum Wage Law was amended (sect. 17 (b)) and the Minister was authorized to prescribe in regulations a reduced minimum wage for persons with disabilities employed in the free market. The regulations have yet to be enacted. (Draft regulations were recently circulated for the comments of the pertinent government ministries and public organizations.)

67. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 1998 regulates the right of people with disabilities to employment equality. Section 8 of the Law prohibits discrimination in employment on the grounds of disability and includes an obligation to make reasonable adjustments. Pursuant to the Law, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs and the Minister of Finance are charged with the enactment of regulations to determine State participation in financing the adjustments. Such regulations have not yet been enacted. Section 9 of the Law prescribes, as a transitional provision for seven years, the duty of a person who employs in excess of 25 employees to ensure a fair representation of persons with disabilities. In addition, section 28 of the Law contains an indirect amendment of the State Service (Appointments) Law, 5719-1959 with respect to the duty of fair representation of persons with disabilities in the State Service. Section 16 of the Law prescribes that the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs shall initiate and develop programmes for employment rehabilitation of people with disabilities and that he shall submit a report each year on this matter to the Labour, Social Welfare and Health Committee of the Knesset. As of the present time, no such report has been submitted to the Knesset. Draft regulations regarding granting priority to persons with disabilities to receive parking spaces at workplaces was recently submitted by the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs to the Labour, Social Welfare and Health Committee of the Knesset, and a meeting was convened for the approval thereof.

68. Last year the Bar Association (Examination Arrangements in the Laws of the State of Israel and Practical Matters) Rules, 5723-1962 were amended, providing as follows:

“(a) With respect to a written examination under Rule 18B, the examining committee, at the request of an examinee who is a person with a disability, within the meaning in the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998, may determine for such person appropriate modifications on account of such disability which shall ensure that he or she will be examined under conditions which are equal, as far as possible, to those of the other examinees.”

69. Altogether, the above-mentioned demonstrates that Israel is making an effort to decrease the unemployment rates among people with disabilities.

I. Minimum Wage (paragraph 16 of the concluding observations)

70. The Committee was concerned that only half of the workers who are entitled to minimum wage actually received it. The reliability of such data is now known to be problematic, due to difficulties in determining the number of workers who are in fact entitled to minimum wage. According to a recent study conducted by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, the percentage of workers who do not receive the legal minimum wage (per hour) is about 5.5 per cent of the whole working population.

71. The Minimum Wage Law, 1987 was revised and strengthened in 1997. This Law is enforced by the Enforcement Division of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. The Ministry's inspectors regularly conduct on-site inspections at workplaces throughout the country. Employers who violate this law are fined or, in rare cases, prosecuted, and are required to pay workers the differences between the actual wages paid and the statutory wages, in accordance with the Law.

72. Enforcement covers all workers: adult Israelis, teenage workers, Palestinian workers, foreign workers and workers hired by manpower contractors. The last three groups were of special concern to the Committee.

74. In 2000, the policy concerning the enforcement of the minimum wage (described in Israel's initial report) was revised. From now on, an extended effort will be made to take legal action against employers violating the law, seeking compensation by the employer for the workers - especially in serious cases. However, the success of this policy depends on adequate means being allocated to the Ministry in the 2001 budget.

75. Among foreign workers, it is estimated that a higher percentage of workers do not receive the legal minimum wage (per hour of work). It is for this reason that much of the enforcement efforts are being directed to this part of the labour market.

J. "Manpower Contractors" (last part of paragraph 16 of the concluding observations)

76. The case of "manpower contractors", which was of particular concern to the Committee, was recently addressed by the Knesset. Responding to such concerns, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs initiated a draft bill in 1999 aimed at radically reforming the existing law. While the Government was still discussing this proposal, a private Knesset member succeeded in passing a private member's bill. As a result, the law was radically amended in 2000.

77. This amendment limits the use of workers through such contractors to a maximum of nine months, plus six additional months by special permit of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs. It also stipulates that a contract worker posted in the same user enterprise over the said time limit will automatically be considered as the user enterprise's employee. Additionally, a contract worker is entitled, from his first day at the user enterprise, to the same rights enjoyed by the user enterprise's employees of similar occupation and seniority at the workplace.

78. This amendment was due to have taken effect in January 2001. It constitutes a major reform, affecting about 6 per cent of the salaried workers in Israel. Thus, a period of time was required before its entry into force. However, even this period now seems insufficient, at least for the public sector. The amendment necessitates a reconsideration of the form of employment of thousands of contract workers posted in the public sector. Thus, the Government has requested the Knesset to postpone the entry into force of this amendment until January 2002, in order to complete its reorganization. This request is still pending in the Knesset, within the legislative drafts accompanying the passage of the annual governmental budgets.

79. In addition, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs has used his enforcement powers against many employment agencies, when complaints and inquiries have shown infractions of the law, including the legal obligations of an agency as an employer. Such administrative activities have produced in one or more of the following results:

- (a) Reimbursement by the agency of sums due to its employees;
- (b) Limiting the scope of an agency's activities until fulfilment of certain conditions;
- (c) Appointing an accountant to verify compliance by an agency of certain fiscal conditions;

(d) Penal indictment, mainly to enforce the prohibition against operating an agency without a permit;

(e) Cancellation of a permit.

80. Finally, it should be noted that the number of authorized employment agencies in Israel has now reached 300. It is noteworthy that more than 100 agencies which were operating before the entry in force of the law in 1996 have ceased to operate following its implementation.

K. Closures (paragraphs 17-19 of the concluding observations)

81. From 1998 through September 2000 (the last relevant date for the requested additional information), there were only five closures per year. Most of these were on non-working days in Israel. In the year 2000, up until September, only two days of closure were enforced. These closures were coordinated with the Palestinian Authority. Prior to September 2000 - the date of the current outbreak of violence in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip - closures were not an issue that affected the daily life of the Palestinian population.

82. Prior to September 2000, any person with a job who satisfied certain criteria received a permit to enter Israel to work. This included being married, being over 21 years old, having children and no previous involvement in criminal activities.

L. Permanent residency (paragraph 20 of the concluding observations)

83. A significant change has occurred on this subject since the Committee's comment. On 31 October 1999, the criteria pertaining to the loss of residency changed, following a petition to Israel's Supreme Court, in the case of The Centre for the Protection of the Individual v. The Minister of the Interior (HCJ 2227/98). This case is still pending before the Court. The original criteria had determined that any resident who moves his or her centre of life outside of Israel for seven years or more would lose his residency. Under the new policy, this rule is not applied to a person who maintains a "proper link" to Israel during the said period. Furthermore, persons who have lost their permanent residence status since 1995 may now regain it: persons who visited Israel since leaving the country and who have lived here for two years will be viewed as having received a new permanent residence permit since their arrival. Whoever lost his or her permanent residency status without notice from the Ministry of the Interior will be viewed as having a permanent residence permit if he or she visited Israel during the time that his or her Leaving Card is valid. These new criteria are more lenient. They were enacted to minimize the retroactive aspect of this directive and to increase the transparency of this process. (The Committee had been concerned about both of these issues.)

84. The Committee further expressed concern with the process of family reunification for foreign spouses. This process is a gradual process, which lasts approximately five years from the day of the request. During the waiting period the spouse receives visiting visas and temporary residency licences, so that he or she can work and live in Israel.

85. The probation period test has three criteria: (a) whether the spouse is indeed a genuine spouse; (b) whether the spouse is not a risk to the security of Israel or to public safety; and (c) whether the spouse's centre of life is in Israel. At the end of this process the spouse receives a permanent residency license.

86. Since 1990, there have been approximately 10,000 reunification applications in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, most of which were received between the years 1994 and 1995. Due to lack of manpower, combined with the high number of applicants, the length of time that it took to complete the process increased. In 1999, the Interior Ministry increased the number of personnel dealing with these requests, creating a special team for this purpose. Since then the length of time needed to complete this process has decreased, and the whole process became more efficient. As of now, all requests filed up to the year 2000 have been dealt with. During 2001 it should be possible to give immediate response to each application. However, a final response may still take months, since the process is a complicated one.

87. Of the 10,000 applications, 6,000 are in various stages of the process. Most of the applicants have received visiting and residency permits, and live in Israel with their spouses. Seven hundred applicants have completed the process to receive a permanent residency permit and are now permanent residents. The remainder have received a negative answer to their application. Negative answers are due to failure to meet the various criteria: sincerity of marriage, that the spouse's centre of life is in Israel, or a criminal or security problem.

88. Israel's Supreme Court, in its decision in HCJ 3648/97 Stamka v. The Minister of Internal Affairs, ruled that there must be equality in the status of spouses of Jewish and non-Jewish Israeli citizens concerning the acquisition of Israeli citizenship by marriage. This was done by upholding a change in the Ministry of the Interior's policy, which no longer favours Jewish citizens by automatically granting citizenship to their foreign national-spouses. The Supreme Court held that section 4 (a) of the Law of Return should apply solely to the spouses of new Jewish immigrants, and not to those of Israeli Jewish citizens, regardless of their ethnic origin.

M. Land use and housing

1. Eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem (paragraphs 21-22 of the concluding observations)

89. See section I.B in the Additional Information above.

2. Arab neighbourhoods in cities with mixed Jewish and Arab populations (paragraph 23 of the concluding observations)

90. The situation in cities with mixed Jewish and Arab populations, such as Jaffa and Lod, was of concern to the Committee. This situation has been addressed by two Government decisions, already mentioned. In one decision, on 30 January 2000, the Government decided to embark on a programme for the year 2000. This programme gives assistance to 11 local authorities with high rates of unemployment and continuing difficult social-economic conditions.

The programme focuses on public utilities, public institutions and infrastructure. Among these authorities are three municipalities with mixed Jewish and Arab populations: Lod, Ramla and Acre. Further details on this issue will be submitted in Israel's second periodic report.

3. Israeli settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip
(paragraph 24 of the concluding observations)

91. Please refer to Israel's position on the applicability of the Covenant in this regard as set out in section I.A of the Additional Information above.

4. The Bedouin unrecognized villages - provision of basic utilities and status (paragraphs 26 and 28 of the concluding observations)

Provision of basic utilities

92. A recent budget proposal for the years 2001-2004 requests the allocation of NIS 1,195,050,000, based on a four-year plan, for the completion of development and infrastructure in the existing Bedouin towns. This is a significant sum, which is to be used to complete the infrastructure in existing Bedouin settlements to construct water and sewage infrastructure where it is incomplete and for the establishment of public facilities such as schools, clinics, etc.

93. The total funds allocated to the Bedouin sector within Israel's budget for the year 2000 were increased threefold in comparison to the period of Israel's initial report.

94. Water is allocated to the Bedouin community living in illegally constructed villages through the "Water Connections Allocation Committee". Within the last three years, the total number of connections to the water main lines has increased from 60 connections to 260 connections. Except for 50,000 of the Bedouin population, all of the unrecognized villages have a connection to water services. The 50 per cent of the Bedouin population who live outside the recognized settlements are allowed to tap into the National Water Carrier system at designated sites in order to bring drinking water to their homes.

95. The establishment of a sewage system is under the authority of the local municipalities. The minority local municipalities receive generous loans for this purpose which exceed those furnished to Jewish local municipalities.

96. The Israeli Government seeks to establish six new "Service Centres" for the Bedouins living in the Negev. When completed, these centres will contain facilities for various service providers, ranging from educational facilities, religious centres and health centres to shopping and industrial facilities. It is planned that these centres will be built outside of existing towns, with the purpose of serving as a basis for new Bedouin towns.

97. Since Israel's initial report, new industry and trade centres have been built in Hura, Segev Shalom and Aroer.

98. Electricity. Until 1996, most unrecognized villages could not be connected to electricity as a result of section 157A of the Planning and Building Law which prohibited the connection to the electricity grid of illegally built buildings (i.e. buildings not having received building permits or which deviated from the terms of such permits). This section was introduced to provide an effective sanction against the disregard by builders of planning regulations. The provision, which also prohibits hook-up of water and telephones, applies equally to the entire population. However, the Knesset decided to mitigate the effect of the section on the Bedouin unrecognized villages and passed a special law (The Supply of Electricity (Special Provisions) Law, 1996) allowing the connection of illegally constructed buildings in a large number of Bedouin villages to the electricity grid, provided that there was no outstanding court order to demolish the building and that it was built prior to Section 157A coming into force (1987). The special law should facilitate the connection of approximately 10,000 buildings to the electricity grid. To date 4,000 buildings, mostly in unrecognized villages, have been approved for connection.

99. Health. Since Israel's initial report, five additional Health Fund medical clinics (Kupat Holim) were built to provide for the needs of Bedouin living outside the Bedouin towns, raising the total of such clinics to seven. In addition, five new Mother and Child Health Clinics (Tipat Halav) have recently been built in Bedouin towns.

100. The infant mortality rate of Bedouin in the Negev is 13 per 1,000 population. Of these, 5.8 per 1,000 die of congenital malformations and inherited diseases, more than double the average national rate. This is due to a very high rate of first cousin-marriages (above 45 per cent) and second-cousin marriages (above 10 per cent) in this population. For the past six years, the Ministry of Health has been funding a programme aiming at reducing infant mortality, through a multiphase, multidisciplinary programme. This programme has been designed in concert with the Bedouin population to be culturally appropriate and culturally sensitive.

101. Education. Regarding education, it should be emphasized that pupils in unrecognized villages are entitled to the same level of education as all other pupils in Israel. However, it is not possible to build elementary and high schools in every village, whether recognized or not. Thus, 11 per cent of the pupils in Israel (Jews and non-Jews) study at regional schools that serve rural localities. Thus, it is not uncommon that even recognized localities do not have their own local schools.

102. Pupils in the non-Jewish sector who reside in localities that have no recognized municipal status attend schools in recognized localities. However, there are logistic difficulties in providing access to schools for pupils from unrecognized villages, since schools are built in accordance with approved zoning plans to meet primarily the needs of the recognized settlements. However, in any case, transportation services to schools are provided by the State for most pupils in unrecognized villages.

103. Furthermore, the special situation of pupils from unrecognized villages is given consideration by the education authorities. The education system allocates extra resources (primarily study hours) to schools whose pupils suffer from environmentally caused academic disadvantages. A special index is used to determine the eligibility of schools to receive such additional resources and one of the criteria of this index in the non-Jewish sector is the inclusion of pupils from unrecognized villages. In other words, the higher the percentage of pupils who come from families that reside in unrecognized villages, the more resources are allocated to the school. Thus, schools with pupils from unrecognized villages receive additional teaching hours which enable them to deal with the specific problems of this population (most notably, poor domestic complementary studying conditions).

104. All the Bedouin pupils study in 53 primary schools and 10 secondary schools. In the unrecognized settlements there are 15 primary schools and 80 kindergartens for children from the age of three.

105. The education system in the Bedouin sector faces many difficulties that are partially due to the unique Bedouin style of life in a plethora of unplanned settlements and to their culture:

(a) Girls drop out of school at a young age because they get married or due to cultural traditions;

(b) Boys leave the education system early to enter the work force;

(c) Polygamy (up to 4-5 wives per man) raises the birth rate (5 per cent per year), causes irreparable psychological damage to children, as well as unemployment, neglected and destroyed homes, low educational achievements, etc.;

(d) Many Bedouin pupils prefer to receive a certificate at the end of 12 years of education, instead of a matriculation certificate.

106. Nevertheless, in recent years there has been a remarkable improvement in the situation of the Bedouin education system:

(a) The number of pupils, and especially female pupils, is continually increasing. This means that the phenomenon of dropping out of the school system is continually decreasing;

(b) The educational achievements in primary education have improved during the last two years due to an intensive programme of pedagogical intervention;

(c) A retired Jewish principal has been assigned to every school principal to provide guidance both in the area of education and in management;

(d) A computerized centre has been established to reduce the phenomenon of school drop-outs. There is a computerized follow-up of pupils at risk and much effort is being invested in bringing them back to their studies;

(e) Ben-Gurion University and the Kaye College have strengthened the teaching forces in the secondary education system in order to increase the number of pupils who receive matriculation certificates. Over the last three years the number of pupils receiving matriculation certificates has constantly increased, from 10 per cent to 32 per cent;

(f) The number of Bedouin teachers in the system continues to increase. Today they make up 60 per cent of all the teachers in the Bedouin educational sector system in contrast to four years ago when they comprised only 40 per cent of the teachers.

Comparative statistics, by year, in the Bedouin educational sector

107. Right to plant. The Government is not aware of any policy which denies landowners the right to plant fruits and vegetables. It may be the case that such restrictions are imposed on illegal occupiers of land.

Planning

108. A few preliminary points should be noted. There have been no expropriations of Bedouin land since 1989, aside from expropriation for the purpose of road or railroad construction. The last expropriation, which occurred in 1989, was done for the purpose of building a new Bedouin town.

109. The information received by the Committee regarding ownership claims on Bedouin lands is inaccurate. The Land Settlements Department was not established to address Bedouin land claims, but was established by the British Mandatory government in the 1930s to deal with various land claims in the absence of legally registered rights in Mandatory Palestine. Since then, the Department has addressed title claims involving all sectors of the population in Israel, including, inter alia, Bedouin claims. Legal title must be proven before the Department in accordance with the rules laid down by law, and the Department has little, if any discretion in the matter. It can neither grant title where none has been proven, nor revoke title where it has been established.

110. Bedouin land claims are dealt with by the Department in the same manner in which all such claims are treated. Near the end of 1998, 3,274 such claims were presented by Bedouins claiming a total of 730,000 dunams. The Land Rights Settlement Ordinance [New Version], 1969 authorizes the Department to admit land claims if proof of registered ownership or uninterrupted possession is provided. However, in many cases Bedouin claims are not supported by proper documentation establishing ownership. Furthermore, Bedouin land title claims are often exorbitant, and cover huge areas of land through which they moved during the years, without maintaining continuous possession. Thus, most claims do not satisfy the legal requirements provided in the law.

111. Nonetheless, in an attempt to come up with pragmatic solutions, the Government has decided to approve financial settlement with the Bedouins. In 168 cases, a settlement has been reached and in 527 other cases the Government has expropriated the land in question and is negotiating a financial settlement (to date, compensation has already been paid for 46,000 dunams of the 75,000 taken). The Department is negotiating a settlement for the remaining 2,500 land claims raised by the Bedouins, covering an area of 550,000 dunams.

112. Finally, hardly any of the illegal Bedouin houses in the Negev have been demolished within the last two years. According to recent estimates, there are currently over 60,000 illegal houses in the Negev.

Planning - the Bedouin sector in the north

113. In 1998, the Government decided to embark upon a five-year programme to develop the Bedouin settlements in the north. The budget for this programme should be NIS 615 million (approximately US$ 154 million), from 1999 to 2003. This programme encompasses many subjects, including developing new neighbourhoods, building public institutions, building roads, sewage, industrial areas, improving the education system, building social services institutions and more. This programme has been in progress since 1999, although it has not been fully implemented in every area, because of administration problems.

114. The following table provides information concerning several prior decisions to give a legal municipal status to several "unrecognized villages". These villages are currently in different stages of the process for approving the plans. Settlements with approved plans may go forward with infrastructure plans (electricity, water, sewage and communication). These settlements are:

	North District	Haifa District
Plans in planning stages	1. Sawaid Hamira 2. Arab El-Naim
Plans in approval stages	1. Hussnia 2. Ras El-Ein	1. Ein Hod
Plans approved	1. Dmeira 2. Kamane	1. Hawaled 2. El Arian

115. As can be seen in the above table, the village of Arab El-Naim will be recognized after its plans are completed and approved. Ein Hod's building plans are completed and await approval (both these settlements were of special concern to the Committee).

Planning - the Bedouin sector in the south

116. There are now, according to estimates, more than 120,000 Bedouins living in the Negev desert area, in the south of Israel, with a yearly population growth rate of about 5.8 per cent .

117. In 1999, the Government decided on the establishment of up to five new Bedouin towns. Under a special new arrangement made for the compensation of Bedouins moving into towns or recognized villages, Bedouins shall not be charged for the land in the new village. Moreover, they shall receive significant compensation for any property they had to abandon at the illegal settlement.

118. A new proposal seeks to establish four additional Bedouin settlements: two villages, a suburban town and an agricultural village. In addition, two new neighbourhoods are to be built in existing towns.

119. The aforementioned decisions gained the support of the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education and the General Health Fund. Each of these will be responsible for the establishment of its institutions in the new settlements, in order to provide for the establishment of an infrastructure of schools and health services.

120. On 21 August 2000 the Government decided to embark upon a new policy regarding the Bedouin population in the south. The purpose of this new programme is to close the social and economic gaps which exist between this population group and the rest of the population.

121. The Government's new programme includes the building of new settlements for the Bedouin sector. An attempt will be made to meet the requirements of the Bedouin population for additional land. However, ownership of land will no longer be a precondition for supplying services. New settlements have already been decided upon and will include Mareit (Darajat), Beit-Pelet, and Beit-Hil. Regarding these new settlements, plans were already presented to the planning institutions for approval. The new settlements of Hawashla, UmBetin, Tarabin AlSana, and Molada are still in the planning stage.

122. To sum up the planning situation in the south:

	South District
Plans in planning stages	Hawashla, UmBetin, Tarabin AlSana, and Molada
Plans in approval stages	Tarabin A-Sana Beit Pelet, Mareit and Be'er Hail Kochle
Plans approved

N. Regional master plans (paragraph 27 of the concluding observations)

123. The Committee was concerned with the Regional Master Plans for the North District of Israel and for the Negev. This issue concerns more the needs of the Israeli Arabs than the Bedouin "unrecognized villages" situation, which was dealt with in the preceding section.

124. It should be noted that a new district plan for the North District of Israel was deposited on 7 September 1999. Most of the development suggested in the new plan is in the central sector of the Galilee, where 41 per cent of the Jewish population in the district resides and 82 per cent of the Arab population in the district resides. The accelerated development of this sector will increase the standard of living for both population groups, and especially the Arab population because of its more substantial weight. Furthermore, the plan gives special consideration to the special demographic needs of the Arab population, which are greater than those of the Jewish population group.

125. New Arab settlements are not in planning due to a policy the purpose of which is to develop existing settlements. This policy was adopted on the basis of trend analysis and interviews with the heads of the Arab population. This is linked with the phenomenon of illegal construction in the Arab sector, which is in itself a complex issue.

126. The Arab population growth rate is 3 per cent per year. The number of new families that need housing is about 10,000 a year. A large part of the Arab population solve this housing problem within the confines of existing familial housing (by enlarging an existing house or adding another building in a family courtyard). Every year the pressure for adding more plots and enlarging existing settlements grows. The phenomenon of illegal construction is fuelled by these factors.

127. Illegal construction occurs, in part, on land owned by a family which is not approved for residence. Additional instances of illegal construction take place by seizing public lands. Ordinarily, Arab housing is in single-story buildings, in low-density construction. With time these buildings become multi-storey buildings through enlargement for descendants. The only high-density construction in the Arab sector is in Jewish-Arab communities or mostly Jewish communities. Since the size of such communities cannot increase indefinitely, and since the problem worsens each year, there is a growing need to move toward multi-storey (high-density construction).

128. Regarding the Negev area in the south of the country, a new district plan was approved on 23 January 2000. Among this plan's goals are to integrate the Bedouin population in the south. It increases the area of the Bedouin city of Rahat and of six other Bedouin settlements.

129. The Bedouins, however, have petitioned Israel's Supreme Court, contending that the district plan does not reflect their need for rural settlements. The petition is currently pending before the Court.

130. It should be noted that in a recent survey conducted by the Government, out of 74 communities with mostly Arab population, 37 had approved local plans, while the rest were in various stages of approval or planning.

O. Disparities in the educational system (paragraph 29 of the concluding observations)

131. The issue of eliminating disparities in the educational system in Israel is a priority on Israel's agenda. The main priorities for the Ministry of Education beginning in 1999 were: closing the gaps by raising peripheral municipalities and weak population groups; affirmative action for the Arab educational system; elevating special education; increasing the number of students with matriculation entitlement. Further details on this issue will be included in Israel's second periodic report.

132. The gap between the Arab and Druze pupils and their Jewish counterparts is still evident. The Arab and Druze sectors receive relatively higher rates of construction budgets. Furthermore, the five-year programme begun in 1991 has been completed after narrowing but not closing the mentioned gap. The Ministry of Education has therefore put affirmative action at the head of its agenda. In 1999, the Ministry of Education embarked on a new five-year programme and other activities. These are intended to equalize the educational and budgetary standards of these sectors with that of the Jewish education sector.

133. The Ministry of Education has allocated an extra budget of NIS 250 million (approximately US$ 62.5 million), over a period of five years, beginning in the year 2000. A steering committee for the programme has determined a basic programme for its application, based on the recommendations of three different committees.

134. The programme's main goals include:

- (a) Increasing the number of pupils eligible for matriculation;
- (b) Reducing dropouts;

- (c) Increasing the amount of teaching classes;
- (d) Improving the psychological assistance and the counselling sectors;
- (e) Improving the special education;
- (f) Improving the technological education;
- (g) Training the teaching, psychological and counselling staffs.

135. The programme operated in the following areas in 2000:

- (a) It upgraded 1,526 computer stations;
- (b) It gave scientific equipment to kindergartens and primary education schools;
- (c) It increased the number of pupils eligible for matriculation;
- (d) It developed curricula;
- (e) It trained teaching staff.

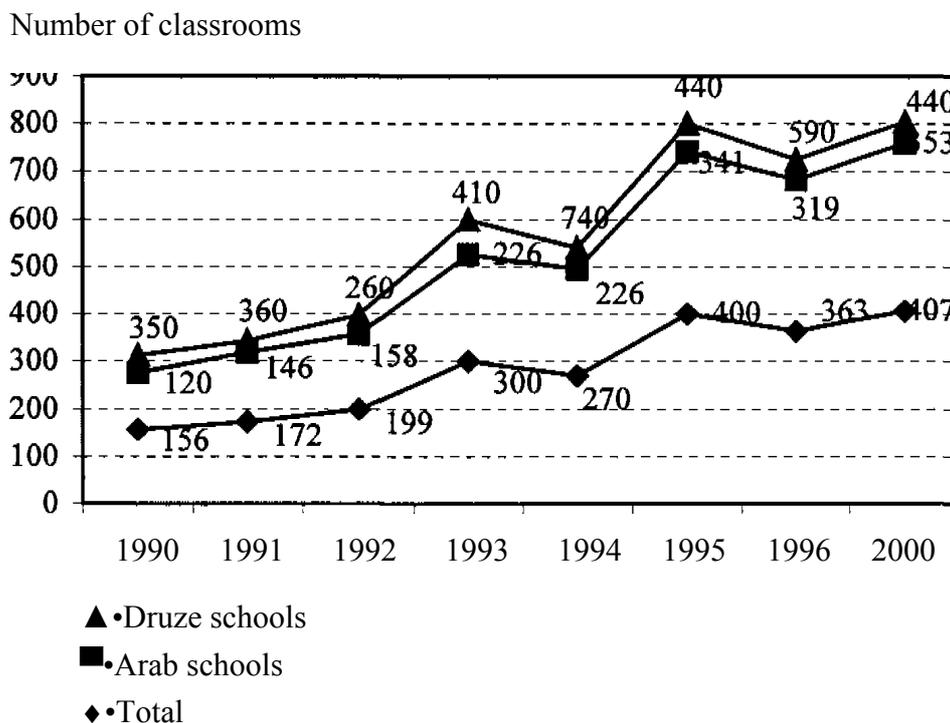

136. Disparities between the Arab sector and the rest of the population still exist, especially in post-secondary education. The gaps are even larger when observing only the female population. The rate of Arab students attaining matriculation is about half that of the Jewish sector, and among these only a quarter apply to universities. Among the Jewish population, only about 5.5 per cent do not work or study, compared to 14.3 per cent in the Arab population. Only about 25 per cent of the Arab sector study in technological education, compared to about 30 per cent for the rest of the population. Half of the classes in Arab technological education are at a level of study which is not sufficient to qualify them for the matriculation examinations.

137. These gaps are the reason for the policy of affirmative action taken by the Ministry of Education.

138. Further details on these issues will be included in Israel's Second Periodic Report.

139. Apart from the aforementioned activities of the Ministry of Education, one should recall the recent governmental decision on affirmative action in the Arab sector (reported in the Replies in paragraph 33 above).

P. The National Health Insurance Law (paragraph 30 of the concluding observations)

140. The Committee's statement regarding the changes in the National Health Insurance Law (as amended by the Arrangements Law for the year 1998) is partially inaccurate. There is no periodic health tax that is linked to the amount of health services needed, but rather a requirement for a minimal co-payment for certain services, in a manner designed to minimize the impact on the weaker socio-economic groups.

141. At the inception of the National Health Insurance Law in 1995, residents were required by the health-care services providers (four in number) to make co-payments for medications. One health-care service provider also required co-payments for visits to medical specialists. In 1998, the other three providers were authorized to require co-payments in various minimal amounts for visits to specialists and certain outpatient clinics. The co-payments are permitted once per calendar quarter per specialist visited, subject to a quarterly maximum payment per individual and a maximum payment per family, regardless of the number of family members for which the family head is responsible.

142. The change in the National Health Insurance Law was made in order to allow greater financial flexibility for the health-care providers, as an incentive to reduce unnecessary use of medical services, and to reduce the budget deficits of the health-care providers. In order to avoid harming the weakest socio-economic groups and to minimize the impact on others, the co-payment requirement is subject to the following limitations:

- (a) Residents receiving supplemental income payments pursuant to the National Insurance Law are exempt;
- (b) Residents receiving support payments pursuant to the Maintenance (Assurance of Payment) Law are exempt;
- (c) Residents receiving invalidity or disability payments pursuant to the National Insurance Law are exempt;
- (d) Residents who have AIDS, cancer, kidney disease requiring dialysis or other specified illnesses are partially exempt;
- (e) There is no co-payment requirement for visits to primary care physicians, paediatricians, gynaecologists or internal medicine specialist.

143. In addition to the exemptions specified above, the Ministry of Health periodically reviews the impact of the co-payment requirement to determine if changes are warranted.

144. Additionally, it must be noted that the "basket of services" which is provided to insured persons pursuant to the National Health Insurance Law is reviewed at least annually, and medical technologies and procedures, as well as new medications, are added.

Q. Domestic violence against women (paragraph 31 of the concluding observations)

145. This issue was of concern to the Committee. Protection from violence is provided at 12 shelters for battered women, located throughout Israel. Due to their particular cultural and religious needs, there are special Centres for Arab women and for ultra-Orthodox Jewish women. Together, these shelters provide emergency intervention for nearly 1,600 women and children yearly. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs covers 75 per cent of the cost of these shelters, and the remaining 25 per cent is provided by women's volunteer organizations. In recognition of the particular needs of the Arab community, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs covers 100 per cent of the operating costs of such shelter.

146. The shelters provide professional counselling, legal advice and assistance, childcare and rehabilitation. Several shelters also have multilingual staff and volunteers in order to assist immigrant women. Children continue in community-based day-care or elementary school frameworks while residing in the shelter. However, some shelters restrict, for reasons of space, the number of children a woman can bring with her to the shelter. Of course, this restriction creates an untenable conflict for some women. In addition, there are 30 transitional apartments which provide women with additional options when they are ready to leave the shelters.

147. A unique shelter for abusive men who have been removed from their homes by court orders, has been established. In this shelter, the men receive group and individual treatment, as well as consciousness-raising and behaviour modification opportunities.
148. At least 10 hotlines are devoted to battered women throughout the country; one is devoted to Arabic speakers, while Russian and Amharic speakers are available on most of the others. Callers receive advice and information from trained volunteers.
149. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (AASW) has initiated a programme of workshops in all government ministries regarding violence against women.
150. Police treatment of domestic violence: police personnel currently receive special training for dealing with family violence. Police policy provides that domestic violence be treated as a violent crime and that the victim be protected. Furthermore, the police may continue to investigate a complaint of violence even if the woman withdraws her complaint. However, as in most countries, the majority of abused women do not file complaints with the police.
151. The police also have the prerogative of filing a report even if the abused woman declines to do so. Women's organizations report that cooperation with the police is generally effective, and the Minister of Public Security has appointed an Adviser on Violence against Women.
152. There are 25 Centres for the Prevention of Violence in the Family located throughout the country. These centres are jointly funded and administered by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, women's organizations and the local authorities. The centres provide direct treatment, visiting centres where parents and children who have been separated can meet (under supervision, if necessary), legal advice, research and information.
153. A women's NGO, in conjunction with Physicians for Human Rights, has developed a project to train multidisciplinary emergency room staff and to improve their sensitivity and their treatment of women suffering from battering and violence. The three-session training course includes lectures and small-group workshops, as well as work with the hospital's administration and management. Based on a pilot trial, the project has been extended to four hospitals.
154. The law has recognized the "Battered Women's Syndrome", acknowledging the right of a battered woman to defend herself against her attacker and effectively broadening the definition of "self-defence".
155. Furthermore, the Knesset has passed an amendment to the Penal Code to allow the courts to impose more lenient sentences on victims of severe abuse who have been convicted of murdering the perpetrator of the abuse. While the amendment is not limited to abuse within the family, it seems that this will be among its most important applications.
156. Israel's eight rape crisis centres receive over 10,000 referrals each year. These centres also maintain hotlines and provide educational services. Public support for the rape crisis centres remains low; donations provide most of the support. The centres report that while police directives are meant to provide sensitive and effective care for the victim, the implementation of these directives is not uniform throughout the country. Moreover, in Israel, as in other countries, assaulted women are often reluctant to contact the police.

157. In March 1995, the Knesset appointed a Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry to investigate the subject of women murdered by their spouses and life partners. The mandate of the Committee was further broadened to include the investigation of violence against women. The Inquiry Committee presented its conclusions and recommendations in June 1996. This comprehensive report analysed the causes of domestic violence, the adequacy and efficacy of existing services, and gaps in the provision of service. The report presented comprehensive, integrated and binding recommendations to each of the relevant ministries.

158. The Government decided in 1998 to establish an inter-ministerial committee to deal with issues of law enforcement and strengthening of existing services. The committee was chaired by the Director-General of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and included representatives from the Prime Minister's Office, the AASW, the Ministry of Public Security, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education and women's organizations. In 1997/98, the Prime Minister's office sponsored a national media campaign against violence against women, including a National Hotline and Referral Service.

Introduction

1. Israel ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (hereafter - the Covenant) in August 1991. The Covenant entered into force with respect to Israel on 3 January 1992. The following is the second periodic report submitted by Israel pursuant to articles 16-17 of the Covenant and of the guidelines issued by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.
2. The present report presents information pertaining to changes that have occurred since the initial report submitted by Israel in November 1997 (hereafter - the initial report). This information relies on the same sources that were used for the initial report. This report follows the initial report's editing. It reflects all data available as of August 2000.
3. Mr. Michael Atlan, Adv., has prepared the report with the help of Mr. Guy Lurie, on behalf of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and under the supervision of the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.
4. Annexed to the report are recent specialized publications and legal texts, including a comprehensive and updated version of all labour laws in Israel (annex I).*

Applicability of the Covenant to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip

5. In its concluding observations on Israel's initial report, the Committee questioned Israel's position regarding the applicability of the Covenant to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel has consistently maintained that the Covenant does not apply to areas that are not subject to its sovereign territory and jurisdiction. This position is based on the well-established distinction between human rights and humanitarian law under international law. Accordingly, in Israel's view, the Committee's mandate cannot relate to events in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, inasmuch as they are part and parcel of the context of armed conflict as distinct from a relationship of human rights.
6. Furthermore, pursuant to the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement of 1995,¹ and the consequent documentation and undertakings of the Palestine Liberation Organization,² the overwhelming majority of powers and responsibilities in all civil spheres (including economic, social and cultural), as well as a variety of security issues, have been transferred to the Palestinian Council, which in any event is directly responsible and accountable vis-à-vis the entire Palestinian population of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip with regard to such issues. In light of this changing reality, and the jurisdiction of the Palestinian Council in these areas, Israel cannot be internationally responsible for ensuring the rights under the Covenant in these areas.

* Texts of the annexes can be consulted in the files of the secretariat.

7. The fact that the Palestinian Council does not represent a State, does not, in itself, preclude its responsibility in the sphere of human rights protection. In fact, this is also evident under article XIX of the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, according to which the Palestinians have taken it upon themselves to exercise their powers and responsibilities “with due regard to internationally accepted norms and principles of human rights and the rule of law”. Similarly, under article II (c) (4) of the Wye River Memorandum, the Palestinian Police is obliged “to exercise its powers and responsibilities with due regard to internationally accepted norms of human rights and the rule of law, and be guided by the need to protect the public, respect human dignity and avoid harassment”.

8. In this respect, it should be noted that without prejudice to its basic position, Israel has been willing - and, in fact, has done so in the context of its oral presentation of its initial periodic report - to cooperate with the Committee and provide relevant information to the extent possible, with regard to the exercise of those powers and responsibilities, which according to the agreements reached with the Palestinians, continue to be exercised by Israel in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Article 1 of the Covenant: self-determination

9. No change has occurred on this subject since Israel’s initial report.

Article 2 - general principles: State responsibility, non-discrimination and international cooperation

1. State responsibility

10. Economic, social and cultural rights continue to be widely recognized in Israel, whether directly by law, regulations or case law, or indirectly by administrative programmes.

11. The trend of legalization of welfare in Israel, described in the initial report, has continued since then. The two best examples are the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 1998 (the English translation is provided in annex II;* additional discussion on this Law is included below under this report on article 2); the Infants at Risk Law, 2000 (there is still no English translation available at present; see further on this law under article 10).

Economic, social and cultural rights as constitutional rights

12. Israel’s draft Basic Law: Social Rights, which was reported in Israel’s initial report, is no longer pending in the Knesset. The future of such legislation is still not clear. However, the rights protected by the Covenant are now part of the ongoing public debate and appear in regular curricula of law faculties. Moreover, the economic, social and cultural rights are more and more recognized as constitutional rights in the jurisprudence of Israel’s Supreme Court. We would like to point out two basic approaches to this matter.

* Texts of the annexes can be consulted in the file of the secretariat.

13. The first is an interpretative approach. In the initial report, mention was made that Justice Aharon Barak, the Supreme Court President, had given his opinion in academic writings that the “right to decent conditions of living” should be construed as being included in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (Barak, 1994, pp. 416-417). It was also stated that no case on this subject had yet been brought before the Supreme Court. This interpretative approach is now apparent in a few recent judicial decisions, even though there is still no binding precedent supporting it.

14. In a recent judgement, delivered on 19 March 2001 by the Supreme Court in the case of Gamzo v. Ishayahu (REC 4905/98) the Court used the said approach for the purpose of interpreting the Enforcement of Judgments Law - 1967. This law grants discretionary power to spread alimony payments when necessary due to “special reasons”. The court ruled that these “special reasons” include protecting the “hard core” of the right to a minimal standard of living, the right to adequate food and the right to proper health care of both the debtor and the holder of the right to alimony. The court added (holding with the said “interpretive approach”) that the “hard core” of these rights is protected by the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

15. In a National Labour Court Case (1997/4-265) Hassid v. The National Insurance Institute (NII), the National Labour Court adjudicated a homeless person’s claim of entitlement to income benefits from the NII, despite his inability to support the application with details of his address, which are necessary to verify the authenticity of the application. The Court interpreted the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty as encompassing within its scope of protection a commitment on the part of the State to ensure a minimum standard of living, and held that the Income Support Law must be read in light of this Basic Law. The Court thus ruled that the NII wrongfully rejected the plaintiff’s application and ordered it to reprocess the application, notwithstanding the incompleteness of the information.

16. In C.A. 3275/98, Welfare Officer, the City of Holon v. Anonymous, the Tel Aviv District Court reviewed a request by the social services for an Order to perform an operation on a two-year-old girl. Her mother, a Moldavian citizen, who left Israel shortly after giving birth to the girl, had deserted the girl. The Court held that by accepting the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the State took upon itself the obligation to provide children with the highest attainable level of health, and ordered that a medical procedure necessary to improve the girl’s quality of life be performed regardless of her nationality.

17. A second approach recognizes economic, social and cultural rights as autonomous constitutional values. This path was taken in a decision issued in 1998 (H.C. 450/97), Tnuffah, Manpower Services and Maintenance Ltd. v. Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, in which the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of legislation requiring manpower contractors to deposit with the Ministry of Labour and Social Services a bank guaranty to ensure the fulfilment of their obligations vis-à-vis their employees. The Court held that while this requirement places limits on the freedom of occupation, such a restriction is necessary and appropriate. In the words of the President of the Court, Justice Aharon Barak (at para. 12):

Defending workers’ rights is a proper purpose; guaranteeing workers’ social security is a proper purpose; observance of a statutory legal framework to protect workers is a proper purpose. Indeed, protection of workers’ rights is of fundamental social importance in our society. For constitutional purposes it is a “proper purpose”. The respondents have been correct to observe that there is a vital public need in regulating the business of manpower contractors and defending the interests of a particularly weak sector of employees.

18. Justice Dorner, went on, in the same case, to call for judicial restraint while protecting the rights to property and freedom of occupation, whenever this has to be balanced against the protection of basic workers’ social rights. She added:

... [We] are dealing with social legislation intended to protect workers. In regard to such legislation, the Court must exercise extreme caution not to harm workers’ rights in order to satisfy individual rights such as freedom of occupation and the right to property.

19. Such duality of approaches is clearly manifested in the wording of Judge Elishevah Barak, currently Deputy President of the National Labour Court. She had already written in a decision issued in 1996, while sitting as a Regional Labour Court Judge, that:

The right to work is also one of the basic human rights and as long as the State of Israel has no Basic Law: Social Rights, one should hold these individual rights as included in human dignity ... This right derives from the notion that human dignity presupposes a minimal human existence ... The right is, in my opinion, included in the term “human dignity” in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, because even though this is a social right, it is a social right of the individual, and not of the public. This right also derives from Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation. This right includes not only the right not to live in the street and not to starve. Human dignity is also impaired when one is forced to inaction, even if one is not starving while earning wages.

(Taba 54/3-289 Dr. Orly Peret v. Dr. Amitzur Farkash)

20. Additional and more specific judicial decisions of this nature can be found in subsequent parts of this report.

21. Lastly, mention should be made of a new section added to the Equal Rights for Women Law, 1951 (sect. 6), in an amendment enacted in April 2000, according to which: “Any woman and man has the equal right to an existence in human dignity, including equality at work, in education, health, housing, environmental protection and social welfare.”

22. This provision clearly assumes the existence of social rights in general, and of the right to decent living conditions in particular, even though it directly prescribes only a norm of equality.

2. Non-discrimination

23. A detailed account of recent application of the non-discrimination principle is given in each chapter of this report. There are mentioned here only issues of general and broad implications. Special attention has been given to the Committee’s concerns and observations in its concluding observations on Israel’s initial report.

Israel and the law of return

24. In its concluding observations on Israel's initial periodic report, the Committee expressed its concern (paragraph 13 of the concluding observations):

“... [T]hat the Law of Return, which permits any Jew from anywhere in the world to immigrate and thereby virtually automatically enjoy residence and obtain citizenship in Israel, discriminates against Palestinians in the diaspora upon whom the Government of Israel has imposed restrictive requirements that make it almost impossible to return to their land of birth.”

25. The Israeli Law of Return personifies the very essence of the State of Israel as a “Jewish and democratic State”. During the period from 1939 onward, it should be recalled that the gates of Mandatory Palestine, and in fact, nearly all countries, were closed to Jewish immigration, thus contributing to the death of millions of Jews in Europe at the hands of Nazi Germany during World War II. In the aftermath of the horrors of World War II, and following the establishment of the State of Israel, Israel's founders enacted the Law of Return to give formal expression to the three central tenets underlying the establishment of the State as the only homeland for the Jewish people. That is to say, the creation of a Jewish State in the land of Israel, the ingathering of the Jewish exiles, in particular after the unfolding horrors of the Holocaust, and the preservation of a strong bond between the State of Israel and other Jewish communities around the world.

26. The Law of Return of 1950 and the Nationality Law of 1952 provide a right for Jews to immigrate to Israel and to automatically acquire Israeli nationality. This privilege, granted as part of Israel's immigration policy, is clearly a domestic matter, subject to the sovereign discretion of the State. However, it should also be emphasized that non-Jews are not prevented from immigrating to Israel, nor are there any restrictions on any particular group. Non-Jews who wish to acquire Israeli citizenship may duly apply for such citizenship in accordance with Israel's Nationality Law.

27. In this respect, Israel is not different from most other States, which upon attaining their statehood, and in accordance with the principle of self-determination, granted preference for the purpose of obtaining nationality of that State to individuals with certain social, cultural, or ethnic links to the State.

28. The Committee suggested in its concluding observations that the Law of Return should be placed on an equal footing with a Palestinian claim for a right of return. Israel's position maintains that a clear distinction should be drawn between its Law of Return and any Palestinian claim to a right of return, and that this subject is presently part of the outstanding issues under negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

Non-discrimination of non-Jews in Israel

29. A recent High Court decision gave great impetus to the principle of non-discrimination of non-Jews in Israel. The court ruled that it is the duty of the State and of the Israel Lands Administration to give equal treatment for all in respect of land use (HCJ 6698/95

A'dal Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration). The petitioners in this case were an Arab couple wishing to build a home in Katzir, a communal settlement in the Eron River region at the north of Israel. The Jewish Agency in collaboration with the Katzir Cooperative Society established this settlement in 1982 on State land that had been allocated to the Jewish Agency (via the Israel Lands Administration) for such a purpose.

30. The Katzir Cooperative Society only accepted Jewish members. As such, it refused to accept the petitioners and allow them to build their home in the communal settlement of Katzir. The petitioners claimed that the policy constituted discrimination on the basis of religion or nationality and that the law with regard to State land prohibits such discrimination.

31. The Supreme Court ruled that land allocation must be on an equal basis, that allotting land for the sole use of Jews in that area was illegal, and that allotting land to the Jewish Agency, when the Agency discriminates, is also illegal as it constitutes indirect discrimination. This ruling reinforced the principle of non-discrimination regarding land use, although it was limited to the particular facts of this case. The general issue of use of State lands for the purposes of settlement raises a wide range of questions. First, the decision in the Ka'adan case is not directed at past allocations of State land. Secondly, it focused on the particular circumstances of the communal settlement of Katzir. In discussing this issue, the Court did not take a position with regard to other types of settlements (such as commune-based kibbutz or moshav).

A multi-year plan for development of Arab-sector communities

32. Like the Committee, the Israeli Government is also concerned about the need to eliminate gaps between Jews and Arabs in Israel. The following is a comprehensive government resolution, taken in October 2000, regarding all aspects of social development of Arab-sector communities. This decision was taken following thorough preparatory work involving most governmental agencies. The decision, translated in full from the original Hebrew version, is as follows:

“In general

- (A) The Government of Israel regards itself as obligated to act to grant equal and fair conditions to Israeli Arabs in the socio-economic sphere, in particular in the areas of education, housing and employment.
- (B) The Government of Israel regards the socio-economic development of the Arab-sector communities of Israel as contributing toward the growth and development of all of Israel's society and economy.
- (C) The Government shall act for the socio-economic development and advancement of the Arab-sector communities and to reduce the gaps between the Arab and Jewish sectors, pursuant to the following plan, as set forth by the Prime Minister's Office and the Ministerial Committee on Arab-sector Affairs in cooperation with the Director-General of the Prime Minister's Office and the representatives of the Arab authorities.

- (D) The development plan is based on working jointly with the Arab authorities. This cooperation lays down a position on the recovery plans implemented through the Ministry of the Interior in the various authorities, as well as on the maintenance of good management (the application of municipal bylaws, collection of municipal taxes, compliance with construction laws, etc.).
- (E) The cost of the development plan for the Arab-sector communities shall total NIS 4 billion for the years 2001-2004 (attached are pages 20-23 detailed table - Appendix 1). This sum includes an additional sum of NIS 2 billion in excess of the existing development budgets in the government ministries for the Arab-sector communities, including NIS 1 billion as an additional payment from the Ministry of Finance for the budget of the ministries. These budgets include the share of the Arab-sector communities in the development budgets of the government ministries designated for the entire population and include all the development budgets for the sector during the term of the plan.
- (F) The development plan shall incorporate Arab local authorities and Arab communities located within regional councils (attached are pages 24-26, list of communities - Appendix 2).
- (G) An inter-ministerial team, headed by the Prime Minister's Office and with the participation of the Ministry of Finance and other ministerial representatives, as required, shall coordinate the workings of the staff, including the mode of implementation, planning the operations, priorities, budgetary amounts and timetables for performance. The inter-ministerial team shall oversee and control the mode of implementation of the development plan by the government ministries and, in cooperation with the representatives of the Arab sector, shall perform an annual evaluation in relation to performance of the plan.

The Ministry of Construction and Housing - NIS 23 million;

The Ministry of Finance - NIS 32 million.

The plan includes NIS 1.025 million per year in the neighbourhoods physical restoration clause - for the purpose of renovating dwellings owned by elderly people living alone. The communities are: Kfar Manda, Kfar Kana, Mashad, Tamra, Majd el-Kroom.

The scheme shall include budgets from the Ministries of Transport, Interior and Construction and Housing for the roads and internal routes as stated in this Resolution and shall be implemented jointly by three government ministries: the Ministry of Construction and Housing, the Ministry of Transport and the Ministry of the Interior, coordinated and administered by the Ministry of Construction and Housing and the Prime Minister's Office.

(B) Development of new neighbourhoods using high-density construction

1. The Ministry of Construction and Housing shall allocate NIS 120 million for development of new neighbourhoods in the Arab-sector communities, to be constructed using high-density public building, mainly on State lands, a total of 5,000 dwelling units, averaging NIS 30 million for each of the years 2001-2004, pursuant to existing arrangements between the ministries and the arrangements to be agreed upon between the ministries following the examination referred to in clause 3 below.

2. Locating the lands for high-density construction shall be implemented in coordination with the Israel Lands Administration, the Ministry of the Interior and the local authorities. The Israel Lands Administration shall transfer the authority for planning and development to the Ministry of Construction and Housing, at its request, for implementation of the plan.

3. The standard of development in the new neighbourhoods shall meet acceptable standards, such that the cost thereof shall not exceed NIS 70,000 per residential unit. The amount of subsidy in the high-density construction shall not exceed NIS 35,000 per residential unit. Those communities to benefit from the subsidy shall be those on the map of national priority areas. Furthermore, the feasibility of encouraging such neighbourhoods in those communities located outside the priority areas shall also be examined.

4. The Ministry of Construction and Housing shall allocate an additional NIS 40 million for the development of new neighbourhoods on private lands located within the bounds of the Arab-sector communities to be constructed using high-density public construction in a total of not less than 50 dwelling units per neighbourhood; NIS 10 million on average for each of the years 2001-2004.

By developing new neighbourhoods on private lands, the aid will include funding for planning (at the detailed plan stage), in addition to contributions toward development in an amount not exceeding 50% of the approved infrastructure tariffs up to a ceiling of NIS 20,000 per residential unit. The budget shall be given to those neighbourhoods and buildings where building permits have been granted after 1 January 2001.

5. Construction density on the sites to be chosen pursuant to this chapter shall not be below six residential units per dunam (net).

(C) Development of public institutions

1. The Ministry of Construction and Housing shall allocate NIS 320 million as participation in the construction of public institutions for cultural, social and sports activities in the Arab-sector communities, an average of NIS 80 million for the years 2001-2004, where the sources of funding shall be as follows:

The Ministry of Construction and Housing - NIS 10 million;

The Ministry of Finance - NIS 70 million.

33. The implementation of this decision has already begun, but its full realization still awaits the passage in the Knesset of the annual budget law for the year 2001.

Amendment of the Equal Rights for Women Law, 1951 (2000)

34. A comprehensive amendment of the Equal Rights for Women Law, 1951 was enacted in April 2000. Please refer to a detailed description of this law provided below under the discussion of article 3 (see also at the end of paragraph 1 above).

Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 1996: Background

35. On 23 February 1998, the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 1998 (hereinafter: the "Equality Law") was adopted by the Knesset, anchoring for the first time the right to equality and human dignity of people with disabilities and creating a new system of obligations for the State of Israel vis-à-vis its disabled residents. The principal impetus for enactment of the Equality Law was “The Report of the Public Committee to Review Comprehensive Legislation in the Matter of the Rights of People with Disabilities” (hereinafter the “Public Committee”) which was submitted to the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs in July 1997.

36. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law came into effect on 1 January 1999. The law, which was eventually adopted by the Knesset, was only part of the original proposed bill. It includes basic principles, general principles, equality of employment, accessibility to public transportation and establishment of a commission on equal rights for people with disabilities. The remaining chapters of the bill were re-tabled before the Fifteenth Knesset within the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999. This bill passed its preliminary reading (22 December 1999) and is currently being debated in the Labour, Social Welfare and Health Committee of the Knesset.

37. On 1 August 2000, the establishment of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Commission was formally announced, and it is presently in its formative stages. Nevertheless, although two years have elapsed since the entry of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law into effect, the majority of its provisions have not yet been fully implemented.

38. At the same time, and as shall be elaborated hereunder, laws and legislative amendments are being enacted in specific areas promoting the state of rights of particular groups of people with disabilities (the mentally ill, disabled infants, mentally retarded persons, etc.).

39. On 5 October 1999 a strike was conducted by handicapped persons in Israel, demanding that the Israeli Government grant them basic living conditions and, specifically, the correction of flaws in the area of National Insurance benefits. After 37 days of demonstrating in front of the Ministry of Finance, the Government decided to respond to the demands of the persons with disabilities, and improvements were made to the entitlements of those persons with severe disabilities, in the area of mobility allowances and special services allowances.

Accessibility

40. Most public buildings and sites in Israel are inaccessible to people with disabilities who are wheelchair-bound. (Government offices, local authority offices, schools, universities, coffee houses, theatres, restaurants, courts, and others.)

41. An amendment to the Planning and Building Law, 5728-1968, and accompanying regulations at the beginning of the 1980s provided that a building permit would not be granted for a public building if no special arrangements for handicapped persons had been provided for in the plans. However, this arrangement only applied to public buildings. Moreover, the arrangement was based on a distinction between Type A public buildings and Type B public buildings, where the latter, which include, for example, schools, government ministries and local authorities, were only obliged to make special arrangements on one floor in order to obtain a building permit. The Local Authorities (Provisions for Disabled Persons) Law, 5748-1988, obliges local authorities to lower sidewalks on pedestrian crossings and junctions. Even these minimal provisions are not enforced as they should be.

42. In general, public transportation in Israel is, to a large extent, inaccessible for persons with disabilities. There are no public buses which a wheelchair-bound person is able to utilize.

43. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law provides people with disabilities with a right of access to public transportation (city buses, trains, boats, air transport) and charges the Minister of Transport with the enactment of regulations to determine the modes of transportation and the times for arranging accessibility. These regulations have not yet been enacted. Recently a petition was submitted to the High Court of Justice by 20 organizations acting to advance the equality of people with disabilities. In an interim order, the Court ordered the Minister of Transport to submit draft regulations to the Knesset by the commencement of the winter session.

44. There was a recent importation of a new type of taxi-cab suitable for wheelchair-confined persons.

45. The Knesset and Prime Minister Elections Law (Consolidated Version), 5729-1969, prescribes an unequal arrangement concerning the accessibility of polling stations for people with disabilities, primarily aimed at providing at least one accessible polling station for every 20,000 residents. A similar arrangement is provided in the Local Authorities (Elections) Law, 5725-1965. Following a petition to the High Court of Justice on the eve of the last elections for the Fifteenth Knesset and Prime Minister, the Elections Law was amended by a transitional provision whereby every person with mobility disabilities may vote in his own area of residence at any polling station for disabled persons, by a method of "double envelopes". This transitional provision is essentially not valid with respect to future elections.

46. Information services are not accessible to people with sensory disabilities (people who are visually challenged, the blind, people who are hard of hearing or deaf).

47. Television programmes are not accessible to people who are hard of hearing or deaf: the Deaf Persons Relief Law, 5752-1992 includes two provisions requiring the Broadcasting Authority: (a) to translate at least one news programme a week into sign language; (b) to accompany a quarter of those broadcasts which are not live broadcasts with subtitles - Hebrew broadcasts with Hebrew subtitles, and Arabic broadcasts with subtitles in Arabic. As a result of two petitions to the High Court of Justice (1994), every Thursday the Broadcasting Authority now translates the late night news into sign language. This programme is broadcast at 23h 30. A petition was recently filed (22 August 2000) in the High Court of Justice by the Bekol Association, an organization for the hard of hearing and hearing impaired, requesting an order that the Broadcasting Authority fulfil its obligation under the Deaf Persons Relief Law and accompany one-quarter of its aforesaid broadcasts with subtitles. An interim order was granted by the court.

48. Unfortunately, women with disabilities still face severe discrimination in the area of access to health services, in general, and in particular in the area of gynaecological care.

49. The proposed bill on equal rights for people with disabilities which is now pending before the Knesset and which was mentioned above, includes an innovative and comprehensive arrangement in the area of physical, sensory and social accessibility.

Employment

50. Unfortunately, unemployment rates among people with disabilities are relatively high. In a survey conducted by the Service for the Blind of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, it was found that the rate of unemployment of blind persons was 72 per cent (March 1997). The estimate of the Rehabilitation Department of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare with respect to the rate of unemployment among people with severe disabilities, physical illness, mental illnesses and retardation is 70-75 per cent unemployment. In a needs survey (1992), unemployment levels among deaf people aged 30-64 were found to be at 18-22 per cent. Moreover, experts in this field have indicated professional flaws in the policies of employment rehabilitation of people with disabilities in Israel. In particular, these experts have indicated that there is insufficient referral toward the free market, as opposed to segregated employment frameworks which fail to utilize the qualifications and personal employment potential of such employees.

51. People with disabilities in Israel earn low wages. The Minimum Wage Law, 5747-1987 does not apply to protected enterprises and employees who “earn” several hundred shekels, unrelated to their output. Section 17 (a) of the Law authorizes the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs to prescribe in Regulations that the provisions of the Law will apply with respect to employees who have physical, mental or intellectual handicaps and are employed in protected enterprises in which the State Treasury participates in their budget. The Minister of Labour and Social Affairs has yet to enact such Regulations. In 1997, the Minimum Wage Law was amended (section 17 (b)) and the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs was authorized to prescribe in regulations a reduced minimum wage for people with disabilities employed in the free market. The regulations have yet to be enacted. (Draft regulations were recently circulated for the comments of the relevant government ministries and public organizations.)

52. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law stipulates the right of people with disabilities to employment equality. Section 8 of the law prohibits discrimination in employment on the grounds of disability and includes an obligation to make reasonable adjustments. Pursuant to the Law, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs and the Minister of Finance are charged with the enactment of regulations to determine State participation in financing the adjustments. Such regulations have not yet been enacted. Section 9 of the Law prescribes, as a transitional provision for seven years, the duty of a person who employs in excess of 25 employees to ensure fair representation of people with disabilities. In addition, section 28 of the Law contains an indirect amendment to the State Service (Appointments) Law, 5719-1959 with respect to the duty of fair representation of people with disabilities in the State Service.

53. Since the date that this law came into effect, no activity has yet been undertaken to promote the aforesaid fair representation. Section 16 of the law prescribes that the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs shall initiate and develop programmes for employment rehabilitation of people with disabilities and that he shall submit a report each year on this matter to the Labour, Social Welfare and Health Committee of the Knesset. As of the present time, no such report has been submitted to the Knesset. Draft regulations regarding the granting of priority to people with disabilities in being given parking spaces at workplaces was recently submitted by the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs to the Labour, Social Welfare and Health Committee of the Knesset and a meeting was convened for the approval thereof. Last year the Bar Association (Examination Arrangements in the Laws of the State of Israel and Practical Matters) Rules, 5723-1962 was amended, and it now provides as follows:

(a) With respect to a written examination under Rule 18B, the examining committee, at the request of an examinee who is a person with a disability, within the meaning in the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998, may determine for such person appropriate modifications on account of the disability which shall ensure that he or she will be examined under conditions which are equal, as far as possible, to those of the other examinees.

Community housing (art. 11 of the Covenant)

54. One of the problems that people with disabilities are still facing in Israel is the preference for institutional frameworks, as opposed to living in the community, particularly for mentally-handicapped and mentally ill people. Thousands of people with disabilities in Israel live in remote and crowded institutions, outside the community and under depersonalized conditions, severely infringing upon their privacy and personal autonomy.

55. Leading professionals in this field have already determined that the quality of life and development of people with disabilities at all levels improves when they live in the community, in their natural environment. The situation in Israel stands in contrast to this:

(a) Out of 7,400 intellectually retarded people living outside their homes, approximately 6,000 of them are living in 53 institutions. New institutions are continually being constructed. Families and associations wishing to exercise the right of mentally retarded people to live in community housing are restrained by the authorities. The major part of the budget in the area of housing for people with disabilities is steered toward institutions;

(b) In Israel there are 6,700 people hospitalized in psychiatric hospitals. Over half of these people are hospitalized only due to a lack of any framework of community housing, rather than on clinical grounds (letter from the Ministry of Health to the Public Committee dated 4 March 1997);

(c) In March 1999, the Public Committee submitted a report on the examination of the condition of mentally ill Holocaust survivors hospitalized in psychiatric hospitals in Israel. The findings were particularly grave with respect to State treatment of these Holocaust survivors;

(d) This phenomenon of institutionalization also includes scores of people with physical disabilities living in institutions and even in hospital.

56. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999, which is currently pending before the Knesset includes an arrangement in the area of housing, principally the anchoring of the right of the disabled person to live in the community and the obligation of the State to grant the disabled person assistance which will guarantee the actual realization of this right.

57. Recently, Amendment 4 to the Welfare (Treatment of Mentally Handicapped Persons) Law, 5729-1969, was enacted by the Knesset. This amendment provides an obligation for the State to allocate resources for housing frameworks and day frameworks for mentally retarded persons and further provides that when determining the type of housing framework, the assessment committee will give priority to community housing.

58. On 5 July 2000, the Rehabilitation of Mentally Disabled People in the Community Law, 5760-2000, was enacted, prescribing the right of a mentally- disabled person to a rehabilitation basket in the community, including in the areas of housing, employment, completion of education, society, leisure and others.

Education (art 13)

59. Pupils, parents and teachers who are wheelchair-bound are unable to enter the large majority of school buildings in Israel, as well as classrooms and various study and social facilities. As stated above (see the section on accessibility above), the law suffices with making one floor accessible in a school, even where there are modern buildings with many floors and levels. Even this minimalist legislation is not sufficiently enforced. In the case of Botzer et al v. "Maccabim-Reut" Local Council et al, 50 (1) P.D. 19, the High Court of Justice determined (in March 1996) the right of a wheelchair-bound pupil to independent, safe and dignified accessibility at school. However, this precedent did not bring about any meaningful change beyond that particular case, and the Ministry of Education has still not prepared any multi-year plan on accessibility in schools in Israel.

60. The objective of the Ministry of Education is to integrate pupils with disabilities into the ordinary education system. However, for many years the view has prevailed in the Ministry of Education that pupils with disabilities who are integrated in regular schools lose their basket of rights under the law. The numerous complaints reaching the Ministry of Education on this matter, and regarding the state of special education in Israel in general, led former Minister of Education, Yossi Sarid, to appoint a "Committee to Examine the Implementation of the Special Education Law". On 20 July 2000, the Committee submitted the report on its recommendations, the main points of which were: recognition of the right of pupils with special needs to study together with children of their own age, to reach results according to their ability by being allowed to realize their potential, and the duty of society to prevent this right from being forfeited, other than in exceptional cases, taking into consideration the wishes of the family.

61. A gap still exists, in the area of special education, between the Jewish sectors and minority sectors: most children with disabilities in the Arab and Bedouin sectors do not study in educational frameworks which meet their needs; schools for special education for minorities which exist in these sectors do not answer the minimum level of conditions required in an educational framework. Children of various ages and with various disabilities study in the same classes, and there is a severe lack of professional personnel to deal with those children having special needs, such as speech therapists, occupational therapists, physiotherapists, and others.

The Ministry of Education recently made a renewed declaration concerning its policy of closing gaps in this area within four years. This period of time is necessary in order to train special teachers in these areas who speak Arabic who will be able to work with such children.

62. The Rehabilitative Day-Care Centres Law, 2000, a private initiative, was recently enacted. This new law sets out the right of an infant with severe disabilities to treatment in a rehabilitative day care centre, on the basis of a basket of services (the Law came into effect on 9 April 2001).

63. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999, which is currently pending before the Knesset includes a chapter anchoring the right of a person with disabilities to education and schooling according to his needs.

Culture and leisure (art. 15)

64. As is generally known, recreation and leisure are taking up increasingly more time in the modern life of individuals. This area is no less important for people with disabilities. Israel has a diverse cultural life. However, people with disabilities, both adults and children, are often not able to partake in such activities as most cultural and leisure sites are still inaccessible to persons with physical or sensory disabilities (see above). Further, most cultural activities taking place are not accessible to people with intellectual retardation. In addition, local governments which are in charge of these areas have no national planning, there is no special department and there is no exclusive budget for activity for people with disabilities. As a result of this lack of appropriate attention to the special needs of adults and children with disabilities in this area, their social isolation increases.

65. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999, which is currently pending before the Knesset includes a provision imposing an obligation on the State to initiate and develop programmes in the areas of culture, leisure and sport for people with disabilities, giving priority to their integration into regular programmes.

3. International cooperation

66. No changes have occurred since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Article 3: Prohibition of discrimination between men and women

67. Since Israel's initial report several important developments have taken place.

The Authority for the Advancement of the Status Women

68. An Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women was established under the auspices of the Prime Minister's Office, in pursuance with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law, 1998. The Authority is invested with advisory powers and may suggest policies to the Government, which are designed to advance women, promote gender equality, eliminate discrimination against women and prevent domestic violence targeted against women. In addition, the Authority supervises, inter alia, the gender policies of the different governmental bodies, monitors the implementation in Israel of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, promotes public awareness on the need to advance women and initiates legislative proposals and research.

69. The following are the main programmes and achievements of the Authority:

- Enforcement of laws relating to women's rights in the workplace, including equal pay, equal opportunities, prevention of discrimination; and shattering of the "glass ceiling";
- Institution of a Programme for Gender Equality in the schools, currently implemented throughout the educational system, from pre-schools through teacher-training colleges throughout the country. This programme is scheduled to run for four years;
- Consolidation and monitoring of funds allocated to the advancement of the status of women in the various ministries and statutory authorities, in order to maximize efficiency;
- Initiation of an out-reach programme for the early detection of breast cancer among hard-to-reach populations;
- Establishment of an informative Web site for women;
- Initiation of a project of informative and educational lectures and programmes for civil servants and in the Israel Defense Forces;
- Sponsorship of a series of literacy projects for women in the Arab and Bedouin sectors; this programme is the result of the express requests of the women themselves; and
- Sponsorship of a project of empowerment among single-parent families headed by women, focusing on skills needed for finding and maintaining employment.

70. A detailed survey of these programmes is provided in the Authority's National Report on the Status of Women in Israel "Beijing 5+", published in June 2000 (and provided in annex III to the present second periodic report).*

* Texts of the annexes can be consulted in the files of the secretariat.

Amendment of the Equal Rights for Women Law, 1951 (2000)

71. The Equal Rights for Women Law, 1951 was comprehensively amended in April 2000. (The full text of the amended law is provided in annex IV to this present Second Periodic Report.)* The following are the principal amendments:

(a) A paragraph was added to state the purpose of the law, which is “to prescribe principles to guarantee full equality between men and women, in the spirit of the principles of the Declaration of Establishment of the State of Israel”;

(b) A provision was introduced permitting affirmative action, in order “to rectify a former or existing discrimination against women” or for the “advancement of equality of women”;

(c) A set of rights were added:

(i) “Any woman or man has an equal right to an existence in human dignity, including equality at work, in education, health, housing, environmental protection and social welfare”;

(ii) The right of a woman concerning her body;

(iii) The right to protection from violence, sexual harassment, sexual abuse and traffic of women;

(iv) The right to adequate representation of women in all public services;

(d) As already mentioned above (under art. 2 in para. 1) the new section 6 states as follows:

Any woman or man has the equal right to an existence in human dignity, including equality at work, in education, health, housing, environmental protection and social welfare.

72. Lastly, mention should be made that all the above provisions shall not affect the validity of any law in force at the eve of commencement of the amending law. This is also true for the regulation of age retirement and pension plans for women regulated by collective agreements.

The Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, 1998

73. Undoubtedly, one of the most progressive pieces of legislation enacted in recent years in Israel has been the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, 5758-1998.

74. This law passed its final reading in the Knesset in 1998 on International Women’s Day and entered into force six months later, on 20 September 1998. During the course of the legislative process, women's NGOs presented their experiences, showing that a significant proportion of Israeli women were subjected to advances, remarks or contact of a sexual nature, which are unwanted and unwelcome, or suffer from threats or offers of remuneration for the purpose of sexual gratification. As in other countries, sexual harassment occurs in the workplace as well as in other social contexts.

75. Prior to the enactment of the law, the only express statutory provision relating to sexual harassment was to be found in section 7 of the Employment (Equal Opportunities) Law, 1988. This provision prohibited explicitly sexual harassment of the "quid pro quo" variety, i.e. adverse treatment in the work context, such as dismissal or denial of work-related benefits, in return for failure to respond to sexual advances. There was no clear statutory provision which related to any other form of sexual harassment, such as the creation of a "hostile work environment", or which dealt with sexual harassment occurring outside the workplace.

76. Benefiting from the social and legal lessons of a number of countries, the new law comprises a number of innovative provisions:

(a) The purpose of the law, as stated in the opening section, "is to protect human dignity, liberty and privacy and to promote equality between the sexes". The wide scope of this section on the purpose of the law was deliberate and based on the experience of a number of countries, where the courts have developed sexual harassment law on the basis of general anti-discrimination provisions. The initiators of the new legislation, which included Dr. Orit Kamir of Hebrew University, Jerusalem, and the Israel Women's Network, were of the opinion that it was important for the new legislation not to fall into the trap of classifying sexual harassment as a problem of discrimination alone. Thus, various questions, such as whether the law relates to sexual harassment of men or same-sex sexual harassment, would be avoided;

(b) At the centre of the new law are the definitions of sexual harassment and "adverse treatment" or "retaliation". The law rejects any kind of objective test, i.e. a test that would define sexual harassment as an act that a reasonable person would treat as harassment. Rather the core definitions of sexual harassment (s.3 (a) (4) and (5)) prescribe a subjective test, requiring the recipient of repeated references or proposals of a sexual nature to show that he or she is not interested in such proposals. "Showing lack of interest" need not be verbal, it can be by conduct, but in general, the law takes the view that recipients must themselves object to acts which are potentially sexual harassment. A number of important exceptions were made to this rule and they appear in the definition of sexual harassment. The exceptions fall into two categories: the first being acts such as indecent acts or blackmail where the act itself is of a serious criminal nature; the second being when the act has been committed by exploiting a position of authority, e.g. education, medical treatment or employment;

(c) Unlike other countries, under the Israeli law sexual harassment and adverse treatment are both criminal offences and civil wrongs, and this dual approach would seem to express the serious view taken by Israeli society in relation to acts of sexual harassment and adverse treatment. The law addresses harassment of women in a broad range of situations, involving relationships of authority and dependence, employment and medical treatment;

(d) Of prime importance are the provisions relating to employers' responsibilities. Based on the law in other countries, such as the United States of America, Canada, United Kingdom and Australia, employers are required to take reasonable measures to prevent the occurrence of sexual harassment or other adverse treatment committed by one of its employees in the work context. Employers and co-workers are also required to institute a complaints procedure. An employer who employs more than 25 employees is required to publish a code of practice on sexual harassment, based on the model code of practice published by the Minister of Justice with the agreement of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs. An employer who does not comply with these special statutory obligations is held to be vicariously liable for acts of sexual harassment committed by his employees in the work context.

77. Feedback received in the last 18 months since the law came into force shows that the law is being implemented, and that there is a dramatic increase in the number of complaints filed concerning sexual harassment, particularly in the workplace and in the army. Women's organizations that campaigned for the law stress that they are now able to give legal assistance to women who have been sexually harassed whereas such women had no legal redress prior to the enactment of the new law. In fact, only recently the Israeli courts convicted a former high-ranking government minister of violating the law, after his former subordinates filed complaints against his alleged misconduct.

Domestic violence against women

78. Protection from violence is provided at 12 shelters for battered women, located throughout the country. Due to their particular cultural and religious needs, there are special centres for Arab women and for ultra-Orthodox Jewish women. Together, these shelters provide emergency intervention for nearly 1,600 women and children yearly. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs covers 75 per cent of the cost of these shelters, and the remaining 25 per cent is provided by women's volunteer organizations. In recognition of the particular needs of the Arab community, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs covers 100 per cent of the operating costs of that shelter.

79. The shelters provide professional counselling, legal advice and assistance, childcare and rehabilitation. Several shelters also have multilingual staff and volunteers in order to assist immigrant women. Children continue in community-based day care or elementary school frameworks while residing in the shelter. However, some shelters restrict, for reasons of space, the number of children a woman can bring with her to the shelter. In addition, there are 30 transitional apartments which provide women with additional options when they are ready to leave the shelters.

80. A unique shelter for abusive men who have been removed from their homes by court injunctions has been established. In this shelter, the men receive group and individual treatment, as well as consciousness-raising and behaviour modification opportunities.

81. At least 10 hotlines are devoted to battered women throughout the country; one is devoted to Arabic speakers, while Russian and Amharic speakers are available on most of the others. Callers receive advice and information from trained volunteers.

82. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (AASW) has initiated a programme of workshops in all government ministries regarding violence against women.

Police treatment of domestic violence

83. Police personnel currently receive special training for dealing with family violence. Police policy provides that domestic violence be treated as a violent crime and that the victim be protected. Furthermore, the police may continue to investigate a complaint of violence even if the woman withdraws her complaint. However, as in most countries, the majority of abused women do not file complaints with the police.

84. The police also have the prerogative of filing a report even if the abused woman declines to do so. Women's organizations report cooperation with the police generally effective, and the Minister of Public Security has appointed an Advisor on Violence Against Women.

85. There are 25 centres for the Prevention of Violence in the Family located throughout the country. These centres are jointly funded and administered by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, women's organizations, and the local authorities. The centres provide direct treatment, visiting centres where parents and children who have been separated can meet (under supervision if necessary), legal advice and research and information.

86. A women's NGO, in conjunction with Physicians for Human Rights, has developed a project to train multidisciplinary emergency room staff and to improve their sensitivity and their treatment of women suffering from battering and violence. The three-session training course includes lectures and small-group workshops, as well as work with the hospital's administration and management. Based on a pilot trial, the project has been extended to four hospitals.

87. The law has recognized the "battered women's syndrome", acknowledging the right of a battered woman to defend herself against her attacker and effectively broadening the definition of "self-defense".

88. Furthermore, the Knesset has passed an amendment to the Penal Code to allow the courts to impose more lenient sentences on victims of severe abuse who have been convicted of murdering the perpetrator of the abuse. While the amendment is not limited to abuse within the family, it seems that this will be among its most important applications.

89. Israel's eight rape crisis centres receive over 10,000 referrals each year. These centres also maintain hotlines and provide educational services. Public support for the rape crisis centres remains low; donations and contributions provide most of the support. The centres report that while police directives are meant to provide sensitive and effective care for the victim, the implementation of these directives is not uniform throughout the country. Moreover, in Israel, as in other countries, assaulted women are often reluctant to contact the police.

90. In March 1995, the Knesset appointed a Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry to investigate the subject of women murdered by their spouses and life partners. The mandate of the Committee was further broadened to include the investigation of violence against women. The Inquiry Committee presented its conclusion and recommendations in June 1996. This comprehensive report analysed the causes of domestic violence, the adequacy and efficacy of existing services, and gaps in the provision of service. The report presented comprehensive, integrated and binding recommendations to each of the relevant ministries.

91. The Government decided in 1998 to establish an inter-ministerial committee to deal with issues of law enforcement and strengthening of existing services. The committee was chaired by the Director-General of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and included representatives from the Prime Minister's Office, the AASW, the Ministry of Public Security, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education and women's organizations. In 1997-1998, the Prime Minister's office sponsored a national media campaign against violence against women, including a National Hotline and Referral Service.

Article 6: The right to work

Related international conventions binding Israel

93. Since its initial report under the Covenant, Israel submitted updated reports under the following International Labour Organization Conventions, which relate to the years 1998-1999:

- Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111);
- Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122);
- Forced Labour Convention (No. 29).

Employment and unemployment: Level and trends

94. From 1997 through 1999, economic expansion in Israel was very moderate. GDP (gross domestic product) grew (in constant prices) by 3 per cent in 1997 and by 2.2 per cent in the years 1998 and 1999. According to the Bank of Israel's Annual Report, 1999, during 1999, "There was a turnaround in economic activity. After falling in the first quarter of the year, GDP grew sharply for the rest of 1999. Accelerated activity was led by a recovery in domestic demand and in exports and was accompanied by an increase in the current-account deficit."

95. In 1999, GDP reached NIS 417.4 billion (in current prices), approximately US$ 101 billion, based on the average exchange rate for the shekel in 1999. Per capita GDP averaged US$ 16,600 (in current prices) for the 1997-1999 period, up from US$14,700 in the 1993-1996 period. However, in each year 1997 through 1999, growth in population exceeded growth in aggregate GDP so that GDP per capita fell by almost 6 per cent between 1997 and 1999.

96. The expansion of economic activity beginning in the second quarter of 1999 was also accompanied by a decline in the unemployment rate, which had increased from 1996 to 1999, while employment continued its moderate growth.

97. As noted in Israel's initial report, 2 million persons were employed in Israel in 1996. This increased to 2.1 million in 1999, a rise of 2 per cent per year since 1996. Unemployment, however, also rose steadily, from 6.7 per cent in 1996, to 7.7 per cent in 1997, 8.5 per cent in 1998 and 8.9 per cent in 1999. It reached a high of 9.7 per cent (seasonally unadjusted) in the third quarter of 1999, declined to 8.8 per cent in the last quarter of 1999 and then to an average of 8.2 per cent in the first half of 2000. New immigrants, mainly from the former Soviet Union, have continued to arrive in Israel, albeit at a slower pace on the average, than in the earlier years of the decade. Between 1996 and 1999, Israel's labour force grew by close to 9 per cent, in large part due to the entry of new immigrants into the labour market.

Employment trends among particular categories of workers

98. Below is an updated table showing the changes in employment and unemployment of various categories of Israeli workers. (More complete data is provided in Table 7 of this section.)

99. As noted above, in 1997 to 1999, employment increased relatively slowly compared to the five preceding years (2 per cent per year in 1997-1999 as compared to 4.9 per cent per year in 1991-1996). In the period 1997-1999, the rise in employment was particularly pronounced among new immigrants, averaging 9.5 per cent per year. Employment among the very young, aged 15-17, declined by 8 per cent and remained stable among those aged 18-24, both of these developments reflecting the long-term trends in these age groups toward extended education and army service, as well as the effects of slower economic activity in those years.

100. With respect to unemployment, the highest rates continue to be found among young workers aged 15 through 24. Unemployment was also particularly high among Arabs and other non-Jewish population groups in Israel, as well as among residents of development areas and new immigrants.

Employment policies

101. As foreseen in Israel's initial report, unemployment has increased since 1997. Rising unemployment has necessitated a re-evaluation of employment and unemployment policies and measures, as described below. To the extent that data for 2000 is available, the trend seems to have been reversed during the year 2000.

102. Most of the increase in unemployment since 1996 stems from a slowdown in economic activity in Israel and from exposure to globalization, with relatively small enterprises and enterprises whose products face competition from imports being particularly vulnerable to the situation. The employees of such firms are typically older workers and those with lower education levels. It is almost certain that in some of these enterprises labour laws are not observed as they should be. The data show that during the past three years the proportion of long-term unemployed has risen sharply from 12 per cent to 16-17 per cent of the labour force.

103. Although data for the end of 1999 and the first half of 2000 indicate the possibility of sustained improvement in the employment situation in Israel, the significant rise in unemployment during 1997, 1998 and most of 1999 required the formulation and implementation of new employment policies and measures.

104. In recent years, there has been a growing awareness of the need for greater government intervention to assist the unemployed whose chances of returning to work would be hampered without such assistance. Various government ministries are involved in income maintenance programmes and vocational training to help the unemployed.

105. Unemployment among new immigrants to Israel continues to be a problem. As shown in the table above, unemployment among new immigrants rose steadily from 9.3 per cent in 1996 to 11.4 per cent in 1999. Such rates were substantially higher than the average for the economy as a whole in those years. From 1997 through 1999, the influx of new immigrants averaged 66,500 per year. The proportion of new immigrants in the labour force rose from 12 per cent in 1996 to 17 per cent in 1999.

106. Programmes to improve job opportunities for new immigrants, as well as the unemployed among other groups in the labour force, have included principally:

- Streamlining of the public Employment Service activities to encourage employers to seek workers through the Employment Service and to improve the matching of job vacancies with job seekers;
- Temporary employment programmes in the public sector;
- Vocational training, retraining and on-the-job training.

107. As shown in Table 1 (annexed to the section on article 6), the rate of unemployment among the Israeli Arab population is higher than among the Israeli Jewish population. The Government's resolution adopted in October 2000, as set out in full in article 2 above, attempts to address this gap by allocating additional resources for vocational training for this sector of the population.

108. Regarding unemployment among the Bedouin population, their rate of unemployment today is more than 20 per cent, as measured by accepted international definitions, compared to 8.3 per cent among the population as a whole. In recent years, the Government has undertaken projects to reduce the extent of unemployment among the Bedouin, including vocational training for adults and subsidized employment, particularly in areas related to tourism, such as in national parks and at archaeological sites.

109. With respect to unemployment among women, four authorities are currently actively engaged in Israel in promoting employment opportunities for women: the Authority for the Status of Women in the Prime Minister's Office; the Knesset Committee to Advance the Status of Women; the Unit for the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Civil Service Commission; and the Unit for Advancement of Women in the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs.

110. With respect to women's advancement in government service, in 1999 the Unit for the Advancement and Integration of Women brought before the Civil Service Commissioner, recommendations to require each government office to carry out a detailed investigation of women's advancement, to set specific goals on women's appointments for each government office, to include the subject of women's status in all educational activities undertaken by the Civil Service Commission and to promote changes in the State Service Law to make the director-general of each government office directly responsible for implementing the law in his or her office.

111. With respect to employment opportunities for women in Israel, the Authority for the Status of Women and the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women focused in 1999 and 2000 on the following areas: an initiative to train women soldiers in new military skills reserved in the past for men; an initiative to open new positions in the police force for policewomen with better prospects of advancement and higher salaries; encouragement to Arab women to join the police force; and encouragement of Arab women to train as social workers in the Arab sector which currently lacks sufficient social workers.

112. The public works' programmes noted in Israel's initial report have been continued since 1996 in an effort to find temporary solutions for the unemployed. The Government's interest in extending the scope of these projects should be noted, particularly among the long-term unemployed who have lost their skills and work habits. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs is developing programmes which combine vocational training and/or general education courses with employment on public works projects to increase the skills of such persons for the long term. Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs data indicate that in 1997, an average of 870 unemployed were working an average of about 18 days per month. This rose in 1998 to 1,280 persons working 17 days per month and, in 1999, to approximately 1,700 persons employed 17 days a month (see below "vocational guidance").

113. The Government's long-term economic programmes continue to emphasize the measures noted in Israel's initial report.

Employment and individual freedom: The right to work as a constitutional right

114. Decisions issued by Israel's Labour Courts in the last four years have included general statements which would appear to accord to the "right to work" a basic value, deriving it either from the basic right to human dignity or from the right to freedom of occupation (Jerusalem District Labour Court 54/3-289 Dr. Orly Peret v. Amitzur Farkash, 9 January 1996; District Labour Courts Reports, vol. 5, p. 632); (National Labour Court 300337/98 Tayizy Arian v. The Courts' Administration, 20 January 2000; National Labour Court Reports, vol. 33 (1), p. 20).

115. However, in none of the cases did such a right make a difference by itself. Thus, it is fair to assess that the constitutional status of the right to work is still an open issue.

The right to work as a statutory right

116. Since Israel's initial report, an additional case of statutory protection of security of employment was introduced. The Women's Labour Law was amended in 2000, prohibiting the dismissal of a woman due to an absence from work where it is necessary for her to hide from her battering husband.

117. Scholars and workers' organizations have lately criticized the Employment of Workers by Labour Contractors Law, 1996, described in the initial report. The National Labour Court also pointed out, in a few occasions, flaws in the existing law, especially in cases where the use of contract labour was made for long periods. In the leading case of Tzvi Shaffir the Court stated:

I consider the form of employment through contract labour agencies or contractors, for long periods of time, as a negative trend in labour relations, detrimental to the protection of workers provided by labour law, both at the individual and the collective level ... A person employed for a long period by one same user enterprise should be considered as the user's employee. Otherwise, there will exist two classes of workers at the workplace: those protected by the collective agreements and extension orders applying to the user and those deemed to be employed by the manpower agency which is not bound by these agreements and orders ... Such workers become a kind of 'outlaws' within the user's workplace.

National Labour Court 57/3-56 Tzvi Shaffir v. Netiv Bitzuah Taassyaty Inc.
National Labour Court Reports, vol. 32, p. 241.

118. Responding to such concerns, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs initiated a draft bill in 1999 aimed at radically reforming the existing law. While the Government was still discussing this proposed bill, a private Knesset member succeeded in passing a private members bill. As a result, the law was radically changed in 2000.

119. The amendment limits the use of workers through such contractors to a maximum of nine months, plus six additional months by special permit of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs. It also stipulates that a contract labour worker posted in the same user enterprise over the said time limit will automatically be considered as the user enterprise's employee. Additionally, a contract worker is entitled, from his first day at the user enterprise, to the same rights enjoyed by the user enterprise's employees of similar occupation and seniority at the workplace.

120. This amendment took effect only in January 2001. It constitutes a major reform, affecting about 6 per cent of the salaried in Israel. Thus, a period of adjustment before its entry into force was necessary. However, even this period was deemed insufficient, at least for the public sector. The amendment necessitates a reconsideration of the form of employment of thousands of contract labour workers posted in the public sector. For this reason, the Government requested the Knesset to postpone the entry into force of this amendment to January 2002, in order to complete its reorganization. This request is still pending in the Knesset.

121. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs is now completing a systematic survey in order to quantify and qualify the population of contract labour employees in Israel. Detailed factual information will therefore be provided in future reports.

122. Concerning the administrative control aspects of the law, some important development took place since the initial report. First, mention was made in the initial report of a petition to the High Court of Justice, seeking to declare unconstitutional the legal provisions requiring financial guaranty as a pre-condition for issuing a permit to a contract labour agency. In 1998, the High Court of Justice, in its final judgement upheld the constitutionality of this requirement, in a leading precedent (HCJ 450/97 Tnuffah, Manpower Services and Maintenance Ltd. v. Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs). This court decision was described earlier in this report under article 2.

123. In addition, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs has used his enforcement powers against many agencies, when complains and inquiries have shown infractions of the law, including the legal obligations of an agency as an employer. Such administrative activities have had one or more of the following results:

- Reimbursement by the agency of sums due to its employees;
- Limiting the scope of an agency's activities until fulfilment of certain conditions;
- Appointing an accountant to verify compliance by an agency of certain fiscal conditions;
- Penal indictment, mainly to enforce the prohibition against operating an agency without a permit;
- Cancellation of permit.

124. Finally, it should be noted that the number of authorized agencies has now reached 300. It is noteworthy that more than 100 agencies, which were operating before the entry in force of the law in 1996, have ceased to operate following its implementation.

The right to work in Israel's case law

125. The "restraint of trade" doctrine mentioned in the initial report has been further entrenched in recent judicial cases. Mention should be made of a new leading case known as the "Checkpoint case" (BSHA 27/99 Dan Prumer Checkpoint Software Technologies Inc. v. Redgard Inc., NLC, 4.06.99). The National Labour Court considered a contract obligating an employee of a high technology firm to abstain, for 22 months after termination of the contract, from being employed in a competing firm. The employee was a specialist in software development in the field of computer security, who had acquired additional knowledge and expertise while at work during the period of the contract. The District Labour Court had issued a temporary injunction prohibiting the employee to begin employment by Checkpoint, a rival firm. The majority ruling at the National Labour Court annulled the injunction.

126. The importance of this case lies less in the principles applied than in their application in such a case. The court exercised a balance of rights and interest similar to the approach described in the initial report. However, commentators have criticized the decision as being improper by granting such protection to a specialized employee in the high technology industry, where many employees are, in fact, in such a strong position regarding the employer that they do not need special protection. Some even argued that this precedent would eliminate, in fact, the employer's protection of its trade secrets and even endanger the viability of the whole high technology industry. It should be noted that the Court addressed this practical concern in its decision. It also stressed the notion that an expertise, even if gained on the job, is part of the personal qualifications of an employee. As such, it is part of his property, which should be protected under the basic right to property, entrenched in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. Overall, this approach in effect promotes the right to work of a worker.

Technical and vocational training programmes: Vocational guidance

127. No change has occurred since Israel's initial report.

Vocational and technical education within the formal education system sponsored by the Ministry of Education

128. The number of students receiving vocational training in secondary schools has continued to increase rapidly in absolute and relative terms. In the school year 1999/2000, 115,000 students (in the Hebrew and Arab systems) were in vocational/technological educational tracks, an increase of 17 per cent over 1998/99. In 1999/2000, the total number of pupils in secondary education rose by only 2 per cent.

129. No updated information is available on the number of institutions providing advanced vocational training. However, regarding the number of students, in 1998-1999, 53,000 students were studying in these schools, close to half in programmes for practical engineers and technicians, 20 per cent in teacher training, 15 per cent in clerical work and business administration and the rest in nursing, paramedical occupations, arts, architecture and design.

Vocational training for adults and youth sponsored by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs

130. The following tables show the scope of vocational training sponsored by the ministry in the year 1999, while further details are provided afterwards:

Vocational courses for adults

131. The Manpower Training and Development Bureau at the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs (hereinafter, the Bureau) initiates and carries out training and retraining day and evening courses for adults in its own training centres, in training centres run by other agencies and in training centres jointly maintained by the Bureau and private bodies.

132. In-service vocational training: About 50 per cent of these training courses are implemented by institutes for integrated in-service training of "ORT" and "AMAL" (two large private educational networks), the remainder being implemented by either direct or joint activities.

133. Retraining for university graduates: In order to provide constructive answers to the demand for trained personnel above secondary school level, and at the same time to solve the problem of unemployment of graduates (Israelis and new immigrants), the Bureau runs two centres for the retraining of graduates in Tel Aviv and Haifa. This is in addition to specific courses held throughout the country.

134. Training of labour force for states of emergency: The Bureau carries out special activities for the training and staffing of essential posts for a state of emergency. Within this framework, the Bureau operates a special centre for the training of drivers which supplies in-service training for drivers in driving, hauling, wreck-extraction, etc.

Vocational training for youth

135. Some of these courses are designed for marginal youth, (see Table 2 above) and in these cases the group of trainees is always under the guidance of a social worker. About 10 per cent of these courses are offered in boarding schools, which provide an attractive setting for the vocational training and education of the adolescent.

136. According to the Apprenticeship Law, 1953 a youngster may be employed as an apprentice in trades which the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs had declared as apprenticeship trades. In conformity with this law, the youngster learns the trade through work and must study in approved vocational classes. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs supervises the progress in his or her vocational studies in the workshop and in school, through apprenticeship inspectors and by periodic examinations. Graduates receive official trade certificates.

137. In conformity with an amendment to the law promulgated in 1972, all working youngsters (including in professions not yet promulgated as apprenticeship trades) must study at least one day a week, like apprentices. For organizational and budgetary reasons, this law is being implemented by stages. It began to be applied in the school year 1972/73 and it was assumed that all working youth would become pupils under the law by the school-year 1990/91. It seems now that due to budgetary limitations, the complete implementation of the law for all working youngsters will be postponed to a later date.

138. The apprenticeship studies are provided in apprenticeship schools, which are run by vocational networks such as ORT, AMAL, Women's Council and others. Youngsters in this category are, by law, exempt from school fees.

Training of technicians and practical engineers

139. The training of technicians and practical engineers (see Table 3 above) is the function of the National Institute for Technological Training, which carries out this activity in cooperation with the Ministry of Education and Culture. The programme is carried out with the assistance of 41 schools and branches. The Institute also constitutes the official framework for the provision of pedagogical services to schools (study programmes, supervision, examinations and issuing of diplomas to successful graduates).

Integrated programmes of the Bureau and the high-tech industry

140. The growth of the Israeli high-tech industry has already made it a major part of the GNP. Due to this process, the need for trained manpower in many fields within this industry is growing as well. A group of leading industries in Israel joined together in order to strengthen the link between the needs of their enterprises and the bureau's training network (i.e. the Israeli National Institute for Technological Training). Their main objectives are to emphasize the importance of interdisciplinary understanding, as a part of the curricula for technicians and practical engineers and to develop an interdisciplinary curriculum, based on the actual situation of the whole industry.

141. Today 10 colleges for technicians and practical engineers are involved in this programme in the areas of electricity; electronics; machinery; controlling systems; air condition; chemistry and biotechnology. It is important to mention that this programme is followed with a “training of trainers” refreshment course. The project also opened a hot-line for teachers. A Web site is also under construction, which will serve teachers and students interested in the areas involved. Finally, the whole programme is under systematic assessment and evaluation.

Training for women

142. With regard to female participation in the labour force, there are two groups – ultra-orthodox Jewish women and Arab women – who require special programmes and measures, due to the cultural factors affecting their potential entry into the labour market. The development of tools to assist their integration into the labour market is being undertaken currently within the framework and limitations noted above.

143. In the field of vocational training, the intention is to continue the policy of devoting special budgets to training for women. As described in the following paragraphs, some special programmes are targeted to women in general, while others target especially vulnerable groups of women.

144. The Ministry’s unit for the Advancement of Women has as its main goal to increase employability of women and their economic independence, through policies of professional and personal growth. The unit’s initiatives are as follows.

(a) Workshops for women, including new immigrants, non-Jewish and ultra-orthodox women:

- Type I: Self-empowerment and work skills - in addition to retraining courses.
- Type II: Entrepreneurship and work skills - in addition to retraining courses.
- Type III: Orientation towards employability and job searching - within the community. (1996 - 20 workshops; 1997 - 55 workshops; 1998 - 70 workshops; 1999 - 80 workshops; 2000 – 120 workshops (1,800 participants); total: 345 workshops; (3,500 participants)). Participants report improved self-image, personal and professional empowerment and better assessment of the job market. Participants in the entrepreneurship workshops report a better understanding and knowledge of the various aspects of small business establishment. Participants in the workshops in the community usually enjoy continued professional assistance. These women join various activities at the end of the workshops, such as: education completion, Hebrew classes (mainly non-Jewish and new immigrants), vocational training, employment or some form of voluntary activity.

(b) Courses for entrepreneurship and small business (130 hours): These are courses for women with entrepreneurial spirit and/or plans, but without access to training because of economic, geographical or cultural obstacles. This training enhances their chances of establishing a viable business and improving their economic status - the rate of business establishment among the participants is 20 per cent-50 per cent. Some start their business ventures at a later stage. Others, realising the implications, prefer to look for a regular job. Businesses started by participants are mainly in services, such as: catering, child nurseries, alternative medicine, bed and breakfast, beauty, flowers and gift shops, secretarial services and manpower services. Some join their husbands as full partners in establishing or running a family business (1996 - 2 courses for Bedouin women; 1997 - 2 courses: 1 for Arab women, 1 for Jewish women; 1998 - 1 course for ultra -orthodox women; 1999 - 2 courses: 1 for ultra-orthodox women, 1 for Druze women; total: 130 participants).

(c) Workshops and counselling for professionals working with women within the community: The aim is provision of knowledge and tools, thus empowering women and counselling them towards advancement and employment. Participants include training counsellors in renewal projects of inner city neighbourhoods (started in 1997); senior staff of vocational training centres (started in 1998); and social workers - 2 workshops in 1998 (on-going counselling, while operating community joint workshops for women).

(d) New target populations: In 2000, the unit enlarged the scope of its workshops activities, to include additional groups: those at a stage of career decision making, such as education completion students, preparatory course students; and groups with special needs, such as persons with disabilities during vocational training in rehabilitation centres and unemployed single parents.

(e) A pilot programme - "Learn a profession and be successful". The Bureau, in collaboration with Women's Rights NGOs, initiated a new pilot programme aimed at reducing poverty among women. This includes workshops on empowerment and work skills, completion of education and in giving participants in the pilot priority in acceptance to regular vocational training and entrepreneurship courses. Several locations in Jewish and Arab municipalities were chosen in which unemployment exceeds 10 per cent.

Employment opportunities among particular categories of workers: prohibition of discrimination

145. The Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 1988: In the past years, the Enforcement Division of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs increased its activities under this law: it conducted 167 investigations in 1996; 99 in 1997; 264 in 1998; 290 in 1999 and 597 during 2000 (until August).

146. The Legal Department pressed charges during year 2000 (until August), in six cases, and had at that time 51 more indictments in preparation. Many cases involve unlawful advertisement. A few cases involve alleged substantial discrimination. There is still no substantial body of jurisprudence on this type of case. There are a few instances of relatively heavy fines imposed, i.e. a fine of NIS 10,000 for unlawful advertisement.

147. The Equal Employment Opportunities Regulations, 1999 established the legal framework for the appointment of a public council, holding advisory powers with regard to the implementation of the Equal Opportunities Law, 1988.

148. The Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 1988 was amended in 1998 by the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, 1998, in a manner that broadened section 7 regarding "sexual harassment" as well as "adverse treatment" that follows sexual harassment. There are still no leading judgements to report on this issue, but there are a few cases in which settlements were reached in light of the amended law, so that its influence is already substantially felt in the field. Further information on this new legislation is provided in this report under article 3.

149. It should be noted that other recent amendments in employment legislation also aim at indirectly improving the situation of women. This applies to the fields of foreign workers and manpower contractors, since the rate of women in these groups is relatively high.

Occupation and continent of birth

151. The table below presents data for 1999 on Jewish employed persons by occupation, by continent of birth and by sex. In 1999, almost 30 per cent of employed Israeli Jews worked in academic, professional and technical occupations, 36 per cent were clerical and sales personnel, while 18 per cent were skilled workers in manufacturing, construction and other industries. In comparison with the occupational distribution in 1995, a distinct shift had occurred by 1999: the proportion of Israeli Jews employed as skilled industrial workers declined while the proportion working in academic, professional, technical, managerial and other white-collar occupations rose.

152. With respect to the continent of birth, in 1999, close to 60 per cent of the Jewish employed population was Israeli-born, 29 per cent came from European countries and the American continent and 12.5 per cent were born in Asian and African countries. In comparison with the situation in 1995, in 1999, more of the Jewish population was born in Israel, coupled with a considerable drop, both absolute and relative, in Israeli Jews born in Asian and African countries. Due primarily to the continued immigration to Israel from the former Soviet Union, the proportion born in European and American countries remained at the same level in 1999 as in 1995 (29 per cent).

153. In 1999, a third of those Jews born in Europe and the Americas worked as academics and professional personnel, compared with 30 per cent of the Israel-born and 18 per cent of those born in Asia and Africa. The decline which occurred between 1995 and 1999 in the number and proportion employed as skilled industrial workers was particularly sharp among the Israel-born though noticeable, as well, among workers born in Europe and the Americas and in Asia and Africa.

154. Among the Israeli Arab working population (see Table 8 of the section on this article), in 1999, as in 1995, the large majority are men, 51 per cent of whom were employed as skilled industrial workers. Labour force participation of Arab women remains low, though rising slowly. In 1999, the proportion of employed Israeli Arab women among all Israeli Arab workers increased from 21 per cent in 1995 to 24 per cent in 1999. Of the women who were employed in 1999, 28 per cent work in academic and professional fields, 36 per cent were clerical and sales workers and 34 per cent were employed in industry as skilled and unskilled labour.

Foreign workers

155. In recent years the phenomenon of foreign workers, described in the initial report, raised great concerns because of its implications in the realms of labour, employment and welfare. Consequently, the Foreign Workers (Prohibition of Unlawful Employment and Assurance of Fair Conditions) Law, 1991 was revised, in an amendment that came into force on 1 July 2000. (An English translation of the amended version of this law is included in annex I to the present Report.)^{*}

156. The first aspect of the 2000 amendment concerns foreign workers' labour rights, in particular:

- The right to a labour contract in writing in the foreign worker's language, along with a Hebrew version. It should be noted that a written contract is not required in regular labour law, except for the case of contract labour workers for whom there is no language requirement;
- The obligation to provide the worker with medical insurance, at the expense of the employer; and
- The obligation to provide "proper lodging", mostly at the expense of the employer.

157. In addition, the employer is now obliged to submit monthly reports to the Employment Service's payments division about payment of wages for every foreign worker he employs. He is also required to keep a copy of the medical insurance, wage slips and a register of each worker's hours of work and rest at the place of work.

158. In July 2000, four sets of regulations under the amended law came into force. They include: the specifications of a "proper lodging"; the maximum amounts that an employer may deduct from the worker's salary by way of reimbursement of the employer expenses on lodging; the documents that the employer is required to keep; details concerning the employer's reporting obligations.

159. The amendment also introduced compulsory fees on employers of foreign workers. Administrative fines for violation of the law had earlier been raised in 1998 from NIS 2,000 to NIS 5,000. The new amendment in 2000 raised the amount of fines determined by the law to NIS 80,000. Nine new offences were also added by the 2000 amendment, mainly for violation of foreign workers' rights. A section was added which provides protection against an employer impairing a foreign worker's wages and work conditions, on the basis of a complaint by the foreign worker or by someone on his behalf. The range of liability for violations of the law was also broadened to cover contractors active in this field, arranging living conditions, medical insurance, wages etc. The supervision authority of the inspectors enforcing the law was also expanded, to grant them the right to seize documents at the place of work, such as wage slips and registers of work and rest hours.

160. In addition, the Employment Service Law was amended, to expand the prohibition on private agencies to charge payment from the work seeker. This amendment aims at preventing an agency from evading the law by using an individual acting de facto, but not de jure, on its behalf in Israel or abroad.

The factual situation of foreign workers

161. Since the 2000 amendment came into force only recently, the information below relates to the legal situation prevailing before it came into effect. Information on the enforcement of the amended law will be available in future reports. According to data supplied by the Employment Services the number of permits issued this year to employ foreign workers amounts to 72,445. Estimates by the Central Bureau of Statistics indicate that around 150,000 workers are presently employed in Israel, of which part are legally employed and part are illegally employed. Thus, it is possible to estimate that the number of illegal foreign workers approximately equals the legal workers. These data seem positive in the light of the declared policy of the Government to reduce the scope of foreign workers employed in Israel.

162. According to data of the Ministry of Interior the following are the countries from which the foreign workers come:

- Europe: Poland, Bulgaria, Romania, Yugoslavia and the former Soviet Union;
- Asia: Philippines, Thailand, India and China;
- Africa: Ghana and Nigeria;
- South and Central America: Colombia, Bolivia, Ecuador, Chile and Brazil.

163. The Foreign Workers Administration, mentioned in Israel's initial report, regularly distributes an information leaflet among the workers arriving at Israel's Ben Gurion international airport. These leaflets, written in a number of languages, list the employer's legal obligations towards foreign workers. It also provides the telephone number of a hot-line, to which one can file complaints to the Enforcement Division of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. Anonymous complaints are also dealt with. Similar material is also being distributed by various NGOs active in this field.

164. The Foreign Workers Administration acts for the purpose of enforcing the duties of employers towards their foreign workers in accordance with the labour laws. This activity by the Foreign Workers Administration is on the rise: in 1998, 1,198 employers were fined (5,081 work sites were inspected, involving 10,740 workers). During the period between November 1999, and August 2000, 2,262 employers were fined for illegal employment, for which NIS 11 million was collected in fines. During that period 359 employers did not pay the administrative fine and preferred to go to trial.

(a) Methods for fixing wages

166. No changes have occurred since Israel's initial report.

(b) Minimum wages

167. The following table shows minimum and average wages in 1996 and 1999 in relation to the cost-of-living index. The minimum wage in 1999 was, on the average, 43.6 per cent of the average wage in the economy.

Enforcement of the Minimum Wage Law

168. As reported, the Minimum Wage Law, 1987 was amended and strengthened in 1997. The law is enforced by the Enforcement Division of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. The Ministry's inspectors regularly conduct on-site inspections at work places throughout the country. Employers who violate this law are fined or, in rare cases, prosecuted, and are required to pay workers the differences between the actual wages paid and the statutory wages, in accordance with the law.

169. Enforcement covers all workers: adult Israelis, teenage workers, Palestinian workers, foreign workers and workers hired by manpower contractors. The following are data concerning enforcement of the Minimum Wage Law, which were not included in Israel's initial report.

171. In 2000, the policy concerning the enforcement of the minimum wage (described in Israel's initial report) was revised. From now on, an expanded effort will be made to take legal action against employers violating the Law, seeking compensation from the employer for the workers - especially in serious cases. However, the success of this policy depends on adequate means being allocated to the ministry in the 2001 budget.

172. According to a recent study conducted by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, the percentage of workers who do not receive the legal minimum wage (per hour) is about 5.5 per cent of the whole working population. Data based on the number of workers who are in fact entitled to minimum wage is problematic and cannot be relied upon.

(c) Equal pay for work of equal value

173. Women's wages, though still lower than men's, have continued to improve. In 1998, women's average hourly wages were 83 per cent of men's. By occupation, their hourly wages are still highest, relative to men, in the category "other professional and technicians" (89 per cent). Women earn the least, relative to men, among skilled industrial and construction workers, but this ratio has improved from 57 per cent in 1995 to 63 per cent in 1998. In both 1997 and 1998, women worked on the average 25 per cent fewer hours per week than men.

174. In 1999, the Be'er Sheva District Labour Court, in one of the only court procedures ever held on the application of the Male and Female Workers Equal Pay Law, 1996, decided that an employer must release to the claimant details regarding the salaries of male employees in the workplace. Preferring to address the principle of equality and the claimant's right to pursue her employer and choosing to ignore potential damage to the secret nature of other workers' salaries, the Court granted the requested relief to the claimant (Simi Nidam v. Rali Electrics and Electronics).

175. It should be noted that during the period of this report, the labour court did not order job evaluations to be conducted under the Male and Female Workers Equal Pay Law, 1996.

176. In a National Labour Court discussion concerning the validity of the proposed voluntary retirement plan, which the General Health Insurance Fund (Kupat Holim Klalit) offered its veteran employees - a proposal which offered more advantageous terms to men than that offered to women and which also had consequences on the future pension plans of each gender - the Court decided that according to the Law on the Equal Age of Retirement for Men and Women Employees, 1987, which stipulates that a woman may retire from her job at any age between a woman's retirement age and that of a man's, the proposed terms of voluntary retirement were discriminatory. However, the majority opinion was that the claimants' acceptance of the terms of their retirement should in effect be seen as a renunciation of their right to choose the age of their retirement (as stipulated in the Law on the Equal Age of Retirement for Men and Women), thus denying their entitlement to the financial compensation requested in court. Only the minority opinion of the Court expressed the view that the discrimination between male and female workers present in the early retirement agreement was an essential element of that agreement and no acquiescence on the part of the female workers could rectify such discrimination (Eytana Niv and others v. Kupat Holim Klalit; A petition to the High Court of Justice is still pending).

177. As to women's wages within the civil service, the positive trend described in Israel's initial report has continued. The wages of women in 1999 were 20 per cent below those of men in the civil service compared to 24 per cent in 1996 (source: data presented by the Treasury to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women, Report to the 15th Knesset, August 2000). For further information on this topic, refer to Israel's second report to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, submitted this year.

3. Occupational Health and Safety

180. Since Israel's initial report, a number of regulations have been amended, at the initiative of the Labour Inspection Service of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, to meet with changes in technology.

181. Following is an update on the Service's enforcement activities. There are now 70 labour inspectors and 10 assistants. In 2000, the Service conducted 61,736 inspections of workplaces, 12,800 of which were at building sites. The Industrial Hygiene Laboratory performed 3,405 environmental tests. The inspectors carried out 455 investigations of work accidents and occupational diseases. In Israel's initial report it was noted that 957 investigations were conducted. But this number included not only systematic investigations, but also various consultations. Since that time, the Service changed its enforcement policy. The practice of consultations has practically been abolished, enabling an increase in the number of investigations. Thus, the number of investigations reported in this present Report do not represent less activity than in 1996.

182. Furthermore, the results of the enforcement activities have improved as can be seen from the following updated data on work injuries, fatalities and injury compensation. There has been a clear reduction in the number of work injuries and in fatalities, even though the number of workers has increased.

4. Equal opportunity for promotion

183. No changes have occurred since Israel's initial report.

5. Rest and leisure

184. The following data concerns the enforcement by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 1951 since the initial report: in 1996 - 119 employers were brought before courts; in 1997 - 210 and in 1998 - 84. In 1999 the sanction for breaching this law became an administrative fine, and thus far only one case was brought to court.

Article 8: Collective labour rights

1. Related international conventions binding Israel

185. Since its initial report, the State of Israel has submitted the following reports to international bodies:

- Israel's initial report on the implementation of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, was filed in February 1998 (CCPR/C/81/Add.13);
- Israel's last report to the International Labour Organization pursuant to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), was recently filed and relates to the years 1998-2000.

2. Forming trade unions and joining them

186. Since the initial report, the legal protection for the right to organize in trade unions was expanded, by several important judicial decisions.

187. In the case of Mifealey Tahanot v. Israel Yaniv (46/3-209 National Labour Court, November, 1996), the Court cancelled the dismissal of two workers after finding that the real ground for dismissal was their initiative to organize a workers committee. The company had no previous workers organization. The two employees had clear intentions to initiate collective bargaining with the employer. This landmark case was important in two respects. First, it laid down two alternative legal grounds for the recognition of the right to organize as a basic right: (a) the right derives from the concept of human dignity entrenched in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty; (b) the right derives from the general right to equality, namely the prohibition to discriminate against workers on irrelevant grounds, like involvement in organizational activities. This issue was developed in the Delek case discussed below.

188. Secondly, regarding the question of which remedy is available in case of a breach of this right, the court recognized its competence to issue a reinstatement order. This was seen as an important initiative. As mentioned in the initial report, reinstatement at work is generally limited in Israeli case law to dismissals in contradiction to a collective agreement, a specific legal provision and within the public service where norms of administrative law apply in addition to private contract law. This remedy had previously been ruled out in private labour contract relations, by the High Court of Justice, in light of a provision in a contract law according to which a court should not order the enforcement of a personal contract. The novelty of the Mifealey Tahanot case lies in considering a breach of a basic right as a legal ground for permitting the enforcement of a private labour contract.

189. This ruling was recently clearly reinforced in the Horn & Leibivitz Transport Co. v. The Histadrut case (99/323 National Labour Court, July 2000). This company had dismissed a group of drivers who tried to organize themselves into a union, just after the Histadrut had expressed its willingness to recognize it under its federation. The Regional Labour Court issued a temporary reinstatement order, until completion of proceedings. The company appealed to the National Labour Court, which upheld the decision of the Regional Labour Court. The Court's rulings at both instances were based on prior decisions, which had recognized the right to organize in labour unions as a basic human right. Here again, the remedy of reinstatement was declared the most effective one in order to protect this right, since an employer might not be deterred by the threat of compensation alone, while deciding how to respond to his employees' organizational activities.

190. Interestingly, the company then reacted by firing about a hundred more drivers, arguing that it had to close the whole department. The Histadrut then threatened the company that it intended to appeal to the Court in a contempt of court proceeding. The conflict ended by the signing of a collective agreement with the company.

191. In the case of Delek The Israeli Petrol Company v. The Histadrut (98/4-10 National Labour Court), the National Labour Court extended the concept of the legal basis for the recognition of the right to organize, already introduced in the Mifealey Tahanot case mentioned above. The court ruled in favour of the protection of such workers' right to organize. It stated that:

... the right to organize protects the worker's dignity at the place of work, where he usually spends a third of his day. The individual worker has less power than the employer, and in most cases he is unable to conduct fair negotiations. Joining a workers' union bolsters the worker's strength and provides a balance in his negotiations with the employer ... in many cases the individual worker's dignity will only be secured by joining a group of workers, i.e. a workers union.

192. The court also rationalized the right to organize as "a two-dimensional right, realized in the actions of both the group and the individual".

193. Finally, the court further developed the interpretation of the legal right to organize on the basis of the non-discrimination principle. The question arose in this case in light of the fact, that the Delek company decided to dismiss employees, in the context of legitimate economic dismissal in accordance with the collective agreement in force. However, the employees which it decided to dismiss were mostly members of the representative labour organization at the place of work. Only a few employees were dismissed who were not members of the representative labour organization. The court ruled that consideration by the employer of union membership, when deciding upon economic dismissals, amounted to unjustified discrimination between workers.

The right to organize a trade union

194. Since Israel's initial report, the right to organize a trade union was further qualified in the landmark decision of Tadiran Keshet Inc. et al. v. The Histadrut (97/41-96 National Labour Court, February 1998). During the term of a collective labour agreement, the Tadiran company underwent a structural change, dividing itself into three companies. The question that arose was which new company should be the bargaining unit under the agreement. The workers wanted it to be a single one; Tadiran wanted to conduct three distinct bargaining units. A strike broke out on this issue, and the employer filed a motion for a temporary injunction ordering the workers back to work.

195. The National Labour Court denied the motion. Judge Gerald Adler, President of the National Labour Court sought a proper balance between the basic right of employees to organize and to choose their representative organization, and the employer's basic right to property entrenched in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The employer's prerogative to manage his business was here countered by the workers' basic rights. The Court held:

When balancing between the workers' right to organize and the employer's right to manage his business, a special weight should be given to the workers' right, because their fate is embedded in the rights that are to be entrenched in the collective agreements applying to them. The employer's right to be part of a change in the bargaining unit is a relative one and is subordinate to the condition that it is not intended to impair organizational rights of workers ... The employer and the labour union have therefore to agree on the structure of bargaining appropriate for them. In a democratic society there is great importance in granting dignity and liberty to each worker. An expression of this is the worker's power to participate in the determination of the bargaining unit in which he belongs. This includes the power to influence changes in the bargaining unit, by way of negotiations between the labour organization which represents the workers and the employer who provides them with work.

196. The court decided that until an agreement was reached on the determination of the bargaining unit, the regular rules regarding industrial conflicts would apply, and the workers' right to strike was upheld.

Number and structure of trade unions in Israel

197. No notable change in the structure of labour movements in Israel has occurred since the submission of Israel's initial report. The Histadrut still remains the largest and most representative workers' organization in Israel and still refrains from disclosing exact numbers on its membership.

Individual freedom to join a trade union

198. No notable change has occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's Initial Report, except for the Tadiran case discussed above, which reiterated the individual freedom of a worker to choose his union.

Freedom of operation of trade unions

199. Since the submission of Israel's initial report, the labour courts provided further qualifications of the already recognized freedom of operation of trade unions. In the case of Haifa Chemicals Inc. v. David Raviv and The Histadrut (57/4-10 Haifa Regional Labour Court, 5 January 1997 and 57/4-43 National Labour Court, 19 January 1997), a motion for an injunction was filed by the employer against actions taken by the workers' organization at the place of work during a strike. The strike broke out after the employer had announced its intention not to renew any collective agreement at the plant. Workers' actions during the strike included blocking the plant's gates and preventing movements of trucks and employees, as well as acts of sabotage within the plant. The employer demanded protection of his property rights through a motion for an injunction. The Regional Labour Court issued a detailed order, which still left room for organizational activities, in particular allowing the presence of 50 workers within the plant and the holding of demonstrations (but not blockage) within the plant near its gates only. The order was construed in order to enable all maintenance activity within the plant, as well as freedom of movement and action to the management members. The ruling was framed in the context of balancing conflicting rights. The court was ready to recognize that the right to strike and the freedom of expression and the freedom of protest of workers could justify to some degree the disregard of the employer's basic property rights, but not to negate them totally.

200. This decision was appealed and the National Labour Court overruled it partly. The details of the order were changed, leaving more room for the employer to operate during the strike. For instance, the court permitted demonstrations near the gates, but only outside the plant and it allowed workers' presence within the plant, but only of members of the worker's organization. Moreover, the National Labour Court also saw the case as one involving a balance of conflicting rights. It, too, was ready not to decide the case strictly on the basis of an analysis of the employer's property rights, which were undoubtedly impaired by the worker's acts.

3. The right to strike

(a) The status and content of the right to strike

201. Since the submission of Israel's initial report a significant decision was given in the case of Mekorot Inc. v. The Histadrut (99/19 National Labour Court, August 1999). Mekorot Inc. is a governmental corporation, responsible for the supply of water to most Israelis. The right of its workers to strike was contested in this case by the public employer on the ground that such strike would impair its ability to provide vital services. The court granted only a limited injunction against the strikers. It held that the right to strike is a relative one, which must be balanced against conflicting rights. Therefore, the injunction was construed in a way that left room for a strike but not at the price of leaving the public with no water. The Court permitted the workers to work only during the limited time normally worked during the Saturday day of rest and holidays. It also urged the parties to return to negotiations and instructed them to report to the court within four days.

Restrictions placed on the right to strike

202. Since the submission of Israel's initial report an important court decision was given, which qualified the implication of a strike which is classified as "unprotected". As explained in the Initial Report, an unprotected strike will usually result in a court injunction ordering the workers to return to work. Nevertheless, this was not so in the case of The Tel Aviv-Jaffa Workers' Organization v. The Tel Aviv-Jaffa Municipality (97/41-92 National Labour Court, February 1998). Even though the strike in this case was conducted without respecting the normally required "cooling-off" period, the court protected it. In the midst of collective negotiations, the municipality had tried to by-pass the workers' union, by hiring a private contractor to provide services normally provided by the municipality's employees. The court considered this kind of privatization as a unilateral act by the employer, especially threatening both the individual workers and the workers' organization at the place of work. The court therefore used its discretion to not grant the injunction which had been requested by the employer. It should be mentioned that one of the judges in the panel issued a dissenting opinion, not refuting the court's power to use discretion, but arguing that the circumstances in the present case did not justify such an exceptional step.

(b) Statistics on strikes in Israel

203. The figures presented in the initial report can now be updated as follows:

4. The armed forces, the police and the administration of the State

204. No notable change occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Article 9: The right to social security

1. Related international conventions binding Israel

205. Since its initial report, Israel has filed a new report on the International Labour Organization Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention (No. 118), which covers the years 1992 to 1995.

2. Social security branches in Israel

(a) Maternity benefits

206. As of May 1998, the husband of a woman who has given birth and is entitled to maternity leave, may partially replace her in her maternity leave and, for the period of his leave, receive maternity allowance instead of her.

(b) Old-age benefits

207. Mention was made in Israel's initial report of an amendment to the law concerning married, non-working, women - "housewives". As of January 1996:

- A housewife is entitled to an old-age pension, provided she was born after 31 December 1930 and was a resident of Israel between the ages of 60 and 65. This is so, even though a housewife does not pay national insurance premiums;
- As of March 1999, the children of a housewife are eligible to a survivor's pension if their mother passes away;
- A housewife is also entitled to a survivor's pension;
- Voluntary insurance remains available to complement this partial compulsory coverage.

208. It should be noted that applications for old-age pensions are initiated by the National Insurance Institute (NII). Every man and woman, approximately two months before reaching pension age, receives a claims form for old-age pension from the NII (in which most information is already filled in and needs only to be verified), together with an accompanying explanatory letter.

209. As mentioned in the initial report, there are increments to the old-age benefits, such as seniority increment, deferred retirement income and income supplement. The ceiling limiting the seniority increment is 50 per cent of the pension, and the ceiling of the deferred retirement income is 25 per cent of the pension.

(c) Disability benefits

210. In January 1998, a comprehensive reform in the scheme of benefits for disabled children came into effect. It reorganizes, and to a large extent broadens, the various grounds or categories of entitlement to benefit for disabled children.

211. Further, following an agreement between the Ministry of Finance and the National Insurance Institute, the rights of severely disabled persons were significantly expanded as of November 1999. A brief summary of the improvements:

- A housewife entitled to “attendance” allowance now receives this allowance at a higher rate than previously (the same rate paid to other disabled). As reported in the initial report, this “attendance” allowance is paid to the severely disabled who are dependent on the help of others for the performance of everyday tasks or who are in need of supervision;
- Severely disabled persons who receive both disability pension and attendance allowance may now receive mobility benefits as well;
- The means test for entitlement to the special attendance allowance for working disabled persons has been made more flexible;
- Notable improvements have been made in the scope of persons eligible for mobility allowance, as well as in the amount of this allowance.

212. In addition to the various benefits for the disabled, the NII provides, through the Fund for the Development of Services for the Disabled, funding for the enhancement of the existing network of services for the disabled in Israel, and the development of new services. As of January 1999, there were approximately 1,000 active projects, of which some 200 were approved during 1998.

213. In the framework of this Fund, an allotment of NIS 22.6 million was approved in May 1999, to assist in the planning and development of accessibility of the disabled in public places, such as schools, community centres, libraries and courts.

214. Among other benefits under General Disability Insurance, mention was made in Israel’s initial report of special benefit for new immigrants. This benefit is equivalent to disability pension plus attendance allowance, and is paid to entitled disabled new immigrants.

(d) Survivors' benefits

215. Since Israel's initial report, the only change to be noted is that which entitles the children of "housewives" to survivors' pension, as already described above (under "old-age benefits").

(e) Employment injury benefits

216. In addition to the groups covered for employment injury benefits, already mentioned in Israel's initial report, mention should be made of the following group which is now covered: a person training under the Emergency Work Service Law, 1967.

217. With regard to the work disability grant mentioned in Israel's Initial Report, workers disabled with a disability degree of 1 to 20 per cent (exclusive) receive a one-time work disability grant equivalent to 70 monthly pensions.

(f) Income support benefits

218. In May 2000, the National Insurance Institute ("NII") paid income support benefits to approximately 127,131 families which did not earn the minimum level of income as determined by the Income Support Law, 5740-1980, and which were not covered by other income maintenance programmes.

(g) Child allowances

219. Every single-parent family with a child between the ages of 6 and 14 is eligible for a study grant, paid at the beginning of every school year. In 1998, coverage of the study grant was broadened to include also large families, which receive a subsistence benefit from the NII. In 1999, coverage was further broadened to include orphans, abandoned children, children who immigrated to Israel without an insured person and women residing in shelters for battered women.

220. As explained in Israel's initial report, Child Allowance rates are linked to the unit of "one credit point", as defined in the Income Tax Order. The actual value of one credit point is now NIS 171 per month (as of January 2000).

221. Up until 1997, the NII followed a policy of setting off children's allowances against any income tax debts of the parents. This policy had a disproportionate effect on poorer families. In 1997, the National Insurance Regulations in this regard were amended and the provision under which the set-off policy had operated was nullified

222. In January 2000, a family with one child received NIS 171 a month (approx. US$ 43); a family with two children received NIS 342; with three children - NIS 684; four children - NIS 1,377; and five children - NIS 1,959 per month. In 1999, 891,500 families received children's allowances, amounting to 19 per cent of the total benefits paid by the National Insurance Institute (NII).

3. Expenditures

223. Social security benefit payments amounted to 8.7 per cent of the GNP in 1999, and 8.9 per cent in 1998. Israel's Initial Report showed a clear increased share of benefit payments in both the GNP and government budget during the decade until 1995. The increase continued in 1997, stabilized in 1998 and rose slightly in 1999.

4. Combined public and private social security schemes

(a) The pension system in Israel

224. The pension system in Israel as depicted in the Initial Report, has undergone a change concerning the budgetary pension, which all civil servants and municipal employees receive under a special law. A comprehensive collective agreement was concluded in 1998, aimed at the gradual abolition of the budgetary pension system and its replacement with the regular pension schemes existing in collective agreements. The implementation of this agreement is still pending, due to practical and legal problems that arose after its signing. The issue is pending before the courts.

225. There is still no legislation insuring any type of pension scheme to all workers. Israeli NGO's regularly criticize the Government on this issue. The reality is that this is a rather complex and difficult issue. Every Minister of Labour and Social Affairs who has entered into office since Israel's initial report has pledged and has made actual attempts to act on this issue. Private Knesset members have introduced new proposed legislation. However, the implications of such legislation, in terms of governmental expenditures, as repeatedly pointed out by the Ministry of Finance, seem to be too serious to be overcome in the near future. Nevertheless, the issue is regularly re-evaluated within the relevant government ministries.

(b) Long-term care

226. The year 1998 marked a decade since the enactment of the Long-term Care Insurance Law. The Law has had a very favourable impact on the lives of tens of thousands of dependent elderly and their families. Long-term care insurance has recently been the focus of a comprehensive re-examination, with the aim of attaining a more equitable and efficient allocation of resources for the benefit of the dependent elderly population.

227. One of the results of this re-examination has been the introduction in March 2000, of the short-term nursing benefit, a new and unique benefit paid for a period of 60 days, mainly to patients having acute functional difficulties.

5. Equality in social security

228. Since the submission of Israel's initial report, there have been some notable positive changes enhancing equality in social security, which have already been presented in this report:

- The gradual erosion in the historical distinctions existing between “housewives” and other women in old-age benefits, survivors' benefits and disability insurance;
- The improvements in the benefits of severely disabled persons.

229. In order to further promote the welfare of women in Israel, a steering committee has been set up which is headed by the Director General of the NII.

230. In addition, mention should be made of a number of examples of recent legislation bearing on the subject of gender equality in social security:

- The definition of “self-employed” was changed, allowing women who work part-time to be insured for employment injury and to be eligible for maternity allowance;
- Payment of maternity allowance to fathers, allowing women to return to work before the end of the 3-month maternity leave, leaving the infant with its father;
- The period during which a woman must rest, due to risk pregnancy, is now considered part of the qualifying period for purposes of maternity allowance;
- The expansion of the definition of single-parent family, to include women who have just begun the divorce process, in civil or religious courts.

Benefit recipients in the eastern Jerusalem neighbourhoods

231. The Committee expressed its concern in its concluding observations regarding the coverage of Arab population living in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. The following tables show the actual situation for 1999 of both aspects to be taken into consideration: the benefits granted and the contributions collected.

The poor

233. The principal recent developments in the area of poverty in Israel have been as follows. The following table clearly shows that in 1997, the incidence of poverty in Israel stabilized, and that it remained stable in 1998 as well.

234. The relative stability in the incidence of poverty in Israel that characterized the population as a whole was also observed among specific population groups, with the exception of families headed by an elderly person, single-parent families and new immigrant families, whose poverty incidence declined in 1998. This stability is notable, in view of the recession in economic activity and the slack in the labour market. It testifies to the central role played by the system of transfer payments in ensuring economic protection in times of unemployment and distress.

235. The improvement in families headed by an elderly person was not only in the incidence of poverty among these families, but also in the average income per poor family. The major reason for this is the increase which occurred in 1998 in the basic old-age benefit and the minimum income – relative to the average wage in the economy and the poverty line.

236. The decline in the incidence of poverty among single-parent families is attributed to a large extent to the improvement, which occurred in 1998, in the level of the income support benefit relative to the average wage in the economy and the poverty line.

237. The Public Council for Reducing Gaps in Society and the War on Poverty submitted its final recommendations in December 1999. The Council examined economic and social distress not only from the point of view of income, but also in the areas of education, housing, health and social services. It recommended measures for improving the existing methods of measuring poverty and incomes gaps, and increasing the knowledge of these phenomena, in order to build a more concrete basis for developing social policy and early intervention programmes.

238. Under an amendment to the National Insurance Law passed in November 1998, the NII now pays wage-replacing benefits at the least on the basis of the minimum wage. This change should have a noticeable impact in the future.

239. For a further review of trends and changes in national legislation, court decisions, etc., please see the National Insurance Institute's report, Summary of Developments and Trends in Social Security - 1999, submitted to the International Social Security Association (ISSA) (attached in annex V of the present report).*

Article 10: Familial rights

1. Related international conventions binding Israel

240. Israel is a party to the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women. In May 1997, Israel submitted its initial report to the Committee on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women. Its second report will be submitted in the coming months.

241. Since 1991, Israel has been a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Its second report will also be submitted to the Committee in the coming months.

242. Since 1991, Israel has been a party to the International Convention on the Rights of the Child, and will soon be submitting its initial report.

243. Israel is a party to the ILO Minimum Age Convention 1979 (No. 138). Its last report for the years 1996-2000 was submitted in August, 2000.

2. Meaning of "family"

(a) The definition of the term "family" in Israeli law

244. No change has occurred since Israel submitted its Initial Report.

(b) Meaning of family in administrative practice

245. No change has occurred since Israel submitted its initial report.

* The annexes can be consulted in the archives of the secretariat.

3. Majority

246. No change has occurred since Israel submitted its initial report, except the amendment of the Marriage Age Law 1960, described below under “Marriage”.

4. Assistance to the family and its protection

(a) The Fundamental Right to Family Life

247. The Halperin Committee: At the present time, ovules donation is permitted under Israeli law only in the case of a self-donation by a woman undergoing IVF treatment. Following an ongoing public debate on the subject, the Minister of Health decided, on 29 February 2000, on the establishment of a public committee, to examine the social, ethical, religious and legal aspects of ovules donation. The committee is examining, inter alia, the legitimacy of an ovule donation from a woman other than the one undergoing the IVF treatment, and the appropriate supervision and registration procedures of such process. The committee will also look into the desirability for legislation to regulate the rights and duties of all parties involved in such IVF process, including the resulting children, and shall submit its recommendations as to any related subject which it finds relevant. (More information about the actions of the committee can be obtained from the Israeli Ministry of Health Web site, www.health.gov.il).

248. Surrogate Motherhood: As of October 2000, 78 surrogacy agreements were approved, resulting in the birth of 26 children in 19 childbirths (due to the prevalence of twins). Two other surrogate mothers are currently pregnant. Twenty-five couples whose agreements had been approved terminated the process midway, or completed the surrogacy process which did not result in a pregnancy. Two of the prospective parents gave birth to children unaided by a surrogate after the approval of their surrogacy agreements.

(b) Marriage

249. In the initial report it was stated that women may consent to marry without their parent’s or guardian’s permission from the age of 17, whereas there was no minimum age for males to consent to marry. The Marriage Age Law, 1950, was amended in 1998, and in accordance with the amendment, the rules applying to female youngsters now apply equally to males.

250. Article 5 of the Marriage Age Law, 1950, provided for two alternative grounds for judicial permission of under-age marriage. The amendment in 1998 added a third ground which permits a young male to marry, if the woman he wants to marry became pregnant or gave birth to his child.

(c) Strengthening and protecting the family

251. As far as economic benefits granted by the State to aid families see under article 9 in this report (social security).

Family reunification

252. In its concluding observations to Israel's initial report. The Committee further expressed concern with the process of family reunification for foreign spouses. This process is a gradual process, which lasts approximately five years from the day of the request. During the waiting period the spouse receives visiting visas and temporary residency licenses, so that he or she can work and live in Israel.

253. The probation period test has three criteria: (a) whether the spouse is indeed a sincere spouse, (b) whether the spouse is not a risk to the security of Israel or to public safety, and (c) whether the spouse's centre of life is in Israel. At the end of this process the spouse receives a permanent residency licence.

254. Since 1990 there have been approximately 10,000 reunification applications in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, most of which were in the years 1994-1995. Due to lack of manpower, combined with the large number of applicants, the length of time that it took to complete the process increased. In 1999, the Interior Ministry increased the number of personnel dealing with these requests, creating a special team for this purpose. Since then the length of time needed to complete this process has decreased, and the whole process became more efficient. As of now, all requests filed up to the year 2000 have been dealt with. During 2001, it should be possible to give immediate response to each application. A final response will still take a matter of months, since the process is a complicated one.

255. Of the 10,000 applications, 6,000 are in various stages of this process. Most of these applicants have received visiting and residency permits, and effectively live in Israel with their spouses. Seven hundred have completed the process and have received a permanent residency permit and are now permanent residents. The remainder have received a negative answer to their application. Negative answers are due to failure to meet the various criteria: sincerity of marriage, that the spouse's centre of life is in Israel, or a criminal or security problem.

256. Israel's Supreme Court, in its decision in H CJ 3648/97 Stamka v. The Minister Of Internal Affairs, ruled that there must be equality in the status of spouses of Jewish and non-Jewish Israeli citizens concerning the acquisition of Israeli citizenship by marriage. This was done by upholding a change in the Ministry of Interior's policy, which no longer favours Jewish citizens by automatically granting citizenship to their foreign national spouses. The Supreme Court held that section 4 (a) of the Law of Return should apply solely to the spouses of new Jewish immigrants, and not to those of Israeli Jewish citizens, regardless of their ethnic origin.

(d) Equality of treatment

257. Discrimination due to Sexual Orientation: On 21 February 2000, the High Court of Justice ordered the Minister of Interior to register the adoption of a child by his mother's lesbian partner in the Population Registration. The Court upheld the validity of an adoption order granted by a court in the child's native state of California, and rejected the registration clerk's claim that the registration of two mothers of one child is “biologically impossible” (HCJ 1779/99 Brener-Kadish v. the Minister of Interior). It should be noted that a request for a rehearing by an extended panel of the Supreme Court has been filed in this matter.

5. Maternity protection

(a) Maternity leave and protection of pregnant working women

258. The Women’s Employment Law, 1954, has been amended several times since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

259. In general, there is an ongoing move from protective-paternalistic legislation which restricts the participation in the workforce by pregnant women and women who gave birth, to legislation which sees the family-unit as a whole and advances greater involvement of fathers in child-rearing.

260. For example, the 1998 amendment to the Employment of Women Law, 1954 has given a pregnant woman the option to decide whether or not to work over-time, provided she supplies her employer with a medical certificate. The law thus trusts the woman as capable of assessing her exact physical and emotional condition, as well as her economic needs.

261. Similarly, the prohibition against employing a woman during her period of maternity pay-leave had been criticized. This rule was amended in 1997, to allow the couple to decide for themselves who would take the maternity leave during the second half of the 12-week maternity-leave period following the birth of a child. This particular change is even more revolutionary than the first change mentioned above, in the sense that it relates to deeply held public convictions and perceptions of motherhood versus fatherhood. Indeed, data from the National Insurance Institute indicates that this new law has been ahead of the public opinion. In 1999, two years since its enactment, only 218 of the fathers have taken advantage of this option to take the last six weeks of the maternity leave instead of their wives. When compared to the total requests presented that year, this constitutes a mere one-third of one per cent (0.33 per cent) of the requests.

262. Likewise, the right to the 12 weeks of maternity pay-leave in the case of an adoption of a child, which until 1998 could be claimed only by the adoptive mother, is now being awarded to either of the adoptive parents according to their own choice.

263. In addition, the Sick Pay (Absence from Work due to Pregnancy and Childbirth by Spouse) Law, 2000, entitles an employee to take seven days of sick leave per year, out of his total amount of “sick days” for the purpose of accompanying his spouse to treatments or medical examinations related to her pregnancy or to her delivery.

264. A 1999 Tel Aviv District Labour Court decision has adopted a broad interpretation to the privilege of a working mother to pass her right for a shorter working day to her spouse. The court stated that this privilege is reserved to all working mothers, regardless of whether they are hired employees or self-employed. The court held that this interpretation, which expands the circle of male workers willing to tend to their children while their spouse is working, was in accordance with the principles of basic equality as well as with the objective of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, and should be seen as encouraging the incorporation of women within high-ranking positions. It must be pointed out that the Na'amat Women's Organization joined in the case alongside the husband-claimant (Menahem Yahav and Na'amat v. The State of Israel).

265. The 1998 amendment to the Employment of Women Law, 1954 also extended the period of the protection during which pregnant women, women on maternity leave and women who are on high-risk pregnancy leave cannot be dismissed from their place of employment. This period was extended by the amendment for an additional 45 days after the woman's return to work. This amendment will make it far less tempting for employers to hire replacements during the employee's absence where such replacement would simply stay on once the protected employee can be legally fired. The amendment further prohibits any cutback in a pregnant employee's post without permission from the Minister on Labour and Social Affairs.

266. However, it must be noted that the percentage of such permissions for dismissals or for diminishing pregnant employees' posts has increased from approving 50 per cent of the requests in 1997, to 54 per cent in 2000.

267. Thus, in the first nine months of 2000, 339 permissions for dismissals were given (77 of the permissions were justified by financial difficulties the workplace was facing at the time of dismissal, and another 43 permissions followed the employee's consent). In 82 of the 213 cases in which permissions were denied, the employee returned to work before the decision was given.

268. As to the procedural aspects of handling these cases, in the course of the year 2000 the department supervisors began to provide the worker with the employer's request for her dismissal, so that her right to be heard can be more efficiently effected.

269. Finally, in 2000, an amendment to the Employment of Women Law, 1954 granted an employee the rights to absence from work and to protection from dismissal, when her absence is due to her need to stay in a battered women's shelter. The law defines "shelter" broadly, including any residence used for hiding from a battering spouse, provided that a social worker certifies that the woman or her child is endangered.

(b) Benefits and cash payments

270. As of April 2000 women who are unable to work due to a high-risk pregnancy receive the equivalent of their salary from the NII, up to 100 per cent of the average wage.

271. The “maternity grant” given to the mother immediately upon birth of her baby or to the adoptive parents, to help cover some of the initial costs of preparing their home for the baby, is currently equivalent to NIS 1,269 (slightly over US$ 300).

272. From the third child onward, families receive an additional “birth allowance” for 20 months. The allowance is equal to a certain percentage of the average monthly salary, which decreases with time.

273. Presently, the “maternity grant” is only given to women who give birth in a recognized medical facility. This legal situation is problematic, especially for Bedouin women who occasionally give birth outside these medical institutions. Several draft laws seek to extend the range of maternity grant receivers, to include women who do not give birth in an official medical institution. These draft laws are still in the primary stages of the legislative process. Another draft law in its primary stages seeks to prohibit the dismissal of a worker undergoing in vitro fertility treatments (IVF). (Additional information is produced in this report under the section on article 9.)

(c) History and development

274. See annex V for a summary of developments and trends in Social Security - 1999.*

(d) Equality

275. No changes have occurred since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

6. Youth protection

276. The Youth Employment Law, 1953, prohibits employment of persons under the age of 15. This law has been amended since the submission of Israel’s initial report. The main amendments consist of the following:

- The penal sanctions were made more stringent;
- The matter of use of youth in appearances and publications was regulated;
- The matter of medical examinations of youngsters was regulated.

277. For detailed information on these matters, please refer to Israel’s report to the ILO under Minimum Age Convention (No. 138), submitted in August 2000.

* Text of the annexes can be consulted in the archives of the secretariat.

278. It should be stressed that the State of Israel is preparing its initial report according to its obligation under the Covenant on the Rights of the Child. The said report will provide more data, as well as more in-depth analysis of regulations and practices relevant to child protection.

Article 11: The right to an adequate standard of living

279. Since the submission of Israel's initial report the right of every person to an adequate standard of living has continued to develop as a normative concept in the Israeli legal culture and jurisprudence.

280. The courts clearly accord great importance to the notion of a right to a "dignified existence". For example, the National Labour Court's wording of the purpose of unemployment benefits is "... to enable workers, expelled from the work force, dignified existence until they are accepted to their new job ..." (National Labour Court, Yafit Gisin v. National Insurance Institute, Taba 98/0-48, 10 August 1998).

281. Paragraph 5 of the Severance Pay Law grants a deceased employee's right to severance pay to his or her survivor. Holding that "The purpose of this statute was to enable survivors an honourable existence ..." the court denied an employer the right to deduct from the severance pay a debt of the deceased employee (National Labour Court Balk Chemicals Inc. v. Sarah Feler, Taba 57/3-124, 28 June 1998).

282. Israel's initial report mentioned the interpretation given to the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom (1992) in a book written by Justice Aharon Barak, the president of Israel's Supreme Court, according to which the right to basic needs is part of the constitutional right to human dignity, entrenched in the basic law (Barak 1994:416). This approach was adopted by Judge Elishevah Barak, currently deputy president of the National Labour Court, in a decision already reported in article 2 of this report. According to Judge Elishevah Barak the right to work "derives from the notion that human dignity presupposes a minimum of human existence ..." (Taba 54/2-289 Dr. Orly Peret v. Dr. Amitzur Farkash). Judge E. Barak went on to explicitly state that this right is protected under the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom (1992).

283. While the above decisions still do not constitute a coherent and systematic judicial approach, a recent binding precedent from the Supreme Court on the issue should be taken into account.

284. In a judgement delivered on 19 March 2001 by Israel's Supreme Court in the case of Gamzo v. Ishayahu (REC 4905/98), the court interpreted the Enforcement of Judgments Law, 1967 in a novel manner. This law grants discretionary power to spread alimony payments whenever needed due to "special reasons". The court ruled that these "special reasons" include protecting the "hard core" of the right to minimal standard of living, the right to adequate food and the right to proper health care of both the debtor and the holder of the right to alimony. The court added (holding with the said "interpretive approach") that the "hard core" of these rights is protected by the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

285. This new precedent constitutes a further step towards recognition of the right to a “minimal” standard of living, at least for the purposes of interpretation of statutes. In the context of this ruling, there was no need to consider recognition of a concept of “decent” standard of living as well.

Poverty

287. The principal recent developments concerning the dimensions of poverty in Israel have been reported above under article 9 of this report (paras. 233-239).

288. As was set out in Israel's initial report, data on the topic of poverty should be read in conjunction with the tables presenting the resources and their use, including GNP, GDP, per capita GNP and GDP, private consumption expenditure over the years as well as GNP by deciles. Such tables, as updated since the initial report, are as follows:

293. A review of the food balance sheets collected annually from 1947 to 1999 reveals an increase in per capita consumption of calories from 2,610 to 3,543 kcal/day, an increase of 36 per cent. It is of interest to note the marked increase in the consumption of fat from 343 to 579 kcal/day, an increase of 69 per cent; the increase in the consumption of vegetables from 65 to 121 kcal/day, an increase of 86 per cent; and the increase in the consumption of meat from 95 to 343 kcal/day, an increase of 260 per cent.

The household expenditure survey

294. The main data from the latest survey was produced above, and has shown no notable change since the initial report.

Special surveys

295. It is necessary to look beyond the overall per capita aggregate in order to determine how the nutritionally vulnerable groups fare. The Ministry of Health (Department of Nutrition and the Israeli Center for Disease Control) has completed the initial stage of the first National Health and Nutrition Survey ("NNS"). A random population sample was extracted to yield 4,500 Israelis, ages 25 to 64 years old. The NNS was designed to monitor food intake, nutritional habits, exercise, smoking, knowledge and attitudes regarding lifestyle, health and nutrition status of the population. This is the largest and most comprehensive nutrition survey ever carried out in Israel. The findings are used to form a basis for formulation of dietary guidelines and recommendations for Israel, and aid in identifying areas requiring development of intervention programmes, such as food fortification. The survey provides information regarding minorities and vulnerable groups, and a database for public health policy decisions, as well as health and nutrition education and promotion programmes. Additional NNS surveys are being carried out in specific population groups. In 2001, the NNS survey will concentrate on infants, children and adolescents. The potential areas of concern and the policy for Israel have remained the same since submission of the initial report.

(c) Methods of improvement of production, conservation and distribution of food

296. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

3. The right to adequate housing

(a) Housing situation in Israel

Tenure

297. There is little more data available beyond that which was reported in Israel's initial report based on the Family Expenditure Survey conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics in 1992-1993, so the data reported in the initial report is still viable.

298. Of the new immigrants who arrived in Israel between 1989 and 2000 from the former Soviet Union, the situation today shows an increase in the ownership rate with approximately 75 per cent of the new immigrants owning their own home. The breakdown is as follows:

Table 40

Public housing eligibility

302. Public housing companies administer approximately 107,000 housing units (7.5 per cent of total households in Israel). The most recent official figures indicate that approximately 2,500 families are listed on waiting lists for public housing.

303. In 1998, the Public Housing Law (Purchase Rights), 1998, was enacted which gives public housing tenants purchasing rights. This law will enter into force at the earliest in 2001. In addition, the Government is selling public housing units to tenants within the framework of a special arrangement. According to this, the tenants may purchase their unit at a substantial discount, proportional to the number of years they have lived in the unit, provided they have lived in the unit a minimum of 12 months and that they do not have another apartment. The discount is 3 per cent of the price of the unit, per year of living in the unit, up to a 90 per cent discount on the part of the price, not amounting to more than NIS 600,000. People with disabilities receive higher discounts. The right to purchase is also given to a relative of a deceased tenant, who lived with the tenant for three years prior to his death. The income from these sales is designated for financing long-term solutions for those eligible for public housing.

304. Up until September 2000, several thousand such units were sold. The sale is continuing, but implementation of this programme is not as easy as expected. There are, for example, instances of disagreement between tenants and governmental housing companies regarding the assessment of the level of participation in repairs to be made before turning over the ownership to the tenant.

Homelessness

305. The number of "homeless" persons in Israel at the present is estimated to be approximately 2,000.

306. In December 2000, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs published the results of a survey it conducted on the socio-demographic characteristics of homelessness in Israel. This survey is based on a sample of 644 homeless persons approached by the social services during the year 1997. According to this survey, the vast majority of homeless persons (76.2 per cent) are new immigrants who have exhausted their various rights to assistance: 85.7 per cent of all homeless persons are males; 83.4 per cent declare themselves as Jews, 11.7 per cent - Christians and 1.1 per cent - Muslims; 62.3 per cent have secondary and postsecondary education; 77.5 per cent are 24-55 years old (the sample did not cover youngsters under the age of 18); 71.5 per cent speak the Hebrew language; 44.1 per cent have no special working skills (22.6 per cent are blue-collar workers); 59.9 per cent were diagnosed as suffering from mental disorders (29.4 per cent suffer from addiction, 23.9 per cent from mental illness). Finally, 94.7 per cent of the sample were singles with few familial ties in Israel (only 28.9 per cent reported having actual contacts with their relatives).

307. Most homeless persons (86.6 per cent) stay in the large cities (Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Haifa); 63.1 per cent stayed in the streets for 1-6 months and 21.3 per cent for over one year. Most of the chronic homeless persons suffer from addiction of some kind.

308. About 20 per cent of the homeless persons in the survey had contacted the social services on their own initiative. All others were reached with the help of local social workers, police or other public enforcement forces, neighbours, passers-by or benevolent organizations.

309. This survey opens the way for further research. For example the survey found that most homeless persons were males. Is this due to the fact that the social services reach fewer women than men, or is it due to a relative sensitivity of the social safety nets to the needs of single-mothers? Furthermore, can anything be inferred from the survey concerning youth homelessness? The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs will undoubtedly address such questions in the future.

Non-discrimination in housing

310. Special attention was accorded in the initial report to two particularly vulnerable sub-groups:

- New immigrants from Ethiopia
- Bedouins living in illegally constructed settlements.

In addition, the relative situation of Arab Israelis continues to be a source of concern, even though important improvements in the situation can be reported.

New immigrants from Ethiopia

311. As of December 1999, 60,563 immigrants from Ethiopia had settled in Israel. This population group is relatively young (60 per cent are younger than 18 years old), with a large number of children in the families and a high percentage of single parent families (more than 25 per cent). By the end of 1999, the population of this group has reached 74,000 people.

312. It should be mentioned that although there are more immigrants coming into Israel from Ethiopia (8,106 immigrants between April 1996 to August 2000), the numbers of families and singles in caravan sites are constantly decreasing. Following a governmental decision of January 1999, immigrants are no longer settled into caravan sites. The fast decline in people living in caravan sites is also due to the relatively high mortgage rate given to Ethiopian immigrants wishing to purchase a home.

Israeli Arabs

313. The following relates mainly to issues that were not dealt with in the initial report, but which were raised by the Committee.

314. An important decision was taken by the Government in October 2000, which was reported under article 2 in this report. This government decision is directly relevant to the issue of equal enjoyment of housing rights. As this decision is quite recent, its implementation will be reported in Israel's next periodic report. However, the decision itself, reflects the Government's appreciation that progress in closing the gaps between Jews and Arabs has not been advancing quickly enough in recent years.

315. The important new High Court decision in the case of A'dal Ka'adan (also reported under article 2), may also prove to have dramatic impact. This will also be evaluated in Israel's next periodic report.

316. Regarding planning in Arab sectors, a new district plan for the northern district of Israel was deposited on 7 September 1999. Most of the suggested development is in the central sector of the Galilee, in which 41 per cent of the Jewish population of the district reside, and 82 per cent of the Arab population of the district reside. The accelerated development of this sector will increase the standard of living for both population groups, and especially the Arab population due to its more substantial weight. Furthermore, the scheme gives special consideration to the special demographic needs of the Arab population, which are higher than the Jewish population group.

317. New Arab settlements are not planned, because of a policy of developing the current settlements. This policy was adopted on the basis of trend analysis and interviews made with the heads of the Arab population.

318. Regarding the south of the country, a new district plan was approved on 23 January 2000. Among this Plan's goals are to integrate the Bedouin population in the south. It increases the area of the Bedouin city of Rahat, and of six other Bedouin settlements.

319. However, the Bedouins have petitioned Israel's Supreme Court, contending that the new district plan does not reflect their need for rural settlements. The petition is currently pending before the court.

320. It should be noted that in a recent survey conducted by the Government, it was found that of 74 settlements with mostly Arab population, 37 had approved local plans, with the rest in various approval or planning stages.

321. Illegal building in the Arab sector is a complex issue. The Arab population growth rate is 3 per cent per year. The number of new families that need housing is about 10,000 a year. A large part of the Arab population solve this housing problem within the confines of existing familial housing (by enlarging an existing house or adding another building in a family courtyard). Every year the pressure for adding more plots and enlarging existing settlements grows. The phenomenon of illegally constructed building is fuelled by these factors.

322. Illegally constructed building occurs in part on land owned by a family, which is not approved for residence. Another part of the illegal construction takes place by seizing public lands. Traditionally, Arab building of residences is done in single-story buildings, in "low-density" construction. With time, these buildings become multi-story buildings through enlargement for descendants. The only high-density construction in the Arab sector is done in mixed Jewish-Arab communities or mostly Jewish communities. Since the size of such communities cannot increase indefinitely, and since the problem worsens each year, there is a growing need for a move toward multi-story (high-density) construction.

323. Regarding issues of entry and residence, it should be noted that Israel allows the entry of Palestinian spouses married to Israeli Arabs in a process of family reunification and the return of residency. Family reunification was discussed under article 10 of this periodic report.

324. Regarding the current residency of Palestinians in Israel, it should be pointed out that on 31 October 1999, the criteria pertaining to the loss of residency changed, following a petition to Israel's Supreme Court, in the case of The Center for the Protection of the Individual v. The Minister of the Interior (HCJ 2227/98), which is still pending. The original criteria had determined that any resident who moves his centre of life outside of Israel for seven years would lose his residency. Under this new policy, this rule is not applied to a person who retains a "proper link" to Israel during the said period. Furthermore, people who lost their permanent residence status since 1995, may now regain it: such person who visited Israel since leaving the country and lived here for two years, will be viewed as having received a new permanent residence permit since his arrival. Whoever lost his permanent residency status without notice from the Ministry of the Interior, will be viewed as having a permanent residence permit if he or she visited Israel during the time that his or her Leaving Card is valid. These new criteria are more lenient, and were enacted to minimize the retroactive aspect of this directive, and to increase the transparency of this process.

The population in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem

325. The situation of the residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem should be seen in the proper historical, cultural and demographic background.

326. In the light of some 3,000 years of history, it seems most curious that the distinction between the eastern and western areas of Jerusalem is based solely on the 19-year period between 1948 and 1967, when Jerusalem was divided. During that 19-year period, eastern Jerusalem, which was a cluster of villages with a rural character, was never developed. Since 1967, eastern Jerusalem has developed into a modern urban environment. Western Jerusalem, on the other hand, was, throughout the period a modern capital city whose neighbourhoods had developed since 1914 according to urban plans based on the city's special topography. Thus, in 1967, at the reunification of Jerusalem, significant gaps existed between the eastern and western parts of Jerusalem.

327. The villages located in the eastern sector of the city developed from family settlements, and the tendency was for small parcels of land to be owned by a variety of private landlords. Land registration was not systematic and was not up-to-date. Thus legal ownership of particular tracts of land is often unclear and there are many instances of more than one claim to ownership to the same parcel of land. Urban planning is based on land ownership; re-designing and updating the registration system prior to preparation of urban plans involves extensive surveying, and this process is as yet incomplete.

328. As a result, there are many cases of difficulty and inability to prove legal land ownership, or of two or more persons claiming ownership of the same land. The municipality of Jerusalem has a policy of accepting affidavits regarding ownership from village Mukhtars or neighbours.

329. In these villages, private considerations traditionally take precedence over communal interests. Thus, projects such as road building, which the residents may want, are problematic as they involve taxation and land expropriation. In fact, residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem are not required to participate directly in the cost of developing or renewing the infrastructure of their neighbourhoods, while residents of western Jerusalem are obliged to make substantial contributions towards the costs of such projects.

330. In 1967, residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem used wells to obtain water. The reunification of Jerusalem necessitated the unification of all infrastructure systems. Accordingly, effective water and sewage systems have been set in place.

331. Natural increase in the population in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem has always exceeded the natural increase of the Jewish population. In 1967, the city's population consisted of 197,000 Jews (74.2 per cent) and 68,000 Arabs (25.8 per cent). In 1999, the Jewish population of the city had grown to 429,000 (69 per cent of the population), while the Arab population had grown to 193,000 (31 per cent of the population).

332. The increase in the number of housing units built since 1967 corresponds to the proportions of the population – as do current plans to build 15,000 new housing units in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem and 35,000 in the Jewish sector.

333. The traditional rural building in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem consisted of detached homes for the extended family on privately owned land. This has proven to be very land-consuming, in comparison with the apartment blocks which characterize Jewish neighbourhoods. In the Arab sector, there is an average of 11 people living in 1.9 housing units per dunam (approximately one quarter acre) of land, while in the Jewish sector the figure is 19 people living in 5.9 units per dunam of land.

334. Much of the public building in the western neighbourhoods of Jerusalem has been financed by private donations received from the Jewish diaspora, whereas the Municipality of Jerusalem and the Israeli Government finance public building in all parts of the city.

335. The municipality of Jerusalem has given priority to a development programme for the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, in coordination with the Government of Israel. The total sum required to bridge the gap is estimated at 520 million New Israeli Shekels (NIS). The Government allocated NIS 450 million for this purpose. The sum of NIS 60.1 million was allocated by the Government in 1999 especially for the development of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem.

336. Between 1997 and 1999, a number of important projects were completed in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. This included the construction of roads (NIS 42 million), improvements to existing roads (NIS 40 million), water and sewage systems (NIS 40 million), community centres (NIS 10 million) and other projects (NIS 47 million) for a total of NIS 179 million.

337. Town plans are in the process of being prepared for all neighbourhoods of the city. Whereas, in the Jewish neighbourhoods it takes an average of three years to establish such plans, in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, the historical factors outlined above cause the process to take considerably longer.

338. In Jerusalem the policy has been to plan development in cooperation with the residents of the eastern neighbourhoods; for example in Tsur Baher, near Har Homa, 400 units to be built on government land will be marketed by an Arab association. The area has been re-zoned to allow for more intensive construction: 75 per cent of the land may be built on, as opposed to the 50 per cent which had been originally allocated.

339. At A Sawaneh, a camp of homeless people had been set up on land belonging to the WAKF (Moslem Charitable Trust), where a special education school was planned. The WAKF tacitly co-operated with the municipality in evicting the residents of the camp, and gave the land to the school, which was built by the municipality.

340. All building plans are subject to approval by the District Planning and Building Committee. The rate of application for building permits corresponds approximately with the percentages of the population. In the first half of 1999, approximately 20 per cent of the total number of applications were received from residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. Of the total applications for building permits which were received, approximately 60 per cent of those submitted by residents of the eastern neighbourhoods were approved and approximately 67 per cent of those submitted by residents of western Jerusalem were approved. In western Jerusalem, building infringements almost invariably consist of illegal additions built on to a legal building, such as a room in a courtyard or an attic added in a roof space. In the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, they typically take the form of entire buildings illegally constructed without a permit. Thus, demolitions in the eastern part of Jerusalem are far more extensive than in the western part of the city.

341. With respect to demolitions of illegal buildings, the policy of the municipality of Jerusalem is to issue a demolition order where the construction of such illegal buildings interfere with plans for public facilities, such as schools or roads, or with the city's historical heritage. The Interior Ministry also has the authority to demolish illegal buildings. Throughout the past years, there has been a growing trend of illegal construction of buildings without a permit in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. In 1997 the total number of these such illegal new buildings was 202; in 1998 it was 485 and in 1999 it was 554. Only a small number of demolition orders are actually carried out each year:

Table 45

Demolition orders: Figures for the period between 1 January 1999-30 June 1999

	Western neighbourhoods of Jerusalem	Eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem
Applications for administrative demolition orders	9 orders	50 orders
Administrative demolition orders carried out	4 orders	11 orders

It should be stressed that all demolitions are conducted with due process and subject to judicial review.

The Bedouin "Unrecognized Villages"

342. Israel's initial report expressly recognized the problematic aspects of this issue. The following are developments that have occurred since then regarding the provision of basic utilities and planning.

Provision of basic utilities

343. A recent budget proposal for the years 2001-2004, based on a four-year plan for the completion of development and infrastructure in the existing Bedouin towns, requests the allocation of NIS 1,195,050,000. This is a significant sum, which is to be used to complete the infrastructure in existing settlements, to construct water and sewage infrastructure where it is incomplete and for the establishment of public facilities such as schools and clinics.

344. The total funds allocated to the Bedouin sector within Israel's budget for the year 2000 have increased threefold in comparison to the period of Israel's initial report.

345. Water is allocated to the Bedouin community living in illegally constructed villages through the "Water Connections Allocation Committee". During the last three years, the total number of connections to the water main lines has increased from 60 connections to 260 connections. Except for 50,000 of the Bedouin population, all of the unrecognized villages have a connection to water services. The 50 per cent of the Bedouin population who live outside the recognized settlements are allowed to tap into the National Water Carrier system at designated sites in order to bring drinking water to their homes.

346. The establishment of a sewage system is under the authority of the local municipalities. The minority local municipalities receive generous loans for this purpose which exceed those allocated to Jewish local municipalities.

347. The Israeli Government seeks to establish six new "service centres" for the Bedouins in the Negev. When completed, these centres will contain facilities for various service providers, ranging from educational facilities, religious centres and health centres to shopping and industrial facilities. It is planned that these centres will be built outside of existing towns, with the purpose of serving as a basis for new Bedouin towns.

348. Since Israel's initial report, new industry and trade centres have been built in Hura, Segev Shalom and Aroer.

349. Until 1996, most unrecognized villages could not be connected to electricity due to provisions of Section 157A of the Planning and Building Law. This section prohibits the connection to the electricity grid of illegally-built buildings (i.e. buildings not having received building permits or which deviated from the terms of such permits). This section was introduced to provide an effective sanction against the disregard of planning regulations. The provision, which also prohibits hook-up of water and telephones, applies equally to the entire population. However, the Knesset decided to mitigate the effect of the section on the Arab unrecognized villages, and passed a special law (The Supply of Electricity (Special Provisions) Law, 1996) allowing the connection of illegal buildings in a large number of Arab villages to the electricity grid, provided that there was no outstanding court order to demolish the building and that it was built prior to Section 157A coming into force (1987). The special law should facilitate the connection of approximately 10,000 buildings to the electricity grid. To date 4,000 buildings, mostly in unrecognized villages, have been approved for connection.

350. Since Israel's initial report, five additional Health Fund medical clinics ("Kupat Holim") were built to provide for the needs of Bedouin living outside the Bedouin towns, raising the total of such clinics to seven. This is in addition to five new Mother and child health clinics ("Tipat Halav") have recently been built in Bedouin towns.

351. The infant mortality rate of Bedouin in the Negev, as a whole, is 13 per 1,000 population. Of these, 5.8 per 1,000 die of congenital malformations and inherited diseases, more than double the average national rate. This is due to a very high rate of first cousin marriages (above 45 per cent) and second cousin marriages (above 10 per cent) in this population. For the past six years, the Ministry of Health has been funding a programme aiming at reducing infant mortality, through a multiphase, multidisciplinary programme. This programme has been designed in concert with the Bedouin population to be culturally appropriate and culturally sensitive.

352. With regard to education, it should be emphasized that pupils in unrecognized villages are entitled to the same level of education as all other pupils in Israel. However, for obvious reasons, it is not possible to build elementary and high schools in every village, whether recognized or not. Hence, 11 per cent of the pupils of Israel (Jews and non-Jews) study in regional schools that serve rural localities. Thus, it is not uncommon that even recognized localities do not have their own local schools.

353. Pupils in the non-Jewish sector who reside in localities that have no recognized municipal status attend schools in recognized localities. However, there are various other logistic difficulties in providing access to schools for pupils from unrecognized villages, since schools are built in accordance with approved zoning plans to meet primarily the needs of the recognized settlements. However, in any case, transportation services to schools are provided for most pupils in unrecognized villages.

354. Furthermore, the special situation of pupils from unrecognized villages is given consideration by the education authorities. The education system allocates extra resources (primarily study hours) to schools whose pupils suffer from environmentally caused academic deficiencies. A special index is used to determine the eligibility of schools to receive such additional resources and one of the criteria of this index in the non-Jewish sector is the inclusion of pupils from unrecognized villages. In other words, the higher the percentage of pupils who come from families that reside in unrecognized villages, the more resources are allocated to the school. Thus, schools with pupils from unrecognized villages receive additional teaching hours which enables them to deal with the specific problems of this population (most notably, poor domestic complementary studying conditions).

355. All the Bedouin pupils study in 53 primary schools and 10 secondary schools. In the unrecognized settlements there are 15 primary schools and 80 kindergartens for children from the age of three.

356. The education system in the Bedouin sector faces many difficulties that are partially the result of the unique Bedouin style of life in a plethora of unplanned settlements as well as their culture. (For a more detailed discussion, please refer to paragraph 6 (f) under the discussion of article 13.)

357. Regarding the right to plant, the Government is not aware of any policy which denies landowners the right to plant fruits and vegetables. It may be the case that such restrictions are imposed on illegal occupiers of land.

Planning

358. A few preliminary points should be noted: there have been no expropriations of Bedouin land since 1989, aside from expropriation for the purpose of roads or railroad construction. The last expropriation, which occurred in 1989, was done for the purpose of building a new Bedouin town.

359. The information received by the Committee regarding ownership claims on Bedouin lands, is inaccurate. The Land Settlements Department was not established to address Bedouin land claims, but was established by the British Mandatory Government during the 1930s to deal with various land claims in the absence of legally-registered rights in mandatory Palestine. Since then, the department has addressed title claims involving all sectors of the population in Israel, including inter alia Bedouins claims. Legal title must be proven before the department in accordance with the rules laid down by law, and the department has little, if any, discretion on the matter. It can neither grant title where none has been proven, nor revoke title where it has been established.

360. The department deals with Bedouin land claims in the same manner in which all such claims are treated. Near the end of 1998, Bedouins claiming a total of 730,000 dunams presented 3,274 such claims. The Land Rights Settlement Ordinance [New Version], 1969, authorizes the department to admit land claims if proof of registered ownership or uninterrupted possession is provided. However, in many cases Bedouin claims are not supported by proper documentation establishing ownership; furthermore, Bedouin land title claims are often exorbitant, and cover huge areas of land through which they have moved over the years, without maintaining continuous possession. Thus, most claims do not satisfy the legal requirements provided in the law.

361. Nevertheless, in an attempt to come up with pragmatic solutions, the Government has decided to approve financial settlement with the Bedouins. In 168 cases, a settlement has been reached, and in 527 other cases the Government has expropriated the land in question and is negotiating a financial settlement (to date, compensation has already been paid for 46,000 dunams of the 75,000 taken). The department is negotiating a settlement to the remaining 2,500 land claims raised by the Bedouins, covering an area of 550,000 dunams.

362. Finally, hardly any of the illegally constructed Bedouin houses in the Negev have been demolished within the last two years. According to recent estimates, there are currently over 60,000 illegal houses in the Negev.

Planning - the Bedouin Sector in the North

363. In 1998, the Government decided to embark upon a five-year programme to develop the Bedouin settlements in the North. The budget for this programme should be NIS 615 million (approximately $154 million), from 1999 to 2003. This programme encompasses many subjects, including developing new neighbourhoods, building public institutions, building roads, sewage, industrial areas, improving the education system, building social services institutions and more. This programme has been in progress since 1999, although it has not been fully implemented in every area, because of administration problems.

364. The following table provides information concerning several prior decisions to give a legal municipal status to several "unrecognised villages". These villages are currently in different stages of the process for approving the plans. Settlements with approved plans may go forward with infrastructure plans (electricity, water, sewage and communication). These settlements are:

Plans in approval stages	1. Hussnia 2. Ras El-Ein	1. Ein Hod
Plans approved	1. Dmeira 2. Kamane	1. Hawaled 2. El Arian

365. As can be seen in the above table, the village of Arab El-Naim will be recognized after its plans are completed and approved. Ein Hod's building plans are completed and await approval (both these settlements were of special concern to the Committee).

Planning - the Bedouin sector in the South

366. There are now, according to estimates, more than 120,000 Bedouins living in the Negev desert area, in the South of Israel, with a yearly population growth rate of about 5.8 per cent.

367. In 1999, the Government decided on the establishment of up to five new Bedouin towns. Under a special new arrangement made for the compensation of Bedouins moving into towns or recognized villages, Bedouins shall not be charged for the land in the new village. Moreover, they shall receive significant compensation for any property they abandoned at the illegal settlement.

368. A new proposal seeks to establish four additional Bedouin settlements: two villages, a suburban town and an agricultural village. In addition, two new neighbourhoods are to be built in existing towns.

369. The aforementioned decisions gained the support of the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education and the General Health Fund. Each of these will be responsible for the establishment of its institutions in the new settlements, in order to provide for the establishment of an infrastructure of schools and health clinics.

370. On 21 August 2000, the Government decided to embark upon a new policy regarding the Bedouin population in the South. The purpose of this programme is to close the social and economic gaps, which exist between this population group and the rest of the population.

371. The Government's new programme includes the building of new settlements for the Bedouin sector. An attempt will be made to meet the requirements of the Bedouin population for additional land. However, ownership of land will no longer be a precondition for supplying services. New settlements have already been decided upon, and will include Mareit (Darajat), Beit-Pelet and Beit-Hil. Regarding these new settlements, plans have already been presented to the planning institutions for approval. The new settlements of Hawashla, UmBetin, Tarabin Al-Sana and Molada are still in the planning stage.

The Jahalin Bedouins

372. Of particular concern is the situation of the Jahalin Bedouin families. This is a nomad Bedouin tribe, which has never had a permanent residence. After the city of Ma'ale Edomim was built, the Jahalin took up residence near the city, on land which had already been purchased by other people.

373. The Jahalin filed a petition with Israel's Supreme Court, which rejected their claim to the land. The court determined that the Jahalin came to that site only after the city had been built.

374. The Government then sought to move the Jahalin families to another site approximately one kilometre from the previous site. The new site is located near a main road and is near a Palestinian settlement, which can provide them with civic services.

375. Each family was given a plot of land, registered in its name. The Government conducted a land development project, which included connecting the site with the electrical power grid and laying down water lines. The plans were approved, and it was decided not to collect the usual taxes and fees that each resident would have had to pay with the development plan. Despite the fact that the Jahalin families resided in tents, which they retained, they were also given steel containers in which they can put their belongings. They are also encouraged to build permanent housing. The Government also gave each family that voluntarily moved, a sum of money to assist it during the interim period. These arrangements were agreed upon in the context of a settlement reached following a second petition by the Jahalin families to the Supreme Court. These arrangements were given force on 7 February 1999.

376. As a result of the above efforts, the living conditions of the Jahalin families have improved since their move to the new site.

(b) Overview of current housing assistance programmes

377. The Ministry of Construction and Housing now has a budget of NIS 10.7 billion (approximately $2.7 billion). There have been no notable changes in the Ministry's programmes since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Supply-side policies

378. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Demand -side assistance

379. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Mortgage assistance

380. Single-parent families: as reported in Israel's initial report, the level of assistance to this group is relatively higher than for most other non-homeowners. The following table illustrates the form and level of mortgage assistance for this group:

Table 48Assistance for single-parent families (in NIS)

Years as single-parent	Mortgage rate	Portion which is a conditional grant	Initial monthly payment	Addition mortgage for each month of military service	Part of which is a conditional grant
3-5	168 000	46 200	614	1 680	462
Over 5	190 000	52 200	693	1 900	522

381. Singles over the age of 30 are now entitled to assistance for mortgages only for the purchase of housing, while the other age groups remain the same as reported in Israel's initial report.

382. For the elderly, no notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

383. Regarding immigrants, no notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report. As reported in Israel's initial report concerning new immigrants from Ethiopia, in light of their rather unique situation, there are special criteria that further raise the level of mortgages (see above).

384. No notable changes have occurred on the issue of substitution or enlargement of residence since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Rent supplements

385. Provisional data for the year 2000 show that rent supplements were made available to more than 168,500 households each month. Of these households, almost 134,600 were new immigrants; 15,000 were young couples with the requisite number of points; 8,300 were single-parent households; and 2,800 were elderly households, other than those included in immigrant families.

Public housing - placement in publicly-owned buildings with a subsidized rent

386. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Special assistance of the Ministry for Labour and Social Affairs

Temporary relief in acute housing crisis

387. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Special assistance to homeless

388. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

(c) The legal framework of housing assistance

389. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

4. Government policy to combat poverty in Israel - recent trends and developments

390. This topic is also dealt with in this second periodic report under article 9 (last paragraphs). It is also mentioned at the beginning of this present article, in connection with the tables on GDP and GNP.

391. During the years 1995-1999, there was a five-year programme of development in the Druze and Circassian sectors. This programme included a budget of NIS 1,070 million (approximately $250 million), which targeted different objectives, such as sewage, water, roads, electricity, health, housing and others.

392. On 30 January 2000, the Government decided to embark on a programme for the year 2000. This programme gave assistance to 11 local authorities with high rates of unemployment and continuing difficult social-economic conditions. This programme focuses on public utilities, public institutions, and infrastructure. Among those local authorities are three which contain mixed Jewish and Arab populations: Lod, Ramla and Acre (which were also mentioned in the Committee's concluding observations on Israel's initial report). In addition, there is also a large Bedouin village included in this programme – Tel Sheva.

Article 12: The right to the highest attainable standard of health

393. Israel's last report to the World Health Organization was submitted in 2000 and covers data up to 1998.

394. For further details, please refer to Israel's "Selected Health For All Indicators" Report, submitted to the WHO in 2000 (provided in annex VI to the present report).*

395. The population in Israel is still relatively young as reported in Israel's initial report. Life expectancy now is slightly higher than reported in the initial report. Life expectancy at birth in Israel was 78.4 years in 1996, close to the average in the European Union. Male life expectancy was 76.3 years in 1996 and 76.1 years in 1998, the third highest among a reference group of 20 European countries. In marked contrast, female life expectancy was 79.9 years in 1996 and 80.3 in 1998. These figures are below the EU average of 81.0 in 1996. The difference in life expectancy in Israel between men and women is the smallest of the 20 reference countries in 1998. The same situation existed in 1994 when life expectancy for men was 75.5 years and for women 79.5 years, as reported in Israel's initial report.

396. The mortality pattern shown by the life expectancy figures, in which male mortality is among the lowest in the reference countries, while that of women is among the highest, also appears in all main causes of death.

397. The Standardized Death Rate (SDR) for cardiovascular diseases in the 0-64 age group was close to the EU average in 1997 - 9.97 in Israel; 9.94 in EU. The SDRs for ischaemic heart disease were the fifth highest of the reference countries for women but the eighth lowest for men. The SDRs for cerebrovascular disease in the 0-64 age group is above the EU average for women and below the average for men. In both these diseases, both male and female SDRs fell sharply from 1982 to 1992.

398. Nation-wide health promotion programmes have gained momentum during the last few years, especially those emphasizing physical activity. The percentage of smokers in 1990 among people aged 20-plus was 35 per cent. In 2000, the percentage of smokers among people aged 20-plus was 30 per cent (among Jews, 36 per cent of males and 27 per cent of females; among non-Jews, 53 per cent of males and 10 per cent of females). Smoking is restricted in public areas and in the workplace. Alcohol consumption in 1993 was lowest of all reference countries.

399. Health expenditure as a percentage of the GDP was 8.7 per cent in 1998.

National Health Policy: The National Health Insurance Law - 1994

400. The National Health Insurance Law has greatly improved the universality and equality of health-care services provided to the Israeli population as a whole, and for the Bedouin population in particular. Every Bedouin resident now enjoys comprehensive health insurance (before the passage of the law, 40 per cent had no health insurance). The National Health Insurance Law has encouraged the health providers to build more clinics in the Bedouin population centres, both in established settlements and outside of established settlements. The health tax which funds the National Health Insurance is a progressive tax, tied to income and not to the amount of required health services. Over and above the improvements noted above, additional funds have been allocated for the financing of construction and operation of additional Mother and Child health care centres in the unrecognized Bedouin villages in the Negev. Similarly, the need for additional medical clinics (for medical care given pursuant to the National Health Insurance Law) has been surveyed and steps have been taken to insure the construction and operation of additional clinics.

401. The Committee's statements in its concluding observations regarding the changes in the National Health Insurance Law (as amended by the Arrangements Law for the year 1998) is partially inaccurate. There is no periodic health tax linked to the amount of health services needed, but a requirement for a minimal co-payment for certain services, in a manner designed to minimize the impact on the weaker socio-economic groups.
