402. At the inception of the National Health Insurance Law in 1995, residents were required by the health-care services providers (four in number) to make co-payments for medications. One health care service provider also required co-payments for visits to medical specialists. In 1998, the other three providers were authorized to require co-payments in various minimal amounts for visits to specialists and certain outpatient clinics. The co-payments are permitted once per calendar quarter per specialist visited, subject to a quarterly maximum payment per individual and a maximum payment per family, regardless of the number of family members for which the family head is responsible.

403. The change in the National Health Insurance Law was made in order to allow greater financial flexibility for the health-care providers, as an incentive to reduce unnecessary use of medical services, and to reduce the budget deficits of the health-care providers. In order to avoid harming the weakest socio-economic groups and to minimize the impact on others, the co-payment requirement is subject to the following limitations:

- Residents receiving supplemental income payments pursuant to the National Insurance Law are exempt;
- Residents receiving support payments pursuant to the Maintenance (Assurance of Payment) Law are exempt;
- Residents receiving invalidity or disability payments pursuant to the National Insurance Law are exempt;

- Residents who have AIDS, cancer, dialysis or other specified illnesses, are partially exempt;
- There is no co-payment requirement for visits to primary care physicians, pediatricians, gynaecologists or internal medicine specialists.

404. In addition to the exemptions specified above, the Ministry of Health periodically reviews the impact of the co-payment requirement to determine if other changes are warranted.

405. Additionally, it must be noted that the “basket of services” provided to insured persons, pursuant to the National Health Insurance Law, is reviewed at least annually and medical technologies and procedures as well as new medications are periodically added.

Health indicators of the World Health Organization

406. The trend in the infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births has been as follows:

Table 49: Infant mortality 1989-1998

Year	Total	Jews	Non-Jews
1989	10.1	8.2	14.7
1990	9.9	7.9	14.9
1991	9.2	7.2	14.2
1992	9.4	7.5	14.3
1993	7.8	5.7	12.8
1994	7.5	5.7	11.5
1995	6.8	5.6	9.6
1996	6.3	5.0	9.3
1997	6.4	5.0	9.4
1998	5.9	4.7	8.5
1999	5.8	4.5	8.4

407. A large part of the fall in infant mortality is due to the fall in mortality from infectious diseases and pneumonia. Death from congenital disorders is also showing a downward trend. In every population group, the higher the mother’s educational level, the lower the infant mortality rates. Mothers in the age groups “less than 20” and “35-plus” show a higher infant mortality rate than mothers in the 20-30 age group.

Table 50
Infant mortality (rate per 1,000 live births) by religion and age of neonate at death - 1993-1996

	Total		Early neonatal mortality 0-6 days		Late neonatal mortality 7-27 days		Post-neonatal mortality 28-365 days

Other religions	10.8	100	4.3	39.9	1.6	14.4	4.9	45.7

408. From 1990 to 1994, almost half the deaths of neonates occurred in the first six days of life, this proportion being much lower among non-Jews than among Jews (39.9 per cent v. 52.4 per cent). The disparity in post-neonatal death rates (28-265 days) between Jews and non-Jews is particularly wide (4.9 v. 6.3) and so is the disparity in the percentage of post-neonatal deaths in total infant mortality (28.7 per cent v. 45.7 per cent). The reason for the relatively high rates of mortality in the post neonatal period among non-Jews is usually associated with congenitive malformation and socio-economic factors, and is to a considerable extent preventable (programmes for dealing with this problem are detailed below in the section titled: "Vulnerable Groups").

409. It should be noted that among Jewish, Christian and Druze newborns, infant mortality rate fell to 7.5 deaths for every 1,000 live births, as intended in the Ministry of Health's objectives for the year 2000, which had been set in 1989. Among the Muslim population, despite the continuing decrease in child mortality rate, the aforementioned objectives are yet to be achieved.

Access to trained personnel

412. There has been no change in access to trained personnel since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Environmental control

413. There has been no change on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

Preventive care

414. Under paragraph 15 of the Public Health Ordinance, 1940, the Director General of the Ministry of Health or the District Health Officer has the power to require any person infected with an infectious disease to be placed in a hospital for infectious diseases or other appropriate form of isolation, should his or her current accommodation not permit taking the precautions necessary to contain the spread of the disease. Currently, this authority is used only in cases of tuberculosis and then only pursuant to court order.

Vulnerable groups

415. The effects of the Health Insurance Law on vulnerable groups are clearly apparent. Since the enactment of this law, the health funds have rapidly improved their services, especially within Arab communities, in order to raise their number of members and accordingly their funding (which the law sets pursuant a per capita formula).

416. Since 1993, the Ministry of Health has spent NIS 47 million (approximately US$ 11.4 million) in building 103 new mother and child health clinics in Arab towns and villages (8 of them are public dental clinics). The Ministry's budgets during the same period also included NIS 54.5 million (approximately $13.5 million) aimed at "closing the gaps within the Arab sector" in the field of preventive care.

417. The sums mentioned above are in addition to the "regular budget" of preventive care services supplied to the population as a whole, including the Arab sector.

418. The Ministry of Health is working intensively to reduce the Israeli Arab infant mortality rate, which is higher than among Jewish Israelis. The infant mortality rate is indeed a product of socio-economic conditions. An important reason for the gap between Jews and non-Jews in this indicator, is the very high rate of marriage between close relatives among Muslim Arabs (about 40 per cent), as compared to the rate for Jews. Therefore, the rate of congenital defects in Arab neonates is very high. Additionally, due to religious attitudes, many of the pregnant women among Muslim Arabs refuse to terminate pregnancies when congenital malformation is diagnosed before birth.

419. One aim of the Ministry of Health's education/information project is to discourage marriage among close relatives; another attempts to encourage pregnant women to make more use of in-utero diagnostic procedures; and a third objective is to encourage mothers to make more use of the mother and child care services dispersed throughout the country. One cannot measure the short-term results of such projects. More time is required before measurable results can be expected. A new project of pre-conceptual intervention aimed at reducing congenital malformations has been launched and 60 per cent of the targeted population is in the Muslim Arab population. Despite the above, infant mortality in the Muslim Arab sector has declined each year and is the lowest in the entire Muslim world.

420. All of the recognized and unrecognized Bedouin villages have connections to running water, except for the 50,000 Bedouins that are mentioned in Israel's initial report. These Bedouins receive water through standpipes, from which it is carried by vehicle, camel or on foot to the family home. The establishment of a sewage system is under the authority of the local government and the minority localities receive loans for this purpose which are more generous than those allocated to Jewish localities.

421. The infant mortality rate of Negev Bedouin is 13 per 1,000. Of this rate, 5.8 per 1,000 die of congenital malformations and inherited diseases, more than double the rate of infant deaths from this cause nationally (2.5 per 1,000). This unusually high rate is due to the very high rate of first cousin marriages (above 45 per cent) and second cousin marriages (above 10 per cent) in this population. The Ministry of Health has been funding a programme for the past six years whose aim is to try to reduce infant mortality due to intermarriage, through a multi-phase, multi-disciplinary programme that has been designed together with the Bedouin population to be culturally appropriate and culturally sensitive.

422. It should be noted that the infant mortality rate for Bedouin in the Negev is lower than the infant mortality rate of Arab populations in neighbouring countries.

423. Fifty per cent of Bedouin live in established settlements, in modern towns with municipal infrastructure, including running water in every home (that meets the Israeli standards for drinking water quality), electricity and sanitation services, as well as all the usual municipal services, such as local health clinics for curative as well as preventive maternal and child health care and educational services. The 50 per cent of Bedouin who live outside of established settlements are allowed to tap into the National Water Carrier system at designated sites in order to obtain drinking water that meets national standards, as stated above.

424. Five new Mother and Child Health Clinics (“Tipat Halav”) have recently been built in Bedouin towns. Since the submission of Israel’s initial report, five additional Health Fund medical clinics (“Kupat Holim”) were built to provide for the needs of Bedouins outside the Bedouin towns, raising the total of such clinics to seven.

425. Other changes in the situation of the Bedouin population were referred to above in the section on housing (discussion of article 11).

Community participation

426. No notable change occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

Health education

427. Coordinators from the Ethiopian community make contact with all HIV patients and carriers in their local communities. They help them communicate with professionals at the local AIDS treatment centre and educate them in ways to avoid spreading the disease, principally by teaching safe sex. Mobile medical teams set up clinics in mobile home sites populated by the Ethiopian community. Transportation to AIDS centres is paid for. Social workers help the patients with their psycho-social problems related to their illness.

428. Health education projects are being conducted by Ethiopian health educators in absorption centres, schools, the army and in higher educational institutions. Community theatre and video films are used during these workshops. Dramas concerning AIDS prevention are broadcast in Amharic-language radio and television programmes. It must be noted that for the most part, immigrants from Ethiopia come from the lowest socio-economic strata of a country that is ranked among the least developed countries in the world.

Article 13: The right to education

1. The legal framework

429. The Compulsory Education Law, 1949, which was referred to in Israel’s initial report, is being gradually applied to children ages 3-4 in certain areas in need. Thus the law applied in the year 2000 to 56,000 children of ages 3-4. As before, this education is to be provided free of charge.

430. As mentioned in the initial report, in 1990, the Knesset enacted the Long School Day Law. This law was repealed and replaced in 1997 by the Long School Day and Enrichment

Studies Law, 1997. The purpose of this law is to add study and education hours to the existing hours in educational institutions. The Minister of Education may, with the approval of the Education and Culture Committee of the Knesset, prescribe a different number of study hours for the Long School Day in certain educational institutions or study classes, provided that the number of weekly study hours shall not be less than 41 hours. For budgetary reasons, there is a gradual implementation of this law, starting with the 1997/98 school year, according to priorities set by the Minister.

431. In 2000, the total number of children enrolled in the education system under the supervision of the Ministry of Education reached about 1,500,000 - from the pre-primary level to the end of secondary school. Other eligible pupils attend schools supervised by the Ministry of Religious Affairs and by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. Combined with the above figures, it is estimated that nearly 100 per cent of the children in the primary school age group attend school, as well as about 95 per cent of the adolescents eligible for secondary education.

The constitutional status of the right to education

432. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

2. Structure of the education system

433. No notable changes have occurred in this structure since the submission of Israel's initial report.

(a) Pre-primary education

434. In 2000, the kindergarten system involved 270,000 children, ranging from age 2 to 6 years, attending public institutions (not including municipal and private institutions).

(b) Primary and secondary education

435. The 1968 reform is still being implemented slowly, and in 1999 - 26 per cent of the pupils were still attending schools according to the old system. There has been a decrease in these figures since 1996, as this is a new measuring system involving actual data and not an estimate.

(c) Higher education

436. As mentioned in Israel's initial report, university tuition is determined in accordance with the decision of a public committee, once every five years. At present the average undergraduate tuition fees is about NIS 10,500 (approximately US$ 2,600) per annum. A public committee is currently discussing tuition fees and assistance to students for the next five years (2002-2006) with the aim of alleviating the financial burden on students.

(d) Adult education

437. The number of persons with only four years or less of formal education has continued to decline, and there has been an improvement in the situation in all sectors. Among the non-Jewish population, the number of such persons decreased from 15.9 per cent in 1994 to 12.5 per cent in 1998, while among the Jewish population, the numbers fell to 4 per cent.

(e) Organizational difficulties in realizing the right to education

438. There has been no notable change in the policy of the Ministry of Education to make every effort to prevent youth from dropping out and to raise the percentage of those attending school (more information on this issue is provided below).

3. Statistical data(a) Literacy

439. The following tables introduce the figures pertaining to the extent of formal education possessed by the adult population of Israel throughout the years 1961-1998. It divides the population by Jews and non-Jews, sex, age and country of origin. According to this data, in 1998, 5 per cent of the total Israeli population had only 0-4 years of formal primary education.

(b) Attendance rates in the education system

440. The following tables reveal the gradual increase in the number of pupils in the Israeli education system. The first table shows the current number and rate of attendance in State schools. The second table presents the 1999 figures on the number of primary and secondary education pupils divided into four education sectors (the Jewish, and non-Jewish sectors). The third table reflects the increase in number of students in all educational institutions since the submission of Israel's initial report. The fourth table deals with primary and secondary education only, and illustrates the changes in number of Jewish and non-Jewish pupils in every school grade, during the years.

441. The above figures do not include pupils attending Talmud-Torah (Orthodox Jewish) pre-schools, and institutions under the supervision of the Ministry of Religious Affairs and the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs (vocational and industrial schools).

(There are approximately 1,270,000 pupils in schools: about 79 per cent of them are in the Jewish sector and 21 per cent in the non-Jewish sector.)

(c) Adult education

443. The following table shows the number of adults engaged in elementary/remedial education (primary and secondary), pre-academic and academic special adults' programmes and immigrant absorption programmes. In the years since the submission of Israel's initial report, there has been stability in the situation in adult education.

Participation in adult education

444. The declining figures in immigrant absorption programmes, is due to the decline in the number of immigrants.

(d) Higher education

445. The following tables show the number of students in higher education institutions and their separation into degree, field of study, sex, age, population group and origin. There has been a major increase since the submission of Israel's initial report in the number of students all across the board.

447. The next table illustrates the increase over a period of time in the percentage of Israelis with higher education.

Source: Central Bureau of Statistics.

448. The number of persons with higher education among the Jewish population grew between 1980 and 1999 by about 88 per cent (from 20.8 per cent to 39.0 per cent); among the non-Jewish population, the number of persons with higher education grew by about 156 per cent (from 7.7 per cent to 19.7 per cent). All these figures are higher than those observed in 1995.

(e) Drop-out rates

449. The following data shows the scope of the drop-out problem. In the Jewish sector there has been a slight reduction of this phenomenon, but in the non-Jewish sector there has been a slight increase. The reason for that is that these figures relate only to attendance in institutions under the supervision of the Ministry of Education. Many non-Jews moved to institutions under the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. Moreover, combining the figures of attendance in institutions under the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and the Ministry of Religious Affairs, the drop-out rates show a trend of stability or even a slight reduction.

450. The rates of attendance in the education system among pupils aged 4-17 reached 90 per cent in 1995, and 92 per cent in 1998. These statistics refer to the number of pupils enrolled in frameworks supervised by the Ministry of Education. It should be noted that attendance rates in the Arab education sector are still lower than for Hebrew education. If attendance figures for the Ministry of Education, Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, and the Ministry of Religious Affairs are combined, the results show an attendance rate of 98 per cent among 15 year-olds, 95 per cent for 16 year-olds, and 89 per cent for 17 year-olds.

451. These figures show a trend of constant increase in the percentage of adolescent pupils who remain in school. The trend in the Arab education sector is less clear, but may be defined as “stable”. Since the 1990s, in both Jewish and Arab education sectors, the percentage of attendance among female pupils has been higher than that of male pupils every year.

(f) Graduating rates at all levels

452. The following tables show the percentage of pupils entitled to matriculation certificates upon their graduation from high school and the ratio between those examinees who meet the requirements for matriculation certificate and those who do not (separated into Jews and non-Jews, sex and type of school). These tables indicate that there is an increase in the percentage of those entitled to matriculation, and the percentage of candidates to matriculation:

453. The graph shows that the last five years have seen a great increase in the percentage of those who are matriculation candidates and of those who are entitled to matriculation certificates in the age group, especially in the Bedouin, Druze and Arab education sectors.

4. Education budgets

455. As the following data illustrates, the amount of government resources spent on education has remained the same since Israel's initial report, as a percentage of the total State budget and the GNP, but it should be mentioned that this percentage is relatively high:

456. Figure 5 shows a stable educational budget per pupil, and not a decreasing one according to some critics:

457. Figure 6 shows a stable percentage of governmental expenditure on education over the past few years and an increasing percentage in higher education:

458. Figure 7 clearly establishes a gradual increase since 1990 in the portion of the total budget allocated to education expenditures. In the past three years since the submission of Israel's initial report there has been stability in the budget. The 2000 government expenditure on education represents 10 per cent of the overall government expenditures.

Construction of new schools

459. As set out in Israel's initial report, in recent years the Ministry of Education has allocated special budgets for building new schools, and expanding and renovating existing ones. This trend still continues.

460. In 2000, NIS 779 million (approximately $192.7 million) were allocated for the development budget. In addition, NIS 693 million (approximately $171.4 million) were allocated in 2000 for the continued construction of 1,880 new classrooms; NIS 25 million (approximately $6.2 million) for the renovation of school buildings; an additional NIS 18 million (approximately $4.5 million) for equipping new classrooms and NIS 20 million (approximately $4.9 million) for schools' peripheral expenditures.

461. In 2000, priority in construction of classes was accorded to the Arab and Druze population. 31.5 per cent (593 classrooms) of the classrooms built were intended for the Arab, Druze (54 classrooms) and Bedouin education sectors (these sectors constitute 20 per cent of the entire population).

The vicinity of schools

462. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

5. Schooling schedules

(a) Programmes for kindergartens

463. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report.

(b) Primary education

464. The reorganization of the structure of studies in primary schools, which was reported in Israel's initial report, has been completed.

465. The schools now operate according to a small number of principles: autonomy of the school, encouraging advancement of students according to their individual personality; and improving language skills. There is only a basic scheduling programme, and the school determines most of its content. The basic scheduling programme is based on seven basic approaches to education, which determine the subjects of study in the programme:

Approach	Areas of study
Symbolic-linguistic	Languages
Symbolic-logical	Mathematics
Cultural-heritage	Culture studies, according to the educational sector
Humanistic	Patriotism, citizenship and democracy, geography and history
Scientific-technological	Sciences, technology, information/communication
Aesthetic-artistic	Literature, music, painting, dance, theatre
Kinetic-physical	Physical education, dance

(c) Secondary education

466. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's initial report. It should be noted that the method of financing the secondary education system is per student. This financing depends on class level, area of study and teacher profile. This type of financing system gives a budgetary advantage to technological areas of study, to areas of study in which students take matriculation examinations, and to special programmes of assistance (which will be mentioned in the next section).

6. Equal educational opportunities

467. The Ministry of Education regards as its main obligation the need to deal with the gaps in the educational system in Israel. The main priorities for the Ministry beginning in 1999 were:

closing gaps by elevating peripheral municipalities and weak population groups; affirmative action for the Arab educational system; elevating special education; and increasing the number of students with matriculation entitlement.

468. The leading programmes in these priorities are:

- Implementing the Free Compulsory Education Law for ages 3-4 in places of need in all population groups (mentioned later in this article);
- Several programmes for raising the level of matriculation entitlement (mentioned later in this article);
- Several programmes for preventing dropping out (mentioned later in this article);
- A five-year programme for affirmative action in the Arab sector (mentioned later in this article);
- An affirmative action programme in the area of construction (mentioned later in this article).

469. The Ministry of Education has placed three other subjects at a high priority level. These are: reducing violence and use of drugs in schools, furthering science and technology education; and taking action for the purpose of both strengthening democratic sentiments among students and Jewish learning. These subjects are closely related to closing gaps and helping weak population groups.

(a) Ratio of males to females in the education system

470. The percentage of entitlement to matriculation certificate is still higher among female pupils than male pupils, 56 per cent in comparison with 47 per cent in 1999, from those finishing the 12th grade, which indicates an improvement. The next table shows the number of pupils in schools. The figures are problematic due to a change in the way the data is processed, which is more accurate and not based as much on estimates. Furthermore, observe the notes made about the drop-out rates, in 3 (e) of this article.

471. No major change occurred in the male/female proportion in institutions of higher education, since the initial report.

General programmes of assistance

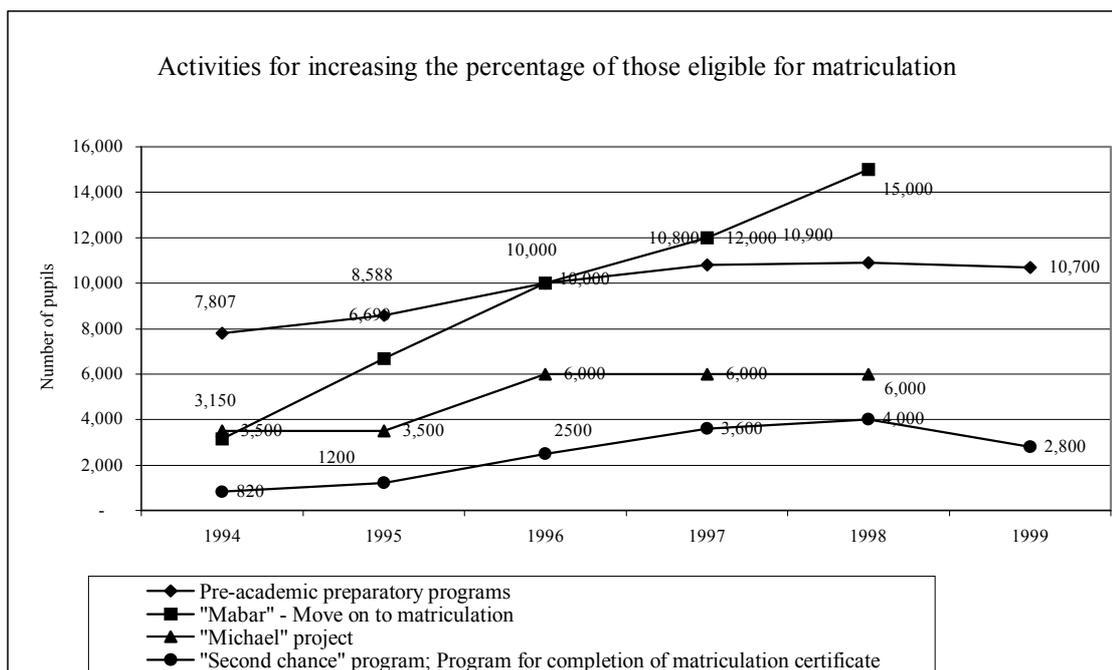

472. The following programmes were mentioned in Israel's initial report. These programmes are designed to help "pupils with a potential" (which was defined in that report). Updated data are as follows:

- Mabar ("Moving on"): in 2000, approximately 19,400 pupils attended this programme, compared to 10,000 in 1996;
- Tahal ("Second Chance"): in 2000, about 2,800 pupils participated in this programme, compared to 2,530 in 1996;
- Pre-academic preparatory programmes: about 10,700 pupils studied in such programmes in 1999, compared to 10,000 in 1996;
- Michael ("Utilizing personal skills for excellence"): in 2000, approximately 8,400 pupils attended this programme, compared to 6,000 in 1996.

473. There are also new programmes:

- Malbam: this is an experimental programme, with a modular approach towards the matriculation exams, for pupils studying at educational centre and in special guidance classes at comprehensive schools. Until the present, they were not expected to take the matriculation exams, and their teachers were not trained for preparing them for the exams. In 2000, about 3,200 pupils participated in this programme;
- Second Chance - Technicians: this is a programme for completing matriculation exams with up to seven general studies credits, in addition to seven credits of technological studies, which are obligatory for acceptance into a technician's study track.

Source: Ministry of Education.

* The figures for the pre-academic programmes do not include pupils studying in external schools under the terms of the Demobilized Soldiers Law, 1984. From 1995, however, these figures do include pupils in external schools as part of the matriculation completion project (i.e. pupils who lack just one examination).

 The figure for the "Mabar" programme in 1999, is 19,480; the figure for the "Michael" programme is 8,400; the figure for the Pre-academic preparatory programmes in 2000 is 10,900.

474. It should be noted that in the past few years, a few programmes for the prevention of "drop-outs" were enlarged, while a few were reduced. Some new radical programmes were initiated, like "Ometz" and "Day Boarding Schools" (mentioned below). This explains the decrease in the amount of activities in some of the programmes in the graph, and the increase in others.

Programmes and measures employed to help "pupils at risk"

475. Programmes of preventive intervention and assistance intended to combat the drop-out phenomenon have been operating in 2000 in 70 schools, compared to 110 in 1996. Truant officers locate and work with pupils including drop-outs. In 2000, 47,000 pupils including 7,000 drop-outs, were reached by these activities, compared to 11,000 in 1996. Special activities are still undertaken to help reintegration of drop-outs in schools.

476. The "Day Boarding School" programme was developed in 1995. The aim of the programme is to advance the personal academic and educational achievements of weaker pupils.

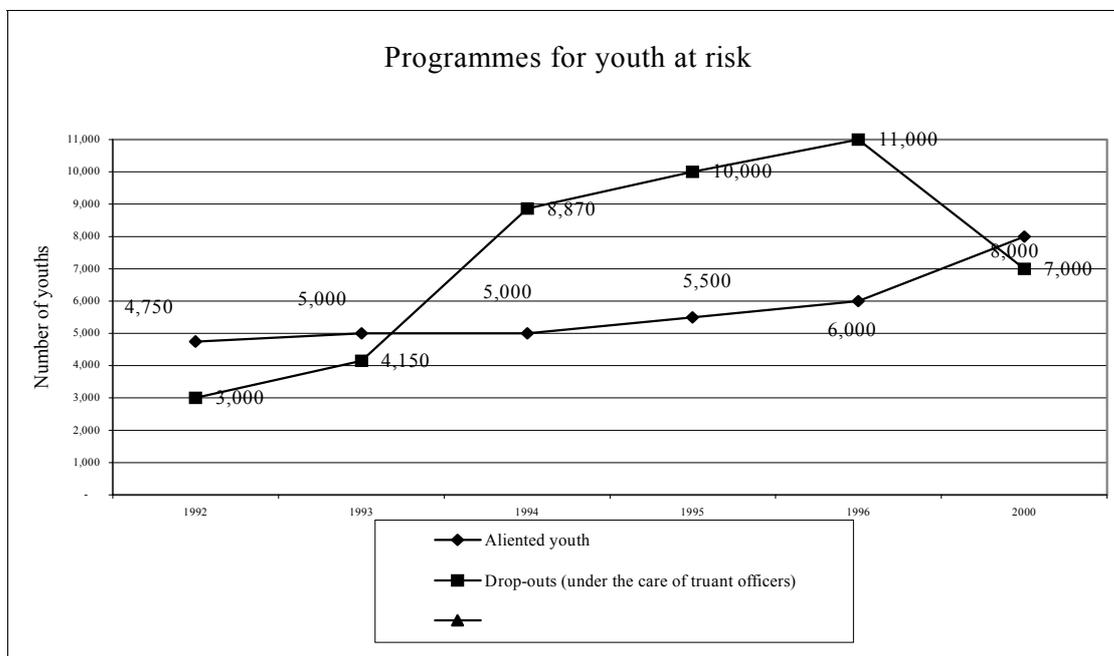

The programme's activities take place in schools and kindergartens, four days a week, 3-4 hours per day. The majority of the time is dedicated to educational activities (homework preparation and studies), and the rest to social activities and cultural enrichment. In 2000, 50,000 pupils participated in these activities.

477. "Children's home" programmes and afternoon-care centers in schools give pupils a place to stay after school hours, until the evening. In 2000, about 740 such programmes and centres were serving approximately 10,000 children, compared to 500 programmes serving 8,000 children in 1996. The Differential Benefits programme has not changed.

478. Individualized treatment is available as immediate assistance for pupils who are at high risk, especially those with a serious family background, who have dropped out of the system or who cannot be accepted within the system in their present condition. The educational intervention they receive is intensive for a short period of time, and long-term monitoring follows this until the child can adjust to being in school.

479. "Ometz" (faith in myself, ready to try, anticipating achievements) is a special curriculum that is challenging and fast paced, aimed at producing a positive learning experience that can motivate the pupils via impressive success and academic achievements. The programme is designed for pupils with eight or more failing grades, who perceive themselves as being incapable of achieving anything and who have no motivation to learn. In 2000, the programme took place in 130 schools.

480. Differential benefits programme. There has been no notable change since the submission of Israel's initial report.

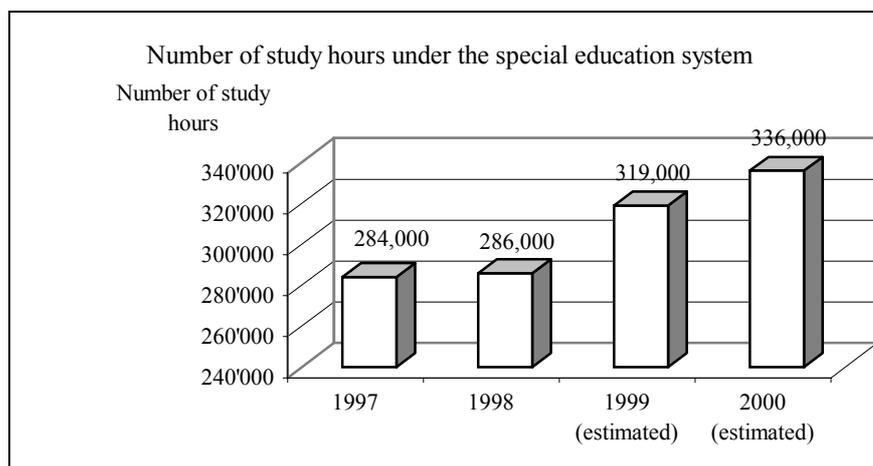

(c) Specific programmes of assistance offered to specified population groups

Children with learning and other disabilities

481. The number of students in the special education system decreased due to integration programmes, which integrate children with disabilities into the regular education system. The number of schooling hours available in the special education system increased. Moreover, the increase in resources allocated to special education has continued and in the 2000 budget NIS 1.7 billion (approximately $400 million) was allocated for this purpose.

482. In 2000, there were approximately 35,000 pupils aged 3-21 years in the various special education frameworks. In addition, about 90,000 pupils were integrated into the regular school system, but received special assistance from special education resources. It should be noted that from 1994 to 2000, the number of pupils in Israel enrolled in special education has declined by about 3,000 pupils.

Access for students with disabilities to schools

483. Ever since 1994, local authorities must provide certified architectural plans regarding schools that include four main elements which concern people with disabilities:

- New schools must have ramps and elevator shafts, for easier access;
- The first floor must contain a lavatory, especially designed for people with disabilities;
- In existing schools, the local authorities must ask for assistance from the Ministry of Education for installing special equipment to help people with disabilities to move up and down stairs;
- Towards the beginning of the school year, the school management must place students with disabilities in classes in the first floor.

Access to laboratories and libraries still constitutes a problem.

(d) Arab and Druze sectors

484. The reported gap between the Arab and Druze pupils and their Jewish counterparts is still evident. These sectors receive relatively higher rates of construction budgets as mentioned earlier. Furthermore, the five-year programme begun in 1991 has ended after narrowing, but not closing, the gap. The Ministry of Education has therefore put affirmative action at the head of its agenda. In 1999, the Ministry of Education embarked on a new five-year programme and other activities. These are intended to equalize the educational and budgetary standards of these sectors to that of the Jewish education sector.

485. The Ministry of Education has allocated an extra budget of NIS 250 million (approximately $62.5 million), over a period of five years, beginning in the year 2000. A steering committee for the programme has determined a basic programme for its application, based on the recommendations of three different committees.

486. The programme's main goals include:

- Increasing the number of pupils eligible for matriculation;
- Reducing drop-outs;
- Increasing the amount of teaching classes;
- Improving the psychological assistance and the counselling sector;
- Improving the special education;
- Improving the technological education;
- Training the teaching, psychological and counselling staff.

487. The programme operated in the following areas in the year 2000:

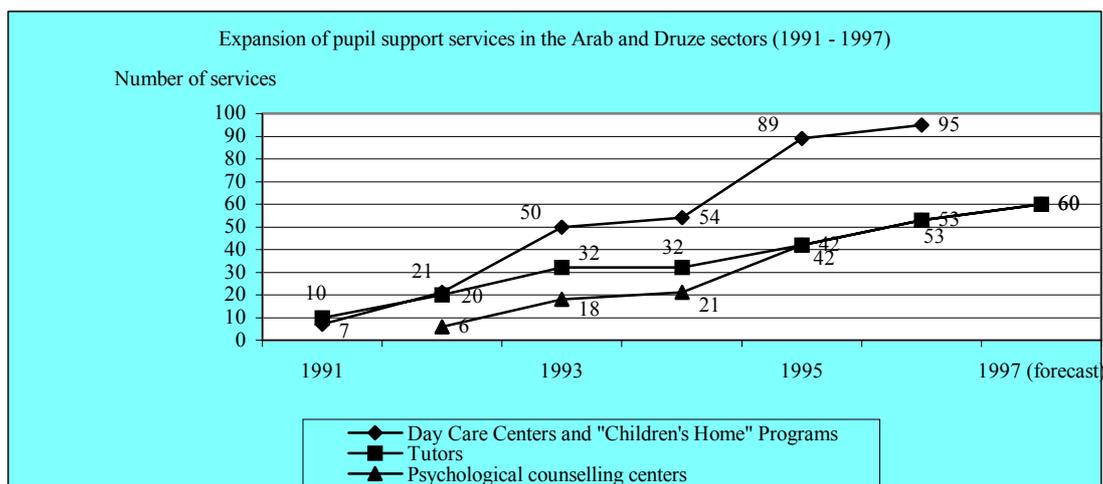

- It upgraded 1,526 computer stations;
- It gave scientific equipment to kindergartens and primary education schools;
- It increased the number of pupils eligible for matriculation;
- It developed curricula;
- It trained teaching staff.

488. This part of the report shows that significant discrepancies still exist between the Arab sector and the rest of the population, especially in post-secondary education. The gaps are even larger when observing only the female population (although there is no gap between female population in other sectors). Among the Arab sector, the number of students attaining matriculation is about half that of the Jewish sector, and among these only a quarter apply to universities. Among the Jewish population, only about 5.5 per cent do not work or study, compared to 14.3 per cent in the Arab population. Only about 25 per cent of the Arab sector study in technological education, compared to about 30 per cent in the rest of the population. Half of the classes in Arab technological education are at a level of study not intended to qualify them to take the matriculation examinations.

489. These gaps are the reason for the policy of affirmative action taken by the Ministry of Education. An example of this affirmative action can be seen in the following chart:

(e) New immigrants

490. The policies on this issue remain unchanged, and no notable change occurred since the initial report. It should be noted that the Ministry for the Absorption of Immigration has programmes for helping immigrants, especially from Ethiopia, which include additional classes in several subjects. The overall budget for this purpose in the Ministry for the Absorption of Immigration and NGOs, is about NIS 300 million (approximately US$ 75 million).

(f) The Bedouin sector

491. With regard to the Bedouin population living in unrecognized villages, it should be emphasized that pupils there are entitled to the same level of education as all other pupils in Israel. For obvious reasons, it is impossible to build elementary and high schools in every village, whether recognized or not. Hence, 11 per cent of the pupils of Israel (Jews and non-Jews) learn in regional schools that serve rural localities. Thus, it is not uncommon that even recognized localities do not have their own local schools. Pupils in the non-Jewish sector who reside in localities that have no recognized municipal status attend schools in recognized localities. However, there are many more logistic difficulties in providing access to schools for pupils from unrecognized villages, since schools are built in accordance with approved zoning plans to meet primarily the needs of the recognized settlements. However, in any case, transportation services to schools are provided for most pupils in unrecognized villages.

492. Furthermore, the special situation of pupils from unrecognized villages is taken into consideration by the education authorities. The education system allocates extra resources (primarily study hours) to schools whose pupils suffer from environmentally caused academic deficiencies. A special index is used to determine the eligibility of schools to receive such additional resources and one of the criteria of this index in the non-Jewish sector is the inclusion of pupils from unrecognized villages. In other words, the higher the percentage of pupils who come from families that reside in unrecognized villages, the more resources are allocated to the school. Thus, schools with pupils from unrecognized villages receive additional teaching hours which enables them to deal with the specific problems of this population (most notably, poor domestic complementary studying conditions).

493. All the Bedouin pupils study in 53 primary schools and 10 secondary schools. In the unrecognized villages, there are 15 primary schools and 80 kindergartens for children from the age of three.

494. The education system in the Bedouin sector faces many difficulties that are partially the result of the Bedouin style of life in a plethora of unplanned settlements and their culture. Girls drop out of school at a young age because they get married or due to tradition. Boys leave the education system early to enter the work force. Polygamy (up to four to five wives per man) raises the birth rate (5 per cent per year), causes irreparable psychological damage to children, as well as unemployment, neglected and destroyed home and low educational achievements. Also, many Bedouin pupils want to receive a completion certificate at the end of 12 years of education, instead of a matriculation certificate. Nevertheless, in recent years there has been a remarkable improvement in the situation of the Bedouin education system. Some evidence:

(a) The number of pupils, and especially female pupils is continually increasing. This means that the phenomenon of dropping out of the school system is continually decreasing;

(b) The educational achievements in primary education have improved during the last two years due to an intensive programme of pedagogical intervention;

(c) A retired Jewish principal has been assigned to each school principal to guide him and instruct him both in the area of education and in management;

(d) A computerized centre has been established to reduce the phenomenon of dropping out of school. There is a computerized follow-up of pupils at risk and much effort is invested in bringing them back to their studies;

(e) Ben-Gurion University and the Kaye College have strengthened the teaching forces in the secondary education system in order to increase the number of pupils who receive matriculation certificates. Over the last three years the number of pupils receiving matriculation certificates has increased from 10 to 32 per cent;

(f) The number of Bedouin teachers in the system continues to increase. Today they constitute 60 per cent of all the teachers in the Bedouin educational sector system in contrast to four years ago when they comprised only 40 per cent of the teachers.

Matriculation certificates

Year	Percentage of pupils receiving matriculation certificates

495. The Bedouin way of life in a plethora of unplanned clusters, and a number of connected factors, have affected the Bedouin educational system. Recently the Ministerial Committee for Arab Affairs decided to establish another 16 permanent villages for Bedouins, in addition to the 7 that already exist. The Ministry of Education has agreed to join this decision and will establish its institutions in these new villages. This has yet to be approved by the Knesset within the budget law for the year 2001.

496. The Bedouin residents will have to settle in one out of these 23 villages which presently exist or which are to be established. Thus, it is hoped that the phenomenon of the unrecognized villages will disappear.

(g) Specially targeted action

497. The Ministry of Education has identified 12 municipalities facing special problems in terms of educational achievements, and has developed a special programme involving the participation of the local communities to improve the situation in those targeted towns and villages. Each locality has defined its needs. The subjects were brought up in an inter-ministerial forum, and subjects were selected.

498. These include implementation of the Compulsory Education Law, 1949 for children ages 3-4, which means giving free education to these children (as mentioned above), and activating day boarding school centres in kindergartens.

499. The geographical dispersion of targeted localities include towns in the South (Dimona, Ofakim, Yeruham, Mizpe Ramon, Kiryat Gat, Tel Sheva), in the Centre/Tel Aviv (Ramle, Lod), and in the North (Beit Shean, Upper Nazareth, Acre).

Eastern neighbours of Jerusalem

500. The Ministry of Education and the municipality of Jerusalem have prepared an integrative programme for the furthering of education in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. This programme began in 1999. The goals of this programme are: improving achievements in basic subjects; reducing the drop-out phenomenon; developing a local educational leadership; improving teaching; improving the educational environment, including introducing computers into the classrooms; and closing the gaps in services and posts.

7. Language facilities

501. As reported in Israel's initial report, adult new immigrants are offered basic Hebrew language classes in new immigrants' schools especially created to teach elementary Hebrew language skills. In 1998, 64,600 persons attended such schools. The reduction in the amount of those attending these schools is due to the reduction in the number of immigrants. Other than that, no notable change occurred since the submission of Israel's initial report.

8. Conditions of teaching staff

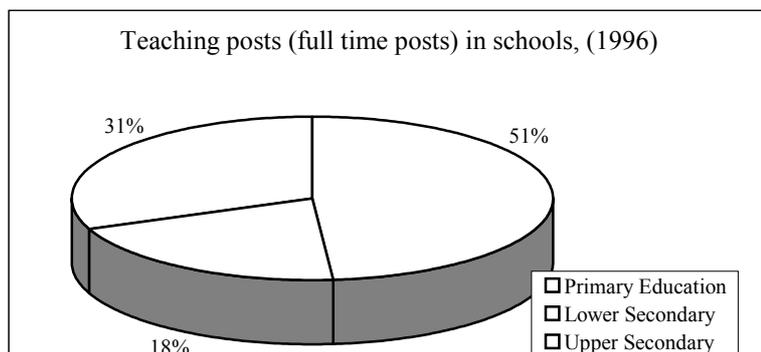

502. There are now approximately 86,000 full-time teachers in all levels of the Israeli primary and secondary system, compared to 80,000 reported in Israel's initial report. The following table demonstrates their distribution to sectors and school levels:

505. The Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, which is responsible for promoting culture in Israel, gives direct financial assistance to some 650 cultural and art institutions compared to the figure of 300 reported in Israel's initial report.

506. It should be noted that since Israel's initial report the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport has been reorganized into two Ministries. The first is the Ministry of Education, whose activities were dealt with in article 13 above. The second is the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport whose activities will be dealt with in the present article.

507. The budget of the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport is presented in the following table:

508. It can be seen from table 93 that the total national expenditure on culture, recreation and sports has increased considerably. This is true for the years 1993 (the last year for which detailed data was provided in Israel's initial report) to 1997 (the last year for which there are detailed data on financing of national expenditure). This is also true for most individual cultural activities. Especially noteworthy is the positive change in the national expenditure on culture as a percentage of GDP. Despite this fact, the total budget of the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport in the year 2000 is significantly less than reported in Israel's initial report. This is mainly due to the elimination of the Ministry's financing of the Israel Association of Community Centers. This is due to the reorganization of the Ministry since the initial report (reported at the beginning of this section). Notwithstanding this change in the Ministry's budget, the major expenditures have seen a mixed tendency.

509. There has been no notable change in the principal tools and projects for cultural promotion in Israel since the submission of its initial report, in the method of allocation of funds nor in the administrations and bodies acting in these areas in Israel other than those reported in the following paragraphs.

510. The Loan Fund for Productions programme has been cancelled.

511. The Omanut l'Am (Art for the People) Association mentioned in the initial report currently sponsors some 6,500 artistic activities held annually in all areas of the arts compared to 12,000 such activities as reported in Israel's initial report.

The institutional infrastructure of cultural life in Israel

512. There are now some 1,200 public library facilities in Israel as compared to the 950 reported in Israel's initial report, as well as school libraries and other libraries throughout the country. The number of museums in Israel has remained relatively unchanged. As reported in Israel's initial report, many other cultural institutions, in various areas of the arts, although not regulated by law, are actively supported by the State:

- Theatres - There are 27 established theatre groups in Israel performing in theatres throughout the country as compared to the 21 reported in Israel's initial report;
- Music - There are some 60 music-oriented organizations in Israel, including 24 orchestras, the Israel Opera, 22 choirs, music schools and many other organizations, representing an increase in the number reported in Israel's initial report;

^b Institutions that reported.

Cultural identity and heritage of population groups

514. As reported in Israel's initial report, being a multi-cultural society, Israel assists various groups in preserving and promoting their cultural heritage.

Jewish cultural heritage

515. The annual budgeting allocations for the Ladino and Yiddish languages according to the laws reported in Israel's initial report currently amounts to approximately NIS 1.6 million, as compared to NIS 750,000 reported in the initial report.

Arab, Druze and Circassian cultural heritage

516. In the Druze sector, the State supports 3 professional and 3 amateur Druze theatre companies, 2 professional singing ensembles, and 12 representative dance companies, which is a significant increase compared to the figures reported in Israel's initial report.

Institutions involved in the promotion of cultural identity

517. There has been no notable change on the subject of museums focusing upon various population groups in Israel or on the subject of universities and research institutes since the submission of Israel's initial report.

The role of mass media and communication in promoting participation in cultural life

518. Legislation in the field of mass communications exists in a number of spheres. The Broadcasting Authority Law, 1965 regulates the activities of the Israel Broadcasting Authority (IBA), now responsible for 2 TV channels and 10 radio channels. The IBA now also broadcasts in a satellite channel, which mainly airs the sessions of the Israeli parliament (the Knesset) and its committees.

519. The Second Authority for Television and Radio Law, 1990 was amended in March 2000 to make it possible to establish another commercial TV channel (hereafter: "The Third Channel”), in addition to the “Second Channel” reported in Israel’s initial report, under the supervision of “Second Authority” (reported in the initial report). In 2000, the Second Authority for Television and Radio published a tender in search of prospective franchisers for the operation of an additional commercial channel (“the Third Television Channel”). The projected time for the beginning of the broadcasts of the Third Channel is the last quarter of the year 2001.

520. In addition, the said amendment has increased the amount of Israeli productions required in the broadcasts of the Second Channel to at least 40 per cent of all broadcasts (section 59a of the Law) compared to the current requirement of one third of all broadcasts.

521. In addition, the amendment has established a requirement for broadcasting programmes in the Arabic and Russian languages, through speech or translation. The required figure is not less than 50 per cent of the total broadcasts for each language (section 4 of the amendment). The amendment has also changed the Second Authority’s functions and duties. They now include catering to the needs of the Arabic-speaking sector, promoting peace and understanding with neighbouring countries and to give a proper venue to the cultural diversity of the Israeli society (section 5 of the Second Authority Law).

522. There has been no notable change in the “Bezeq” Law, 1982 since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

523. No notable change has occurred on the subjects of Educational Television, the Open University, foreign TV channels broadcasting in Israel through cable channel satellite and the Internet since the submission of Israel’s initial report. No notable change has occurred on the subject of newspapers and similar, since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

Preservation and display of mankind’s cultural heritage

524. No change has occurred on this subject since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

Freedom of artistic creation and performance

525. No change has occurred on this subject since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

Professional education in culture and art

526. There are currently 21 professional post-secondary art schools, recognized by the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, which provide training in a variety of the artistic areas, as compared to 14 reported in Israel’s initial report. Certain universities and colleges offer study programmes in the administration of cultural institutions, besides other programmes reported in Israel’s initial report.

Other measures for conservation, development and diffusion of culture

527. No change has occurred on this subject since the submission of Israel’s initial report.

International cultural cooperation

528. There are currently 35 public festivals held in Israel annually, compared to 30 reported in the initial report. Some of these festivals include the participation of many artistic groups from abroad.

Status of the Arabic language

529. Hebrew and Arabic are the official languages of the State of Israel (section 82, King's Order in Council on Palestine, 1922). This is also reflected in several provisions in Israeli law, which mandate the use of the two languages, cumulatively or alternatively in public life.

530. There have been four major changes in the status of the Arabic language since the submission of Israel's initial report:

(a) Official documents: Under directive number 21.556A of the Attorney-General, concerning the translation of official documents from Arabic, it is prohibited to demand that a citizen must translate into Hebrew an official document, which is in the Arabic language, such as a marriage certificate or a divorce certificate, as long as the certificate was issued by an authority which is recognized by the State of Israel. In addition, the Attorney-General's directive prescribes that the Government must now make its legal forms available in both Hebrew and Arabic;

(b) Vehicle licence plates: Under a specific directive issued by the Attorney-General to the Ministry of Transportation, new car licence plates may carry the name of the State of Israel in Arabic as well as in Hebrew. The aims of the new directive are to emphasize the official status of the Arabic language in Israel, as well as to increase consciousness of the needs of minorities in Israel;

(c) Publication of public tenders in Arabic: the Attorney-General has directed all the legal advisors in the civil service that all public tenders are to be published in both an Arabic-language newspaper and a Hebrew one, as well as to be made available on the Internet. The directive stresses that it is prohibited to distinguish between public tenders according to their relevance to the Arab sector. Furthermore, the duty to translate the public tenders into Arabic rests on the Government;

(d) The Second Authority for Television and Radio Law, 1990 - The 2000 amendment of the law, already mentioned above, established a requirement for broadcasting programmes in the Arabic and Russian languages, through speech or translation. The required figure is not less than 50 per cent of the total broadcasts for each language (section 4 of the amendment), as reported above in this article in the section on the Second Authority for Television and Radio Law, 1990.

The enjoyment of scientific progress

Institutional promotion of research and development

531. The Ministerial Committee for Science and Technology and the Chief Scientists Forum are now headed by the Minister of Science, Culture and Sport. The implementation of Israel's research and development policy is divided between three different ministries:

- Basic research is now under the responsibility of the Ministry of Education. The general basic research budgeting policy is not decided by the ministry itself, but rather by an independent Council for Higher Education, as reported in Israel's initial report;
- Strategic-generic research and development is supervised by the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport;
- Applied industrial research and development is under the authority of the Ministry of Industry and Trade, as reported in Israel's initial report.

The national research and development budget

532. No significant change occurred on this subject since the submission of Israel's initial report, as seen in the following tables.

COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS
Twenty-sixth (extraordinary) session
13-31 August 2001

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES
UNDER ARTICLES 16 AND 17 OF THE COVENANT

Concluding observations of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

ISRAEL

1. At its 39th meeting, held on 17 August 2001, the Committee considered the additional information (E/1989/5/Add.14) submitted by the State party in response to the request made by the Committee in its concluding observations (E/C.12/1/Add.27, para. 32) adopted at its nineteenth session in 1998 with respect to the initial report of Israel on the implementation of the Covenant (E/1990/5/Add.39) and adopted, at its 47th meeting, held on 23 August 2001, the following concluding observations.
2. In paragraph 32 of its concluding observations on the initial report of Israel, the Committee requested the State party “to provide additional information on the realization of economic, social and cultural rights in the occupied territories, in order to complete the State party’s initial report and thereby ensure full compliance with its reporting obligations”. The Committee requested that the additional information be submitted in time for its twenty-fourth session in November/December 2000.

3. In a note verbale dated 3 November 2000, the Permanent Mission of Israel to the United Nations Office at Geneva informed the Committee that the additional information would be included in the State party's second periodic report, which the State party planned to submit no later than March 2001.

4. In a letter dated 1 December 2000 to the Permanent Representative of Israel (E/2001/22-E/C.12/2000/21, annex X), the Chairperson of the Committee reminded the State party that the Committee had called for the additional information to be submitted in time for the twenty-fourth session and emphasized that some of the additional information concerning the occupied territories had been requested "in order to complete the State party's initial report and thereby ensure full compliance with its reporting obligations". Since the additional information formed part of the State party's initial report, it should be submitted, and would be considered, separately from the State party's second periodic report.

5. The Chairperson urged the State party to submit by 1 March 2001 up-to-date information on the realization of economic, social and cultural rights in the occupied territories, giving particular attention to the issues that were identified in the concluding observations, as well as those mentioned in the letter. The Committee scheduled its consideration of the additional information for the afternoon of 4 May 2001 and invited the State party to participate in the discussion.

6. The additional information was received on 20 April 2001, too late for it to be translated into the working languages of the Committee, as required by rule 24 of its rules of procedure, for the twenty-fifth session. Consequently, the consideration of the additional information had to be postponed again to the Committee's extraordinary session in August 2001. The State party was informed of the deferral in a letter dated 11 May 2001.

7. At its twenty-fifth session, the Committee invoked rule 64 of its rules of procedure, which provides that the Committee may make suggestions and recommendations of a general nature on the basis of its consideration of reports submitted by States parties and reports submitted by specialized agencies, in order to assist the Economic and Social Council to take action in pursuance of articles 21 and 22 of the Covenant. Accordingly, the Chairperson addressed a letter (E/2001/77) dated 11 May 2001 to the President of the Council, enclosing a copy of a letter of the same date addressed to the State party citing alleged violations of the Covenant which had been brought to the Committee's attention.

8. In a note verbale dated 14 August 2001, the Permanent Mission of Israel to the United Nations Office at Geneva informed the Committee that owing to complications concerning preparations for the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance scheduled to take place in Durban, South Africa, the delegation of the State party would be unable to travel to Geneva to attend the Committee's extraordinary session. The State party also informed the Committee that it had submitted its second periodic report and requested that the additional information previously submitted to the Committee be considered together with the second periodic report at a future session of the Committee.

9. At its 39th meeting, on 17 August 2001, a representative of the Government of Israel read a statement before the Committee, but declined to participate in the consideration of the additional information that was scheduled for that meeting. The Committee therefore decided to proceed with the consideration of the additional information in accordance with the decision taken at its twenty-fifth session.

10. The Committee noted that the additional information submitted by the State party did not include information on the realization of economic, social and cultural rights in the occupied territories, except in relation to East Jerusalem. In the absence of such information in relation to the other occupied territories, and in accordance with its procedure concerning reports that had not been submitted or were overdue, which the Committee had begun to apply at its ninth session, the Committee proceeded to discuss the situation in the occupied territories. This would complete the consideration of the State party's initial report.

11. The Committee deplores the State party's refusal to report on the occupied territories and the State party's position that the Covenant does not apply to "areas that are not subject to its sovereign territory and jurisdiction". The Committee's views on this issue have already been firmly expressed in its previous concluding observations (E/C.12/1/Add.27). The Committee notes the statement of the State party in paragraph 5 of the additional information it submitted to the Committee, that powers and responsibilities "continue to be exercised by Israel in the West Bank and Gaza Strip" according to agreements reached with the Palestinians.

12. The Committee rejects the State party's assertion regarding the distinction between human rights and humanitarian law under international law to support its argument that the Committee's mandate "cannot relate to events in the Gaza Strip and West Bank". The Committee reminds the State party that even during armed conflict, fundamental human rights must be respected and that basic economic, social and cultural rights as part of the minimum standards of human rights are guaranteed under customary international law and are also prescribed by international humanitarian law.

13. The Committee expresses its deep concern about the State party's continuing gross violations of economic, social and cultural rights in the occupied territories, especially the severe measures adopted by the State party to restrict the movement of civilians between points within and outside the occupied territories, severing their access to food, water, health care, education and work. The Committee is particularly concerned that on frequent occasions, the State party's closure policy has prevented civilians from reaching medical services and that emergency situations have ended at times in death at checkpoints. The Committee is alarmed over reports that the Israeli security forces have turned back supply missions of the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East attempting to deliver food, water and medical relief to affected areas.

14. The Committee continues to be concerned that the State party's Law of Return denies indigenous Palestinian refugees the right to return to their homes and properties.

15. The Committee urges the State party to exercise its powers and responsibilities to put an end to the violence, the loss of human lives and the restrictions imposed on the movement of civilians between points within and outside the occupied territories. In this regard, the Committee urges the State party to implement without delay its obligations under the Covenant and to desist from decisions and measures resulting in violations of the economic, social and cultural rights of the population living in the occupied territories. The Committee expresses its firm conviction that the implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights can play a vital role in procuring a lasting peace in Israel and Palestine.

16. The Committee reiterates its request that the State party provide information on the realization of economic, social and cultural rights in all occupied territories. This information should be submitted in time for it to be considered together with the State party's second periodic report, which is tentatively scheduled for the thirtieth session of the Committee in April/May 2003. The rest of the information already submitted will be considered together with the second periodic report.

COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS
Thirtieth session
5-23 May 2003

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES
UNDER ARTICLES 16 AND 17 OF THE COVENANT

Concluding observations of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Israel

1. The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights considered the second periodic report of Israel on the implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (E/1990/6/Add.32) at its 17th, 18th and 19th meetings, held on 15 and 16 May 2003 (E/C.12/2003/SR.17, 18 and 19), and adopted, at its 29th meeting, held on 23 May 2003 (E/C.12/2003/SR.29), the following concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the second periodic report of the State party, which was prepared in general conformity with the Committee's guidelines. The Committee appreciates the extensive written replies to the list of issues, as well as the readiness of and efforts made by the high-level delegation to respond to the oral questions. The members of the delegation were knowledgeable with respect to most of the Covenant rights, but the Committee regrets that a number of the questions it posed during the dialogue remained unanswered.

3. The Committee notes with appreciation the large amount of information received from non-governmental organizations concerning the implementation of the Covenant in the State party.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the steps undertaken by the State party to implement the Multiyear Plan for the Development of Arab Sector Communities (2000), aimed at closing the gap between Jews and Arabs by promoting equality in the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights.
5. The Committee notes with appreciation the various affirmative action measures taken, as mentioned in the State party's replies to the list of issues, with respect to various disadvantaged sectors such as the Arab Druze, Circassian and Bedouin communities, despite the decline in economic growth in the State party in recent years.
6. The Committee further notes with appreciation that the Supreme Court's rules of standing have been relaxed, allowing any person, regardless of citizenship, residency or other status, who contends that his or her rights were unlawfully denied or infringed, formal access to the Court, and allowing even for an actio popularis. In particular, the Committee particularly appreciates that in the State party, plaintiffs seeking remedy for alleged violations of economic, social and cultural rights have access to and can make use of the judiciary system, which provides opportunities for the justiciability of the rights enshrined in the Covenant. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the information given on cases before the courts, in which reference has been made to Covenant provisions.
7. The Committee further notes the amendment to the Women Equal Rights Act in April 2000.
8. The Committee welcomes the improvements in the conditions for foreign workers, allowing them to change employers for the legal duration of their stay, prohibiting employers from withholding workers' passports, as well as the regulations regarding the system of compulsory health insurance for these foreign workers.
9. The Committee notes that, while gaps still remain, the State party has achieved some positive results towards expanding basic education and special education for non-Jewish sectors.
10. The Committee notes with appreciation the efforts undertaken by the State party to address the problem of trafficking and exploitation of persons, such as the criminalization of trafficking, increased penalties for trafficking of minors, and the enhanced cooperation between government agencies to combat trafficking with a victim-sensitive approach.

C. Factors and difficulties impeding the implementation of the Covenant

11. The Committee reiterates its statement made in previous concluding observations that Israel's continuing emphasis on its security concerns, which have even increased in recent years, has impeded the realization of economic, social and cultural rights within Israel and the occupied territories.

D. Principal subjects of concern

12. The Committee notes with regret that a number of the issues raised in its concluding observations of 1998 (E/C.12/1/Add.27) and 2001 (E/C.12/1/Add.69) remain outstanding issues of concern. In this regard, the Committee reiterates its concerns raised in 1998 (E/C.12/1/Add.27, paras. 11, 25, 26 and 28) and in 2001 (E/C.12/1/Add.64, para. 14).

13. Despite the positive measures mentioned in paragraph 6 of the present concluding observations, the Committee reiterates its concern that the Covenant has not been incorporated in the domestic legal order, and can therefore not be directly invoked before the courts.

14. The Committee regrets that the judgement of the Qa'dan case has still not been implemented.

15. The Committee also reiterates its concern about the State party's position that the Covenant does not apply to areas that are not subject to its sovereign territory and jurisdiction, and that the Covenant is not applicable to populations other than the Israelis in the occupied territories. The Committee further reiterates its regret at the State party's refusal to report on the occupied territories (E/C.12/1/Add.27, para. 11). In addition, the Committee is deeply concerned at the insistence of the State party that, given the circumstances in the occupied territories, the law of armed conflict and humanitarian law are considered as the only mode whereby protection may be ensured for all involved, and that this matter is considered to fall outside the sphere of the Committee's responsibility.

16. The Committee is deeply concerned about the continuing difference in treatment between Jews and non-Jews, in particular Arab and Bedouin communities, with regard to their enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights in the State party's territory. The Committee reiterates its concern that the "excessive emphasis upon the State as a 'Jewish State' encourages discrimination and accords a second-class status to its non-Jewish citizens" (ibid., para. 10). This discriminatory attitude is apparent in the continuing lower standard of living of Israeli Arabs as a result, inter alia, of higher unemployment rates, restricted access to and participation in trade unions, lack of access to housing, water, electricity and health care and a lower level of education, despite the State party's efforts to close the gap. In this regard, the Committee expresses its concern that the State party's domestic legal order does not enshrine the general principles of equality and non-discrimination.

17. The Committee is concerned that in spite of the enactment of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law in 2000, the majority of its provisions have not been implemented. The situation is aggravated for persons with disabilities from the Arab sector.

18. The Committee is particularly concerned about the status of "Jewish nationality", which is a ground for exclusive preferential treatment for persons of Jewish nationality under the Israeli Law of Return, granting them automatic citizenship and financial government benefits, thus resulting in practice in discriminatory treatment against non-Jews, in particular Palestinian refugees. The Committee is also concerned about the practice of restrictive family reunification with regard to Palestinians, which has been adopted for reasons of national security. The Committee reiterates its concern in this regard (ibid., para. 13 and E/C.12/1/Add.69, para. 14).

19. The Committee deeply regrets the refusal of the State party to provide in its second periodic report additional information on the living conditions of population groups other than Israeli settlers in the occupied territories as requested in its 2001 concluding observations. The Committee continues to be gravely concerned about the deplorable living conditions of the Palestinians in the occupied territories, who - as a result of the continuing occupation and subsequent measures of closures, extended curfews, roadblocks and security checkpoints - suffer from impingement of their enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights enshrined in the Covenant, in particular access to work, land, water, health care, education and food.

20. The Committee expresses its concern about the general increase in unemployment in the State party, which rose from 6.7 per cent in 1996 to 10.5 per cent in 2002, as well as about the significant increase in unemployment of the non-Jewish sectors: 13.5 per cent for the Arab sector and more than 15 per cent for the Bedouin sector. The Committee also expresses concern about the rate of unemployment in the occupied territories, which is over 50 per cent as a result of the closures which have prevented Palestinians from working in Israel.

21. The Committee is concerned about the persisting inequality in wages of Jews and Arabs in Israel, as well as the severe under-representation of the Arab sector in the civil service and universities.

22. The Committee is concerned about the fact that it is extremely difficult for Palestinians living in the occupied territories and working in Israel to join Israeli trade unions or to establish their own trade unions in Israel.

23. The Committee expresses concern about the fact that the Jewish religious courts' interpretation of personal status law with respect to divorce is discriminatory as regards women, especially the regulation that allows the husband to remarry even when the wife is opposed to the divorce, whilst the same rules do not apply to the wife.

24. The Committee is particularly concerned about information received concerning the construction of a "security fence" around the occupied territories, which allegedly would infringe upon the surface area of the occupied territories and which would limit or even impede access by Palestinian individuals and communities to land and water resources. The Committee regrets the fact that the delegation did not respond to questions by the Committee concerning the security fence or wall during the dialogue.

25. The Committee is particularly concerned about limited access to and distribution and availability of water for Palestinians in the occupied territories, as a result of inequitable management, extraction and distribution of shared water resources, which are predominantly under Israeli control.

26. The Committee reiterates its grave concern about the continuing practices by the State party of home demolitions, land confiscations and restrictions on residency rights, and its adoption of policies resulting in substandard housing and living conditions, including extreme overcrowding and lack of services, of Palestinians in East Jerusalem, in particular in the old city (E/C.12/1/Add.27, para. 22). Furthermore, the Committee is gravely concerned about the continuing practice of expropriation of Palestinian properties and resources for the expansion of Israeli settlements in the occupied territories (ibid., para. 24).

27. The Committee continues to be concerned about the situation of Bedouins residing in Israel, and in particular those living in villages that are still unrecognized (ibid., para. 28). Despite measures by the State party to close the gap between the living conditions of Jews and Bedouins in the Negev, the quality of living and housing conditions of the Bedouins continue to be significantly lower, with limited or no access to water, electricity and sanitation. Moreover, Bedouins continue to be subjected on a regular basis to land confiscations, house demolitions, fines for building “illegally”, destruction of agricultural crops, fields and trees, and systematic harassment and persecution by the Green Patrol, in order to force them to resettle in “townships”. The Committee is also concerned that the present compensation scheme for Bedouins who agree to resettle in “townships” is inadequate.

E. Suggestions and recommendations

28. The Committee urges the State party to take into consideration the subjects of concern and to give effect to the recommendations contained in its 1998 and 2001 concluding observations.

29. The Committee urges the State party to undertake steps towards the incorporation of the Covenant and its provisions in the domestic legal order. The Committee refers the State party to its general comment No. 9 on the domestic application of the Covenant.

30. The Committee urges the State party to undertake steps to facilitate the implementation of the judgement in the Qa'dan case.

31. The Committee recognizes that the State party has serious security concerns, which must be balanced with its efforts to comply with its obligations under international human rights law. However, the Committee reaffirms its view that the State party's obligations under the Covenant apply to all territories and populations under its effective control. The Committee repeats its position that even in a situation of armed conflict, fundamental human rights must be respected and that basic economic, social and cultural rights, as part of the minimum standards of human rights, are guaranteed under customary international law and are also prescribed by international humanitarian law. Moreover, the applicability of rules of humanitarian law does not by itself impede the application of the Covenant or the accountability of the State under article 2 (1) for the actions of its authorities. The Committee therefore requests that the State party provide more extensive information on the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights enshrined in the Covenant by those living in the occupied territories in its next periodic report.

32. The Committee reiterates its recommendation that the State party take steps to ensure equality of treatment for all Israeli citizens in relation to all Covenant rights (ibid., para. 34).

33. The Committee urges the State party to undertake effective measures to combat discrimination against persons with disabilities, especially by providing access to public facilities and promoting access to basic services and employment, with particular attention to persons with disabilities from the Arab sector.

34. The Committee reiterates its recommendation (ibid., para. 36) that in order to ensure equality of treatment and non-discrimination, the State party undertake a review of its re-entry and family reunification policies for Palestinians.

35. The Committee reiterates its request that the State party provide detailed information on the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights of all population groups living in the occupied territories in its next periodic report (ibid., para. 46 and E/C.12/1/Add.69). The Committee also calls upon the State party to give full effect to its Covenant obligations and, as a matter of the highest priority, to undertake to ensure safe passage at checkpoints for Palestinian medical staff and people seeking treatment, the unhampered flow of essential foodstuffs and supplies, free movement to places of employment, and the safe conduct of students and teachers to and from schools (E/C.12/1/Add.27, para. 39).

36. The Committee recommends that the State party take effective measures to reduce the rate of unemployment, and pay particular attention to reducing the inequalities between the Jewish and non-Jewish sectors with respect to employment. The Committee further recommends that the State party ensure that workers living in the occupied territories are permitted to continue to work in Israel.

37. The Committee strongly recommends that the State party take measures to reduce the inequalities in wages between Jews and Arabs, in conformity with the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, as enshrined in article 7 of the Covenant.

38. The Committee recommends that the State party take steps to ensure that all workers working in Israel can exercise their trade union rights, in accordance with article 8 of the Covenant.

39. The Committee recommends that the State party take steps to modify the Jewish religious courts' interpretation of the law concerning divorce to ensure equality between men and women, as provided for in article 3 of the Covenant.

40. The Committee urges the State party to ensure that any security measure it adopts does not disproportionately limit or impede the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights enshrined in the Covenant, in particular access to land and water resources by Palestinians, and that adequate restitution and compensation are provided to those who have incurred damage to and loss of property and lands as a result of these security measures.

41. The Committee strongly urges the State party to take immediate steps to ensure equitable access to and distribution of water to all populations living in the occupied territories, and in particular to ensure that all parties concerned participate fully and equally in the process of water management, extraction and distribution. In that connection, the Committee refers the State party to its general comment No. 15 on the right to water.

42. Reiterating its earlier recommendation (ibid., para. 41), the Committee urges the State party to cease the practices of facilitating the building of Israeli settlements, expropriating land, water and resources, demolishing houses and carrying out arbitrary evictions. The Committee also urges the State party to take immediate steps to respect and implement the right to an adequate standard of living, including housing, of the Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem and the Palestinian Arabs in cities with mixed populations. The Committee recalls in this connection its general comments No. 4 (the right to adequate housing) and No. 7 (forced evictions). The Committee requests the State party to provide detailed information on this issue in its next periodic report.

43. The Committee further urges the State party to recognize all existing Bedouin villages, their property rights and their right to basic services, in particular water, and to desist from the destruction and damaging of agricultural crops and fields, including in unrecognized villages. The Committee further encourages the State party to adopt an adequate compensation scheme for Bedouins who have agreed to resettle in “townships”.

44. The Committee encourages the State party to continue to provide human rights education in schools at all levels and to raise awareness about human rights, in particular economic, social and cultural rights, among State officials and the judiciary.

45. The Committee also encourages the State party to develop the system of mixed schools for Jewish and Arab pupils, in order to promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among the citizens of the country.

46. The Committee requests the State party to disseminate its concluding observations widely among all levels of society and to inform the Committee of all steps taken to implement them in its next periodic report. It also encourages the State party to continue to consult with non-governmental organizations and other members of civil society when preparing its third periodic report.

47. The Committee requests the State party to submit its third periodic report by 30 June 2008.

Introduction

1. This is the Third Periodic Report of the Government of the State of Israel, submitted to the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in accordance with the requirements of articles 16–17 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. (hereinafter referred to as the “Covenant” or the “CESCR”). This report has been compiled by the Human Rights and Foreign Relations Department at the Ministry of Justice, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and other Government bodies. Israeli Non-Governmental Organizations (“NGOs”) were also invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of the present report, both through direct application, and a general invitation to submit remarks posted on the Ministry of Justice website. Their contributions were given substantial consideration.

2. Since the submission of the Second Periodic Report (UN document – E/1990/6/Add.32), many legislative, administrative and judicial developments relevant to the implementation of the Covenant occurred. A short summary of the main changes is included below. This report provides a comprehensive account of these developments. It also addresses the comments made in the concluding observations by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (E/C.12/1/Add.90) dated May 23, 2003.

3. In terms of legislation, since the submission of Israel’s previous periodic report, noteworthy steps have been taken to promote economic, social and cultural rights issues. Some of the more prominent new laws include the Increasing Participation in the Work force and Reducing Social Gaps (Negative Income Tax) Law 5767-2007, (the “Increasing Participation in the Work force and Reducing Social Gaps (Negative Income Tax) Law”) which endeavours to reduce poverty and increase work force participation rates, providing remuneration for labor to low income-earners. In accordance with an amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5748-1988, dated January 3, 2006, an Equal Employment Opportunities Commission was established within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor.

4. In 2008, the Knesset enacted the Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Work places to Women’s Needs Law 5768-2008, (the “Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Work places to Women’s Needs Law”) granting monetary incentives to employers in the private sector who endeavour to integrate and promote women in their business, as well as employers who modify the workplace and work conditions to the needs of women and parents.

The Women’s Employment Law 5714-1954 (the “Women’s Employment Law”), was amended several times between 2006 and 2008, to ensure a full range of rights for working women, including different aspects of job security (further detailed below) as well as further elaborating and enhancing the maternity protection of women.

In 2007, the Knesset enacted the Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments) 5676-2007 (the “Gender Implications of Legislation Law”), which imposes a duty to systematically examine the gender implications of any primary and secondary legislation before it is enacted by the Knesset.

In 2008, the Law of Execution, 5678-2008, was amended (Amendment no. 29) in order to strengthen the protection provided by the Law to the right to adequate housing, stipulating that in situations of evictions due to debt, mortgage or pledge, the provision of an alternative housing prior to the eviction is obligatory.

In 2007, The Compulsory Education Law 5709-1949, was amended in order to mandate compulsory education to youth between the ages of 15–17 (inclusive) – attending the 11th and 12th grades.

The Free Education for Sick Children Law 5761-2001, was enacted in 2001, aimed at advancing equal opportunity in education for sick children and providing a suitable educational framework for children in hospitals or at home due to long term illness.

5. The fundamental rights protected by the Covenant are effectively protected through legislation, judicial decisions and otherwise. However, Israel has not enacted any further basic laws (Israel's constitutional law) on economic, social and cultural rights since the submission of its previous periodic reports.

6. With respect to judicial decisions, the Supreme Court has continued to play a major role in the implementation of the rights protected by the Covenant. In 2005, while addressing the issue of standard of living, the Supreme Court residing as High Court of Justice held that the State is obligated to maintain a ‘safety net’ designed to ensure that the condition of the underprivileged would not deteriorate to one of existential deprivation in the sense of a shortage in food, places of residency, sanitation, health-care services and such (H.C.J 366/03 The Commitment to Peace and Social Justice Association v. The Minister of Finance).

On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court took the laudatory step of recognizing civil marriages which had taken place between Jewish Israeli residents and citizens outside of Israel (H.C.J 2232/03 Anonymous v. The Rabbinical Court of Appeals).

Several important Judiciary developments have occurred since the submission of Israel’s previous report, broadening the meaning of family in administrative practice, with regard to same-sex couples. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court handed down a landmark decision concerning the rights of same-sex couples. It held that a wedding certificate from a foreign country in which same-sex marriages are recognized, could allow the couple to be registered as married by the Ministry of the Interior. In a significant decision dated January 2005, the Supreme Court accepted the appeal of two women, a same-sex couple, to adopt each other’s children.

7. Lower Court instances also significantly contributed to the protection of human right, as the National Labor Court concluded that a decision of the Minister of Transport and Road Safety to allow transport operatives other than those on strike to provide transportation in the midst of a cessation of services in the city of Beer-Sheva, caused severe, direct, and intentional damage to the workers’ right of association and their right to strike (L.C 57/05 The New Histadrut v. The Minister of Transport (3.3.05)).

In April 2008, the District Court of Tel-Aviv, while residing as an Administrative Court, reaffirmed the importance of protecting workers’ rights when it annulled a tender issued by the Municipality of Bat-Yam due to a concern that the winning company could not uphold its obligations regarding the workers’ rights (Ad.P 1464/07 Preach Hashaked Inc. v. The Municipality of Bat-Yam et. al. (14.4.2008)).

In July 2007, the District Labor Court further broadened the legal protection of the right to organize in trade unions under Israeli jurisprudence, ordering the reinstatement of the petitioner following his wrongful dismissal stemming from his unionizing activity (C.M. 6726/07 Alon Leigh Green v. Excellent Coffee Ltd. (18.7. 2007)).

8. The Following report addresses the main issues raised by the Covenant in the period between the submission of the Israel’s previous Periodic report and December 2008, as well as concerns raised by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

Article 1

Self-determination

9. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Article 2

General principles: State responsibility, non-discrimination and international cooperation

State responsibility

10. Economic, social and cultural rights continue to be widely recognized in Israel, whether directly by law, regulations or case law, or indirectly by administrative programs.

11. The trend of legalization of welfare in Israel, described in previous reports, has continued, as detailed throughout this report.

12. The Courts in Israel often refer to the provisions of the ICESCR when discussing issues concerning the various rights enshrined in the Covenant. The High Court of Justice, for example, addressed the Covenant in relation to Article 13 regarding the right to free primary education (H.C.J 7351/03 Rishon Lezion Municipal Parent Organization et. al. v. The Minister of Education, Culture and Sports et. al. (18.7.2005)). Other examples can be found in the High Court of Justice's references to the Covenant in relation to Article 11 regarding the right to an adequate standard of living (H.C.J 366/03 The Commitment to Peace and Social Justice Association v. The Minister of Finance (12.12.05)), as well as in relation to Article 12 regarding the right to the highest attainable standard of health (H.C.J 3071/05 Gila Luzun v. The State of Israel (28.7.08)).

13. District Courts and Labor Courts also refer to the Covenant in their rulings. For example, the Jerusalem District Court addressed the Covenant in relation to Article 11 regarding the right to an adequate standard of living, concerning the right for housing (C.A (Jerusalem) 6184/05 Moshe Zrihan v. "Amidar" – National Housing Company (20.3.2007)).(A.C. (Haifa) 518/06 Ishmael Abu-Tzalih et. al. v. The Governmental Authority for Water and Sewage et. al. (07.02.2008)).

14. Considerable educational resources are also dedicated to the advancement and promotion of the rights enshrined in the Covenant through the continuation and enhancement of human rights education, as also encouraged by the committee in its concluding observations to Israel's previous periodic report. Further information on this matter is provided in Article 13 below.

Economic, social and cultural rights as constitutional rights

15. As mentioned above, economic, social and cultural rights are widely protected in legislation, and continue to be recognized as having a constitutional status in Israeli jurisprudence, led by the world renowned Israeli Supreme Court for its professionalism and relentless efforts to enshrine human rights. Various judicial decisions of this nature will be detailed in subsequent parts of this report.

16. In 2007, the Government adopted a Socio-Economic Agenda geared towards reducing socio-economic gaps in the Israeli society, while maintaining a growth-oriented policy. In order to implement the Socio-Economic Agenda and formulate appropriate measures, an inter-ministerial committee was established, headed by the General Director of the Ministry of Finance. The committee set up various working groups engaged in defining targets for improving the socio-economic situation, creating tools for encouraging employment and monitoring the application of these tools and the manner in which their efficiency is measured.

17. The Socio-Economic Agenda is based on short, medium and long-term measures, focusing on improving the situation of the weaker strata by increasing employment rates and wages, and reducing poverty. Accordingly, following the inter-ministerial committee's activity, the Government adopted two objectives for medium-term socio-economic policy: employment objective – increasing the employment rate among the 25–64 age group from 69.1% to 71.7% by 2010; and poverty reduction objective – the income of the lowest quintile will increase by 10% more than the per capita GDP growth rate in the years 2008–2010, while the proportion of income from labor in the lowest quintile's income will increase from 43% to 45%.

18. In order to attain these objectives, various short, medium and long term measures were formulated, taking under consideration the specific needs and characteristics of the weak populations in Israeli society. Among the measures developed, further elaborated throughout this report, are specifically designated vocational training programs, including programs to encourage vocational training for occupations in-demand in the labor market; establishing the Authority for Economic Development of the Arab Population; measures for integrating income maintenance recipients in the labor market; measures to promote women's employment such as extending assistance provided by means of day-care centers, a measure that supports the employment of women and increases the disposable income; and advancing the integration of persons with disabilities in the work force.

19. The earned income tax credit (EITC – that is, negative income tax), is an additional innovative mean for reducing poverty among working families and raising work force participation rate. This, by increasing the remuneration for labor to low income-earners. A detailed program for applying EITC in Israel has already been compiled, and began to operate in recent months in accordance with the Increasing Participation in the Work Force and Reducing Social Gaps (Negative Income Tax) Law, enacted on December 27, 2007.

20. The amount of remuneration is determined as a function of the employee's income, the number of children in the family and the total income of the household. The program will be applied in stages, initially concerning paid-employees in 17 municipalities (including 5 Arab and the new regional Bedouin municipality of Abu-Basma), and by 2010, the program will be extended to cover the entire country, and apply to both self-employed workers and paid-employees. A quarter of a million households will be eligible for the benefit once the program is applied nationwide.

21. As mentioned above, one of the Agenda's objectives is to increase the rate of employment among the 25–64 age group to 71.7% by 2010. As a result of the substantial improvement in the labor market during recent years, the employment rate reached 71.2% in the second quarter of 2008.

22. The Government acknowledges the importance of education as a catalyst for reducing socio-economic gaps and increasing social mobility. For this purpose, a broad reform was consolidated and gradually implemented in order to advance the educational system. The reform, further elaborated in Article 13 below, includes the extension and alteration of the teachers' workweek, creation of a rewarding wage system and flexibility in management per individual school, enhancing professional training and reducing the number of pupils in each class. In 2008, the reform is applied in 813 primary and post-primary schools throughout the country. In 2009, the reform will be applied in 700 additional schools, thus being applied in most primary schools in Israel.

23. Alongside the Socio-Economic Agenda, the Government adopted a program for the encouragement of the periphery areas. The gap between the periphery and the center is expressed in employment rate, socio-economical variants, and the realization of capital, physical and human potential. The need to reduce gaps between the periphery and the center, obligates specific designated resources.

24. Another aspect of the activity to promote the peripheral regions in the country is the National Strategic Plan for the Development of the Negev, established by Government's Resolutions .no 4415 (20.11.05), no. 3489 (31.3.05) and no. 4092 (9.8.05). The Government's comprehensive plan covers a nine year period, from 2006 through 2015, and seeks to develop the Negev by improving infrastructure and the educational system, increasing employment and the population in the Negev and reducing discrepancies in income between Negev residents and the rest of Israel. Between the years 2006 and 2015, the Government plans to allocate, directly and/or indirectly, 17 billion NIS ($4.47 billion) to the development of the Negev.

Non-discrimination

25. In its concluding observations with regard to Israel's previous periodic report, the Committee expressed concern "that the State party's domestic legal order does not enshrine the general principles of equality and non-discrimination". We wish to reiterate in this regard, that the principle of equality is a fundamental principle in the Israeli legal system as portrayed both in legislation and adjudication, has already been described in detail in Israel's initial and periodic reports.

26. The Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty purports to protect basic guarantees of personal liberty within the framework of Israel's Jewish and democratic character. The goal of the Basic Law is "to defend Human Dignity and Liberty, in order to establish in a Basic Law the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State."

27. The Basic Law stipulates, inter alia, the following: There shall be no violation of the life, body or dignity of any person as such; There shall be no violation of the property of a person; All persons are entitled to protection of their life, body and dignity; There shall be no deprivation or restriction of the liberty of a person by imprisonment, arrest, extradition or otherwise (unless as provided by law); There shall be no violation of rights under this Basic Law except by a law befitting the values of the State of Israel, enacted for a proper purpose, and to an extent no greater than is required.

28. Furthermore, many laws emphasize the principle of equality, as detailed extensively in Israel's initial and periodic reports.

29. The principle of equality is also enhanced through adjudication, as the Supreme Court of Israel plays a pivotal role in its promotion through the development of jurisprudence dealing with contentious and highly charged political and security-related issues, for example:

- 29.1. H.C.J. 11163/03, The High Follow-up Committee for the Arab Citizens in Israel et. al. v. The Prime Minister of Israel (27.02.06) – The High Court of Justice has affirmed the principles of equality and non-discrimination of any kind, and asserted that the allocation of resources on the basis of any discriminatory criteria is unacceptable. A unanimous ruling was issued to cancel the Government's Resolution establishing national priority areas in Israel, alleging it as discriminatory on the basis of national origin. The Supreme Court held that the Government must respect the principle of equality and is prohibited from discriminating against the minority citizens of Israel. The Court stated that all governmental acts must be performed in conformity with the Basic Laws and in conformity with the values of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State. The Court emphasized that the basic values of Israel are human dignity, liberty, equality, the right to property, etc. The Court noted that the prohibition to violate these values became even stronger following the legislation, in 1992, of Basic Laws: Human Dignity and Liberty and Freedom of Occupation, which granted these values a higher and more significant status in the Israeli legal system.

Note that the issue of implementation of this decision is currently pending before the High Court of Justice.

- 29.2. H.C.J. 3939/99 *Kibbutz Sde-Nahum et. al. v. Israel Land Administration et. al. (29.08.02) – The High Court of Justice held that the Israel Land Administration must administer State lands while protecting the public interest, which includes the protection of the land for the benefit of the larger public, and refraining from granting unjustified land-related benefits to others. As expected from any other administrative body, the Administration must act fairly to promote the general principle of distributive justice in allocation of public resources. The Court also noted the difference between discrimination and legitimate distinction. Consequently, the Court held that a decision to allocate lands exclusively to a specific population, not based on a legitimate distinction, is prohibited.
- 29.3 H.C.J. 1113/99 *Adalah et. al. v. The Minister of Religious Affairs, et. al. (18.4.00) – the Supreme Court accepted the petitioners demand to instruct the Minister of Religious Affairs to establish clear, non-discriminatory criteria for the distribution of resources to all cemeteries. The Court ruled that the Minister of Religious Affairs should allocate money designated for cemeteries on an equal basis and according to the proportionality test (population percentage). Furthermore, the Court ruled that: “The resources of the State, whether land or money...belong to all citizens and all citizens are entitled to enjoy them according to the principle of equality, without discrimination based on religion, race, gender or other prohibited consideration”. In his judgment, the former President of the Supreme Court, Justice Aharon Barak, stressed that the right to equality is a constitutional right incorporated in the right to human dignity.

30. A further detailed account of recent applications of the non-discrimination principle is given throughout the report. Mentioned here are only issues of general and broad implications. Special attention has been given to the Committee’s concerns and observations in its concluding observations following the presentation of Israel’s second periodic reports.

The Law of Return 5710-1950

31. This issue has been extensively discussed in Israel’s previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Non-discrimination on the basis of age

32. As detailed in Israel’s previous reports, the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5748-1988 (the “Equal Employment Opportunities Law”), prohibits discrimination of an employee by his employer on the basis of several characteristics detailed in the Law, including age. In H.C.J 10076/02 Dr. Yuri Rosenbaum et. al. v. The Israel Police Inspector General and the Israel Prisons Service Commissioner (12.12.2006), the High Court of Justice upheld the prohibition of age discrimination, while discussing a petition regarding mandatory retirement age in the Civil Service. The Civil Service Law (Retirement) (Integrated Version) 5730-1970 (the “Retirement Law”), requires the mandatory retirement of employees in the civil service upon reaching the age of 65 (currently 67, as elaborated in Article 3 below). The Law excludes the Police and the Israel Prisons Service’s (hereinafter: “IPS”) employees from the mandatory retirement arrangement, empowering the Police Inspector General and the IPS Commissioner to allow police officers and wardens employed for more than 10 years, to retire upon reaching the age of 55 (currently 57).

Therefore the Police and IPS consolidated internal procedures which determined the age of 55 as the mandatory retirement age for police officers or wardens employed for more than 10 years.

Here, two wardens and a policewoman appealed against their mandatory retirement at the age of 55, claiming that the retirement age constitutes a discrimination against them, in comparison to other Civil Service employees who are required to retire at the age of 65. The Court held that the relevant comparison group is Civil Service employees as a whole, as the State is considered the employer of all Civil Service employees. Therefore, the State cannot define different mandatory retirement age for different sections in the Civil Service, as it constitutes age discrimination as defined in section 2 to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law.

The Court accepted the appeal, declared the annulment of the Police and IPS internal procedures and ordered the reinstatement of the petitioners. However, due to the wide implications of this judgment on the Police and IPS, the annulment of the mandatory retirement age internal procedures was delayed for a period of 18 months in order to complete all necessary adjustments. Consequently, in November 2008, a revised internal police procedure was published.

33. In another case, the Tel-Aviv District Labor Court awarded an employee pecuniary damages for unlawful termination of employment, and non-pecuniary damages for the termination of employment on discriminatory grounds. The Court determined that the employer, Iberia Spanish Airlines, had discriminated against its employee on the basis of her age, as it fired her when she reached the age of 60, and for that reason alone. The company claimed that the termination of employment was conducted willingly, as the employee expressed her wish to early retirement. However, the Court found this claim to be unfounded. The Court held that there were no indications of dissatisfaction regarding the employee's performance, or that the termination of employment was conducted in the course of cutbacks or due to the employee's wish. Therefore, the Court found that the termination of employment constituted a violation of section 2 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, as it discriminated against the employee based on her age (La. (Tel-Aviv) 2539/03 Barbara Hollestain v. Iberia Spanish Airlines (19.10.2006)).

Non-discrimination of minority populations in Israel

34. As detailed in Israel's second periodic report, in October 2000, the Government consolidated a comprehensive multi-year plan addressing all aspects of development for the Arab population (hereinafter: "the 2000 multi-year plan"). The 2000 multi-year plan operated from 2001 until December 31, 2004, during which the Government successfully implemented 87% of the plan.

35. Although the economic situation has led the Government to decide on an overall cutback during these years, figures show that during 2001 and 2002, the implementation rate of the plan was 90%, in 2003 – 81%, and in 2004 – 85%.

36. Incomplete implementation of the plan in some cases is due to the aforementioned cutbacks, as well as bureaucratic barriers and budget deficits in some of the municipalities where cooperation is required for the successful implementation of the plan.

37. In August 2006, the Government resolved to commence on two additional multi-year plans (2006–2009) for the socio-economic development of Arab localities in the North, particularly concerning education, housing and employment: Resolution no. 412 on the development of the Druze and Circassian populations, in the amount of 447 million NIS ($120 million), and Resolution no. 413 for the development of the Bedouin population, in the amount of 318 million NIS ($85 million).

38. The consolidation of the multi-year plans by the Government lasted for several months, as the preparations of the plans involved the heads of the Druze, Circassian and Bedouin municipalities respectively, as well as representatives of the relevant Government Ministries. Additional input was sought from a wide range of sources.

39. The new development plans focus on three main issues: investment in human resources with a special emphasis on the empowerment of women, economic development, and employment – including the development of tourism as a source of income.

40. The budget required for the implementation of the plans was allocated by the relevant Government Ministries, in addition to a special budget of the Prime Minister's Office designated to the non-Jewish population. The current implementation rate of both Resolutions is 88%.

41. Note that these plans continue on from previous multi-year plans implemented and completed since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report.

42. Furthermore, Government Resolutions no. 412 and no. 413 are supplemental to the development budgets that the Ministry of the Interior allocates to local municipalities, the subsidies given to retired soldiers in purchasing land plots and housing construction, and segments of the budget set aside for the rehabilitation of Northern Israel, adopted following the Second Lebanon War.

43. Concerning the Bedouin population in the Negev (South), reference should be made to the aforementioned National Strategic Plan for the Development of the Negev. The Plan was devised, in part, to assist the Bedouins living in the Negev. For example, one of the plan's goals is adding approximately 20,000 jobs for the Negev population within 10 years. Among the endeavors to attain this goal, the plan seeks to encourage businesses and employment within the Bedouin population through financial assistance to entrepreneurs, vocational training and developing commercial areas and joint industry zones.

44. The Authority for Economic Development of the Arab Population, including Druze and Circassian. On February 15, 2007 the Government decided to establish, within the Prime Minister's Office, the Authority for Economic Development of the Arab Population, including the Druze and Circassian (hereinafter: the "Authority"). The aim of the Authority is to realize, to its maximum, the economic potential of the minority population, through the encouragement of productive economic activity within this population, and its integration into the national economy. Among its functions, the Authority will operate as coordinator for the purposes of integration and supervision with regard to government activities concerning the economic advancement of the Arab population.

45. The establishing of the Authority is in progressive stages. Recently, Mr. Aiman Dar Saif, a former executive in the Prime Minister's Office, was appointed as the Authority's director. Alongside the Authority, an Advisory Committee will operate, with half of its members being Arab experts and business men and women.

46. Investment Fund for Businesses in the Arab Population. In December 2006, the Director General of the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) announced the decision to establish a private equity fund, in cooperation with the private sector. The fund will invest an overall sum of 160 million NIS ($42.1 million) over 7 to 10 years in businesses in Arab localities. Any factory, company or business will be able to apply for 2–4 million NIS ($526,315–$1,052,631) in financing, thus enabling 40–80 companies to receive financing assistance in exchange for stocks.

47. Development of industrial zones. In 2006, following Government Resolution no. 249, the Encouragement of Capital Investments Order (Development Areas) 5763-2002 (the "Encouragement of Capital Investments Order"), was amended in order to include all minority localities in the definition of “Development Area A”, thus enabling plants in industrial areas in these localities to receive various tax benefits and grants as stipulated in the Order and the Encouragement of Capital Investments Law 5719-1959 (the “Encouragement of Capital Investments Law”). Furthermore, on January 7, 2007, the Government resolved to expedite the marketing of lands for industrial purposes in “Development Area A”, thus facilitating the expedition of land marketing in these localities, as well as subsidizing the land development expenses, as stipulated in the Resolution.

48. Between the years 2005 and 2008, activities in industrial zones in Arab and Druze localities were subsidized by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, in sums amounting to 28,665,967 NIS ($7,543,675.5). As part of these activities, 1,008 square kilometers of State-owned land in these areas was marketed.

49. In 2005 and 2006, the Government made 2 additional resolutions (Resolution No. 3957 dated July 22, 2005, and Resolution No. 632 dated November 5, 2006), establishing a plan for the development and expansion of new and existing industrial zones, as well as assistance to small businesses in Arab, Druze and Bedouin localities. The Government allocated a total of 119 million NIS (31,315,789$) in the years 2005–2006 for this purpose.

50. Development of road infrastructure. In accordance with the aforementioned multi-year plan of October 2000, between the years 2001 and 2004, the Ministry of Transport and Road Safety allocated a budget of 180 million NIS ($48 million) for the development of intra-municipal road infrastructure and safety projects (45 million per year), and a budget of 325 million NIS ($87 million) for the development of inter-municipal road infrastructure (81.25 million NIS – $21.96 million per year) in various Arab localities.

51. During the years 2005–2007, the Ministry continued to advance the development of intra-municipal infrastructure in the Arab localities. Furthermore, the Ministry continues to develop inter-municipal infrastructure through the allocation of budgets to the local municipalities towards their development of infrastructure in their jurisdiction, or through managing companies. During these years, 94,386,900 NIS ($25,509,972) was allocated for development projects for the Druze and Circassian population, 69,652,880 NIS ($18,825,102) for projects in the Bedouin towns in the North, 34,790,000 NIS ($9,402,702) for the Bedouin towns in the Negev and 230,448,321 NIS ($62,283,330) towards Arab localities.

52. During the first half of 2008, the Ministry allocated a budget of 52.2 million NIS ($14 million) towards the development of intra-municipal infrastructure, from which 7.8 million NIS ($2.1 million) for Bedouin localities in the Negev, 11.8 million NIS ($3.19 million) for Bedouin localities in the North, 6.1 million NIS ($1.64 million) for the Druze and Circassian localities and 26.4 million NIS ($7.13 million) for Arab localities. Furthermore, during this period of time, the Ministry allocated an additional 29.3 million NIS ($7.19 million) for development of infrastructure and safety projects in these localities.

53. According to the Ministry’s estimates, by the end of 2008, the Ministry will have allocated another 20 million NIS ($5.4 million) for additional funding of uncompleted projects.

54. The inter-municipal infrastructure development is performed by ‘Ma’atz’ – Israel National Road Company Inc., according to a five-year plan which determines the projects to be carried out. The current plan is for the years 2005–2009. According to the five-year plan, 2.333 billion NIS ($630,540,540) was allocated for the development, maintenance and reconstruction of inter-municipal infrastructure in the Arab localities.

55. According to information provided by ‘Ma’atz’, by the beginning of 2008, a total of 315.26 million NIS ($85.2 million) was invested in the development of inter-municipal infrastructure in the minorities' localities. An additional amount of 1.0111 billion NIS ($273,270,270) will be allocated for the completion of remaining projects. Furthermore, during 2008–2009, another 1.0065 billion NIS ($272,027,027) will be allocated according to the five-year plan, for the development, maintenance and reconstruction of inter-municipal infrastructure in minorities' localities.

56. National-Civil Service. The Public Commission for National-Civil Service (hereinafter: the "Commission"), which had been established on August 1, 2004, was mandated to examine the issue of civil service for populations not performing military service. In February 2005, the Minister of Defense adopted the Commission's recommendations advising that all Israeli citizens and residents, not recruited to military service such as most ultra-orthodox Jews and most of the Arab population, will perform civil service.

57. Government Resolution no. 4598, dated December 18, 2005, stressed the importance of promoting the possibility to perform either military or civil service as part of equality and division of the burden among the Israeli society. During the Government meeting that resulted in the above Government Resolution, instructions were set with regard to the realization of the civil service initiative. It also established the Civil Service Administration (hereinafter: "the Administration").

58. Government Resolution no. 2295, dated August 19, 2007, establishes a new National-Civil Service Administration. The new administration mandate is to regulate and coordinate the implementation of the National-Civil Service program in order to enable youth from all segments of the population exempt from military duty, to take part in the program for a period of 1–2 years, performing activities aimed at promoting the society in general and weak populations in particular, thus enhancing the linkage between the individual and the State.

59. The Resolution stresses the voluntary nature of the National-Civil Service, and its help in reducing inequality between people who serve in the military or any other voluntary service, and those who do not serve, and will increase the possibility of all those serving to integrate in the civil life.

This Resolution encountered strong resistance from different Arab leaders and from the Arab High Monitoring Committee.

60. However, according to a survey conducted, the majority (74%) of the Arab youth are willing to take part in such program. Moreover, since the application of the Government Resolution, the numbers of National-Civil Service members have been increasing steadily – from 240 applicants in 2006, to 628 in 2007, and 1,050 in 2008.

61. The National-Civil Service is an independent body, without linkage to the military system and the military service. That is excluding issues relating to the postponement of the military service for yeshiva students according to the Service Postponement to Yeshiva Students who's Torah – their Craft Law 5767-2007 (the "Service Postponement Law").

62. The main challenges the Administration faces are the creation of attractive service options for youth from the different populations, countering opposition in different sectors and providing professional training where needed.

63. The Administration is responsible to present to the Government, after consultation with a public committee, a program for long-term operation, including ways to extend the volunteering group, and other plans of action. Furthermore, the Administration is in charge of initiating programs needed in order to present information, raise awareness, and broaden the public involvement in the National-Civil Service subject.

64. The Prime Minister's Office is currently promoting legislation to anchor the National-Civil Service program, and to equalize the conditions and entitlements of those who perform military service with those who perform National-Civil Service.

Appropriate representation

65. The Civil Service. In 2000, the Civil Service (Appointments) (Amendment no. 11) (Appropriate Representation) Law 5760-2000 (the "Civil Service (Appointments) Law"), was enacted by the Israeli Knesset in order to ensure that minorities and under-represented populations such as women, persons with disabilities, and the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations are represented in the Civil Service according to their proportion in the eligible work force population. The Law requires appropriate representation of the various groups throughout the Civil Service, at all levels and in all professions.

66. On November 30, 2003, the Government consolidated Resolution no. 1073 concerning appropriate representation for persons with disabilities in the Civil Service. Among the measures set out in the Resolution is the appointment of Equality for Persons with Disabilities Supervisors in each Ministry, whose task it is both to promote the employment of persons with disabilities in the Civil Service and to make the Ministry more accessible to persons with disabilities in general. The Government further decided to give priority to persons with severe disabilities in appointments and promotions in the Civil Service.

67. The Civil Service (Appointments) Law was amended in 2005, in order to include persons of Ethiopian origin among the various groups entitled to appropriate representation in the Civil Service. Following this amendment, the Government accepted Resolution no. 1665 concerning allocation of positions in the Civil Service for persons of Ethiopian origin and giving them priority in appointments and promotions.

68. On March 12, 2006, the Government decided (Resolution no. 4729), based on section 15A of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law, to designate 337 employment positions towards the integration of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassians, into the Civil Service between the years 2006 and 2008. In addition, the Government decided to establish an inter-ministerial team charged with examining further ways of promoting appropriate representation of Arabs in the Civil Service. On July 16, 2006, the inter-ministerial team submitted its recommendations.

69. On August 31, 2006, the Government adopted Resolution no. 414 adopting most of the inter-ministerial team's recommendations, including: determination of new objectives for advancing appropriate representation of Israeli Arabs in the Civil Service, such that Arabs would constitute 8% of all Civil Service employees by the end of 2008, and 10% by the end of 2010. In addition, it was decided that until the end of 2008, 20% of all new positions would be allocated for Arabs. Previous decisions to give priority to Arab-Israelis in appointments and promotions were extended by a further four years. Each Ministry was required to appoint a supervisor charged with the advancement of Arab representation and an inter-ministerial team to ensure the implementation of the Resolution would be established.

70. On November 11, 2007, the Government adopted Resolution no. 2579 amending the previous Resolution no. 414. According to the new Resolution, Arabs, including Druze and Circassians, are to consist of 10% of all Civil Service employees by the end of the year 2012. In addition, 30% of all new positions until 2012 are to be allocated to this population. In order to achieve these objectives, the Resolution requires all Government Ministries to consolidate a five-year working plan. The Resolution further requires that priority be given to Israeli-Arabs appointments and promotions until the end of 2012. The Resolution establishes an Inter-ministerial team headed by the Director General of the Ministry of Justice to follow-up on the implementation of the provisions detailed above by every Government Ministry and look into ways of removing barriers from the integration of Israeli Arabs into the Civil Service. Following this Resolution, the Civil Service Commission is in constant contact with each Ministry, monitoring its progress in moving towards the goals set by the Government.

71. Data indicates a steady increase in the rates of Arab, Druze and Circassian employees in the Civil Service. As of November 2008, 6.5% of employees in the Civil Service were Arabs, Druze and Circassians (in comparison to 6.17% in 2007).

72. Furthermore, 8.7% of all new employees integrated in the Civil Service in 2007 were Arabs, Druze and Circassians, In comparison to 6.9% in 2005, and 4.26% in 2003. It should be noted that the rates of women among the Arab, Druze and Circassian newly integrated employees are also on the rise. In 2007 39.8% of all recently accepted Arab, Druze and Circassian integrated employees were women, in comparison to 37.7% in 2005, and 34.2% in 2003.

73. An increase is also evident in the employment of Arab, Druze and Circassian academics in the Civil Service. In 2007, 46.82% of Arab, Druze and Circassian Civil Service employees had an academic degree, in comparison to 43.7% in 2006. This trend is correlated with the general trend of allocating positions intended for the integration of Arab, Druze and Circassian academics.

74. Data also indicates an increase in the number of Arab employees in senior ranks – 376 employees in 2007, in comparison to 347 in 2006.

75. On March 12, 2006, the Government of Israel made a resolution, at the request of the Ministry of Justice, in the matter of suitable representation among interns in the Ministry of Justice (Resolution no. 4730). The Government decided, inter alia, as follows:

“A. In accordance with the provisions of section 15A(b)(2) of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law to designate, insofar as possible, some ten per cent of the annual class of interns in the Ministry of Justice solely for the employment of candidates who qualify for an internship in the Ministry of Justice and fulfill one of these:

the candidate is a member of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassian;

the candidate or one of his/her parents was born in Ethiopia;

the candidate is a “person with a severe disability” within its meaning in section 35.252 of the Civil Service Regulations...”

76. In accordance with the aforesaid resolution, it was decided to compile a directory of candidates that will effectuate the aforesaid Government Resolution with respect to “suitable representation” and will include candidates who meet the criteria set forth in the Government’s Resolution and whose particulars and qualifications make them suitable for internship. Accordingly, in 2008, the Ministry of Justice announced, for the second year, the creation of such a directory of candidates for internship positions for September 2008 and March 2009.

77. Local municipalities. In the 88 local councils or municipalities which serve towns and villages where the population is primarily composed of Arabs, Druze, Bedouins or Circassians, the employees of the local government bodies are almost exclusively composed of members of those minorities. In larger municipalities with mixed populations, such as Jerusalem, Haifa and Lod, members of minorities are employed at a level which approaches their overall representation in the population, although less so at the most senior positions.

78. Government Companies. Under an amendment to the Government Companies (Amendment 11) Law 5735-1975 (the “Government Companies Law”), dated June 11, 2000, the Arab population (defined as including people of Druze and Circassian origin) must be appropriately represented on the board of directors of every government company and statutory corporation. According to data gathered in December 2008, 47 out of 586 directors, (8.02%), were of Arab origin, including Druze and Circassian, in comparison, to 10 (1.7%) in 2001.

79. In H.C.J. 10026/01 Adalah v. the Prime Minister of Israel et. al. (02.04.03) the Court discussed the issue of the appointment and representation of Arabs, specifically women, to the boards of directors of government companies, as the petitioner claimed that the implementation pace of the Government Companies Law by the Government was unsatisfactory and inconsistent with its obligation. The Court dismissed the petition, determining that the gradual implementation of the Law is inevitable, and pointing out that the petitioner itself agreed that an appropriate representation of the Arab population cannot be achieved in two or even several years. The Court further held that the Government endeavors to implement the Law and fulfill its obligations are sufficient.

80. On June 27, 2007, the Jerusalem District Court determined that an Arab citizen could not be disqualified from being appointed to the board of directors of Keren Kayemeth Le’Israel (KKL) – the Jewish National Fund, which is a dual entity committed to the principal of equality (OP 5299/06 Uri Bank v. Keren Kayemeth Le’Israel KKL). The petitioners requested the Court to annul the election of new directors to KKL which had taken place on July 13, 2006, due to fundamental deficiencies in the process, and the election of Mr. Radi Sfori, an Israeli Arab elected as a representative of the Meretz Party.

The Court discussed whether the procedure of appointing new directors to KKL was in line with the Companies Law 5759-1999, and whether an Israeli Arab could be appointed as director of a corporation defined as being “trustee of the Jewish people in the land of Israel”. The Court stated that the appointment procedure was not deficient, and refused to annul the elections. It held that former court decisions acknowledged the duty of every authority in Israel to treat all different individuals in the State equally. Although KKL is a private company – it shall apply the principle of equality since it is a dual entity.

81. The Judiciary. In the last 10 years there has been a significant increase in the number of Arab citizens working in the Israeli judicial system. This is greatly the result of the increase of appointments of members of minority populations within the Ministry of Justice. Currently, 38 out of 576 judges are members of minority populations, half of which were appointed in the last 10 years. The distribution of appointments within the Arab population is as follows: 14 Muslim judges – 8 were appointed in the last 10 years, 17 Christian judges – 12 were appointed in the last 10 years, 7 Druze judges – 5 were appointed in the last 10 years.

82. Minorities’ terms of employment in the Civil Service. In addition to increasing representation of minority groups, the Civil Service Commission has also taken steps to better accommodate the various needs and lifestyles of minority employees at work. Holiday and vacation time is provided according to the relevant religious holidays, such that Muslim employees are entitled to a day off during the Ramadan, and Christians can choose Sunday as their day off from work.

83. Furthermore, members of the Arab population employed in the Civil Service enjoy a unique benefit in the form of State participation in the rent paid by them for apartments in the vicinity of their workplace and funding of weekly commute expenses.

Arab cooperative societies

84. All Israeli NGOs are treated equally. In 2007, The Registrar of Cooperative Societies published on its internet web site a document in Arabic entitled the “The Proper Administration of Cooperative Societies”, which is a translation of a document in Hebrew first issued in October 2002. Additionally, the Registrar employs an Arab lawyer who handles applications in Arabic, a contractor lawyer who is fluent in Arabic and is involved particularly in registration, and two other Arab accountants who examine NGOs’ files. The Registrar and its representatives took part in a number of conferences organized by Arab representatives and attended lectures concerning the different requirements of the Registrar.

85. Land allocation. The Supreme Court ruling in H.C.J. 6698/95 Ka’adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (ILA) was discussed in Israel’s previous periodic report. In response to that judgment, the ILA, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency for Israel, issued new admission criteria to be uniformly applied to all applicants seeking to move into small, communal settlements established on State-owned land. These criteria stipulate that the applicants must be over the age of 20, have applied as an individual or a couple (including families), maintain sufficient economic resources, and be suitable for a small communal regime.

If the Committee rejects an application for admission, the reasons for rejection are to be based upon an objective, professional, and independent opinion. Any criterion for admission is to be examined in advance by the Administration and publicized.

The decisions of the committee are subject to review by a Public Appeals Committee, which is to be chaired by a retired judge. Application forms and the rules of procedure of the Appeals Committee are to be made available to the public.

86. On January 22, 2007, the High Court of Justice had rejected the petition of “Hasolelim” Rural Community Association Inc., filed against the decision of the Israel Lands Administration (ILA), dated March 2, 2006, to allocate a lot for residence to Ibrahim and Hilda Dwiri in the neighborhood of Kibbutz Hasolelim (“Nof-Alonim”) despite the pre-requisite for admission to the neighborhood, of military service.

The Court explained in its decision, that the Israel Lands Council is the authorized body to set the land policy of Israel, and the ILA is the authorized body to act upon such policy and to supervise its realization.

Although the Court had established that in light of the above it did not need to address the petitioners’ claims with regard to the justifications to reject the admission of the Dwiri family, it nevertheless emphasized the extraordinary severity of differentiation on the basis of nationality. (H.C.J. 7574/06, “Hasolelim” Rural Community Association Inc. v. The Israel Lands Administration).

Equal rights for persons with disabilities

87. The State of Israel signed the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities on March 31, 2007, thus expressing its commitment to the advancement and the protection of the rights of persons with disabilities. The Ministries of Justice and of Foreign Affairs are currently examining the necessary measures towards the ratification of the Convention, including the legislative amendments required.

88. The Commission for Equal Rights of People with Disabilities. Since Israel’s previous periodic report, the Commission for Equal Rights of People with Disabilities (hereinafter: “the Commission”) was established, its powers were broadened and the number of employees significantly increased. The Commission includes three main units: Accessibility, Integration in Society and the Legal Department. The Commission’s work is aimed at promoting public policies regarding the rights of persons with disabilities as well as providing assistance to individuals who encounter difficulties. Alongside the Commission operates a steering committee, composed mainly of persons with different disabilities who represent the main organizations operating in the field.

89. Legislation. As set out in detail in Israel's previous report, the central piece of legislation in this field is the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law (the "Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law"), enacted by the Knesset on February 23, 1998. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law established, for the first time, the statutory right to equality and human dignity for persons with disabilities and created a new system of obligations for the State of Israel vis-à-vis its disabled citizens. In addition to chapters concerning fundamental and general principles, the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law comprised operative chapters on employment, public transport services and the establishment of the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities. The Law was amended in 2004, so as to extend the application of the temporary provision requiring adequate representation of persons with disabilities in the work force, for a further period expiring in 2010.

90. In 2005, the Law was amended again, adding section E1 – Public Places and Public Services. This section incorporated many new and important elements into the Law, including: prohibition of discrimination in public services, in public places and products, accessibility of public places, accessibility to public services, restrictions on the statutory duty of accessibility and accessibility to education, higher education institutions and educational services. The Law was further amended in 2007 and 2008, in order to promote effective implementation of the accessibility provisions – the 2007 amendment dealing with implementation of the new provisions concerning licensed accessibility experts, and the 2008 amendment strengthening the provisions on accessibility to educational facilities.

91. In this regard, mention must be made to an amendment to the Immovable Property Law 5729-1969, passed on December 4, 2001, facilitating the statutory framework for accommodations and adjustment of the common parts of apartment buildings to the needs of a resident with disabilities, in certain circumstances even without the consent of other residents.

92. The enactment of the accessibility amendment to the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law in 2005, was followed by the passage that same year of two additional related laws – the Investigation and Testimony Procedures (Suitability to Persons with Intellectual or Mental Disability) Law 5765-2005, (the "Investigation and Testimony Procedures (Suitability to Persons with Mental or Physical Disability) Law") and the Broadcasting Television (Subtitles and Signing) Law 5765-2005, (the "Subtitles and Signing Law"), further elaborated below.

93. In December 2007, the Prohibition of Slander Law 5726-1965, was amended by the Israeli Knesset. According to the revised Law, making a mockery of or humiliating persons with disabilities because of said disability – whether it is psychological, mental (including cognitive), physical, permanent or temporary, shall be considered unlawful and prohibited slander.

94. According to a recent Amendment to the National Health Insurance Law 5754-1994, (the "National Health Insurance") (Amendment 43) dated November 5, 2008, children with Autistic disorders will receive 3 hours' a week of paramedical treatment (physiotherapy, speech therapy and occupational therapy). These treatments will require a minimal co-payment of 23 NIS ($6) per session. The Amendment will be gradually implemented, commencing on January 1, 2009.

Employment of persons with disabilities

95. As set out in Israel's previous report, the employment provisions of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law prohibit discrimination on the basis of disability, oblige employers to make reasonable work accommodations and require appropriate representation of persons with disabilities in the work force.

96. Since the submission of Israel's second periodic report, the Government promulgated various regulations with a view of promoting greater participation in the work force by persons with disabilities. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Preference in Parking Spaces in the Work place) Regulations 5762-2001, oblige employers to provide each disabled employee with an accessible designated parking space for his/her exclusive use. These regulations apply to every employer who has at least six employees, and who has provided designated parking spaces for at least three of them. Under the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (State Participation in Financing Accommodations) Regulations 5766-2006, employers are entitled to a refund from the Government on expenses made in adjusting the workplace to the disability, work and daily needs of disabled employees (subject to a maximum sum per employee).

97. In addition, the employment provisions of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law have been the subject of a growing body of case law.

98. In the first case to be decided, L.C 2968/01 Balilti v. Jerusalem Post Publications Ltd (2.12.01), the Jerusalem District Labor Court held that the duty to ensure proper representation of persons with disabilities according to section 9 of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, includes giving priority to persons with disabilities over other similarly qualified employees when selecting for redundancy.

99. In 2003, addressing the duty to make reasonable accommodations, the Tel Aviv District Labor Court held that an employer is obligated to find alternative suitable employment for an employee who has become disabled during the course of his employment (C.M. (Tel Aviv) 5712/03 Steinberg v. Israel Electric Co. (30.12.03)).

100. In another case, in 2005, the Nazareth District Labor Court ruled that the phrase "accommodation" is not limited to the physical adjustment of structures, equipment or accessories, but extends to making accommodations of an economic nature. Thus, an employer is obligated to continue employing an employee who became disabled, and pay him the same salary, even if there is a decrease in his/her productivity due to the disability, unless the employer can prove that this imposes an unreasonable burden on his/her business. In this case, the Court held that an employee with cancer constitutes a person with a disability for the purposes of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law (L.C (Nazareth) 1732/04 De Castro Dekel v. M.B.A Hazore'a (10.07.05)).

101. Labor courts have also dealt with cases of persons with Intellectual and/or Mental disabilities, whose work capacity is diminished due to their disabilities. The courts ruled that such persons are to be regarded as "workers" and as such are entitled to all the benefits of an employer-employee relationship, including the applicability of all relevant labor laws. In both decisions, the employers were obligated to compensate the plaintiffs retroactively (L.C (Tel-Aviv) 10973/04 Goldstein v. Na'amat; L.C (Haifa) 3327/01 Roth v. Ram Buildings Ltd).

102. As a result of these decisions and with a view of encouraging the employment of persons with Intellectual and/or Mental disabilities in supported employment in the open labor market, a law was enacted in 2007 – the Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed as Rehabilitated Persons (Temporary Provision) Law. According to this Law, a person whose work capacity is less than 19% shall not be considered an employee, but rather a rehabilitated person. As such the entire body of labor laws does not apply, but at the same time the new Law gives a rehabilitated person the right to remuneration for work and decent work conditions concerning matters such as leave, sick pay, hours of work and travel expenses. This law supplements the Minimum Wage (Adjusted Wage for Employees with Disabilities Having Reduced Ability to Work) Regulations 5762-2002, promulgated on February 21, 2002, concerning adjustments to the minimum wage for persons who are at various levels of diminished work capacity as the result of a disability. The objective of the Regulations is to encourage employers to hire employees whose work capacity is diminished due to disability, by enabling them to pay such employees less than the minimum wage. The Regulations set a reduced minimum wage scale which corresponds with work capacity. Thus an employee whose work capacity is reduced by between 25–50% is entitled to 75% of the minimum wage; an employee whose work capacity is reduced by between 50–70% is entitled to 50% of the minimum wage; and an employee whose work capacity is reduced by over 70% is entitled to a third of the minimum wage. Under the Regulations, the person with disability is required to apply to the Ministry of ITL requesting a determination of his/her reduced work capacity, resulting in the entitlement to a reduced minimum wage. The Regulations apply to employment in the open labor market, as opposed to sheltered employment. In the first 20 months of the implementation of the Regulations, 1,600 persons with disabilities have applied to have their minimum wage adjusted, and in 1,255 of these cases the wage was, in fact, adjusted.

103. On July 27, 2008, the National Insurance Law (Consolidated Version) 5755-1995 (the “National Insurance Law”) was amended (Amendment no. 109) in order to further facilitate the integration of persons with disabilities into the labor force. The amendment is the end product of a process designed to sever the linkage between disability, social security and unemployment. Prior to the amendment, a person with disability entitled to the National Insurance Disability Benefit had little if no incentive to take him/herself off social security and enter the labor market, since a salary exceeding the level of Disability Benefit would disqualify him/her from receiving the benefit, even where he/she lost his/her job thereafter. Eliminating the Disability Benefit trap was a centerpiece of the Report issued by the Public Commission for the Examination of Disabled Persons’ Issues and The Promotion of their Integration into the Community. The Commission, headed by retired Justice Laron, presented its Report on April 21, 2005, having been appointed by the Government following a major strike of persons with disabilities in 2002. The recent amendment to the National Insurance Law, which is the outcome of the Government’s adoption of the Laron Commission’s Report, enables a person with disability to earn a relatively high monthly salary (7,000 NIS – 1,842$) without having to forgo his/hers National Insurance Disability Benefit entitlement.

Accessibility

104. The extensive aforementioned 2005 amendment to the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, prohibits disability-based discrimination in the operation of public places and the provision of public services, and requires that these be made accessible, such that persons with disabilities will be able to benefit to the full extent from public services and will be able to enter a public place, move around and enjoy its facilities in full. The new accessibility regime applies to public places and services operated by the State and other public authorities, as well as to those operated by the private sector.

105. According to the Law, existing buildings, as well as new construction must be made accessible. Special provisions of the new legislation are devoted to accessibility and non-discrimination related to specific areas – insurance contracts, schools and higher educational institutions, roads and infrastructure in general and emergency services.

106. In addition to radically changing the norms governing accessibility, the 2005 amendment establishes a wide range of enforcement mechanisms: obtaining and renewing a business licence will now be conditional on securing the approval of a licensed accessibility expert, to the effect that the requirements of the new accessibility regime have been complied with. The accessibility expert's approval is likewise a pre-condition for obtaining planning permission and completing other planning procedures.

107. At the core of the new provisions on enforcement are a number of key powers with which the Commission for Equal Rights for Persons with Disabilities has been invested: in order to secure implementation of the accessibility requirements, the Commission may either file a civil claim or, subject to providing notice as required by the Law, issue an accessibility order setting out the various steps required in order to make a particular place or service accessible, together with a time frame for so doing. Violation of the terms of an accessibility order is considered a criminal offence.

108. Various regulations have been promulgated to accommodate the aforementioned accessibility amendments: The Equal Rights for People with Disability (Licensed Building, Infrastructure and Environment Accessibility Experts) Regulations 5767-2007, and the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Licensed Service Accessibility Experts) Regulations 5767-2007, prescribe the prerequisites for the registration of a licensed building, infrastructure and environment accessibility experts, and licensed service accessibility experts respectively.

Transportation

109. Legislation requiring the accessibility of public transportation was part of the original Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Accessibility to Public Transportation) Regulations 5763-2003, set out in detail the obligations of public transportation operators (trains, boats, air transportation, municipal bus lines, central bus stations, train stations, airports, etc.) to provide accessibility for persons with disabilities.

Community housing

110. Community housing for people with Intellectual Disabilities. To date, it is estimated that 33,000 people with intellectual disabilities live in Israel, 25,000 of which receive care from the social services. Some reside at home while others live in various residential services facilities.

111. Currently, 63 residential facilities provide housing for people with Intellectual disabilities: 9 governmental facilities accommodating 1,816 residents, 40 private facilities accommodating 3,740 residents and 14 public facilities run by non-profit organizations, accommodating 1,175 residents.

112. In addition there are several community housing options: 140 foster families, 48 hostels (up to 24 residents in each), 21 communal houses (up to 15 residents in each) and 166 apartments in the community (up to 6 residents per apartment).

113. An amendment to the Welfare (Treatment of Persons with Intellectual Disabilities) Law 5729-1969, enacted in 2000, provides that when it is decided that a person with an Intellectual Disability should live outside his/her family home, priority should be given to housing in the community. The Department for the Treatment of the Intellectually Disabled within the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, acts to implement this priority, as the general trend is to transfer people from residential facilities to community housing in the form of hostels. In practice housing in the community is now the dominant option, such that two-thirds of people with Intellectual Disabilities living outside their family homes live in the community.

114. Following a recent petition to the Supreme Court, the limitations set by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services upon community housing have been narrowed down and are confined to cases where the medical services provided in the Community are insufficient or cases of violence or severe behavioral problems. In order to implement the new policy, the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social services has decided to establish hostels in the community, in which between 16 and 24 persons with Intellectual Disabilities will reside. The revised policies of the Ministry relating both to the limitations on living in the community and the building of hostels in the community have recently been approved by the Supreme Court (H.C.J 3304/07 Lior Levi et. al v. The State of Israel et. al. (24.9.08)).

115. Community housing for people with Physical Disabilities. The Department for Rehabilitation in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, which is responsible for the treatment of people with physical or sensory disabilities, allocates 85% of its budget towards Community Housing (mainly hostels and apartments). The remaining portion of the budget is used to maintain existing residential facilities. Since 2001, no new residential facilities have been established, as the majority of the budget is invested in community housing. Recently, the Department published tenders for the establishment of new hostels for people with severe disabilities. Moreover, the existing facilities will be obligated to reassign appropriate persons from residential facilities to community housing.

Culture and leisure

116. Several important developments have occurred since Israel's previous periodic report in this regard. Firstly, the many advancements in accessibility mentioned earlier, influence all aspects of life for the disabled, including access to cultural events and leisure sites.

117. Recently, a number of resort sites have been made accessible for the disabled with the help of the National Insurance Institute funds.

118. In September 2008, new regulations were promulgated, obligating the adjustment of various public sites to the needs of persons with disabilities. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Site Accessibility Adjustments) Regulations 5768-2008, lay down the accessibility requirements for archeological sites, national parks and nature reserves, as well as other areas, mainly forests, managed by the Jewish National Fund or on its behalf. According to these Regulations, new sites will not open for public use unless the accessibility requirements are met. Existing sites are compelled to gradually fulfill the requirements within 10 years.

119. The Television Broadcasts (Subtitles and Sign Language) Law, mentioned above institutes a comprehensive statutory scheme in this field, thereby replacing its predecessor, the far narrower Deaf Persons Relief Law of 1992. The new Law applies broader responsibilities and restrictions on broadcasters in order to enhance, to the fullest extent, disabled persons' accessibility to television broadcastings.

120. In 2008, the Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting, a public body established under the Telecommunications Law 5742-1982, decided on a separate definition of "prime-time" for children's channels, so that the requirement for subtitles will coincide with the relevant viewing hours for children with hearing impairments. The Council also decided on a list of children's programs of major interest that will be subtitled.

International cooperation

121. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Additional information

122. For further information regarding the elimination of all forms of discrimination, please refer to the 10th–13th Combined Periodic Report of the State of Israel on the Implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD), submitted in May 2005, as well as the Third Periodic Report of the State of Israel on the Implementation of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), submitted in July 2008.

Prohibition of discrimination between men and women

123. The Israeli courts continue to protect and uphold the principle of equality and prohibition of discrimination, including gender discrimination. In the wording of the Tel-Aviv Labor Court in La.A. 8704/06 Nadav Fitusi v. N&B Bogin Sports Center Ltd: “any discrimination based on gender is a negative social phenomenon that is to be uprooted completely. The prohibition on discrimination derives not only from the provisions of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5758-1988, but also from the general principle of equality which is part of our legal system and anchored in Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity”.

In this case, the plaintiff was employed by the respondent as a gym instructor and was dismissed from work following the respondent’s desire to replace him with a female instructor. There was no disagreement among parties that the dismissal was due solely to the plaintiff’s gender.

The Court held that in order to prove discrimination, the worker needs only to convince the court that such prohibited consideration was actually a factor for the employer’s decision, even if it was not the main reason. Based on section 10 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Court ordered the respondent to pay 30,000 NIS ($8,108) compensation to the plaintiff, considering the specific circumstances of the case.

Childcare services expenditures

124. On April 3, 2008, the Tel-Aviv District Court determined that expenses paid for childcare services, such as nursery and after-school programs, are expenses made for the purpose of generating an income, therefore can be deducted from the taxable income of a mother each tax year. The Court determined that these costs are essential in allowing the integration of mothers to young children in the labor market.

Here, the Court held that a mother of two children, a lawyer with a private practice, needs to work long hours in order to succeed in her profession, and therefore must find a solution for the care and supervision of her children during her working hours. However, the tax authorities did not agree to deduct the expenses paid for childcare from the taxable income. The Court held that distinction shall be made between the component of care and supervision (including the amount of money necessary to operate a childcare institution) to the component of education and enrichment the children receive while in those childcare institutions.

The Court emphasized the fact that the premise is the right of the two spouses to fulfill their career aspirations, their right to realize their will to practice their occupation and create a livelihood for themselves and their family members. The placement of children who need adult supervision in childcare institutions is done for the purpose of allowing both parents to work. Therefore, the Court ordered that the tax authorities deduct 2/3 of the expenses paid in the years in dispute. (I.T.A (Tel-Aviv) 1213/04 Vered Peri v. The Income Tax Assessor of the Dan Metropolitan Area (03.04.2008)).

125. On May 12, 2008, the State of Israel submitted an appeal to the Supreme Court, and the proceedings are still pending. (C.A. 4248/08 The Income Tax Assessor of the Dan Metropolitan Area v. Vered Peri).

The Retirement Age Law, 5763-2004

126. In January 2004, The Knesset approved the Retirement Age Law 5763-2004 (the "Retirement Age Law"), implementing more equitable norms regarding retirement age.

127. The new Law equalizes the mandatory retirement age (67) and the early retirement age (60) for both men and women. As for the retirement age which grants the right to Old Age benefit – commencing on April 1, 2004, the retirement age is gradually raised until it will eventually reach 67 for men and 62 for women.

128. Regarding women who were born in 1950 and onwards, the Law orders the Minister of Finance to appoint a public committee, comprised of Government, employees' and employers' representatives, for the examination of the retirement age for women.

The Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments)

129. On November 25, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Gender Implications of Legislation Law which imposes a duty to systematically examine the gender implications of any primary and secondary legislation before it is enacted by the Knesset. The Law's aim is to expose any hidden inequalities between men and women that might be present in various bills, in order to advance the status of equality between both genders. According to the Law, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women will submit to the relevant Knesset committee an opinion concerning the gender implications of any bill or secondary legislation, when brought for its consideration or approval. This will allow Knesset members participating in committee hearings to become acquainted with any gender implications inherent in legislation, if such implications in fact exist. In addition, the submission of these opinions will be anchored in the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law 5758-1998 (the "Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law") as one of the official functions of the Authority.

The Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Work places to Women's Needs Law

130. On April 10, 2008, the Knesset enacted The Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work force and the Adjustment of Work places to Women's Needs Law. The purpose of the new Law is to generate a change in the business culture in Israel and promote public awareness in order to encourage employers to advance and integrate women in the workplace and, inter alia, adjust the workplace to the needs of women and parents. According to the new Law, monetary incentives will be granted by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Labor (hereinafter: "ITL") to employers in the private sector who endeavor to integrate and promote women in their business, as well as employers who modify the workplace and work conditions to the needs of women and parents.

131. The new Law requires the Minister of ITL to establish a Public Council for the Integration and Advancement of Women in the Workplace, which will function as an advisor to the Minister on the issue of women in the workplace, including measures to implement the provisions of the Law. The Public Council is made up of 11 members – representatives of different Government Ministries, experts in Gender studies, representatives of women's NGOs, representatives of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status Women, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission and representatives of trade unions and employers' associations. A retired female judge will head the Public Council.

132. The Minister of ITL is required to submit an annual report on the implementation of the Law to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women and to the Knesset Committee on Labor, Welfare and Health.

133. This Law has the potential of serving as an incentive to employ more women, promote women to senior positions and to modify the work conditions to the unique needs of women, thus increasing women's economic independence.

The Collection and processing of statistics

134. A recent amendment (June 2008) to the Statistics Ordinance [New Version], 5372-1972, determines that the collection and processing of statistics relating to individuals and the publication of the results by the Central Bureau of Statistics, shall include statistics by gender, unless the National Statistician has determined, regarding a specific matter, that there are circumstances justifying deviation from the general rule. The National Statistician may determine that the collection and processing of statistics and the publication of the results shall include statistics by gender in matters that have gender related implications, even if they do not pertain to individuals. According to the Amendment, The Central Bureau of Statistics shall publish, at least once a year, results deriving from the collection and processing of statistics that include statistics by gender. The Central Bureau of Statistics shall appoint, following consultation with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, an employee who shall be responsible for the implementation of this section. The amendment will enter into force on January 1, 2009.

135. The Equal Rights for Women Law 5711-1951, (the "Equal Rights for Women Law") was also amended in 2008, to add two important sections relating to the collection and processing of information: Section 3A determines that any person or an entity requiring a person to state, in a form or other document, the names of one his/her parents should require the names of both parents (as long as the person has that knowledge). Section 6C3 determines that a public body that regularly collects and processes information regarding individuals, and publishes that information for statistical purposes, shall include in its activity reference to gender. The relevant Minister or the person in charge may determine, regarding a specific matter, that there are circumstances justifying not doing so. The person in charge may determine that the collection and processing of statistics and the publication of the results shall include statistics by gender, even if the information does not pertain to individuals on matters relating to gender. The amendment will enter into force on January 1, 2009.

The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women

136. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women has provided a detailed survey of its actions and programs entitled "Beijing +10", this survey was published in March 2005.

Amendment of the Equal Rights for Women Law

137. Prior to the abovementioned Amendment, the Equal Rights for Women Law was amended in 2005. The fourth Amendment to the Law (July 20, 2005), determined that any task force appointed by the Government for the creation of foreign and/or interior national policies (including negotiation teams working towards a peace agreement) must include an appropriate number of women. In order to effectively implement and enforce the provision, the appointing body must report on its composition to the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, which will in turn examine the details. Ultimately, such information will be compiled in an annual report concerning the adequate representation of women in national policy task forces, to be submitted to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women. Current data indicate that 37% of all representatives in governmental committees and work-teams are women.

Amendment of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law 5758-1998, (the "Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law")

138. In general, the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law requires that the victim express his/her lack of interest in order for the situation to constitute as an act of sexual harassment. Nevertheless, as detailed in Israel's previous report, a number of important exceptions were made to this rule. Under the circumstances of those exceptions, even though the victim did not show a lack of interest, a "sexual harassment presumption" is applied. These exceptions can be divided into two main categories, the first are acts that constitute serious criminal offenses regardless of the sexual harassment offense, such as indecent actions or blackmail; the second category consists of cases wherein an individual exploits a position of authority, which can occur in educational, medical and employment contexts.

139. In 2004 and 2007, the Law was amended in order to broaden the "sexual harassment presumption" to include the following victims:

139.1. A minor (under 15), where the harasser is an adult, even though the act was not committed by exploiting a position of authority.

139.2. A pupil of the 12th–14th grades where the act was committed by exploiting a position of authority in education.

139.3. A rehabilitated person, as specified under the Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed During Rehabilitation (Temporary Provision) Law 5767-2007 (the "Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities Employed During Rehabilitation Law"), while employed, and by exploiting a position of authority.

Sexual harassment in the workplace

140. According to the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, an employer who employs more than 25 employees is obligated to prescribe a code of practice detailing the principal provisions of the Law concerning sexual harassment and adverse treatment in the labor relations sphere, and the procedures prescribed by the employer for filing complaints in respect to sexual harassment or adverse treatment and for dealing with such complaints prescribed by the employer. The employer must publish the code of practice among his/her employees. The Law further obligates the employer to appoint a supervisor of sexual harassment issues. The supervisor is responsible, inter alia, for handling sexual harassment and adverse treatment complaints, and to take measures aimed at raising his/her employees' awareness of the issue.

141. During 2007, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (hereinafter: "the Authority") began collecting data on the implementation of the obligation to appoint a supervisor in local municipalities and in government companies. By the end of 2008, 900 out of 2,600 employers the Authority approached in the private sector, 172 out of 250 local municipalities and 48 out of 65 government corporations, 140 kibbutzim and all Government Ministries and agencies have appointed a supervisor.

142. Near the end of 2007, the first training course for supervisors was launched by the Authority in cooperation with the Union for Local Authorities in Israel.

143. An enforcement and awareness promotion campaign of the Authority in conjunction with the Enforcement and Regulatory Administration within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, was launched in October 2007. During the joint campaign, model codes of practice were distributed in workplaces throughout the country and data on the implementation of the provisions of the Law was collected. Inspections were performed in 163 workplaces, in which 15,000 workers are employed altogether. The inspections revealed that the majority of employers (66%) comply with the obligation to publish a code of practice.

144. Model codes of practice in various languages (Hebrew, Arabic, Russian, Amharic and English) are also easily accessible on the Authority's website.

145. In the past years, the Supreme Court demonstrated a rigorous approach towards sexual harassment in the workplace, among others it was established that the term "position of authority" is not limited only to an employer or a direct superior, but also refers to any position of influence, power or authority (C.S.A 1599/03 Tapiro v. The Civil Service Commission (16.12.03)).

146. In another decision concerning sexual harassment in the workplace, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal from the nursing deputy director in the Mental Health Centre in Beer-Sheva, who had been convicted of harassing nurses during a training course (C.S.A 11976/05 Ruchi Halil v. The Civil Service Commission (11.04.07)). The Court found that the appellant had repeatedly spoken to his subordinates in a manner that contained sexual content, which is considered to constitute sexual harassment according to the Law. The Disciplinary Court sentenced the appellant to severe reprimand, a rank reduction of one level for a period of two years, removal to a different governmental hospital and disqualification from service in the training of nurses for a period of three years.

147. In yet another case, the Supreme Court accepted the State's appeal requesting a more severe punishment for the director of the communications division in the Ministry of Defense, who was convicted of sexually harassing 3 workers from his division (C.S.A 7233/02 The State of Israel v. Shahar Levi (01.05.2003)). The Supreme Court President considered the circumstances of the case, in which the senior director had repeatedly harassed his subordinate, and had furthermore attempted to prevent her from complaining against him by abusing his authority and position of power over her and other subordinated workers, and held that he should not be employed in the civil service. The director was therefore sentenced to severe reprimand, immediate dismissal and disqualification from employment in the civil service until the age of 65.

148. In a recent case, The National Labor Court held that for relationships between colleagues based only upon random sexual relations, defense claims arguing consent or seduction by the victim will not be heard. There is an obligation to report to the superior or the head of the organization of the existence of a relationship and the fact that it is consensual, in order to avoid liability (La.A 274/06 Anonymous v. Anonymous).

The Prevention of Stalking Law 5762-2001, (the "Prevention of Stalking Law")

149. On October 16, 2001, the Knesset enacted the Prevention of Stalking Law designed to protect people from having their lives, privacy, or personal choices disrupted; and from suffering physical injury at the hands of another person who has stalked or has caused them physical harm. The Law defines stalking as "harassment of an individual by any other individual, or by making threats against an individual under circumstances that provide a reasonable basis for assuming that the stalker or person posing a threat, might continue to harm and disrupt the victim's life, privacy or choice, or could potentially cause physical harm". Stalking may include the following acts: spying, ambush, or any other activity tracking the actions of an individual or infringing upon an individual's privacy; inflicting actual harm or even the threat of it; establishing verbal, written or any other form of contact with the individual; damaging an individual's property, tarnishing an individual's reputation or limiting an individual's freedom of movement.

150. According to the Law, if the Court finds an individual guilty of stalking, it is entitled to impose a restraining order prohibiting that individual from committing any of the following acts: harassing the victim in any form or in any location, threatening the victim, spying, ambushing, tracking the movements or actions of the victim or infringing upon the victim's privacy in any other manner and establishing any verbal, written or other form of communication with the victim. If the circumstances of the stalking provide a reasonable basis to fear continued disruption or actual harm to another individual's life, the court is entitled to include in the restraining order a ban on committing the following acts: being present within a delimited distance of the victim's residence, car, workplace, school or any other location the victim regularly attends; bearing or possessing firearms, including weapons issued by the security authority or any other government authorities, all against the victim or a relative of the victim, either explicitly or implicitly, directly or indirectly.

151. In 2008, the Prevention of Domestic Violence Law 5751-1991, was amended to stipulate that a court should not reject a request for a protection order according to this Law or a request for an order for prevention of stalking according to the Prevention of Stalking Law, before giving the claimant a chance to articulate his/her claims. This amendment embodies the intergovernmental committee for prevention of domestic violence recommendation. Given that in most cases, the victim is a woman, the instruction prescribed by the Law, facilitates women in receiving their personal liberty and by doing so, assists them in better integrating in society.

Trafficking in women

152. Since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report, Israel has taken several dramatic steps in combating trafficking in persons for all purposes, as will be detailed under Article 6 below. This issue has been given great attention, and was promoted in all levels – legislative, judicial and administrative. This resulted in a sharp decline in the number of victims of trafficking for prostitution. For further detailed information regarding the prevention of trafficking in women and the treatment and assistance to trafficking victims, please refer to the Third Periodic Report of the State of Israel on the implementation of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).

Rehabilitation and treatment of women engaged in prostitution

153. In January 2007, substantial Government funds were allocated for the rehabilitation and treatment of women engaged in prostitution, and an inter-ministerial committee was established, headed by the Director of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women. The implementation of the program began in 2008, according to which emergency-apartments will be initiated to supply women engaged in prostitution with temporary shelter, the mobile clinic for the treatment of girls and women engaged in prostitution will be upgraded and expanded, a national hotline will be activated to give initial relief to their distress, a treatment shelter for mental treatment and lengthy rehabilitation will be established, day-centers for mental and vocational rehabilitation and a preventative and an educational campaign for schools and the general public will be launched. The implementation of these programs has commenced in Tel-Aviv and Haifa.

The right to work

Related international conventions binding Israel

155. Since the submission of its second periodic report, Israel submitted several updated reports under International Labor Organization Conventions, as detailed under Article 7 below.

Employment and unemployment: levels and trends

156. The Israeli economy has enjoyed a period of rapid growth over the last few years. During the years 2004 and 2005, the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) grew at an average annual rate of 5%, with 5.2% growth in 2006. This growth rate was fuelled mainly by rapidly expanding exports, which were demand induced, and was accompanied by other economic indicators such as a clear reduction in unemployment, an impressive reduction in public deficit, and a surplus in the balance of payments – in sharp contrast to the deficit that was the norm during previous decades. Actual GDP in current prices amounted to 633 billion NIS ($166 billion) in 2006, compared to 589 billion NIS ($155 billion) in 2005.

157. With the relatively low influx of new immigrants to Israel, population growth has stabilized at around 1.8% per annum, meaning that the GDP per capita increased dramatically and stood at more than 3% per annum during this period. Despite the war in Lebanon during the summer of 2006, the economy remained largely unaffected, mainly as a result of the flexibility of the work force, the hi-tech nature of exports along with the geographical location, and a strong commitment to meet global deadlines in export markets.

158. The GDP per Capita in 2006, reached 78,546 NIS ($20,140) representing a rise of 3.2% compared to 2005.

159. The rapid economic growth continued in the year 2007 at a similar pace to that of 2006 – this despite a clear slowdown in many leading world economies towards the end of the year.

160. As noted in Israel's previous periodic report, 2.1 million persons were employed in Israel in 1999. This increased to 2.6 million in 2006, an annual rise of 2.7% since 1999. Unemployment continued to decline and in 2007 stood at 7.3%, in comparison to 8.9% in 1999.

Employment trends among particular categories of workers

161. New immigrants, mainly from the former Soviet Union, continued to arrive in Israel, albeit at a slower pace than in the previous decade. Since 1999, the rate of immigration has decreased sharply and the rate of unemployment among this group dropped to a level of just 6.3% by 2007 (in comparison to 11.4% in 1999).

162. In the period between 1999 and 2006, unemployment was particularly pronounced among the 18–24 years age group, however a decrease in this category was apparent as unemployment stood at 16.6% in 1999 and lowered to 15.1% in 2007.

163. Although decline in unemployment was also evident among the Arab population, unemployment rates remain relatively high. The figures were as follows: 11.4% of Arabs were unemployed in 1999, which decreased to 10.2% in 2007. This compares to an 8.5% unemployment rate among the Jewish population in 1999, which declined to 6.8% in 2007.

Employment policies

164. The recent dramatic downward trend in unemployment is a clear reflection of the economic growth mentioned earlier. The actual unemployment rate dropped from 10.9% in the first quarter of 2004 to 7.7% in the fourth quarter of 2006. The downward trend continued in the following year, 2007, as well.

165. The increasingly globalized nature of commerce has meant that much of the expansion of Israeli exports are a testament to their relative market leadership which enables increased sales volume even in the face of intensifying world competition. The labor market reflects these changes insofar as the demand for certain professional workers, particularly in the hi-tech field, is marked.

166. As mentioned in Israel's previous report, there has been a growing awareness of the need for greater Government intervention to assist the unemployed whose chances of returning to work would be hampered without such assistance. Consequently, various Government Ministries are involved in income maintenance programs and vocational training to help the unemployed.

167. Programs to improve employment opportunities have included principally:

167.1. Streamlining of the Employment Service's activities to encourage employers to seek workers through the Employment Service and to improve the matching of job vacancies with job seekers;

167.2. Bringing long-term recipients of welfare payments back into the labor market and assisting them in becoming self-sufficient ("Lights for Employment" program);

167.3. Vocational training, retraining and on-the-job training (elaborated below).

168. The "Lights for Employment" program was instituted in August 2005, aimed towards bringing recipients of welfare payments back into the labor market, and assisting them in becoming self-sufficient. The program has been initiated as a pilot in several areas in Israel. The program is based on enabling legislation which defines the principles and aims of the program (the Economy Policy Law for the fiscal year 2004 (Legislative Amendments) 5764-2003). In July 2007, this Law was amended and the program has been extended until July 31, 2009. Four centers have been established and are operated by private enterprises (Jerusalem, Ashkelon, Hadera-Netanya, Nazareth-Ein Mahal).

Promoting employment opportunities among minority populations

Tourism

169. Since the submission of Israel's second periodic report, the Government has invested vast efforts towards developing tourism as a source of employment and income among the Arab population, as part of the general effort to promote and advance economic prosperity in the Arab population, thus reducing gaps in comparison to the Jewish population.

Accordingly, in the 2000 multi-year plan and the 2 additional multi-year plans for the development of the Arab population in the North (mentioned under Article 2 above), emphasis was given to this issue and the required budget was allocated.

170. Between the years 2000 and 2008, the Ministry of Tourism invested 21,173,000 NIS ($5,571,842) towards the development of tourism infrastructures in Arab localities. The Ministry of Tourism further provides financial assistance and professional guidance to entrepreneurs in establishing rural-accommodation units (Zimmers), as well as in other tourism-related initiatives.

Agriculture

171. The Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development invests significant efforts and resources towards the development and advancement of agriculture activity in the minority populations, thus maintaining and creating new employment opportunities. In 2007 and 2008, the Ministry allocated a budget of 20 million NIS ($5.12 million) towards agricultural development in Arab localities, in two main spheres – general infrastructure and the individual farmstead.

172. With regard to general infrastructure, the Ministry provides financial assistance (grants for 60%–100% of the cost) for reconstruction of agriculture roads in all of the Arab localities throughout the country. In addition, the Ministry provides financial assistance for the removal of pens and cowsheds located in the center of Arab villages, and relocating them in designated areas on State lands outside these villages, as well as on private lands.

173. The Ministry participates (grants for 60% of the cost) in the reconstruction and replacement of main water pipes for agricultural use in the Arab villages throughout Israel. The Ministry also assists in the preparation of programs for agriculture tourism in the Arab villages, including in the Negev.

174. The development activity concerning the individual farmstead can be divided into three major branches – livestock, vegetables crops and plantation. With regard to the livestock branch, financial assistance (60% of the cost) is provided for establishing milking facilities. Activities to promote the vegetable crops branch include financial assistance (30% of the cost) in order to facilitate building greenhouses for vegetable growing for the local market, in the framework of the program for strengthening northern Israel. Financial assistance is further provided for the creation of vegetable growing habitats in the Jewish fallow year, for local marketing. The activity concerning the plantation branch includes assistance in the establishment of packinghouses and ice houses (in the framework of the program for strengthening northern Israel), and financial support for planting olive and almond trees – which varies according to geographic location (20% in central Israel, 25%–40% in the north).

175. The aforementioned development activities are additional to the utilization of additional funding offered to the general public.

176. In addition, the Ministry decided to allocate 2 million cubic meters of water for Bedouin farmers who will receive the water according to a procedure created for this purpose.

177. In order to minimize the damage inflicted on Arab farmers due to general cutback in water for agriculture Israel, it was decided to lead a special water allocation policy to the Arab population. Accordingly, since 2006, the water quotas for Arab farmers are determined according to their actual use in the previous three years. Consequently, these farmers did not suffer from the cutbacks executed in the last years due to the water shortage.

178. The Beit Netofa Valley Project detailed in Israel's previous report has progressed since then. Agriculture associations for the farmers of Araba and Sakhnin were created, and are expected to receive ownership of the project and manage it after its completion.

The Bedouin population in the Negev (south)

179. In order to encourage employment among members belonging to minority populations in the southern Negev area, it was decided that a factory/entrepreneur in the industrial field, services or tourism, that employs at least 4 new employees from the Bedouin or the Jewish Ultra-Orthodox population in the Negev, will be entitled to reimbursement of 15%–20% of these workers' monthly wage costs for a period of 5 years. The employer will also receive reimbursement for the costs of organized transportation to and from the workplace, up to a total of 3,000 NIS ($810) per worker, annually.

180. The Ministry of ITL is aware of the inherent difficulties faced by entrepreneurs from the Bedouin population, such as limited financial capability, and is therefore taking action to bridge the gaps. The Ministry of ITL has established a designated Center for Nurturing Entrepreneurship among the Arab and Bedouin populations located in Rahat that is better equipped to serve these populations' needs. Furthermore, in order to support entrepreneurs among the Bedouin population in the Negev, the Ministry of ITL has established a unique loan fund for small enterprises.

181. Employment centers for the Bedouin population. In the framework of cooperation between the Government and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, it was decided to create unique employment centers in the Bedouin localities. These centers will assist in enhancing the number of employed persons, aid in the creation of small businesses and enterprises, and lead change in employment related perceptions and norms in the Bedouin population, including encouraging the employment of women while providing them with unique training for that purpose. Three such Centers are to be established in the upcoming year.

182. Furthermore, as mentioned under Article 2 above, the Encouragement of Capital Investments Order, was amended in order to strengthen the Arab localities, including the Bedouins communities. There are currently seventeen planned industrial areas in the Southern district, three (17%), of which are in the Bedouin towns – Rahat, Segev Shalom and Hura. Additionally, two new industrial areas currently in advanced stages of planning also service the Bedouin population – Shoket, (for Hura, Lakia, Meitar and Bney Shimon), and Lehavim, (for Rahat, Lehavim and Bney Shimon). Development of all these areas is uniform and subject to the same general criteria.

183. Special vocational training and unique programs for the Bedouin population were developed, in order to increase employment rates and increase the number of students, both male and female, enrolled in higher education courses.

184. An economic model for Bedouin women in the weaving, needlework and food fields, was formulated, where the women market their products in special fairs and abroad. The women will be prepared for the process that includes building a business organization model, creation of a unique product line and the proper means of marketing. The project will last three years, during which the women will open independent businesses. Currently, the project runs in Kseife and 20 women are participating in it.

Employment opportunities for persons with disabilities

185. With respect to employment opportunities for persons with disabilities, since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report significant legislative and judicial developments have occurred concerning the promotion of the integration of persons with disabilities into the work force and the improvement of their rehabilitation process. These developments are elaborated in Article 2 above.

186. Recent data shows a moderate improvement in the rate of employment among persons with disabilities, especially among those with severe disabilities (42% in 2005, compared to 36% in 2002).

187. According to the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, adults with disabilities of employment age (aged 20–64) constitute 17.6% of the population. The rate of employment among persons with disabilities is lower than that of the rest of the population, especially among those with severe disabilities, thus contributing to increased levels of poverty and social exclusion. Furthermore, the rate of unemployment among the disabled population is very high, especially for persons with severe disabilities.

191. In 2005, the Ministry of ITL established the Department for Integration of Persons with Disabilities in the Work force. The Department is charged with promoting the integration of persons with disabilities in the open labor market as opposed to sheltered employment, through, inter alia, the implementation of the abovementioned Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Regulations (State Participation in Financing Adjustments) Regulations and the Minimum Wage (Adjusted Wage for Employees with Disabilities Having Reduced Ability to Work) Regulations.

Employment and individual freedom: the right to work as a constitutional right

192. This issue has been extensively discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

The right to work as a statutory right

193. Among the developments in this field, several cases of statutory protection of job security were introduced. The Women's Employment Law was amended several times in 2007 and 2008, to ensure a full range of rights for working women, including different aspects of job security (further detailed below).

194. As detailed in Israel's previous report, scholars and workers' organizations have criticized the Employment of Workers by Labor Contractors Law 5756-1996, described in Israel's initial report. The National Labor Court also pointed out, on several occasions, flaws in the existing Law, especially in cases where the use of contract labor was made for long periods. As mentioned in Israel's previous report, in response to the concerns raised, the Law was radically changed in 2000, limiting the employment periods of workers through contractors, and equalizing the contract workers' rights to those provided by the user enterprise to its employers of similar occupation and seniority.

195. The amendment constituted a major reform, affecting about 6% of those salaried in Israel. Thus, a period of adjustment before its entry into force was necessary. Due to the complexity of the situation, detailed in Israel's previous report, the provision concerning the equalization of employers' rights entered into force in July 2001, whereas the provision concerning the limitation of employment periods entered into force in January 2008.

196. The Ministry of ITL invests many efforts towards the enforcement of the Law. These efforts have resulted in one or more of the following towards employers: non renewal of licenses; refusal to grant licenses; conditioning the issuance of new licenses; increased use of financial guarantee as precondition for issuing a license; confiscation of the guarantee; insertion of conditions to an existing license; licensing cancellation; reimbursement by the agency of sums due to its employees; appointment of an accountant to verify compliance by an agency of certain fiscal conditions – as a result of the verification an agency may be requested to increase the financial guarantee; penal indictment, mainly to enforce the prohibition against operating an agency without a permit.

197. On February 16, 2004, a general collective agreement was reached between the Employers' and the Employees' Organizations in the labor contracting sector. The purpose of the agreement is to protect the rights of the contract labor workers, including their employment conditions and social benefits. The agreement applies employment conditions such as working hours, yearly vacations, travel expenses, sick pay, clothing expenses, pension arrangements, contributions to mutual funds, etc. The agreement applies, through an expansion order by the Minister of ITL, to all labor contractors, even if they are not members of the Employer's Organization that signed the agreement.

198. Finally, since Israel's last report, the number of authorized agencies has significantly decreased to 223.

199. On May 28, 2008, the Tel-Aviv District Labor Court determined that the 38 petitioners who were employed in the Ministry of Education through different manpower companies are to be recognized as civil servants since the beginning of their employment in the Ministry. The petitioners worked extensive periods of time in the Ministry of Education through different manpower companies, they were accepted to work by the Ministry, and were referred to the manpower companies to arrange their wage and formal working conditions. The Court determined that the State, as a public employer, is imposed with expanded liability, since, inter alia, it serves as a model that can affect the formation of norms in employment relationships in the private sector as well. According to the Court, employees employed by the State for a long period of time in one workplace side by side with civil servants performing similar work, will benefit not only the same salary conditions but also similar job security, and equal right for promotion, including equal right to compete in internal tenders. (La.C 6141/03 Lone Hillwi et. al. v. The State of Israel – The Ministry of Education (28.05.2008)).

The right to work in Israel's case law

200. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Technical and vocational training programs: vocational guidance

201. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Vocational training for adults and youth sponsored by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor

202. The Unit for Manpower Training and Development in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (hereinafter: “the Unit”) offers courses for adults and youth in three main frameworks: training for adults in day and evening courses, training for youth and training for technicians and practical engineers.

Vocational courses for adults

203. The professional training for adults takes place in the framework of day studies, supplementary evening courses and technician and practical engineering training:

203.1 Day training: Intended for job seekers referred by the Employment Service, and focuses on populations receiving income support, especially in professions which are lacking manpower on a national level over long periods of time (e.g. metal, construction, electricity). The training is given by expert trainers from technical colleges, specialized schools and government training centers.

203.2 Over the past several years, the Unit has operated training programs for individual employers in the framework of “class in the factory” and “placement class” (see Table 6 below). The “class in the factory” program is carried out in cooperation with the employer and frequently takes place at the workplace. The program is tailor-made according to the needs and requirements of the employers. The participants are chosen according to qualifications determined by the employer.

203.3 In the placement class program, the educational institution that conducts the course, undertakes to find employment to 50% of the graduates. The training lasts between four and twelve months.

203.4 An additional training framework that takes place at the workplace is called “internal training program” and requires the employment of new workers in full time positions with minimum wage salaries.

203.5 Commercial schools – Training is carried out by schools recognized by the Ministry of ITL and are pedagogically supervised by the Unit. They teach professions for which there is a national economic demand. The program is intended for the general public and the tuition is paid in full by the students.

It should be noted that in all frameworks (day training and commercial schools), academic and practical exams are administered. Those who successfully complete the exams are granted a diploma, professional certificate or professional license.

Vocational schools for youth

204. Vocational training for youth programs are geared towards enabling youth to acquire a profession by combining both education and vocational experience. The Ministry of ITL facilitates vocational training for youth in 70 different fields.

205. In 2007, 14,200 pupils attended 71 Vocational Training Institutions supervised by the Ministry, of which 11,555 (81.4%) were boys and 2,641 (18.6%) were girls. 55.6% of the pupils were Jewish, 28.7% were Muslim, 3.7% were Druze and 3.2% were Christian.

206. The prominent fields of training in 2007 were automotive, electricity and electronics, administration and metal working.

Training of technicians and practical engineers

207. As detailed in Israel's previous report, the training of technicians and practical engineers is the function of the National Institute for Technological Training (MAHAT), within the Ministry of ITL. The program is carried out with the assistance of 80 technical colleges throughout the country. The Institute also constitutes the official framework for the provision of pedagogical services to these colleges (study programs, supervision, examinations and issuing of diplomas to successful graduates).

208. MAHAT offers special programs to assist weak populations so that they may more easily integrate into the work force. For example, the Jewish Ultra-Orthodox community (especially women), single parent families (especially women), Bedouins and new immigrants in need of professional retraining.

209. During 2007, MAHAT certified 21,197 technicians and practical engineers (in comparison to 29,715 in 2006).

Integrated programs of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor and the High-Tech industry

210. As part of the Ministry and High-Tech's integrated project detailed in Israel's previous report, a website was established to provide information to institutions interested in training technicians and practical engineers as well as to potential students interested in these fields.

Training of women

211. As detailed in Israel's previous report, with regard to female participation in the labor force, two groups — Ultra Orthodox Jewish women and Arab women — require special programs and measures, due to the religious-cultural factors affecting their potential entry into the labor market.

212. In the field of vocational training, the policy of devoting special budgets to training women continues. Some of the special programs target women in general, while others specifically target vulnerable groups of women.

213. The Department for the Advancement of Women within the Ministry of ITL endeavors to increase the employability of women and, consequently, their economic independence. Several of the Department's initiatives are as follows:

(a) Self-empowerment workshops and entrepreneurship workshops, including new immigrants, Arab women and ultra-orthodox women. These workshops also focus on work skills and additional retraining courses.

Between the years 2002 and 2007, 370 workshops were provided to some 6,500 participants. The participants report improved self-image, personal and professional empowerment and better assessment of the job market. Participants in the Entrepreneurship Workshops report a better understanding and knowledge of the various aspects of small business establishment. Participants in the workshops usually enjoy continued professional assistance. These women undertake various activities at the end of the workshops such as acquiring education, Hebrew classes, vocational training, employment or some form of voluntary activity.

(b) Programs for integrating single parents into the work force: between the years 2003 and 2005, the Ministry of ITL operated a program intended for single parents receiving allowances or alimony from the National Insurance Institute, in order to integrate them into the work force. The program was launched as a pilot and then incorporated into the regular long term program of the Ministry. The program provides assistance in financing child care by subsidizing payments for afternoon programs and day-care centers. Financial assistance is also provided for babysitting during non-conventional hours and during summer vacation. The program also addresses professional training aspects, through a voucher system to courses recognized by the Manpower Training and Development Unit.

In August 2008, the Unit began to offer professional consultants to help identify appropriate training courses and job placement services according to the individual needs and qualifications of the participants in the program. During 2008, an additional program will be launched to encourage single parents to participate in the program to encourage the development of entrepreneurship skills, and thus, the ability to establish small businesses.

An additional pilot program established by the Ministry of ITL was launched on September 1, 2008. As part of the new program, training centers for single parents, receiving allowances or alimony, will be established. Through courses operated in these centers, the participants will acquire skills to enable them to enter or re-enter the job market. Following a two month course, the participants will be directed to specific training courses or jobs to suit their individual qualifications.

(c) Courses for entrepreneurship and small business: courses for women with entrepreneurial spirit and/or plans, but without access to training because of economic, geographical or cultural obstacles. The training enhances their chances of establishing a viable business and improving their economic status. The courses are provided by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor and the Israel Small and Medium Enterprises Authority, through Centers for the Promotion of Entrepreneurship (CPEs). Currently, 24 CPEs are located throughout the country. In addition to training, these centers also provide assistance and counseling in the process towards the establishment of a small business.

214. Vocational training for Arab women. Over the course of the past few years, there has been an increase in the rates of employment among Arab women, yet these rates remain relatively low. Academic education and vocational training are the key components for the integration of Arab women into the work force, yet various barriers are inhibiting their integration into these educational and training systems: Education – traditional professions are substituted with professions that require specific know-how; the study of many technological professions requires knowledge in mathematics and English. Social/Cultural Barriers – The traditional stands and cultural stigmas among the Arab population define the acceptable limits to traveling alone to school and work. Arab women are often reluctant to attend courses that require traveling to other towns. Not all vocational courses are available in the women's residential towns, often because of lack of proper framework, candidates, and future job opportunities.

215. Due to the above, many Arab women attend "traditional" courses that are local, and are likely to enable them to meet the requirements of local job opportunities, whether full or part time. This is not the case with regard to education, computers, graphics or technical assistants/engineering. Additionally, the employment opportunities in these fields, in some of the residential towns, are very limited.

216. In that regard, during 2006, an education program was implemented for the coordinators of the Project for the Advancement of the Bedouin population in the North, dealing with the issue of social/cultural barriers, motivation, recruitment of candidates and persistency through vocational training. Also, in order to rectify the current situation, joint efforts are made by the Ministry of ITL, local authorities, social services, vocational training institutes and employers in order to provide vocational training, and to create more feasible job offers for Arab women.

217. In addition to the general training system provided by the Ministry of ITL, there are special programs for Arab women, aimed at bridging the gaps and increasing women's participation in training courses.

218. Day-care centers – Arab and Bedouin localities. Arab women are considered the primary caretakers for children; this is one of the factors that explain the low percentage of women participating in the work force. The Government, through the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, has invested great efforts in enhancing the awareness among women of their own career options and self-fulfillment. Recent years' growing participation of Arab, including Bedouin, women in the work force created a need for day-care centers and nurseries. The Government has moved to meet these needs.

219. As a matter of Policy, the Ministry of Construction and Housing works on the construction of day-care centers throughout the country on the basis of one daycare for every 1,600 housing units. Two centers have been built, in the Bedouin town of Rahat. Fourteen additional centers are under construction: nine in the Northern area, four in the Central area and one in Jerusalem.

220. The system includes 2,200 nurseries (ages 0–3), among them, 900 are in the Arab localities, providing a solution for 1,500 children of working mothers and 3,000 children to mothers on social welfare. In addition, day-care centers operating in the Arab municipalities provide a solution for another 1,000 children. Such nurseries and day-care centers allow mothers to work, as well as provide a source of income for the women operating them.

221. In 2007, the Government allocated funding for the establishment of 150 buildings designated for day-care centers, 17 of which in Arab municipalities.

Employment opportunities among particular categories of workers: prohibition of discrimination

222. In July 2004, the Enforcement and Regulatory Administration was established in the Ministry of ITL (hereinafter: "the Administration"). The Administration is responsible for enforcing and regulating 17 labor laws protecting workers in Israel, including the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. The data below therefore relates to the period between 2004 and 2007.

223. In 2004, 460 investigations were initiated and 120 administrative fines were imposed. In 2005, 146 investigations were initiated and 44 administrative fines were imposed. In 2006, 187 investigations were initiated and 59 administrative fines were imposed. In 2007, 84 investigations were initiated and one administrative fine was imposed.

The data indicates that in 2007, 31.9% of employed Israeli Jews worked in academic, professional and technical occupations, 38.4 % were clerical and sales personnel, while nearly 16 % were skilled workers in agriculture, manufacturing, construction and other industries. Unskilled workers comprised 6.4%.

226. Among the Israeli Arab population, 19.2% worked in academic, professional and technical occupations, 23.7% were clerical and sales personnel, and nearly 42 % were skilled workers in agriculture, manufacturing, construction and other industries. Unskilled workers comprised 13%.

Foreign workers

227. Israel is a destination country for migrant workers from Asia, Eastern Europe and Africa. The main countries of origin of foreign workers in Israel are: China, the Philippines and Thailand. In 2007, the Minister of ITL issued 92,344 permits for employment of foreign workers in various permitted fields (Nursing care – 51,744; Agriculture – 28,500; Construction – 12,000; Industry – 1,100; Restaurants – 900).

228. Migrant workers coming to Israel in search of employment are motivated mostly by harsh economic conditions and low wages in their countries of origin. By coming to Israel they hope to earn high wages and guarantee a solid financial future for themselves upon return to their home countries. Some enter Israel by illegally crossing the southern border of Israel or illegally at its airports, using either a forged tourist visa or a false Jewish identity. The vulnerability of these persons exposes them to the risk of being exploited for easy financial gain. This vulnerability may be heightened by requirements to pay high middleman fees in their countries of origin.

229. Currently employers may be prosecuted for violations of the labor laws in Israel, including the Foreign Workers Law 5751-1991 (the “Foreign Workers Law”), which, as mentioned in Israel’s previous report, was revised in 2000 to ensure the protection of foreign workers’ rights.

230. The Employment Service Law (Amendment no. 14) 5764-2004 – criminalizes the collection of illegal excessive recruitment fees from foreign workers, and makes this crime punishable by up to 6 months imprisonment and/or attended by a fine of up to 200,000 NIS ($55,054). The Amendment also applies a temporary order (in force until June 2009) amending the Prohibition on Money Laundering Law, 5760-2000, making the collection of exorbitant fees an origin offence.

231. The Employment Service (Recruitment Fees) Regulations 5766-2006 – cap the permitted recruitment fees of Israeli recruitment agencies at 3,135 NIS, (approximately $825) or 88% of the monthly minimum wage, minus any sum already paid by the worker to a foreign recruitment agency. The agency may, however, be legitimately reimbursed from the foreign worker for the cost of airfare from the source country to Israel. The Regulations also state the terms under which it is permitted to collect the fee, for example, a detailed contract must have effect between the agency and the worker. Additionally, the Regulations outline the circumstances under which a recruitment agency shall reimburse payments collected from a foreign worker.

232. The Employment Service (Provision of Information) Regulations 5766-2006, (the “Employment Service (Provision of Information) Regulations”) – these regulations require a recruitment agency to provide foreign workers with all relevant information relating to their rights and obligations as foreign workers in Israel, for example, information as to the permitted recruitment fees, etc.

233. Investigations and fines statistics:

233.1 The number of fines imposed upon employers of foreign workers for breach of the Foreign Workers Law by the Enforcement Division of the by the Foreign Workers Department: 2002 – 1,847; 2003 – 1,816; 2004 – 7,996; 2005 – 8,356; 2006 – 8,111; 2007 – 3,565.

233.2 The amount of fines imposed by the Enforcement Division of the Foreign Workers Department: 2002 – 865,300 NIS ($233,864); 2003 – 34,191,000 NIS ($9,240,810); 2004 – 118,625,500 NIS ($32,060,945); 2005 – 131,592,000 NIS ($35,565,405); 2006 – 169,830,900 NIS ($45,900,243); 2007 – 64,358,000 NIS ($17,394,054).

233.3 Number of investigations opened against employers of foreign workers: 2002 – 4,073; 2003 – 8,496; 2004 – 9,834; 2005 – 4,170; 2006 – 3,743; 2007 – 3,111.

234. The following is an example of one 2008 decision regarding the severity with which the courts and the authorities regard breaches of the Foreign Workers Law concerning foreign worker’s rights. On July 17, 2008, the National Labor Court accepted the State appeal, regarding the leniency of the punishment imposed on the defendants. The defendants were convicted of employing a foreign worker without a lawful license, without arranging medical insurance for him, without providing him with a contract in a language he understood and without stipulating the details of his salary, and the deductions from it. The worker, after working for only a month, was hurt in a work related accident (which was later defined as a traffic accident since it involved a fork-lift). The worker was taken by ambulance to a hospital, but was admitted anonymously since the employing company denied knowing his details and denied his relationship with the company. The District Labor Court imposed a lenient fine of 50,000 NIS ($13,157) on the company and 15,000 NIS ($3,947) on its manager, since it determined that the employment was only for a short period of time, and did not involve personal gain for the defendants, as well as lack of prior convictions.

235. The State appealed the leniency of the fine, which constituted only 15% of the maximum penalty stipulated in the Foreign Workers Law, claiming it does not reflect the severity of the offences, as the defendants evaded their responsibilities as employers, and deserted the worker without financial backup or support in a time of distress and uncertainty that amounted to risk on his health. The National Labor Court accepted the appeal and imposed a 150,000 NIS ($39,473) fine on the company as well as a 45,000 NIS ($11,842) fine on its manager (Cr. A 27/07 The State of Israel v. Thesa Import and Export of Wood Inc. at el. (21.5.08)).

236. Revocation of permits to employ foreign workers. In 2007, in the field of nursing care, 20 employers had their permits revoked and an additional 21 employers had their permits limited or made conditional. In the agriculture field, 14 employers had all/part of their permits revoked and 4 employers had their permits limited or conditioned. In the restaurant field, the permit of one employer was revoked and later restored under warning following a process of repairing the faults found. In the industry field, 2 employers had all/part of their permits revoked and 3 employers had their permits limited. In the construction field, one manpower agency employing foreign workers had its permit revoked and a portion of the monies secured by a bond which the agency had posted with the Ministry, were transferred to company's workers who had not received their salaries.

237. Actions against Recruitment Agencies. During 2007, approximately 50 licensed recruitment agencies with special permits to recruit foreign workers were inspected and investigated by the Ministry of ITL.

- In 42 cases, both the licenses and permits of the agencies were revoked
- In 4 cases, the permits given to the agencies to recruit foreign workers were revoked for a set period
- In 4 cases the permits given to the agencies to recruit foreign workers were revoked indefinitely and one permit was granted on probation

The revocations were based on the following grounds: unlawful collection of fees from foreign workers, recruitment of workers done in collaboration with a non-licensed agency, false social worker reports, unlawful transfer of foreign workers and bringing a foreign worker to Israel contrary to the terms of the permit.

Seven agencies appealed their license/permit revocations to the District Labor Court; their appeals were denied.

238. Dissemination of information regarding rights among foreign workers. A special workers' rights brochure ("Zchuton") regarding the rights of foreign workers in the construction field, was issued by the Ministry of ITL in English, Russian, Romanian, Turkish, Thai and Chinese. The "Zchuton" instructs the workers to contact the Ombudswoman (detailed below) in any case of breach of the rights discussed therein.

239. The Licensed Manpower Companies employing foreign workers in the construction field are obligated to distribute the special "Zchuton" for the construction branch to each foreign worker they employ, and the directors of the companies must provide the Foreign Workers Department in the Ministry of ITL with an affidavit stating that they take personal responsibility for the distribution of this "Zchuton" to each worker.

240. Furthermore, as discussed above, the Employment Service (Provisions of Information) Regulations require recruitment agencies to provide foreign workers with all the information relating to their rights and obligations as foreign workers in Israel (e.g. permitted fees' rates, etc.).

241. In addition, a brochure discussing the general labor rights of foreign workers in Israel is published on the website of the Ministry of ITL in English, Hebrew, Chinese, Thai, Russian, Romanian and Turkish. This brochure is also distributed by the Ministry of the Interior to each foreign worker who arrives at the Ben Gurion Airport.

242. An additional method of disseminating information has been implemented by the Israeli Embassy in Thailand. In cooperation with the Ministry of ITL and the Thai Labor Ministry, a brochure has been launched discussing the rights of foreign workers in Israel. The booklet, in Thai, gives information about the labor and social security rights of workers and includes other information, such as relevant phone numbers, medical treatment facilities and basic Hebrew. The booklet is attached to the passport of each worker that receives a visa.

243. Medical insurance. The Foreign Workers Law requires employers to arrange broad medical insurance for employees who are foreign workers. Employers who violate this obligation may face criminal prosecution.

244. An Ombudsman for the complaints of foreign workers was appointed in the Ministry of ITL. Her mandate is to safeguard the rights of foreign workers employed in Israel, and to handle complaints from foreign workers, employers, citizens, NGOs, associations and the media. The Ombudsman has the authority to recommend that a criminal investigation be carried out by the Enforcement Division, as well as to initiate administrative proceedings. The Ombudsman serves a central coordinating function in reviewing complaints and deciding if they are violations of regulatory laws or crimes of slavery, forced labor or trafficking. She then refers them to the proper authority (the Ministry of ITL if a regulatory violation is involved and the Police if a crime of trafficking, slavery or forced labor is involved).

245. Bilateral agreements. Government Resolution no. 2211 dated August 12, 2007 directed the Minister of ITL and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to promote bilateral agreements with foreign workers' countries of origin, and to consider including in such agreements directives concerning International Organization of Migration (IOM) supervision of the recruitment process to eliminate illegal recruitment practices. Subsequent to this Resolution, an inter-ministerial committee was formed. The committee consolidated a draft agreement that was sent to IOM for review and subsequently sent to the Thai Government for comments. The Government intends to propose the agreement to the major foreign workers' countries of origin in the future.

Trafficking in persons

246. On October 29, 2006, the Anti Trafficking Law 5766-2006, came into force. The Law promulgates a broad trafficking crime for a number of illegal purposes: prostitution, sexual crimes, slavery or forced labor, removal of organs, pornography and using the body of a person to give birth to a baby who is then taken from her. The crime is addressed with a punishment of 16 years of imprisonment, and 20 years of imprisonment if the offence is committed against a minor. The Law includes a full panoply of crimes in order to address gradations of exploitation: slavery – 16 years of incarceration; trafficking for the purpose of slavery or forced labor – 16 years of incarceration; forced labor – 7 years of incarceration; exploitation of vulnerable populations – 3 years of incarceration. For the first time, Israel has a slavery offense, a broad forced labor offence with heightened sentencing and heightened punishment for exploitation of vulnerable populations. The new legislation reflects an approach that requires the integration of a series of tools and actors to combat trafficking in persons. It also places emphasis on the prohibition of all forms of slavery and forced labor.

247. With regard to trafficking for the purpose of slavery or forced labor, the following crimes have been established: trafficking in human beings for the purpose of slavery or forced labor (section 377A (a) of the Penal Law), holding a person under conditions of slavery (section 375A of the Penal Law), forced labor (section 376 of the Penal Law), and exploitation of vulnerable populations (section 431 of the Penal Law). In addition, the abduction offence has been broadened to include two new offences: (1) abduction for the purpose of slavery or forced labor and conveying a person beyond the boundaries of a State (sections 374A and 370 of the Penal Law) and (2) causing a person to leave a State for the purposes of prostitution or slavery (section 376A of the Penal Law).

248. These criminal offences exist alongside various regulatory offences intended to protect foreign workers, for example, the Foreign Workers Law and the Employment Service Law 5719-1959 (“Employment Service Law”). However, their inclusion in the Penal Law accords them a higher level of criminality and better expresses society’s moral condemnation.

Remuneration

Methods for fixing wages

250. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Minimum wages

251. The number of work hours per week at regular pay is 43 hours, according to the Minimum Wage law 5747-1987, (the “Minimum Wage Law”). The minimum wage is updated every year on April 1, and constituted 47.5% of the average wage. On June 19, 2006, the Knesset approved the Minimum Wage Law (Raising Minimum Wage) (Temporary Order) 5768-2006, aimed towards gradually raising the minimum wage. The Temporary Order set a minimum wage which constitutes more than 47.5% of the average wage. According to the Temporary Order, in the period between June 1, 2006, and March 31, 2007, the monthly minimum wage was 3,585 NIS ($943); between April 1, 2007, and June 30, 2008, the monthly minimum wage was 3,710 NIS ($976), and as of July 1, 2008, the monthly minimum wage is 3,850 NIS ($1,013). The Temporary order will remain in force until the sum of 3,850 NIS ($1,013) will constitute less than 47.5% of the average wage. The sum is to be reviewed in April 2009.

Enforcement of the Minimum Wage Law

252. Several amendments have been made to the Minimum Wage Law since Israel’s previous periodic report. In 2002, the Law was amended so that criminal and civil liability may be imposed with regard to the Law, in situations involving a manpower contractor, an employer and an employee. The Law stipulates specific circumstances, where criminal and/or civil liability may be imposed directly on the actual employer and/or the manpower contractor. In addition, the amendment obligates the employer to post a notice concerning the rights of the workers in accordance with the Minimum Wage Law.

253. In an amendment from 2006, the definition of “monthly minimum wage” was amended in order to increase the level of minimum wage, as detailed above.

254. The Enforcement and Regulatory Administration was established in July 2004, within the Ministry of ITL in order to efficiently implement the provisions of the Law. Prior to the establishment of the Administration, four separate departments in the Ministry of ITL were responsible for the enforcement of various social-labor laws. The new Administration centralized the enforcement and licensing authorities in the field, except for the laws concerning foreign workers, which are handled by the Foreign Workers Department. Enforcement inspectors have been trained to enforce the full range of labor laws.

255. Enforcement measures are carried out through the following activities:

- (1) Investigating complaints submitted to the Administration.
- (2) Self-initiated supervision by conducting on-site inspections at workplaces throughout the country.
- (3) Raising awareness among populations in need of protection by the Administration, as well as among employers.

256. Employers who infringe upon the Law may be fined or subject to a prison sentence. In addition, employees may sue the employer for compensation for the gap between the actual wages paid and the statutory wages.

257. Enforcement covers all workers: adults, teenage workers, Palestinian workers, foreign workers and workers hired by manpower contractors. The following are data concerning the enforcement of the Minimum Wage Law.

258. According to information from the Ministry of ITL, 767 investigations were initiated in 2004 and 291 administrative fines were imposed. In 2005, 243 investigations were initiated and 213 administrative fines were imposed; in 2006, 395 investigations were initiated and 99 administrative fines were imposed, and in 2007, 357 investigations were initiated and 60 administrative fines were imposed.

259. On February 4, 2007, the Government consolidated Resolution no. 1134 aimed towards reducing socio-economic gaps in the Israeli society and increasing participation in the work force. Among the measures determined in the Resolution is improving the enforcement capabilities of the Enforcement and Regulatory Administration, through:

259.1 Substantial enlargement of the Administration personnel.

259.2 Improving the technological (computerized) capabilities and increasing the budget allocated for inspection through outsourcing.

259.3 Establishing a mechanism, in coordination with the labor organizations, to facilitate quick and efficient handling of complaints filed against employers.

259.4 Increasing awareness amongst employers and the public as to the provisions of the Law.

260. Recently, the District Court of Tel-Aviv, while residing as an Administrative Court, reaffirmed the importance of protecting workers' rights, as it annulled a tender issued by the Municipality of Bat-Yam due to a concern that the winning company cannot uphold its obligations regarding the workers' rights. The Court held that "accepting an offer that does not enable the protection of the minimal rights of the workers, constitutes a deviation from the reasonability sphere, as a situation where a public authority contributes to unlawful proceedings cannot be accepted." The Court further held that: "The issue at hand is a tender to provide cleaning services, where the main component is the wage of the employees. Experience shows, that these workers, in any case, receive minimum wages, and there is no room for additional erosion of their rights; and in a detriment cost offer, it is more likely that the workers will carry the burden of the "cost" of deficit and not their employer, as there is a presumption that it does not intend to provide services without profit, and it has the power to inflict the detriment results of the tender upon the workers shoulders." (Ad.P 1464/07 Perah Hashaked Inc. v. The Municipality of Bat-Yam et. al. (14.4.2008)).

261. In another recent ruling, the District Labor Court determined that failure to pay workers the minimum wage they are entitled to, on time as stipulated by law, constituted a criminal offence committed by the employer. Here, the employer failed to pay his employees their wages, and gave them several small sums of money as pocket money instead. The employer claimed that he did fulfil the requirement to pay minimum wage, only in delay, therefore a criminal offence under the Minimum Wage Law was not consolidated. The employer also claimed that the Minimum Wage Law did not determine the time of payment. The Court emphasized that the determination of minimum wage is a fundamental basis for all policy aimed at fighting poverty and fulfilling the needs of the workers and their families. The basic purpose of the determination of minimum wage is to ensure hired employees the social protection needed. According to the Court, the purpose of the Law and the legislator intention are detailed in the law's explanatory notes, according to which: [...] the uniqueness of the Israeli society from the beginning of its formation is the assurance of decent living for all. The society engraved on its flag, after difficult struggles, to ensure the right of a working person to earn a living from his/her job, and to live respectably out of it, as a proud working person and not as a person supported by welfare". This principle is also stipulated by the legislator in section 14 to the Minimum Wage Law according to which lack of paying minimum wage to the employee constitutes a criminal offence (Cr. R (Tel-Aviv) 420/06 The State of Israel – The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor v. Segal Enterprise (1996) Inc. (26.6.08)).

Enforcement of labor law in Arab localities

262. In 2005, the annual working program for the Enforcement and Regulatory Administration included three special focus points: employers and employees from the Arab population; employers of new immigrants; businesses in the security field.

263. A major obstacle to the enforcement of labor laws in Arab places of employment is the unwillingness of the local population to cooperate with the Ministry, mostly due to fear of losing their source of income.

264. In December 2004, the Administration initiated a wide-scale awareness pilot campaign on labor law. This pilot program was carried out in the Arab city of Shfara'm, with a population of 30,000 Muslims and Christians. The Administration coordinated gatherings and meetings with employers and employees, as well as 1,300 high school students in Shfara'm, and also visited 50 places of employment. During these meetings, the Administration learned of the public's awareness of their rights in the labor law, educated them on these rights, and circulated written materials in Arabic.

265. In the course of these meetings the Administration took note of several problematic employers and gave them due notice. In May, 2005, the Administration conducted inspections of 25 places of employment in order to examine the situation there. The Administration received very little, if any, cooperation from the local population, especially from female employees. In addition to their fear of losing their jobs, many of these women are connected through family ties with their employers, and therefore are even more reluctant to complain.

266. During 2008, the Administration performed similar projects in the Arab cities of Yarka and Joulis. Furthermore, 15 Arab youths, both male and female, have recently begun performing national civil service in the framework of the Administration. During their national civil service, these young persons carry out awareness raising activities concerning labor laws among the Arab population throughout the country.

267. The Administration prepared pamphlets on the Minimum Wage Law and the Youth Employment Law 5713-1953, (the “Youth Employment Law”) and translated them into Arabic. Thousands of these pamphlets were circulated throughout the Arab population. Moreover, an enforcement campaign focusing on the Youth Employment Law was carried out in Nazareth.

268. In April 2005, The Haifa District Labor Court ordered a marketing firm and its director to pay 150,000 NIS ($40,500) in compensation to a female employee due to violation of the Minimum Wage Law. M.I.R.A. Panorama, located in the Druze village of Usfiya, paid their female employees approximately half the hourly minimum wage. The Court emphasized the gravity of any violation of the Minimum Wage Law as well as the importance of the deterrence of any such violations, and concluded its verdict by stating that violations of the Minimum Wage Law constitute a grievance to the workers dignity as a person. (C. 88/03 The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor v. M.I.R.A. Panorama, (3.4.05)).

Equal pay for work of equal value

269. Gaps remain between male and female salaries. According to recent data (2006), on average men earned a 57% higher income than women.

270. One explanation for this gap is shorter working hours (or lower availability for work) of women. In 2006, employed men worked an average of 46 hours a week, compared to employed women, who worked 35 hours a week – a 31% difference. However, in 2006, women’s average income per hour was 37.1 NIS ($10.02) and men’s – 44.8 NIS ($12.1), a 21% gap, indicating that the difference cannot be solely attributed to the number of working hours.

271. In 2006, women’s average hourly wages were 80.5% of the men’s. By occupation, their hourly wages are highest, relative to men, in the category “other professional and technicians” (86.5 %). Women earn the least, relative to men, among skilled industrial and construction workers (92.3%).

272. Arab women employees earned 8% more per hour, than Arab men. In terms of gross monthly salary, Arab men's salaries were 35% higher than the Arab women's salaries. The difference in the monthly salary is due to the gap in men's working hours compared to the women's – a difference of an average of 15 monthly hours.

273. Thirty-five per cent of employed Arab women are employed in academic, independent and technical professions, 27% in clerical work and up to 25% in sales and agencies as compared to Arab men – 27% employed in academic, independent and technical professions and 35% as professionals and non professionals.

274. A recent report by the Wage and Labor Accord Unit in the Ministry of Finance, regarding salary expenses in the Civil Service, reveals a trend of reducing wage differences between male and female Civil Service employees.

275. The salaries of men and women in the Civil Service in various grades were compared through an analysis of two periods: November 2006 in comparison to May 2002, and November 2006 in comparison to May 1997. It should be noted that November and May are months in which special salary additions (one-time) are not paid. The salary data examined were: number of positions, average pensionable salary, average overtime work, average expense reimbursement and average gross salary.

276. The most significant phenomena that took place in these periods were the relative growth in the number of women employed in the Civil Service in comparison to the number of men, and the significant reduction in the expense reimbursement gap between women and men, a trend that also continued in 2007.

277. In comparison to 1997, the data indicates that the gap between men and women employees with regard to overtime has risen by 3%. In the remaining three elements, gaps were reduced: at a rate of 2% for pensionable salary, at a rate of 15% for expense reimbursement and at rate of 3% in gross salary.

278. Regarding employees in management positions, the data reveals that over a period of nine years, the ratio of men's positions to women's positions was significantly reduced, meaning that more women are employed in the management ranking. In all indexes of salary, other than in overtime, a reduction occurred in the gaps. Only with regard to overtime work, the gap increased at a rate of 5%. The considerable reduction in the expense reimbursement section (15%) should be noted.

279. It should be noted that a significant part of the existing gap derives from placement in the various grades. Evidently, the employee's position and grade have a significant influence on his/her salary. Since most female employees in the Civil Service hold administrative positions and are thus occupying lower grades than male employees, their salaries are lower.

280. As in other aspects of protecting equality, the judicial branch in Israel takes an active part. In October 2002, the High Court of Justice delivered its ruling in the petition concerning case of Eytana Niv, detailed in Israel's previous report. The ruling dealt with early-retirement arrangements for the Fund's employees, which provided preferable benefits to male employees up to the age of 65, whilst granting female employees these benefits only up to the age of 60. The Court defined discrimination as “an unequal and unjust treatment given to equal persons”. The Court thus stipulated that the Fund must provide women with the same rights as men within the retirement arrangements, and that the Fund discriminated against the petitioners. The Court also stated that equality is a fundamental value in the Israeli legal system and that gender-based discrimination is one of the gravest forms of discrimination. The State of Israel, throughout the years, anchored equality between the genders and only exceptional considerations would justify overpowering it. Discriminating against women is clearly contrary to public order and essentially null. Subsequently, the Court ordered the removal of the discriminating provisions of the early-retirement arrangements (H.C.J 6845/00 Eitana Niv et. al. v. The Klalit Health Fund (9.10.02)).

281. On July 26, 2007, while rejecting an appeal by a former female employee who claimed she was discriminated against in salary and retirement benefits, the National Labor Court emphasized that the prohibition of discrimination derives from the principle of equality and is anchored in the Equal Pay for Male and Female Employees Law, 5724-1964, (the “Equal Pay for Male and Female Employees Law”) and the Equal Employment Opportunities Law.

Here, a former female employee in the Knesset claimed that she was discriminated against in salary and retirement benefits in comparison to her male counterparts. The Court found that the appellant failed to prove that she experienced discrimination in comparison to her male colleagues, neither on the basis of the Equal Pay for Male and Female Employees Law nor on the basis of Equal Employment Opportunities Law, since she did not prove any linkage between the claimed discrimination and her being a woman. (La.A. 222/06 Shoshana Kerem v. The State of Israel).

282. On November 20, 2007, the State Labor Court ruled that “freedom of contract” does not justify discrimination such as that evidenced by paying different salaries to men and women performing the same tasks. The court stated that in these circumstances, the principle of equality prevails over freedom of contract (L.A 1156/04 Orit Goren v. Home Center (Do It Yourself) Ltd.). Here, the plaintiff resigned after 4 months of work, after her employer denied her claim that she was being discriminated against in salary. She had compared her salary to that of a male worker who received 1,500 NIS ($405.4) a month more than she did, although they both performed the same duties. In response, the respondent claimed that the difference in salary was the end result of negotiations held with all workers before they were hired to work, and during which the plaintiff had demanded less money than the other worker. The Lower Court ruled that there was no justification for the difference in salaries paid to the plaintiff and her colleague, and stated that the plaintiff was being discriminated against based solely on her gender.

The National Labor Court rejected the position that “freedom of contract” justified discrimination between salaries, and unanimously approved the Lower Court’s decision, granting 7,000 NIS ($1,891.9) in compensation to the plaintiff for her 4 months of work, based on the Equal Pay for Male and Female Employees Law. However, the majority opinion ruled that as the difference in salary was the result of negotiations made prior to employment, the plaintiff had not been discriminated against based on the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, and therefore had no right to compensation for non-pecuniary damage in contrast to the lower court’s ruling. Nevertheless, the dissenting opinion of the National Labor Court’s President, argued that there was no difference in the level of proof required for granting compensation for violations of both laws, and accepted the lower court’s ruling, granting additional compensation to the plaintiff based on the Equal Employment Opportunities Law.

283. In November 2003, the Labor Court in Be'er Sheva ruled in favor of a female employee who received a lower salary than her male counterparts (La. 1576/99 Simmy Niddam v. Rally Electricity and Electronics Ltd. (03.11.03)). The Court granted the plaintiff all social benefits along with compensation for grief caused to her in the sum of 30,000 NIS (approximately $8,100).

Occupational health and safety

285. There are currently 62 labor inspectors and 15 assistants in the Inspection Service of the Ministry of ITL (hereinafter: "the Service"). In 2006, the Service conducted 27,477 inspections of workplaces, 6,014 of which were at construction sites. The inspectors carried out 634 investigations of work accidents and occupational diseases; imposed 1,494 safety and health violation orders (requiring immediate action); and imposed 778 safety and health improvement orders.

286. The Industrial Hygiene Laboratory performed 2,473 occupational-monitoring. In addition, the laboratory examined 2,469 monitoring reports conducted by private laboratories.

287. As indicated in Israel's previous report, the results of the law enforcement activities have been constantly improving as can also be seen from the following updated data on work injuries, fatalities and injury compensation. The trend portrayed in Israel's previous report continues as a reduction in the number of work injuries and in fatalities is evident, in spite of an increase in the number of workers.

Promotion of equal opportunities

288. In accordance with an amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law dated January 3, 2006, an Equal Employment Opportunities Commission was established, within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor.

289. The Commission is charged with the promotion, implementation and civil enforcement of all legislation relating to equal opportunities in employment, with the exception of legislation relating to persons with disabilities, which is the responsibility of the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities. As such, the mandate of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission includes the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, Equal Pay for Male and Female Employees Law, the Women's Employment Law, the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law (in relation to employment), the Hours of Work and Rest Law 5711-1951 (hereinafter: the "Hours of Work and Rest Law), the Discharged Soldiers (Job Reinstatement) Law, 5709-1949, the Equal Rights for Women Law, the Employment Service Law, Protection of Employees (Exposure to Offences of Unethical Conduct and Improper Administration) Law 5757-1997, and legislation concerning adequate representation of women, people with disabilities, Israeli Arabs and persons of Ethiopian origin in the public sector.

290. The Commission is charged, inter alia, with a wide range of duties, including fostering public awareness by way of education, training and public relations; promoting programs and activities; co-operating with other entities including employees and employers; conducting research and collecting information; making interventions, by leave of the court, in legal proceedings; dealing with complaints relating to violation of the constituent legislation, including by way of filing a civil action in the courts; applying to the court for general orders instructing employers to take general measures regarding all or part of their work force or employment applicants.

291. The Equal Employment Opportunities Commission commenced operation at the beginning of 2008, following the Government's decision in November 2007, to appoint Adv. Tziona Koenig-Yair as the First National Commissioner. In addition three regional commissioners are in the process of being appointed.

292. More recently, the advisory committee to the Commission has been appointed. Under the amendment to the Law, the 21-member committee comprises of representatives of the Authority for the Promotion of Women's Status, the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Government Ministries, NGOs, trade unions and employers' associations. Appropriate representation being given, insofar as is possible, to women, Israeli Arabs and persons with disabilities.

293. Since her appointment, the National Commissioner manned 3 additional positions, published a pamphlet dealing with employment rights which was distributed to 300,000 employers and employees, and is now being translated into Arabic.

294. Since September 2008, the services provided by the Commission include the handling of 150 specific applications, 3 law suits currently being prepared and many preliminary measures taken regarding discrimination by employers.

295. At the end of each year the Commissioner is required to submit an annual report to the Minister of ITL, who shall forward the report with his/her comments to the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women, and to the Knesset Committee for Labor, Welfare and Health.

Rest and leisure

296. The following data concerns the enforcement of the Hours of Work and Rest Law by The Enforcement and Regulatory Administration of the Ministry of ITL, since Israel's last report: in 2005 – 523 investigations were initiated and 99 administrative fines were imposed. In 2006 – 641 investigations were initiated and 182 administrative fines were imposed. In 2007 – 685 investigations were initiated and 309 administrative fines were imposed. Between the years of 2006–2008, 170 criminal indictments were filed.

297. Since submission of Israel's previous periodic report, the following Reports were submitted: Israel's Third Periodic Report on the implementation of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, submitted in July 2008; Israel's Fourth Periodic Report on the implementation of International Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, submitted in June 2005; Israel's 10th–13th Combined Periodic Report on the International Convention on Elimination of all forms of Racial Discrimination, submitted in September 2005.

Forming trade unions and joining them

298. A recent decision by the District Labor Court, has further broadened the legal protection of the right to organize in trade unions under Israeli jurisprudence (C.M. 6726/07 Alon Leigh Green v. Excellent Coffee Ltd. (18.7. 2007)).

Here, the petitioner requested the Court to revoke his dismissal by the respondent, which he claimed was wrongful and the result of his unionizing activity. According to the petitioner, prior to his unionizing activity, the respondent considered him to be a good employee and even promoted him to shift manager. The respondent argued that it was not the petitioner's desire to execute his right to form a union that led to his dismissal, but rather the deterioration in his performance as a shift manager.

The Court addressed Section 33J(a) of the Collective Agreements Law 5717-1957, which states, inter alia, that an employer shall not dismiss an employee, worsen an employee's work conditions, or prevent a person from being hired due to membership or activity in an employees union or committee, or due to efforts to establish an employees union or committee. The rationale portrayed in the Law, in accord with similar principles derived from case law in the Labor Courts, is that discriminating against an employee on the basis of his membership in an employees union violates the principle of equality as well as the right to form and join unions. Therefore, pursuant to both law and case law, the court must protect employees when there is concern that employers acted against them in violation of the basic right to form and join unions. The Court held that the respondent did not meet the burden to prove that the petitioner's dismissal was due to his performance and was not due to his unionizing activity.

As an exceptional remedy, the Court ordered the reinstatement of the petitioner, in accordance with section 33k to the Law. The Court held that indeed, the rule is that labor relations must not be compelled, and that monetary compensation should suffice, particularly when discussing the private sector. Yet, here is an exceptional case where the respondent's conduct amounted to an infringement of the employee's constitutional right, which no monetary compensation can remedy. Such an exceptional violation of a constitutional right that is a 'privilege' and beyond the employee's general rights, brings about exceptional consequences. This being the case, even with regard to a private entity.

299. Recently, the National Labor Court determined that an organization may not be considered a representative trade union, if it differentiates between men and women, in a way that constitutes discrimination against women, such as preventing them from taking part in the democratic process that is to elect and be elected to the organization's institutions. Moreover, it may not be considered a trade union, as it does not have a democratic nature and proceedings (La.C. 9/07 Ultra-Orthodox Kindergarten Teachers Organization v. The Teachers of Agudat Israel Histadrut (15.09.2008)).

The right to social security

Related international conventions binding Israel

305. Israel has filed new reports on the ILO Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention (No. 19), the ILO Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention (No. 102) and the ILO Equal Treatment (Social Security) Convention (118) – all discussing the years 2001–2006.

306. Furthermore, Israel has ratified bilateral social security conventions with the Czech Republic (2002) and Canada (2003), bringing the total number of these conventions to fifteen. Israel, as an immigration country, is interested in such conventions in order to assure each beneficiary an adequate benefit for prior social security credits in their country of origin.

307. Another purpose of these international conventions is the need to avoid dual coverage and contributions for workers posted temporarily by their employer in another country, while assuring continuity of protection and adequate benefits under the social security legislation of their country of origin.

Social security branches in Israel

308. Commencing in 2006, all social security benefits are indexed to the Consumer Prices Index, and not the average wage.

Maternity allowance

309. As of January 1, 2005, the National Insurance Institute (NII) pays a maternity grant, which is provided to post-natal new mothers in order to help cover the cost of a layette for the newborn child, directly into the mother's bank account, granted approximately one month after the birth date. The maternity grant was previously paid by means of a check given to the mothers in the hospital where the birth took place.

310. As of January 1, 2008, a "maternity grant" given to a new mother upon the birth of her first baby, or to the adoptive parents upon adoption, will equal 1,489 NIS (slightly more than $402). The maternity grant for a second child will be equivalent to 670 NIS (slightly over $181), and for every third and additional child to the family it will be the equivalent of 447 NIS (slightly over $120).

311. Commencing on January 1, 2006, women who are unable to work for a period of at least 30 consecutive days, owing to their high-risk pregnancy, are to receive "maternity allowance". The amount per day is the lower of the following two amounts: the basic amount divided by 30 – 248 NIS ($65); or the woman's salary divided by 90.

312. The NII pays a benefit to a mother who has given birth to three or more children in one birth, and again at the end of a 30-day period after the date of birth, if at least three of these children have survived. The childbirth allowance is paid, in addition to the maternity grant, for the period from the first day of the month following the birth, up until 20 months from that date.

313. Automatic payment of Maternity Allowance. Both employed and self-employed women are entitled, upon giving birth, to a Maternity Allowance from the NII for the period of their Maternity Leave from work. As of January 1, 2006, self-employed women receive the allowance automatically, without having to submit a claim.

314. The temporary order regarding Maternity Allowance for fathers who take maternity leave instead of the mother, detailed in Israel's previous report, was anchored since then in both the National Insurance Law and the Women's Employment Law. Data indicate a significant rise in the number of men receiving Maternity Allowance. In 2007, the number of men receiving Maternity Allowance was 246, in comparison to 128 in 2003.

Old-age benefits

315. As detailed in Israel's previous periodic report, applications for Old-Age Pensions are initiated by the NII. Every man and woman, approximately two months before reaching pension age, receives a claims form for Old-Age Pension from the NII, together with an accompanying explanatory letter.

316. Retirement Age Law. As mentioned earlier under Article 3 above, in 2004, the Knesset enacted the Retirement Age Law, under which, starting from July 1, 2004, the retirement age, and consequently the age of entitlement to Old-Age Pension, is gradually raised as follows: the conditional age or retirement age (age of entitlement to Old-Age Pension conditioned by a means test) will be gradually raised until it eventually reach 67 for men and 62 for women. The absolute age or pensionable age (age of entitlement to Old-Age Pension that is not conditioned by a means test) is gradually raised for women until it eventually reaches 70 (the same as for men). Prior to the change, the conditional age of entitlement to Old-Age Pension was 65 for men and 60 for women, while the absolute age was 70 for men and 65 for women. The new Law has implications on the definition of insured persons and many other social security branches, such as Disability, Unemployment, Income Support, Mobility and Long-term care.

317. On March 19, 2007, the Electricity Economy Law, 5756-1996, was amended and section 31a was added. According to the new section, persons who reach the retirement age and are entitled to income support, are entitled to a 50% discount on the first 400 KWH for domestic monthly use. The new section further invests the Minister of National Infrastructure with the authority to determine, in consultation with the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services, other populations who may also be entitled to the reduced payment benefit.

Disability benefits

318. Entitlement of returning resident to Disability Pension. According to Amendment no. 53 to the National Insurance Law approved in 2002, a Disability Pension may also be granted to a person whose incapacity to work began when he was not a resident of Israel, if the impairment that led to the incapacity to work, began when the person was a minor (under 18) residing in Israel. Prior to the amendment of the Law, one of the prerequisites for entitlement to the Disability Pension was that the incapacity to work began when the person was an Israeli resident, except for new immigrants who are entitled to the Pension even if their incapacity began before they became Israeli residents. The amendment, in effect as of September 1, 2002, is meant mainly to meet the needs of returning residents.

319. Broadening the definition of a new immigrant with regard to Disability Pension eligibility. A recent amendment to the National Insurance Law broadened the definition of a new immigrant to include persons holding a visa for temporary or permanent residence in Israel who receive a basket of services from the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption. For these persons, entitlement to the Disability Pension begins 12 months after they entered the country, but not before July 1, 2006, when the amendment came into effect.

320. Retirement Age Law: implications on Disability Insurance. The Retirement Age Law has widened the scope of persons eligible for Disability Pension. Insured persons for purposes of Disability Insurance are now defined as "Israeli residents who are aged 18 or older but who have not yet reached the retirement age". This age is being gradually raised, as detailed above, to 67 for men and 62 for women, and in the meantime varies in accordance to the person's month of birth. The change is in effect as of April 1, 2004; it applies to men who reached the age of 65 and to women who have reached the age of 60 on or after July 1, 2004.

321. Compensation for Poliomyelitis Victims Law 5767-2007. The new Law aims to provide compensation to Israeli residents (as defined in the National Insurance Law) who were infected with the Poliomyelitis disease while residing in Israel, and consequently became paralyzed. The compensation will be allocated according to medical disability degrees, which will be determined as stipulated under the National Insurance Law.

Benefits provided under the Law are additional to the general Disability and/or Mobility Benefits to which the polio victim may be entitled.

322. Children with Disabilities. The NII pays a special benefit for disabled children, defined as follows: children under the age of 18 (including adopted children or step-children) of an insured person, or of an insured person who died as an Israeli resident, who is of the following:

- A child (from age 3) dependent on the help of others for the performance of everyday functions (dressing, eating, washing, mobility in the home and the permanent presence of another, as defined in the regulations) to a degree significantly greater than is normal for his/her age group
- A child (more than 91 days old) in need of constant supervision
- A child with a special impairment, that is: (from birth) Down's syndrome or a deterioration in hearing, or (more than 91 days old) a vision impairment, autism, psychosis or a severe developmental retardation (the latter until the age of 3)
- A child (over 91 days) in need of special medical treatment as defined in the regulations, due to a severe chronic disease

Survivors' benefits

323. Initiating claims for Survivors' Pension. In keeping with the NII's policy of endeavoring to initiate substantiated claims whenever possible, in order to ensure maximal utilization of rights, a new campaign to initiate claims for Survivors' Pensions began in 2006. The target population includes spouses and children (under 22 years of age) of deceased insured persons, who have not yet submitted a claim for a Survivor's Pension.

324. Automatic payment of Survivors' Pension. As of 2006, Survivors' Pension is paid automatically to the following groups:

324.1 Widows to whom a Dependant's Increment had been paid to their husbands' Old-Age Pension;

324.2 Widows who receive Old-Age Pension by virtue of having accumulated a qualifying period, in the same bank account as their husbands'.

Dependence allowance

325. Section 135 to the National Insurance Law stipulates that once a widow remarries she is entitled to receive two benefit payments, but forfeits her claim to the monthly Dependence Allowance. The Law defines a wife as including common-law wife.

326. In La.A. 1407/04 The National Insurance Institution v. Nehama Freeman (8.11.06), the National Labor Court debated whether a widow who became a common-law wife, did not remarry, and attained a higher economic status than other widows, shall continue to enjoy the Dependence Allowance granted to widows. The Court held that although the economic status of a common-law wife is better than that of a widow, it still is not a relationship as stable as marriage – since the parties may separate at any given moment, the woman may be suddenly returned to the economic status of a widow. According to the decision, the equalization tendency found in the legislation and in the rulings of courts is aimed at equalizing the rights and benefits received by a common-law wife to those received by married women. However, the issue raised was the negation of a benefit; the Court found that such negation needs to be interpreted narrowly and that therefore, if the legislator wishes to negate a right or a benefit it must be explicitly written in the Law.

Employment injury benefits

327. Grant following the death of work – injured disabled person, not resulting from the work injury. In 2001, an amendment to section 310 of the National Insurance Law was approved, enabling payment of a grant to the dependents of a work – injured disabled person whose death was not a result of his/her work injury. In accordance with the conditions stipulated in the Law, a grant in a sum equivalent to 60% of the full disability pension of the disabled person, multiplied by 36, is paid to the dependents. The grant is paid in two installments, the first upon the death of the disabled person, and the second after one year has elapsed since his/her death. Prior to the change, when a work injured disabled person died as a result of something other than his/her work injury, his/her monthly pension was ceased, and a grant was paid – at the rate of the average wage. This sum was paid only to the dependants of a disabled person who had a permanent medical disability of at least 50%, and to the dependants of an elderly disabled person.

The new grant is of a higher rate, and is paid to the dependants of all work – injured disabled persons, thus improving their economic situation. It should be noted that when a work injured person dies as a result of his/her work injury, his/her dependents continue to receive a monthly pension.

Income Support benefits

328. Income Support is a partial benefit provided to a person whose income from work or any other source (such as the Old-Age Pension) is lower than the Minimum Guaranteed Income (MGI), necessary for subsistence according to the law. Since 2002, many changes have been made in the amounts of the Old-Age Pension relative to the MGI. Therefore, in 2006 the NII decided to re-examine entitlement to income supplement, based on claims previously submitted and denied, acting under the assumption that the financial situation of the claimant has not changed.

329. In 2006, the NII paid Income Support benefits to approximately 130,341 families who did not earn the minimum level of income as determined by the Income Support Law 5740-1980 (the “Income Support Law”,) and who were not covered by other income maintenance programs.

330. Exemption from the Employment Test requirement. One of the basic prerequisites for eligibility for an Income Support benefit is satisfying the Employment Test: registration at the labor exchange as a job-seeker or participant in the “Lights for Employment” program. Only if the Employment Service is unable to offer a job does an individual become eligible for an Income Support benefit. The Employment Test is meant to verify that a claimant for Income Support benefit was not able to find employment, unless he/she is not capable of earning a living or is unsuitable for placement at any job. There are several categories of persons exempt from this requirement, such as single parents with small children, persons caring for a sick relative, etc. Under an amendment to the Income Support Law, in effect as of 2002, a mother in a foster family caring for a child up to the age of 7 is also exempt from satisfying the Employment Test in order to receive Income Support benefit. Another amendment to the Law, in effect as of 2007, determines that persons aged 25 or over, with medical disability degree of 75% or more, as well as disabled housewives, are also exempt from the Employment Test.

331. Vehicle ownership. According to an amendment to the Income Support Law dated December 26, 2006, the ownership of a vehicle does not, under certain conditions, disqualify a person from eligibility for Income Support benefit. Previously, a person who owned a vehicle, other than a motorcycle, was not eligible for an Income Support benefit, unless he/she had impaired mobility or needed the vehicle in order to access medical treatment. The amendment aspires to remove obstacles from Income Support recipients who need a vehicle in order to work.

Child allowances

332. As reported in Israel's previous periodic report, all families residing legally in Israel, regardless of income, are entitled to "Child Allowance", a monthly grant that increases with the number of children in the family. The Government policy of reducing Child Allowances – the first stage of which was carried out from 2002 to 2004 – will continue until 2009. The policy is being partially implemented by means of temporary orders and partially as permanent legislation. By the end of the legislative process in 2009, the allowance will be a fixed amount for every child in all families, regardless of the child's place in the family.

Commencing from January 2008, a family with one child receives 152 NIS a month (approximately $41); a family with two children receives 304 NIS ($82); with three children – 486 NIS ($131); four children – 823 NIS ($222); and five children – 1,160 NIS ($313) per month. The amount per every child born after June 1, 2003, is 152 NIS ($41).

In 2005, 956,294 families received child allowances, amounting to 19% of the total benefits paid by the National Insurance Institution (NII). In 2006, 968,282 families received child allowances, amounting to 17.6% of the total benefits paid by the NII.

333. In accordance with the Economy Policy Law for the Fiscal Year 2004 (Legislative Amendments), the National Insurance Law was amended and section 68(c) was added. The new section provides that a parent who is entitled to Child Allowance for three or more children, and receives one of the following benefits: Income Support, Alimony, Survivors' Pension with Income Supplement or Old-Age Pension with Income Supplement, will receive a monthly increment to the child allowance at a rate of 0.59 of a credit point for each of the third and fourth child in the family (106 NIS ($28)).

334. The NII also provides a Study Grant for every child between the ages of 6 and 14 in entitled families, at the beginning of the school year. Entitled families are: single-parent families; families with 4 or more children who receive one of the following benefits: Income Support, Alimony, Disability, Old-Age, Survivors' Benefit; a child orphaned from both parents; an abandoned/orphaned child as defined in the Income Support Law; a child who immigrated to Israel without an insured parent; and women residing in a shelter for battered women, under certain conditions.

Special Social Funds

335. Within the endeavors to aid and advance the weak populations in Israeli society, the NII maintains 5 Special Social Funds dedicated to the development of infrastructure and services for these populations, by encouraging service-providing organizations (Governmental, Municipal and Non-Governmental) to expand the scope and accessibility of the welfare services they provide to various population groups insured and supported by the NII:

335.1 the Fund for Development of Services for the Disabled.

335.2 the Fund for Activities Aimed at Work Safety and the Prevention of Work Accidents.

335.3 the Fund for Development of Long-Term Care services.

335.4 the Fund for the Development of Services for Children and Youth, (established in 2004).

335.5 the Fund for Special Initiatives.

336. The activities of the Funds are anchored in the National Insurance Law, and four of them draw their budget from a percentage of the annual allocation earmarked for the insurance branch to which they are attached. The Fund for Special Initiatives has its own particular budget, since the projects it sponsors are geared towards all the Institute's beneficiaries.

337. The Funds act as catalysts for the development of services in the community by providing preliminary financial assistance for the initiatives of service-providers who undertake to continue to maintain and operate these services on their own for an extended period.

The pension system in Israel

338. On July 19, 2007, the Federation of Israeli Economic Organizations and the Histadrut Trade Union, signed a collective agreement concerning an extensive pension insurance arrangement for all workers. The collective agreement came into force on January 1, 2008, following the issuance of an expansion order by the Minister of ITL validating the agreement.

339. The collective agreement will only apply to employees who do not have a beneficiary pension arrangement. An employee who has a beneficiary pension arrangement will not be affected, the beneficiary arrangement will continue to apply in its current form and his/her rights will not be subtracted from. The agreement applies to every employee from the age of 21 for men, and 20 for women.

340. The agreement stipulates that, inter alia, as of January 1, 2009, each employee will be entitled to pension allocation after completing six months of employment. During the adjustment period until January 2009, the entitlement will apply to all employees who on January 1, 2008, completed nine months of employment. An employee, who began his/her employment in a workplace and has pension insurance, will be entitled to pension allocation from the first day of his/her employment; the carrying out of the allocation will begin either after three months of employment retroactively, or at the end of the tax year, whichever is earlier.

341. The salary insured is the salary as determined by the Severance Payment Law 5723-1963, and shall include the basic pay and all additional wage components to which the employee is entitled. The maximal insured wage equates to the average wage.

Each employee is entitled to choose the pension fund or the retirement fund and notify the employer within 60 days of commencing employment.

Long-term care

342. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Expenditures

343. Social security benefits payments amounted to 6.9% of the GNP in 2007, and 7.1% in 2006. Israel's second periodic report presented a clear increased share of benefit payments in both the GNP and the Government budget until 2002 (8.9%). A decreasing trend began in 2003 (8.3%) and continued until 2007.

Equality in social security

344. Since the submission of Israel's previous report, there have been some notable positive changes enhancing equality in social security, which have been presented in this report.

Article 10 Familial rights

Related international conventions binding Israel

345. Since 1991, Israel is a party to the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women. In May 2005, Israel submitted its Fourth Periodic Report to the Committee on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women. Its fifth report will be submitted in 2009.

346. Since 1991, Israel has been a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Its third report was submitted to the Committee in July 2008.

347. Since 1991, Israel has been a party to the International Convention on the Rights of the Child, submitted its Initial Report in 2001 and its second periodic report will be submitted in 2009.

348. Since the submission of Israel's second periodic report, a report under the ILO Minimum Age Convention 1979 (No. 138), was submitted relating to the years 2004–2005.

Meaning of “family”

The definition of the term “family” in Israeli law

349. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Meaning of family in administrative practice

350. Several important judiciary developments have occurred since the submission of Israel's previous report, broadening the meaning of family in administrative practice, with regard to same-sex couples.

351. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court handed down a landmark decision concerning the rights of same-sex couples. It held that a wedding certificate from a foreign country in which same-sex marriages are recognized, could allow the couple to be registered as married by the Ministry of the Interior. Five gay couples who held wedding ceremonies abroad petitioned to the Supreme Court following the Ministry of the Interior's refusal to register them as married (H.C.J 3045/05 Ben-Ari v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J 3046/05 Bar-Lev v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J 10218/05 Herland v. The Ministry of the Interior, H.C.J 10468/05 Lord v. The Ministry of the Interior and H.C.J 10597/05 Remez v. The Ministry of the Interior).

The Supreme Court based its decision on a previous Supreme Court ruling (H.C.J 143/62 Fonk-Shlezinger v. The Minister of the Interior) in which a distinction was made between the duty to register marriages, and the question of recognition of their status. The Supreme Court determined that the Ministry of the Interior must not discriminate against same-sex couples who hold a wedding certificate from a foreign country that permits same-sex marriages. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court noted that by doing so, it does not grant a new status to same-sex marriages, and reiterated that it is the role of the Knesset to endow as much.

352. In an innovative judgment, the Nazareth District Court determined that the term “man and woman” in the Inheritance Law 5725-1965, (the “Inheritance Law”) includes spouses of the same gender. The judgment was based upon the general inclination to broaden the interpretation of the term “spouse” in the Inheritance Law. (C.A. 3245/03 A.M. v. The Attorney General (11.11.04)).

353. In a significant decision dated January 2005, the Supreme Court accepted the appeal of two women, a same-sex couple, to adopt each other’s children. The Court ruled that under the Children Adoption Law 5741-1981, each case should be examined on its own merits and all the relevant circumstances need to be taken into consideration. The Court emphasized that the decision solely concerns this couple and is not a principled one, thus leaving the question of same-sex relationships for a later date. The Court recommended that the Knesset amend the Law to provide a solution to a real problem, and attempt to bypass ideological controversial problems that the issue presents (C.A. 10280/01 Yaros-Hakak v. The Attorney General (10.01.05)).

354. On April 19, 2007, The Haifa Labor District Court accepted a claim against the “Mivtachim” pension fund, and determined that a surviving partner of a lesbian relationship was eligible to the legal rights of an “insured widow”, and not of an “insured widower” (D.L.C 1758/06 Moyal-Lefler v. Mivtachim). Following this decision, the plaintiff is to be paid a Survivors’ Pension of 40% as opposed to only 20%.

The Court concluded that in this instance, the plaintiff was the deceased’s spouse, and was publicly recognized as her common-law wife. Therefore, she was eligible to a Survivors’ Pension, according to the rules of the pension fund. The Court stated that “the distinction between men and women in the rules of the respondent and the National Insurance Law derives from a similar rationale – a reflection of the economic situation in which we live, where women’s incomes are lower than men’s, and their promotion in the labor market is more difficult. Therefore there is a justification for the preference of widows as it narrows the existing gap between men and women.”

The Court held that the plaintiff should be classified as a female widow, and not as a widower. She was therefore eligible for the rights of an “insured widow”, and the pension as stated in the rules of the pension fund.

Majority

355. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Assistance to the family and its protection

The fundamental right to family life

356. Fertility treatments. There are 24 fertility departments in Israel, 9 in governmental hospitals, 11 in public hospitals and 4 in private hospitals. In 2006, 25,552 cycles of IVF treatment were performed (in comparison to 20,886 cycles in 2002), resulting in 6,473 pregnancies and 4,298 live births (5,229 children). The percentage of live births in Israel per treatment cycle has been relatively steady since 1996 (15.8 %) and in 2006 it stood at 16.8%.

357. In February 2007, the Equal Employment Opportunity Law was amended to add a specific prohibition on discrimination against an employee due to fertility treatment or IVF treatment.

358. The accumulative number of applications for surrogate motherhood, as of December 2007, is 450, resulting in 194 children in 160 successful child births (due to 32 labors of twins and one set of triplets being born). Out of the 450 applications some were made by couples for the second time after a success or a failure to conceive on the first application. Some of the applications never reached the stage of signing an agreement. At least two of the prospective mothers gave birth.

Marriage

359. Family Matters Court Law 5755-1995 (“Family Matters Court Law”). Until 2001, the Muslim and Christian courts had exclusive jurisdiction in all family matters, including women’s and children’s alimony, property issues, child maintenance, guardianship and parental matters. In November 2001, the Family Matters Court Law was amended to create parallel jurisdiction in Family Matters Court in all issues concerning the personal status of Muslims and Christians (matrimonial assets, custody, child support, family violence and in the case of Muslims, also parenthood) under the jurisdiction of the civil system, excluding questions of marriage and divorce which remain exclusively under religious jurisdiction.

360. Minimum marriageable age for men and women. The phenomenon of underage marriage still takes place in certain segments of Israeli society, including those of the Ultra-Orthodox Jews, Jews originating from Georgia and Arabs.

361. In 2005, 30 requests to allow the marriage of minors were submitted to family matters courts – 17 were approved. During the years 1997–2005, more than a half of the 251 requests for marriage of minors were approved. During the years 2000–2006, 41 complaints were submitted to the Police due to violations of the Marriage Age Law 5710-1950. In half of those cases criminal files were opened. In all other cases it was decided not to prosecute.

362. Dissolving of Marriage Jurisdiction (Special Cases and International Jurisdiction) Law 5729-1969. The Law concerning the dissolution of marriage of persons with no religious affiliations or different religions was amended in July 2005, to allow for either spouse to apply directly to a Family Matters Court in matters of marriage dissolution, instead of applying first to the President of the Supreme Court. In suitable cases, the Family Matters Court may seek consultation from the relevant religious court to determine whether it is necessary to dissolve the marriage according to the religious law of either spouse in order to allow him or her to remarry. The amended Law also includes international jurisdiction provisions of Family Matters Courts.

363. Upholding Divorce Decree. In two Amendments to the Rabbinical Courts (Upholding a Divorce Decree) Law 5755-1995, the legislator extended the powers granted to the Rabbinical Court when dealing with a husband reluctant to give his wife a “Get” (divorce decree), thus preventing her from re-marrying. The first Amendments, dated June 1, 2004, empowered Rabbinical Courts to order the reluctant husband to remain in isolation for an initial period of 14 days (previously 5 days) and for continuous periods thereafter, pursuant to certain limitations. The Second Amendment, dated July 25, 2007, enables the Rabbinical Courts, in certain circumstances, to foreclose or withhold pensions and other allowances in a progressive manner as stipulated in the Law, as well as possessions including personal effects and real estate.

364. On July 21, 2008, the Jerusalem Family Matters Court compensated a woman in the amount of 550,000 NIS ($148,648) due to her husband's lack of compliance to the order of the Rabbinical Court, stipulating the need for a divorce between the couple (F.C. (Jerusalem) 6743/02 K. v. K. (21.6.08)). The woman filed for divorce at the Rabbinical Court in 1998, and in 2006, that Court ordered the husband to grant a divorce decree to his wife. The Family Matters Court determined that due to the lingering of the divorce process the husband inflicted extensive emotional suffering upon his wife, even more so after his refusal to comply with the order of the Rabbinical Court. Therefore, the Family Matters Court decided to compensate the woman for the emotional pain she suffered. However, this decision does not repeal the need to receive the husband's consent to the divorce in order for it to become valid.

365. With regard to the issue of women remarriage in cases where the husband is opposed to the divorce, please refer to the Israel's periodic reports on the implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW).

366. Division of property. The Knesset recently amended the Division of Property between Spouses Law, 5733-1973, in order to allow the division of property prior to the divorce or end of marriage. According to Jewish "Halacha", both spouses must consent to the divorce. The purpose of the Amendment is to prevent the possibility of one spouse to require the other spouse to relinquish his/her property rights, as a condition for his/her consent to divorce.

The Amendment further broadened the incidence of the Law, to include marriage annulment, declaration that the marriage was void and separation according to religious law that does not allow divorce, in addition to divorce.

The Amendment added Section 5A(a), according to which, the court may allow, under certain circumstances, the realization of the right to division of property, namely the right of each spouse to half of the couple's total property, prior to the divorce or the marriage annulment in each of the aforementioned forms.

According to Section 5A(b), the court may shorten the periods stipulated in section 5A(a), if it deems it appropriate. Furthermore, in certain circumstances, namely the involvement of violent elements, the court may order the division of property even if the situation does not comply with the terms stipulated in section 5A(a).

According to Section 5A(c) the court may condition the execution of a division of property request, in the deposition of a written letter of consent to receive or give a Get from the applicant.

367. Civil marriages. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court took the laudatory step of recognizing civil marriages which had taken place between Jewish Israeli residents and citizens, outside of Israel (H.C.J 2232/03 Anonymous v. The Rabbinical Court of Appeals). A Jewish man, who wanted to divorce his wife after having been civilly married outside of the State, turned to the Rabbinical Court which stated that the marriage should not be recognized, and are therefore dissolved. The wife, who did not wish to divorce her husband, petitioned the decision to the High Court of Justice. The Court determined that the Rabbinical Court could not dissolve the marriage based on the fact that the marriage was not performed according to Jewish "Halacha". It further noted that civil marriages are indeed valid in Israel. The Supreme Court based the recognition of civil marriages, inter alia, on international private law, and further determined that the necessity to validate these marriages is strengthened by the right to marriage and family life, and the obligation to respect the familial unit.

368. Spouses. On April 15, 2007, the Nazareth Family Matters Court rejected a lawsuit brought by two children of a deceased man against his second wife. In the claim, the children requested the rights to a property of their father's that the second widow had inherited (Nazareth F.C 001180/04 A.Z and P.Z v. V.Z et. al.). The plaintiffs claimed that their father's widow had a new spouse and that according to a condition in their father's testament, she lost the right to the property under those circumstances and the children were subsequently to inherit it.

The Court held that the meaning of the word "spouse" as it appeared in the testament should be interpreted as a relationship characterized by economic management of a family unit, stemming from a joint family life. This meaning complied with the testimony's objective that the children would inherit the property only if the wife developed a serious and permanent relationship with her new partner, similar to the one she had with the deceased.

The Court decided that in this case, the relationship between the respondent and her partner was based on friendship and intimacy, but could not be characterized as incorporating the economic management of a joint family unit. Therefore, the new couple could not be considered as 'spouses' according to the terms of the testament, and the lawsuit was rejected.

Strengthening and protecting the family

369. In a precedent decision, the National Labor Court rejected an appeal submitted by the State, regarding the interpretation of section 4(a)(1) to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. The State claimed that the proper interpretation of the Law should grant similar benefits to male and female employees in the same workplace, upon fulfilling the condition that their female spouse is employed and that there is a similarity between the benefits granted in both their workplaces. The Court rejected the State's claim, and reaffirmed the decision of the District Labor Court, which held that the petitioner was entitled to a shorter workday, the same as given to his female co-workers, despite the fact that his wife was not entitled to similar benefits in her workplace. The Court stipulated that the purpose of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law is to implement the principle of equality, which is a fundamental principle, in all matters relating to employment relations. The Court held that the purpose of the Law was to grant parental benefits to one of the parents, according to their preference, and to prevent dual-use of the same rights by both parents (La.A. 1155/02 The State of Israel v. Alexander Muskalnenko (31.8.2003)).

370. For discussion of the financial and economical benefits granted by the State to aid families, please see Article 9 above.

371. By the end of 2007, 2,408,400 children made up 33.3% of the total population of the State of Israel, in comparison to 33.8% in 2000.

372. In 2007, 8% of all children in Israel lived in a single parent family, in comparison to 6.8% in 1995. The number of children who immigrated to Israel since 1990 and presently reside in Israel is approximately 90,000.

373. In 2007, 24.8% of families with children were under the poverty line, a decline in comparison to 25.5% in 2006.

374. For discussion of the financial and economical benefits granted by the State for the protection of children, please see Article 9 above.

375. Indications of information concerning the implications of legislation can be found in the Rights of the Child Law 5762-2002. This Law requires the systematic inclusion of explanatory notes in every bill regarding its expected implications on the rights of children.

Provision of welfare services

376. In January 2007, there were 418,527 children known to the social services departments, this consists of nearly 20% of all children in Israel. From January 2001 to January 2007, there was an increase of 44% in the number of children in the social services system. 326,588 children were defined by the social services departments as ‘children at direct risk or family risk’ – indicating that the child’s development and his/her reasonable manner of life are at risk and he/she may require assistance.

377. In 2006, 8,222 children that had been victims of sexual and violent offences under the age of 14 were investigated by a children’s investigator, in comparison to 8,328 in 2005 and 5,704 children in 2000. Despite the gradual increase in the number of children interrogated by a children’s investigator, the percentage of girls interrogated has declined from more than two thirds of the children investigated in 1990 to less than half in 2005. Out of all children interrogated, 55% were victims of abuse within the family, 30.3% were victims of sex offences, 9.4% were witnesses of sex offences, and 5% were suspects of committing sex offences.

378. A 2001 Amendment expanded the Evidence Procedure Revision (Protection of Children) Law 5715-1955 (section 1A), stipulating that a child could be investigated by a children’s investigator concerning related offences. The expansion was designed to prevent a situation in which a child might be investigated by a children’s investigator concerning an offence included in the Law (sex and severe violence offences), but could not be investigated concerning a related offence – a situation which invariably led to a splitting-up of the investigation.

379. A 2004 Amendment made several other changes, including:

379.1 The implementation of special procedures allowing children to testify in court in relation to offences to which the Law applies (section 2(d)). In this regard, the child’s testimony will be permitted by the children’s investigator subject to certain conditions being met. The investigator may require, for example, that the child testify via closed circuit television, on one specified date, not on the witness stand, in the judge’s chamber, and so on.

379.2 Decisions of the children’s investigator and the Court concerning testimony and testimonial measures will be concluded only after hearing the opinion of the child, if he/she can express his/her own opinion. The child’s opinion will be weighed according to his/her age and his/her maturity (section 2(f)).

379.3 Once the children’s investigator reaches a decision as to the child’s testimony, he/she must, without delay, reevaluate his/her decision, considering; admission of the child’s testimony if he/she has allowed the child to testify, or the trial, if he/she has prohibited the child’s testimony (section 2(g)).

379.4 A decision of a children’s investigator may be re-examined by a senior children’s investigator (section 2(h)).

380. A 2005 Amendment constituted the rule that investigation of a child must be conducted with his/her parents’ knowledge, except in certain circumstances. For example: if there is concern as to any damage to the child’s physical and mental wellbeing, if the suspect is a family relative and there is a concern of possible damage to the child, and if there is substantial difficulty in informing the parent by reasonable effort and the delay might foil the investigation or any crime prevention (section 4A). In addition, the amended Law states that if an investigation without the parents' knowledge is required, the child may, under specific conditions, be taken out from the place where he/she is staying (school, kindergarten, etc.), in order to conduct the required investigation. The conditions include such requirements as having had consultation with education personnel who know the child, supplied explanations to the child, provided identification details of the children's investigator to the administrator of the place, etc.

381. A 2005 amendment stated that a child with an Intellectual Disability is to be investigated by a special children's investigator in accordance with the Investigation and Testimony Procedures (Suitability to Persons with Intellectual or Mental Disability Law).

382. Section 361 of the Penal Law was amended in 2001 (Amendment 59), and now determines that leaving a child under the age of six without appropriate supervision, in circumstances that endanger the child's life, hurt or might hurt the health or well-being of the child, is a criminal offence.

383. Sexual Abuse. Since 2002, there have been several Amendments to section 354 of the Penal Law concerning restrictions on limitation in sex offenses against minors. Currently, the Law stipulates that in the case of offenses committed against a minor by a person responsible for the minor, the limitation period shall begin when he/she reaches the age of twenty eight. If the offenses were committed by a person above the age of fifteen who is not a relative, or responsible for the minor, the limitation period shall begin when the minor reaches the age of eighteen. In addition, a 2001 Amendment (Amendment 61) to the Penal Law removed the element of 'use of force' from sex offenses, which has effectively shifted the focus of the investigation to absence of consent. A 2003 Amendment (Amendment 77), also added an offence concerning the sexual exploitation of a patient by a mental therapist (Section 347A).

384. On July 12, 2007, the Limitation Law 5718-1958, was amended (Amendment 4) in order to extend the limitation period for civil suits concerning sexual assault or abuse of minors. The amendment relates to a civil suit concerning sexual assault of a minor, or child abuse by a family member or a person responsible for the child, as well as the sexual assault of a person between the ages of 18 and 21, while exploiting relations of dependence, authority, trust or treatment, or if the sexual assault was committed by a family member. In these cases, the limitation period will not commence before the victim reaches the age of 28. The Law further stipulates that if an indictment was filed, the civil limitation period will not end until one year had passed after a conclusive verdict was delivered.

385. Child Prostitution. Section 214 of the Penal Law was amended in 2007 (Amendment 93), and the short two-year limitation period for submission of indictments concerning pornographic advertisements of minors was annulled. The Penal Law was amended in 2006, so that section 15 now applies the principal of extraterritoriality to pornography and prostitution offences committed against minors. It is currently possible to try offenders in Israel for such offences, even though the act might not constitute a criminal offence in the country in which it was performed (no double criminality is required).

386. The Committee for Examination of the Conditions of Children at Risk. According to Government Resolution no. 1007, dated November 16, 2003, Israel's former Prime Minister and former Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services, appointed a public committee for the examination of the conditions of children and youth at risk or in distress. On September 12, 2006, following a report submitted by the committee in March 2006, the Government accepted Resolution no. 477 on the gradual implementation of a plan recommended by the committee. In 2007, the implementation of the plan began in several towns in Israel with a special annual budget of 200 million NIS ($52,631,578).

387. In 2007, approximately 1,000 children of foreign workers lived in Israel. In July 2007, 975 children of foreign workers under 5 years old were treated in family health-care centers in the city of Tel-Aviv.

388. Since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report, there has been some progress in the legal status of foreign workers' children. Government Resolution no. 3807, dated June 26, 2005, was amended by Government Resolution no. 156, dated June 18, and states the following:

“Upon request, the Minister of the Interior is entitled to grant permanent residency status to children of illegal immigrants who have been part of Israeli society and culture, if they fulfill the following conditions:

(a) The child has lived in Israel for at least 6 years (as of the date of the Resolution), and has entered Israel prior to the age of 14. A short visit abroad will not be viewed as an interruption of this time period;

(b) Prior to the child's entry or birth, the parents must have entered Israel legally, and with an entry permit in accordance with the Entry into Israel Law, 5712-1952;

(c) The child speaks the Hebrew language;

(d) The child is in first grade or above, or has completed his studies;

(e) Those filing the request will be required to submit documentation or participate in hearings, in order to prove that they fit the abovementioned criterion.”

The Minister can grant temporary residency status in Israel to the parents and the siblings of the child, as long as they have lived in the same household from the child's day of entry or birth in Israel, and are in Israel as of the date of this Resolution. If there is no reason for objection, the temporary residency status will be renewed until the child reaches the age of 21. At that point, the parents and the siblings will be entitled to file a request for permanent residency status.

389. As of November 3, 2008, approximately 862 requests have been filed of which 430 were accepted, 417 were rejected and 15 remain pending due to lack of adequate documentation. In the case of 349 rejected requests, appeals were filed to the committee of appeals. On review, 127 applications were accepted by the Ministry of the Interior, and 193 rejected. An additional 24 appeals were referred to the committee that reviews humanitarian issues, and 8 appeals are currently under review.

Youth protection

390. As detailed in Israel's previous report, the Youth Employment Law prohibits employment of persons under the age of 15. Under the Law, an executive (as defined by the Law) in a corporation has a duty to supervise and adopt all necessary measures in order to prevent infringements of the Law by the corporation or one or more of its employees. A 2000 amendment to the Law broadened the duty to include the responsibility of executives in public bodies to ensure that contractors hired by the public body, do not violate the Law. With regard to the duty of public executives according to the amendment, the Law enumerates the different measures the executive must adopt in order to fulfill his/her duty.

391. In 2007, the Law was further amended in order to allow the employment of a minor between the ages of 16 and 18, after 23:00 pm, where the employment of the minor is required due to a declaration of a “state of emergency” or in workplaces where work is conducted in shifts. According to the Law, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Labor is authorized to approve such employment, only where convinced that the health and welfare of the minor are protected.

Family reunification

392. In its concluding observations to Israel's last periodic report the Committee expressed concern with the process of family reunification for foreign spouses.

393. Since the outbreak of the armed conflict and hostilities between Israel and the Palestinians towards the end of the year 2000, which led, inter alia, to the commission of dozens of suicide bombings inside Israel, there has been a growing involvement in assistance to terrorist organizations on the part of Palestinians originally from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Such individuals carry Israeli identity cards pursuant to procedures of family unification with Israeli citizens or residents, allowing their free movement between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and into Israel.

394. In order to prevent such potential danger posed by former residents of these areas during the current armed conflict, the Government decided in May 2002 to temporarily suspend granting them legal status in Israel, through the process of family unification. The decision was adopted following the horrendous wave of terrorist attacks in March of 2002, when 135 Israelis were killed and another 721 were injured.

395. In addition, between September 2000 and the end of 2006, 38 of the 172 terrorist attacks carried out in Israel, were committed by such individuals. Those injured in these 38 terrorist attacks constitute 86% of the total number of injured by terrorist attacks. In fact, in 2007, a 20-year-old woman, whose mother is an Israeli-Arab from Kfar Qasem and whose father is Palestinian, was caught — merely 12 minutes before exploding herself in a restaurant in Israel — using a bomb that was stored during the previous night, in the home of a relative in Kfar Qasem.

396. This situation is the result of the genuine difficulties in obtaining information concerning residents of the West Bank, following Israel's transfer of powers and responsibilities and termination of daily presence in this area pursuant to the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement, dated September 28, 1995.

397. Israel, as any other State, is entitled to control entry into its territory, and more so, during times of armed conflict, when persons requesting to enter may potentially be involved in acts of violence and terrorism against its citizens.

398. On July 31, 2003, the Knesset enacted the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763–2003, which limits the possibility of granting residents of the territories Israeli citizenship pursuant to the Citizenship Law 5712–1952, including by means of family unification; and the possibility of granting such residents residence permits into Israel pursuant to the Entry into Israel Law 5712–1952. The Law was amended in 2005 and 2007, in order to expand the humanitarian relief it initially provided. The amendments also expanded the applicability of the Law to citizens of enemy States (namely, Iran; Syria; Lebanon; and Iraq).

399. The Law enables entry into Israel for the purposes of medical treatment, employment, or other temporary grounds, for an overall period of up to six months.

400. In addition, the Minister of the Interior may authorize a request for family unification for those who are married to an Israeli spouse, and are residents of the area, for men over the age of 35 and women over the age of 25. The Law further authorizes the Minister of the Interior to grant residence permits to children of such a couple that are minors under the age of 14. With regard to children of such a couple that are minors over the age of 14, the Law stipulates that the Minister of the Interior has the authority to grant temporary permits under certain conditions.

401. The Law further allows the Minister of the Interior, due to special humanitarian reasons and according to a recommendation of a professional committee appointed for this purpose, to grant temporary residence permits for a resident of the area or a citizen of Iran, Iraq, Syria or Lebanon, who have a family member legally residing in Israel, and to approve a request for stay permit of a resident of the area who has a family member legally residing in Israel.

402. Such a decision of the Minister of the Interior is to be reasoned and given in writing, within 6 months from the day that the professional committee received all the necessary documents.

403. The Law stipulates that a request can be denied in cases where the Minister of the Interior or certain security functionaries assert that the person, or a family member of first relation, poses a security threat.

404. In cases where a person or a family member has been known to act for the benefit of the State of Israel, the Law enables the Minister of the Interior and certain security functionaries to grant permits to a resident of the area.

405. The Law does not change the status of persons who already received their status prior to the day the Law came into effect. However, those persons' status shall not be advanced, but rather left static.

406. The Law was initially enacted for a period of one year. At the end of that period in August, 2004, the Law was extended for another six months. It was re-extended in February 2005 for a period of four more months and has been further extended until August 31, 2005. The revised Law was published on August 1, 2005 and was invoked until March 31, 2006. At the end of that period it was extended until April 2007, and later an amended version was extended until July 31, 2008, and re-extended until July 31, 2009.

407. The Law's constitutionality was scrutinized and recently upheld by the Supreme Court in H.C.J. 7052/03, 7102/03 Adalah et. al. v. The Minister of the Interior (14.5.06). The High Court of Justice, residing in an extended panel of eleven judges, rejected the petitions against the legality of the Law, by a six to five vote.

408. On December 17, 2007, the Minister of the Interior announced the formation of the professional committee according to the Law, and proclaimed its members.

409. New petitions against the constitutionality of the Law are pending before the High Court of Justice. On July 31, 2008, The State submitted its arguments. (H.C.J cases 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07 MK Zehava Galon et. al. v. the Minister of the Interior et. al.)

Equality of treatment

410. Significant developments which occurred since the submission of Israel's previous report concerning the definition of "family" in reference to same-sex couples are detailed above.

Maternity protection

Maternity leave and protection of pregnant working women

411. Between the years 2006 and 2008, a number of significant amendments were made to the Women's Employment Law, further elaborating and enhancing the maternity protection of women, while continuing the legislative trend detailed in Israel's previous report, which considers the family-unit as a whole and advances greater involvement of fathers in child-rearing:

411.1 Amendment No. 33 (February 2007) – Extended the period in which a woman returning to work after her maternity leave may not be dismissed from her place of employment from 45 days to 60 days.

411.2 Amendment No. 34 (March 2007) – Prior to the amendment, a woman who was hospitalized during her maternity leave for at least two consecutive weeks, was entitled to extend her maternity leave for the period of her hospitalization, but not for more than four weeks. The amendment allows the extension of the maternity leave even if the period of hospitalization was not consecutive.

411.3 Amendment No. 35 (March 2007) – The criminal fine for violating provisions of the Women's Employment Law was doubled and the incarceration period was lengthened.

411.4 Amendment No. 36 (March 2007) – Extended the period in which a woman absent from work due to her stay in a shelter for battered women may not be dismissed upon her return to work, from 60 to 90 days.

411.5 Amendment No. 37 (May 2007) – The Maternity leave was extended from 12 to 14 weeks.

411.6 Amendment No. 38 (June 2007) – The temporary provision allowing for paternity leave in the case of a mother conceding her rights to a leave to her spouse, has become final.

411.7 Amendment No. 39 (August 2007) – Addresses several issues:

411.7.1 It allows for a woman to shorten her maternity leave in case of her giving the infant up for adoption or in the case of a surrogate mother.

411.7.2 It also allows for a man whose spouse has given birth and can not care for the infant due to a handicap or illness to take a paternity leave for the full period in which she is unable to care for the infant. According to the amendments, his paternity leave does not cancel the mother's right to her leave. A parallel amendment was made to the National Insurance Law to allow the father on leave to collect a birth allowance in addition to the allowance paid to the mother.

411.7.3 A woman may be absent from work due to her pregnancy upon a doctor's approval. If she is not entitled to payment from the health insurance or from her employer, her absence will be considered as sick leave.

411.7.4 When a pregnant woman, due to the nature or conditions of her work or workplace, is unable to continue her work, she may be absent upon doctor approval. Her absence without pay will be permitted only if her employer can not find an alternative suitable position for her. Her seniority will not be affected by her absence.

411.7.5 A nursing mother who is not legally allowed to work in certain jobs due to her nursing condition, and is not entitled to vacation days after her maternity leave, may be absent from work. Her absence will be considered vacation without pay.

411.7.6 Upon fulfillment of certain conditions specified in the Law, the termination of a limited term contract, will be considered a dismissal when concerning circumstances such as pregnancy, maternity leave, fertility leave, etc.

411.7.7 A right of appeal has been granted to an employee regarding decisions made by the government official in charge of allowing dismissals or cutting back of a post during pregnancy.

411.8 Amendment No. 40 (August 2007) – Imposition of responsibility on employers who have caused the dismissal of a pregnant woman employed as a contract worker in violation of the Law.

411.9 Amendment No. 41 (October 2007) – Extending the prohibition on dismissal of an employee undergoing fertility treatment for having a second child, as well as for a first child.

411.10 Amendment No. 42 (February 2008) – An employer is prohibited from scheduling a woman in night shifts or during the weekly rest, for four months following her return from maternity leave unless she has agreed to do so, in writing (certain jobs are not included, such as hospital work, etc.).

411.11 Amendment No. 43 (February 2008) – Prevents the possibility of overlap between the period of notice for dismissal, and the periods during which the Law prohibits dismissal.

411.12 Amendment No. 44 (March 2008) – Prior to the amendment the Law allowed for a vacation without pay after maternity leave, on the condition that the employee worked for at least 24 months prior to the birth. The amendment allows for this right after only 12 months of employment prior to the birth.

411.13 In addition, as of September 2007, a man can replace his wife on maternity leave if she is not capable of caring for the newborn due to her health condition, even if 6 weeks have not yet elapsed since the birth as usually required – if the infant is in the father's custody and in his sole care. This maternity leave for the father includes extension of the leave due to a multiple birth or hospitalization of the infant.

412. The Women Employment (Periods and Rules for Payment to the Pension Fund) Regulations 5768-2008, entered into force in September 1, 2008. According to the new Regulations, during maternity leave, the employer is obligated to continue transferring payments to the employee's pension fund, in the same manner and amount, as prior to the maternity leave. The respective amount that the employee is required to transfer will be deducted from the last salary prior to the maternity leave, and the first salary following the conclusion of the leave. The Regulations stipulate that these provisions are unconditional.

The Regulations further determine that during maternity protection leave, the employer is obligated to transfer payments to the employee's pension fund, only if the employee fulfilled her respective obligation to transfer payments to the fund throughout her maternity protection leave.

413. On August 24, 2006, the Jerusalem District Labor Court ordered compensation to be paid by the ISS Ashmoret Company Ltd. to their employee, who was illegally dismissed from her job when 7 months pregnant, without the approval of the Women Labor Supervisor in the Ministry of ITL (LC. 001452/04 Ayenalem Ababito v. ISS Ashmoret Company Ltd.). The Court accepted all of the plaintiff's claims, and determined that the respondents had illegally dismissed her from her job when they discovered she was pregnant. In accordance with the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Court imposed personal responsibility on both the branch director, and the regional director of the employee.

The Court also ordered that the ISS Company pay the employee approximately 300,000 NIS ($78,947), in compensation for dismissal, mental anguish, loss of earnings and loss of maternity allowance.

Benefits and cash payments

414. For an extensive reference to Maternity Benefits see Article 9 above.

415. A recent amendment to the Sick Pay Law (Absence from Work due to a Child's Sickness) 5753-1993, (18.3.2008) extended the number of days for which a single parent or a parent who has sole care of his child may receive sick pay, from 12 to 16 days leave to tend to a sick child (compared to the standard 8 days).

Equality

416. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

The right to an adequate standard of living

417. As detailed in Israel's previous reports, the right to an adequate standard of living is well recognized in the Israeli society and legal system, where the judiciary, executive and legislative branches are all committed to continued fulfillment thereof.

418. Many Government branches contribute to the advancement of the standard of living throughout the Israeli society, among which are the Ministries of Health, National Infrastructures, Industry, Trade and Labor and Social Affairs and Social Services. A prominent example for the State of Israel's adherence to provide an adequate standard of living can be found in the National Insurance Institute and its activity, which is designed to guarantee weak populations and families, that are in temporary or long term difficulties, a financial basis for adequate existence. The NII services, described in further detail under Article 9 above, are equally accessible to the different populations in the Israeli society.

419. The courts in Israel continue to play a central role in the protection of the right to an adequate standard of living. The issue of standard of living was addressed by the Supreme Court, residing as the High Court of Justice, in a petition filed by the Commitment to Peace and Social Justice Association – (H.C.J 366/03 The Commitment to Peace and Social Justice Association v. The Minister of Finance (12.12.05)). In its ruling, the Court emphasized that while Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty does entail an obligation of the State to ensure human dignity, it does not provide an absolute and total protection of social rights. In this regard however, the State is obligated to maintain a 'safety net' designed to ensure, that the condition of the underprivileged would not deteriorate to one of existential deprivation in the sense of a shortage in food, places of residency, sanitation, health-care services and such.

420. In 2007, the gross monthly income per household was 12,935 NIS ($3,495), which constitutes an actual increase of 4.2% compared to 2006. A 4% actual increase of the gross monthly income occurred regarding households headed by an employee, and a 2.7% actual increase regarding households headed by a self-employed person.

Poverty

422. The year 2000 witnessed a slight decline in the incidence of poverty in Israel. The percentage of families, whose net income (after transfer payments and direct taxes) was below the poverty line, fell from 17.8% in 1999 to 17.6% in 2000. In 2002 there was no change in the incidence of poverty. In 2003, following reductions in several national insurance (Social Security) benefits and a tax reform, the scope of poverty in Israel expanded. Further expansion occurred in 2004. The figures for 2006 as well as for the last survey conducted in 2007, indicate a slight decline in the rate of poor families in Israel (20% in 2006 and 19.9% in 2007). The poverty rate among individuals and among children also reduced – in 2007, 23.8% of the individuals were poor, in comparison to 24.5% in 2006. With regard to children – 34.2% lived in poverty in 2007, in comparison to 35.8% in 2006.

423. A reduction in poverty incidence among large families (at least 4 children) is also evident – 56.5% in 2007, compared to 60% in 2006. A similar reduction also occurred among Arab families which constitute a significant fraction of families of 4 or more children – 51.4% in 2007, in comparison to 54% in 2006. However, gaps remain in poverty incidents among the Jewish and the Arab populations.

424. In recent years, there has been an impressive growth in the Israeli economy and a significant recovery of the labor market in all its sectors. It is estimated that the growth in employment opportunities in the course of 2007, as well as the raising of the minimum wage in April 2007, and the raising of the Old-Age Pensions, are the main contributors to the reduction in poverty. These factors are also estimated to further assist in decreasing the incidence of poverty according to economic income, and to the stabilization or slight decline in the incidence of poverty according to net income.

425. As was set out in Israel's previous reports, data on the topic of poverty should be read in conjunction with the tables presenting the resources and their use, including GNP, GDP, per capita GNP and GDP, private consumption expenditure over the years as well as GNP by deciles. Such tables, as updated since the last report, are as follows:

The right to adequate food

426. Table 24 above reveals the distribution of households' expenditure. The data indicates that in 2006, 16.6% of households' consumption expenditure was utilized toward food acquisition.

427. In 2007, the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services established an Inter-ministerial Committee to examine the Government's role and responsibility for ensuring food security for its citizens. The Committee included representatives from various Ministries (Social Affairs and Social Services, Health, Finance, Education, Justice, ITL, Agriculture and Rural Development, and Pensioner's Affairs) as well as representatives of the National Insurance Institute. The Committee invited the public to participate in the process and many organizations submitted written positions and/or appeared before the committee. The committee also heard academic experts in relevant fields.

In March 2008, the Committee submitted its conclusions and recommendations. According to the committee, in 2006, 31% of families in Israel had to relinquish basic food ingredients in order to finance the purchase of other essential products and services, a slight decline in comparison to 34% in 2003. Among the Jewish population, 29% of the families had to relinquish basic food ingredients in comparison to 32.8% in 2003. Among the Arab population, 37.3% of the families had to relinquish basic food ingredients in comparison to 38.3% in 2003. However, the situation among the elderly and the Jewish Ultra-Orthodox population deteriorated. Data further indicated that incidence of food insecurity rises with the increase in the number of children in the family. While the situation has improved regarding families with up to three children, data reveals an increase in food insecurity rates among families with at least four children.

The Inter-Ministerial Committee examined the different measures adopted in Israel, as well as in different economies worldwide to enhance food security, such as nutrition services in schools, food pantries, public kitchens, family budget management educational campaigns, subsidy, transfer payments and financial support. According to the Committee, the State of Israel has always recognized its responsibility to care and provide assistance to those in need. The Government has carried out this responsibility through a policy of transfer payments and financial benefits to ensure sufficient income. The Government has preferred financial assistance policies over direct involvement in food provision, as have most Western economies, due to negative implications that often result from such involvement. Therefore, NGOs play a pivotal and significant role in nutritional assistance and food distribution in Israel, in the form of food pantries and public kitchens.

The Inter-Ministerial Committee's recommendations were as following:

1. Regulating the NGOs' activity towards food provision, both in times of emergency and peace, in order to better facilitate their activity, including the allocation of governmental funds.
2. The establishment of an Advisory Public Committee for Nutritional Security.
3. Re-evaluation of the transfer payments and benefits policy, and to consider establishing designated nutrition services.
4. Institutionalizing the collection of data relating to food security.

428. The Inter-Ministerial Committee's recommendations were not adopted by the Government, due to an objection of the Ministry of Finance. However, a joint team comprising representatives of the Ministries of Finance and Social Affairs and Social Services was established, and is currently working towards adapting and consolidating appropriate measures in order to facilitate the adoption and execution of the Committee's recommendations.

Prior to the consolidation of the Inter-ministerial Committee, the NGO "Latet" petitioned the High Court of Justice, requesting that the Court determine that the State is obligated to allocate funds for the construction and operation of a logistical infrastructure that will coordinate collection, procurement, and distribution of nutritional assistance. (H.C.J 1925/07 Latet Organization et. al. v. The Prime Minister et. al.) The petition was erased due to the publication of the Committee's recommendations and their adoption by the Government.

429. Developments regarding financial benefits, including income support are detailed under Article 9 above.

Methods of improvement of production, conservation and distribution of food

431. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

The right to adequate housing

432. On November 4, 2008 the Law of Execution was amended (Amendment no. 29) in order to strengthen the protection provided by the Law to the right to adequate housing. The Law stipulates that in situations of evictions due to debt, mortgage or pledge, the provision of an alternative housing prior to the eviction is obligatory.

According to the Law, the Registrar of the Execution Bureau, may not order the eviction of the indebted and his/her family members who reside with him/her, unless it is established that the indebted and his/her family either have a reasonable alternative housing, have the financial means to afford one or are provided with an alternative housing.

The protection provided by the Law also applies to evictions due to the carrying out of a mortgage or to the realization of a pledge. According to the Amendment, one can not waive the protection while pledging or mortgaging his/her property.

Sanitation facilities

434. As part of the abovementioned 2000 multi-year plan, extensive sewage infrastructure projects were completed in 73 Arab localities (affecting a total of 700,000 residents).

435. In February 4, 2007, the Government consolidated an additional multi-year plan to promote and assist in the construction and development of sewage infrastructure in Arab, Druze and Circassian localities, as well as Bedouin localities in the North (Government Resolution no. 1140). The multi-year plan is to be implemented in the years 2007–2011, and a total budget of 400 million NIS ($105 million) was allocated to that end. According to the Government Resolution, as a prerequisite for the implementation of the plan, the localities are required to establish Water and Sewage Corporations, as stipulated in the Water and Sewage Corporations Law 5761-2001. Progress has been made towards the establishment of Water and Sewage Corporations by the localities, however they have yet to be completed.

Public housing

437. On July 17, 2008, the Standard Contracts Tribunal ended a long legal dispute between “Amidar” – the national housing company, and its tenants, concerning the standard contract applied between them. The Court determined that several unfair conditions in the existing standard contract should be amended, and that the amended contract shall apply retroactively on similar contracts that have already been signed (St.Con.Trib 803/07 The Community Advocacy Association v. The Attorney General et. al.).

Street dwellers

438. The Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, defines a “street dwellers” as a person, man or women, who resides on the street, in an abandoned house or in public parks, suffers from severe physical and mental neglect, and is alienated and disassociated from family and friends. These people are characterized with instability in residence and mobility throughout the country, mostly lacking personal documentation. Some suffer from addiction to psychoactive substances (drugs and alcohol) and have a history of personal and family crises. Most of them are diagnosed as suffering from a dual prognosis – mental illness and addiction.

439. The Ministry's goal is firstly to prevent street dwellers' deaths and to provide them with adequate living conditions. The Ministry aims to assist the street dwellers in epitomizing their legal rights (social security benefits, personal documentation, etc.) and eventually achieve full re-integration into the community. In order to achieve these goals, the Ministry works in conjunction with local authorities and other relevant Ministries. In May 2004, the General Manager of the Ministry published an updated directive regarding treatment programs for street dwellers (replacing the 1997 directive) to all local authorities. These directives are updated occasionally as necessary.

440. In addition, the Government specifically designates budgets for the treatment of street dwellers, which are allocated to the local authorities, in order to encourage the development of programs for the treatment and integration of street dwellers at the local level, and in order to enhance the responsibility of the local authority for the street dwellers in its jurisdiction.

441. Fourteen local facilities are currently providing treatment for street dwellers, 2 of which opened during 2008. These facilities provide a range of treatment frameworks – over-night shelters, rehabilitation facilities with or without accommodations, and transitional housing apartments. In addition, 4 national facilities provide treatment for severe cases and for persons referred by municipalities that do not operate local treatment facilities. These include the "House for Life" program, which, as of 2007, offers a treatment framework for street dwellers who are unable to rehabilitate, and unable to live independently in the community.

442. During 2007, 1,737 street dwellers received treatment, 232 of them in the national facilities. The estimate is that some 1,000 street inhabitants do not receive any treatment, because of both their mobility and of their distrustful and reluctant approach towards the establishment.

443. In recent years, data regarding the treatment of "street dwellers" in Israel has been systematically collected. Statistically – 91% of the street inhabitants who receive treatment are males. 39% are single and 53% are divorced. 80% of the street dwellers receiving treatment are between the ages of 26–55. (56% are between the ages 36–55). 64% are new immigrants (mostly from the former Soviet Union). 45% suffer from alcoholism, 33% from drug addiction and 30% are addicted to both drugs and alcohol.

444. Forty-one per cent of those approaching the facilities were referred by the municipality hot-line, or special patrols arranged by the authorities along with a social worker. Another 10% were referred by medical facilities such as hospitals, etc. 29% were seeking treatment on their own initiative.

445. A significant decrease in the death rate of the street inhabitants is evident. In 2007, there were 28 reported incidents of street dwellers' deaths, in comparison to 79 in 2002.

Non-discrimination in housing

The Arab population

Representation in the National Council for Planning and Construction

446. The National Council for Planning and Construction (hereinafter: the "Council") comprises 32 members; third of which are representatives of Ministers (appointed by the Ministers), another third are representatives of municipal authorities (appointed by the Minister of the Interior), and the final third are public representatives (partially appointed by the Minister of the Interior).

The Ministry of the Interior, ensures a balanced representation of all communities, regions and populations, including the Arab population in the Council; in that regard, 4 of the 32 Council members are Arabs.

Planning Scheme for the Arab population

447. In recent years, the Department of Planning in the Ministry of the Interior, initiated an extensive project towards the preparation of updated planning schemes for the majority of Arab localities.

448. The objectives of the project are:

- Improvement of the quality of life in the localities, including a significant increase in dwelling areas, employment areas, open spaces, and public facilities as well as suitable infrastructure – in order to address the needs of the localities in the long run
- Regulation of the planning situation, in order to meet the needs of the localities and their integration in the surrounding area
- Providing a planning basis towards the integration of the minorities' localities in the social-economical development of the Israeli society in general

449. Seventy per cent of the Arab localities in Israel are included in the project (87 out of 128 localities). Most of the remaining localities have approved planning schemes, which adhere to their developmental needs. In some of these localities, the planning schemes are promoted by the local authorities themselves.

450. So far, 60 million NIS ($16.2 million) were allocated for the promotion of the planning project. It is notable, that in spite of wide-ranging cutbacks in the Ministries' budgets in the past few years, the budget allocated for this project has increased.

451. The project is supported by several Government Resolutions, and is based on the national planning policy as formed and adopted in the NOP 35 – the National Outline Plan for Construction, Development and Conservation. The national planning policy indicated new development trends for localities as well as diverse density rules based on the size of the locality, its social and economical status and its demography.

452. The planning schemes implement several fundamental principles:

- Solutions for anticipated population growth
- Designation of public areas for public institutions, green areas and infrastructure layout
- Designation of State's land to construction for the benefit of the homeless and for the fulfillment of public needs
- Development of regional or joint employment areas in order to enhance the incomes of the local authorities
- Creation of a framework of regional solutions in a variety of fields such as environmental protection, public transportation, burial, etc.
- Suitability to the special needs of the different populations and the uniqueness of each locality (for example: land ownership, preservation of the rural or urban character, preservation of traditions and religious values, commerce and occupation according to the needs of the locality, etc.)

- Creation of joint employment areas for the Jewish and Arab local authorities in order to promote the economical integration of the Arab localities, and in order to increase the income of both Jewish and Arab local authorities

453. Each plan is promoted by a professional planning panel, hired by the Department of Planning and accompanied by a broad steering committee, headed by representatives from the Department. Each committee includes representatives from the local authority, the relevant Ministries and the neighboring local authorities, the Jewish National Fund (Keren Kayemeth Le'Israel), the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel, and Israel Nature and National Parks Protection Authority.

454. Stemming from the appreciation of the importance of the community's involvement in the decision making processes affecting its daily life and the nature of its place of residence, a special emphasis is placed on the participation of the local community in the planning process.

455. In addition to the full participation of the local leadership, the effort to include the local community in the planning process is carried out through diverse methods according to the character of the locality and its social structure. These include focus groups, distribution of questionnaires, open assemblies to present the plan and receive comments, etc.

456. The success of the planning project depends, first and foremost, on the assumption of responsibility by the local leadership, by supporting the project, promotion of detailed planning in compatibility with the planning scheme, executing expropriation for public purposes, collection of fees and development taxes and law enforcement against illegal construction. The Department of Planning in the Ministry of the Interior is doing its utmost in order to achieve the improvement needed for all fractions of the Arab population in Israel.

457. Notice should be given to the fact that most of the Arab localities have a planning scheme, even if not an updated one, initiated back at the 1980's by the Government.

A new Arab city

458. The Department of Planning recently began background work in order to examine the possibility of creating a modern city for the Arab population in Israel. Aimed towards the broadening of the possibilities and mobility of the population, creating value and merchantability for the land, stimulating the creation of a social-economical middle-class and to strengthening the financial, social and cultural resources.

Allocation of financial benefits

459. In H.C.J. 2101/99 Shibli and ACRI v. The Minister of Construction and Housing (21.04.02), Israel's Supreme Court examined the method of allocating rental benefits. The State noted a recent change to its allocation policy that would remove any distinctions with regard to benefit allocations. Basically, the determining factor is linked to the number of residents and the percentage of housing used for rental properties. The complainant nevertheless claimed that the State's policy was discriminatory in result because most Arab towns were small and thus not entitled to such benefits. The Court held in April 2002, that the Government should be given the opportunity to implement the new program to adequately determine whether it is discriminatory in result.

460. Another notable case concerning rental benefits was presented to the Be'er Sheva Administrative Court (A.C.A. 335/04 Vered Pinhasi v. The State of Israel, (22.11.04)). The claimant was married to a non-citizen Palestinian with 5 children and in dire need of rental assistance. The State denied such benefits because she was married to a non-citizen. The Court held that such a basis was incorrect and contrary to the interests of justice and fairness, such that the claimant and her family should not be denied such assistance.

461. On December 13, 2006, the Supreme Court rejected a petition filed by Adalah against the Ministry of Construction and Housing, challenging the governmental policy of providing financial support — in the form of low-interest governmental loans — for home mortgages to Israeli citizens who have completed their military or national-service. The petitioners argued that the extended support for housing mortgage loans discriminates against Arab citizens of Israel, who are not required to perform military or national-service. The petitioners contended that the performance of military service is irrelevant to the purpose of supplemental governmental housing support, which is to assist the socio-economically disadvantaged to find housing solutions.

Here, the Court held that there is no impediment in principle to granting benefits to those who have completed full military and national-service above that which is afforded in the Absorption of Discharged Soldiers Law 5754-1994 (the “Absorption of Discharged Soldiers Law”), provided that the use of the military service criterion is justified in the circumstances.

The former president of the Supreme Court, Justice Barak, rejected Adalah’s argument that in this case the use of this criterion results in discrimination against Arab citizens. Barak reasoned in this regard that “a distinction made on the basis of the national or military service criterion is not necessarily a permissible distinction or illegal discrimination: this depends on the circumstances. Those who have completed military or national service differ in many respects, as a group, from those who did not. Thus, for example, those who have completed military or national service dedicate much of their time and energy for the benefit of the general public. They cannot work or make a living during their service period. As long as this distinction is based on these factors, and as long as it is relevant in a given situation, it should not be considered illegal discrimination.”

462. Adalah’s motion for an additional hearing before an expanded panel of Supreme Court Justices in order to re-consider the decision was rejected (H.C.J. 11956/05, Suhad Bishara, et. al. v. The Ministry of Construction and Housing).

463. On June 17, 2008, the Absorption of Discharged Soldiers Law was amended, stipulating that recognized higher education, vocational training or academic preparatory institutions, may consider military service among the considerations in determining entitlement to dormitories or other financial benefits.

Dwellings in Jerusalem

464. In 2007, 283 building applications, which make up 12% of the total number of applications, were received from residents of the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. Of the 283 applications, 135 (47%) were granted. Residents in the western parts of Jerusalem submitted 2,095 applications, of which 1,505 (71%) were granted.

465. Illegal construction. In the western parts of Jerusalem, building violations almost invariably consist of additions to a legal building, such as the addition of a room in courtyard or an attic within a roof space. In the eastern part of Jerusalem, violations typically take the form of entire buildings constructed without a permit. Thus, demolitions in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem are far more dramatic than in the western part of the city. All demolitions are conducted with due process and are subject to judicial review.

The Bedouin population in the south

466. Currently, approximately 115,000 Bedouins (65% of the total Bedouin population) live in urban and suburban centers which have been legally planned and constructed. All existing towns have approved plans and include infrastructure such as schools, clinics, running water, electricity, etc.

467. There are six (6) existing suburban Bedouin towns in the Negev: Laqiya, Hura, Kseife, Arara in the Negev, Tel-Sheva and Segev Shalom, in addition to the city of Rahat. Although the seven existing towns can effectively provide a proper solution to the Bedouin population's needs, subject to their expansion, the Government decided that another nine (9) new towns for Bedouins should be established. The Government did so based on the desire to please the Bedouin population and in consideration of their special needs, including their desire to settle according to a tribal format.

468. Consequently, there are nine (9) new planned towns. Of those Tarabin is now being populated and 100 new houses have been built, Abu Krinat and Bir Hadaj are under construction, and Kasar A-Sir, Marit (Makhol), Darjat, Um Batin, Mulada and El Seid are all undergoing planning procedures. Further three towns are undergoing statutory approval procedures: Ovdad, Abu Tlul, and El-Foraa. A regional municipality was founded for nine of the new towns. It is called "Abu Basma", and was officially established on February 3, 2004.

469. Since its establishment, the Abu Basma regional municipality invested significant efforts and resources in ameliorating infrastructure in its jurisdiction, including roads, sanitation and water infrastructure. The regional council also promoted the construction of educational facilities, community centers, leisure facilities and other service provision facilities. The Abu-Basma Regional Council also initiates projects in areas of education, welfare and employment.

470. In two different resolutions made in 2003 (April and September), the Government created a comprehensive plan for the Bedouins, including investments of 1.1 billion NIS ($297,297,297) in the improvement of infrastructure, and founding public institutions over the next 6 years.

471. Following lessons learned from past planning committees, the planning authorities performed this task in constant consultation with Bedouin representatives who provided input as to their vision of every town's desired character depending on such characteristics as whether the town is built for an agrarian population with a special needs for designated flocking areas; whether the town is planned for a group that requires strict separation to be maintained between the various tribes or whether the town is designed for a population that has a more urban character.

472. On July 15, 2007, the Government concluded the following resolution concerning the establishment of a new Authority in the Ministry of Construction and Housing dealing entirely with development for the Bedouin population, including the expansion of towns, and provision of housing solutions for all Bedouins. Its text is as follows:

“D. The Government decided to establish, in the Ministry of Construction and Housing, the Authority for the Regulation of the Bedouin Residence in the Negev, whose purpose, functions and organizational structure are as follows:

- The care of Bedouin residence in the Negev, including:
 - Ascertaining claims of ownership over the land
 - Arranging permanent residences, including infrastructure and public services, both in existing towns and new towns
 - Aid in incorporation in employment
 - Coordination of education, welfare and community services
- The functions of the authority and its main powers:
 1. Accumulating information concerning the existing situation of the population, whether scattered or located in existing towns, including claims of ownership.
 2. Initiation and execution of land arrangements.
 3. Initiation of statutory planning, in coordination with the Planning Administration in the Ministry of the Interior, of suitable residence solutions, including solutions that address the characteristics of the group, social reciprocation, possible locations, etc.
 4. Promoting the planning and development of local and regional infrastructure for permanent solutions.
 5. Accompanying the population through all the stages of residence.
 6. Giving recommendations on the issue of enforcement priorities.
 7. Coordination and synchronization between the various authorities, while accompanying, tracking and supervising the execution of decisions made by authorities.
 8. The aforementioned functions of the Authority will not detract from the powers of the various Government Ministries, or the powers of the local authorities according to the law.
- The proposed organizational structure of the Authority is designed to enable the efficient execution of all its goals and functions, as follows:
 1. The Authority will act within the framework of the Ministry of Construction and Housing.
 2. Alongside the Authority, an Inter-Ministerial steering committee will be established; whose function will be to discuss the obstructions in the way of arranging the residence and implementing the goals of the Authority. At the head of the steering committee will be the General Director of the Ministry of Construction and Housing.
 3. A council will be appointed to the Authority, whose functions will be to lay out the Authority's line of action and advise the General Manager of the Authority in all that regards the execution of the Authority's policy. The council will be composed of 21 members, among them: 14 relevant Government representatives, (Construction and Housing – chairman, Finance, Justice, Education, the Interior, Industry, Trade and Labor, Health, Social Affairs and Social Services, Tourism, the Negev, the Galilee, Public Security, Agriculture and Rural Development, Environmental Protection and Transportation and Road Safety), and 7 public representatives who will be appointed by the Minister of Construction and Housing. Of the 7 public representatives, 4 will be from the Negev Bedouin and will have no ownership claims to the land.

4. The operational responsibility of the Authority will be in the hands of the Authority's General Manager. Underneath him will operate various sections, whose areas of occupation will be, inter alia, land transactions; programs and residence; planning, development and construction; community; legal counseling; finances and logistics and research, propaganda and documentation. The land transaction section will be subject, statutorily, to the authority of the Israel Land Administration.

5. A concessions and proceeds committee will act, alongside the General Manager of the Authority. The Committee will be headed by a retired judge, and its function will be to make recommendations concerning agreements brought before it, on the basis of the standards set out in the law. The recommendations of the committee will be submitted for approval by the Authority's general manager."

473. The Government has further decided:

1. To request the General Director of the Ministry of Construction and Housing to make recommendations to the Government, within 30 days, and in coordination with the General Director of the Prime Minister's Office and the Supervisor of Budgets in the Ministry of Finance and the Civil Service Commissioner, on the kind of budgetary resources and personnel that are required to finance and otherwise execute this decision.

2. To entrust the Minister of Construction and Housing with the appointment of a public committee headed by a retired Supreme Court Justice, and of whose members, at least half will be representatives of the relevant Government Ministries, including representatives of the Ministries of Construction and Housing, Finance, the Prime Minister, Agriculture and Rural Development, the Negev and the Galilee, the Interior, Justice, the Transportation and Road Safety, and the Israel Land Administration. In addition to this the Minister will appoint public representatives, among them representatives of the Bedouin population that have no ownership claims to land. The committee will submit its recommendations to the Minister in order to draft a bill concerning the regulation of the Bedouin population in the Negev, including the sum of the reparations required, arrangements for allocating alternative land, civil enforcement and a schedule of the execution of arrangements. The committee will submit its recommendations within three months. The committee will act under the framework of a budget and land inventory that it will determine in coordination with the General Director of the Prime Minister's Office, the General Director of the Ministry of Construction and Housing and the Supervisor of Budgets in the Ministry of Finance, within 30 days.

Within the framework of Government policy regarding Bedouin residence and land in the Negev, and as an important step integrating other Government plans for the development of the Negev and the Galilee, the Government has promoted various resolutions enhancing the treatment of the Bedouin population in the Negev.

Nonetheless, owing to the complexity of designing solutions for various issues, and the prolongation of the treatment in the availability of the land in the area of permanent towns, which are designed to receive the Bedouin population living in the illegal clusters, there is a need to coordinate the totality of the plans within the organized framework of an authority, which will deal with the issues in a coordinated and expansive manner.

474. In spite of the establishment of a number of permanent towns for the Bedouins, about 63,000 Bedouins (35%) still choose to live in illegal clusters of buildings throughout the Negev, ignoring the planning procedure of the planning authorities in Israel. This illegal building is carried out without any preparation of plans as required by the Planning and Building Law, 5725-1965, and with no pre-approval by the planning authorities. In addition, it causes many difficulties in terms of providing services to the residents of these illegal villages.

475. Note that a solution to the housing problem of the greater part of the Bedouins living in the illegal villages will be achieved subsequent to the completion of the nine new towns.

476. The Government is encouraging movement to permanent towns by providing unique financial benefits to all the residents of the Bedouin Diaspora who seek to move to permanent towns, regardless of their economic condition or any entitlement test. These benefits include, inter alia, provision of land plots for free or for very low cost, and compensation for demolition of illegal structures.

477. The Advisory Committee on the Policy regarding Bedouin towns has been established, in its present form, on October 24, 2007, based on Government Resolution no. 2491. The Advisory Committee's task is to present recommendations regarding a comprehensive, feasible and broad-spectrum plan which will establish the norms for regulating Bedouin housing in the Negev, including rules for compensation, mechanisms for allotment of land, civil enforcement, a timetable for the plan's execution, and proposed legislation's amendments, where needed.

478. The Advisory Committee comprises seven members and one chairperson, former Supreme Court Justice Mr. E. Goldberg. Note that two of the Advisory Committee members are Bedouin representatives.

479. The Advisory Committee began its sessions in January 2008, after having received over a hundred letters from the public, together with numerous other written materials and documentation. The Advisory Committee's hearings were public and took place in Beer Sheva.

480. The Advisory Committee has held tens of sessions and has heard many depositions from various sources, including Bedouin representatives, various stakeholders, experts in the relevant fields (inter alia, town planners, geographers, anthropologists, historians, sociologists and lawyers), and the general public. The Advisory Committee has also heard representatives of public bodies and institutions, including Municipal Authorities, public figures, Knesset members, and NGOs.

481. The Advisory Committee has held four field study trips in the Negev region in order to further deepen its knowledge on the subjects within its mandate.

482. The Advisory Committee has concluded its public discussions in May 2008, and on December 11, 2008, submitted its final recommendations to the Government.

483. Spraying of Crops in the Negev. In its concluding observations concerning Israel's second periodic report, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights expressed its concern regarding claimed destruction of Bedouin agricultural crops, "in order to force them to resettle in 'townships'". In this regard it should be mentioned that in on April 15, 2007, the Supreme Court issued its decision, regarding a petition concerning spraying operations in the Negev, performed by the Israel Lands Administration (ILA) (H.C.J. 2887/04 Saleem Abu Medeghem, et. al. v. Israel Lands Administration, et. al.). In its decision, the Court mentioned, inter alia, to the Committee's concluding observations.

The Court affirmed the State's right to prevent illegal invasion of State-owned land. However, the Court held that the method of spraying crops is not consistent with the law.

Justice Joubran held that despite the fact that the State has a right to prevent unlawful invasion to State-owned land, the actions of the State are illegal as they did not receive the proper authorization according to the law, and constitutes violation of the Bedouin right to health. Justices Arbel and Naor determined that the State acted within its authority. However, the measure used, aerial spraying of the crops, is not consistent with the proportionality principle anchored in the limitation clause in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, since it violates the right to human dignity of the Bedouin population as not in all of the aerial spraying incidents, they received proper notice in advance of the intention to spray their crops, and as it might have caused actual damage to their health and physical integrity.

484. The Electricity Supply Law (Temporary Order) 5756-1996, was enacted to solve the problem of providing electricity to Arab and Druze citizens whose houses had been built without building permits, and were consequently not connected to the central electricity grid. This Law was amended in 2001, extending the temporary supply for a period of 7 years. In 2004, the Law was amended again, so that the extension would cease as of May 31, 2007. Since the enactment of the Law and up until May 31, 2007, the Electricity Administration approved linking 8,941 buildings to the electricity grid.

485. Public Transportation. On July 19, 2007, the Ministry of Transport and Road Safety published a tender for the operation of 10 lines of public bus transportation to serve more than 60,000 residents in the region of the Bedouin town Rahat. The tender was published in the framework of the Ministry's plan to expand public transportation services in Bedouin towns to equalize them with those in Jewish towns, as Bedouin towns currently lack an organized system of public transportation.

According to the tender, 4 city lines will operate in Rahat, and another 4 inter-city lines will connect Rahat with the city of Beer-Sheva and the new train station recently opened in Lehavim-Rahat. Another 2 lines will connect the towns of Hura and Laqiya with the Bedouin market in Rahat. The plans for the new lines were carried out following surveys conducted that determined the needs of local residents. Local residents also participated in special workshops on the issue.

The winning company will be obliged to sell reduced tickets to youths, the elderly and other eligible persons such as students. The company will also be obliged to issue a monthly ticket allowing unlimited travel on all bus lines in the Beer-Sheva metropolis. In addition, the winning company will be obliged to use new buses, and keep high standards of service. The tender was completed, and is currently awaiting a final decision concerning the winning company.

486. Social Services. In May 2004, the Center for the Welfare of the Bedouin Family was established in Beer Sheva by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. The Center has two main goals:

486.1 To provide assistance to the Bedouin community in matters related to conflict and tension resolution in the family, as well as to provide therapeutic interventions.

486.2 A center for the prevention of, and education on, domestic violence.

The center is financed and supervised by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services and is operated by the Bedouin association of "Elwaha" which is manned by specialized social workers.

The center provides many uniquely adapted services. For example assistance is given in locating Bedouin families willing to take in female Bedouin victims of violence, allowing those women to remain within the Bedouin community whilst protecting them from further violence. These women stay in the foster family are financed by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. Following its establishment, the center has become an integral part of the community, and an essential tool at the disposal of the courts which may refer battering men to be treated in the center.

487. Social Services operate in the Bedouin towns, as well as in illegal Bedouin villages. There are around 30 monthly appeals to Social Services from Bedouin women. Each receives individual care. There are also several Bedouin couples undergoing couple therapy. Note that the operation of the abovementioned center has improved the treatment of domestic violence in the Bedouin population, enabling matter-of-fact, focused and efficient care to be provided, free from community and family pressures.

488. In 2008, the Service for Girls and Young Women handles about 380 young Bedouin women annually, 300 in the south and 80 in the north providing both individual and group treatment.

Planning – the Bedouin population in the north

489. Updated plans for all Bedouin localities in the north, are either already available or in process of planning (by the Ministry of the Interior or by local and governmental authorities).

490. Furthermore, the Department of Planning in the Ministry of the Interior promotes detailed plans to the unification and distribution of the Bedouin towns in the north – the first step includes six localities and is allocated a budget of 4 million NIS ($1,052,631).

The right to the highest attainable standard of health

494. The Right to a Dignified Death. On December 6, 2005, the Knesset enacted the Terminally Ill Patient Law, which provides an answer to the medical-ethical dilemma present in the treatment of terminally-ill patients. The Law is based on the recommendations of a public committee appointed by the Minister of Health in 2000. The Committee consisted of 59 members representing different related areas relevant to the issue, such as: medicine, nursing, social work, religion, philosophy, law and ethics. The Law is based on the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State, and attempts to create a balance between the values of sanctity of life, quality of life and respect for a person's autonomous will.

495. The Law presumes that every person has the will to carry on living, unless it is proven otherwise. Furthermore, in case of any doubt, the will to live shall be preferred (section 4a). One shall not avoid granting medical treatment to a terminally ill patient unless it is clear, according to specific conditions, that the patient has no will to continue living (section 4b). If the terminally ill patient has “capacity”, meaning that he is more than 17 years old, can express his/her will, was not declared incapacitated, or excluded from this status due to a documented and justified medical decision, then any decision concerning his/her medical treatment shall be subject to his/her implicit will. If the terminally ill patient does not have “capacity”, any decision concerning his/her medical treatment shall follow his/her preliminary instructions, the instructions of an empowered person or a decision of an “institutional committee” as defined below. If there are no such instructions or decisions, a decision whether to avoid granting medical treatment to the terminally ill patient will be made by the responsible physician, having had consideration of an implicit testimony from the patient’s relative, and in the absence of such relative, considering the position of the patient’s guardian (section 4b (1) and (2)).

496. The Law states that a terminally ill patient’s will to not have his/her life extended shall be respected, and that providing him with medical treatment is to be avoided (section 8). Nevertheless, it shall be clarified that the Law does not allow committing an act, including a medical act, which is intentionally directed to cause the terminally ill patient’s death, or which will certainly result in death, even if committed from means of grace and compassion (section 12). In addition, assisting the patient to commit suicide or stopping a consecutive medical treatment are both prohibited (sections 13 and 14a accordingly). However, it is permitted to avoid the innovation of a consecutive medical treatment which has been terminated only due to medical reasons, or the innovation of a cyclic medical treatment (section 14b).

497. The Terminally Ill Patient Law contains different provisions constituting the manner and procedure in which a person can express, in advance, his/her will concerning his/her medical treatment in the event that he becomes terminally ill. In addition, the Law states that every medical institution will appoint, in consultation with a state committee, institutional committees which are to determine in cases of conflict or if there is any doubt as to how to treat the terminally ill patient. These committees will consist of four physicians, a nurse, a social worker or a clinical psychologist, an academic specializing in philosophy or ethics, a jurist qualified to be appointed as a district judge and a public representative or religious personality.

498. In 2007, the national expenditure on health was 7.9% of the GDP, similar to the national expenditure in 2006. 36% of the national expenditure was financed by households, and 37% by Government budget.

499. In a survey conducted by the Ministry of Health during 2003-2004, the following results were received (the rates are per 100 residents): 53.1% of Israeli women and 57.3% of Israeli men assessed their general health, including their physical and mental health as very good or excellent. In the Jewish population, 55.2 % of the women and 59.1% of the men assessed their health as very good or excellent, compared to 53% of the women and 54.9% of the men in the Arab population.

500. Regarding smoking, 18.6% of the women, and 36.1% of the men reported that they smoked cigarettes, at least once a day. Among the Jewish population 19.8% of the women and 32.1% of the men reported that they smoke, compared to 4.6% of the women and 55.2% of the men in the Arab population. Regarding their Body Mass Index (BMI), 13.9% of the men and 15.7% of the women reported of BMI of 30 or more, based on self reported weight and height.

Quality measures program

501. The National Health Insurance Law provides for the creation of research and evaluation organizations (the Health Council, the Israel Institute for Health Policy and Health Services Research), in order to oversee and assess the effect of the Law on the quality, effectiveness and cost of health services in Israel. Within this context, it became necessary to create a system of indicators for community health care in Israel, which would enable ongoing evaluation of the level of treatment relative to national and international indicators.

502. The Quality Indicators of Community Health Care Program was initiated by researchers at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, in conjunction with the four Israeli health funds (HMOs), and with the support of the Israel Medical Association and the sponsorship of the Israel Institute for Health Policy and Health Services Research. In March 2004, the Ministry of Health declared this activity to be a national program, and it is led by a steering committee made up of all the participating organizations.

503. The main objectives of the National Program are to improve the quality of community health care in Israel by ongoing measurement of performance, and to provide information to the public and to policymakers regarding the quality of health services in Israel. The program allows routine and dynamic quality assessment of the preventive, diagnostic, therapeutic and rehabilitative services supplied by the health funds.

504. To date, 69 indicators have been developed in six main medical fields and are regularly measured throughout the Israeli population. This ongoing scientific infrastructure assists in national prioritizing during policy making and induces quality improvement. The information is also available and open to the general public, inviting them to assess the quality of services in Israel and consume them in an informed and responsible way.

505. The annual National Quality Indicators for Community Health Care Report was first published in 2004. The current report (2008) presents data for 2005-2007. The data presented in the 2008 report relates to six fields of community health care – flu vaccination, screening for detection of colorectal cancer and mammography for detection of breast cancer, asthma treatment, treatment of diabetes, treatment of children and cardiology treatment. According to the Report, continued improvement has been recorded in most of the indicators examined. National performance was rated as high for most indicators, also when compared to international standards. The annual reports are available on the NIHP website: <http://www.israelhpr.org.il>.

Infant Mortality

506. The trend in infant mortality rate, per 1,000 live births, has been as follows:

507. Recent statistics indicate continuance decrease in infant mortality rates, from 4.6 deaths per 1000 live births in 2004, to 3.9 in 2007. Among Jewish and Christian newborns, the infant mortality rate fell even furthermore to 2.9 and 2.8 deaths for every 1,000 live births, respectively. A large part of the decrease in infant mortality rates is due to the decrease in mortality caused by infectious diseases, decrease in prenatal mortality and pneumonia. Death from congenital disorders is also showing a downward trend.

508. Among the Muslim population, despite the continuing decrease, the child mortality rate is still relatively high and stands at a rate of 7.2 deaths per every 1,000 live births. The gap between the communities stems from a number of factors, among them the high rate of consanguineous marriage – approximately 35% in the Arab population and approximately 60% in the Bedouin population, religious prohibition against abortion even in medically recommended cases, as well as socio economic differences.

Life expectancy

510. In 2007, life expectancy for Israeli women was 82.5 years, and for Israeli men – 78.8 years. Elderly people (65+) comprise 9.8% of the population as of 2006 (only 3.3% among the Arab population). In 2006, persons over 65 made up 11.2% of the female population, compared to 8.5% of the male population.

Access to trained personnel

512. Medical clinics for the treatment of common diseases and injuries exist in each locality consisting of more than 100-150 residents. In addition, as prescribed by the National Health Insurance Law detailed in Israel's previous reports, every Israeli resident is entitled to health insurance, including extensive medical treatment and medicine provision.

513. Health care is also accessible to foreign workers, who are entitled to medical insurance, as detailed under Article 6 above. Moreover, children of illegal migrant workers, are also entitled to medical insurance provided by Israeli Health Funds.

514. In 2006, the number of physicians in Israel was 25,138 (37 per 10,000 residents) and the numbers of nurses and midwives was 42,609 (62 per 10,000 residents), constituting a ratio of 1.7 nurses and midwives to physicians. Moreover, the number of pharmaceutical personnel was 4,958 (7 per 10,000 residents), and the number of dentists was 7,726 (11 per 10,000 residents). The rate of hospital beds in 2006 was 60 per 10,000 residents.

515. Mention should be made to a study initiated by the Ministry of Health, which indicated lessened access to medical personnel in peripheral areas in the northern and southern parts of the country. Other than the general shortage in medical personnel, one of the major hindrances is the great difficulty in recruiting medical personnel to reside and serve in these remote areas of the country. The Ministry of Health devotes significant efforts, including financial incentives, and assistance in housing and spousal employment opportunities, towards encouraging medical personnel to relocate to these areas, yet thus far the problem still remains.

516. Ninety-nine per cent of childbirths take place in hospitals, under trained personnel supervision. In December 2005, the Population Registry Law 5725-1965, was amended for the regulation of births occurring outside of a medical institution. Women who give birth at home or on the way to the hospital are entitled to comprehensive post-natal care in the hospital for themselves and their infants.

517. The maternal mortality rate has remained low. In 2006, there were only 9 cases of maternal mortality.

Environmental control

518. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Water Supply

Water supply to the Bedouin illegal villages

520. As detailed above in this report, most of the Bedouins in the Negev live in urban and suburban centers, all of which have approved plans and provide all necessary infrastructures including running water supply. The remaining Bedouin population reside in illegal villages, these illegal villages cause difficulties in terms of supplying the residents with the necessary services, especially water.

521. While the Government does not question its duty to supply its inhabitants with services such as water, it is practically impossible to supply it to sporadic destinations disregarding the national construction and planning programs. Nevertheless, in anticipation of the completion of the establishment of additional permanent Bedouin towns and the regulation of water supply systems, the Ministerial Committee for the Arab Population has decided to build "Water Centers". Following that decision, instructions have been given concerning the planning of water supply systems to several centers in the Negev called "Water Centers". The Water Centers are a result of the Government's understanding of the needs and current realities of the Bedouin population and its efforts to improve their living conditions. The planning of the centers take into account an amount of water suitable for the magnitude of population expected in 2020. These systems will enable to supply water to a significantly larger portion of the Bedouin population, than the portion receiving water supply today through individual connections. There are currently 5 Water Centers, which are located in the most populated areas of the Bedouin Diaspora, compatible to Government's plans for the establishment of permanent towns.

522. An additional method used, is through direct water connections to the main water pipeline, granted to a minimum of 10 families. Due to the problematic nature of these connections, which require the transfer of the water to illegal villages, this method is less frequently used than previously. The connection to such pipelines is approved by the Water Committee, which evaluates requests for connections to pipelines, as well as negotiates in cases of disputes between residents of the Diaspora over ownerships of such connections. Between 2001 and 2006, the Water Committee convened 16 times and examined 306 requests to be connected to pipelines and for settlement of disputes. It should be explained, that rejection of requests for connections is mostly due to technical grounds which prevent the possibility to make such connections (such as topographic difficulties, etc.). Also, according to “Mekorot” — the Israel National Water Corporation — numerous pirate connections to pipelines are present without the authorization of the water committee.

Vulnerable groups

523. As detailed in Israel’s previous periodic report, the National Health Insurance Law, has had an apparent positive effect on the provision of health care to vulnerable groups in the Israeli.

524. The required co-payments, detailed in Israel’s previous periodic report, are limited by Law. The maximal rates were recently updated. Moreover, in order to avoid harming the most vulnerable groups, the co-payment requirement is subject to further limitations, including exemption and reduction for specific vulnerable groups, such as people with disabilities, elderly persons with low socio-economic status and persons with certain chronic diseases. However, the co-payment requirements are under constant critique.

525. In a position paper published in July 2008, by ‘ADVA Centre’ and ‘Physicians for Human Rights – Israel’ titled “Co-Payments for Health Services: Agreeing but not Doing”, the two NGOs claim that co-payments for prescription medications and medical examinations expand the inequality regarding accessibility to health services. The NGOs recommend the cancellation of participation payments for prescription medications and medical services, and offer alternative ways to expand the financial sources as an alternative to the cancellation of the abovementioned payments.

526. According to another position paper published by ‘Physicians for Human Right – Israel’, in May 2008, titled “Inequality in distribution of special medical instruments throughout Israel”, the peripheral areas are discriminated against when compared to the centre of Israel. The Paper further states that the Ministry of Health deviates from the regulation regarding distribution of special medical instruments and does not enforce its own regulation by allowing the positioning of additional medical instruments in Tel-Aviv.

Health care in the Arab population

527. In 2005, a report regarding the health condition of the Arab population in Israel was published by the I.C.D.C. – Israeli Center for Disease Control. The report demonstrates positive changes of the health conditions of the Arab population. According to the report, infant death rate decreased, as did the death rate due to heart and vascular diseases. The rate of the population’s vaccination coverage had increased and so did the use of mammography for early detection of breast cancer.

528. According to the report, there is a noticeable improvement in the level of health-care services and accessibility to these services among the Arab population. As of 2005, at least one primary medical clinic and at least one family health-care station provide services in each Arab locality.

529. The report reveals an increase in illnesses such as diabetes and obesity, especially among older Arab women. An additional increase is found in the numbers of malignant Neoplasms (note that except lung cancer, the rates of malignant Neoplasms among the Arab population is lower than that of the Jewish population).

The Bedouin population in the south

530. As noted above, all existing Bedouin towns have approved plans and include infrastructure such as medical clinics, running water, electricity, etc. The cost of a visit to the clinic is identical throughout the country. That is, a visit will generally be free.

531. The General Health Services Department operates a special health service for the Bedouin population that includes an ambulance service for Bedouins, run by a Bedouin employee. This ambulance ensures constant access between the hospital and the community. This enables a talented professional staff to evaluate the living conditions of patients prior to their release from hospitalization. Additionally, the ambulance transports patients to the hospital and back when they are in need of emergency care.

532. In addition to eighteen Mother and Child Health Clinics located in Bedouin towns, and a mobile family care unit, six new Mother and Child Health Clinics (Tipat Halav), have recently been constructed in the illegal villages. These Mother and Child Health Clinics are equipped like every other Mother and Child Health Clinic in the country.

533. Furthermore, in addition to the thirty-two Health Fund medical clinics already existing in the Bedouin towns, 9 Health Fund medical clinics have been built to provide for the medical needs of Bedouins living in illegal villages. The clinics are all computerized, air conditioned, and they are fully equipped according to the standards upheld by all the Health Funds in the country.

534. There have been other major improvements in the past decade. Improved immunization coverage of Bedouin infants in the Negev, for example, resulted in a significant decrease in vaccine-preventable infectious diseases. Recent 2006 figures indicate that 90%-95% of the Bedouin children have completed all necessary vaccinations by age three – a sizeable improvement compared to a rate of 27% in 1981. Two mobile immunization teams managed by the Ministry of Health also provide home immunizations to infants in Bedouin families living outside of permanent towns, whose families do not bring them to one of the Mother and Child Health Clinics for treatment. A computerized tracking system allows the Ministry of Health to identify infants who are overdue on their immunization schedule and to send one of the mobile immunization teams to immunize them.

535. There has also been an important improvement in the growth of Bedouin infants and toddlers over the past two decades, indicating improved nutrition. Moreover, there has been increased compliance with recommendations for supplemental folic acid among Bedouin women in their fertile years, and a decrease in the incidence of open neural tube defects (NTDs) among Bedouin fetuses and infants. Unfortunately there are still high rates of congenital malformations and inherited diseases among Bedouin infants, due to multiple factors including the tradition of consanguineous marriage, as well as cultural-religious-social barriers to pre-marital and pre-natal screening for inherited diseases.

536. The infant mortality rate of Bedouin infants in 2005 was 15:1000, representing a decline from the rate in 2004. It should be noted that the infant mortality rate among Bedouin infants living in illegal villages was essentially lower than that among Bedouin infants living in permanent towns. The Government is continuing to open Maternal and Child Health clinics in illegal villages and new MCH centers are being built to serve the population.

537. Furthermore, the Government has been funding several special projects to improve the health and expand the health-care services provided to Bedouins living in illegal villages. One of these programs is a special long-term intervention program to decrease infant mortality among the Bedouins. The program is community-based and boasts a wide-consortium of participants, including representatives from the Bedouin community leadership and the educational system, along with providers of curative and preventative health-care services, the Department of Health in the Community and the Department of Epidemiology of the Faculty of Health Sciences of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

538. Free genetic testing and counseling is also funded by the Government, for any member of a tribe in which the prevalence of a serious inherited disease, for which a genetic test is available, is above 1:1000.

539. The Government also participates in an intervention program to decrease the rate of home accidents among Bedouin children, and has funded the building of additional MCH clinics for Bedouins currently living in illegal villages (additional clinics are being built by the main HMO serving the Bedouins).

540. There has been a decline in the incidence of infectious disease among Bedouin infants over the past decades. Bedouin infants and children have lower rates of pertussis, tuberculosis and HIV infection. Furthermore, due to high immunization coverage among Bedouin infants, indicating good access and utilization of preventive health-care services, there have been no cases of the measles since 1994 and no cases of poliomyelitis, diphtheria, congenital rubella, neonatal tetanus or tetanus in Bedouin children of the Negev since 1990. During the period of 2000–2003, no cases of the mumps were reported. Only one or two cases of Homophiles influenza invasive disease between 2000 and 2002, and none were reported in 2003. There is, however, generally a higher rate of infectious disease among Bedouin infants than among Jewish infants of the same age.

541. Specialty physician services are being provided to the Bedouin community in the Negev, including: Pediatrics, General Internal Medicine, Neurology, Family Medicine, Dermatology, Gynecology and Obstetrics, Ear, Nose and Throat, Ophthalmology, Orthopedics, Gastroenterology, Cardiology, Surgery and Trauma, Pediatric Surgery and Pediatric Pulmonary Medicine. In addition, every resident has equal access to all the specialty clinics at the Soroka University Medical Center.

542. The Government, as well as the main HMO serving the Bedouin population, undertake major efforts to train and recruit Bedouin physicians and nurses. The Government provided all the funding required for three classes of Bedouin students to complete their training as registered nurses, including funding their transportation to the nursing school, a meal allowance during their studies, and special remedial lessons to assist those who needed it. The Government has similarly provided special funding to hire Arab physicians and nurses.

543. Students participating in the third course are committed to serving their first three years of practice after graduation wherever the Ministry of Health decides their services are needed. This will guarantee that the trained nurses serve the target population, the Bedouins. In addition, the first female Bedouin physician in Israel, has completed her degree. She was part of the special “Cultivating Medicine in the Desert” program aimed at incorporating more Bedouins into the health sector. Currently, six Bedouin women are studying medicine; 35 Bedouin women have completed degrees in various health professions; and 45 additional women are studying health sciences.

544. In July 2008, Physicians for Human Rights-Israel — published a report titled: “Ana Huna (I am here) — Gender and Health in the Unrecognized Villages of the Negev”. The report is critical of the healthcare services granted to Bedouin women in the Negev, as well as the problems on providing of infrastructure and public transportation, making it difficult for Bedouin women to reach distant healthcare centers in cases where the villages have no clinic or have one that lacks full services. The report also stipulates that the communication between the medical staff and some of the women is problematic due to language barriers. However, as detailed above, significant improvements have been made in the past years regarding the provision of health care for Bedouin women, and the Bedouin population as a whole.

Community participation

545. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Article 13 The right to education

The legal framework

546. In 2007, The Compulsory Education Law 5709-1949, was amended in order to broaden its scope and apply compulsory education to youth between the ages of 15 and 17 (inclusive) – attending the 11th–12th grades. Prior to the amendment, education for the 11th–12th grades was free, yet not compulsory. In the aim of protecting the youth in this vulnerable stage from negative influences, and to prepare them and provide better tools for their successful integration as productive adults in the future, the Government decided to provide an obligatory educational framework rather than an optional one. Another desired effect of the Law, is a decrease in drop-out and removal of pupils rates, by compelling the provision of solutions within the education system to all pupils in this age group. The Law is to be fully implemented until 2009 to pupils attending the 11th grade, and until 2010 to those attending the 12th grade.

547. Due to budgetary constraints, the gradual implementation of the Long School Day and Enrichment Studies Law 5757-1997 (the "Long School Day and Enrichment Studies Law"), detailed in Israel's previous report, is to be completed until 2014.

548. The Daily Meal for the Pupil Law 5765-2005 (the "Daily Meal for the Pupil Law"). On January 6, 2005, the Knesset enacted the Daily Meal for the Pupil Law with the goal of creating a nutrition service to provide warm meals to pupils in primary schools where the long school day is applied, according to the Long School Day and Enrichment Studies Law detailed in Israel's previous report. On April 28, 2008 the Law was amended to include children attending Pre-School where the long school day is applied. According to the amendment, the Law also applies to other Pre-School frameworks where 41 hours of education per week are provided. In these frameworks a warm meal will be provided to pupils on days they attend pre-school for at least 8 hours.

Section 3 to the Law stipulates that each pupil will receive one warm meal per day, according to a well-balanced and varied menu which will be determined by the Ministry of Health, and will take into consideration the age and needs of the pupils.

The Law is to be gradually implemented. The Minister of Education, in conjunction with the Minister of Finance, will determine the population of pupils regarding which the Law will be implemented each year.

The nutrition service is co-funded by the Ministry of Education and the local municipalities. The Law permits the local municipality to collect participation payments from parents, yet the Law requires the Minister of Education's consent to do so. The parental participation payment will be determined by the Minister, according to socio-economic standards and in the framework of payments stipulated in the Compulsory Education Law.

549. The Free Education for Sick Children Law 5761-2001. This Law is aimed at advancing equal opportunity in education for sick children and providing a suitable educational framework for children in hospitals or at home due to long term illness. The purpose of the Law is to preserve the normative lifestyle of these children. The educational framework for children in hospitals or at home aim, is to identify the special educational needs of the sick child and to enable, subject to the learning capacities and medical condition of the child, the promotion of his/her development. According to the Law, the Minister of Education will introduce a special educational program for sick children to be implemented in their own homes or in hospitals with the consent of the parents. Section 7 to the Law stipulates that the implementation of the Law will be gradual, commencing in 2006.

550. Removal of pupils from the educational system. In 2004, the Minister of Education published Regulations regarding the removal of pupils from the educational system (Compulsory Education (Rules for the Permanent Removal of a Pupil Due to School Achievement) Regulations 5765-2004).

551. These Regulations include a prohibition on removing a pupil in the 1st–6th grades from school due to lack of achievement in studies. Regarding pupils in the 7th–12th grades, removal from school shall not be made on the basis of lack of achievement unless the pupil fails at least 70% of the mandatory subjects for that school year, and if the failure did not occur due to illness, death of a family member, separation or divorce of the pupils parents or other exceptional event which, according to the educational personnel, led to the failure.

The principal of the school from which the pupil is removed, and the Head of the Local Council's Education Department, will make an effort to find an alternative educational system best fit for the pupil upon removal. This shall be done in accordance with the Pupils Rights (Publishing Orders and Pupil Removal) Regulations 5762-2002 (the "Pupils Rights (Publishing Orders and Pupil Removal) Regulations").

552. The Pupils Rights (Publishing Orders and Pupil Removal) Regulations, establish rules regarding the removal of pupils from school. Among them is the necessity of performing a hearing before finalizing the removal decision. The pupil or his/her parents can file an appeal with the Head of the Ministry of Education's District, according to section 6(a), and a hearing should be held within 14 days according to the provisions of section 6(b) before a hearings panel. The pupil and his/her parents may state their claims in person or by an appointed representative.

553. The Tel-Aviv District Court, while residing as an Administrative Court, ordered the Municipality of Holon to fully subsidize the cost of school books and school transportation for the child of a mentally ill mother, deeply in debt, and whose father passed away. The municipality did not contest the unfortunate financial status of the mother, but rather its inability to fully subsidize the child's needs due to the existing obligations of its municipal welfare department. Although the Court found no deviation from the law or procedures relevant to the issue at hand, it declared that it is within its power to issue a remedy in the interest of justice because of the importance of the principle of free education. Thus, the fact that a remedy was not stipulated anywhere in statutes did not prevent the Court from fashioning an adequate judicial remedy. The Court determined that the right to education is essential to every child in order to fully realize their skills and abilities and emphasized that financial difficulties of the parent should not preclude the child from receiving an education (Ad. A. (Tel-Aviv) 2402/05 Anonymous v The Ministry of Education et. al. (13.06.2006)).

Structure of the education system

554. As of 2004, the budget system has been set on a differential basis (based on the "Shoshani Report"). According to this new method, each school will receive a budget per pupil, in accordance with the number of pupils in the school and their socio-economical background. For a pupil with a greater educational gap, a budget consisting of a greater number of hours will be granted. The new differential budget system significantly increases the budget granted to populations of a lower economical background, including pupils from the Arab, Druze, and Bedouin populations.

555. Bilingual Education. In its concluding observations concerning Israel's previous periodic report, the committee encouraged the development of the system of mixed schools for Jewish and Arab pupils, in order to promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among the citizens of the country. A prominent example for bilingual education can be found in the village "Neve Shalom – Wahat al-Salam". "Neve Shalom – Wahat al-Salam", situated equidistant from Jerusalem and Tel-Aviv-Jaffa, was founded in the early 1970's. By 2007 more than 50 families had come to live in the village, with an equal number of Jewish and Arab families. Eventually, the village will include 140 homes.

556. The Bilingual educational system developed and implemented in "Neve Shalom – Wahat al-Salam" is one of the many expressions of coexistence in their community, as well as other communities in the area. The bilingual educational system, extending from nursery to junior high-school levels, enrolls some 200 children, 90% of which come from surrounding Arab and Jewish communities. Similar bilingual and intercultural educational frameworks operate in Jerusalem, Misgav and Kfar Kara.

557. Note that parents are entitled to enrol their children to an educational institution (kindergarten or school) of their choice within their local municipality, whether the spoken language is Hebrew, Arabic or a bilingual institution, whereas the only limitation is that preference in enrolment is given to children who reside in proximity to the educational institution.

558. Needless to mention that there is a great variety of programs in Israel dedicated to the promotion of coexistence and cooperation among Israel's Jewish and Arab populations, either through education, cultural initiatives or Inter-Municipal Collaboration for the welfare of the different communities, as elaborated throughout this report.

Statistical data

559. In 2006/7, the total number of children enrolled in the education system under the supervision of the Ministry of Education reached nearly 1,900,000 – from the pre-primary level to the end of secondary school, of which 1,381,101 were Jewish and 465,016 were Arabs.

560. The total national expenditure on education in 2007, amounted to 56.2 billion NIS ($14.7 billion), comprising 8.5% of the Gross Domestic Product. The total national expenditure on education (in constant prices) in 2007 increased by 5% following a 2% increase in 2006 and 2005 each.

Literacy

561. In similarity to Israel's previous report, the number of persons with only four years or less of formal education has continued to decline, and there has been an improvement in the situation across the board. Among the Arab population, the number of persons without any formal education decreased from 7.0% in 2002 to 6.1% in 2006, while among the Jewish population, the numbers fell from 2.5% to 2.1% respectively. The number of persons with 1–4 years of formal education also decreased from 4% among the Arab population in 2002, to 3.9% in 2006, and among the Jewish population – from 1.2% in 2002 to 1% in 2006.

562. The following tables introduce the figures pertaining to the extent of formal education possessed by the adult population of Israel throughout the years 2002–2006. It divides the population by population group, gender and age. According to this data, in 2006, 1.5% of the total Israeli population had only 1–4 years of formal primary education, while 2.8% had no formal education:

Higher education

564. In 2006/7, 261,788 students attended higher education institutions (universities, colleges and the Open University). The following table shows the number of students in universities and their aggregation into degree, field of study, gender, age and population group:

Dropout rates

565. In 2007, 91.4% of adolescents aged 15–17 attended school, 1.4% worked and did not study and 7.2% neither worked nor studied (a decline in comparison to 2006 (7.8%)). 92% of the girls aged 15–17 attended school in comparison to 91% of the boys. Among the Jewish population 5.4% of the youth aged 15–17 neither worked nor studied (5.5% male and 5.4% female), in comparison to 12.5% among the Arab population (12.7% male and 12.1% female).

568. The percentage of entitlement to matriculation certificate continues to be higher among female pupils than male pupils. In 2006, in the Hebrew education system, 85.7% of the female-minors in the 12th grade age group took matriculation exams (84.3% in 2002), compared to only 80.4% of the male-minors (75.1% in 2002). Female-minors' entitlement to a matriculation degree was also higher and stood at 61%, compared to 49.5% of the male-minors.

569. Among the Arab education system, 91.2% of the female-minors in the 12th grade age group took the matriculation exams (91.7% in 2002), compared to 86.1% of the male-minors (84% in 2002). Arab Female-minors' entitlement to a matriculation degree was also higher than male-minors (56.3% and 36.5%, respectively).

570. Note that one third of those pupils unsuccessful in the 1997 and 1998 matriculation exams completed the requirement for a certificate within 8 years of their graduation.

571. The following data include statistics on graduating students in Israel's universities, in the Open University (a correspondence educational institution), non-university higher education institutions and teachers' training colleges. Similarly to Israel's previous report, these tables indicate a continuing trend of an increasing amount of graduating students. Also similar to Israel's previous report, the tables indicate that there are more women graduating than men:

572. In 2006/7 the total of 20,942 recipients received first degrees from non-university higher education institutions and teachers' training colleges: 2,095 from the Open University, 12,206 from various academic colleges and 5,433 teachers' training colleges.

Construction of new schools

573. Since Israel's previous report, there has been a steady increase in the number of schools and teachers in the Hebrew Education system, as well as a significant increase in the Arab Education system. The total number of schools in the Jewish population rose by 6.4% (from 2,957 in 2000, to 3,145 in 2007). During these years, the total number of schools in the Arab population rose by 28.7% (from 582 to 749 schools).

The vicinity of schools

574. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Human rights education

575. In 2008, the Ministry of Education had begun the implementation and assimilation of a fundamental change in teaching civic studies, including Human Rights issues. The goal is to increase the teaching hours allocated to the subject so far. In the extended program, there is an even greater emphasis on economic, social and cultural rights.

576. Educational programs concerning human rights issues are operated routinely throughout the country. Israel has developed special programs such as an annual "Human Rights Day". Each year, the "Human Rights Day" is dedicated to a different aspect of human rights, and a relevant curriculum and teaching material is developed in both Arabic and Hebrew. In 2003, for example, the "Human Rights Day" addressed the issue of tolerance towards "others" and the issue of social rights. In 2004, the Ministry of Education developed a learning kit dealing with social rights, which included references to both Jewish and Islamic cultures and traditions. In 2005, emphasis was given to rights of persons with disabilities. In 2006, the topic chosen was the right to an adequate standard of living and in 2007 – the right to highest attainable standard of health.

577. Since 2005, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in cooperation with several NGOs and the office of the United Nations Special Coordinator for the Middle East Peace Process, is sponsoring the simulation program "Israel Model United Nations", with the participation of numerous Jerusalem high-schools from all parts of the city and all segments of society. The project strives to expose participants to the United Nations' variegated activities, instilling awareness of the major challenges confronting the global arena, whilst inculcating a spirit of tolerance and inter-cultural dialogue. Forming part of the well-established Model United Nations program that operates extensively throughout the world, the program goes some way towards improving the image of the United Nations in Israel. With several new initiatives to expand Model United Nations activities to Israeli institutes of higher learning in 2009, the IMUN program holds promise of becoming an important facet of educational dialogue in Israel.

Gender equality

578. Data concerning the ratio of males to females in different educational aspects is detailed throughout this Article, specifically regarding attendance and graduation rates (including higher education), years of schooling, etc.

579. The Ministry of Education has established a special department dedicated to the promotion of gender equality within the School System. The Ministry maintains an active, useful, and user-friendly website that not only provides information about the Ministry's programs and projects, but additionally provides visitors with perspectives on the meaning of gender equality and women's empowerment. The language of the website, and of directives issued by the Ministry of Education, reveal a clear commitment to gender equality and provide definitive guidelines for teachers and all school officials.

580. The current Minister of Education and her Director General are both women, and feminists themselves. The Minister of Education has repeatedly and explicitly declared that gender equality is not merely a "program" or a "project"; but a life-style. To that end, all schools are committed the creation and maintenance of an educational climate conducive to equality and mutual respect.

581. In 2003, the Director General of the Ministry of Education issued a circular dealing with various aspects of gender equality, such as the development of new educational materials conducive to gender equality, the advancement of equal opportunities, the abandonment of dated stereotypes, the empowerment of educational leadership among teachers and principals, and more.

582. The Ministry of Education offers numerous In-Service Training Programs for teachers in order to increase their awareness of, and skills in the promotion of, gender equality. Nation-wide programs such as "Girls Leading a Change" empower high school pupils, while the school curriculum formally addresses issues such as gender, government and politics. Recently, the Ministry has instituted a matriculation program in gender studies.

583. In 2005, the Ministry of Education instituted several educational programs designed to further enhance equal opportunity between the genders within the education system. The abovementioned program "Girls Leading a Change" was initiated by the Women's Association in Israel to encourage empowerment and leadership amongst young women in high schools. The program was later broadened to include young men, and is now called "Girls and Boys Leading a Change". In 2007, the program was operating in more than 60 high schools in Israel, including schools in Arab localities, and involved more than 2,500 young women and men.

Also in 2005, the Ministry of Education together with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women held 10 one-day seminars (in which more than 1,500 school principals participated) on the subject of encouraging girls to engage in the fields of mathematics and exact sciences. The seminars dealt with the following issues: raising awareness of professional and management teams for this matter, illustrating the perceived barriers to female participation in this field, illustrating the actual ability of female students and methods of deconstructing these barriers, development of an intervention program encouraging female participation in these fields from an early age, and other relevant issues.

584. Furthermore, the Minister of Education appointed a special committee to examine the extent to which gender stereotypes were to be found in educational textbooks. After receiving the findings, the Minister decided not to incorporate books imbued with gender stereotypes into the education system, and those books already in use in the school system which promoted gender stereotypes, would be gradually replaced.

585. The Ministry has made a particular commitment to promoting the talents of young girls and women who display exceptional aptitudes in mathematics and science. These programs are based on the concept of enhancing gender equality, and allowing each child to pursue his/her innate talents and inclinations without deference to social pressures and inflexible gender expectations.

586. “Bnot Mitzvah” – the Jewish ritual when a girl reaches 12 years old, is used as a school event for the 6th graders and as a tool to highlight the female empowerment, and different substances regarding women leaders, influential women that changed society, women combatants, pioneers and others. This includes outer activities as well as in-school ones. The pupils examine the status of women in Israel and in other countries, and search for disciplines promoting women and allowing them to progress.

587. Empowering female pupils in the general school system is aimed at promoting leadership and empowerment of pupils in the 7th–9th grades, that includes themes promoting awareness to gender equality and its influence on all aspects of life. The program includes raising awareness to the possibilities facing the pupils in fulfillment of their personal potential, skills advancement and social and personal awareness to changes needed in the social and personal aspects of the family, the society and the education system. It also includes raising appreciation to the ability and potential of women to integrate in the economic, political, technological and military sectors and the importance of such integration. The program also includes activities with the male pupils aimed at changing their gender perceptions.

588. Empowering Arab female pupils program is aimed at promoting and changing personal and social perspectives while emphasizing the role of women in the family, the society and in the workplace. The program targets 7th–9th graders and includes themes promoting awareness of stereotypes regarding both genders in the Arab society, their perception of their abilities and dreams, etc. The program includes corresponding activities with the male pupils aimed at changing their gender-based perceptions.

589. Empowering female pupils in the religious schools is performed while considering the changes in society in general and the religious society in particular. Coping with these developments requires these religious young women a re-evaluation of the fulfillment of the roles that fashion the home, family and society. This program includes 10 meetings and is targeted at pupils in the 7th–9th grades.

590. Promotion of equality in human dignity. The basis of the program is that gender equality also means equality in human dignity between the genders. Among the goals of the program is raising the personal capability of teenagers to deal with changing social circumstances with the peer group (peer pressure, social struggles, friendship, relationships, etc.), and with the relationship with the adult world (authority, requesting help, etc). During the program the pupils study social perceptions and equality on the basis of human dignity of men and women. The program is introduced to pupils in the 7th–10th grades.

591. Women in science and technology. The National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology was established in the year 2000. The Council’s goals are to serve as a network facilitator linking adult and adolescent women in the field of science and technology, to serve as a contact point for voicing problems related to women's roles in science, to collect information regarding programs promoting women's role in science, to propose and implement programs that will promote women in science, to raise public awareness regarding the state of women in science and to coordinate between public and private initiatives for the advancement of women's involvement in science.

Children with disabilities

592. In 2007, 293,000 disabled or chronically ill children resided in Israel, making up 12.8% of the total child population of the country. Approximately 176,000 children (out of the 293,000), were disabled or suffered from a chronic illness that affected their daily functioning and had persisted for more than one year. These children made up 7.7% of the total child population.

593. The percentage of children with special needs who have at least one disability stands at 9.1% among Bedouin children (in the southern Negev area), 8.3% among the total population of Arab children and 7.6% among Jewish children.

594. In 2007, 15.8% of pupils with special needs in primary and post primary education, attended special schools, 22.3% attended special classrooms in regular schools and 61.8% were integrated in regular schools. Regarding the attendance of children with special needs in kindergarten – 66.4% attend special classes and 43.6% are integrated in regular education.

595. The Special Education Law 5748-1988 (the “Special Education Law”), was amended in 2002 to add a chapter dealing with integration of children with special needs. The purpose of the amendment was to equalize the services provided to children integrated in regular schools with those provided to children in the special education facilities. The amendment further obligates the Placement Committee to prefer the placement of a child with disability in a regular educational facility. Among the purposes of the amendment is the integration of children with disabilities within the regular education system while enlarging the budget designated for the purpose from year to year. The amendment applies thus far to children aged 5 and older.

596. Recently, the Rights of Pupils with Learning Disabilities in Secondary Education Facilities Law 5768-2008, was enacted. This Law asserts the rights of pupils with learning disabilities to adjustments in the criteria for admission to secondary education facilities (academic, technological, rabbinical or professional), as well as in exams and other assignments throughout the school years.

597. An internal procedure of the Ministry of Education enables all pupils with disabilities to receive the necessary accessibility adjustments in the educational facility they attend, by providing the required financing according to specific blueprints submitted to the Ministry by the relevant local authority.

598. The Safe Transportation of Children with Disabilities Law 5754-1994 (the “Safe Transportation of Children with Disabilities Law”), was enacted in order to ensure the safe transportation of children with disabilities to and from their educational facility. According to the Law, a child with a disability is entitled to transportation arrangement adapted to his/her needs and the type of disability, from his/her residence to the educational facility he/she attends. The Law stipulates that the local authority, in which the child with disability resides, is responsible for providing the required transporting.

599. On June 18, 2008, the Be'er-Sheva Magistrate's Court awarded compensation to a minor child with a disability and her parents, since the municipality failed to provide the minor with adequate transportation to school as stipulated by the Safe Transportation of Children with Disabilities Law. Due to this municipality's failure to provide transportation, the parents endured financial expenses – buying a car suitable to bring the child to school, adjusting the car to the disability, and driving her to school which resulted in absence of the father from his/her workplace and loss of income, as well as loss of social benefits on his/her part. The Court determined that the municipality's budget considerations cannot justify the non fulfillment of an obligation by law, the municipality must allocate a budget in order to fulfill the requirements stipulated by law, even if funding from Government Ministries is lacking or insufficient. Therefore, the Court awarded compensation in the amount of 30,000 NIS ($7,894) for the loss of income and social benefits, 10,000 NIS ($2,631) for distress and 50,000 NIS ($13,157) for the costs of the car (C.C (Be'er-Sheva) 2159/03 Pada Ov Jama v. The Municipality of Rahat (15.6.2008)).

600. In a recent case, the Tel-Aviv District Court, residing as an Administrative Court, addressed the scope of the State's obligation to provide free education to children with disabilities. The petitioners contested an internal directive of the Ministry of Education, according to which, commencing in the 2007/8 school-year, supervisors of special education schools may authorize reinforcement assistants for special education classes, however, they may not authorize personal assistants. The petitioners claimed that the directive violates the right of a child with disability to free education as anchored in the Special Education Law.

The Court determined that the State has a substantial obligation, stipulated in the Special Education Law, to provide free education for children with disabilities, and therefore cannot rid itself from its obligation once a child is placed in the special education system. A directive that negates the ability of an individual or a group of individuals, such as persons in need of personal assistance, to realize their fundamental right of education, contradicts the said obligation. The Court determined that it is essential that the Ministry's policy take individual circumstances into consideration. The preference of a strict framework of rules over the treating of the exceptional cases by allowing deviation from the rule, may constitute a breach of a fundamental right of a child to special education, and as such is invalid. The Court further determined that the Ministry of Education directive forbidding the authorization of personal assistants in the special education system is void and shall be rephrased to allow the integration of personal assistants to a pupil in exceptional and justified cases (Ad.P 1214/08 Orel (minor) et al. v. The Ministry of Education et al. (07.09.2008)).

601. In September 2007, the Minister of Education established a public committee, headed by the retired Supreme Court Justice Dalia Dorner, to examine the special education school system in Israel. The Dorner Committee, operating these days, was established in order to examine the Ministry of Education's policy towards children with special needs, examine the allocation of the Ministry's budget towards treating these children, draw an action plan and set a list of priorities in this regard, with consideration given to the budgetary constraints of the Ministry.

Arab population

602. Since 2000, a unique program has been implemented exclusively within the Arab population. This program is geared towards training teachers; training educational advisors for an M.A.; advancing the teachers professionally; creating programs aimed towards encouraging students to achieve greater results in their native language, mathematics and sciences; implementing programs geared towards increasing the number of pupils eligible for a Matriculation Certificate; programs to prevent drop-outs, investment in computers, equipment and physical infrastructure, including technological and science classes for the higher division classes, etc. This program has resulted in great achievements: a steady rise in students' achievements in national exams, the reduction of gaps in the achievements of middle-school pupils in mathematics and sciences, an increase in the number of pupils and decrease in the number of drop-outs, an increase in the number of pupils eligible for Matriculation Certificate, change of attitudes towards education and school among female pupils, significant increase in the number of pupils that participate in science and technology competitions.

603. Updated information concerning construction of schools, teaching positions, attendance and graduation rates with regard to the Arab population is provided throughout this Article.

604. It must be mentioned that on November 23, 2008, the Appointments Committee of the Higher Education Council bestowed the title of professor on Haula Abu-Bakar, a teacher and lecturer at Jezreel Valley College, making her the first female Israeli-Arab professor in Israel.

The Bedouin population

605. According to the multi-year plan, a budget was allocated towards establishing additional educational facilities in Bedouin localities both in the North and the South. As part of the Ministry of Education's scheme to advance the educational framework in the Bedouin localities, funding was allocated towards establishing and upgrading science and computers laboratories. Pedagogic counsels providing assistance to school principals in preparing the school's work plan and funding were allocated for reinforcement hours for pupils in need in all levels of education, in order to reduce pedagogic gaps, including raising matriculation certificate entitlement rates.

606. In addition, a program for training Bedouin teachers and assisting them in the first stages of their employment was initiated in order to reinforce the teachers' status and to improve their pupils' achievements. Currently, 165 teachers participate in the program. An additional training program for the amelioration of the teaching staff in secondary education was also initiated in cooperation with the Ben-Gurion University.

607. Commencing in 2006, every first and second grade class in the Bedouin localities that consisted of more than 28 pupils, was divided in to two classes and received 10 additional hours per week.

608. Positive results of these efforts are apparent – the rate of 12th grade Bedouin pupils entitled to matriculation certificates increased by 6% between 2004 and 2007.

Training for professional personnel

609. Guidance Counselors — Between 2004 and 2008, 3 training courses for Guidance Counselors were opened — 2 in the North and 1 in the South.

610. In addition, 2 classes of learning functions diagnosticians were opened, one in Sakhnin College (north), and the second in Be'er-Sheva (south) in the framework of the Open University.

611. Psychologists – additional positions for psychologists were allocated, yet a shortage of positions per pupils and of educational psychologists persists.

Special education frameworks

612. Four special education schools and 25 kindergartens are currently serving the Bedouin population in the South, as well as 3 Regional Support Centers. In 2008, two additional Regional Support Centers were opened, as well as 10 classes in primary schools. In addition, all primary and intermediate schools received additional reinforcement teaching hours.

613. In the North – a new school for severe Intellectual Disabilities was established, as well as 6 special education kindergartens. In addition, 4 classes in secondary schools were added, as well as 3,000 hours of integration.

The Bedouin population in the south

614. Since its establishment in 2004, the new Abu-Basma municipality invested many efforts towards improving educational facilities for the Bedouin population in the region, including those residing in illegal villages. Between April 2004 and July 2008, the establishment of 2 kindergarten classes in 3 different localities (total of 6 classes) was completed, 4 additional classes are in construction. 66 new Primary school classes were established in different localities, 42 additional classes are under construction, 10 of which are nearing completion, and 16 additional classes are in planning stages.

615. Since 2004, three High Schools were established in the illegal villages of Abu-Krinat, Al-Huashlla and Bir-Hadge. The schools contributed greatly to the significant reduction in dropout rates, especially among Bedouin girls, who previously were not sent to school by their parents, due to the distance of the school from the village and religion and cultural barriers. Construction of new High School classes in kasar-a-Sar is in its final stages.

616. The 'Daroma' (South) program – In 2004, the Ministry of Education commenced a program to improve educational achievements among exceptional pupils in the 10th–12th grades. The Daroma program now operates in 5 Bedouin High-Schools (approximately 300 pupils). The purpose of the program is to advance these pupils in Mathematics and English, develop their learning skills and prepare them for the Psychometric test required for enrollment in higher education institutions. The pupils participate in courses in academic institutions such as the Ben-Gurion University. The program also focuses on self-empowerment and activities within the community and for its benefit. A similar program will commence in 2009, in the Abu-Basma municipality and in Tel-Sheva in the South. Such a program is also operating in the North entitled "Heznek Atidim".

617. Extracurricular activities program is also operated in the Bedouin localities in the Negev, in conjunction with the Ministry for the Development of the Negev and the Galilee, and the Israel Association of Community Centers. The program provides scholarships for extracurricular activities, for children in the 4th to 6th grades in the Negev.

618. In 2008, the Ministry of Education announced its intention to grant Bedouin students studying engineering, technology and science with tuition grants and scholarships in the amount of 5,000 NIS ($1,315) each, for the upcoming academic year. The scholarships are intended to further encourage Bedouin students to achieve higher education.

619. In accordance with Government Resolutions no. 412 and no. 413 dated August 2006, The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women grants scholarships for Bedouin female students in the North, as well as for Druze and Circassian female students. In 2007/8, 75 scholarships were granted. The Authority recently published an announcement inviting Bedouin, Druze and Circassian women to submit applications for the upcoming year.

Language facilities

620. As reported in Israel's initial report, new adult immigrants are offered basic Hebrew language classes in new immigrants' schools especially created to teach elementary Hebrew language skills. In 2006/7 25,322 persons attended such schools, which consisted of a total of 1,404 classes. 14,126 attended primary new immigrants' schools (Primary Ulpanim) and 11,196 attended continuation new immigrants' schools (Continuation Ulpanim).

Conditions of teaching staff

621. The following table relates to the number of teachers in the educational system, as well as the average working hours of teachers. The table reveals a continuing increase in the number of teachers throughout the education system and in all levels of education. As indicated in the following table, between the years 2000 and 2007, 2,738 teachers were added to the Hebrew Education, and 9,193 were added to the Arab education:

623. As part of the reform in the education system mentioned earlier, the teachers' work week was extended and altered and a new rewarding wage system was created. The new work week was extended to 36 hours per teacher, 26 of which will be devoted to teaching a class, 5 hours devoted to teaching individual children or small groups and 5 hours devoted to other assignments. The teachers' salary was adapted and raised by 26%. In addition, in order to enhance and improve the teachers' professional in-service training and development, the promotion criteria were altered to include a prerequisite of professional training participation.

Responsibility for the establishment and administration of schools

624. No notable changes have occurred on this issue since the submission of Israel's previous report.

Article 15

The right to take part in cultural life and enjoy scientific progress

The right to take part in cultural life: funding

625. In 2007, the national expenditure on culture, recreation and sports constituted 5.5% of the Gross Domestic Product, a slight increase in comparison to the years 2004–2006 when the national expenditure on culture comprised 5.4% of the GDP.

626. In 2007, of the total national expenditure on culture, recreation and sports, 9.4% were spent on cultural heritage, literature and visual arts, 21.5% were spent on music and performing arts, 22.6% on radio, television, cinema and photography, 10.2% on socio-cultural activities, 23.7% on sports, games, computers and internet, 5.8% on gambling as well as on nature and environment, and 4.9% were spent on fixed capital formation.

The institutional infrastructure of cultural life in Israel

627. The National Council for Culture and Art. On November 12, 2002, the Knesset enacted the Culture and Arts Law 5762-2002, which created the National Council for Culture and Art as an advisory body assisting the Minister of Science, Culture and Sports, as well as other Government bodies, in issues relating to arts, culture and the financing of cultural institutions. The role of the National Council is to promote and initiate policies and programs encouraging art and culture, ensuring the freedom of creation and the expression of the cultural variety of the Israeli society. The National Council is required to suggest multi-year policy plan in the fields of arts and culture, including the financing of institutions in the field. The council was established in 2004.

628. National Library. On November 26, 2007, the Knesset enacted the National Library Law 5767-2007, declaring the library at the Hebrew University as the National Library. Prior to the Law, the library at the Hebrew University performed as a de-facto national library but was not legally recognized as such. According to Law, the National Library is intended to accumulate, preserve, nurture and bequeath knowledge, heritage and culture resources, in general, and those linked to the State of Israel, the land of Israel and the Jewish people, in particular.

629. In 2000, the Israeli Film Council was established, in accordance with the Film Law 5759-1999, enacted on January 10, 1999. The Council's aim is to encourage the Israeli film industry, promoting freedom of creation and expression of the cultural variety in Israeli society. The council's roles are to advise the Minister of Science, Culture and Sports on all relevant issues regarding the film industry, including defining criteria for financial support to public institutions dedicated to encouraging and promoting creation, production and distribution of Israeli films as well as international cooperation.

Cultural identity and heritage

Jewish heritage

630. In January 2007, the Knesset approved the creation of two national heritage authorities, for the heritage of the Jewish community of Bukhara and for the heritage of the Jewish community of Libya. Each of these heritage authorities are mandated to preserve the heritage culture of its community, and to research and document it (The National Authority for the Cultural Heritage of the Bukhara Jewish Community Law 5767-2007, and the National Authority for the Cultural Heritage of the Libyan Jewish Community Law 5767-2007).

631. On December 6, 2005, the Knesset enacted the Diaspora Museum Law 5765-2005, recognizing the Diaspora Museum in Tel-Aviv as the national center for Israeli communities in Israel and abroad, and to ensure its existence. According to the Law the Diaspora Museum functions and responsibilities are to present items relating to the Israeli communities and to the history of the Jewish people, to conduct research and to bring together knowledge on issues relating to the Jewish people. In addition, its roles include the creation of a reservoir of genealogical trees and family names of Jewish families in the world, and to create a database of Jewish communities in the world and their history. The Ministry of Education, Culture and Sports is in charge of executing this law, and the State will participate in the funding of the Diaspora Museum.

632. The Council for Commemoration of the Sephardic and Eastern Heritage Law 5762-2002, was enacted on November 13, 2002. According to the Law, the Minister of Science, Culture and Sports and the Minister of Religious Affairs will appoint the Council for Commemoration of the Sephardic and Eastern Heritage, to advise the Ministers regarding promotion, assistance, and encouragement of activity relating to the heritage of the Spanish Jewry.

Druze heritage

633. On June 4, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Druze Cultural Heritage Center Law 5767-2007, which purpose is to facilitate the establishment of a Druze Cultural Heritage Center in Israel. According to the Law, the Government shall designate the necessary budget for the establishment, operation and maintenance of the Center. The Center will include a research institute, a museum and an archive of Druze heritage, culture and history. The Center will develop and promote research activities as well as educational programs, including tours, lectures, conferences and exhibitions geared towards developing, enriching and promoting knowledge relating to the different aspects of the Druze culture, history and heritage.

The role of mass media and communication in promoting participation in cultural life

634. Developments concerning accessibility of persons with disabilities to television broadcasts are detailed above, under Article 2 above.

635. The Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting is a public council established under the Telecom Law. Its fundamental task is to regulate the Israeli Cable and Satellite multi-channel subscriber television by representing, protecting and promoting the public interests in this field. These interests include ensuring maximal diversity and pluralism by the broadcasting channels and the contents they deliver; improvement of technologies and services; increasing the supply of content and freedom of choice for subscribers; development and production of original Israeli content; minimizing prices, etc.

636. The realization of these targets promotes in turn the participation in local cultural life and the exposure to foreign cultural life, of all Israeli citizens who subscribe to multi-channel television. In the years 2001–2007, these have included on average approximately 80%–85% of Israeli households.

The development and production of original Israeli content

637. The Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting is responsible for ensuring that the Cable and Satellite TV licensees invest between 8%–12% of their yearly income towards the production of original Israeli content of various genres, and decide and declare the specific requirements for the fulfillment of this obligation.

638. In previous years, the licensees have invested significant amounts in original Israeli production: in 2003 – 198,338,624 NIS ($53,605,033), in 2004 – 245,947,713 NIS ($66,472,354), in 2005 – 248,615,342 NIS ($67,193,335) and in 2006 – 237,326,932 NIS ($64,142,414).

639. The development of the local production industry has, and continues, to broaden the array of possibilities of expression of the multitude of cultures, tastes and opinions within the Israeli public, enriches Israeli culture, enables varied representations of current issues, and strengthens the grasp of the modern Hebrew language as well as offers broadcasting in other widespread languages in Israel such as Arabic, Russian and Amharic.

640. Moreover, developing the local production industry creates multitudes of new jobs for Israelis by enlarging and developing existing professional fields such as production, writing, directing, acting, photography, technology, etc. Another added value of this activity is the promotion of the Israeli creation, and thus, the Israeli culture, way of life and economy, overseas. In various countries, Israeli films and programs are sold to other broadcasters, and succeed in international festivals, as has happened quite frequently in recent years.

Initiating and granting licenses for designated channel broadcasting

641. The Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting has granted designated channel licenses to a Russian-Speaking channel and an Israeli music channel. These channels are financed by commercials (as opposed to all multi-channel TV channels that are financed by subscribers' fees). Each channel is unique, and has its own specific characterization, designed to enable expression of an array of specific cultural niches of Israeli society. Hence, the producing and broadcasting of these channels, bears an important national and democratic significance. In 2008, the Council decided on re-issuing previous tenders that had not yet materialized, for licenses for an Israeli Arab-speaking channel and a Jewish Tradition channel.

Community TV broadcasting

642. The Council for Cable TV and Satellite Broadcasting promotes, regulates and supports the broadcasting of community programming, produced mainly by volunteers of various local communities, including community centers, elderly people, new immigrants, students, various religious groups, independent groups, etc.

643. The broadcasts allow the participants and the communities to express themselves on screen and present their interests, activities and talents, and thus participate in cultural life. It also allows the general public to be familiarized with these communities, including their problems and successes, that otherwise may not receive public exposure.

Approval for broadcasting of foreign television channels

644. The supply of foreign TV channels offered to the Israeli viewers included about 50 channels in the year 2002. Between the years 2002 and 2007, the airing of 40 additional foreign channels was approved.

Protection of children

645. In 2001 the Knesset approved the Classification, Marking and Prohibiting of Harmful Broadcasts Law 5761-2001. The Law determined that broadcasts including visual, verbal or vocal elements of violence, sexual acts or cruelty, or that raise a probable concern that they encourage criminal behavior or the use of illegal drugs, will be marked as broadcasts that are not appropriate for children under a certain age.

646. The Law distinguishes between 3 marking categories, in accordance with their substance: programs inappropriate for children under the age of 8, programs inappropriate for children under the age of 14 and programs inappropriate for children under the age of 18. These categories were formed by the Ministry of Communications, after consulting with the various relevant bodies.

Preservation and display of mankind's cultural heritage

647. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Freedom of artistic creation and performance

648. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Status of the Arabic language

649. On March 21, 2007, the Knesset approved the High Institute for the Arabic Language Law 5767-2007, according to which, the Arabic Language Academy was established. Among its functions, the Arabic Language Academy is charged with researching the Arabic language and its cultural and historic resources, promoting the study of terminology, grammar, vocabulary, pronunciation and transcription. The Academy also addresses linguistic innovation and the adaptation of the Arabic language to the modern and computerized reality. According to the Law, the Institutions activities are financed by Government budget.

650. H.C.J. 4112/99 Adalah v. Municipality of Tel Aviv et al. (25.7.2002) addressed the duty of municipalities in which Arabs reside, to use the Arabic language along with Hebrew in all municipal signs. The Supreme Court determined that two principles are important in this context: the protection of the individual's right to a language, and the right to equality. This is due to the fact that the language comprises part of the individual's personality and the instrument through which he thinks and communicates with others. The Supreme Court stipulated that: "Indeed language plays a major role in human existence for both the individual, and for society. Using language we express ourselves, our individuality and our social identity. Take away a person's language and you have taken away his essence". The Court further stated that a language receives special importance when it is the language of the minority. The Supreme Court stressed the status of equality as one of Israel's fundamental values, according to which rights for language and equal use of municipality's services are to be assured, due to the duty to maintain equality among residents of the State.

The Court ordered the immediate use of Arabic in all new signs or instances where old signs are replaced. In major roads or public institutions, and side streets in districts with a significant Arabic-speaking population, signs must be altered within 2 years. Finally, regarding remaining signs, the Court required a change within 4 years from the date of the judgment.

Additional information

651. For additional information regarding the Right to Equal Participation in Cultural Activities, please refer to the 10th–13th Combined Periodic report of the State of Israel on the Implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, submitted in May 2005.

Sporting activities

Prevention of hostility in sports events

652. The Safety in Public Places Law 5722-1962, was amended (Amendment 3) in July 2005, to specifically prohibit racially motivated expressions at sporting events. Consequently, indictments were filed against defendants who shouted racial remarks during soccer matches.

653. Even prior to the abovementioned Amendment, actions were taken by the State Attorney's Office, considering racial remarks against the Arab population as incitement to racism and taking criminal measures on their account. Criminal investigations were opened in a number of cases of incitement to racism against the Arab population in soccer games, and indictments were filed. Several cases were concluded and the defendants were convicted.

654. In July 2008, the Prohibition of Violence in Sporting Events Law 5768-2008, was enacted in order to facilitate the safe and peaceful manner of sporting events by broadening the definition of racist display and facilitating training for security personnel as well as broadening their responsibilities and authorities. The Law further establishes a Committee for the Prevention of Violence in Sports geared towards the elimination of the phenomenon.

Women in sports

655. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, together with the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sports, have designed a unique training course for women, educating them on ways to become active and committed members of local and national Councils for the Advancement and Administration of Sports in Israel.

656. Section 9A to the Sports Law 5748-1988, (the "Sports Law") was adopted at the end of 2003, stipulating that all State supported sports organizations, including sports associations, bodies, unions and federations, shall provide appropriate representation of women. This appropriate representation concerns both staff and management, and shall include all categories of positions. Under section 9B, sports organizations shall submit annual reports to the Knesset Committee on implementation of this section. This amendment stems from the realization that as in many other areas of life, promoting women's role in sports requires their full involvement, not only in sporting activities themselves, but also as decision makers and in managerial roles.

657. In an innovative ruling, the High Court of Justice examined the issue of the fund allocation to sports institutions, and ruled that in order to redress long-standing inequality issues, local councils should allocate funds for women's sports at 150% of that allocated to men's sports (H.C.J 5325/01 L.C.N Association for the Advancement of Women Basketball v. Ramat-Hasharon Local Council). Similarly, the public committee that determines criteria for the allocation of public funding for sports has recommended the application of affirmative action plans to boost allocation towards women's sports, and has instituted programs to implement them.

658. On March 21, 2005, the Government decided on the establishment of the Public Council for Women's Sports (Resolution no. 3416). Also that year, a national program for women's sports was presented by the Sports Administration and was approved by the Ministry of Education. A budget of 80 million NIS ($21,052,631) was allocated for the program's operation by the Council for Sports' Gambling Arrangements, for a period of 8 years, and additional 1.8 million NIS ($473,684) per year was allocated by the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sports, also for a period of 8 years.

659. In 2007, the Department for Women's Sports was established at the 'Wingate' institute. The Department is responsible for the operation and execution of the national program, including all its goals and targets, such as: increasing the number of the female athletes in Israel, development of excellence and leadership among women in the various sports, and in the fields of management, coaching and refereeing.

Promotion of new sporting fields

660. In 2005, the Sport Driving Law 5766-2005, was legislated in order to facilitate and regulate the practice of this field. According to the Law, an Authority for Sport Driving was established within the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sports, and in 2007, several accommodating regulations were promulgated. The Law will enter into force upon completion of the promulgation of the remaining necessary regulations.

The enjoyment of scientific progress

Institutional promotion of research and development

661. The National Council for Civil Research and Development Law 5762-2002, was enacted on November 19, 2002. According to the Law, a National Council for Civil Research and Development will be created, to serve as an advisory body to the Government and Ministries on issues relating to research and development in the civil sector. The council's roles include recommending to the Government on a national comprehensive policy, annually and perennially, in the fields of civil research and development, to set priorities in this context, to recommend on development of infrastructures for research and execution of projects in the fields of science and technology, etc.

The Council was established in August 2004, and operates in the fields of energy, technology and engineering, medicine and bioscience, and computer science. The council cooperates with universities, research centers, industrial centers, and regional research and development centers. Following an amendment to the Law, issued on December 27, 2007, the National Council for Civil Research and Development will receive its budget from the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sports.

The national research and development budget

662. The following table reveals the scope of the Government's expenditure on civil research and development between the years 2002 and 2007:

664. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

The legal protection given to intellectual property

665. On November 25, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Copyright Law 5767-2007. The new Law came into force in May 2008, replacing the previous Copyright Law of 1911.

666. The new Law provides an up-to-date comprehensive framework for the protection of works of copyright, portraying the proper balance between the need to facilitate incentives to creation by giving financial rights concerning the creation itself, and the need to enable the public to use these creations for the promotion of knowledge and culture, all the while preserving the freedom of expression and creation and assuring free and fair competition.

667. The Law accommodates Israel's international obligations concerning the protection of intellectual property including those deriving from the Bern Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, the Agreement on Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) and the International Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers, Phonograms and Broadcasting Organizations.

Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Forty-seventh session

14 November-2 December 2011

Consideration of reports submitted by States parties under articles 16 and 17 of the Covenant

Concluding observations of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Israel

1. The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights considered the third periodic report of Israel on the implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (E/C.12/ISR/3) at its 35th, 36th and 37th meetings, held on 16 and 17 November 2011 (E/C.12/2011/SR.35-37), and adopted, at its 59th meeting held on 2 December 2011, the following concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the third periodic report of Israel and the written replies to its list of issues. It also notes with appreciation the high level of the State party's delegation, and its positive and constructive engagement with the Committee.

3. The Committee, reminds the State party, while noting its serious security concerns, of its obligation to report and to fully guarantee and implement the Covenant rights for all persons in all territories under its effective control.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee notes with appreciation efforts made by the State party in promoting the implementation of economic, social and cultural rights. The Committee welcomes in particular:

- (a) The enactment in July 2011 by the Knesset of the National Council for Nutrition Security Law;
- (b) The amendment in July 2010 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law;

- (c) The enactment in 2008 by the Knesset of the Encouragement of the Advancement and Integration of Women in the Work Force and the Adjustment of Workplaces to Women's Needs Law;
- (d) The rendering of the Supreme Court in June 2011 of a decision affirming that access to water is a basic human right;
- (e) The ruling by the High Court of Justice in February 2011 determining that the Ministry of Education was required to take concrete measures to promote the right to education for children in East Jerusalem and address the lack of classrooms;
- (f) The adoption in October 2011 of the Trajtenberg report recommendations to lower the cost of living, ease the financial burden of poorer and middle-class families and increase the supply of affordable housing.

C. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

5. The Committee notes with concern that most of the recommendations addressed to the State party following the consideration by the Committee of the State party's second periodic report in 2003 are still valid today.

The Committee recommends that the State party follow up on those recommendations that were issued in 2003 and that are still valid today.

6. The Committee remains concerned that, in spite of the fact that domestic courts have referred to Covenant rights in judicial decisions, the Covenant rights have not been incorporated in the domestic legal order with the consequence that the citizens can not directly invoke the rights contained in the Covenant before domestic courts.

The Committee urges that the State party incorporate the rights of the Covenant in its domestic legal order. The Committee recommends that the State party establish training programmes for the legal profession, including the judiciary, on the scope and function of the Covenant and of the State party's obligation to effectively implement binding human rights obligations at the domestic level. The Committee draws the attention of the State party to its general comment No.9 (1998) on the domestic application of the Covenant.

7. The Committee notes with regret that the State party has not yet established an independent national human rights institution.

The Committee recommends that the State party establish an independent national human rights institution in compliance with the principles relating to the Status of National Institutions for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (Paris Principles).

8. The Committee regrets the absence in the State party's third periodic report as well as in its replies to the list of issues of information related to the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights as enshrined in the Covenant in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

The Committee urges the State party to include information on the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights as enshrined in the Covenant in the Occupied Palestinian Territory in its fourth periodic report. The Committee reminds the State party of the Advisory Opinion rendered on 9 July 2004 by the International Court of Justice, as the United Nations' principal judicial body, which stated that Israel is bound by the Covenant with regard to the Occupied Palestinian Territory and that it should also not raise any obstacle to the exercise of such rights in those fields where competence has been transferred to the Palestinian authorities.

9. The Committee is concerned about the continuing obstacles to employment by the Arab Israeli population, the considerably higher levels of unemployment rates of the Arab Israeli population, and the concentration of members of the Arab, Druze and Circassian population in some sectors characterized by low wages, including agriculture and the hotel and restaurant sector. (art. 6)

The Committee recommends that the State party take immediate steps to increase employment opportunities in towns and villages for Arab Israelis, and report on progress achieved in its next periodic report.

10. The Committee is concerned about the high unemployment level of persons with disabilities, despite the many projects and instruments established by the State party in this regard. (art.6)

The Committee urges the State party to effectively implement its measures to overcome the obstacles faced by persons with disabilities in accessing the labour market, and to report in its next periodic report on the impact of such measures on the unemployment rate of persons with disabilities.

11. The Committee is concerned about the negative impact of the budget cuts since 2009 regarding the Employment Service, as well as reductions in the expenditures on vocational training programmes. (art. 6)

The Committee recommends that the State party take measures to strengthen the Employment Service, both in terms of its budget as well as human resources and services it offers, such as vocational training vouchers.

12. The Committee is concerned about serious obstacles to the enjoyment of the right to work of: (a) Palestinians in the West Bank whose agricultural land has been rendered inaccessible or difficult to reach by the construction of the Wall and the limited allocation of permits and opening times of the Wall gates; (b) Palestinian farmers in the Gaza Strip whose agricultural land lies in or near the buffer zone; and (c) Palestinian fishermen in Gaza. (art.6)

The Committee urges the State party to ensure that Palestinians enjoy unimpeded access to their agricultural lands in all their territories, and recommends that the State party clearly demarcate the buffer zone to the extent strictly necessary to address its security concerns and effectively inform the civilian population in the Gaza Strip of the extent of its applicable regime. The Committee recommends that the State party conduct investigations of the killings and injuries of workers in the buffer zone, providing victims with an adequate remedy. Furthermore, the Committee calls on the State party to recognize and respect the right of the Palestinian people to the marine resources, including the right to fish in the territorial sea and Exclusive Economic Zone of the Gaza Strip.

13. The Committee is concerned about the continuing wage gap between men and women, in both the Jewish and the Arab Israeli population groups. (art.7)

The Committee recommends that the State party effectively implement measures to ensure equal pay for work of equal value, between men and women, in both the Jewish and the Arab Israeli population groups.

14. The Committee is concerned about the persistent and significant wage disparities between the Arab Israeli and the Jewish population groups, despite recent improvements as explained by the State party delegation during the dialogue. The Committee is also concerned that approximately 12 per cent of Arab Israelis are paid below the minimum wage. (art.7)

The Committee reiterates its previous recommendation that the State party take measures to eliminate inequalities in wages between Jews and Arab Israelis, in conformity with principle of equal pay for work of equal value, as enshrined in article 7 of International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and ensure that wages are never lower than the established minimum.

15. The Committee is concerned about recent legislation which prescribes that persons with disabilities have a wage that in certain circumstances is 30 per cent of the minimum wage. (art.7)

The Committee recommends that the minimum wage be fully applicable to persons with disabilities. The Committee further recommends that the State party make sure that this should not result in the reduction of employment opportunities for persons with disabilities.

16. The Committee is concerned that Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory and working in Israel are not allowed to be members of the General Federation of Laborers in Israel, which has been assigned by law with the responsibility to protect Palestinian workers' rights in Israel and retains half of the union fees collected from those workers. (art.8)

The Committee recommends that the State party take steps to allow that all Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory and working in Israel can join the General Federation of Laborers in Israel, in accordance with article 8 of the Covenant.

17. The Committee is concerned about the revocation of residency permits of Palestinians living in East Jerusalem, which results in the loss, among other things, of their right to social security, including access to social services (art.9).

The Committee calls upon the State party to put a stop to the revocation of residency permits of Palestinians living in East Jerusalem. The Committee urges the State party not to hinder the enjoyment of their right to social security, including access to social services. The Committee also urges the State party to ensure the right of access to social security on a non-discriminatory basis, especially for disadvantaged and marginalized individuals and groups. In this respect, the Committee draws the attention of the State party to its general comment No.19 (2007) on the right to social security.

18. The Committee, while recognizing the efforts undertaken by the State party to combat domestic violence, is concerned that the prevalence of domestic violence against women and girls has not decreased significantly. It is also concerned that domestic violence is not defined as a crime in the Penal Code. (art.10)

The Committee recommends that the State party define domestic violence as a crime in the Penal Code and intensify its efforts to prevent and combat domestic violence, including through awareness-raising campaigns aimed at all segments of the population. It recommends that the State party ensure an effective access to justice for victims of domestic violence, ensure the prosecution and punishment of perpetrators of such violence, and adopt effective protection measures, especially restraining orders. The Committee furthermore recommends that the State party provide training on domestic violence for the police, judiciary and other relevant officials.

19. The Committee is concerned that the State Party has not provided sufficient information concerning education, services and programmes on sexual and reproductive health aimed at the most vulnerable segments, such as women and young people from the Arab Israeli population group and those living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

The Committee recommends that the State party increase its efforts in the creation of educational programmes and services on sexual and reproductive health for all the population, especially women and young people from the Occupied Palestinian Territory and the Arab Israeli population group.

20. The Committee is concerned that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003, as amended in 2005 and 2007, imposes severe restrictions on family reunification. (art.10)

The Committee urges the State party to guarantee and facilitate family reunification for all citizens and permanent residents irrespective of their status or background, and ensure the widest possible protection of, and assistance to, the family.

21. The Committee is concerned that the State party continues to be a country of destination for trafficking in persons. (art.10)

The Committee calls on the State party to ensure full and effective implementation of its Anti-Trafficking Law and the two national plans to combat trafficking in persons. It urges the State party to take all appropriate measures to ensure that all perpetrators are prosecuted and brought to justice, and that victims have access to adequate protection and assistance.

22. The Committee is concerned that, in the case of a divorce, custody of children up to the age of six is always given to mothers, and that fathers are often required to pay child support awards that exceed their income, and if not that their freedom of movement is seriously curtailed. The Committee is concerned that divorced fathers often are required to visit their children in supervised visitation centers during their working hours, which leads to the accumulation of work absences and the risk of dismissal. (art.10)

The Committee recommends that the State party amend the Capacity and Guardianship Law so that custody of children up to the age of six is not always given to mothers, and ensure that child support awards do not lead to an inadequate standard of living for the father.

23. The Committee recommends that the State party take measures so as to enable the Palestinian Authority to exercise its functions and powers emanating from the 1995 Interim Agreement, including the transfer of tax revenues to it (art.11).

24. The Committee is concerned about the high incidence of poverty among families in the State party, in particular among the Arab Israeli population, as well as in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. The Committee is furthermore concerned about the high rate of privatization of social services. (art.11)

The Committee recommends that the State party establish a comprehensive policy to address the problem of poverty and social exclusion, accompanied by adequate budget allocations and a scaling down of the privatization of social services. The Committee recommends that the State party focus its efforts in particular on the Arab Israeli population, Ultra-Orthodox Jewish families and disadvantaged and marginalized groups such as older persons, persons with disabilities and asylum-seekers. The Committee also recommends that the State party ensure timely and unfettered access by the humanitarian organizations operating in the Occupied Palestinian Territory to the Palestinian population, including in all areas affected by the Wall and its associated regime. The Committee refers in this regard to its 2001 Statement on Poverty and the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

25. The Committee is concerned about the lack of social housing units, the limited availability of affordable housing, and the lack of regulation of the private rental market. (art.11)

The Committee recommends that the State party take immediate steps to ensure the availability of affordable housing, by adopting a national strategy and a plan of action on adequate housing, by increasing the number of social housing units, and by offering increased rental assistance. The State party should also ensure a proper regulation of the private rental market. The Committee also urges the State party to expeditiously implement the Planning and Construction Procedures for the Acceleration of Construction for Housing Purposes Law 5771-2011. The Committee also draws the attention of the State party to its general comment No.4 (1991) on the right to adequate housing.

26. The Committee is deeply concerned about home demolitions and forced evictions in the West Bank, in particular Area C, as well as in East Jerusalem, by Israeli authorities, military personnel and settlers. (art.11)

The Committee urges the State party to stop forthwith home demolitions as reprisals and ensure that evictions in Area C are in conformity with the duty (a) to explore all possible alternatives prior to evictions; (b) to consult with the affected persons; and (c) to provide effective remedies to those affected by forced evictions carried out by the State party's military. The Committee recommends that the State party ensure that the development of special outline plans and closed military zones are preceded by consultations with affected Palestinian communities. The Committee also recommends that the State party review and reform its housing policy and the issuance of construction permits in East Jerusalem, in order to prevent demolitions and forced evictions and ensure the legality of construction in those areas. The Committee furthermore urges the State party to intensify efforts to prevent attacks by settlers against Palestinians and Palestinian property in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and investigate and prosecute criminal acts committed by settlers.

27. The Committee is concerned that the Plan for the Regularization of Bedouin Housing and for the Economic Development of the Bedouin Population in the Negev, based upon the recommendations of the Goldberg Committee and adopted in September 2011, foresees a land planning scheme that will be operated in a short and limited period of time, and includes an enforcement mechanism for the implementation of the planning and construction laws. (art.1)

The Committee recommends that the State party ensure that the implementation of the Plan does not result in the forceful eviction of Bedouins. The Committee recommends that any eviction should be based on free, prior and informed consent and that those relocated are offered adequate levels of compensation, in line with the Committee's general comment No.7 (1997) on the right to adequate housing: forced evictions.. The Committee also recommends that the State party officially regulate the unrecognized villages, cease the demolition of buildings in those villages, and ensure the enjoyment of the right to adequate housing.

28. The Committee is concerned about the increasing food insecurity among disadvantaged and marginalized individuals or groups, including older persons, the Jewish Ultra-Orthodox population group, and Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. It is also concerned about the rising prices of consumer goods and the increasing share that these take in the overall family household budget. (art.11)

The Committee recommends that the State party intensify its efforts to address food insecurity and hunger in the State party, as well as in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, focusing on all disadvantaged and marginalized individuals or groups, without discrimination. The Committee recommends that the State party urgently adopt the report and implement the recommendations of the Inter-ministerial Committee set up to examine the Government's role and responsibility for ensuring food security for all its citizens, submitted to the Ministerial Committee for Social Affairs in March 2008. The Committee also urges the State party to establish the Food and Nutrition Security Council, in line with National Council for Nutrition Security Law 5771-2011, and task it to set up a nutrition security policy.

29. The Committee is concerned that Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory do not have access to sufficient and safe drinking water and adequate sanitation. It is also concerned about the continuing destruction of the water infrastructure in Gaza and in the West Bank, including in the Jordan Valley, under military and settler operations since 1967. (art.11)

The Committee urges the State party to take measures to ensure the availability of sufficient and safe drinking water and adequate sanitation for Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory , including through the facilitation of the entry of necessary materials to rebuild the water and sanitation systems in Gaza. The Committee urges the State party to take urgent steps to facilitate the restoration of the water infrastructure of the West Bank including in the Jordan Valley, affected by the destruction of the local civilians' wells, roof water tanks, and other water and irrigation facilities under military and settler operations since 1967. The Committee draws the State party's attention to its general comment No.15 (2002) on the right to water.

30. The Committee is concerned about the unequal treatment of Bedouin women and girls with regard to education, employment, and health, especially those living in unrecognized villages. (arts. 3, 11, 12, 13 and 14)

The Committee recommends that the State party continue to take measures to improve the situation of Bedouin women and girls with regard to their access to health care, education and employment.

31. The Committee is concerned that the National Health Insurance Law excludes persons who are not in possession of a permanent residence permit, denying in practice the access to adequate health care for Palestinians with temporary permits, migrant workers as well as refugees. The Committee is also concerned about the infant and maternal mortality rates among the Arab Israeli and Bedouin population groups (art.12).

The Committee recommends that the State party extend the coverage under the National Health Insurance Law to persons not in possession of a permanent residence permit, so as to ensure universal access to affordable primary health care for all. The Committee also urges the State party to intensify its efforts to lower the infant and maternal mortality rates among the Arab Israeli and Bedouin population groups.

32. The Committee is concerned that Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, especially those living in the closed zones between the Wall and the Green Line, and in Gaza, have severely restricted access to health facilities, goods and services. (art.12)

The Committee recommends that the State party take measures so as to enable the Palestinian Authority to exercise its functions and powers emanating from the 1995 Interim Agreement. The Committee urges the State party to ensure unrestricted access to health facilities, goods and services, including urgency treatment, for Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory , especially those living in the closed zones between the Wall and the Green Line, i.e. seam zones. The Committee also urges the State party to take disciplinary action against checkpoint officials who are found responsible for unattended roadside births, miscarriages, and maternal deaths resulting from delays at checkpoints, as well as maltreatment of Palestinian ambulance drivers. The State party should take urgent measures to ensure Palestinian women's unrestricted access to adequate prenatal, natal and post-natal medical care. The State party should also take measures to ensure the availability and accessibility of psychological trauma care for people living in Gaza, in particular children.

33. The Committee is concerned that the school dropout rate is systematically higher in Arab schools compared to Hebrew schools, especially in Grade 9. It is also concerned about the serious shortage of classrooms in schools for Arab Israeli children, as well as in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. (arts. 13 and 14)

The Committee recommends that the State party intensify its efforts to lower the high dropout rate for Arab Israeli and Bedouin children, including through strict enforcement of the Compulsory Education Law 5709-1949. The Committee recommends that the State party take the necessary measures to address the serious shortage of classrooms in schools for Arab Israeli children and in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. The Committee also urges the State party to ensure that children living in East Jerusalem are able to be absorbed in the regular education system through the establishment of adequate infrastructures, and until such time to provide financial coverage for alternative educational frameworks as an interim solution, in line with the decision of the High Court of Justice of 6 February 2011.

34. The Committee is concerned that the education system still does not provide adequate support to children with disabilities. It also notes with concern reports of the lack of services provided in practice to children with disabilities in regular schools, effectively limiting their integration into regular class settings. (arts.13 and 14)

The Committee recommends that the State party adopt measures in the law and in practice to ensure the implementation of inclusive education of children with disabilities, such as the obligatory training of all teachers (beyond special education teachers), to require individual education plans for all students, ensure the availability of assistive devices and support in classrooms, educational materials and curricula, ensure the accessibility of physical school environments, encourage the teaching of sign language, and allocate the necessary budget for all those measures. The Committee draws the attention of the State party to its general comment No.5 (1994) on persons with disabilities.

35. The Committee is concerned that Palestinian children living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory are not able to enjoy their right to education, as a consequence of restrictions on their movement, regular harassment by settlers of children and teachers on their way to and from school, attacks on educational facilities, and sub-standard school infrastructure. The Committee also notes with concern that there are as many as 10,000 unregistered children in East Jerusalem, out of which around 5,500 are of school age but do not attend school due to their lack of registration. (arts. 13 and 14)

The Committee recommends that the State party take measures so as to enable the Palestinian Authority to exercise its functions and powers emanating from the 1995 Interim Agreement, ensuring the right to education for Palestinian children living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. The Committee also urges the State party to address violations of the right to education, including those stemming from restriction on movement, incidents of harassment and attacks by the Israeli military and settlers on school children and educational facilities, as well as non-attendance caused by a lack of registration.

36. The Committee is also concerned that the measures adopted by the State party to restrict freedom of movement of both people and goods in the Occupied Palestinian Territory severely impede the Palestinian population's access to religious sites, cultural exchanges and events. (art.15)

The Committee recommends that the State party take measures to ensure that Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory can exercise their right to take part in cultural and religious life, without restrictions other than those that are strictly proportionate to security considerations and are non-discriminatory in their application, in accordance with international humanitarian law. The Committee also recommends that holy sites in the Occupied Palestinian Territory are protected against demolition and desecration, in accordance with the Protection of Holy Places Law 5727-1967.

37. The Committee is concerned that the measures adopted by the State party to relocate the Arab-Bedouin villages in new settlements will negatively affect their cultural rights and links with their traditional and ancestral lands.

The Committee recommends that the State party fully respect the rights of the Arab-Bedouin people to their traditional and ancestral lands.

38. The Committee encourages the State party to consider signing and ratifying the Optional Protocol to the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, and ratify the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

39. The Committee requests the State party to disseminate the present concluding observations widely among all levels of society, in particular among State officials, the judiciary and civil society organizations, translate and publicize them as far as possible and inform the Committee of the steps taken to implement them in its next periodic report. It also encourages the State party to engage all the relevant actors, including non-governmental organizations and other members of civil society, in the process of discussion at the national level prior to the submission of its next periodic report.

40. The Committee requests the State party to submit its fourth periodic report, prepared in accordance with the revised reporting guidelines of the Committee, adopted in 2008 (E/C.12/2008/2), by 2 December 2016.

Introduction

1. Hereinafter is the Fourth Periodic Report of the Government of the State of Israel, submitted to the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in accordance with the requirements of Articles 16–17 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (hereinafter – the “Covenant” or the “CESCR”).
2. Since the submission of our Third Periodic Report many developments relevant to the implementation of the Covenant have taken place. This report provides a comprehensive account of the most significant developments. It also addresses the comments made in the concluding observations by the Committee (E/C.12/ISR/CO/3) dated December 2, 2011.
3. Israeli Non-Governmental Organizations (“NGOs”) were invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of the report, both through direct application, and a general invitation to submit remarks posted on the Ministry of Justice (MoJ) website.

General

4. Incorporation of Covenant rights – The fundamental rights protected by the Covenant are effectively protected through legislation, judicial decisions and otherwise. Israel has not enacted any further basic laws on economic, social and cultural rights since the submission of our previous report. For recent significant developments in legislation, policy and institutional frameworks, see below.
5. Review and implementation of concluding observations – A joint inter-ministerial team, headed by the Deputy Attorney General (International Law), was established in 2011 in order to further the implementation of the concluding observations of UN human rights committees. The work of this inter-ministerial team has brought about several significant changes. For significant examples, see Annex I.
6. Training on the application of the Covenant – With reference to the Committee’s recommendation regarding training programmes for the legal profession and judiciary, a wide range of training days on Human Rights Conventions have been held. For details, see Annex I.
7. Independent human rights institution – There are several national institutions that operate in Israel and provide services for the protection of human rights, such as the State Comptroller and Ombudsman, the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission (EEOC), the Commission for Equal Rights for Persons with Disabilities, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (AASW) and others.
8. Non-application of the Covenant in the “Occupied Palestinian Territory” – It is Israel’s position that the Covenant is not applicable beyond a State’s national territory. For an elaboration of this position, see our Second Periodic Report, pp. 3–4.

9. Self-determination – No change has occurred in this area since the submission of our third periodic report.

Article 2

10. International economic and technical assistance – Israel’s Agency for International Development Cooperation (MASHAV) – MASHAV aims to contribute to the prosperity and well-being of populations facing severe development challenges. To this end, it promotes and engages in development cooperation. For details of MASHAV’s extensive activities in 2016, see Annex I.

11. International social security conventions – These agreements maintain the social rights of those who move from one country to the other and prevent the duplication of national insurance contributions.

12. International Cooperation regarding trafficking in persons – see under Article 6; regarding rights of foreign workers, specifically by means of bilateral agreements with their countries of origin – see under Article 6; regarding the preservation of nutritional security pertaining to animal products – see under Article 11B; regarding disease prevention – see under Article 12; in the Scientific and Cultural Fields – see under Article 15.

Israel recently submitted its sixth periodic report to the CEDAW committee, outlining in detail developments in gender equality legislation. The following are significant highlights 14. Restructuring of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women – Government Resolution No. 2331 (December 14, 2014), “Promoting gender equality and integration of gender thinking”, ordered the restructuring of the AASW and defined its main tasks, including promoting gender equality in the public and private sectors; presenting opinions on gender aspects of legislation, resolutions and budget and creating a knowledge center. Some of the many activities of the AASW are outlined in this report, including in relation to sexual harassment (below); promotion of employment opportunities (Article 6) and promotion of wage equality (Article 7).

15. For details of the AASW’s budget, see Annex II. Note the very significant increase in the 2017 annual budget.

16. Implementing Gender Mainstreaming in Government Ministries – the AASW promulgated a Gender Mainstreaming Guide providing guidelines on the implementation of policies for gender equality, such as the examination of plans and budgets from a gender perspective.

17. An Inter-ministerial Team for National Action Plan – an inter-ministerial team was established to formulate an action plan for the advancement of gender equality. This was submitted to the Knesset and the Government in 2013.

18. Gender Mainstreaming in Local Authorities – More than 170 local authorities have enrolled in a plan for gender equality which includes activities regarding work and employment; financial empowerment; advancement of women to key positions; gender-related health issues; prevention of violence against women, and more. The project began in 2017.

19. Establishing a Ministerial Committee on Gender Equality – Under Government Resolution No. 36 (May 26, 2015), the Government established a Ministerial Committee on Social Equality charged with promoting gender equality. For recent examples of the committee’s meetings, see Annex I.

The employment service

27. In its previous concluding recommendations, the Committee recommended that Israel take measures to strengthen the Employment Service. We are pleased to report that the Employment Service budget has almost doubled since the submission of our previous report and now operates through a greater variety of means. For details, see Annex II. The following are a number of the main employment programs:

28. "Employment circles" – This program, launched in 2014, aims to facilitate the employment of recipients of income supplement benefits, thus decreasing their dependency on benefits. It has led to an impressive reduction in the numbers of recipients of income supplements seeking employment. For details, see Annex I.

29. Employment integration grant for outlying areas – This pilot program, launched in 2016, is aimed at job seekers who live in outlying areas who manage to find work far from home. For details, see Annex I.

30. Training vouchers – These are offered to those eligible, including persons who receive income supplement benefits or unemployment benefits. They may be used for a wide range of courses, from event photography and tour guiding to public vehicle driving and accounts management.

Promotion of the Arab population in the labour market

31. Occupational Guidance Centers – In recent years, twenty-one occupational guidance centers serving minority populations have been established, at a total cost of 200 Million NIS (55.6 Million USD). These have served about 17,000 applicants, approx. 10,000 of which have found employment.

32. In 2015, a new center was established in Beit-Hanina, in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. It has provided services to approx. 1,200 residents.

33. Other Placement Services – The Authority for the Economic Development of the Minorities Sector (AEDMS) and the NGO "Kav Mashve" operate career centers for universities candidates from minority populations. 1,017 placements have been made within these programs. Two (2) other NGOs (Tsofen and ITWORKS) have been selected to assist in placements in hi-tech companies.

34. Additional steps – For the integration of universities graduates from minority populations into the public sector and for financial incentives for businesses that employ populations with high unemployment and improvements in public transportation, see Annex I.

The promotion of women from minority populations in the labour market

35. In recent years, the integration of Arab women in the labour market has been given significant attention in research and government investment. As a result, the employment rate of Arab women is on the rise. For additional information, see Annex II.

36. Five-year Interministerial Program – Government Resolution No. 4193 (January, 2012) set forth a five-year program for raising employment in minority populations, particularly amongst Arab women, with a budgetary scope of 730 Million NIS (203 Million USD) (approximately 85% of which is committed or being authorized). For details, see Annex I.

37. Day Care Centers in Minority Communities – A new procedure enables communities with a low socioeconomic index to benefit from Government support of up to 100% of the cost of construction of day care centers. Further to Government Resolution No. 4193, more places have been offered to children of Arab women who are employed in part-time positions.

38. “Women of Valor” – This program provides social support for women, particularly from the Arab population, with less than 12 years of education who are seeking employment. For details, see Annex I.

39. Additional steps – For details of a nursing program for Arab women in the South; a loan foundation for small businesses owned by women from minority populations; professional training vouchers, educational programs offered to Arab women and a media campaign to encourage the employment of minorities, see Annex I.

Promotion of the Bedouin population into the labour market

40. A five-year plan for the economic growth and development of the Bedouin population in the Negev was implemented between 2012 and 2016, with a total budget of 1,263 Billion NIS (350.83 Million USD) (Government Resolution No. 3708, September, 2011). This plan included the following employment and training programs:

41. Employment Centers – The first employment center was opened in Hura in 2010. As of September 2017, there are nine (9) centers that provide guidance and placements in all Bedouin localities. For additional data, see Annex I.

42. Reimbursement of Wages – A factory or entrepreneurial business in the industrial, services or tourism fields, which employs at least four (4) new employees from the Bedouin or the ultra-Orthodox Jewish population in the Negev, is entitled to a reimbursement of 15%–20% of these workers’ monthly wages for a period of five (5) years. The employer is also reimbursed for the costs of organized transportation to and from the workplace, to a total of 3,000 NIS (U.S. $811) per worker, annually.

43. Additional steps – For details of vocational training, the construction of industrial parks in Bedouin localities, training for local authority officials and others; programs to encourage entrepreneurship; and improvements in public transport, see Annex I.

Promotion of persons of Ethiopian descent in the labour market

44. There has been a significant increase in the employment rates of people of Ethiopian descent, such that they are now similar to those of the general population – 65.3% compared to 64.2% of the general population, although the average wage remains lower than average.

45. Employment centers – The Ministry of Education (MoE), together with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), have initiated a four (4) year program to promote employment by providing education and training, with a total budget of 15 Million NIS (4.2 Million USD). As of June 2017, there are nine (9) such employment centers specially geared for the needs of the Ethiopian population.

46. Additional steps – For information on vocational training; placement of university and college graduates; and promoting the employment of women of Ethiopian descent, see Annex I.

Promotion of persons with disabilities into the labour market

47. Israel's initial report concerning the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD), submitted in May 2017, contains a detailed account of the steps that have been taken in this regard. For significant highlights concerning affirmative action by large employers, centers that provide support for employers of persons with disabilities (PWD) and more, see Annex I.

Promotion of senior citizens into the labour market

48. The Committee for the Integration of Senior Citizens into Employment and the Community – This inter-ministerial sub-committee was appointed in August 2013, following the establishment of the Strategic Committee for the Aging of the Population.

49. Government Resolution No. 834 (December 2015) – Outlines steps for the integration of senior citizens into employment. Ongoing programs include “The Experience-Required” Program. This includes a job placement website adapted to senior citizens and a call center that offers assistance in all aspects of job seeking. The program also refers job seekers to workshops, including computer skills. It offers dozens of lectures and workshops on preparing for retirement.

50. Media Campaign – During August 2015, a media campaign seeking to challenge stereotypes presented the benefits of employing senior citizens.

51. Additional steps – For details on employment centers for senior citizens, integration of senior citizens into the public services, entrepreneurship programs and corporate responsibility, see Annex I.

Employment programs run by the ministry of labour, social affairs and social services

52. (The MoLSAaSS) runs several employment programs aimed at specific populations, including women, young families at risk, victims of violence, etc. It also runs programs to help employed people escape the cycle of poverty. For details, see Annex I.

Legal safeguards to protect workers from unfair dismissal

53. This has been discussed in our previous reports. In addition, following judicial rulings of Labour Courts in the last two (2) decades, employers who seek to fire an employee are obligated to conduct a hearing in order to allow the employee to present his/her case regarding the intention of dismissal. For additional details on the requirement to conduct a hearing, see Annex I

54. Enforcement – For recent data on the enforcement of the Prior Notice for Dismissal and Resignation Law 5761-2001, see Annex II.

Article 7

Minimum wage

55. The legal framework governing the minimum wage has been outlined in our previous reports.

56. Increase in minimum wage – Following agreements in late 2014 and early 2015 between the Presidium of Business Organizations and the General Federation of the Trade Unions (“Histadrut”), which were later anchored in legislation, the minimum wage in Israel has increased incrementally from 4,300 NIS to 5,300 NIS (1,195 and 1470 USD respectively). For additional details, and information on minimum wage for youth, see Annex II.

57. Persons with disabilities – In its previous concluding observations, the distinguished Committee recommended that the minimum wage be fully applicable to PWD, whilst ensuring that this not result in the reduction of employment opportunities. For information on this issue please see Israel's third periodic report (section 102). An additional plan defines special provisions for PWD that are recognized as being in the process of rehabilitation (rehabilee). These are persons that have been evaluated to have less than 81% of the regular work capacity in the same job and workplace. These persons are employed without a worker-employer relationship, yet they receive part of their rights under labour laws which employees are entitled to, such as a certain amount of remuneration (occupational remuneration) and are provided with certain benefits given to other workers such as days of leave, sick days, travel expenses, and maternity leave.

58. Apart from these exceptions (i.e. rehabilitees and persons with reduced work capacity), PWD are entitled to the same rights as any other employee, and must be compensated with a suitable wage that is at least the minimum wage. Failure to pay minimum wage, or if applicable adjusted minimum wage, constitutes an administrative violation which is subject to a financial sanction of 35,000 NIS (9,162 USD) and in appropriate cases prosecution of the violator. The violator is liable to a penalty of up to one (1) year imprisonment or a criminal fine of 226,000 NIS (59,162 USD).

59. For recent data, see Annex I.

60. Enforcement – For recent data on the enforcement of the minimum wage, see Annex II.

Conditions for workers

61. Conditions for workers, including overtime, paid and unpaid leave have been discussed in our previous reports. The following are a number of updates.

62. Enhancing the Enforcement of Labour Laws Law 5772-2011 – This law established administrative fines for the violation of labour laws and imposed direct responsibility for certain workers' rights on the recipients of security, cleaning and catering services provided by contractors. For details, see Annex I.

63. Prohibition of Receiving Collateral from an Employee 5772-2012 – This law prohibits an employer from receiving security or collateral from an employee as a condition for her/his employment or to guarantee continued employment. It also applies to temporary employees and those employed via a contracting company.

64. Amendment to the Foreign Workers Law 5761-1991 – A 2017 amendment directs the making of regulations to establish the different methods by which foreign workers may be paid. It also authorizes the Ombudswomen for Foreign Workers Rights to revoke a permit if an indictment has been filed for a serious offense which implies that the employer is not worthy of a permit. For details of both amendments, see Annex I.

65. For recent data relating to the enforcement of working conditions, see Annex II; for recent case law relating to the working conditions of care-workers, see Annex III.

Reconciliation of family and personal life

66. Regulations for Promoting the Integration and Advancement of Women in Employment and Adapting the Workplace to Women's Needs 5774-2013 – The Promoting the Integration and Advancement of Women in Employment and Adapting the Workplace To Women's Needs Law 5768-2008, empowers the MoLSAaSS to grant financial awards to employers who encourage the integration and promotion of women in the workplace. The Regulations set out criteria for the granting of awards, such as the creation of official employer policy on integration of women and work-family balance, policy on pregnant working women, training of women and career paths for women.

67. Parental Hour – A 2017 amendment to the Women's Employment Law 5714-1954 extends eligibility to a shorter working day during the first four (4) months after maternity leave to women who do not work full-time, as specified. An additional amendment provides that the shorter working day can be used alternately by the father and the mother, the designated parent within a surrogacy process or an adoptive parent.

68. In July 2015, the CSC approved a shorter working day for a parent of a child up to one (1) year-old for men whose spouse is on maternity leave.

69. Maternity Leave – For updates with regard to maternity leave, see Article 10 below.

70. For information on steps taken to promote a better work-life balance in the public sector, see Annex I.

Equal pay for work of equal value

71. Israel's recent sixth periodic report to the CEDAW committee included a detailed presentation of this issue. Below are a number of the most significant developments.

72. Male and Female Workers (Equal Pay) Law 5756-1996 – A 2014 amendment requires public bodies that report on employees' salaries to include a gender salaries account. An additional amendment from the same year authorizes Labour Courts to award monetary compensation for a violation of the law even if no monetary damage has been incurred.

73. Gender Salary Gaps Survey – In 2015–2016, the EEOC at the MoLSAaSS conducted a survey which examined prevailing perceptions of employers regarding gender salary gaps. For some examples and data regarding gender gaps in salary, see Annex I.

Programs to promote gender equality in wages – EEOC

74. For data regarding individual complaints of discrimination in the workplace, see Annex I. For significant case law following EEOC civil actions, see Annex III.

75. “Of Equal Worth” – This was a 2012–2015 joint venture of the EEOC and three (3) different NGOs (“Shatil”, the Israel Women Network and “Adva”), funded by the EU, that aimed to reduce gender pay gaps. One of the products developed by the venture is the “Salary Gaps Calculator”, an innovative tool for gender-related analysis of an organization's pay data. For details, see Annex I.

76. MoSTaS training kit – In late 2015, the MoSTaS, in cooperation with Google, launched a training kit on implicit and unconscious gender biases in the workplace. This can be downloaded from the Ministry's website.

Sexual harassment

77. This issue has been discussed in previous reports. The following are a number of significant updates.

78. A National Plan – Following the decision of the Ministerial Committee on Gender Equality, which received a status of a Government Resolution (No. 3229 of December 7, 2017), a committee was established to formulate a national plan for the prevention of sexual harassment, headed by the Director General of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women. For details, see Annex I.

79. Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law 5758-1998 – A number of amendments have been made to this law, including to the statute of limitations for a sexual harassment lawsuit, to the ability to claim compensation without proof of damages and to the definition of positions of authority or dependency. For details, see Annex I.

80. Prevention of Sexual Harassment Regulations (Amendment) 5774-2014 – This obliges institutions of higher education to take steps to prevent sexual harassment. Institutions with 2,000 students or more are also obliged to appoint two (2) trained persons responsible for this issue.

81. A Voluntary Code for the Prevention of Sexual Harassment – In 2016, the Association of Rape Crisis Centers, in collaboration with the MoEI and the Standards Institution published a “Voluntary Code for the Prevention of Sexual Harassment at Work”, elaborating on issues that the law does not address.

82. Insurance Indemnity – In May 2014, the Ministry of Finance (MoF) issued a binding procedure according to which insurance companies may not grant indemnity to a defendant for costs incurred by sexual harassment.

83. Activities of the AASW – For details, see Annex I.

84. Enforcement Statistics – For data on the enforcement of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, see Annex II.

Health and safety at work

85. A long list of legislation and regulations ensure safety and health in the workplace. For significant measures that have recently been added to these frameworks, see Annex I.

86. For data relating to the activity of the MoLSAaSS Labour Inspection Service, see Annex II.

Article 8

Trade unions

87. Since the submission of our third periodic report, dozens of new trade unions have been established, some in new fields such as the communications and insurance industries. This increase follows a number of judicial decisions in which courts ruled that employees should not be prohibited from unionizing, increased competition between labour unions and increased awareness amongst employees of their rights.

88. Freedom to form a trade union – No change has occurred since the submission of our third periodic report.

89. Individual Freedom to join a trade union – This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. In 2009, the Collective Agreements Law 5717-1957 was amended in order to impose criminal liability on an employer who refrained from hiring a person, worsened terms of employment or dismissed an employee because of membership, non-membership or discontinuance of membership in a trade union.

90. Foreign Workers According to the Histadrut constitution, any worker over the age of 18, who is a civilian or resident or migrant worker who is lawfully employed in Israel, and which undertakes to accept the Histadrut Constitution, its principles and the decisions of its institutions, may become a member of the Histadrut. Since some of the asylum seekers (Visa 2(A)(5)) have no prohibition and/or restrictions and are currently allowed to work, it was decided that asylum seekers that hold a valid permit of this kind, will be accepted as members of the Histadrut. The Histadrut's Tel Aviv-Jaffa District established a department for foreign workers that serve as a center for assistance and professional protection for this community. For a recent judicial decision on this matter, see Annex III.

91. Independence of trade unions – This has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred since the submission of the third periodic report.

Collective agreements

92. In 2009, the Collective Agreements Law 5717-1957 was amended in order to require employers to negotiate with new trade unions, although there is no obligation to reach an agreement with regard to a new collective agreement. For details, see Annex I.

93. New Collective Agreements – Significant collective agreements are signed from time to time between employers, employees and trade unions. For data regarding collective agreements that have been recently registered, see Annex II.

The right to strike

94. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the third periodic report.

95. Public Services – For additional information concerning “public services” in this regard, see Annex I.

96. For data concerning strikes, industrial sanctions, persons involved and working days lost, see Annex II. For a recent ruling regarding the constitutional nature of the right to strike, see Annex III.

Article 9

Social security coverage

97. This issue has been discussed in our previous reports. The following branches of social security are all covered: health care, sickness, old age, unemployment, employment injury, family and child support, maternity, disability and survivors and orphans. For significant amendments that have been made to entitlement to social security since our last report, see Annex I.

98. Holocaust survivors and older persons – In April 2014, the Government approved Resolution No. 1568 titled “National Plan for Assisting Holocaust Survivors” The Plan is designed to reduce the gaps created as a result of former agreements on this issue and to equalize the entitlement conditions to all Holocaust survivors in Israel. For additional information, see Annex I.

99. General disability pension – Significant amendments have been introduced in this field, among them Amendment No. 201 to the National Insurance Law of January 2018, determines that as of January 2018, the disability pension will be gradually increased and as of January 2021, the annual increase will be in attached to the rate of increase of the national average salary (on January 1 of each year). For additional information, see Annex I.

Periodic review of benefits

100. Section 1 of the National Insurance Law requires that the “basic amount” defined in the law, which is the basis for the calculation of NII allowances, is updated in January of every year. Since 2006, this is done in accordance with the rise in the consumer index over the previous year. Additionally, the NII frequently assesses the scope of allowances in light of changes in the poverty line and the effect of allowances on overcoming poverty. Recently, the Economic Efficiency Law (Legislation Amendments for Achieving the Budget Goals for 2019), made some significant changes in the area of long-term care benefits, for additional information, see Annex I. For recent changes made as a consequence of increases in minimum wage, including the restructuring of the entitlement to long-term care benefits in order to enable the same number of nursing hours, even given an increase in the minimum wage and the cost of care, see Annex I.

Non-contributory social assistance

101. As a rule, all residents are obliged to pay national insurance fees, including those who are not working. Exceptions to this rule include married women and widows who do not work outside of the home. This latter group is nevertheless entitled to the great majority of the allowances, except those intended for employees, without the accumulation of privileges attached to employment.

102. Moreover, certain allowances are financed by the MoF and are not dependent on the payment of national insurance payments. These include income support, alimony, old age and survivors’ benefits for elderly new immigrants, benefits given to those who affected by ringworm, polio, acts of hostility, and more.

Private social security

103. There are no private social security schemes in Israel.

Equal enjoyment of pension rights

104. Entitlement to Pension – There is no distinction between the enjoyment of pension rights between men and women. Note that in the previous generation of Pension Funds that were closed in 1995 women have the ability to withdraw their pensions at the age of 62 rather than 67 in the existing Pension Funds.

105. Retirement Age and Old-Age Pension Benefits – According to the Retirement Age Law 5763-2004, the retirement age, and consequently the age of entitlement to old-age pension benefits, is 67 for men and 62 for women. The Law set a mechanism which was supposed to raise the retirement age for women, incrementally, to the age of 64. In 2017, the implementation of this mechanism was made conditional on the submission of the Minister of Finance’s recommendation to the Knesset Finance Committee, following the work of a professional, interdisciplinary Public Committee. According to an amendment made in 2017 to the Retirement Age Law, the Knesset Committee is to address these recommendations no later than February 2018.

106. Regardless of these developments, the “entitlement age” for women, that is to say, the age at which a woman is entitled to an old age pension regardless of income or qualifying period, is being raised, incrementally to equal that of men (70 years).

107. No distinction is made between men and women regarding qualifying periods or amounts.

108. For details of the increase in the old-age pension benefit and for the reduction in the qualifying period required for a “seniority supplement” to this pension, see Annex I. For judicial decisions, see Annex III.

Social security entitlements of non-nationals

109. The National Insurance Law and the National Health Insurance Law apply to Israeli residents. Section 2 of the National Insurance Law defines who is not considered a resident in this regard.

110. Persons who are employed in Israel but are not citizens or residents (mostly foreign workers) are granted NII coverage in the following designated insurance categories: maternity insurance, work accident insurance and insurance against bankruptcy of the employer. In addition, they are entitled to child benefits and health insurance. For details, see Annex I.

111. For information on the right to health services – See below, under Article 12; for International social security conventions – see above under Article 2; for examples of recent relevant Court rulings, see Annex III.

Expiration of residency status

112. The Committee expressed concern about the revocation of permanent residency permits held by residents of the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. In this context we wish to clarify that permanent residency can expire when the person leaves Israel for a period longer than seven (7) years or acquires citizenship or residency in another country. Expiration of residency is relevant only with regard to residence abroad for a period longer than seven (7) years, rather than a temporary stay abroad. Moreover, a person can regain residency, if he or she maintains an affinity to Israel despite life abroad, if he or she lived in Israel for two (2) consecutive years, and if certain conditions were met (this however does not relate to the revocation of residency due to terrorist activity).

113. The following statistics relate to residents of eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem whose residency expired: 2017 – 22 persons (10 women and 11 men), 2016 – 53 persons (27 women and 26 men), 2015 – 89 persons (37 women and 52 men), 2014 – 69 persons; 2013– 93 persons and in 2012 there were 114 expirations of residency. As can be seen, these figures are extremely small.

114. For recent judicial rulings on this matter, see Annex III.

Article 10

The right to enter a marriage with full and free consent

115. This issue has been detailed in Israel's previous reports. The following are significant updates.

116. Amendment to the Marital Age Law 5710-1950 – In December 2013, the Knesset amended the Marital Age Law (Amendment No. 6) raising the minimum marital age from 17 to 18. For details, see Annex I. For data, see Annex II.

117. Police Enforcement of the Marital Age Law – The Police deal with violations of the Marital Age Law. Police officers hold periodic meetings with representatives of the PIBA to ensure that they receive the relevant information. In addition, all police districts are given lectures on the Law's implementation and enforcement.

118. Prosecution according to the Marital Age Law – In May 2018, the Attorney General's Guideline No. 4.1113 concerning the Attorney General's policy regarding applications for a marriage of minor permit was published.

119. Also, in May 2016, the State Attorney published a Guideline entitled "The Prosecution Policy regarding the marriage of a minor's offence", setting out the Prosecution's policy in respect to this offence. For details regarding these guidelines, see Annex I. For recent case law, see Annex III.

120. Eliminating Polygamy – The Government recently reaffirmed its commitment to tackling this phenomenon (Government Resolution No. 2345, January, 2017). For details, including the establishment of an inter-ministerial committee, an Attorney General guideline on prosecution policy and educational endeavours, see Annex I.

121. Measures to prevent the phenomena of women whose husbands refuse to grant a divorce ("Agunot") – A number of important additional measures have been taken in this regard. For details, see Annex I.

Citizenship and entry into Israel law (temporary provision) 5763-2003

122. In its concluding observations to Israel's last periodic report the Committee expressed concern with the process of family reunification for foreign spouses. In January 2012, for the second time, an extended panel of the Supreme Court scrutinized and upheld, by a majority, the constitutionality of the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003 (H.C.J. 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07 MK Zehava Galon et. al. v. The Minister of Interior et. al.). The Law was extended several times and it is currently valid until June 30, 2018.

123. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has stated that there is room to consider some changes in policy, given the length of time that has passed since the enactment of the Law and the difficulties that it has caused. In light of this, the Minister of Interior initiated a number of changes aimed at providing humanitarian relief. For example, the Advisory Committee to the Minister may now determine, in relevant humanitarian circumstances, to recommend a permit valid for two (2) years, as opposed to just one (1) year. In 2016, The Minister of Interior decided to approve the upgrading of the status of persons who hold staying permits in Israel and their family reunification requests that were filed until 2003 were approved, so they and their minor children will receive an A/5 permit to reside in Israel. This upgrade is subject to several tests, among them: proving the existence and sincerity of the marriage, center of life test and lack of criminal and security prevention). So far 1,600 persons received such an upgraded permit, which entitles its owner to national insurance and health insurance.

124. See Article 12 below for details of the health insurance arrangement established in 2012 for the benefit of persons who hold temporary permits for stay in Israel pursuant to the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law.

Parental custody in divorce and child support

125. In recent years, the recommendations of two (2) public committees were submitted to Ministers of Justice – one regarding parental responsibility in divorce and the other regarding child support. These recommendations have yet to evolve into law, although there have been a growing number of judicial decisions that determine joint, equal or shared custody. However, in most cases, the main guardian remains the woman. For a recent precedential case on these issues, see Annex III.

Tender years doctrine

126. In its concluding observations, the Committee expressed concern that, in the case of a divorce, custody of children up to the age of six (6) is given to mothers. To clarify, where there is a conflict between parents, Family Matters Courts and Religious Courts are obliged to consider the best interests of child as a primary consideration. According to the law, both parents share equal parental responsibility towards their children. However, the law enshrines a “tender years” presumption whereby children under the age of six (6) should be in custody of the mother, unless the court considers that there are special circumstances to rule otherwise.

127. In December 2011, a public committee recommended cancelling this presumption and provided a number of guidelines to be considered in determining custody and contact issues, including the physical and emotional wellbeing of the child and domestic violence. These recommendations were adopted by the former Minister of Justice, and were presented in a governmental bill, but are still publicly debated.

Social services for families

128. More than half of the cases known to social services departments are family-related. Most therapeutic intervention is provided by the family’s social worker, although where needed, the family is referred to a specialized social worker. For details, see Annex I.

Equality of access to childcare

129. Lower Contribution to the Cost of Day-care centers – Following the recommendations of a Public Committee on poverty in 2013, as outlined below, the MoLSSaSS significantly lowered the contribution paid by parents of poor families for the day-care of toddlers at-risk. For details, see Annex I.

130. Day-care centers in minority communities – For increased Government support of day-care centers in minority localities, see Article 6 above.

Social services for older persons in the community

131. Social services that enable older persons to remain in their normal living environment for as long as possible include day centers, social programs, enrichment centers and a “Supportive Community” program which includes a hot-line, health care services and a community counsellor. For details, see Annex I.

132. For further social services, including a Government call center, see below under “Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of Older Persons”.

Social services for people with disabilities

133. A detailed up-to-date account of the services that enable PWD to live independently within the community was presented in Israel’s initial report concerning the implementation of the CRPD, submitted in May 2017. For significant highlights of the main developments since the submission of our third periodic report, see Annex I.

Health care

134. For details of the accessibility of health facilities, see Article 12.

Maternity protection

135. This issue has recently been presented in detail in Israel's sixth periodic report to the CEDAW committee. It has also been discussed in our previous reports. The following are significant relevant updates.

136. Extension of maternity leave – A 2010 amendment to the Women's Employment Law extended maternity leave to 26 weeks, of which 14 remained with payment and 12 without. An employer is prohibited from firing an employee during this extended period. A further amendment, made in March 2017, extended maternity leave for which parental allowance is paid from 14 to 15 weeks.

137. Parental leave – A father may now take paid parental leave for a period of one or more weeks (instead of a minimum of three (3) weeks). Furthermore, he may take seven (7) days of parental leave simultaneously with his wife, according to the provisions of the Law. Also, according to Amendment No. 60 of 2018 to the Women's Employment Law, a mother that gave birth to more than one child in a multiple delivery is entitled to extend her maternity leave by three (3) additional weeks for every child that was born in that delivery (from the second one). A further period is given to the spouse of such a mother. For details, see Annex I.

138. An amendment to the National Insurance Law 5755-1955 in 2016 provides that an employee whose wife is self-employed is entitled to parental leave in lieu of his wife. Note that a recent amendment allows for the granting of certain social rights to those holding temporary status (A/5, A/2, A/2, A/4) without the previously required waiting period of 183 days.

139. Additional amendments – For details with regard to the protection of pregnant women against dismissal, absence from work of a spouse following birth, maternity leave in the event that the infant is hospitalized and absence from work due to fertility treatment, see Annex I.

140. National Insurance – For information on national insurance benefits given in the event of birth, and during maternity leave, see Article 9.

141. Foreign workers who are pregnant – Subsequent to a High Court of Justice (HCJ) ruling on this matter, Population and Immigration Authority (PIBA) published in 2013 an amended "Procedure regarding Pregnant Foreign Workers" whereby a foreign worker who is legally employed and pregnant is entitled to remain in Israel in accordance with the provisions of the procedure. A female worker who gave birth during her first 63 months of employment may choose either to leave Israel with the child and then to return and continue working in Israel, or to prolong her stay in Israel, with the child, up to 63 months from having first received a B1 visiting visa. For details on this ruling, see Annex III.

Paid employment of children

142. This issue has been presented in our previous reports. The following are significant amendments that have been legislated since the submission of our third periodic report.

143. Youth Employment Law 5713-1953 – As mentioned in our previous reports, this law prohibits the employment of youth under the age of 15. A number of amendments augmented the protection afforded to youth. See Annex I.

144. Additional provisions for the protection of youth in the workplace – See Annex I.

145. Enforcement – In the summer of 2014, the MoEI conducted a nationwide enforcement campaign relating to the enforcement of youth labour laws, with special emphasis on the employment of youth in event halls. In 2015, the MoEI conducted a publicity campaign aimed at employers of youth in order to reinforce compliance with the law. For data on the enforcement of the Youth Employment Law, see Annex II.

Economic, social and cultural rights of older persons

146. There are currently almost 940,000 older persons (ages 65 and over) in Israel, approximately 11.1% of the overall population. Over 95% reside in the community.

147. Government Call Center – The Ministry of Social Equality (MoSE) runs a call center which provides information and advice in all matters relating to socio-economic rights of older persons. For examples, see Annex I.

148. The call center also provides assistance in cases of violence against older persons, maintains contact with the welfare authorities and the Police, relaying information, including regarding possible economic exploitation.

149. Public Service for Older Persons – A 2017 amendment to the Senior Citizens Law 5750-1989 mandates that a public service for which there is a queue (for example, services given in the post office, government offices etc.) shall be offered to a person above the age of 80, upon request, without the need to queue.

150. For information on the promotion of employment amongst older persons, social security benefits, social services, food aid, health services and continuing education, see Articles 6, 9, 10, 11B, 12 and 13.

Programs against abuse, abandonment, negligence and ill-treatment of older persons

151. Social Services – Approx. 55 local authorities (out of 255) have units dedicated to handling mistreatment of the older persons. They specialize in locating and identifying victims of abuse, treating them and other family members and handling offenders. In 2014, 5,318 older persons were treated in these units. Social workers in all authorities may refer older persons to immediate protection in respite care or, or if need be, to nursing homes.

152. For details on training in the identification of older persons who are victims of abuse, inheritance planning, personal security in the community, the work of NGOs in this field and for data regarding criminal proceedings, see Annex I.

Economic and social rights of asylum seekers

153. General – Asylum seekers who are granted refugee status receive a temporary residency permit and are eligible to all social rights.

154. Social security – Asylum seekers whose requests for asylum are under deliberation, and are employed, are entitled to rights in three (3) insurance branches, like other non-residents. See Article 9 for further details.

155. Health – For health services offered to asylum seekers, see under Article 12.

156. Education – The Compulsory Education Law 5709-1949 applies to every child residing in the country, including children of asylum seekers. An Inter-Governmental Committee headed by the Director General of PIBA is currently examining the need to broaden the social rights of asylum seekers.

157. Employment – Complaints regarding employment of asylum seekers are brought before the Police or the relevant enforcement authority. Violations of employment law are enforced. Legal aid is provided without charge in cases in which there are indications of trafficking or forced labour, etc.

158. Family reunification of non-residents – Current PIBA policy is not to grant separate work and stay permits to spouses of temporary foreign workers (similar to tourists and illegals) currently in Israel, as this has been found to encourage illegal overstay. Note, that foreign workers receive a temporary stay visa, conditional on the understanding that they are not entitled to settle permanently.

159. A foreign worker may of course marry an Israeli citizen. The citizenship procedure is set out in PIBA procedures published on their website. During this process, the foreign worker is entitled to a temporary stay permit.

160. With regard to refugees who have been recognized as such by the Minister of interior, requests for family reunification with a spouse and minor children are brought before the Director General of the PIBA, alongside a recommendation from an inter-ministerial advisory committee.

Criminalization of domestic violence

161. Domestic violence is criminalized in Israel. For details, see Annex I. For statistics regarding criminal enforcement, see Annex II.

Combating domestic violence

162. Since the submission of our previous report, the Prevention of Domestic Violence Law 5751-1991 was amended to allow the Court to extend the validity of a protection order for up to an additional year, for special reasons.

163. Police reviews – The Police conduct several periodic reviews of the treatment of domestic violence offences each year, in every police district and in several stations. Ongoing discourse with leaders of minority groups is also held, focused on improving accessibility and encouraging women to approach the Police.

164. Placement of social workers in police stations – This project aims to strengthen cooperation between the Police and welfare authorities, provide initial assistance to victims and to prepare appropriate intervention and assistance programs in advance, including risk assessment. For details, see Annex I.

165. Centers for Prevention and Assistance – For data regarding the activities of these centers, see Annex I.

166. Additional steps – An inter-ministerial committee on preventing domestic violence was established and its recommendations considered. For details, see Annex I. For details of rehabilitation hostels for abusive men, prevention programs for youth and the obligation of public health officials to report suspicious incidents, see Annex I.

The support and rehabilitation of victims

167. The MoLSAaSS offers a range of services for families coping with violent situations. These include shelters, transitional apartments, financial grants, assistance in housing, an emergency hotline, child and youth emergency centers and other services for children. For details of these programs and relevant data, see Annex I.

Raising public awareness and training

168. Raising awareness amongst health care professionals – In 2000, the MoH established a designated staff department, the National Social Work Service, which is responsible for the promotion of the identification of victims of domestic violence and sexual assault and for the quality of care provided to the victims. Many training days on this subject have been given over the years.

169. Raising public awareness – For the important work of the AASW in raising public awareness, including annual awareness campaigns and a state-sponsored event held in the President's residence, see Annex I.

170. Police training – Training courses are given to a wide-range of police officers. For details, see Annex I.

Trafficking in persons

171. In its concluding observations to Israel's last periodic report the Committee expressed concern that Israel ensure the full and effective implementation of its Anti-Trafficking Law. Recent years have shown that Israel has continued to make remarkable progress in its efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons. The United States' State Department has ranked Israel in Tier 1 for seven (7) consecutive years – an important external evaluation that Israel is fully meeting the minimal standards required for the eradication of TIP.

172. As a result of combined and sustained efforts, there has been a significant decrease in the number of cases of trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, which nowadays rarely appears in its "classic form". However, new patterns of trafficking, where violence and withholding of passports are not present and victims are seemingly not frightened or subjected to control of another person, pose challenges which are being addressed.

173. For a number of examples of the many measures employed to combat all forms of trafficking in persons, see Annex I.

174. Investigations, prosecutions and convictions – Data demonstrates a decline in the volume of cases of trafficking in persons for the purpose of prostitution, reflecting the success of the combined efforts of all parties in previous years. See Annex II.

175. Precedential Judicial decisions – For recent case law, see Annex III.

Assistance and protection to victims

176. Israel provides services to assist victims of trafficking, none of which are contingent upon cooperation with law enforcement. These include medical services, including psychiatric care; legal aid; shelters; work permits; and a forfeiture fund which allocates budgets for rehabilitation and protection of victims, and to bodies providing victim aid and combatting trafficking. For details, see Annex I.

Article 11

A. The right to the continuous improvement of living conditions

Poverty line

177. The definition and calculation of the national poverty line has been discussed in our previous reports. There have been no changes in this regard.

178. Each year the NII publishes a report on the extent of poverty and social gaps. Recent data reveals improvements in the measures of inequality and poverty. These are attributable to the changes in policy that have brought about an increase in net disposable income for families, older persons and younger persons, particularly in the lower and middle earning groups – primarily the increase in the minimum wage and in child and older person benefits. Increased rates of employment are also a contributing factor. For recent data, see Annex II.

National action plan to combat poverty

179. In its previous concluding observations, the Committee recommended that the State party establish a comprehensive policy to address the problem of poverty. We are pleased to report that this matter has been given serious attention. In 2013, the Minister of MoLSAaSS appointed a broad public committee to formulate recommendations for a national action plan to combat poverty and create equality of opportunity. The following are some main points of the national plan as implemented by different Ministries:

180. The National Insurance Institute (NII) – Following the recommendations of the public committee, the NII amended the income test for income supplement benefits; increased income supplement benefits for older persons; created a savings account for every child; and created a heating benefit. For details, see Annex I.

181. The MoLSAaSS – In 2015, the MoLSAaSS founded a poverty response program which operates in 94 localities with a low socio-economic index, at a cost of some 100 Million NIS per year (27.8 Million USD). This program includes two (2) sub-programs, which are based on poverty-conscious social work and inclusive practices. For details and data regarding the programs, see Annex I.

182. The MoF – As reported in our third periodic report, the Increasing Participation in the Work Force and Reducing Social Gaps (Negative Income Tax) Law 5768-2007, initiated an “earned income tax credit” (EITC – that is, negative income tax) as an innovative means for reducing poverty amongst working families and raising participation in the workforce. Since the submission of our third periodic report, a number of amendments have broadened the eligibility for EITC. For details, see Annex I.

183. For information relating to the promotion of employment amongst disadvantaged populations, including professional training vouchers – see Article 6; for information relating to developments in the eligibility for public housing, see Article 11D.

B. The right to adequate food

The national council for food security

184. Following the Committee’s previous concluding observations, we are pleased to update regarding the legislation of The National Council for Food Security Law 5771-2011, which aims “to promote nutritional security amongst the residents of Israel, in the spirit of human dignity and the principles of equality, justice and fairness...” and established the National Council for Food Security which advises the Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Social Services in this regard. For details of the mandate of the National Security Council and its recent activity, see Annex I.

Food aid

185. The MoLSAaSS provides support for programs for older people, community programs and daytime centers which include meals. Hot meals are provided to the homes of older people, specifically Holocaust survivors, in conjunction with the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany. For details, see Annex I.

The quality and safety of animal and plant produce

186. For details, see Annex I.

Food waste

187. Following a survey conducted by the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development (MoAARD) concerning food loss at the production stage, the Ministry is currently reviewing policy tools, prior to the adoption of a strategic plan. For details of this and other ongoing projects, see Annex I.

The dissemination of nutritional principles

188. The Nutrition Department in the Ministry of Health (MoH) works in several ways to disseminate knowledge of healthy nutrition, including amongst disadvantaged populations. For details, see Annex I.

189. Food in schools – The new Supervision on Food Quality and Proper Nutrition in Education Institutions Law 5774-2014 authorizes the Minister of Education to set terms and conditions regarding the food and nutritional values of foods sold in education institutions. The Law also requires food suppliers to publish the nutritional composition of foods sold within the institution.

190. Additional guidelines – new guidelines have been adopted or updated in order to ensure or encourage proper nutrition: Nutrition and Food in Summer Camps for Children and Youth (2016); MoH Protocol on Healthy Food in Hospitals (2017); and MoH Circular on Healthy Food in Mental Health Institutions (2012).

Access of disadvantaged populations to food

191. Allocation of Reused Water for Agricultural Purposes – In 2014, transitional regulations were published that give priority to farmers from among the Arab population in the allocation of reused water for agricultural purposes, at a subsidized price (Water (Criteria for the Allocation of Water for Agriculture) (Transitional Provisions) Regulations 5774-2014).

192. Allocation of Quotas for Milk and Egg Production – for information on Quotas for Milk and Egg Production, including on allocation of such Quotas to breeders of the Arab, Druze or Circassian populations, see Annex I.

193. Simplifying the Procedure for Proving Ownership Rights of Private Land for the Purposes of Subsidies and Allocation of Resources – Allocation of water for agriculture, quotas for milk and egg production and agricultural subsidies require the applicant to demonstrate legal ownership of the relevant land. Farmers from the Arab population often face difficulty in doing so since the transfer of rights is often not updated in the Land Registry. In 2015, the MoAaRD published a procedure aimed at facilitating proof of ownership. The procedure is presently implemented with reference to a long list of subsidies (rural development, land preservation, the encouragement of capital investments in agriculture, natural disasters, pasture and more) and in relation to allocations of water, milk and egg production quotas.

194. Efforts to eradicate the Brucellosis Disease in the Negev – A number of Government Ministries embarked upon a multi-year project (2014–2019) for the reduction of Brucellosis Disease in sheep and goat herds in the Negev, in the wake of increased human contraction. For details, see Annex I.

C. The right to water

Adequate and affordable access to safe water

195. Ensuring the supply of safe water in adequate quantities is part of the overarching goal of Israel's water economy. It is achieved in a number of ways, including by sustainable, long-term planning and development of water infrastructure and economic regulation which sets cost-based rates in order to ensure the funding of required infrastructure investments. For details, see Annex I.

196. Desalination – Five (5) large-scale seawater desalination facilities and some smaller brackish water desalination facilities currently provide about 50% of domestic water requirements. Regulations govern the quality of desalinated water.

Access to sufficient and safe water

197. In general, the water supplied in Israel, especially for home consumption, is of high quality and safe according to international standards. The quality and reliability of supply is guaranteed, among other things, by the connection of every locality to the national water system. Remaining localities which still rely on disconnected water sources are undergoing development planning.

198. In some cases of illegal construction, there may be legal or practical obstacles to connecting to the supply infrastructure and water is obtained from a more central point in the public system.

199. Access to Water in Bedouin Communities – Following a pilot program that began in 2014, water provision to Bedouin communities is currently done through direct private water connections to the main water pipeline, through its own water meter.

Affordability of water services

200. General – Water and sewage rates are determined in a manner intended to cover the overall recognized expenses of suppliers so as to ensure the efficient allocation of supply. For details, see Annex I.

201. Discounted rates – The Water Rules (Determining the Recognized Amount) 5776-2016 introduced discounted rates for groups of persons in need. For details, see Annex I.

202. Disconnection of water supply – the Water and Sewage Corporation Rules (Disconnection of Water Supply) 5776-2015 dramatically amended the instances in which water supply may be disconnected. For details, see Annex I.

Monitoring the quality of water

203. For details, see Annex I.

Education concerning the use of water

204. There is a high level of awareness in Israel, ingrained in early education, of informed and economical water use. For details of measures taken, including regarding the use of water in times of crisis, see Annex I.

D. The right to adequate housingHomelessness

205. Data – According to data held by the Ministry of Construction and Housing (MoCH), during the course of 2016, 1,267 people defined as “street dwellers” by their local social services department received a monthly allowance. This is not necessarily indicative of the total number of homeless people, some of which may not have been identified by social services.

206. Services – These were outlined in our previous report. The MoLSAaSS offers services for street-dwellers within the community, including provision of make-shift shelters for overnight use in emergency situations, as well as rehabilitative and occupational services throughout Israel. This program assists 1,800 street-dwellers annually.

207. Public Housing – For updates relating to public housing, see below.

Affordable housing

208. Acceleration of Construction – The Planning and Building Proceedings for the Acceleration of Residential Construction (Transitory Provisions) Law 5771-2011 was enacted in order to expedite the construction of affordable housing, creating a new planning committee for this purpose. This was replaced in 2014 by the Promotion of Construction in Preferred Residential Sites (Transitory Provisions) Law 5774-2014 which established special planning procedures for preferred residential sites, in order to accelerate the construction of housing in these areas. In particular, these provisions provide fast track for setting detailed plans in order to enable issuing building permits and provide sufficient housing supply.

209. According to the Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS), whereas 2009 saw the start of construction of 35,165 new apartments (defined as the moulding of the building’s foundations), 2015 saw the start of construction of 50,558 new apartments.

210. Additional amendments set in 2018 were designed to increase the availability of affordable rental housing, see Annex I.

211. Taxation – In 2016, the Economic Efficiency (Legislative Amendments in the Implementation of Economic Policy for the Budget Years of 2017 and 2018) Law 5777-2016 imposed a “multiple apartments” tax on the third or more apartment owned. The Law was approved by the Knesset, yet did not enter into force. Five petitions were filed to the HCJ against Chapter 12 of the Law. For a recent judicial decision on this matter, see Annex III.

212. Regulation of the private rental market – In its previous concluding observations, the Committee expressed concern with regard to regulation of the private rental market. We are pleased to report a number of significant steps recently taken in this regard.

213. On 13th June 2016, the Government directed the Minister of Finance to establish an inter-ministerial committee to examine incentives for landlords to rent their properties for a period of at least five (5) years at a set, index linked, rental price. This resolution also directed the establishment of a MoJ’s Committee to recommend measures that may be taken to improve the efficiency of dispute resolution between landlords and tenants, including the establishment of a designated court to this end (Government Resolution No. 1528).

214. Following the work of the inter-ministerial committee in July 2017, the Knesset approved Amendment no. 1 to the Rental and Loan Law 5777-2017, which includes a special chapter regarding rental for residential purposes. This chapter regulates, among other things, the relations between the tenant and the owner, and increases the protection and certainty in this market. The chapter sets instruction in regard to the contract (requirement of a written contract), the apartment (it defines apartments as “inhabitable” if they lack, for example, plumbing, electricity or natural light), define the landlord’s responsibilities for repairs, including timeframes; types of payments that the owner can collect for the tenant, the amount of collateral which the owner may demand, instruction in regard to the end of the legal relations between both sides etc.

215. Rental Assistance – In its previous concluding observations, the Committee recommended increasing rental assistance. We are pleased to report that since the submission of our third periodic report, and following two (2) Government Resolutions (of March 2012, allocating 160 Million NIS (43.8 Million USD) to this issue and of January 2016, allocating additional 47 Million NIS (13 Million USD)).

216. In March 2012, Government Resolution No. 4433 regarding “Increase in Government Aid in the Field of Housing and Preservation of the Stock of Public Housing for Eligible Persons” allocated a budget of 160 Million NIS (44.5 Million USD) for the increase of rent subsidies.

Public housing

217. See our previous reports for details of the legislative and policy frameworks relating to public housing in Israel. Below are some amendments that have been made since our third periodic report.

218. Eligibility criteria – A number of substantial updates have been made to broaden the eligibility criteria for obtaining public housing. For details, see Annex I.

219. The Management of Public Housing – During the years 2015–2016, the MoCH invested 393 Million NIS (109.2 Million USD) in the maintenance of public housing.

220. Waiting Lists for Public Housing – For details of waiting lists for public housing and an increase in rent contributions given to those on the waiting list, see Annex I.

221. Increasing availability of Public Housing – In its previous concluding observations, the Committee recommended increasing the number of social housing units. We are pleased to inform the Committee that approx. 1,850 additional apartments have been purchased from funds accumulated from the sale of other public housing apartments, at a cost of about one Billion NIS. Furthermore, two (2) government agencies (the “Jewish Agency” and “Amigur”, who manage some of the public housing) are planning the construction of 2,650 housing units in retirement homes, by 2020. For details, see Annex I.

222. Publication of Tenders for the Sale of Public Housing in Arabic – In 2017, “Amidar”, a national housing company, began to publish tenders for the sale of housing in Arabic as well as in Hebrew. The MoCH has established a special website in Arabic that includes all information presented in the Hebrew website and additional information specifically intended for the Arab population. Such information covers the governmental program for affordable housing (“A Price for Residents”), the procedure for participating and upgrading participation in the program, financial benefits, the technical specifications of the flats on offer, etc. Furthermore, in 2015–2016, the Ministry widely published campaigns aimed at the Arab population through advertising “A Price for Residents” projects in Nazareth and in Sakhnin. The Ministry continues to operate to promote linguistic accessibility for the Arab population.

Accessibility

223. Israel’s initial report concerning the implementation of the CRPD includes a detailed account of the steps taken to improve the accessibility of housing for PWD. For details of the most significant measures, see Annex I. For recent case law, see Annex III.

Preventing housing on polluted sites

224. Legislative and other measures ensure that housing is not built on polluted sites or in immediate proximity of sources of pollution. For details, see Annex I.

Legal provisions governing eviction from housing

225. For data relating to evictions over the past five (5) years, see Annex II. These figures demonstrate that there is a steady decline in the number of eviction orders granted each year. Moreover, only approx. 3% of the eviction orders are executed, due to settlements reached with the debtor prior to eviction and to the fact that several orders may relate to the same property.

Legal provisions governing eviction from public housing

226. The MoCH may initiate eviction proceedings against squatters or tenants with a monetary debt. In both situations, there is a central committee that examines every case on its merits and exhausts an administrative procedure prior to the initiation of legal proceedings.

227. In 2016, a public committee was formed in order to examine eviction from public housing. It suggested that eviction proceedings no longer be pursued in relation to tenants with monetary debt, but rather replaced by improvements in debt collection. The committee also recommended the establishment of an interdepartmental committee charged with examining the circumstances of squatters (note however that the chairperson and committee members were disputed regarding these recommendations). Following these recommendations and the above-mentioned disagreement, the Director General applied to the Attorney General and requested his decision on the matter. In August 2017, a meeting was held with representative of the MoCH and MoJ, in which it was decided that in regard to persons who are entitled and received public housing but are indebted for rent payments – an eviction will only be conducted in extreme and exceptional cases after all other procedure for the rent collection have been utilized and the tenant is unwilling to pay the debt. In regard to squatters to public housing – it was decided that such persons such be evicted with no exceptions pursuant to the law. It was further agreed that in order to deal with dozens cases of squatting, a set of rules addressing the priorities for eviction will be developed, and approved by the Deputy Attorney General (Civil Affairs).

228. For data on persons evicted from public housing from 2011–2014, see Annex II.

Illegal structures in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem

229. In its previous concluding observations, the Committee expressed concern regarding the demolition of illegal structures in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem.

230. Illegal construction harms the local population, as it does not take into consideration planning policies and parameters that are needed to ensure quality of life, the welfare of the population and public needs. Enforcement measures against illegal structures are adopted in accordance with legal guarantees and following due process, subject to judicial review and the right to appeal. Authorities exercise discretion in the execution of demolition orders and give priority to the demolition of illegal structures that pose an obstacle to city development, for example, an illegal structure that blocks a sewer pipe system, a planned school, access to roads, etc.

231. For data regarding the demolition of illegal structures in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem and, conversely, construction permits granted, see Annex II.

Planning and housing in the Bedouin population

232. In its previous concluding observations, the Committee expressed concern regarding planning and eviction in the Bedouin population.

233. In November 2015, the MoAaRD completed a study designed to collect demographic information and planning data concerning the Bedouin population in the Negev. On the basis of this study, recommendations were formulated to expand existing localities and establish new ones, whilst regularizing some Bedouin localities at their current location. For details of the Bedouin localities with approved outline plans, see Annex I.

234. With regard to the planning related to the rest of the clusters in the Bedouin diaspora, planning companies were recruited to conduct feasibility studies and to examine special planning solutions. This process is being conducted with the participation of the population in each region. These companies are currently conducting field surveys and are to make planning recommendations for the consideration of the Authority for the Regularization of the Bedouin Housing in the Negev. This course of planning, with special emphasis on the participation of the Bedouin population, is unprecedented in Israel.

235. The Government encourages movement to regulated localities by providing unique financial benefits. These benefits include, inter alia, provision of land plots for free or at very low cost and compensation for the demolition of unauthorized structures.

236. With regard to demolition of illegal structures, note that enforcement activities are conducted only against structures that were constructed after 2010, in areas that do not belong to any local authority. All enforcement activities are conducted according to the law. For data relating to the demolition of illegal structures, see Annexes I and II.

National health system

237. As prescribed by the National Health Insurance Law detailed in Israel's previous reports, every Israeli resident is entitled to health insurance, including extensive medical treatment and medicine provision. The following are a number of important recent amendments which extended health coverage to a number of other groups.

238. Health Insurance for Palestinian Residents who Hold Stay Permits – The National Health Insurance Regulations (Enrolment in a Health Fund, Rights and Duties of Recipients of Residence Visas under the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) (5763-2003), 5776-2016 came into effect on August 1, 2016. These Regulations entitle recipients of stay permits under Sections 3, 3A(2) and 3A1(A)(2) of the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) 5763-2016 to register in a health fund and to receive services similar in scope to those given to Israeli residents (with the exception of health services provided abroad), against co-payment as is the practice in the particular fund.

239. The population in question includes Palestinian minors who have received a stay permit in order to reside with a parent legally residing in Israel, Palestinian residents who have received a stay permit to reside with a spouse and those who have received the stay permit on special humanitarian grounds. Since the Law has entered into force, approximately 2,716 permit holders joined an HMO health insurance plan.

240. Health Insurance for Minors without Civil Status – The MoH signed an agreement with the Meuhedet Health Fund for the provision of the full range of health services (with the exception of health services provided abroad) to minors resident in Israel without civil status. This agreement was renewed in 2015, with a number of significant improvements. For details, see Annex I. Since the renewal of the agreement, there has been a steady increase in the enrolment of previously uninsured minors. For data, see Annex II.

241. Health Care for Foreign Workers – In June 2014, the HCJ ordered the State to bring health care arrangements for foreign workers in the care giving field, who have been legally resident in Israel for over ten (10) years, closer to the arrangements applicable to Israeli residents (H.C.J.1105/06 Workers Hotline v. The Minister of Social Services) Consequently, in 2016, an amendment was made to the Foreign Workers Order (Employee Health Benefits Package) 5761-2001, which regulates the health services to which legal foreign workers in the care giving field are entitled. For details, see Annex I. For data regarding gaps in health parameters, such as life expectancy, between the Jewish and Arab Population, see Annex I.

Accessibility of health facilities

242. Health funds – Health Funds are obliged to make vital health services available to every patient. Each Health Fund has developed a system for provision of home visits to the elderly and to PWD. In April 2017, the MoH distributed a circular defining “home-bound” patients to whom such services should be offered.

243. Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities (Accessibility Adjustments to Health Services and Places Providing These Services) Regulations 5776-2016 – Regulations published in September 2016 address the physical accessibility adjustments that need to be made to existing medical facilities.

244. Home care – The MoH is developing networks to enable further care and rehabilitation in the home, with an emphasis on continuity of care, and offers support programs for individuals in their transition from hospitalisation to community.

Health services in outlying areas

245. Health services in the Negev – On 23rd September, 2014, the Government allocated 100 Million NIS (27.8 Million USD) for the development of health services in the Negev area (Resolution No. 2025).

246. Incentives to Health Funds – Between 2011 and 2013, the MoH offered Health Funds incentives totalling 20 Million NIS (5.6 Million USD) per annum for infrastructure improvements in outlying areas. For details, see Annex I.

247. New hospitals – The MoH has decided to open two (2) new general hospitals, one in Be’er-Sheva, the other in Haifa. 15 Million NIS (4.2 Million USD) were allocated for the years 2015–2016, for the purpose of establishment of a new hospital in Be’er-Sheva, and the land for the hospital has been allocated. As for the Haifa hospital, the allocation is in the planning stages. A medical school in the Northern Galilee has also been established.

248. For details of the allocation of hospital beds, staff and other resources, and new incentives for physicians willing to move to outlying areas, see Annex I.

Reducing inequalities in healthcare

249. In recent years, the MoH has enhanced efforts to minimize gaps in health care and address inequalities in health.

250. Unit for Reducing Inequalities – This Unit, established in 2013, is charged with narrowing disparities in economic accessibility to health services, including reducing the impact of cultural differences in the use and quality of health services. For details of the Unit’s activities and achievements, see Annex I.

251. Incentivising Health Funds – In 2012–2014, approx. 55 Million NIS (15.3 Million USD) were distributed to projects aimed at narrowing geographic or social disparities. Funding criteria for 2015–2016 added emphasis on services provided where there are social disparities, including interventions in the fields of pre-diabetics, diabetes and child obesity in the Arab population.

252. Mental Health Services – The transfer of responsibility for mental health services within the community to Health Funds has resulted in the establishment of dozens of new clinics, many of which are in outlying areas.

253. Investments – For an estimate of the funds invested by the MoH to reduce inequalities in healthcare, see Annex II.

Measures to reduce inequalities in relation to persons of Ethiopian descent

254. The MoH has put together a series of policies aimed at the inclusion of persons of Ethiopian descent, focusing on improving cultural accessibility, adequate representation, accessibility to health rights, reducing diabetes and strengthening confidence in the health system, including reducing the duration for addressing complaints of racism to less than 48 hours. For further examples, see Annex I.

Health services available to the Bedouin population

255. Health clinics and medical services – As of April 2016, there are 60 health clinics providing for the Bedouin population in the Negev, including independent physicians who work with these clinics and provide services. Local medical services are also available outside the Bedouin localities, such as in Be'er-Sheva, Yeruham, Arad, Dimona, Omer, Mitzpe-Ramon, etc.

256. Clinics in unauthorized villages located throughout the Negev are computerized, air conditioned, and equipped according to the standards followed by all the Health Funds in the country.

257. Nurses Serving the Bedouin Population – As of April 2016, there are 871 employed nurses who treat patients of all populations in the southern district, 100 of whom specifically serve the Bedouin population. For more information, see Annex I.

258. Medical Centres – In 2014, the Government undertook to establish six (6) medical centers providing services during night hours and on weekends in the Negev area (when regular clinics are closed), among them in Bedouin localities (Ar'ara, Rahat, Kuseife and one that will serve Lakiya, Hura and neighbouring localities). The total budget for this issue is 18.5 Million NIS (5.15 Million USD) (Resolution No. 2025).

Health care for women in the Arab population

259. Leadership in health – In addition to the general measures outlined above for the reduction of inequalities, programs designed especially for women in the Arab population also include a "Leadership in Health" program. This program includes a series of workshops for women from the Arab population who want to be community leaders on health and nutrition, addressing studies that show high obesity rates among Arab women. For details, see Annex I.

260. Child and maternity care – See below.

Health services for non-residents

261. In addition to the legislative amendments presented above, a number of medical services are available to migrants and foreign workers. These include emergency medical treatment, medical services given to infants and pregnant women (including routine immunizations), volunteer clinics that provide medical and mental health services, a community program for HIV/AIDS treatment and oncology treatment. For details, see Annex I.

The cost of health-care services

262. The total budget of the MoH for 2018 currently stands on 35.46 Billion NIS (9.85 Billion USD) (5 Billion NIS (1.39 Billion USD) of which as an expenditure which is depended on income) and additional 409 Million NIS (113.6 Million USD) as authorization for future budgetary obligation.

263. The total budget of the MoH for 2019 currently stands on 42 Billion NIS (11.7 Billion USD) (38 Billion NIS as Net expenditure and 4 Billion NIS as expenditure depended on income) and additional 500 Million NIS (138.8 Million USD) as authorization for future budgetary obligations. In addition, the budget for the medical services health basket, which is financed by the health insurance tax (collected by the National Insurance Institute) and supplementary State budget transferred to the HMOs, is expected to be 53.4 Billion NIS (gross) (14.83 Billion USD).

264. Funding of Health Funds – For updates, see Annex I.

Approval of drugs and medical equipment

265. For details of the legislative arrangements in place to ensure that drugs and medical equipment are scientifically approved and have not expired or become ineffective, see Annex I.

Training of health personnel on health and human rights

266. For details, see Annex I.

Child and maternal health

267. Parenting Skills – The “Possible and Healthy” (“Efshari-bari”) initiative aims to develop the well-being of toddlers by providing tools for improving the child-parent bond and for creating a family environment conducive to optimal parenting through a healthy lifestyle and attentive nourishment. The MoH and Joint Israel are leading this program based on an evidence-based model developed in the UK.

268. Infant hearing screening – In 2010, a successful national infant hearing screening program was launched. For details, see Annex I.

269. Genetic Testing – Measures have been taken to improve accessibility to genetic testing in order to reduce congenital anomalies. Additional genetic tests have been included in the services covered by National Health Insurance.

270. National Screening Plan for Breast Cancer Detection and Treatment of Myomas – For details, see Annex I; Immunisation programs – See below.

Child and maternal health in the Bedouin population

271. Main Projects – In September 2011, the Government authorised 90 Million NIS (24.3 Million USD) for social and communal issues, including health, in the Negev (Government Resolution No. 3708). This was allocated to the increase of Bedouin women mediators working towards the reduction of infant mortality; continued research to map genetic diseases unique to the Bedouin population; enriching flour with folic acid for the benefit of pregnant women; and establishing healthcare centers within the largest schools in the Bedouin population.

272. An updated plan was approved in February 2017, encompassing the improvement of health services, including emergency health services, safety issues and better responses to the health needs of young children (Resolution No. 2397), with a budget of 10 Million NIS (2.85 Million USD).

273. Immunization – The coverage of Bedouin children is over 90%, which is similar to the general population. Vaccinations are conducted in clinics and by mobile immunization teams which reach infants in the Bedouin diaspora. A computerized tracking system enables the identification of infants who are overdue for their vaccinations. 2014 figures show that the rate of influenza immunization among the Bedouin population significantly surpasses that of the general population (41.8% and 31.3% respectively).

274. Mother and child healthcare stations – As of October 2017 there are 47 mother and child health stations located in the southern district, 27 of which (57%) are designated for the Bedouin population. As of April 2016, there were 128 positions of mother and child health nurses in the southern district, 73 positions of which are designated for clinics that serve the Bedouin population specifically. 90% of these positions were filled.

275. In February 2017, the Government resolved to renovate the mother and child health clinics in certain localities, including Bedouin ones, with a total budget of 40 million NIS (10.5 million USD (Resolution No. 2397).

276. An additional budget of 5 Million NIS (1.38 Million USD) was approved by the MoH in order to better cope with health needs at the Bedouin population including – special training for nurses and doctors as well the mediators that work with the mother and the child.

277. School nurses – As of April 2016, there were 44.75 positions for school nurses in the southern district. Of these, 35 positions (78.2%) were designated for schools of the Bedouin population, and these positions have been filled.

278. Autism – Following findings that there is under-diagnosis of children within the autism and communication impairment spectrum amongst the Bedouin population in the Negev, a special program has been initiated to diagnose and treat children. Since the program began in 2010, 120 children have been diagnosed and have begun treatment, in contrast to the three (3) that were known when the program began.

Infant mortality

279. Data – Israel’s infant mortality rate continues to decrease, from 6.3 deaths for every 1,000 live births between 1996 and 1999, to 3.1 deaths in 2015. There remain gaps in infant mortality rates between different populations, although the decrease in rates is common to all. For more details, including on gaps between infant mortality between different populations, see Annex I. For statistical information on infant mortality rate, see Annex II.

Fertility treatment, contraceptives and sexual health

280. This has been discussed in our previous reports. In 2010, an amendment was made to relevant regulations to enable women to freeze eggs in order to preserve their fertility. Further legislation was passed governing egg donation, subsequent to which regulations regarding compensation for egg donation were published. For recent court rulings on the matter of fertility treatments, see Annex III.

Raising awareness of sexual health

281. In its previous concluding observations, the Committee recommended that Israel increase its efforts in the creation of educational programs and services on sexual and reproductive health. In this regard, schools all over the country study and discuss sexual education and gender issues in several educational, such as: Life Skills”, “Preparation for Family Life” and “Worth Talking”. These programs include topics such as: physical development, dating and relationships, love, sexual and gender identity, gender equality, sexual relations, couple and sexual communication, birth control, pregnancy, adolescent prostitution, gender diversity, various family types, career planning, warning lights in a relationship and how to receive assistance and more. Schools can also choose to focus on gender studies in many ways and programs offered by the Gender Equality Unit in the MoE. Such programs are taught to all pupils Jewish and Arab alike, for information on education programs in schools in the Arab population and Jewish religious communities, see annex I. Over the past years, greater emphasis has been placed on the fine line between normative and harmful behaviour. The activities focus on positive communication, consent, mutuality, sexual relations and birth control.

282. In 2013, an HPV immunization program was initiated for eighth-grade female pupils. In 2015 the program was expanded to include boys as well. This program includes an explanation of the ways the virus is transmitted, including an explanation regarding safe sex.

Diseases linked to water and adequate sanitation

283. Waterborne infections – Since drinking water is treated and inspected frequently (see Article 11C above), waterborne infections are rare. Pathogens are generally spread through contamination of food rather than water.

284. Sanitation – Updated regulations, published in 2010, set higher levels of treatment in existing and future wastewater plants. For details, see Annex I.

285. Access to sanitation – As of 2014, 99.9% of the population had access to sanitation. For additional data, see Annex II.

286. Access to sanitation in the Bedouin localities – Further to Government Resolution No. 546 (July, 2013), a comprehensive waste management program has been launched, including the establishment of regional and local recycling infrastructures, the rehabilitation and evacuation of waste hazards, including collector lines and sewage infrastructures; and education and explanatory activities concerning environmental protection, enforcement and regulation. 40 Million NIS (approx. 11.1 Million USD) has been allocated to this program.

Infectious disease control

287. Immunization Programs – In addition to a consistent program for primary childhood and school-age immunizations, immunizations are offered to high risk groups and during outbreaks of infectious diseases. The immunization program is updated periodically. For details of recent updates to child and adult vaccinations, see Annex I.

288. Influenza prevention – Each year the MoH updates its guidelines on preventing seasonal influenza and leads the national preparedness drive for pandemic influenza. Guidelines are also issued for treating people exposed to avian flu.

289. Additional measures taken to control contagious diseases – The MoH continues to update the list of notifiable diseases outlined in the Public Health Ordinance 1940. These include those of international significance, diseases under vaccination supervision, zoonotic diseases, foodborne diseases and others. Beyond regular epidemiological investigations, work is also being done on select issues as needed.

290. For details of the work undertaken and programs initiated relating to foodborne diseases (including the successful curbing of a salmonellosis outbreak in 2015); hepatitis B and C; cutaneous leishmaniasis; west Nile fever and rabies prevention, see Annex I.

291. Morbidity prevention among individuals traveling abroad and returning from overseas – For details, see Annex I.

292. International cooperation – The MoH receives reports from around the world related to health threats to the State of Israel and is tasked with reporting to bodies around the world of occurrences in its territory, in line with the obligations of Israel as a member of the World Health Organization.

Substance abuse

293. Tobacco – For examples of measures that have been taken since the submission of our previous report, including smoking prevention in the Arab population and tobacco control in the vicinity of schools, see Annex I.

Alcohol

294. Prevention of Alcohol Abuse – In 2009, the Government authorised a two-stage plan for the reduction of the exaggerated consumption of alcohol (Resolution No, 907). This included legislative steps, public awareness campaigns, youth education and the establishment of an inter-ministerial committee to formulate further steps. For more details, see Annex I.

295. Legislation – Further to this Resolution, several laws were adopted, including new restrictions on the advertising and marketing of alcoholic beverages. For details, see Annex I.

296. Training – For details, see Annex I.

297. Educational programs for youth – Programs for preventing the use of drugs, alcohol, tobacco and dangerous substances are incorporated into the school program. At high school level, the program includes lectures for parents, pupils and educators. For details of these programs, the work undertaken with pupils who are involved in drug abuse, and a MoE Youth Leadership program in this field, see Annex I.

Treatment and rehabilitation of drug users

298. The MoH operates several different types of rehabilitation centers for adults and youth. For details of recent improvements and of persons treated, see Annex I.

299. Services provided by MoLSAaSS – The Addiction Treatment Service in MoLSAaSS, is responsible for social services offered to persons suffering from alcohol, drug or gambling addictions and their families. The Service sets national policy, initiates and adapts rehabilitation and treatment programs, budgets and supervises treatment frameworks.

300. Services, both ambulatory and residential, are provided by local authorities and voluntary organizations. These services are provided by 936 social workers, counsellors and other professionals.

301. For details regarding treatment services, number of persons treated and budget allocated, see Annex I.

Prevention of HIV/AIDS

302. Preventative Measures – For details of measures taken with regard to each risk group, see Annex I.

303. Prevention and treatment of HIV/AIDS amongst persons of Ethiopian descent – A unique program provides HIV carriers from within this community with support and assistance from specially trained coordinators and social workers. For details, see Annex I.

304. Education in schools – In addition to programs relating to sexual education outlined under Article 13, schools are required to discuss HIV/AIDS with pupils. Around the World AIDS Day, the MoE's Psychology and Counselling Service uploads updated material to its website, including recommended workshops. Community organizations, such as the Israel AIDS Task Force, deliver training in schools.

Support to persons with HIV/AIDS

305. Support for carriers and their families is provided first and foremost by the social and psychological teams at eight (8) AIDS centers throughout the country. Dedicated staff is available after hours to provide support and answer questions. They also conduct home visits and accompany patients, where needed, to other services. AIDS centers have space for family discourse and support.

Dealing with stigma and discrimination

306. MoH guidelines issued in 2011 strictly forbid discrimination against HIV positive patients in all health facilities. Guidelines issued in 2017 underscore this in relation to dentistry. Cases of discrimination are brought to the attention of the MoH.

307. MoE Director-General guidelines underscore that pupils with HIV/AIDS are entitled to the same rights as all other pupils. Schools or kindergartens may not limit the educational or social activities of these pupils, unless a doctor directs otherwise.

308. Each year the MoE publish on its website contents intended for teachers, pupils and parents, regarding dealing with stigmas and discrimination. For example, each year towards World AIDS Day, the Ministry publish materials that promoted educational discourse on the matter, which include messages of tolerance towards others including patients and carriers and the importance using contraception's and of safe sex. An additional example is the international day dedicated for the fight against homophobia in the month of May. Each year the Ministry publishes dedicated contents that allows teaches and parents to explain and educate for tolerance, gender equality and gender identity. In 2017, 9th to 12th grade pupils from all populations underwent lectures and workshops by professionals, educational counsels and by members of the LGBTI community.

Affordable access to essential drugs

309. Universal health care includes affordable access to essential drugs, including anti-retroviral medicines and medicines for chronic diseases. Therefore, for residents, the treatment of HIV/AIDS, including all drugs, is included in the services to which they are entitled free of charge.

310. Foreign residents, including those with no legal status and no medical insurance, may receive treatment through a special community program set up in 2014 by the AIDS and Tuberculosis Department in the MoH, with the involvement of AIDS clinics, NGOs, pharmaceutical companies and other commercial organisations. It is funded through a combination of Government budgets, donations of ART drugs by pharmaceutical companies and a volunteer pharmacist service.

The use of restraints in psychiatric hospitals

311. Restraining orders are issued only in accordance to the law and are used only in cases of imminent danger of physical harm to the patient or to others, as a consequence of deterioration in her/his mental health condition, and not as a means of “punishment”.

312. In May 2016, the MoH Director General appointed a steering committee to examine possible plans to reduce the use of mechanical restraints in Israel. The Committee was headed by the Ombudsman of the Medical Professions at the MoH and included professionals from mental health departments, the Commissioner for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities and more. As of March 2017, the use of such restraints has already decreased by more than 50%. In June 2017, the Committee published its recommendations that include, inter alia, a recommendation to introduce methods that will replace restraining measures thus enabling immediate professional, safe and non-aggressive treatment for challenging patients’ behaviours, and a three-year plan to reduce the use of such restraints in the medical system. In the practical aspect, the Committee determined that retraining patients is allowed only in very exceptional and narrow situations of real and immediate threat to the life or limb of the patient, other patients or a staff member, and only if every other alternative have failed. The Committee further recommended that restraints will be used for the shortest time period required until the immediate threat is over. It was further recommended that a restrained patient is to be examined by a physician every hour, in order to examine if he/she can be released. The Committee also recommended that a hospital will not have restraining authority for more than 24 hours, and in exceptional cases in which a Hospital Director considers it necessary, he/she must request a special permit from a designated psychiatric committee. If this committee provides such a permit for up to 24 additional hours, the relevant patient will have the right to appeal to a court of law and receive free of charge legal aid. The Committee further recommended that minors (under the age of 13) will not be restrained or put in isolation alone and for more than one (1) hour. The committee suggested that its recommendations will be anchored by legislation.

313. In April 2018, a Circular of the MoH Director General was published. The Circular states that the mechanical restraints of a patient and her/his isolation are extreme measures, which can be taken only in unusual circumstances, and only for the purpose of preventing immediate substantive physical danger to the patient or her/his surroundings. It was further instructed that it is prohibited to impose mechanical restraints or isolation on a patient in the following situations: as a measure of punishment; as an educational measure; during a psychomotoric unrest that does not endanger the patient and her/his environment; when the patient refuses to comply with instructions; as a means of discipline and more. According to the Circular, an instruction for the imposition of mechanical restraints or isolation of a patient will only be given based on the medical considerations, and solely for the purpose of preventing danger to the patient or her/his surrounding, and when such risk is of a high level of certainty. In general, isolation should be preferred over restraint, but if there is an alternative measure that can reduce the harm caused to the patient, her/his health and her/his dignity – the staff must prefer such alternative. The restraining of the patient should be for the shortest period possible, and will terminate when the circumstances for the provisions of the restraint cease to exist.

Education on economic, social and cultural rights

314. The Department of Civil Education and Co-existence in the MoE promotes human rights education and activities to bring together different groups in Israeli society. For example, days which reinforce issues of rights and equality are marked with expansive activities (such, for example, as Human Rights Day and International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination); schools run programs to promote tolerance and prevent racial discrimination; teach classes on civic and democratic values and “life skills” classes which include topics such as gender-based discrimination and LGBTI rights and prevention of domestic violence.

315. The MoE also offers hundreds of hours of professional development for teachers and others on democratic values, dignity, pluralism, tolerance and preventing discrimination. For more details, see Annex I.

Free, compulsory primary education

316. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. As outlined, education is compulsory and free for all until the age of 17 (12th grade). In 2015, the Compulsory Education Law 5709-1949 was applied such that state kindergartens now provide free education to children from age three (3).

317. Implementation of the Long School Day – The full implementation of the Long School Day and Enrichment Studies Law 5757-1997 has been postponed for an additional three (3) years, until 2019. For details, see Annex I. As of December 2016, this law is implemented in schools in 106 communities and in kindergartens in 92 communities, according to socio-economic parameters.

318. Parental payments – Parental payments may be requested for compulsory or elective services. The only compulsory service is the insurance of personal accidents. All other services are elective. Schools are instructed that pupils must not be prevented from participating in activities due to financial difficulties. For details, see Annex I. For details of the maximum amounts permitted for collection during the 2016–7 academic year, see Annex II.

319. Special education – Special education services are provided for children with special needs between the ages of 3 to 21 who are entitled to such services by law. For numbers of pupils and classrooms for pupils with disabilities, according to population, see Annex II.

320. School meals – For additional developments concerning meals served at schools, see Annex I.

321. The Early Childhood Council – In August 2017, the Knesset passed a new law which directs the establishment of an Early Childhood Council. For details, see Annex I.

Secondary education

322. Prohibition of discrimination – The Pupil's Rights Law disallows any form of discrimination in the registration of pupils to schools. In 2011 and in 2014 this law was amended to include country of origin, sexual orientation and gender identity in the list of grounds upon which discrimination is prohibited.

323. New Educational Programs – The MoE has launched four (4) programs aimed at pupils with high scholastic achievements, two (2) of which are aimed at pupils from disadvantaged backgrounds. For details, see Annex I. For statistical data concerning participation, see Annex II.

324. Programs for the promotion of education amongst minority groups – See below.

325. Data – For data concerning pupils in schools by level of education, distribution of pupils by classrooms and populations, literacy rates and the extent of formal education possessed by the adult population during the years 2006–2014, by population group, gender and age, see Annex II.

Technical and vocational education

326. High school pupils choose a theoretical or vocational-technological track. The vocational-technological track offers specialized programs in a broad range of fields, including machinery, electronics, healthcare and biotechnology. For more details, see Annex I.

327. Over the last five (5) years, the number of pupils in these various programs has grown from 100,000 to 150,000.

328. Technological Education in the Bedouin population – The MoE runs three (3) technological high-schools for Bedouin pupils in the Negev (in Hura, Rahat and Segev-Shalom). In 2015, 1,090 pupils, both male and female, attended these schools.

329. Between 2013–2015, a practical engineering course was attended by 171 Bedouin students in the Negev, both men and women. This included a full scholarship, monthly stipend, transportation fees, personal tutoring and placement assistance following graduation for Bedouin students who met the requirements.

Higher education – accessibility to the Arab population

330. In recent years, the rate of Arab students among the total students studying for their first degree has been steadily increasing. According to figures from the Council for Higher Education (CHE) in 2014–2015, the percentage of Arab students studying for a bachelor's degree stood at 14.6%, compared to 9.9% in 2006–2007. For more data on the accessibility of the Arab population to higher education, see Annex II.

331. Multi-year plan – In January 2010, the Planning and Budgeting Committee (PBC) of the CHE launched a multi-year plan for the years 2011–2016 to make higher education more accessible to minority populations, including the ultra-Orthodox population, with a budget of approx. 500 Million NIS (138.9 Million USD).

332. As part of this plan, guidance centers aimed at the Arab population have been established, preparatory colleges at which minority students study receive State funding and a wide range of courses including academic preparation, social guidance and scholarships are offered to students from the Arab population. For more details, See Annex I.

333. Plans for a state-funded academic college – The CHE has also started the process of establishing a state-funded academic college in an Arab locality in northern Israel. This institute will render higher education more accessible to the Arab population, especially to women.

334. Universities Psychometric Entry Test – The Psychometric Entrance Test (PET) is a standardized national exam in Israel, generally taken as a higher education admissions exam. It may be taken in Hebrew, Arabic, Russian, French, Spanish, or Hebrew/English. The PET is evaluated for cultural fairness, with sensitivity to gender, religion and population. The Arabic version of the test is drafted by native Arabic speakers who ensure that there are no unequal reference points in the different versions. The MoSTaS allocates scholarships to Arab students for the preparatory course.

335. Arabic language education – In 2014 the CHE appointed a committee to evaluate study programs in Arabic. This committee, composed in part of international experts, examined Arabic language education at four (4) Israeli universities. In its report, the committee expressed satisfaction with the level of Arabic teaching and commended the Hebrew University in this matter.

Integration of persons of Ethiopian descent in higher education

336. In June 2016, following the recommendations of a working group that examined the obstacles faced by persons of Ethiopian descent, the CHE decided to implement a number of measures aimed at increasing the participation of Ethiopian students in higher education. 100 Million NIS (28.6 Million USD) have been allocated to fund additional classes, personal tutors, employment preparation courses, stipends and scholarships.

337. In 2017, the CHE established a Steering Committee that includes representatives of the Academia, public representatives and students, the majority of which are of Ethiopian descent. The Steering Committee examined this issue including barriers, and required changes, and in 2017 presented its preliminary recommendations to the PCB. The Steering Committee recommended inter alia, on the following:

- The expansion of the “achievements” program that operates in 32 cities and municipalities, in which young persons of Ethiopian descent who are most suitable for higher education are located and receive assistance in accessing higher education institutions. In addition, in order to assist persons of Ethiopian descent to better prepare for the psychometric exam (higher education entry exam), vouchers are allocated for preparation courses and a budget was allocated for pre-academic colleges for the provision of academic or financial assistance for students of Ethiopian descent;

- The Steering Committee noticed that while the rate of the Ethiopian population in Israel is about 1.7% the rate of students of Ethiopian descent is only 1.1%. Therefore, the PCB set a target of reaching at least a rate of 1.7% of students of Ethiopian descent at the end of the current five-year plan;
- The Council also set a goal of decreasing the dropout rate of first degree students of Ethiopian descent, which is 20% higher than that of the general population, by allocating personal academic tutoring classes and financial assistance if needed, financing residence in students dormitories is required, psychological assistance (personal or group sessions), including by diagnosing learning disabilities. The total annual budget per student for this issue is between 4,000 and 5,500 NIS (1,100–1,530 USD);
- Excellence program for students of Ethiopian descent – In the frame of this program students of Ethiopian descent will receive enrichment and empowerment classes and academic and financial assistance if needed;
- The CHE sees great importance in transferring students of Ethiopian descent from programs that were intended specifically for them, to general programs;
- In addition, the Steering Committee also formed a plan to absorb academic staff members of Ethiopian descent in higher education institutions. According to this plan, as of 2018–9 academic year the PBC will allocate two (2) three-year scholarships for this purpose, and in the following years this number shall increase to four (4) such scholarships. The total budget for this plan is 9.5 Million NIS (2.64 Million USD);
- The MoSTaS is operating since 2017, a program intended to encourage students of Ethiopian descent to study second, third and post doctorate degrees, with scholarship of 50,000, 80,000 and 100,000 NIS respectively (13,900, 22,200 and 27,800 USD respectively). The Ministry of Aliya and Immigrant absorption also provides scholarships for third degree students in the sum of 72,000 NIS (20,000 USD);
- In addition to the steps described above, there are additional measures which are taken by the relevant higher education institution, i.e. personal assistance, cognitive counselling, instrumental enrichment course, test preparation workshops etc.

Integration of ultra-orthodox students in higher education

338. The PBC invests significant efforts and resources in order to allow the ultra-Orthodox population to integrate into the higher education system and subsequently into the labour market.

339. In 2012, the PCB and the CHE established a five-year program aimed at integrating the ultra-Orthodox population into academic frameworks which are adapted for them. As part of the plan, ultra-Orthodox frameworks were established near universities and colleges, under their responsibility.

340. A 2016 evaluation of the program reveals that the program exceeded most of its goals. Several petitions were filed to the HCJ against these programs, claiming, inter alia, that these programs permit gender separation. These petitions are still pending before the Court.

341. The PBC also established a program for scholarships and loans for ultra-Orthodox students. During 2016 2,500 ultra-Orthodox students participated in this program, 50% of whom were women.

Integration of women in higher education

342. In 2013, the Committee for the Promotion and Representation of Women in Higher Education was established in order to examine the main issues and obstacles to the representation of women in Academia. In July 2015 it published its recommendations focusing on three (3) prominent issues – encouraging women towards academic research, recruiting women into the academic staff and promoting women in the senior academic staff.

343. In July 2015, the PBC and the CHE approved several resolutions on the basis of these recommendations. For details, see Annex I.

Access of students with disabilities to higher education

344. For a number of recent legislative amendments improving accessibility of higher education to PWD, see Annex I.

Adult and continuing education

345. For details, see Annex I. For further education programs offered to Arab and Bedouin women, see Article 6.

National expenditure on education

346. The MoE allocates funding in accordance with clear and transparent criteria which ensure equality, whilst providing additional budgets where needed for educational and socio-economic reasons. In recent years, the MoE has allocated a major part of its additional resources differentially, giving preference to peripheral areas, weaker populations, and accordingly to the Arab population. Thus for example, in the MoE's budget for 2018, 69.3 Million NIS (19.25 Million USD) were allocated by the MoE for additional education services for the Bedouin population in the Negev. Also in 2018, 239.3 Million NIS (66.47 Million USD) were allocated for the establishment of new classrooms in Arab and Bedouin localities (together with additional budget of 178.1 Million NIS (49.47 Million USD) as an authorization for budget obligation), and additional 27 Million NIS (7.5 Million USD) were allocated for the establishment of new classrooms in Druze localities (together with additional budget of 13.5 Million NIS (3.75 Million USD) as an authorization for budget obligation). For data on national expenditure, see Annex II.

Investment in schools for Arab, Druze, Bedouin and Circassian populations

347. Data – For disaggregated information on pupils by level of education, see Annex I. For data relating to numbers of classrooms, see Annex II.

348. National plans – A number of Government resolutions have sought to define five-year plans which direct substantial investment into education and the building and refurbishment of schools for the Arab, Bedouin, Druze and Circassian populations. For details, see Annex I.

349. Financial assistance – The MoE oversees a scholarship assistance plan to assist pupils from weak families from all populations, including the Arab, Bedouin, Druze and Circassian populations. These assist in funding general parental payments, learning aids and assistance in payments for field trips and socio-educational activities. In 2015, an estimated 44% of the budget was allocated to pupils of Arab, Bedouin, Druze and Circassian populations.

350. Construction of new Schools – In its concluding observations, the Committee recommended that measures be taken to address the shortage of classrooms in schools for Arab Israeli children. In this regard, there has been a steady increase in the number of schools. From 2010 to 2015, the number of schools in the Arab system rose by 15.1% (from 878 to 1,011). By way of comparison, the number of schools in the Hebrew system rose by 9.3% (from 3,480 to 3,807).

351. Schools in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem – New schools have been constructed in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem. These schools contain approx. 800 classrooms. An additional 1,000 classes are in planning and construction stages. New sport halls were also established in Beit Safafa, Al-Issawiya, and other neighbourhoods.

352. Every year, the Jerusalem Municipality opens on average more than 100 new classrooms. Temporary solutions are provided where needed, including adding transportation to existing schools, renting buildings and “evening schools”. In the years

2011–2015, 20 Million NIS (5.6 Million USD) were allocated for the renting of 255 classrooms.

353. For initiatives to improve the quality of education in the eastern neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, including the distribution of computers, lengthening the school day, science programs and scholarships, see Annex I.

354. New Schools for the Bedouin Population – In the last five (5) years, over 30 new schools were established for the Bedouin population, in addition to new kindergartens. Most of the schools are equipped with science laboratories, computer classrooms and other advanced educational tools.

355. Schools serving the Bedouin population which have adopted specially developed educational programs receive budgetary priority and pedagogical support, as part of the Marom program for elementary schools and middle schools. Over the last three (3) years and during the next two (2) years, these schools will receive additional school hours as part of the differential budget.

356. Special Education Frameworks Serving the Bedouin Population – A three-part rehabilitation complex for Bedouin children with special needs in Tel-Sheva is under construction in accordance with Government Resolution No. 3148 of 2011. One part is fully operational and provides education services to 270 Bedouin children. It comprises of eight (8) kindergarten classrooms, a school with ten (10) classrooms for children with mobility and/or moderate mental disabilities, and an elementary school with ten (10) classrooms for children with mental disabilities. The second part of the complex will include a rehabilitative day-care center, health and rehabilitation center, a center for art therapy treatment, and a research unit under the auspices of the Ben-Gurion University. The third part of the complex will include two (2) post-elementary schools and a sports center. One of these schools was approved for construction. In total, 550 children will attend this three-part complex upon its completion.

Language of instruction

357. For details, see Annex I.

359. For information on mixed schools in which pupils of different populations study together, see Annex I.

Investment in the education of pupils of Ethiopian descent

360. General overview – Following two (2) important Government Resolutions, a series of round tables and a public consultation exercise, below are a number of important steps that have been taken. For details of these Resolutions, and the budgets allocated, see Annex I.

361. Educational programs – The MoE undertook an examination of all existing programs, including those run by NGOs, in light of the basic tenants. A committee was also formed to examine and authorize special programs or frameworks for pupils of Ethiopian descent, both in formal and informal education. An educational unit on Ethiopian heritage was incorporated into the general curriculum.

362. Increasing parental involvement – This has included the creation of parent groups for every age-group in about 25 schools with a high percentage of pupils of Ethiopian descent.

363. Academic support – As of November 2017, a program to provide academic support in core studies, including the provision of food during the extra classes, has aided almost

7,000 pupils of Ethiopian descent in 35 areas. A similar program provides support in 162 additional schools. Additional projects at pre-school and elementary school level have focused on Hebrew language skills.

364. Matriculation – 49.24% of pupils of Ethiopian descent are eligible for a full matriculation certificate, compared to 64.2% of the general population. The MoE has created programs to enhance rates of matriculation amongst pupils of Ethiopian descent. As of November 2017, 220 pupils participated in 45 programs, run in 28 schools with a high percentage of pupils of Ethiopian descent. “Virtual coaching” is also offered in order to improve academic achievement.

365. Social support –teachers and social workers have been trained in cultural sensitivity and dialogue; seven (7) psychologists, who have also received training in cultural sensitivity, have been placed and trained in local authorities with a high percentage of pupils of Ethiopian descent in special education.

366. The Research Institute for Innovation in Education at the Hebrew University runs a project that trains high school girls of Ethiopian descent to aid other children of Ethiopian origin in the development of cognitive, social and linguistic skills, to better prepare these children for school.

367. Financial aid – The MoE has developed a program of coupons which enable each child of Ethiopian descent to participate in an after-school activity in her/his neighbourhood. As of November 2017, approx. 60% of these coupons had been utilized, with an expectation that over 80% will be used.

368. The MoE also allocates financial assistance to children of Ethiopian descent to the sum of 400 or 800 NIS a month (105 or 210 USD), based on their date of immigration. In 2015, a total of 10,322 pupils received this assistance.

The education of girls

369. Admission criteria – The Compulsory Education Law makes no distinction between boys and girls. Schools are generally not permitted to have admission criteria and their intake is determined by catchment area alone. This is true of both mixed and single-sex schools. For more details, see Annex I.

370. The value of educating girls – This is generally appreciated in Israel by all segments of society.

371. Sciences, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) – For information on the efforts made to augment the education of girls in the STEM subjects, see Annex I.

372. Prevention of Early Marriage – For details of efforts made by the MoE to prevent early marriages, which have a direct effect on the education of girls, see Annex I.

Drop-out rates

373. The Pedagogical Administration at the MoE has defined reducing dropout rates as a central objective of their work plan for the coming years.

374. Statistics – Action taken in recent years has significantly reduced, in almost every grade, the dropout rate among all the populations in Israel. The total dropout rate has decreased by 42.8% between 2010 and 2013.

375. For information on the dropout rate in Jewish and Arab populations, see Annex I. For information on the eligibility for matriculation certificates, see Annex I.

376. Attendance Officers – Attendance officers regularly visit schools in order to maintain school attendance, in accordance with the Compulsory Education Law (Section 4). For data regarding their work with different populations, see Annex I.

377. Guidelines and Procedures – For updates, see Annex I.

378. Encouraging achievement – The MoE runs programs to improve the achievements of pupils who are at risk of dropping out. For examples of programs, see Annex I.

Enhancement of access to the cultural heritage of mankind, including through new information technologies

387. On November 2017, in a joint project of the Prime Minister’s office and the MoCS, the National Museum Internet Portal¹ was initiated. This Portal currently includes and provides access to over 63,000 items, which are located in Israeli museums that receives State financial support. This portal received international recognition by its parallel European portal – European Collections, out of the understanding that items held in Israeli museums hold profound value to the history of mankind and human history.

388. In recent years another three (3) heritage sites located in Israel were recognized by UNESCO as World Heritage Sites: Beit Guvrin National Park, Nahal Mearot Nature reserve and Beit Shearim National Park. Andalusian Orchestra – In September 2017, the MoCS issued a new regulation, according to which the status of an Israeli Andalusian Orchestra that shall be chosen (an Orchestra playing classic Middle Eastern and Northern-African music) will be upgraded and shall be recognized as a national orchestra alongside the Philharmonic Orchestra. According to this regulation, the orchestra that shall be chosen by the music department and the council for culture and art in the MoCS will be entitled to an increased budget of five Million NIS (1.39 Million USD).

In addition, the Ministry provides scholarships to pupils of peripheral areas, including those of Ethiopian descent.

400. Essay and research competition – The Unit for Israeli Communities’ Heritage in the MoE holds an annual essay and research competition on issues relating to the heritage of all of Israel’s communities.

Affordable access to the benefits of scientific progress

401. The MoSTaS is dedicated to promoting science and technology in the general public and one of its main goals is to encourage pupils to study these fields. Each year it holds a series of extra-curricular activities aimed at making science more accessible to youth, with special emphasis placed on the inclusion of minority groups. These programs include the promotion of digital literacy in outlying areas; informal education in the exact sciences, particularly in areas ranked in low socio-economic brackets; improving accessibility to the ultra-Orthodox population and space-related activities for the general public, including pupils from Arabic schools.

It also examines policy in these fields. It serves as an advisory committee to the Minister of Health and to the Science and Technology Committees of the Knesset on developments in medicine, science, biotechnology, bioethics and more.

Effective protection of the moral and material interests of creators

406. According to the Copy Rights Law 5768-2007, regulates the protection of the moral right of the creator, by which the creator is entitled and may also collect a fee for the use made in her/his right. The moral right consists of two (2) rights: the right to attribution (credit) and the right to perfection of the creation so that no alteration or misrepresentation that harms the name or dignity of the creator is made.

407. The Rights of Performers and Broadcasters Law 5744-1984, regulate the protection of the right of the performer, which includes, inter alia, the right to receive proper royalties for the presentation or playing of his/her performance, as well as the moral performance right.

Freedom of scientific research and creative activity

408. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the third periodic report.

International contacts and cooperation in the scientific and cultural fields

Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Concluding observations on the fourth periodic report of Israel*

1. The Committee considered the fourth periodic report of Israel (E/C.12/ISR/4) at its 36th and 37th meetings (see E/C.12/2019/SR.36 and 37), held on 2 and 3 October 2019, and adopted the present concluding observations at its 60th meeting, held on 18 October 2019.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the fourth periodic report by the State party, despite the delay in submission, and the supplementary information provided in the replies to the list of issues (E/C.12/ISR/Q/4/Add.1). The Committee appreciates the constructive dialogue held with the State party's interministerial delegation.

3. While welcoming the establishment of a joint interministerial team tasked with reviewing and implementing the concluding observations of the human rights treaty bodies, the Committee regrets the lack of consultation with stakeholders, including civil society, during the process of preparing the fourth periodic report.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the State party's ratification in 2012 of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

5. It also welcomes the adoption of Amendment No. 200 to the National Insurance Law, which provides a gradual increase in the general disability allowance by 2021, and the progress made by the State party in those areas relating to the rights enshrined in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights indicated below.

C. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

Applicability of the Covenant

6. The Committee is concerned that, despite its previous recommendations (E/C.12/ISR/CO/3, para. 6), the State party has still not taken any measure to incorporate the Covenant in the domestic legal order and that the provisions of the Covenant cannot be invoked before, or directly applied by, the courts, other tribunals or administrative authorities.

* Adopted by the Committee at its sixty-sixth session (30 September–18 October 2019).

7. The Committee reiterates its previous recommendations that the State party incorporate the rights of the Covenant in its domestic legal order. It also recommends that the State party enhance judicial training on the nature and scope of the State party's obligation under the Covenant and on the justiciability of the Covenant. The Committee draws the attention of the State party to its general comment No. 9 (1998) on the domestic application of the Covenant.

Application of the Covenant to the occupied territories

8. The Committee reiterates its deep concern about the State party's position that the Covenant is not applicable beyond its sovereign territory and that, given the circumstances in the occupied territories, the law of armed conflict and humanitarian law exclusively are considered to be applicable. The Committee also reiterates its regret that the State party refuses to report on the situation in the occupied territories.

9. The Committee reminds the State party that the applicability of its human rights obligations in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, as well as the concurrent application of international human rights law and international humanitarian law in a situation of armed conflict or occupation, have been affirmed by the International Court of Justice in its advisory opinion rendered on 9 July 2004 on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. This is also the view consistently adopted by various human rights treaty bodies, including the Committee, and expressed in the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and in the reports of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, the Secretary-General and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. The Committee urges the State party to comply with its obligations under the Covenant in line with the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. It also reiterates its previous recommendation that the State party include, in its fifth periodic report, information on the situation regarding the Covenant rights enjoyed by people in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

State party's policies relating to the Occupied Palestinian Territory

10. While noting the serious security situation affecting the State party, the Committee remains deeply concerned about the severe impact of the policies adopted by the State party relating to the Occupied Palestinian Territory, namely the closure policy and the related permit regime regarding the Gaza Strip and the occupation and settlement policy in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, on the enjoyment of Covenant rights by people living there, including the rights to work, food, water and sanitation, health and education, and to their cultural rights. It is also concerned about the expansion of Jewish settlements in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan, including through delegated powers granted to organizations such as the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish National Fund.

11. The Committee reminds the State party that it has positive and negative obligations with regard to the Occupied Palestinian Territory, depending on its level of control and the transfer of authority, that it should not raise any obstacle to the exercise of such rights in those fields where competence has been transferred to the Palestinian authorities and that any measures taken by the State party should ensure that the legislative and policy measures relating to the occupied territories taken by the State party as the occupying Power do not result in any permanent alteration in the political or legal status of the territories or have irreparable consequences for the people living there. The Committee urges the State party:

(a) To immediately lift the blockade on and the closures affecting the Gaza Strip and provide unrestricted access for the provision of urgent humanitarian assistance;

(b) To reduce the restrictions on items on the dual-use list to minimum levels, as strictly required by security imperatives;

(c) To take immediate steps to facilitate the free movement of Palestinians within the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip, and ensure that any measures restricting the free movement of civilians and goods from, into and within the Gaza Strip are in line with its obligations under the Covenant;

(d) To immediately halt and reverse all settlement policies and developments in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan, and rescind the delegated powers granted to organizations facilitating settlement such as the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish National Fund, and discontinue supporting these organizations.

National human rights institutions

12. While noting that several national human rights institutions exist in the State party, including the Office of the State Comptroller and Ombudsman, the Committee remains concerned that they do not meet the criteria set out in the principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (the Paris Principles) and that there is no lead agency to coordinate their activities.

13. The Committee recommends that the State party take concrete steps to establish an independent national human rights institution in line with the Paris Principles, including by strengthening the independence of existing institutions.

Free disposal of natural wealth and resources

14. The Committee is concerned about reports that the State party has given licences to Israeli and multinational companies for oil and gas extraction and renewable energy projects in the occupied Syrian Golan and the Occupied Palestinian Territory without consulting the affected communities while prohibiting Syrians and Palestinians from accessing, controlling and developing their natural resources. It also regrets the lack of information on the measures put in place by the State party to ensure that the companies do not infringe human rights while operating in the occupied territories (art. 1 (2)).

15. The Committee recommends that the State party immediately cease to issue licences for the exploitation of natural resources in the occupied territories and that it regulate the operations and activities of Israeli and multinational companies operating in the occupied territories in order to ensure their compliance with human rights standards. The Committee draws the attention of the State party to its general comment No. 24 (2017) on State obligations under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in the context of business activities.

Basic Law: Israel – the Nation State of the Jewish People

16. The Committee is deeply concerned about the possible discriminatory effect of the Basic Law: Israel – the Nation State of the Jewish People on non-Jewish people in the State party with respect to their enjoyment of Covenant rights. It is also concerned that this Basic Law, by viewing the development of Jewish settlements as a national value, may further deteriorate the situation regarding economic, social and cultural rights in the occupied territories, which have already significantly been hampered by the settlement policy (arts. 1 (1), 2 (2) and 15).

17. The Committee urges the State party to review the Basic Law with a view to bringing it into line with the Covenant or to repealing it and to step up its efforts to eliminate discrimination faced by non-Jews in their enjoyment of Covenant rights, particularly the rights of self-determination and non-discrimination and to cultural rights.

Non-discrimination

18. The Committee notes the absence of comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation in the State party and is concerned that the existing anti-discrimination legislation is not fully in line with article 2 (1) of the Covenant, given the limited prohibited grounds of discrimination, and that the State party has not taken any step to review existing legislation (art. 2 (2)).

19. The Committee recommends that the State party review existing anti-discrimination legislation or adopt comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation with a view to ensuring that such legislation prohibits all direct, indirect and multiple forms of discrimination, on all grounds, including language, colour, social origin, property, sexual orientation, birth or other status, and provides for effective remedies for victims of discrimination. The Committee draws the attention of the State party to its general comment No. 20 (2009) on non-discrimination in economic, social and cultural rights.

Bedouin people

20. While noting the adoption in 2017 of the Socioeconomic Development Plan for Negev Bedouin 2017–2021 (Government resolution No. 2397), the Committee is concerned about:

- (a) The large number of unresolved land claims;
- (b) The absence of meaningful participation of and consultation with the affected Bedouin communities in the formulation of the plan;
- (c) Reports that Bedouin people in unrecognized villages in the Negev Desert have been evicted from their homes and ancestral lands and forced to relocate to recognized Bedouin townships;
- (d) The substandard living conditions in both the unrecognized villages and the recognized townships, which are characterized by very limited access to adequate housing, water and sanitation facilities, electricity and public transportation (arts. 1 (1) and 11).

21. The Committee recommends that the State party:

- (a) Step up its efforts to resolve the pending land ownership claims in a timely, transparent and effective manner;
- (b) Consult with the affected Bedouin communities on the implementation of Government resolution No. 2397 and ensure that any policy affecting the Bedouin people is formulated and implemented following a meaningful consultation with and with the participation of the affected Bedouin communities;
- (c) Immediately stop the eviction of Bedouin people living in unrecognized villages from their homes and ancestral lands and recognize their villages;
- (d) Improve living conditions and infrastructure in all Bedouin residential localities in the Negev area.

Refugees and asylum seekers

22. The Committee is concerned about the excessively large number of outstanding asylum applications and the negligible number of people granted refugee status. It is also concerned that asylum seekers, including Eritrean and Sudanese asylum seekers who fall under the State party's temporary non-return policy and who are de facto permanently living in the State party, are not legally allowed to work and have very limited access to social security benefits and health-care services. It is further concerned about the fact that the Law for the Prevention of Infiltration (1954) requires employers to deposit 20 per cent of the monthly salaries of Eritrean and Sudanese asylum seekers into a departure fund, resulting in about 50 per cent of them earning less than the minimum wage, with severe consequences to their ability to access and enjoy Covenant rights, particularly the rights to health and to education (arts. 2 (2), 6 and 9).

23. The Committee recommends that the State party:

- (a) Improve the refugee status determination procedure with a view to facilitating the processing of applications and enhancing the fairness and effectiveness of the procedure;

- (b) Allow asylum seekers to enter the labour market;
- (c) Expand the social assistance benefits granted to asylum seekers, including health insurance, paying special attention to the needs of marginalized and disadvantaged persons, including persons with disabilities, women, children and older persons;
- (d) Repeal the Law for the Prevention of Infiltration or amend it with a view to making it consistent with the Covenant.

Right to work

24. While appreciating the overall increase in labour market participation and employment in the State party, the Committee is concerned that certain groups continue to be limited in the enjoyment of their right to work and are concentrated in low-paying sectors. The Committee regrets the lack of comprehensive and disaggregated data on the realization of the right to work (art. 6).

25. The Committee recommends that the State party intensify its efforts to increase the labour market participation of persons with disabilities, Bedouins, Arab women and ultra-Orthodox Jewish men, including by providing vocational education and training tailored to their experience and level of job skills and by fully implementing the quota for the employment of persons with disabilities. It also recommends that the State party provide comprehensive and disaggregated data on the realization of the right to work, including on labour force participation, employment, unemployment and underemployment, in its fifth periodic report.

Occupational safety and health

26. The Committee is concerned about the lack of progress made in reducing occupational injuries and fatalities and the significant decrease in the number of labour inspections carried out from 2006 to 2016 (art. 7).

27. The Committee recommends that the State party intensify its efforts to reduce occupational injuries and fatalities, including by raising the awareness of employers and workers about workplace safety and measures that could be taken to prevent injuries and fatalities and by strengthening labour inspections. It also recommends that the State party include information on accidents and diseases in the fifth periodic report.

Right to just and favourable conditions of work

28. While noting that in Israel 58 per cent of migrant workers, most of them women, are employed as caregivers on a live-in basis, the Committee is concerned that these workers are excluded from the applicability of the Hours of Work and Rest Law of 1951 and that their working conditions are not effectively monitored by the labour authorities. While noting that the State party has concluded bilateral agreements with some of the countries of origin of migrant workers to protect their rights, the Committee is concerned that workers from countries that do not have a bilateral agreement with the State party may be at risk of exploitation and abuse (art. 7).

29. The Committee recommends that the State party take measures:

- (a) To ensure that live-in caregivers are adequately paid for overtime work and provided with a weekly rest period of not less than 25 hours, including by extending the application of the Hours of Work and Rest Law to include these workers;
- (b) To enable the labour inspectorate to effectively monitor the working conditions of live-in caregivers and put in place accessible complaints mechanisms for workers in this sector;
- (c) To ensure that the provisions relating to the protection of the rights of migrant workers in bilateral agreements are in line with the Covenant and that there is full compliance with these provisions;

(d) To ensure that the rights of workers from countries that do not have a bilateral agreement with the State party are protected on an equal footing with those of workers covered by bilateral agreements.

Sexual harassment in the workplace

30. The Committee is concerned about the frequent incidence of sexual harassment in the workplace, despite the adoption of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law of 1998, and about the very small number of cases investigated and leading to prosecution (arts. 3 and 7).

31. The Committee recommends that the State take measures to strengthen the enforcement of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, that it conduct training to raise the awareness of law enforcement officials about gender-related issues and that it ensure that reports of sexual harassment are duly investigated and prosecuted, that perpetrators are adequately punished and that victims have access to appropriate redress, including compensation.

Trade union rights

32. The Committee is concerned about reports that workers in the occupied Syrian Golan are less well informed or aware of their rights, including trade union rights, thereby making it less likely that they will claim their rights or seek effective remedies in cases of violation of their rights (art. 8).

33. The Committee recommends that the State party ensure that complaints mechanisms are put in place for workers in the occupied Syrian Golan and that it take the measures necessary, including in cooperation with trade unions, to raise workers' awareness of their rights under the Covenant and the complaints mechanisms available to them.

Right to social security

34. The Committee is concerned about the continuing disparity of five years in the retirement age of men and women in the State party, which has led to a gender gap in pensions. It is also concerned that the old-age pension is insufficient for providing recipients with a decent living given the high incidence of poverty among older persons in the State party. The Committee regrets the lack of detailed information provided by the State party relating to social security benefits (arts. 3, 9 and 11).

35. The Committee recommends that the State party take the steps necessary to equalize the retirement ages of men and women with a view to closing the gender gap in pensions and that it increase the old-age pension to a level that provides recipients with a decent standard of living. It also requests the State party to include, in its fifth periodic report, detailed information on the coverage and level of social security benefits, on the indexation of those benefits and on the measures taken to extend the coverage of social security benefits to foreign workers with temporary stay visas and asylum seekers.

Protection of the family

36. The Committee is concerned that, despite its previous recommendation, the "tender years" presumption in the Legal Capacity and Guardianship Law still remains (arts. 3 and 10).

37. The Committee recommends that the State party amend the Legal Capacity and Guardianship Law with a view to abolishing the "tender years" presumption and ensuring that all decisions on child custody are made in accordance with the principle of the best interests of the child.

Personal status laws

38. While noting that religious courts have exclusive jurisdiction on issues relating to marriage and divorce, whereas the civil family courts have parallel jurisdiction on custody and alimony, the Committee is concerned that different laws and regulations apply to the parties in a dispute depending on their religion and denomination, which results in different rules and levels of protection in matters of personal status (arts. 3 and 10).

39. The Committee recommends that the State party assess the current system of religious law governing marriage and divorce with a view to harmonizing it with the provisions of the Covenant, particularly the provisions on non-discrimination in the enjoyment of Covenant rights (art. 2 (2)) and on the equal enjoyment by men and women of the economic, social and cultural rights in the Covenant (art. 3).

Family reunification

40. The Committee is concerned about the fact that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) prohibits Palestinians from the West Bank or the Gaza Strip and who are married to Israeli or East Jerusalem residents to exercise family reunification with their spouses and that this prevents them from enjoying their right to family life. It is also concerned that many families in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, who have relatives in the Gaza Strip remain separated for years due to the closure policy of the State party. Furthermore, it is concerned about the risk that Palestinian women whose right to reside in East Jerusalem or in Israel is dependent on their husband's status may, in case of divorce, lose that right, which may in turn result in them staying in abusive relationships (art. 10).

41. The Committee recommends that the State party review the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) with a view to bringing it into line with its obligations under article 10 of the Covenant and to facilitating the exercise of family reunification for all citizens and permanent residents irrespective of their status or background.

Poverty

42. The Committee is concerned about the high and growing incidence of poverty in the State party, particularly among older persons, Bedouin families, Arab Israeli families and ultra-Orthodox families. It is also concerned about the high level of income inequality in the State party, which is the highest of States members of the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development (art. 11).

43. The Committee recommends that the State party combat poverty, including by undertaking a comprehensive analysis of the underlying causes of poverty among particularly affected groups and by adopting concrete and targeted measures to address the incidence of poverty among these groups. It also recommends that the State party take effective measures to reduce income inequality among the population, including by reforming the tax system and the social security system.

Poverty and food insecurity in the Gaza Strip

44. The Committee is concerned about reports that half the population of Gaza lives in poverty and that about two thirds of households in Gaza have been suffering from food insecurity, which is largely attributable to the State party's closure policy. Moreover, and notwithstanding the explanation provided by the delegation, the Committee remains concerned about the long-lasting and hazardous impact of the aerial herbicide sprayed by private companies hired by the Ministry of Defence in areas adjacent to the fence between Israel and Gaza. It is particularly concerned about the impact of such activities on the productivity of the crops and on the soil in nearby areas in Gaza. The Committee is also concerned about restrictions imposed on the access of Palestinians to their agricultural land, water sources, irrigation facilities and marine resources. It is further concerned about the confiscation of and damage to fishing boats, which has deprived Palestinians of their means of subsistence (arts. 6, 11 and 12).

45. The Committee refers the State party to paragraph 11 (a) and (b) of the present concluding observations. It recommends that the State party commission a scientific assessment of the impact on Palestinians of herbicide spraying, in particular on their livelihoods, health, food security and environment, and that it respond appropriately to the relevant findings. In the interim, the State party should, on the basis of the precautionary principle, cease such spraying. The Committee also recommends that the State party ensure that farmers and fishermen have free access to their land, to their irrigation facilities and to their marine resources and that it refrain from confiscating and damaging boats and fishing equipment and restricting the movement of Palestinian fishermen and fishing communities.

Water and sanitation

46. The Committee is concerned that none of the unrecognized villages in the Negev are connected to the national water network and that the majority of Bedouin villages, recognized or unrecognized, are not connected to a sewage disposal infrastructure. The Committee is also concerned about the impact of the State party's occupation and settlement policy and of its destruction of Palestinian water infrastructure on Palestinians in the Occupied Palestinian Territory in accessing water, which results in them living far below the extreme water scarcity level, which in turn engenders serious health consequences (art. 11).

47. The Committee recommends that the State party take all measures necessary:

(a) To ensure that all the Bedouin villages, recognized or unrecognized, are connected to the national water network and to a sewage disposal infrastructure;

(b) To cease the destruction of Palestinian water infrastructure and ensure that Palestinians have access to sufficient quantities of safe and clean drinking water.

Right to housing

48. The Committee is concerned about the decline in public expenditure in the housing sector and in the number of social housing units. It regrets the lack of detailed information on the situation of homelessness and of persons living in inadequate housing (art. 11).

49. The Committee recommends that the State party increase the budget allocated to the housing sector with a view to expanding social housing to disadvantaged and marginalized individuals and families and that it include, in its fifth periodic report, information on the situation of homelessness and of persons living in inadequate housing and on the provision of social housing, including relevant statistical data.

Planning and zoning in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem

50. The Committee is concerned about the discriminatory effect of planning and zoning laws and policies on Palestinians and Bedouin communities in the West Bank, as illustrated by the fact that less than 1 per cent of the land in Area C and 13 per cent of the land in East Jerusalem is allocated for the construction of infrastructure for Palestinians. The Committee is also concerned that the process of applying for building permits is long, complicated and expensive and that few such applications are approved, which has led to high numbers of evictions and demolitions in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem (arts. 2 (2) and 11).

51. The Committee recommends that the State party review planning laws and policies in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, to ensure that they are compliant with its obligations under the Covenant and that it end zoning practices. The Committee also recommends that the State party reform the construction permit system in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, with a view to preventing demolitions and forced evictions because of a lack of a construction permit and that it ensure that demolitions are carried out only as a last resort, when strictly necessary and as required for a legitimate State purpose, in accordance with its obligations under the Covenant. The Committee draws the attention of the State party to its general comments No. 4 (1991) on the right to adequate housing and No. 7 (1997) on forced evictions.

Practice of demolishing homes as a form of punishment

52. The Committee is concerned about reports that the family homes of alleged perpetrators of attacks against Israeli civilians and security forces are being demolished as a form of punishment. The Committee notes a report of the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs indicating that a total of 53 residential structures were demolished as a form of punishment or sealed from 1 January 2015 to 31 May 2018, which resulted in the forced eviction of 323 persons (arts. 2 (2) and 11).

53. The Committee urges the State party to immediately cease the practice of collectively demolishing houses and private property as a form of punishment and to ensure that victims of such practice are provided with full and effective reparations, including restitution of the affected properties.

Right to health

54. The Committee is concerned that the level of funding allocated to the health-care sector, as a share of the gross domestic product, grew by only 0.4 per cent between 2000 and 2017, despite a significant growth in the population, which has led to a lack of medical personnel and critical medical equipment, long waiting times and a high incidence of hospital-acquired infections. It is also concerned about the disparities between urban and peripheral areas in terms of availability, accessibility and quality of health-care services. The Committee is also concerned about the disproportionately poor health status of the Arab and Bedouin populations in the State party, including the disproportionately higher rates of infant mortality compared with those of the general population (arts. 2 (1)–(2) and 12).

55. The Committee recommends that the State party increase the budget allocated to the public health-care sector and intensify its efforts to ensure equal access to quality health-care services, regardless of place of residence, particularly for those living in peripheral areas. It also recommends that the State party take concrete measures to address the disproportionately poor health status of the Arab and Bedouin populations.

Access to health-care services

56. While noting that the National Health Insurance Fund does not cover foreign workers and that employers are obliged to provide foreign workers with medical insurance under the Foreign Workers Order (Employee Health Benefits Package), the Committee is concerned about the high incidence of non-compliance by employers, which has effectively deprived many foreign workers of their right to health. The Committee is also concerned that asylum seekers, including Eritrean and Sudanese nationals who are in the State party under the temporary non-return policy, are not allowed to work in the State party, are not covered by health insurance and have no access to public health-care services, except in medical emergencies. It is also concerned that, by the decision taken by the State party in 2018, children of undocumented migrant workers and asylum seekers whose application for asylum has been refused are excluded from a health insurance programme provided through an agreement with Meuhedet. The Committee is further concerned that budgetary constraints, a shortage of medical professionals and poor infrastructure restrict the availability of and accessibility to health-care services to foreign workers, refugees and asylum seekers in State-funded clinics, particularly the Terem Clinic and the Gesher Clinic (arts. 10 and 12).

57. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Take the measures necessary to ensure that migrant workers and asylum seekers have equal access to preventive, curative and palliative health-care services, regardless of their legal status and documentation, including by extending the coverage of national health insurance to them;

(b) Ensure that all children, regardless of their legal status, have access to health-care services at all times;

(c) Expand the provision of health-care services, including for mental health care, by State-funded clinics to asylum seekers and enhance the accessibility of such services, including by providing additional financial resources.

58. The Committee is concerned about the very limited availability of health-care services and the deteriorating quality of such services in the Gaza Strip due to restrictions on dual-use items, including essential medical equipment and supplies, and the escalation of hostilities, which have forced residents to seek medical treatment in the West Bank or in Israel. It is also concerned about the lengthy and complicated exit-permit system, which has impeded the ability of residents of the Gaza Strip to access medically recommended treatment that is not available in Gaza in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, in Israel and abroad. Furthermore, it is concerned that in recent years there has been a significant increase in the number of requests for permits that have been refused or delayed, with devastating consequences, including the death of patients waiting for permits and the carrying out of critical medical procedures on children without their parents at their side (art. 10 and 12).

59. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Facilitate the entry of essential medical equipment and supplies and the movement of medical professionals from and to Gaza;

(b) Review the medical exit-permit system with a view to making it easier for residents of Gaza to access, in a timely manner, all medically recommended health-care services;

(c) Ensure that all children referred for medical treatment outside Gaza can be accompanied by at least one parent.

Clinical trials on human beings

60. The Committee is concerned about the absence of framework legislation regulating clinical trials and that clinical trials have been carried out on human beings in the absence of appropriate regulatory processes (art. 12).

61. The Committee recommends that the State party adopt framework legislation regulating clinical trials on human beings, protect the right to health of persons participating in such trials and put in place effective oversight mechanisms. It also recommends that the State party ensure that thorough investigations are carried out in cases of unregulated medical trials and that appropriate remedies are provided to participants.

Right to education

62. While noting the measures envisaged by the State party to improve access by disadvantaged and marginalized children to education, the Committee remains concerned that the level of funding allocated to the education sector, as a share of the gross domestic product, has stagnated during the past 10 years despite the continuous growth of the population. It is also concerned about the disproportionately high dropout rates among Bedouin students and the large gaps in the educational achievements between Arab students and Jewish students. It is further concerned about the shortage of classrooms and kindergartens in Bedouin neighbourhoods and the proliferation of poor-quality and unsupervised private kindergartens that are attended mostly by children of asylum seekers. The Committee is also concerned about the large portion of students with disabilities enrolled in special classes or special schools (arts. 13–14).

63. The Committee recommends that the State party step up its efforts:

(a) To increase the public funding allocated to the education sector;

(b) To identify why so many Bedouin students drop out of school and take effective measures to address the situation;

(c) To improve the quality of education provided to Arab students with a view to enhancing their academic achievement;

(d) To address the shortage of classrooms and kindergartens in Bedouin neighbourhoods;

(e) To increase the number of public kindergartens and regulate and closely monitor the quality and educational environment of private kindergartens;

(f) To expand inclusive education opportunities for students with disabilities to attend mainstream schools.

Access to education

64. The Committee is concerned about the restricted access of students to education in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, in particular:

(a) The shortage of school facilities due to the frequent demolition of school buildings and the confiscation of school premises or educational materials by Israeli authorities, as well as difficulties in obtaining construction permits and securing construction materials, most of which are banned under the dual-use item regime;

(b) The precarious learning environment in which Palestinian students are being educated due to the armed or non-armed searches of Palestinian schools carried out by Israeli security forces;

(c) The frequent incidence of harassment of or threats against students and teachers by security forces or Israeli settlers at checkpoints or along roads, which particularly impedes female students from going to school (arts. 10, 13 and 14).

65. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Rescind demolition and stop-work orders against schools;

(b) Place limits on Israeli security forces entering school facilities and carrying out searches to the extent strictly required, paying particular attention to the need to ensure a safe and protected learning environment for Palestinian students;

(c) Take effective measures to ensure the unhindered and safe access of students and teachers to schools without harassment or threats, investigate and punish acts of harassment and intimidation by Israeli settlers and security forces, and prosecute those responsible;

(d) Endorse the Safe Schools Declaration and take concrete measures to deter the military use of schools, including by integrating the Guidelines for Protecting Schools and Universities from Military Use during Armed Conflict into domestic military policies and operational frameworks.

Access to higher education

66. The Committee is concerned about the blanket ban on education in the West Bank imposed since 2014 on students from the Gaza Strip, which has limited their access to higher education in particular. It is also concerned at the serious impact of the dual-use list on the ability of students in the Gaza Strip to enjoy their right to education, particularly in the fields of science and engineering, and the benefits of scientific progress and its applications due to the lack of essential education materials and equipment (arts. 13 and 15).

67. The Committee urges the State party to lift the above-mentioned blanket ban and to allow the entry into Gaza of the materials and equipment necessary for educating students in the fields of science and engineering.

Cultural rights

68. While noting that the State party is a pluralist country composed of people from diverse cultural backgrounds, the Committee is concerned about the lack of measures taken to promote cultural diversity. Moreover, notwithstanding the explanation given by the delegation, it is concerned about the fact that the status of Arabic has been downgraded from an official language to a language with special status through the adoption of the Basic Law: Israel – the State Nation of the Jewish People. It is also concerned by the very low level of funding allocated to the Academy of the Arabic Language, which amounted to 1,450,000 new shekels for 2019, especially given that the Arab population makes up 20 per cent of the State party's population (art. 15).

69. The Committee recommends that the State party take the measures necessary to promote diverse cultures, including by raising awareness of the various cultures of the Arab population, the Bedouin people, migrant workers and asylum seekers. It also recommends that the State party reinstate Arabic as an official language and promote its use, including by strengthening the Academy of the Arabic Language, inter alia by allocating more financial resources to it.

Protection of and access to historical and religious sites

70. The Committee is concerned that Palestinians living in the Gaza Strip are impeded from visiting religious sites in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, due to the closure policy of the State party and that Palestinians living in the West Bank too are restricted from visiting religious sites in East Jerusalem. The Committee regrets the lack of detailed information on the measures taken by the State party to protect historical and religious sites of all religions in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (art. 15).

71. The Committee recommends that the State party ensure that Palestinians living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory exercise their right to take part in cultural and religious life without restrictions other than those that are strictly proportionate to security considerations and are not discriminatory in their application in accordance with article 15 (1) (a) of the Covenant, as interpreted in the Committee's general comment No. 21 (2009) on the right of everyone to take part in cultural life.

D. Other recommendations

72. The Committee recommends that the State party take fully into account its obligations under the Covenant and ensure the full enjoyment of the rights enshrined therein in the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development at the national level. Achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals would be significantly facilitated by the State party establishing independent mechanisms to monitor progress and treating beneficiaries of public programmes as rights holders who can claim entitlements. Implementing the Goals on the basis of the principles of participation, accountability and non-discrimination would ensure that no one is left behind. In this regard, the Committee draws the State party's attention to its statement on the pledge to leave no one behind (E/C.12/2019/1).

73. The Committee recommends that the State party take steps to progressively develop and apply appropriate indicators on the implementation of economic, social and cultural rights in order to facilitate the assessment of progress achieved by the State party in complying with its obligations under the Covenant for various segments of the population. In that context, the Committee refers the State party to, inter alia, the conceptual and methodological framework on human rights indicators developed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (see HRI/MC/2008/3).

74. The Committee requests that the State party disseminate the present concluding observations widely at all levels of society, including at the national and district levels, in particular among parliamentarians, public officials and judicial authorities, and that it inform the Committee in its next periodic report about the steps taken to implement them. The Committee encourages the State party to engage with non-governmental organizations and other members of civil society in the follow-up to the present concluding observations and in the process of consultation at the national level prior to the submission of its next periodic report.

75. In accordance with the procedure on follow-up to concluding observations adopted by the Committee, the State party is requested to provide, within 24 months of the adoption of the present concluding observations, information on the implementation of the recommendations contained in paragraphs 11 (c) and (d) (State party's policies relating to the Occupied Palestinian Territory), 17 (Basic Law: Israel – the Nation State of the Jewish People) and 23 (refugees and asylum seekers) above.

76. The Committee requests the State party to submit its fifth periodic report, to be prepared in accordance with the reporting guidelines adopted by the Committee in 2008 (E/C.12/2008/2), by 31 October 2024. In addition, it invites the State party to update its common core document, as necessary, in accordance with the harmonized guidelines on reporting under the international human rights treaties (see HRI/GEN/2/Rev.6, chap. I).

Introduction

1. In an expression of its respect for the principles and the spirit of international human rights law, on 1 April 2014 the State of Palestine acceded to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The present report was drafted in fulfilment of the commitments and duties incumbent upon the State of Palestine under the Covenant, particularly article 16. In addition to national measures, frameworks and standards, the report covers in particular the legislative, administrative and judicial aspects relating to the provisions of the Covenant.

2. The State of Palestine is under military occupation on the part of Israel and this report will throw some light on the colonialist policies of that occupation and the serious, systematic and widespread violations that infringe the provisions of the Covenant. In fact, the Israeli occupation authorities deliberately and systematically target Palestinians on a wide scale including through extrajudicial killings, arbitrary detention, torture, displacement, forced migration, confiscation of lands and depletion of natural resources.

3. Following the accession of the State of Palestine to a number of international conventions and treaties, on 7 May 2014 the President of the State of Palestine issued a decree for the formation of a ministerial-level standing national committee to follow up on that accession. The committee is chaired by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants with members drawn from other ministries and competent institutions, and with the Independent Commission for Human Rights acting as observer, and its purpose is to monitor the fulfilment of obligations arising from accession to the various treaties. The ministerial-level standing committee established a subcommittee of experts who oversee the preparation of the official reports of the State of Palestine under the various treaties and, in its turn, the subcommittee established a series of working groups each of which is responsible for a specific treaty. A working group was thus set up for the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, with members drawn from the official institutions involved with the implementation of the Covenant. The information contained in the present report was gathered from the institutions concerned by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics. The ministerial-level standing committee also established a subcommittee to harmonize domestic legislation with the State's international obligations. This subcommittee is currently reviewing a number of pieces of extant legislation, as well as bills for laws and new legislation, to ensure that they are consistent with the international obligations of the State of Palestine. In particular it is examining a draft law on the protection of the family from violence, the Cybercrime Act, the Labour Code and a draft criminal code.

4. A draft of the present report was transmitted for consideration to representatives of civil society institutions and Palestinian human rights organizations, who then participated in the national consultations conducted by the State of Palestine concerning the report. Since Israel, the occupying power, bars civil society institutions in the Gaza Strip from accessing the West Bank, two separate meetings were held: one at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants, on 13 December 2017, with civil society institutions in the West Bank including Jerusalem; and another by videoconference at the Independent Commission for Human Rights, on 6 February 2018, with civil society institutions in the Gaza Strip. The consultations were attended by representatives of ministries of the State of Palestine and of civil society and human rights institutions working in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. The substance of the report was discussed and civil society offered comments, facilitating the preparation of the final version.

5. In this connection, it should be noted that the State of Palestine declared its commitment to the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development as soon as it had been adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 2015. Indeed, most of the items on that Agenda reflect obligations under the Covenant and other human rights treaties, in particular eradication of poverty, gender equality and the right to drinking water and sanitation. In addition to this, Palestine was among the States that presented their voluntary national review on the implementation of the 2030 Agenda at the 2018 high-level political forum on sustainable development.

6. The submission of the present report does not exempt Israel, the occupying power, from reporting on its own compliance with the provisions of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in the Occupied Palestinian Territory including East Jerusalem, on the basis of its obligations and responsibilities as an occupying power, in accordance with international humanitarian law and international human rights law, as well as on the basis of the advisory opinion given by the International Court of Justice in 2004 on the legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

For more than 10,000 years the Palestinian people have uninterruptedly been born, grown and lived in the land of their ancestors, Palestine. During that time, they have preserved their national identity and their inalienable right to self-determination along with other inalienable rights. Despite the historical injustice they have suffered, the unlawful and long-standing Israeli occupation and the denial of their right to self-determination and independence, the Palestinian people remain wedded to all their rights as recognized under international treaties and conventions as well as under resolutions concerning people's right to self-determination – and in particular the Palestinian people's right to self-determination – of the United Nations, international institutions, the Human Rights Council and the General Assembly as well as under resolutions 181 (1947) and 194 (1948) and under Security Council resolutions 242 (1967), 338 (1973) up to and including 2334 (2016).

The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was established as an inclusive political framework and the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, recognized at the level of the United Nations and internationally. It has guided the Palestinian people on their journey towards the realization of their inalienable rights, notably the right to self-determination, the right of return and the independence of the State of Palestine with Jerusalem as its capital, on the basis of the natural, historical and legal right of the Palestinian Arab people to their homeland, Palestine.

The Palestinian National Council (PNC) adopted the National Charter and the PLO Statutes as the two supreme constitutional documents underpinning the Palestinian people's exercise of their right to self-determination. The Charter regulates the operations of the National Council as a representative institution for the Palestinian people and the highest legislative authority, and it envisages an executive body in the form of the Executive Committee.

The State of Palestine recognizes the right to self-determination for all, as proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence, which is an expression of the national will of Palestinians as represented by the Palestine Liberation Organization, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

The Declaration of Independence, which is a constitutional and foundational document, emphasizes the commitment of the State of Palestine to the principles and objectives of the United Nations and to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It further stipulates that the "State of Palestine is the State of Palestinians wherever they may be. Therein they shall develop their national and cultural identity, enjoy full equality of rights, and have their religious and political beliefs and human dignity safeguarded under a democratic parliamentary system based on freedom of opinion; freedom to form parties; respect of the majority for minority rights; respect of minorities for majority decisions; social justice and equality; and non-discrimination in public rights on grounds of race, religion or colour, or between men and women, under a constitution that ensures the rule of law and an independent judiciary, in full consistency with the age-old spiritual and cultural heritage of Palestine embodying tolerance and religious coexistence."

The Palestinian Government promulgated the Palestinian Basic Law in 2001 (amended in 2003) to create a transitional document guaranteeing the fundamental rights and principles that enable the Palestinian people to exercise their right to self-determination and that enable the political process to achieve that end, until the adoption of an official constitution for the State of Palestine.

The Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003, contains a body of articles intended to fulfil the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. These include:

Article 2, which states that the people are the source of authority;

Article 5, which stipulates that the system of governance in the State of Palestine is to be democratic;

Article 26, which affirms the right of Palestinians to participate in the political process.

The Basic Law includes a raft of provisions relating to political participation and the democratic system of governance, such as the election of the Head of State (art. 34); the election of members of the Legislative Council and the definition of its role (art. 47); and the composition of the Legislative Council (art. 48). These measures are intended to fulfil the right to self-determination and the principle according to which the people are the source of authority. The Basic Law goes on to define certain components of the Palestinian political process; for example, in article 63 which defines the Council of Ministers as the basic executive organ of government.

Laws have been passed to regulate the mechanisms and means whereby the elective political process is conducted:

- Local Council Election Act No. 10 of 2005;
- Decree-Law No. 1 of 2007, which regulates general (presidential and legislative) elections.

The domestic laws of the State of Palestine address the importance of involving women in the political process and set quotas for them.

The first legislative and presidential elections were held in 1996. In 2005, voters were again called to the urns to elect a President, and a new Legislative Council was elected in 2006. The division of Palestinians and the refusal of Israel, the occupying power, to allow the electoral process in occupied Jerusalem has prevented further legislative and presidential elections from being held.

Exercising the right to self-determination under occupation

Israel, the occupying power, constitutes the fundamental obstacle in this connection and it works to prevent the Palestinian people from exercising their rights. In this it receives support and encouragement from parties intent upon undermining the international multilateral system, a system founded on laws and rights, and upon preventing the establishment of a democratic and equitable international order in which peoples, including the Palestinian people, can fulfil their inalienable rights. Chief among those rights is the right to self-determination, independence and return for Palestine refugees on the basis of General Assembly Resolution 194, as well as the right to economic, social and cultural development.

The Government of the Israeli occupation continues to set up a colonialist system based on racist laws that deprive the Palestinian people of the right to self-determination and steal large portions of land for the construction of the wall and of illegal settlements. Furthermore, the occupying forces deliberately carry out arbitrary arrests and prosecute Palestinians in sham courts that lack minimum fair trial guarantees. The International Court of Justice, for its part, has also stated that the wall of expansion and annexation, and the system underpinning it, constitute a serious violation of the right to self-determination of the Palestinian people.

The Israeli system of expansion and colonialism over occupied Palestinian land is the principal cause hindering the Palestinian people's exercise of natural and legal sovereignty over their own territory and resources. The occupying authorities disrupt the development of the Palestinian people and make constant structural changes to prevent Palestinians from enjoying their rights and their resources.

Israel, the occupying power, has been imposing a military and economic blockade on the Gaza Strip since 2006 and has been responsible for repeated military incursions and the destruction those incursions have wreaked. Moreover, the occupying authorities prohibit the entry of basic supplies, including foodstuffs, into the Gaza Strip and their repeated acts of aggression have not only killed and injured thousands of Palestinians but have damaged the environment and provoked a humanitarian crisis. The amount of groundwater suitable for human consumption has dropped to just 5 per cent of available groundwater supplies leading to concerns among United Nations agencies and others that the Gaza Strip will not be viable for life by 2020.

The occupying authorities continue to prevent millions of Palestine refugees from fulfilling their right and their desire to return to the homeland from which they were displaced, in accordance with General Assembly Resolution 194 (1948).

Since its illegal annexation of Jerusalem, Israel, the occupying power, has been taking steps which it describes as “legal” or “administrative” but which are in fact racist measures that aim to change the legal condition and status of the occupied city. In this connection, it carries out acts of ethnic cleansing, seizes lands and property, forcibly evicts Palestinians, destroys their homes, breaks up their families and restricts residency. The purpose of this is to empty Jerusalem of its original Palestinian inhabitants and alter the demographic makeup of the city.

The unlawful policies and practices of Israel have impeded the Palestinian people’s right to an independent and geographically contiguous State of Palestine, with Jerusalem as its capital, a State where life is viable and which is able to develop economically, socially and culturally. They have likewise impeded the ability of the Palestinian Government to adopt and implement national policies in various areas of life. Nonetheless, attempts at national reconciliation have continued with a view to ending the division among Palestinians, and efforts are ongoing to put an end to the occupation and to ensure that the Palestinian people can exercise their right to self-determination and their natural and legal sovereignty over their own land.

Sustainable development and the right to self-determination

Despite the colonialist occupation policies that seek to undermine the developmental efforts of the State of Palestine, sustainable development nonetheless lies at the core of the vision of self-determination held by the leaders and government of the Palestinian people. This includes the right to dispose of natural resources as sovereign rights holders and the economic, social and cultural empowerment of citizens. This position of the State of Palestine has been expressed through its commitment to the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development; its adherence to the Rio Declaration and the principles enshrined therein concerning the rights to self-determination and development of peoples under foreign occupation; and its unreserved accession to human rights treaties. In fact, the Government of the State of Palestine believes that sovereignty over natural resources, enjoyment of the benefits of sustainable development and not being left behind are among the most important aspects of the exercise of the right to self-determination.

1. The Palestinian Declaration of Independence guarantees human rights and public freedoms in the State of Palestine, stipulating that the State of Palestine is “the State of Palestinians wherever they may be. Therein they shall develop their national and cultural identity, enjoy full equality of rights, and have their religious and political beliefs and human dignity safeguarded under a democratic parliamentary system based on freedom of opinion; freedom to form parties; respect of the majority for minority rights; respect of minorities for majority decisions; social justice and equality; and non-discrimination in public rights on grounds of race, religion or colour, or between men and women, under a constitution that ensures the rule of law and an independent judiciary, in full consistency with the age-old spiritual and cultural heritage of Palestine embodying tolerance and religious coexistence.” The Declaration also emphasizes the commitment of the State of Palestine to the principles and objectives of the United Nations, to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to the principles and policies of non-alignment.

2. The Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003, in chapter II on public rights and freedoms, embraces a number of principles that also figure in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in international human rights treaties. In fact, article 2 (2) of the Covenant states that economic, social and cultural rights are to be exercised by all persons without discrimination, setting a framework for full compliance with the principle of equality and the prohibition of discrimination. This is reflected in article 9 of the Basic Law, which reads: “Palestinians shall be equal before the law and the courts, without distinction on the basis of race, sex, colour, religion, political views or disability.”

3. The Basic Law, moreover, includes certain provisions intended to protect particular categories, in the form of positive measures in favour of certain societal groups such as persons with disabilities, minorities and women. Palestinian laws, in fact, seek to ensure a dignified life for persons with disabilities and those who support them while article 22 (2) of the Palestinian Basic Law stipulates that the welfare of families of martyrs, detainees, the injured and persons with disabilities is a duty to be regulated by law, and the State of Palestine guarantees them education as well as health and social insurance.

4. Article 2 of Disability Rights Act No. 4 of 1999 states that persons with disabilities have the right to enjoy a free and dignified life and to have access to services of various kinds. Nor may their disability be a reason for depriving them of the exercise of any other rights. The Act also guarantees the right of persons with disabilities to create their own organizations and associations and it requires the State to provide habilitation in various forms, depending upon the nature of the disability of each individual. The persons concerned are required to meet no more than 25 per cent of the relative costs, while persons with a disability that has been occasioned by the occupation are fully exempt from all costs.

5. The State of Palestine recognizes the need to safeguard the right to work for persons with disabilities, to which end article 10 of Disability Rights Act No. 4 of 1999 requires government-run and private enterprises to ensure that 5 per cent of their workforce is made up of persons with a disability. This figure was adopted on the basis of the fact that most institutions employ fewer than 20 workers, and was subsequently reaffirmed in the Palestinian Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000).

6. The situation for persons with disabilities in the State of Palestine: A 2011 survey on persons with disabilities in Palestine pointed to a disability rate in Palestinian society of 2.7 per cent, under a narrow definition of disability, but of 7 per cent under a broad definition of disability. Disability among males stood at 2.9 per cent and among females at 2.5 per cent. The highest disability rates were in the governorate of Janin with 4.1 per cent followed by Hebron with 3.6 per cent, while the lowest was in the governorate of Jerusalem with 1.4 per cent. The survey showed that the most widespread form of disability was motorial (48.5 per cent) followed by slow learning (24.7 per cent). However, the true disability rate is higher, also for the following reasons:

(a) Concealment of disability, especially females with disabilities, as some families – out of social considerations – fail to register girls (or boys) with disabilities;

(b) The absence of an agreed and common definition of persons with disabilities in the State of Palestine;

(c) The lack of unified information in a single register, as a number of official bodies (the Ministry of Social Development, the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Education and Higher Education) and the General Union of People with Disabilities record cases of disability as they become aware of them;

(d) The difficult economic situation, which causes families to submit inaccurate information in order to obtain support and subsidies.

7. With a view to prohibiting discrimination, the Palestinian Labour Code considers women and men on an equal footing vis-à-vis non-discrimination in working conditions. According to article 100 of the text: “Under the provisions of the present Code and of regulations issued under the Code, discrimination between men and women is prohibited.” The Code does, however, envisage measures that may be considered as positive discrimination in favour of women; for example, article 101 forbids the employment of women in hazardous or onerous jobs, as identified by the Minister. It also prohibits overtime during pregnancy and in the six months following childbirth, and it places a ban on women working at night, with the exception of jobs defined by the Council of Ministers. The Civil Service Act is another law that provides employment safeguards for women as it envisages equal wages without discrimination on the basis of sex and equal rights to aspire to senior positions for both sexes, also without discrimination.

8. For its part, the 2005 Local Council Election Act also envisages positive discrimination by assigning quotas for women and allocating minimum levels for female representation on electoral lists. Under the Act, the first three names on each list must include at least one woman, the following four names must include at least one woman and the five names after that must also include at least one woman. In addition, the Act allocates 6 (out of a total of 66) seats to Christians, as determined by presidential decree, under the mixed electoral system.

9. Persons with disabilities are not discriminated against in any way with regard to their right to health, to medical care, to basic social services, to social security, to education and vocational training or to participate in cultural activities on an equal footing with others. Article 22 of the Basic Law, as amended in 2003, states that social and health insurance as well as pensions for disability and old age are to be regulated by law; that the welfare of families of martyrs, detainees, the injured and persons with disabilities is a duty that is likewise regulated by law and that the State of Palestine is to guarantee them education as well as health and social insurance. Article 16 of the Basic Law prohibits any form of medical or scientific experiment without the prior legal consent of the party involved and it states that medical tests and treatment or surgical procedures may be conducted only under the relevant law. According to article 24 of the Basic Law: "Education, which is the right of all citizens, is compulsory up to the end of the basic level at least and is free of charge in public schools, academies and institutions."

Equality of rights between men and women

10. With the Palestinian Declaration of Independence, issued by the Palestinian National Council in 1988, the late Palestinian President Yasser Arafat announced the establishment of the State of Palestine with its legal foundations and principles, its legislative system and its institutions. This includes the principle of equality before the law and the courts. The Declaration stipulates: "The State of Palestine is the State of Palestinians wherever they may be. Therein they shall develop their national and cultural identity, enjoy full equality of rights, and have their religious and political beliefs and human dignity safeguarded under a democratic parliamentary system based on freedom of opinion; freedom to form parties; respect of the majority for minority rights; respect of minorities for majority decisions; social justice and equality; and non-discrimination in public rights on grounds of race, religion or colour, or between men and women, under a constitution that ensures the rule of law and an independent judiciary, in full consistency with the age-old spiritual and cultural heritage of Palestine embodying tolerance and religious coexistence." In this way, the Declaration of Independence laid the foundations for a pluralistic, democratic and parliamentary system based on fair treatment for women and full equality between them and men under a constitution that protects human rights and social justice while ensuring rule of law and an independent judiciary.

11. The Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003, includes a number of legal safeguards intended to guarantee the principles of non-discrimination and of equality between men and women in all areas, as well as other human rights and public freedoms and the exercise thereof. Article 9 of the Basic Law states: "Palestinians shall be equal before the law and the courts, without distinction on the basis of race, sex, colour, religion, political views or disability." Having established the right of women to full equality before the law and the courts as a supreme and binding legal principle, the Basic Law then extends that right to allow women the enjoyment and exercise of all human rights and public freedoms without discrimination. In addition to this, the Basic Law also addresses the principle of rule of law which, in article 6, is described as the basis of governance in Palestine and as a fundamental legal guarantee protecting the human rights of women against all persons, groups and public, private or civil bodies. This includes the State and State agencies, which are accountable under their own laws and are required to treat all persons equally. In the case of any violation of these provisions recourse may be made to an independent judiciary.

12. Apart from the provisions of the Palestinian Basic Law that guarantee gender equality and non-discrimination, the introduction to the Law includes the following text: “The present Basic Law has established a firm foundation that represents the collective conscience of our people with its spiritual components, its national faith and its nationalist loyalty. The chapters of the Basic Law contain a body of advanced constitutional rules and principles that regulate general and individual rights and liberties in a manner that achieves justice and equality for all, without discrimination.”

13. The draft Palestinian criminal code prohibits discrimination, including gender-based discrimination, and envisages imprisonment and fines for anyone who commits acts falling under that definition. The code defines discrimination in the following terms: “Any differentiation among natural persons on the basis of national or social origin, colour, sex, family status, state of health, disability, political opinion, trade union affiliation, or actual or presumed affiliation or non-affiliation with a race, nation, lineage or specific religion.”

14. Successive Palestinian governments have consistently adhered to the provisions of the Palestinian Basic Law and the Declaration of Independence in this regard, and have preserved the political, social, economic and legal gains made by Palestinian women.

15. Despite the foregoing, equality between women and men in some areas remains hostage to the social reality and the cultural heritage of certain communities in Palestinian society. And in matters relating to personal status, Palestinians are subject to rules and institutions the authority of which stems from religious laws and beliefs.

16. It should be noted that domestic laws emanating from the Palestinian Legislative Council generally incorporate the principle of gender equality and non-discrimination. The best examples of this are Civil Service Act No. 4 of 1998, which regulates public-sector employment, and the Palestinian Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000), which regulates workers in the private and the civil sectors. Both those laws place women and men on an equal footing vis-à-vis the right to work, job opportunities, wages and other rights relating to public-, private- or civil-sector work. Work, in fact, is considered to be a right for all citizens who are capable of performing it, and the State of Palestine applies the principle of equal opportunity in access to work and appointment to public-sector posts and functions.

17. The Palestinian Government has taken a number of administrative measures to prevent discrimination against women and to uphold their rights in various sectors. The Ministry for Women’s Affairs was established in 2004 with the function of promoting gender-related issues in governmental institutions and developing national policies rooted in principles of equality and respect for women’s rights. In 2007, the Palestinian President approved the revised structure of governorates under which all governorates are to have women and child bureaus to provide care and support for women and children in political, social and economic fields. Under a 2008 decree of the Council of Ministers, gender units have been reconstituted and reactivated as part of the structure of ministries and government institutions to ensure that gender-related issues are duly institutionalized and integrated across different sectors and to assess and follow up on government programmes and policies from a gender perspective. In collaboration with the General Union of Palestinian Women and other women’s institutions and centres, the Ministry for Women’s Affairs issued the “Charter of Palestinian Women’s Rights”, which was adopted by the Palestinian President on 8 March 2008. The Charter, which is based on the principle of equality between men and women in all areas and on non-discrimination, calls upon the relevant bodies to be guided by the text and to consider the Charter as the government-endorsed reference for all matters related to planning, policymaking and legislative amendments in areas that affect women and their rights.

18. The Palestinian Government has made significant progress in limiting the discrimination and prejudice that women face. It has achieved this by adopting various up-to-date mechanisms and plans to remove the barriers standing in the way of effective equality and equal participation of men and women. One of the steps taken in that regard was the 2014 accession, without any reservations, to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. In order to respond to the effective needs of women, the Ministry for Women's Affairs then adopted a number of strategic mechanisms, policies and plans including the cross-sectoral national strategic plan to promote justice and equality between the sexes 2014–2016; the national strategic plan against violence against women 2011–2019; and the national strategic plan for the integration of gender into the fields of water and solid waste. These efforts culminated in 2016 when the Palestinian Government developed a general nationwide framework for the implementation of Security Council resolution 1325 (2000) on women, peace and security. This was followed by efforts to involve women in consultations on how to implement the resolution at the national level, in cooperation with United Nations agencies.

19. In addition to this, the Palestinian National Policy Agenda 2017–2022 emphasizes the ongoing commitment of the State of Palestine to building a national system that is based on human rights and that provides more comprehensive, integrated and sustainable social protection for gender. In fact, the issue of gender equality and the empowerment of women has long occupied an important place in the hierarchy of government priorities and the Government has allocated $9 million to the process of reviewing laws and legislation to ensure that they take due account of women's rights, do not contain discriminatory provisions and are consistent with international standards and treaties. This process includes capacity-building programmes on gender; analytical studies to provide information on gender gaps; services, protection against violence and access to justice for women; and raising community awareness about violence against women. Part of the funds will also be directed to support the development of gender-responsive policies and budgets. In its Decree No. 1/05/13/M.W/S.F. of 2009 the Council of Ministers insisted that the annual budgets of government departments should be gender-sensitive and that gender units should be involved in their preparation.

20. The Palestinian Council of Ministers adopted Decree No. 366 of 2005 regarding the protection of women against violence. The Decree defines violence against women as any physically, sexually or psychologically violent act that takes place in the family or the community in violation of current law, and it assigns the responsibilities required for the implementation of the Decree to ministries and other competent bodies. The Ministry of the Interior is designated to provide qualified female staff to deal with cases of violence against women in police stations. At the same time, the Ministry of Justice, in coordination with the Public Prosecutor, is designated to issue instructions for members of the Office of the Public Prosecution on providing protection for female victims of violence and on placing them in shelters run by the Ministry of Social Development until such time as the factors motivating such placement no longer subsist. For its part, the Ministry of Health is designated to provide psychiatrists specialized in violence against women. In addition, doctors who treat women are required to write a psychiatric report to be annexed to the treatment report and sent to the Office of the Public Prosecution. Lastly, the Ministry of Social Development is designated to include female victims of violence as urgent special cases in its relief and development programmes. Responsibility or coordination between the various ministries involved in the implementation of the Decree is entrusted to the Ministry of Women's Affairs.

21. The Palestinian Government has set up a national committee against violence against women and it has adopted strategies to prevent discrimination and ensure equality for women. These include the national strategy for Palestinian women and the national strategic plan against violence against women 2011–2019.

In 2013, the Council of Ministers approved the "Takamol" national referral system for women who have suffered violence. The system, which includes a set of rules that together have come to constitute a national charter for the treatment of female victims of violence, sets forth the rights and obligations that underpin the professional relationship between the women and their service providers (doctors, social workers and police). For example, it prohibits service providers from exploiting female victims in any way and requires them to maintain a purely professional relationship with the women. It also forbids pursuing any kind of relationship outside the professional sphere, discontinuing services to pressure the women for unlawful ends (be they social, material or sexual) and obtaining any recompense for the performance of professional duties. Furthermore, service providers are required to show respect and appreciation to female victims of violence, including respect for their right to take whatever decision they consider appropriate for their own lives, to provide services without discrimination and to maintain the confidentiality of all information and dealings with the women. Confidentiality may not be breached nor information published without the written consent of the woman concerned.

22. In 2011, in the face of increased “honour killings of women” by members of their families and the absence of deterrent penalties, the President issued a decree to abrogate provisions that could mitigate penalties against the authors of such offences or exonerate them altogether. However, this did not prevent perpetrators from benefiting from the mitigating grounds envisaged in general provisions of criminal law. Indeed, committing an offence in a fit of extreme anger as envisaged in article 98 of the Jordanian Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960), which is applicable in the West Bank; obtaining pardon from the victim’s blood relatives (her family) who waive their rights against the perpetrator; seeking clemency from the judge; or any other legally mitigating grounds such as those contained in articles 99 and 100, all constitute grounds the ultimate effect of which is to mitigate the penalty imposed against the perpetrator, be it by force of law or by virtue of the judge’s discretionary authority. It was for this reason that a decree-law was issued in 2014 under which persons responsible for honour killings against women are explicitly exempted from benefiting from mitigating grounds in cases where they commit their crimes in a fit of extreme anger.

23. In 2014, Palestinian Civil Police Force adopted a unified procedural guide for its family protection units in the West Bank. The units, which were set up in 2004, specialize in cases involving women, who either approach the units directly or are referred thereto and who are provided with protection against violence. Police teams have been given training in the use of the guide. The Office of the Public Prosecution has also established a gender unit and it has formed a committee to develop unified procedures for prosecutors who investigate, prosecute and pursue cases involving violence against women and children. Twenty prosecutors have been designated to receive gender-related cases, to follow the relative court proceedings and to file appeals against any final rulings that are inconsistent with the law. For its part, the Supreme Judicial Council has also set up a gender unit to follow up on the administrative and judicial aspects of gender-related cases. Buildings housing offices of the Public Prosecution have special rooms for cases involving female victims of violence, in order to protect their confidentiality, and other rooms for determining cases of rape. Prosecutors have also been given the role of supervising family protection units by making field visits, examining registers and, if a case is closed, informing the Office of the Public Prosecution of the circumstances of that closure.

24. In order to protect female victims of violence, a national system for the review of critical cases has been established. Its purpose is to take preventive action regarding offences against women, children and marginalized persons in the State of Palestine, to identify shortcomings in public policies and services regarding protection, to seek the support of politicians and decision makers to address those shortcomings and to move towards a system capable of responding to the needs of women, children and persons at risk and of protecting them and their rights. This system works thanks to cooperation between institutional stakeholders such as the Ministry of Social Development, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education and the police.

25. The Independent Commission for Human Rights (Bureau of Grievances), which was established pursuant to Presidential Decree No. 59 of 30 September 1993, has the task of monitoring the operation of the various departments, agencies and institutions of the State of Palestine and of reviewing current laws, legislation and regulations to ensure that they duly safeguard human rights. As part of its work, the Commission set up a unit to receive complaints of violations against the rights of citizens of either sex and, in 2014, it received a total of 294 complaints from women, 188 from the West Bank and 106 from the Gaza Strip; the Commission provided advice to the women concerned and represented them before the competent courts.

26. The Ministry of Justice preceded the Independent Commission by establishing a citizens’ complaints department in 2004. The department receives complaints from citizens regarding human rights violations, either by individuals or by State institutions, including complaints regarding women’s rights. It then follows up, also by appealing directly to the institutions concerned, in order to rectify the situation and restore matters to their correct course.

27. As concerns judicial proceedings in Palestine, there has been general progress in the way trials relating to the protection of human rights are conducted, including those relating to rights of women. Civil society institutions also play an important role in raising awareness about women's rights and in running campaigns that focus on issues such as discrimination and gender quality. Such institutions act as a kind of regulatory instrument monitoring the activities of official institutions in Palestine and as an authority to which women can turn to defend them and to communicate with the competent authorities on their behalf.

28. Act No. 6 of 2005 envisaged the establishment of a maintenance fund to provide protection against abusive husbands who deprive women of their rights and leave them destitute. The fund undertakes to disburse the court-ordered maintenance if the spouse is absent, his whereabouts are unknown, he does not have the assets to fulfil the court ruling or for any other reason. The amounts are disbursed within a maximum of 15 days from the completion of the application process, and the State has determined a financial allocation for the fund as part of its general budget.

29. Work is currently underway on new bills in which women are accorded fair treatment and which are free from discriminatory provisions. These include the draft criminal code, which criminalizes a number of behaviours and actions against women and includes offences that are not addressed in existing laws, such as trafficking in women and sexual harassment. With respect to the old Criminal Code, which is still in force in the State of Palestine, the new bill also amends definitions and increases penalties relating to offences of which women are victims.

30. Measures have also been taken to protect women working in the private and civil sectors from discriminatory acts. Under the Palestinian Labour Code, a labour inspection body was established as part of the Ministry of Labour with responsibility for monitoring the implementation of labour legislation, particularly with regard to working conditions, and for receiving and investigating reports and complaints from workers. Thus, all working women are able to report to the inspection body in regard of any violation committed by their employer, any discrimination they might suffer or any disciplinary measure imposed against them. The Labour Code prohibits the dismissal or termination of service of working women (or men) on the grounds that they have submitted a report or complaint. The labour inspection body enjoys judicial authority and has the right to inspect workplaces without prior notice and to inquire of employers and workers – together, individually or in the presence of witnesses – about the implementation of labour legislation. It also has the right to examine any documentation relating to working conditions. If an employer is found to have committed an offence, including discriminatory acts against women, the inspection body draws up a report then takes the due action and imposes the due sanctions.

In addition, the Labour Code requires employers to display the rules governing the employment of women in a visible position in the place of work. This is so that women can learn about their labour-related rights and obligations and the remedies available to them and thus improve their ability to claim their entitlements.

31. Out of its general budget, the Palestinian Government makes monthly cash allocations to the families of martyrs, the injured and detainees in order to alleviate the impact of the crimes committed under the Israeli occupation. Those crimes cause greater harm to women, especially if they result in the killing, detention or injury of a family member or a breadwinner and the loss of sources of income.

32. Decrees, circulars and regulations have been issued that have contributed, at least in part, to ensuring that Palestinian women receive fair treatment in a number of areas, particularly in matters relating to personal status. For example, the Palestinian Ministry of the Interior has issued circulars concerning the right of women to retain their own family name after marriage and – once they have reached the legal age of majority – their right to obtain a passport without the consent of their husband or father.

33. The Bureau of the Chief Qadi has also issued circulars that are relevant in this connection. These cover matters related to the separation of inheritance quotas between heirs and the fact that they cannot be registered until four months have passed since the death of the legator; the registering of divorce documents in sharia courts; the requirement for a husband to inform his wife before marrying a second woman and to inform the second wife that he is already married; cases involving khul' divorce; and rights to visit and host children. In addition, each sharia court has a “family guidance and conciliation” division which works to strengthen family ties, resolve marital disputes and reconcile spouses.

34. As concerns the right to education, official and unofficial bodies such as the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education and the Ministry of Social Development, have taken operational measures and rolled out practical tools to reduce the phenomenon of school dropout and, particularly, the phenomenon of child labour.¹

35. The Ministry of Health has applied positive discrimination to address the needs of women and ensure they are treated fairly in the field of health care. It has integrated reproductive health services, pregnancy care and family planning into its primary health-care centres, and it has established mother and child units as part of the structure of those centres. The objective is to improve access to integrated and high-quality reproductive health services in mother and child clinics at the primary health-care level, particularly in marginalized areas and in areas where movement has been rendered difficult by the wall of annexation and expansion and by Israeli military checkpoints. Another objective is to provide quality services in hospitals, particularly in maternity and post-natal units.

36. The Ministry – in coordination with the Ministry of Education and Higher Education – runs weekly lectures on reproductive health in schools. It is also preparing a number of guides such as a unified national guide on reproductive health services, a unified national guide on safe childbirth in hospital, a referral system between primary care units, hospitals and support services, and training materials on women’s health for staff.

37. In its national strategic plan for health 2014–2016, the Ministry of Health has sought to guarantee Palestinian citizens’ right to access the health care they require by ensuring health services and facilities for all categories of citizen, particularly women, whatever their place of residence. It has also sought to achieve quality in the provision of health services, to increase the satisfaction of citizens and to reduce the number of referrals for treatment abroad.

With its primary care services, the Ministry of Health provides health care free of charge to mothers, pregnant women and children up to the age of 3.

38. As concerns protecting women from diseases they might contract as a consequence of violence, health-service providers – particularly those working in the primary health-care centres of the Ministry of Health (mother and child, family protection and reproductive health clinics) – provide services to female victims of violence, in accordance with codes of conduct and operation, and intervention and treatment mechanisms envisaged in the “Takamol” national referral system for women who have suffered violence. This covers aspects such as testing, diagnosis, treatment, empowerment and raising women’s awareness about their human and health-related rights. The women are then referred to other sectors where they can obtain psychosocial, legal and support services to protect them against violence. At the same time, their cases continue to be monitored and they are given counselling and guidance, particularly pregnant women and women and girls who have suffered rape.

39. Efforts are currently being made in the various gender-related fields. At the level of the media, there is a focus on producing a media discourse that is sensitive to gender issues and that seeks to combat violence against women and girls in the State of Palestine. In the academic world, work is underway to create specializations on gender and women’s issues in Palestinian universities. Moreover, efforts are currently being made to provide legal aid for Palestinian women, as envisaged in the law, and the State is assigning lawyers to pursue the cases of female detainees being held in the prisons of the Israeli occupation.

40. The “Tawasol” women’s coalition has been set up as a quasi-governmental body for women that aims to achieve gender equality. The coalition is seeking to build a comprehensive database on women in order to provide decision makers with data that will enable them to develop strategies with a gender perspective and to facilitate the exchange of information between women's institutions. It also hopes to strengthen partnership between the Government and the institutions of civil society, to help change stereotypical views of women and of their role in all areas of society and to promote and develop support and guidance mechanisms for female victims and survivors of violence.

41. Despite this generally positive climate and the adoption of numerous legislative, administrative and judicial measures, Palestinian women remain subject to a body of conflicting and discriminatory legislation which has been drawn from various sources. These include Ottoman, British, Jordanian and Egyptian provisions and racist Israeli military laws and orders in addition to Palestinian laws and legislation.

Articles 4 and 5

42. The rights enshrined in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights are recognized in the Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003. Article 11 of that Law reads: "Personal freedom is a natural right that is guaranteed and may not be violated." This means that no exception may be made for any violation affecting the rights and freedoms envisaged in the Covenant, the implementation of which is regulated and guaranteed by the Palestinian Basic Law.

43. As an expression of the political will to respect human rights and the rights of citizens, the State of Palestine acceded to the core human rights treaties in 2014. It did so, moreover, without reservations thereby guaranteeing all the rights enshrined in those instruments, without exception.

44. Following accession to the human rights treaties, the Constitutional Court issued its Interpretive Ruling No. 5/2017 on 12 March 2018 to define the nature of the relationship between international law, particularly human rights treaties, and Palestinian domestic law. The ruling outlined the legislative hierarchy applicable in the State of Palestine with the Declaration of Independence at the apex followed by the Basic Law, then international treaties and conventions (which have to meet the formal requirements to acquire force of law) and, lastly, national laws and legislation.

45. The Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003, contains a chapter (arts. 110 to 114) dedicated to the provisions applicable during a state of emergency. This includes the general constitutional restrictions applicable in states of emergency and the special powers whereby the President can limit public freedoms in order to face such exceptional circumstances. The chapter also declares the inadmissibility of restrictions on fundamental rights and freedoms and stipulates that any detentions during a state of emergency must meet minimum requirements vis-à-vis the rights and fundamental freedoms of individuals.

Article 111 of the Basic Law reads: "No restrictions may be imposed on fundamental rights and freedoms save to the extent necessary to fulfil the goal stated in the decree declaring a state of emergency."

46. The State of Palestine has taken no action aimed at restricting the rights enshrined in the Covenant. Moreover, any violation of fundamental human rights is penalized under the Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003, article 30 (2) of which states: "No law may contain provisions that shield any administrative decision or action against review by the courts."

47. Article 32 of the Basic Law stipulates: "Any violation of any personal freedom, of the sanctity of the private life of human beings, or of any of the rights or liberties guaranteed under the Basic Law or any other law shall be considered a crime. Criminal and civil cases resulting from such violations shall not be subject to any statute of limitations. The National Authority shall guarantee just compensation to those who suffer harm in that connection."

48. However, the colonialist policies and practices of Israel, the authority responsible for the unlawful occupation, and its systematic and widespread violations of international law in the Occupied Palestinian Territory prevent the Palestinian people from exercising their rights as guaranteed under international law, including the economic, social and cultural rights enshrined in the Covenant.

49. At the internal Palestinian level, the rights contained in the Covenant, as well as other rights, have been affected by the division resulting from the 2007 takeover by Hamas in the Gaza Strip and its unlawful monopoly over legislative authority there, which has required a state of emergency to be declared in the State of Palestine, pursuant to the amended Basic Law of 2003. With the failure of efforts towards achieving reconciliation and holding legislative elections, legislation has had to be replaced with decree-laws, which are issued by the President of the State of Palestine to meet the changing needs of the Palestinian people. These have included the 2016 Decree-Law on Social Security – issued to respond to a fundamental requirement of Palestinian society and to meet the obligations of the State of Palestine under international treaties – and the Public Education Act, issued in early 2017. One of the most significant aspects of these decrees is their consistency with the international obligations of the State of Palestine, and the most important legislative priority remains that of unifying legislation across the two parts of the nation and removing any provisions that are inconsistent with those international obligations.

50. The illegal occupation of Palestinian territory by Israel is one of the largest obstacles preventing the realization of the rights enshrined in the Covenant, particularly in the so-called “Area C”, which makes up 60 per cent of the surface area of the West Bank, including East Jerusalem. That Area is under the effective control of Israel, the authority responsible for the unlawful occupation, which is seeking to annex it illegally by proceeding unilaterally and taking no account of the Palestinian people who detain legal and political sovereignty over the Area. In addition to this are the Israeli efforts to change the demographic makeup of East Jerusalem and “Area C” using facilitations that aim to encourage colonists to move and settle in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem.

51. A deterioration in the economic, social and cultural conditions of the Palestinian people is being deliberately imposed by the occupying authorities, who exercise effective control over East Jerusalem and the so-called “Area C” where they employ administrative measures as a means to debilitate Palestinian residents and impose restrictions, using racist barriers with the aim of depriving them of the right of movement and impelling them to emigrate. The economic and social conditions of the population in those areas is critical compared to the economic and social conditions enjoyed by the illegal colonists who have been settled there by Israel, the occupying power in the West Bank and East Jerusalem. The policies of the occupiers towards Palestinians and their economic and social rights are not limited to lengthy, complex and costly administrative and bureaucratic procedures, which deprive many people of their fundamental rights, but actually amount to systematic and widespread violations of the rights of the Palestinians who live in areas under the direct and effective control of the occupation. A good example of this is the demolition of housing carried out by the occupying power’s so-called “Civil Administration” in “Area C” under pretexts such as “absence of authorization” and “security”, and the plans to expel Bedouin communities in the Khan al-Ahmar area. It should be noted, moreover, that authorization procedures in areas under the direct control of the occupation, including fees, are imposed irrespective of the low income and standard of living of Palestinian families. This is to ensure the demographic superiority of the colonists and to pave the way for the annexation of the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

52. The discriminatory policies of the occupation affect all the rights enshrined in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The abuse of procedures for obtaining authorization to construct homes or public facilities affects the right to education by causing overcrowding in schools, which has led some schools to institute double shifts, morning and evening, to accommodate all pupils. Those policies also affect the right to health as there are not enough health facilities to meet the needs of Palestinians in “Area C” and in East Jerusalem. In fact, health facilities in East Jerusalem – in particular the Makassed Charitable Society Hospital and the Augusta Victoria Hospital – also provide services to residents of the suburbs of Jerusalem, who are excluded by Israel, the occupying power, through its unlawful annexation of Jerusalem and its unilateral changes to the city map. They also serve sick and injured persons from various parts of the West Bank, where treatment might not be available, and from the Gaza Strip. In addition to this, the policies themselves pose a threat to the health of Palestinians because the occupiers’ excessive use of force leads to deaths and disabling injuries among Palestinians. The contrast in standards of living, income and services between Palestinian families in “Area C” and in East Jerusalem and the income of settler families in the same areas gives an indication of the extent of the discrimination practised by the occupying power against Palestinians and of the obstacles the latter face in seeking to exercise their right to a decent standard of living. Occupation policies throughout the West Bank directly and indirectly affect all these rights. The settlement system, including military checkpoints and racist and illegal bypass roads, affects the extent to which Palestinians living, working or studying near the settlements are able to enjoy their fundamental rights, whether enshrined in the Covenant or in other treaties. This is because, by affecting the right of movement, the system determines the extent to which Palestinians are able to access the facilities where they can exercise those rights. It also disrupts official Palestinian institutions as they seek to exercise their authority in villages and cities of the Occupied Palestinian Territory where the occupiers deliberately neglect the human rights of Palestinians.

53. The same situation prevails in the Gaza Strip, which has been under illegal Israeli military blockade since 2007. During the blockade and the aggressive military operations launched by Israel, the authority responsible for the illegal occupation, the social and economic situation in the Gaza Strip has deteriorated to become the lowest in the State of Palestine. During the attacks of summer 2014, the unjustified and excessive use of force by the occupying forces led to the destruction of thousands of homes and the displacement of the families living in them. Schools were also destroyed, including schools run by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) where citizens whose own homes had been destroyed had taken refuge to escape areas where shelling and clashes were taking place. UNRWA schools, it should be noted, all fly United Nations flags. Health facilities and hospitals were also affected by the shelling, precisely at the time when they were most needed, thereby throwing fuel on the flames of the humanitarian crisis in Gaza and affecting citizens' right to health over the long term, particularly in view of the overcrowding and the scarcity of basic medical necessities in local hospitals. One of the effects of the blockade is that Israel, the occupying power, can control what materials enter the Gaza Strip and, using vague pretexts, it can prohibit the entry of many vital necessities. Thus, for example, the occupying power has placed certain foodstuffs on its list of "dual use items", which are prohibited from entering the Gaza Strip. The criteria used for placing items on the list are ambiguous and take no account of the actual needs of citizens living in the Strip. The list has had the effect of impeding the entry of the materials necessary to reconstruct homes and facilities destroyed by Israeli attacks against Gaza, and matters have reached a point where even foodstuffs are not admitted under the criteria used to compile the list.

54. The Palestinian legal system considers work to be a right guaranteed under the Basic Law, which describes work as "a right, a duty and an honour" that the State seeks to provide to everyone able to perform it. The legal framework regulating work was completed under the Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000), which reaffirms the status of the right to work without discrimination between men and women. The Code also specifies that a minimum of 5 per cent of the workforce in all establishments must be constituted of persons with special needs.

55. The Palestinian Labour Code broadly outlines the principles underpinning the right to work and identifies the desired outcomes, and it sets forth the measures and policies to adopt to uphold and safeguard that right. These are aimed at combating unemployment and creating jobs as well as at training and qualification. The Code states that the Council of Ministers is to establish a committee on labour policy made up of the three parties involved in the production process (government, employers and workers) with the task of proposing public policies in the area of employment, training and vocational guidance.

56. By the end of 2015, the unemployment rate in the State of Palestine stood at 25.9 per cent of the workforce of both sexes over the age of 15. This represents a small drop compared with the unemployment rate of the previous year 2014, which had been 26.9 per cent. The figures for the end of 2015 show that unemployment among females was higher (39.2 per cent) than that among males (22.5 per cent). The unemployment rate in the State of Palestine in the period 2014–2015 is schematized in the table below.

Year	Female unemployment	Male unemployment	Total
2014	38.4 %	23.9 %	26.9 %
2015	39.2 %	22.5 %	25.9 %

57. As the body competent to take specific measures aimed at reducing unemployment, the Ministry of Labour provides training and vocational qualification services. In cooperation with its social partners and with support from international institutions, the Ministry has developed some basic labour strategies, including the following:

- Strategy for vocational and technical education and training: The overarching aim of this strategy is to create an efficient, capable, enterprising, adaptable, innovative and outstanding workforce in Palestine in order to curb poverty and to drive social and economic development. This is to be achieved by delivering high-quality, demand-oriented vocational and technical education and training linked to all sectors of the economy, at all levels and to all people;
- National Employment Strategy: This aims to create the right conditions – in terms of policies, measures, institutions and infrastructure – to accommodate the growth in the Palestinian workforce in such a way as will reduce poverty. Given the high rates of unemployment and the low level of wages, the strategy sees changing the perspective of young people as an important objective with a view to providing suitable and sustainable jobs for the future;
- Charter for decent work in the Palestinian territories: The charter constitutes the basis for the development of a national plan and government programmes to promote decent work. It has several areas of focus including that of promoting job opportunities in the Palestinian territories in order to eliminate unemployment and poverty.

58. As concerns vocational training and education, training centres belonging to the Ministry of Labour have rolled out 21 free training programmes via 69 training courses run at vocational training centres in the following governorates:

- Jericho: a multipurpose vocational training centre; a vocational training centre in the city of Yatta and the Jericho vocational training centre;
- Bethlehem: the Beit Jala vocational training centre;
- Ramallah and Birah: the Mahmoud Uthman vocational training centre and the Beit Aour al-Tahta vocational training centre;
- Nablus: the Nablus vocational training centre;
- Qalqilyah: the Qalqilyah vocational training centre;
- Tulkarm: the Tulkarm vocational training centre;
- Janin: the Jalil vocational training centre;
- Jerusalem and environs: the Ayzariyah vocational training centre;
- Governorate of Salfit: the Salfit vocational training centre (under construction).

59. Students applying to enrol in the Ministry's training centres must undergo an entrance exam as well as an individual interview. While taking account of the objective criteria for admitting students who wish to join these programmes, the Ministry accords priority to persons with special needs, and efforts are currently being made to qualify 40 trainers in how to deal with such persons, in cooperation with the Bethlehem Arab Society for Rehabilitation. In the next phase, the Ministry is seeking to provide training on how to deal with persons with special needs using sign language.

Thirteen of the 21 programmes adopted in 2015/16 were vocational diploma-level programmes in the following specialities:

|---|--|
| 1. Electrical installations | 2. Quantity surveying |
| 3. Tailoring and fashion design | 4. Cosmetology and hairdressing |
| 5. Auto electrics | 6. Auto mechanics |
| 7. Office secretarial skills | 8. Building and construction |
| 9. Painting and plastering | 10. Air conditioning and refrigeration |
| 11. Trade and commerce | 12. Maintenance and installation of networks |
| 13. Electrical installations and the mounting of solar panels | |

The remaining programmes were as follows:

- | | |
|--|--------------------------------------|
| 1. Working in aluminium | 2. Tiling and paving |
| 3. Metalwork | 4. Installation of medical equipment |
| 5. Sales representative | 6. Auto bodywork and painting |
| 7. Installation and maintenance of alarm systems | 8. Auto electromechanics |

60. Since 2015, the Ministry of Labour has been taking the following steps with a view to reducing unemployment:

- It has worked to create job opportunities, both through visits to companies and via the media. In 2015, a total of 3,627 job openings were created of which 350 actually led to employment;
- It has sought to network with institutions operating in the field of development and financial credit, in which regard it arranged 1,009 visits to companies at various sites in governorates across the West Bank in 2015;
- It has provided vocational guidance and counselling to 2,058 jobseekers;
- It has provided vocational guidance and counselling via 12 employment bureaus in universities, benefiting 1,039 students;
- It monitors the employment of workers on the local and external market via employment offices belonging to the Ministry of Labour;
- It has set up a labour-market information system to register jobseekers and match them with available openings.

61. In addition, the Ministry of Labour follows up on all matters related to the receipt and distribution of permits for Palestinian workers who work in the occupying State, who numbered 57,000 at the end of 2015. This includes monitoring their labour-related rights. The social rights those workers accrued in that year amounted to 185,426,649 new shekels. From its headquarters and its departments in the governorates, the Ministry of Labour issues certificates of aptitude for persons wishing to work abroad. It has distributed 810 such certificates, 767 to men and 43 to women.

62. In 2015 the Ministry of Labour launched the employment councils the purpose of which is to combat unemployment. They undertake the following activities:

- Continuing to develop the labour-market information system at the level both of programming and of information input;
- Preparing the list of 20,000 Palestinian workers to work in the State of Qatar, as per an agreement reached with that country;
- Setting up an employment and social protection fund pursuant to Decree No. 9 of 2003 to support employment and business enterprise programmes for young people.

Arbitrary dismissal

63. Palestinian law provides workers with guarantees to protect them against arbitrary dismissal. The Palestinian Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000) states that the termination of an employment contract by an employer without due reason constitutes arbitrary dismissal. The Code states, furthermore, that workers who have suffered arbitrary dismissal retain all their labour rights and are entitled to compensation equivalent to two months' wages for each year of employment, with a maximum equivalent to the wages they would earn over two years of employment. In cases involving piecework or work on commission, compensation for arbitrary dismissal is calculated on the basis of the average monthly wage of the worker in the last year of work.

64. In order to safeguard the rights of workers following arbitrary dismissal, as well as other labour rights, the Palestinian Labour Code exempts workers from the payment of court fees in labour-related cases. This is intended to facilitate workers' access to the courts in order to protect their labour rights.

65. One of the main reasons for the high unemployment rate remains the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territory. In fact, the systematic and widespread policies of occupation – which consist in the confiscation of lands, violations of the right to movement, the looting of natural resources and other colonialist practices – rob Palestinians of their right to work, work which would provide them with a decent life, empower them economically and facilitate their enjoyment of other rights. Data compiled by international institutions indicates that Israeli activities in the Dead Sea region, which occupies 87 per cent of the area of the Jordan Valley and which Israel is seeking to annex unlawfully, is depriving between 60,000 and 80,000 Palestinians of job opportunities in agriculture. At the same time, vast areas of the Jordan Valley have been seized and allocated to 9,500 illegal settlers. Unemployment among Palestinians is expected to increase after the racist Government of Israel and the United States Administration set their sights against UNRWA, which is a major employer of the Palestinian people and particularly of the refugees who were forcibly displaced following the Nakba of 1948 and their descendants. Those people have been denied the right to work in their own lands and the right to live in the homes that were stolen from them during the Nakba, as well as their right of return as enshrined in General Assembly Resolution 194.

Articles 7 and 8

66. The Palestinian legal system affords relative flexibility vis-à-vis the minimum wage, in accordance with variables affecting standards of living. The Labour Code includes provision for a wage committee, to be established by the Council of Ministers and to include representatives from government, workers and employers. Representatives from the latter two categories are to be appointed by trade unions and employers' associations. The committee is responsible for examining public policy in regard of wages and determining the extent to which it is consistent with living standards. It makes recommendations in that connection to the Council of Ministers, which then issues a decree setting the level of minimum wages on the basis of those recommendations. The wage committee meets periodically, at least once a year, to scrutinize any changes in living standards and to assess the necessary adjustments to the minimum wage. In case of need, it also meets in extraordinary session at the request of its Chair or of the representatives of any of the three parties represented on the committee.

In line with this procedure, the Palestinian Council of Ministers issued Decree No. 01/21/14/M.W/S.F on 9 October 2012, setting the minimum wage in all areas of the State of Palestine as follows:

- The minimum monthly wage in all sectors was set at 1,450 shekels;
- The minimum daily wage in all sectors was set at 65 shekels;
- The minimum hourly wage in all sectors was set at 8.5 shekels;

The Decree came into force on 1 January 2013.

67. Although both the Basic Law and the Labour Code prohibit discrimination between men and women in labour rights, in practical terms there is, in fact, a widening wage gap between men and women. In 2015, the average monthly wage of men stood at 3,203 shekels whereas for women it was just 2,405 shekels.

68. Certain categories, such as domestic workers, are not covered by the Palestinian Labour Code and it is left to the executive to decide what is the best course of action to take. Thus the Minister of Labour issued Decree No. 6 of 2013, which concerns domestic workers and states that their wages are to be paid in cash and are to be no less than the legally stipulated minimum wage.

Conditions of work

69. Palestinian law includes general provisions setting minimum standards to ensure that all workers are able to enjoy suitable working conditions.

Some of the basic conditions envisaged in the Labour Code are set forth below:

- An upper limit of 45 hours of work per week, distributed over 5 or 6 days. The Code also envisages a reduction of at least 1 hour per day for jobs that are dangerous or harmful to health or that are performed at night;
- An upper limit on overtime of 12 hours per week;
- The right to paid weekly rest, which workers may accumulate and take once a month;
- Daily working hours are to be interspersed with one or more periods of rest of up to 1 hour;
- For each hour of overtime workers are to be paid for one and a half hours;
- Workers are entitled to an annual paid holiday of two weeks, which is to be increased to three weeks for workers engaged in jobs that are dangerous or harmful to health, and for workers who have been employed for more than five years;
- Workers are entitled to other holidays for religious and cultural festivals, which are not to be calculated as part of their annual holiday. They are also entitled to leave for the death of relatives and for other reasons, as well as sick leave of up to 28 days per year.

The Palestinian Labour Code includes a number of additional provisions concerning the work of women, in which regard see article 3 of the Covenant concerning non-discrimination against women.

70. The issue of sexual harassment in the workplace – or even of sexual harassment in general – is not contemplated in any legislation currently in force in the State of Palestine, be it criminal legislation (the Jordanian Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960) in the West Bank or the Mandate Criminal Code (Act No. 74 of 1934) in the Gaza Strip) or in labour legislation (the Palestinian Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000) or the Palestinian Civil Service Act).

The provisions applied in such cases, then, are the general legal provisions concerning crimes against honour or crimes against public order and public morals, with their respective penalties. This covers offences such as rape, indecent assault, inappropriate advances and indecent acts or comments. The penalties for such offences are more severe if the perpetrator has responsibility or authority over the victim; for example, employers or hierarchical superiors.

71. The Palestinian draft criminal code aspires to overcome the shortcomings in current legislation by envisaging the crime of sexual harassment which it defines as: “Any repeated and insistent annoyance of others through acts, words or gestures such as would undermine their dignity or offend their modesty with a view to eliciting a response to sexual desires – or to the sexual desires of a third party – or to applying pressure such as to weaken their resolve to resist such desires.” The draft criminal code penalizes sexual harassment with a fine and a term of imprisonment of up to 6 months, that term being increased to up to 2 years if the perpetrator has professional or effective authority over the victim.

72. Sexual harassment is a sensitive topic about which it is difficult to obtain accurate statistics and figures, due to the associated social stigma that may lead victims not to report offences. In addition, prevalent societal norms in some sectors of the community might tend to place the blame, at least partially, upon the female victim in cases of crimes against honour. This is particularly so in marginalized areas and areas where, due to the occupation, the Government of the State of Palestine faces difficulties in exercising effective control. In those areas, which often suffer grim socioeconomic circumstances, ancestral social customs are strengthened and, in the absence of effective State control, provide an alternative source of protection and security for individuals and families.

73. As concerns the working environment and occupational health and safety, the Palestinian Labour Code contains general provisions defining the responsibilities of companies and employers to meet occupational health standards and to make working conditions as safe as possible. Under the Code, the Council of Ministers, acting on a proposal of the Minister of Labour, is to issue occupational health and safety regulations. These cover the following:

- Personal protection to shield workers against workplace hazards and occupational diseases;
- Workplace health standards;
- First aid for workers in companies;
- Periodical medical tests for workers, as determined by the Ministry of Health, with the costs being borne by the companies concerned.

74. The Labour Code requires employers to issue occupational health and safety instructions accompanied by a list of relevant sanctions, once these have been approved by the Ministry of Labour in order to ensure that they meet minimum occupational health and safety requirements. Employers must then display those instructions in a place visible to all their workers. Under the Code, moreover, it is forbidden to make workers bear any of the costs arising from health and safety measures.

75. Under the Public Health Act No. 20 of 2004, the Ministry of Health also has some responsibilities vis-à-vis occupational health and safety. The Act allows the Ministry to establish the means to ensure health and safety in the workplace and to create a continuous inspection mechanism. The Act also gives the Ministry authority to license companies and to issue prior written approval for any kind of activity that might affect public health or the environment.

Right to form trade unions

76. Article 25 (2), (3) and (4) of the Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003, regulates labour relations in such a way as to ensure justice for all parties involved and to provide welfare, security and health and social care to workers. Under the Basic Law, union organization and strikes are defined as rights that are regulated by law.

77. The Palestinian Labour Code guarantees workers in the private sector the right to form trade unions but it does not set forth the objective conditions or official requirements to do so. The Ministry of Labour monitors the activity of trade unions in the State of Palestine by attending their conferences, approving their budgets and overseeing their elections to ensure they are consistent with the statutes of the union concerned, as approved by its general assembly and endorsed by the Ministry of Labour.

78. In cooperation with workers' and employers' representatives, and with funding from the International Labour Organization (ILO), the Ministry of Labour is drafting a trade union law. A draft text has been completed and is currently being examined by representatives of the three parties involved in the production process.

79. Collective bargaining mechanisms are protected and regulated under the Labour Code, which defines them as the dialogue between a trade union or its representatives and the employer or employers, or their representatives, the purpose of which is to resolve a collective grievance, improve working conditions or enhance productivity. Collective bargaining is conducted in accordance with the law, either at company level between employers and management on the one hand and workers' representatives on the other or, at the level of a particular economic sector, between representatives of employers in that sector and the relative trade union or, at the national level, between the employers' federation and the trade union federation. The aim of such negotiations is to reach a collective working agreement that is binding upon both sides for a period of three years. Negotiations for the next agreement begin, at the request of one of the two parties, three months prior to the end of the previous agreement and the first agreement remains in force until a new agreement is reached. At a minimum, the agreement must make provision for the following:

- Freedom to engage in trade union activity;
- Minimum wage for all types of work;
- Conditions for employing and dismissing workers;
- A bilateral committee to resolve any dispute that may arise concerning the application of the agreement.

80. The Palestinian Labour Code envisages a mechanism for resolving collective labour grievances, which are defined in the Code as any dispute that arises between, on the one hand, one or more employers and, on the other, workers or a group of workers regarding a matter of collective interest. In such a case, and if the dispute cannot be resolved by negotiation, either of the two parties involved may have recourse to a mediator of the Ministry of Labour who then has 10 days to resolve the dispute. If the mediator is unable to find a solution, the matter is referred to the Minister of Labour who, in turn, refers it to a conciliation committee, which is headed by an official of the Ministry of Labour and has representatives appointed in equal numbers by employers and workers. If the conciliation committee is also unable to resolve the dispute, either of the two parties may turn to the courts. If neither of the parties chooses to exercise this right and the dispute in question has a bearing on the public interest, the Minister of Labour can require the two parties involved in the dispute to appear before a committee of arbitration, which is headed by a judge and has a representative from the Ministry of Labour, a workers' representative and an employers' representative. In 2015, the department of the Ministry of Labour responsible for collective labour grievances helped to conclude 12 collective labour agreements, all of which were deposited with the Ministry of Labour in accordance with the law.

Right to strike

81. The right to strike is guaranteed under the Basic Law, article 25 (4) of which stipulates that it may be exercised within the limits of law. The same right is envisaged in the Labour Code where the legality of strikes is enshrined in article 66, while article 67 regulates the conditions under which the right to strike may be exercised. The Civil Service Act and other laws governing workers in certain public sector institutions – such as the Palestinian Security Forces Military Service Act No. 8 of 2005 and the Palestinian Diplomatic Corps Act of 2005 – do not contain explicit provisions regulating strike action. For this reason, strikes in the public sector are based on general norms that are drawn from the Basic Law, with recourse also to the provisions of the Labour Code. In this connection, article 67 of the Labour Code includes provisions governing strike action as well as company closure by management. Under that article, the party intending to strike must give written notification to the company management and to the Ministry of Labour at least two weeks prior to the action. This period is extended to four weeks in the case of a company that constitutes a public facility. The notification must be signed by 51 per cent of the workers in the company in the case of a strike or by the administrative board in the case of a company closure. Under the law, it is forbidden to strike during the course of collective bargaining to resolve a dispute and a strike must cease when the dispute that occasioned it has been submitted to an arbitrating body.

Work in illegal settlements and in Israel, the occupying power

82. Many Palestinians find themselves obliged to work in illegal settlements located in the Occupied Palestinian Territory and within the Green Line between the Occupied Palestinian Territory and Israel, the authority responsible for the unlawful occupation. They are compelled to do so due to high unemployment and low income and standards of living, particularly among citizens residing in "Area C" and East Jerusalem, who face various obstacles to their socioeconomic development due to the colonialist and racist policies the occupation authorities apply against them. Data collected by ILO indicates that the income that can be earned by working in the illegal settlements or within the Green Line is 2.2 times the amount that can be earned on the Palestinian labour market, particularly for residents of “Area C”. Indeed, many Palestinians living in those marginalized areas resort to working in the settlements and within the Green Line without obtaining work permits from the occupation authorities, which renders them more vulnerable to exploitation, curtailment of their labour rights and arbitrary dismissal.

83. ILO data also indicates that the number of Palestinians working in the illegal settlements or within the Green Line is steadily increasing, reaching 131,000 in 2017. The wages those workers earn constitute 24.4 per cent of the entire amount of wages earned by Palestinians in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. There is no precise figure as to the number of persons working without a permit, as such data is difficult to obtain.

84. The Palestinian Ministry of Labour follows up on all matters related to the receipt and distribution of work permits and the labour rights of Palestinians who work within the Green Line. This does not apply to the settlements because work in the settlements is illegal under Decree-Law No. 4 of 2010, which aims to prohibit and boycott products from the settlements. At the end of 2015, 57,000 Palestinians were working inside the Green Line and the social rights those workers accrued in that year amounted to 185,426,649 shekels.

Public pensions

85. Public officials who come under the Civil Service Act are also subject to the Public Pensions Act No. 7 of 2005, which was amended by Decree-Law No. 5 of 2007 and Decree-Law No. 1 of 2008. The Public Pensions Act applies to all employees in the public sector, including diplomatic and law enforcement personnel (although certain aspects regarding the security sector are covered in the Palestinian Security Forces Insurance and Pensions Act No. 16 of 2004). The Public Pensions Act is also applicable to staff of local bodies and of civil society institutions that are affiliated to the retirement system, and to members of the Palestine Liberation Organization who hold positions of responsibility abroad. These categories receive a pension as envisaged in the Public Pensions Act in the following cases:

- Retirement;
- Old age or incapacity;
- Decease.

86. The Public Pensions Act was a brainchild of the Palestinian Pension Agency, which regulates pensions and disburses benefits in accordance with the law. The Agency’s resources come from deductions made to participants’ salaries, contributions from the organizations that pay out the salaries and returns on the Agency’s investments, as well as other resources resulting from its activities.

The public pensions system has two fundamental components:

- (a) Defined benefits system;
- (b) Defined contribution system.

87. Under the defined benefits system, the government pays in the equivalent of 9 per cent of the employee’s salary while the employee pays in 7 per cent. In the defined contribution system, both the employee and the Government pay in 3 per cent of the salary. When it comes to calculating benefits, old-age pension is calculated on the basis of 2 per cent for each year of service, taking account of the average salary over the last three years of pensionable service. Contributors are also entitled to a pension in case of incapacity on grounds of health, which is likewise calculated on the basis of 2 per cent for each year of service, taking account of the average salary over the last three years of pensionable service, the years of service calculable for the purposes of the pension being the number of years of effective service up to the date of the injury or incapacity plus half the remaining years up to the age of mandatory retirement.

Thus, the number of years calculable for pension purposes cannot exceed 35. In addition to this, in case of incapacity or old age, employees (or their heirs if they have died as the result of a workplace injury) are entitled to an insurance pay-out from the Pension Agency, which is calculated as a percentage on the basis of age, as set forth in the following table from article 25 of the Public Pensions Act.

Up to the age of	Insurance pay-out (%)	Up to the age of	Insurance pay-out (%)

Employees acquire eligibility to a pension under the following rules and conditions:

- Reaching the mandatory retirement age of 60 with not less than 15 years of service;
- Completing 20 years of service and being 55 years old;
- The lower limit of pension entitlement is reached by persons who have completed 25 years of service and reached the age of 50 and who work in security, radiology laboratories and centres, oil and gas exploration or mines;
- Persons who are 60 and are not entitled to a pension receive their contributions and the interest accrued in a single pay-out upon reaching the age of 60.

In order to obtain an incapacity pension, persons must meet the following criteria:

- The person concerned must be under the age of 60;
- The person concerned must not be eligible to an old-age pension or early retirement;
- The person's state of incapacity must be confirmed by a committee appointed by the Pension Agency, which reviews and assesses the case.

Heirs' entitlement to a pension arises if the deceased was receiving or was entitled to receive a pension at the time of death.

Social security

88. The State of Palestine adopted a comprehensive social security system in September 2016 with the passage of Social Security Decree-Law No. 6 of 2016, which was drafted in cooperation with ILO. The purpose of the Decree-Law is to provide social security benefits to insured persons and their families, on the basis of principles of equity, sustainability, transparency and efficiency. The system covers groups that are outside the insurance and security schemes for government workers. In fact, the Social Security Decree-Law includes a raft of social insurance provisions for persons who are not covered under the Public Pensions Act No. 7 of 2005 or the Palestinian Security Forces Insurance and Pensions Act No. 16 of 2004. To that end a separate fund has been set up, overseen by the Social Security Corporation, which was brought into being under the Decree-Law. The following forms of social security are envisaged:

- Coverage for old age, incapacity and natural death;
- Coverage against workplace injuries;
- Maternity coverage;
- Coverage against illness;
- Health coverage;
- Unemployment coverage;
- Family compensation.

89. Coverage for old age, incapacity and natural death, coverage against workplace injuries and maternity coverage are mandatory for all groups. Initially, the Social Security Decree-Law was applied to these three basic categories (i.e., coverage for old age, incapacity and natural death, coverage against workplace injuries and maternity coverage) with the rest being introduced gradually. Social security under the Decree-Law is contribution-based with a 7.5 per cent deduction from the worker's monthly salary and a payment of 8.5 per cent of the worker's monthly salary on the part of the employer.

90. When the Social Security Decree-Law was first enacted in March 2016, it met with a wave of criticism from civil society and trade unions. Thus, consultations to amend the Decree-Law were held between the Palestinian Government and its critics, and those amendments were effectively introduced by September 2016. One of the criticisms levelled against the Social Security Decree-Law concerned the issue of contributions, because it envisaged that workers should pay 7.5 per cent of their monthly salary while the employer paid 8.5 per cent, which is the same percentage as employers pay for end-of-service indemnities. The Social Security Decree-Law has also been criticized for not granting the same privileges as those envisaged under the Public Pensions Act. Yet another criticism concerns the way in which the family of a deceased worker receives indemnity, which requires the worker to have spent 24 months in his post, something that is not required under the Public Pensions Act where the family of the deceased receives payment immediately after the death.

91. The question of the minimum amount of benefits is addressed in several provisions of the Decree-Law. Article 52, for example, states that the mandatory minimum pension for an insured person entitled to a pension must not be less than 75 per cent of the minimum wage or of the individual poverty threshold, whichever is higher. In cases of complete and permanent incapacity, article 58 of the Decree-Law sets the minimum incapacity pension for insured persons at not less than 40 per cent of the average monthly wage during the period in which the contributions were being made, up to a maximum of 10 years prior to the onset of the incapacity, or at not less than 75 per cent of the minimum wage or of the individual poverty threshold, whichever is higher. Under article 59, the pension for partial permanent incapacity is to be calculated as a percentage of the full pension for complete and permanent incapacity. Lastly, article 67 of the Decree-Law states that the pension in cases of natural death must not be less than the minimum wage or the individual poverty threshold, whichever is higher.

92. With regard to the periodic review of minimum levels, article 101 of the Decree-Law states that benefits are to be revised, at least once every three years, by decree of the administrative board of the Social Security Corporation, on the basis of the increase in the consumer price index in the country during that period. It should be noted that the minimum levels stipulated in the Decree-Law are insufficient to ensure an adequate standard of living for beneficiaries and their families, even if the higher of the minimum amounts stipulated in the text are applied. The underlying problem lies in the value of the minimum wage which, being 1,450 shekels, means that the mandatory pension for insured persons is 1,087 shekels, which is not enough to meet basic monthly needs, given standards of living in Palestine.

93. This Decree-Law does not guarantee benefits received under the system of non-contributory social assistance for disadvantaged and marginalized persons and their families, who are not covered by contribution-based social security programmes. However, this matter is addressed indirectly in article 102 of the Decree-Law which states that it is not permissible to withhold the benefits to which insured persons or their heirs are entitled under the Decree-Law save to pay a debt of spousal maintenance or a debt due to an institution. The amount withheld must not amount to more than a quarter of the benefit concerned and the priority is to be given to spousal maintenance.

94. The Social Security Decree-Law also envisages an optional supplementary system for old-age pensions, which depends on fixed contributions that are applicable – on a voluntary basis – to insured persons, but not to trainees. The system is funded through contributions paid by the employer and the insured person, calculated on the basis of the part of the insured person's monthly wage that surpasses the maximum insurable wage, as per article 42 (1) (a) of the Decree Law. This is without prejudice to acquired rights or to the right to end-of-service indemnity, which surpasses the maximum insurable wage specified in the Labour Code, and to all agreed financial rights which surpass the maximum end-of-service indemnity. The insured person receives a lump sum equivalent to the value of the amount accumulated on his personal account plus interest, which can also be changed into life-long or fixed-term instalments. If the insured person dies before reaching the legal retirement age, that person's heirs are entitled to a lump sum equivalent to the amount accumulated on the person's personal account plus interest.

95. With regard to health care, article 74 states that medical coverage for workplace injuries should include the costs of medical treatment and hospitalization as well as costs for transportation resulting from the injury and rehabilitation services and devices, including prosthetic limbs. As concerns maternity care under the Decree-Law, article 88 states that maternity coverage should include a monthly cash payment during the period of maternity leave (insured women are entitled to 12 weeks of maternity leave on the basis of a medical report establishing the expected date of birth). This is conditional upon the payment of at least three months' contributions during the year prior to the maternity leave. The insured woman may also absent herself from work for reasons specified by law while receiving a monthly amount equivalent to the average monthly wage she was receiving during the last three months she was paying contributions prior to maternity leave.

Family rights

96. Issues relating to family and personal status in the State of Palestine are regulated by a number of different laws. Muslims in the West Bank come under the Jordanian Personal Status Act No. 61 of 1976 while Muslims in the Gaza Strip are subject to the Ottoman Personal Status Act of 1918 and to the Family Rights Act of 1954, which was issued during the Egyptian administration of the Strip. The provisions of these laws are drawn directly from rules governing the family enshrined in Islamic sharia. The Palestinian Basic Law allows Christian communities to establish their own legal and judicial system wherewith to regulate matters relating to personal status. As a consequence, Christians are subject to a variety of personal status laws according to the particular community to which they belong. For example, the Code of Canon Law of 1983, the Personal Status Act for Catholic Communities and the Byzantine Family Code (for the Orthodox Churches).

97. Under Islamic personal status laws, women do not enjoy the same legal power to conclude a marriage contract as do men. Indeed, men are considered to have full jurisdiction over themselves and are entitled to conclude a contract of marriage without the consent of a "guardian" once they are over the age of 13, but women do not have the same faculty. As a general rule, women cannot marry of their own volition and power to arrange their marriage lies with a man in their family (for example, a father, brother, paternal uncle, etc.). This does not apply to women who have already been married. The same holds true for Christian communities where, under personal status laws Christian women (like Muslim women) often cannot marry of their own volition, whereas men can.

98. Palestinian courts have taken a number of preventive legal measures to expedite cases involving families that have forced their daughters into marriage and, sometimes, into prostitution. For example, the Chief Qadi and President of the Supreme Council of the Sharia Courts issued a circular to sharia court judges emphasizing the importance of ascertaining the conditions for marriage. These include the consent of the woman, corroboration that she is over the age of 18, verification of the future place of residence of the couple following their marriage, existence of a medical examination showing that the man is not carrying HIV/AIDS and verification that there are no other sharia or statutory impediments to the marriage.

Protection for working mothers

99. The Palestinian Labour Code envisages special protection for mothers. Article 103 of the Code states that working women who, before each birth, have spent 180 days working have the right to paid maternity leave of 10 weeks, of which at least 6 weeks following the delivery. It is prohibited, moreover, to dismiss a woman during such leave unless it is shown that she did other work during that period.

100. Under article 101 of the Code, pregnant women may not work overtime hours during their pregnancy or for six months after giving birth. Moreover, article 1 of Decree No. 2 of 2004 of the Minister of Labour prohibits the employment of women in work that is hazardous or arduous such as the manufacture and use of insecticides, welding which gives rise to harmful rays and noxious gases and work with solvents used in chemical cleaning processes on machines and clothing. Article 3 of the Decree prohibits the employment of pregnant or breastfeeding women in the following: industrial process involving the use of mercury, such as the silvering of mirrors; work at metal or glass smelting furnaces; work involving the use or manufacture of lead or metal alloys containing more than 10 per cent lead; work requiring exposure to fumes or smoke from oil derivatives; work requiring exposure to ionizing radiation; spray painting; rubber manufacture; manufacture of fertilizers of any kind; and the manufacture or repair of batteries.

101. The concept of protection for working mothers is applied differently by, on the one hand, private establishments that are subject to the Labour Code and, on the other, public-sector institutions that are subject to the Civil Service Act. The Act grants paid maternity leave of three months from the time the person concerned enters hospital as well as an hour off work each day to breastfeed until the infant reaches the age of 1. In addition to this, pregnant women are granted paid leave if their state of health requires home rest. Although both laws envisage non-discrimination between men and women, they do not grant paternity leave to men.

102. Pregnant women are provided with all forms of preventive care free of charge. This includes prenatal monitoring throughout pregnancy, the free provision of dietary supplements and other preventive interventions. Medical services are also made available in cases of high-risk pregnancies with free specialist consultancies, except in cases where the pregnant woman needs to be admitted to hospital.

Protection for children

103. Under the Palestinian Children's Act No. 7 of 2004, all children have the right to a standard of living that is adequate to ensure their physical, mental, spiritual and social development, while the State is to take all measures necessary to secure that right. Parents bear joint responsibility for the upbringing of their offspring, ensuring their development, providing guidance and meeting their needs in a manner consistent with their evolving abilities. The parents or guardians also have a duty to pay for their children's food, clothing, housing and education.

104. The Act also insists on the importance of preventive efforts within families as part of the actions they undertake on behalf of their children. This is to maintain the fundamental role that families have and to reaffirm parents' responsibility vis-à-vis the care, upbringing and education of children and thus ensure their optimal natural development. In cases where children do not obtain the care to which they are entitled from the persons who are naturally supposed to provide that care – i.e., parents or guardians – they are placed as a matter of urgency in the child protection centre in Beitunia or the care home for girls in Beit Jala where they can be provided with basic psychosocial, counselling and educational services. If children are found to require permanent care, a process of inter-institutional coordination takes place after which they are transferred to a permanent care home. The condition of children in such homes is professionally monitored by child protection counsellors who work for departments of social development.

105. All children who meet certain conditions set by the State and by State institutions are entitled to social assistance. They are:

- (a) Orphans or children of unknown parentage;
- (b) Children in social care institutions;
- (c) Children of divorced or abandoned women who have no one to maintain them;
- (d) Children of persons who are incarcerated, missing or incapable of work due to illness or disability and who have no one to maintain them;
- (e) Children of families whose homes have been destroyed or burned down;
- (f) Children of persons with disabilities or with chronic diseases;
- (g) Children who are triplets, quadruplets, etc.

Through its orphan protection counsellors in the governorates, the Ministry of Social Development, coordinates with associations and institutions involved in caring for such categories. The Ministry also provides assistance to orphaned children and to families with special needs.

106. As concerns protection measures, the Palestinian Children's Act recognizes the right to protection against all forms of physical, moral or sexual violence and abuse, as well as against abandonment, neglect and other forms of ill-treatment and exploitation. In that regard, the State is to take all legislative, administrative, social, educational and preventive measures necessary to secure the rights of children. Child protection counsellors provide children with protection and care against all forms of abuse and neglect, and it is up to them to decide – having fully assessed the family's circumstances and taking account of the child's best interests – whether to reintegrate a child into the family or to place the child in a permanent care home. According to article 56 of the Palestinian Children's Act, when a case is reported child protection counsellors must take measures to protect the child in question, also by preventing any contact between the child and the parties responsible for the situation that threatens his or her physical or mental health and safety. This might involve protecting the child within the family or placing the child with another family or in a temporary protection centre. For its part, the Ministry of Health is currently working on a child-protection system of its own, which will involve investigation, referral, early intervention, awareness-raising among families and the community and communication with relevant government agencies to curb violence, abuse and exploitation against children.

The Palestinian Children's Act addresses the issue of child labour and places an outright ban on the employment of children under the age of 15. It prohibits, furthermore, the employment or involvement of children in hazardous work or in jobs and professions – as specified by the Ministry of Labour – which could hinder their education or damage their physical and mental health and well-being. This applies even if they work for first-degree relatives. Anyone who violates these provisions is liable to a fine of between 1,000 and 2,000 Jordanian dinars (JD). The penalty is increased according to the number of children who are victims of the violation and is redoubled in the case of repeat offences. Moreover, in the case of repeat offences, the Minister of Labour can, at the proposal of the Minister of Social Development, order the full or partial closure of the establishment responsible for the violations.

107. The Act also addresses the conditions of employment and labour rights of juveniles. It requires employers to arrange for an initial medical examination of juveniles, before they join the workforce, to be followed by periodic medical checks. For its part, Decree No. 1 of 2004 of the Minister of Labour prohibits the employment of juveniles in remote locations far from civilization, and it prohibits juveniles from working overtime or being employed on a piecework basis. The Children's Act requires that the daily working hours of juveniles be reduced by not less than one hour per day. It also states that juveniles may not work for more than four hours consecutively and stipulates their right to one or more periods of rest of not less than one hour as well as annual leave of three weeks, which cannot be postponed. The Act also includes provisions to ensure that juveniles are able to participate in vocational training programmes run by the Ministry of Labour and to attend Ministry-supervised private centres that provide training in trades and professions of all kinds.

108. The employment of children is regulated by a number of policies, plans, strategies and procedures:

- A strategic plan for the labour sector and a charter for decent work in the State of Palestine, which prioritize the improved effectiveness, reach and quality of the labour inspection body to enable it to exercise its legal mandate to regulate and protect working juveniles;
- The annual and periodic plans of the Ministry of Labour, which include activities and interventions intended to regulate working juveniles across all areas of the Ministry's operations. This includes inspections, work protection, employment, vocational training, labour relations, wages and social security;
- Under chapter VI of the Palestinian Labour Code, the Ministry of Labour has legal jurisdiction to monitor the application of the Code in the workplace, particularly vis-à-vis the work of juveniles;
- The Palestinian Labour Code envisages penalties of between JD 200 and JD 500 against employers who violate its article 134. The penalty is increased according to the number of workers who are victim of the violation and is redoubled in the case of repeat offences;
- The National Committee on Child Labour was established pursuant to Decree No. 80 of 2013 of the Minister of Labour. The Committee, which includes representatives from Government and from employers' organizations, evaluates and reviews national child labour policies and ensures coordination between official and unofficial bodies.

109. Child protection networks run campaigns in the field and carry out tours of inspection in shopping centres, industrial facilities and public establishments. These activities are carried out in cooperation with representatives of partner institutions that are part of child protection networks such as the family protection unit of the Palestinian Police, the governorates, the Ministry of Labour and the Palestinian Red Crescent Society. Checks are made to detect cases of working children under the age of 15, or of children who are over 15 but who work under inadequate health and safety conditions. Children under the age of 15 are referred to the police family protection unit and are dealt with by child protection counsellors in the departments of social development. The children's cases are examined individually to understand the reasons that led them to work and a plan of action is put in place along with measures to guarantee the child's right to education and protection. In addition, the child's parents or caregivers are required to sign a pledge in which they undertake not to exploit the infant economically.

110. Child protection networks work in schools to raise awareness about children's rights and the dangers of child labour. These activities target both children and their parents and seek to draw attention to the risks of children working when under the legal age. Other awareness-raising campaigns take place across audiovisual media focusing on child rights and child labour, the negative impact of work, the risks children face when working and their deprivation of the rights envisaged in the Palestinian Children's Act.

111. The Palestinian Children's Act includes provision for the welfare of children who have been deprived of a natural family environment, be it permanently or temporarily. This is delivered via alternative care, either in another (alternative) family or, if no family is available, in a public or private social care institution.

112. The Ministry of Social Development acts to ensure the due implementation of the Palestinian Children's Act and of the Foster System Regulations, which were endorsed by the Palestinian Council of Ministers in 2013. Children placed with foster families receive a number of services including protection, medical care and treatment and the possibility to obtain a birth certificate and passport, as well as regular follow-up for both the child and the foster family.

113. The State of Palestine has made significant progress on the question of juveniles in conflict with the law. Decree-Law No. 4 of 2016 regarding the protection of juveniles defines a juvenile as a child who is under the age of 18 at the time of committing a criminal act or when at risk of falling into delinquency. The juvenile's age is established by an official document, in the absence of which the age is to be determined by an expert appointed by the courts or by the Office of the Public Prosecutor for Juveniles. The new Decree-Law – which represents a step forward in the criminal policies applied to juveniles, who are now treated as victims – came as the culmination of the State's concern for juveniles, which began a number of years ago. The National Committee for Juvenile Justice was established in 2010 under the leadership of the Ministry of Social Development and with the following institutional membership: the Ministry of the Interior (Police), the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education, the Supreme Judicial Council, the Office of the Public Prosecution, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Women's Affairs, the Independent Commission for Human Rights and Defense for Children International – Palestine Section. The National Committee has the role of identifying needs and priorities at the national level and developing plans and programmes regarding juvenile justice. The Committee then established a technical subcommittee, which drafted the 2016 Decree-Law regarding the protection of juveniles. Prior to that, the law applicable to juveniles had been the Jordanian Juveniles Act No. 16 of 1954 in the West Bank and the Egyptian Juvenile Offenders Act of 1937 in the Gaza Strip. An executive committee has been set up by the Ministry of Social Development to follow up on the application of the new Decree-Law.

114. In 2013, thanks to collaboration between the Ministry of Social Development and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the State of Palestine came up with a system of legal aid for juveniles in conflict with the law. The system was rolled out in the West Bank where three lawyers were appointed to deal with such cases in the north, centre and south of the region. The legal aid offered to juveniles and their referral to different institutions has contributed to their reintegration. Legal assistance has been provided to 919 juveniles since the programme was launched. In the years 2014 and 2015, 645 cases were resolved while a further 274 were processed. In 2015, legal assistance was provided in 167 cases of robbery, 120 cases involving violence, 19 cases involving sexual disorders, 7 drug-related cases, and 24 cases of minor infractions such as traffic violations. Alongside the non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that offer these services, the Bar Association adopted a legal aid system in 2016 under which it will provide legal representation to all persons of insufficient means who stand accused of crimes that attract a prison sentence. Under the system, juveniles will receive this service automatically irrespective of their lack of means or possibility of going to prison. The Bar Association is developing a legal mechanism for the care and protection of adolescents as well as a code of conduct that takes account of the interests of marginalized groups, including children.

115. In 2016, the Ministry of Social Development developed and reviewed its strategic plan for juvenile justice, with support from the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF). This process led to a long-term five-year plan and a short-term one-year plan (a road map). The plans envisaged the formation of a committee to monitor law enforcement as part of the National Committee for Juvenile Justice, with members from competent ministers and from Defense for Children International. They also included provision for a survey regarding the services provided to juveniles by civil society institutions in the areas of, firstly, rehabilitation and, secondly, non-custodial measures. Lastly, the plans aimed to build capacity among childhood counsellors with theoretical and practical training.

116. Another step taken by the State of Palestine to provide a judicial system specifically for juveniles was the establishment of a special unit to deal with juveniles, as part of the structure of the Palestinian Police. In addition, 12 members of the Office of the Public

Prosecution have been assigned to deal with cases involving juveniles. More recently, under the new Decree-Law regarding the protection of juveniles, a special juvenile court has been established as part of each court of first instance.

117. At departments of social development in the governorates, probation officers are present when juveniles are questioned by police or prosecutors, and they maintain contact with the parents regarding the provision of legal assistance to the juvenile. A social report about the young person is submitted to the court with a recommendation as to the best course of action to pursue in the case. The Ministry provides juveniles who have been convicted by the courts with protection and welfare in juvenile care institutions.

Persons with disabilities

118. Article 10 of Persons with Disabilities Act No. 4 of 1999 states: "The Ministry is responsible for coordinating with all relevant stakeholders authorities to provide care and habilitation for persons with disabilities." Article 5 of the Act stipulates: "The State is to provide various forms of habilitation for persons with disabilities, depending upon the nature of their disability."

119. Accordingly, the Ministry of Social Development makes the following services available to persons with disabilities: residential social welfare services for persons with severe disabilities who have no one to provide for them; health insurance and access to diagnosis and classification to determine degree of disability; early detection of disability; assistive devices and equipment as part of an emergency assistance programme; school and university fee exemptions for persons with disabilities in education; and assistance in cash and in kind. Under article 6 (2) of the Persons with Disabilities Act, all means of transport for individuals with disabilities are exempt from fees, customs duties and taxes. The Ministry grants the exemptions to applicants who meet the required conditions.

Older persons

120. Article 21 of the Basic Law grants all individuals irrespective of their age the freedom to engage in economic activity, in accordance with the law. Article 22 of the Basic Law states that social and health insurance, as well as pensions for incapacity or old age are to be regulated by law.

121. The draft criminal code addresses the protection of older persons from all forms of violence and abuse, and makes children responsible for caring for their parents. A draft law on the rights of older persons was completed a few years ago and is part of the legislative programme of the Palestinian Government, although it has yet to be approved. The fact that the new law has not been enacted means that its implementing regulations have not been issued and nor have the regulations governing care homes for older persons.

122. Nonetheless, via its home for older persons in the governorate of Jericho, the Ministry of Social Development provides care and accommodation for older persons who have suffered violence or have no one to care for them and nowhere to stay. In addition to this, through geriatric care counsellors at departments of social development in the governorates, the Ministry coordinates with institutions in the local community to provide care and shelter for older persons who have suffered violence or ill-treatment or have no one to care for them and nowhere to stay.

Asylum seekers

123. Due to the specific nature of the Palestinian situation, the State of Palestine is unable to take in refugees. This is because the occupying State controls all entry and exit crossings of the Occupied Palestinian Territory and has usurped the power to decide whether or not foreigners are allowed to enter the State of Palestine.

124. It should be noted that nearly half the Palestinian people have been refugees in the diaspora since 1948 and that the occupying State does not allow Palestinian citizens in the diaspora to return to their homeland, even though that State was primarily responsible for their displacement. The Palestine Liberation Organization continues to work with the State of Palestine to find a just solution to the refugee issue and to implement the right of return, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 194 (1948).

Domestic violence

125. Article 295 of the Jordanian Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960) penalizes sexual relations between a girl aged between 15 and 18 and a person charged with her care. According to that provision, a fixed term of imprisonment with hard labour is to be imposed on any legitimate or illegitimate ascendent of a girl aged over 15 but under 18 who has sexual relations with that girl. This also applies to the husband of the girl's mother or paternal grandmother as well as to persons responsible for the girl's education or who hold authority over her. The same penalty is applicable if the author of the offence is a cleric or a director or employee of an employment bureau and they commit the offence by abusing their authority and the facilities that arise from such authority. A full chapter of the Code (arts. 273 to 278) focuses on offences affecting the family.

Articles 42 to 49 of the Children's Act No. 7 of 2004 envisage protection for children from all forms of violence and exploitation.

The Social Development Act No. 14 of 1956 gives the Ministry overall responsibility for the welfare of children and mothers.

Under Regulation No. 12 of 2011 regarding centres for the protection of female victims of violence, those centres are to provide protection, support and rehabilitation for victims of domestic violence.

Council of Ministers Decree No. 01/79/13/M.W/S.F, which was issued in 2013, concerns a national referral system for female victims of violence and regulates the relationship between the three partner institutions (the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministry of Social Development and the Ministry of Health) in protecting women who have suffered violence.

The Government is working on the final version of its draft law on the protection of the family from violence, which criminalizes aggression against children or women, including spousal rape.

126. Spousal rape, however, is not criminalized under current law in the State of Palestine; indeed, the Personal Status Act overlooks it entirely. This is because the cultural heritage surrounding family life, which is linked to certain schools of Islamic sharia, considers that a husband has a right to have sex with his wife, irrespective of her consent. This is why new laws, and particularly the draft criminal code, need to address this issue and close the loopholes in existing legislation, which the State of Palestine inherited from earlier periods in its history.

127. A person who commits rape is liable to a term of imprisonment of not less than 5 years and, if the victim is under 15, to a term of imprisonment of not less than 7 years. If the victim is over 15 but under 18 and the perpetrator is a legitimate or illegitimate ascendent of hers, the penalty is imprisonment for between 3 and 15 years, at the discretion of the judge. If a valid contract of marriage is concluded between rapist and victim, the prosecution of the offender is discontinued or, depending upon the circumstances, the enforcement of his sentence is suspended. This constitutes a double punishment for the victim and opens the way to impunity for perpetrators. Thus, the Office of the Public Prosecution has retained its right to prosecute the offence (or to enforce the sentence) in cases where the marriage ends with divorce for the woman, without legitimate reason, within 3 years in the case of less serious offences and within 5 years in the case of more serious offences. According to records held by the gender unit of the Office of the Public Prosecution, there were some 30 cases of rape in the West Bank in the period between 2013, 2014 and up to 22 June 2015.

128. The draft Palestinian criminal code envisages rigorous imprisonment or life imprisonment for anyone responsible for raping a female who is under the age of 18 or who, due to weakness or physical, psychological or mental incapacity, is unable to oppose resistance. Moreover, it does not exempt perpetrators from criminal proceedings if they marry their victim; however, it does not criminalize spousal rape. In general terms, the draft criminal code expands the scope of criminalization of gender-based acts of violence, with a particular focus on offences against women, which attract more severe penalties. These include offences such as incest, indecent assault, inappropriate advances, indecent acts or comments, seduction through promise of marriage and instigation to break marital ties. For example, under current criminal law, persons who commit incest are liable to a term of imprisonment of between 2 and 3 years, irrespective of whether one of the offenders has legal or effective authority over the other. This is because, in all cases, incest is considered to be a less serious offence. However, the new draft code distinguishes between two different situations. In the first case, where one of the parties to the incest has legal or effective authority over the other, the party holding that authority is liable to a term of imprisonment of not less than 7 years (the act being considered a more serious offence) while the other is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 3 years (the act being considered a less serious offence). In the second case, where incest occurs between two persons neither of whom has authority over the other, each of them is liable to a term of imprisonment of not less than 5 years (the act being considered a more serious offence). The draft criminal code goes even further by considering the mere fact of committing a crime against a woman to constitute, of itself, a circumstance liable to aggravate the penalty prescribed for that crime, whatever it may be.

129. As for protection, women's counsellors at departments of social development take in and assist female victims of violence who turn to the departments or to the family protection units run by the police or by the governorates. There, the women and their children can be provided with protection, care and guidance, and efforts can be made to reintegrate them into the community. In cases where their lives might be at risk, they are given protection in cooperation with three centres present in the West Bank (the Mehwar Centre in Bethlehem, which is a governmental institution run by the Ministry of Social Development; the Safe House in Nablus, which belongs to the Family Defence Society; and the Emergency Centre in Jericho, which is associated with centres for the legal and social guidance of women). There, the women and their children can receive all the legal, psychological, social and health services they require.

130. The provision of protection to female victims of violence also involves empowering them across a range of areas:

- Education: providing beneficiaries with secondary and university-level education;
- Economic empowerment: providing beneficiaries in protection centres with training in professions of their choice, such as cosmetology or tailoring;
- Providing work for survivors of violence: the work is provided in centres run by the Ministry as well as in other centres, although there are some difficulties in this regard;
- Awareness-raising: activities are conducted to raise awareness about women's rights, gender, domestic violence and protection. These activities are directed at beneficiaries themselves, at women's counsellors and at the residents of protection centres.

Human trafficking

131. Certain provisions contained in some domestic Palestinian laws contemplate traditional offences that are akin to human trafficking. In particular, the Palestinian Children's Act, the Palestinian Labour Code and the Jordanian Criminal Code, which is in force in the West Bank, cover offences such as prostitution, child labour and child abuse. For its part, the draft Palestinian criminal code includes detailed provisions that explicitly and directly criminalize and punish human trafficking offences. The draft code also considers slavery to be a form of human trafficking and focuses particular attention on the categories most at risk, particularly women and children.

132. Many pieces of legislation in Palestine serve to protect women and girls from sexual exploitation in all its forms, although they do not make explicit provision for human trafficking offences. Thus in 2014 – pending the enactment of the draft Palestinian criminal code – the State of Palestine acted to protect such persons by signing and ratifying the relevant international treaties; i.e., the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. In addition to this, while still under the British Mandate in 1932, Palestine acceded to the 1904 International Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic and the 1921 International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children.

133. Prostitution is illegal under the criminal laws of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, which penalize incitement or coercion to practise prostitution, the exercise of prostitution and living off the earnings of prostitution. The relevant provisions, which are contained in a separate section dedicated to licentious behaviour and offences against public morals, envisage a term of imprisonment of between 1 month and 3 years for anyone who, whether in Palestine or abroad, leads or attempts to lead a female under the age of 20 into prostitution or who leads or attempts to lead anyone under the age of 15 to commit sodomy. The same laws envisage a penalty of up to 2 years' imprisonment for anyone, male or female, who knowingly derives their income entirely or in part from the earnings of a woman who exercises prostitution.

134. The same laws also prohibit opening locations in which to exercise prostitution, and anyone who furnishes, rents or owns a site for purposes of prostitution, or who participates in the use of a site as a place of prostitution, is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 6 months. The laws also punish the offence of trafficking in women, and anyone who detains a woman against her will in any place to practise prostitution or in a house of ill-repute is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 2 years. Moreover, anyone who – using threats, intimidation, deception or drugs – leads or attempts to lead a woman into an act of illicit intercourse is liable to a term of imprisonment of between 1 and 3 years. The law also envisages punishment for anyone who, entrusted with the care of a child, allows the child to reside in or frequent a house of ill-repute.

135. Child marriage is considered to be a form of trafficking in women, and the criminal laws in force in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip envisage a term of imprisonment of up to 6 months for anyone who marries a girl under the age of 15, or officiates or helps to officiate at such a marriage in any way. Moreover, under the criminal laws of the Gaza Strip, anyone married to a girl under the age of 15 who has conjugal relations with her or who attempts to facilitate such relations using any material means or device is liable to a term of imprisonment of 2 years. The Gaza laws also impose a sentence of 5 years' imprisonment upon anyone who has illicit intercourse with a female aged between 16 and 21, or who assists another to engage in such intercourse, if the female is a descendant of the perpetrator or of the perpetrator's wife or if he is her guardian, responsible for her upbringing or otherwise holds authority over her.

136. These laws also penalize sexual offences committed against women such as rape, indecent assault, inappropriate advances, indecent acts or comments. The Palestinian Labour Code, moreover, prohibits women from working at night.

137. Under Decree-Law No. 9 of 2007 concerning money laundering, money resulting from the sexual exploitation of women and children is considered to be illicit and to constitute grounds for the offence of money-laundering. Perpetrators are liable to a term of imprisonment of 15 years as well as heavy fines.

138. The draft Palestinian criminal code envisages severe penalties for vice-related crimes, and it dedicates an entire section to crimes that offend human dignity, including the crime of human trafficking. Article 468 of the draft code, for example, envisages a term of imprisonment of up to 7 years for anyone who, whether in Palestine or abroad, leads or attempts to lead a female into prostitution or who leads or attempts to lead a boy under the age of 18 into vice and immorality. That penalty increases to up to 10 years' imprisonment if the female is under the age of 18 or if force, threats or deception are employed against her. Any person, male or female, who habitually engages in prostitution is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 7 years, while anyone who opens a house or other location in which to exercise prostitution, who administers such an establishment or assists in running it in any way is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 10 years. The draft code also covers the question of living off the proceeds of prostitution by stating that anyone who knowingly derives their income from the earnings of a female or male who practises prostitution is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 7 years. All the aforementioned provisions also envisage the imposition of heavy fines.

139. The draft Palestinian criminal code penalizes all forms of human trafficking, particularly trafficking in women. Perpetrators of the offence face a fixed term of imprisonment as well as a fine of between JD 20,000 and JD 40,000 or a fine equivalent to the proceeds of the offence, whichever is greater. The penalty is increased if the offender has established an organized criminal group for the purposes of human trafficking; if the act was accompanied by threats, abuse or torture; if the offender is related to – or has authority over – the victim; if the offender is a public official; if the crime results in the death, disability or illness of the victim; or if the victim lacks capacity or has a disability.

140. There are no detailed studies or accurate statistics regarding the trafficking of women and their exploitation in prostitution in the State of Palestine. This is due to the sensitivity of that issue in the Palestinian cultural and social milieu. However, the studies that do exist indicate that human trafficking activities are practised in a limited and unregulated manner. It is important also to mention other factors that further complicate efforts to curb human trafficking, gain access to victims and prosecute and punish perpetrators. These factors are the Israeli occupation with its fragmentation of Palestinian territory; the isolation of large areas; the military checkpoints, the settlements, the wall of expansion and annexation and the bypass roads; the continuing control of the borders of Palestine; and the absence of government control over the facilities that employ Palestinian workers (men and women) or over the working conditions to which they are subjected, both in Israel and in the settlements.

141. The Minister of Labour has issued a decree regulating domestic work. Under the decree – which defines the nature of such work, working hours and employer obligations – it is the responsibility of the Ministry of Labour to stipulate and oversee adherence to domestic employment contracts. The Ministry also has the power to take measures and impose penalties if it receives complaints or information concerning violations to the rights of domestic workers.

142. With regard to trafficking in human organs, article 16 of the Palestinian Basic Law stipulates: “It is prohibited to conduct any form of medical or scientific experiment without the prior legal consent of the party involved, while medical tests and treatment or surgical procedures may be conducted only under the relevant law. The transplantation of human organs and other new scientific developments are to be regulated by law and are to serve legitimate humanitarian purposes.” The draft criminal code envisages a term of imprisonment of up to 5 years for persons who undertake to sell an organ of their own body while purchasers and intermediaries are liable to the same penalty. Anyone who, knowing an organ to have been sold, performs a surgical operation to remove that organ from a body or to transplant it into another body is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 7 years. The sentence is to be one of rigorous imprisonment if the offence was committed by an organized group or if it was committed in the context of hudud.

Poverty

143. The State of Palestine is among the least developed countries according to General Assembly resolution 43/178 of 1988, which recognizes the difficulty of achieving development for the benefit of the Palestinian people under occupation. Thus, the main cause for the widespread poverty is the Israeli occupation and the policies of that occupation, which aim to assign all life sustaining resources to settlers in the illegal settlements at the expense of the Palestinian people, their natural resources and their land. This restricts the Palestinian people in the exercise of the very rights they need to exercise in order to overcome poverty, such as the right to self-determination, the right to sustainable development, the right to movement and the right to life.

144. The Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics has set the national poverty line in accordance with a domestic definition of the concept of poverty, which is based on the official definition of poverty established in 1997. The definition, which embraces absolute and relative criteria, is based on a budget for the basic needs of a family of five (two adults and three children). Two poverty lines have been traced on the basis of the real consumption patterns of families (issued by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics on 10 July 2015).

145. It should be noted that there is, as yet, no national plan to combat poverty although, as of mid-2017, a national team has been working on drafting a multi-dimensional poverty plan and there are policies and programmes that aim to reduce the impact of poverty on families and individuals. In addition, economic empowerment and social rehabilitation programmes enable families and individuals to launch income-generating projects, and this too acts as a form of relief assistance.

146. The Ministry of Social Development is responsible for monitoring programmes aimed at combating and reducing the impact of poverty. As part of those programmes, baskets containing relief aid are provided to families living below the poverty line. The families are also given cash assistance every three months, free health insurance for all their members and full exemption on charges for external medical treatment, while 36 per cent of them receive food assistance every three months. Furthermore, the families are provided with emergency assistance as required; they are exempted from school fees and pay lower university tuition fees in some universities.

147. The Ministry of Social Development gives all families, without exception and unconditionally, the right to apply for its services. Methodologies for targeting families have been introduced, with the approval of the Council of Ministers. The Ministry provides basic services to the family as a single unit, while also focusing on each individual family member. Single persons are considered to constitute a family while persons with special needs within a family are assisted with additional services over and above the basic services. In this way, the services and interventions reach all the subgroups within the family.

Right to adequate nourishment

148. Under article 17 of the Public Health Act of 2014, the Ministry of Health coordinates with the bodies responsible for overseeing the circulation of foodstuffs. Those bodies monitor imported foodstuffs, which arrive at customs posts and are not allowed to enter without clearance from the Ministry, as well as locally produced foodstuffs in the places where they are prepared and processed. According to article 18 of the Act, foodstuffs may not be marketed if “they contravene the specifications and conditions set by the Ministry, if they have been adulterated in any way, if they are unfit for human consumption or if they are harmful to human health”. The department for nutrition registers all special foodstuffs and monitors them on the market. These include: “Micronutrient-fortified foods, infant formula, follow-on formula, baby and infant food, nutritional products for athletes, dietary supplements, medically prescribed foodstuffs, foods for weight loss and foodstuffs that claim to have health or nutritional benefits.” On a separate front, the Ministry is implementing a national system for the marketing of breast milk substitutes, which includes a ban on advertising or promoting any breast milk substitute.

149. Under article 25 of the Act, officials of the Ministry are to test samples of the food in circulation using a sampling mechanism governed by regulations issued in accordance with the Act. Under article 26, the samples are to be tested in Ministry-designated laboratories as soon as they have been taken and the parties concerned are to be informed of the results of the analysis within no more than 15 days. The Ministry collects samples on a random basis to ascertain food quality and addresses any violations it encounters.

150. The Ministry also takes steps to raise awareness about the principles of nutrition. In that regard, and acting in cooperation with the competent authorities under article 36 of the Act, the Ministry develops text-based and audiovisual educational programmes on health and the environment. Article 38 of the Act states that it is the responsibility of the Ministry, acting through its department for school health and cooperating with the competent authorities, to develop educational programmes on health and the environment then roll them out in nurseries, schools and universities. As part of its national strategic plan for health 2014–2016, the Ministry has intensified its health awareness and education campaigns, particularly on non-communicable diseases and their various risk factors. The second programme under the strategic plan includes the promotion of healthy lifestyles and public health programmes.

151. Ministry of Health departments for school health, health education, nutrition and environmental health conduct awareness-raising campaigns among school students, mothers and the community at large on healthy and balanced diets and the avoidance of unhealthy eating habits.

152. A document on policies, strategies and a national plan for nutrition in Palestine 2015–2017 was developed on the basis of the right to food, as part of a food security programme the third pillar of which concerns food security and nutritional safety. The document prioritizes food security, and efforts to implement it are being made by the competent authorities in Palestine.

153. The Ministry of the Economy organizes the various sectors of the market and regulates business transactions. It monitors the commodities entering the market in order to ensure the safety and quality of goods and products and to protect citizens from fraudulent practices. It accomplishes this task via the department for consumer protection, which operates under Consumer Protection Act No. 21 of 2005 and its implementing regulations of 2009. For its part, Act No. 4 of 2010 regarding the boycott of goods from the settlements aims to block any goods and services produced in illegal settlements on the Palestinian Occupied Territory, to provide better marketing opportunities for Palestinian goods and to raise citizens' awareness about the negative effects of promoting products from the settlements.

Right to access water

154. Measures taken to ensure that all persons are able to access affordable and sufficient water that is safe for personal and domestic use are regulated by Water Act No. 14 of 2014. The purpose of the Act is to develop water resources in Palestine through integrated sustainable management, with a view to increasing capacity, improving quality, preserving and protecting water resources from pollution and depletion, and improving and increasing the standard of water services.

155. The Act considers all hydric resources in Palestine to be public property and grants power to manage those resources to the Water Authority, which is mandated to distribute them fairly and efficiently. The Act, furthermore, decrees the inviolability of hydric resources and of water and sewage facilities, in line with criteria established by the Council of Ministers, and it states that all individuals have the right to obtain sufficient potable water of adequate quality, at prices to be determined under a system of tariffs issued by the Council of Ministers. Under the Act, it is forbidden to interrupt the supply of water to users who, due to financial inability, fail to pay their bills.

156. The management of water resources in the State of Palestine is divided into different levels that operate integrally. Regulation and oversight is the responsibility of the Water Sector Regulatory Council, which oversees the quality of water and sewerage services and ensures that prices remain reasonable for all the parties involved. It also issues authorization for water-related facilities and projects. On a separate front, the Palestinian Water Authority is responsible for strategy and planning in the water sector and, thus, regulates the supply of water to service providers.

157. Under article 2 (11) of the Public Health Act, the Ministry of Health conducts periodic tests of drinking water to ensure that it remains fit for human consumption. Indeed, the Ministry acts to ensure the availability of safe drinking water by screening it for biological or chemical contaminants in the Central Public Health Laboratory. The Ministry also chlorinates collective wells, wherever they may be located, as well as wells run by local authorities whence water is distributed to homes. Ministry policies also include a system for the epidemiological monitoring of diseases, including waterborne diseases. The system envisages rapid intervention to reduce the propagation of disease as well as the testing and treatment of water, the raising of public awareness, the treatment of persons who fall sick and the provision of free medicines. Also under the system, samples are collected from open water reservoirs and from wastewater sites and tested for the presence of the poliovirus. The actions of the Ministry of Health are not limited to drinking water but also include the water of swimming pools, which also undergoes periodic testing and is regularly chlorinated. The Ministry also monitors compliance with the sanitary conditions set forth in instructions issued by the department for environmental health.

158. The water sector in the State of Palestine is being affected by the occupation, which depletes Palestinian national resources, including water resources, and denies the Palestinian people access thereto. Israel, the occupying power, supplies large amounts of Palestinian water in the West Bank to the illegal settlements. This water is, in fact, stolen. Data supplied by the Water Authority and by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics indicates that the amount of water available to an Israeli settler in the West Bank is about eight times the amount available to a Palestinian citizen. And the water crisis in “Area C” of the West Bank, including East Jerusalem is growing. Those areas are, in fact, under the complete control of the occupying forces who apply discriminatory policies the overall effect of which is to provide a high level of well-being for settlers while almost entirely neglecting local Palestinians. The occupiers have raised the cost of permits for building facilities, including water facilities, in those areas while, at the same time, preventing the Palestinian Government from establishing the necessary infrastructure there. In the Gaza Strip – which already suffers from overpopulation and difficult living conditions as a result of the blockade that began in 2007 and the three wars waged by Israel since then – the water sector is affected by the fact that upwards of 90 per cent of groundwater is polluted. This fact has led a number of United Nations agencies to express concerns about whether the Strip will be liveable by the end of the current decade. In general, the population of the Gaza Strip is reliant on desalination plants which do not produce enough water to meet their needs.

159. Despite these problems, public water supply networks in the State of Palestine are largely able to ensure access for citizens, and data from the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics shows that 94.9 per cent of Palestinian families are connected to the public water system. Those who are not connected to the system rely for drinking water on unofficial suppliers, a process that often requires walking long distances and making a physical effort to transport the water, not to mention the elevated costs involved. The Palestinian Government is doing what it can to close this gap by supporting citizens who rely on such services and monitoring the prices of the water thus supplied. Although the Government has drawn up a plan for the communities that are cut off from the water supply or that do not receive water as they should, it is nonetheless forced to rely on unofficial suppliers as those communities remain under occupation.

160. The infrastructure crisis in the water sector essentially concerns sewerage, and the significant shortage in sanitation infrastructure outside the main cities has left communities in “Area C” and “Area B” without sewerage altogether. In that connection, 38.4 per cent of families in the West Bank are connected to the sewerage system as compared to 83.5 per cent of families in the Gaza Strip. This means that not less than 32.6 per cent of Palestinian families rely on absorption pits or other alternative means of sanitation.

Right to adequate housing

161. In 2014, in collaboration with the United Nations Human Settlements Programme (UN-Habitat), the Ministry of Public Works and Housing conducted an in-depth study on housing in the State of Palestine. In addition to this, at the end of 2013, the Ministry issued a document on the condition of the housing sector in the State. The document considered all matters related to housing, taking account of its significance, the impact of the occupation on its development and the political, institutional and legal frameworks affecting it as well as its financial, economic and cultural dimensions. The results of the study, and of a 2015 survey into housing conditions conducted by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, showed that 0.5 per cent of families in the State of Palestine are deprived of adequate shelter, 8.7 per cent live in unsafe structures, 13.2 per cent live in inadequate and severely overcrowded structures and 5.5 per cent do not have a waste collection service.

162. The Ministry of Public Works and Housing has formulated national housing policies with a view to promoting that sector and to identifying a global vision that embraces strategic objectives and plans of action. Undoubtedly the most important objective is to develop operational strategies and plans that will enable all citizens to enjoy adequate housing; however, there are a number of obstacles that stand in the way of achieving this. One of these is the lack of available financial resources and the fact that the State of Palestine is reliant on donations and support from abroad in order to finance its budget. The Ministry of Public Works and Housing is attempting to overcome this obstacle by developing a strategic partnership between the public sector and the private sector (developers, contractors, housing cooperatives and investors) to build accommodation units and to plan and develop the necessary infrastructure and services to enable citizens to enjoy adequate housing. In addition, a strategy is being studied that would involve cooperation with donor States to provide support for housing projects and infrastructure.

163. The other obstacle consists in the policies of the Israeli occupation which involve the confiscation of lands, the construction of illegal colonies and bypass roads, the division of the territory of the State of Palestine and the arbitrary obstruction of development in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem. These policies weigh heavily against the completion of housing projects. The Israeli occupation holds authority over more than 60 per cent of the area of the West Bank, which is the area necessary for Palestinian urban expansion there, while the remaining areas are constantly diminishing due to population growth rates and the intensification of forced displacement of marginalized communities from “Area C” and the countryside, generally towards the big cities. In 2017, according to the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) bureau in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, the occupying authority appropriated more than one third of East Jerusalem to build illegal Israeli settlements, with only 13 per cent remaining for Palestinians. At least one third of the houses in East Jerusalem were built without authorization from the occupying authorities, which means that they are at risk of being demolished. In addition to this, the arbitrary policies pursued by the occupying authorities by establishing “permanent residency” for Palestinians living in Jerusalem has led many of them to reside in specific areas in order to preserve their status and to be able to live and work in Jerusalem. This has led to severe overcrowding and urban congestion in vital areas located at the entrances to Palestinian cities.

164. These policies have led to a significant rise in land and real estate prices in all West Bank cities and in the costs of building housing units, meaning that broad swathes of society are no longer able to own their own home. This has had a negative impact on government programmes and plans to provide out adequate and low-cost housing projects for large segments of Palestinian society.

165. Occupation policies that violate Palestinians’ right to housing are not limited to confiscating land and obstructing the development of the Palestinian people, they also include arbitrary demolitions. These are carried out by Israel, the occupying power, either as a punitive measure contrary to international law (a policy which increased during the first and second intifadas) or as an administrative measure in the context of refusing to concede authorizations for Palestinian urban expansion. It also involves the destruction of Palestinian homes under other pretexts, a practice that has rendered many Palestinian families homeless.

166. The obstacles the occupation places in the way of the right to housing for Palestinians also extend to the Gaza Strip, which is already suffering from severe overcrowding as well as difficult living conditions for the vast majority of its inhabitants, of whom Palestinian refugees account for an estimated two thirds. Moreover, with its aggression of summer 2014, the occupying State completely destroyed a total of 12,576 housing units and partially destroyed a further 6,455. This means that, by the end of the attacks, some 19,000 units were uninhabitable, according to OCHA statistics. Moreover, because of the obstacles the occupation authorities places on the importation of construction materials, those houses have still yet to be rebuilt and refurbished.

167. In spite of these difficulties, the State of Palestine had been able to carry out a number of low-cost housing projects, mostly aimed at public-sector employees as detailed below:

168. The Ministry has provided cooperative housing associations with government land at symbolic prices, benefiting some 5,800 families.

169. Housing policies include strategies to provide housing to persons with special accommodation requirements, including families with female breadwinners, the very poor, families with members with disabilities and disadvantaged families many of which have large numbers of children. Notably, these strategies include the creation of a government-backed housing fund to help low-income families access affordable housing. The target groups are families with lower-than-average income who are below the family poverty line as defined by law. This can include government employees, private-sector wage earners or other groups; it can also include vulnerable and highly disadvantaged families in which the head of the household is a woman, a widow or a combat veteran. In such cases, the target group will require additional subsidies in order to participate in the programme.

170. In the case of families where the head of the household is a woman, priority is given to developing infrastructure, supporting efforts to recondition homes and building decent new housing in villages and other areas where such disadvantaged households live. This is achieved by supporting women's associations, which are the principal institutions of coordination, and by targeting subsidies to enable families with female breadwinners to enjoy adequate accommodation and to help them pay for the services they require.

171. As concerns the environmental safety of housing, responsibility for building housing units lies with municipalities and village councils. The department for health in the governorate then approves the construction following an environmental assessment to ensure that there are no risk factors that may threaten the health of residents and that the natural environment is such as to ensure safe and suitable housing.

Article 12

172. The right to health is addressed in several articles of the Palestinian Basic Law. Article 16 considers the right to health in the context of the right to physical safety and prohibits any form of medical or scientific experiment without the prior legal consent of the party involved. It also prohibits medical tests, treatment or surgical procedures except in the framework of the law. Article 22 states that public institutions have a duty to provide health care as well as health and social insurance to the families of martyrs, detainees, the injured and persons with disabilities. The same article also regulates labour rights and guarantees health and social care for workers.

173. The details of national health policy are enshrined in the Public Health Act according to which it is the responsibility of the Ministry of Health to run the State's preventive, diagnostic, therapeutic and rehabilitative services. The Ministry is also to create the health institutions necessary to that end, to provide health insurance in line with available resources and to perform other duties with a view to supporting the health sector.

174. The State of Palestine has adopted a health policy that embraces preventive health initiatives such as a national vaccination programme against communicable diseases and preventable disabilities, and early disease and disability detection programmes accompanied by the provision of the necessary treatment, depending upon the Ministry's available resources. The policy also envisages initiatives to raise awareness in all health-related areas in order to increase the knowledge of citizens, improve their attitudes and behaviour and help them embrace healthy lifestyles that will promote their own health and that of their families.

175. The costs of health-care services and private or public health insurance are such as to make them accessible to all, including socially marginalized groups. The Ministry of Health provides primary health-care services, testing and treatment for communicable diseases and treatment for mental illness and cancer free of charge and without the need for health insurance. Other medical treatment services are covered by a health insurance system that is affordable and available to all citizens. It should be noted, moreover, that 7.7 per cent of insured families are covered by free health insurance from the Ministry of Social Development or the Ministry of Labour.

176. Health insurance covers treatment in centres and clinics run by departments of health and in State-run hospitals. It also covers 95 per cent of the costs of treatment in private hospitals, when patients have been referred there by the referrals committee and the service procurement department of the Ministry of Health, and it covers rehabilitation services and physiotherapy for cases referred by the Ministry's service procurement department. However, it does not cover cosmetic surgery, orthodontics, fertility treatment, prosthetic limbs or assistive medical devices.

177. There are six kinds of government health insurance in Palestine. These are compulsory insurance (for employees of the government sector and of municipalities and contractual workers), voluntary insurance, insurance for workers in Israel, contractual insurance, social development insurance and insurance for Palestinian prisoners and their families. In 2014, a total of 150,464 families were participating in these various forms of insurance in the West Bank, in addition to 12,515 families with free health insurance. Since 2000, the Government has been covering unemployed persons with its "Al-Aqsa insurance". This is a form of free health insurance that is made available to the unemployed, families in need and persons whose earnings are lower than the minimum wage. In all, some 215,000 families benefit from this insurance. Under a presidential decision issued on 26 June 2007, all residents of the Gaza Strip are fully exempt from fees for health services provided by ministries and government agencies or institutions, including services dispensed for the first time after that date. This means that the free health insurance coverage for residents of the Gaza Strip is 100 per cent. In the West Bank, 162,979 families have government insurance, including 12,515 families with free health insurance. Alongside government health insurance, there is also a private health insurance as well as NGO insurance and UNRWA insurance.

178. Primary health-care centres in Palestine – which numbered 767 in 2014 – are distributed throughout the country, particularly in rural communities and in "Area C". Of these, 61.5 per cent belong to the Ministry of Health while the others are run by UNRWA and NGOs. The Ministry of Health is the main provider of secondary health-care services (hospitals) in Palestine where it owns and operates 26 hospitals containing 3,259 beds in all governorates. In all, there are 80 working hospitals in the State of Palestine with a capacity of 5,939 beds. Of these, 50 are located in governorates of the West Bank with a capacity of 3,052 beds (59 per cent of the total) while the rest are in the Gaza Strip. The Ministry oversees the issuance of licences to hospitals and other health institutions belonging to the private sector and NGOs. It also has authority to monitor and inspect health-care institutions to ensure that they are adhering to the standards laid down in the Public Health Act and operating in accordance with the conditions set forth in their licence.

179. Civil society organizations run 34 hospitals with a capacity of 1,967 beds, while the private sector has 16 hospitals with a capacity of 512 beds. For its part, UNRWA has just 1 hospital in the governorate of Qalqilyah, with a capacity of 63 beds. The military provides medical services via 3 hospitals with a capacity of 138 beds. In addition to this, the Ministry is currently overseeing the construction of a private cancer and marrow transplant hospital and a private ophthalmology hospital.

Indicator	Indicator updated	Year	Value
Number of hospitals	Annually	2015	80
Number of doctors per 1,000 inhabitants	Annually	2016	1.7
Number of beds per 1,000 inhabitants	Annually	2015	1.3

180. Measures are taken to ensure that preventive, therapeutic and rehabilitative health facilities, as well as medical equipment and services, are available to everyone, including older persons. As concerns persons with motorial disabilities, certain obstacles remain regarding the adaptation of buildings (especially departments of health) where access is available only on the ground floor but not on upper floors. This is not a problem in primary health-care clinics which, since in general they are single-storey, are easily accessible to persons with disabilities. Nonetheless, such centres lack beds that are suitable for persons with motorial disabilities, unlike State-run hospitals, which are equipped to take in persons with such disabilities. No health centres, departments of health or State-run hospitals are equipped to deal with persons with visual and hearing disabilities.

181. The Ministry of Health does not offer habilitation services and there are no habilitation centres in the institutions it runs. However, it does purchase such services from the private sector and it ensures they are covered under the health insurance it provides. As part of its disability programme, the Ministry of Health has issued directives that aim to improve adaptation in departments of health and clinics in rural areas. Due to the shortage of financial resources, the Ministry cooperates with international organizations such as Handicap International and with Palestinian institutions such as the Young Men's Christian Association to refurbish certain clinics and health centres for persons with motorial disabilities. The Ministry has also adopted guidelines for the future to train medical personnel on optimal ways of dealing with persons with disabilities and to train health workers in sign language.

182. There are areas in which there are no hospitals run by the Ministry of Health. One of these is occupied Jerusalem and its suburbs and "Area C", where there are only primary health-care centres. Citizens in the Jerusalem suburbs who have health insurance can access treatment in the Makassed Charitable Society Hospital (which is run by a private association) via a direct referral from the department of health for the suburbs of Jerusalem, without need for a referral from the service procurement department.

183. Medicines are provided to sick persons who have medical insurance under a policy whereby the patient contributes 5 shekels per dose, with the dose varying according to the kind of medicine involved (be it pills, liquid or suppositories) and the nature of the illness (acute or chronic). In the case of acute illness, the patient contributes 5 shekels per 20 pills, 6 suppositories or single bottle of liquid medicine. Patients with chronic conditions pay 5 shekels per 30 pills. Some medications, due to their nature or effectiveness are excluded from this regime, such as certain antibiotics and injections.

184. The allocation for medicines amounts to 12 per cent of the budget of the Ministry of Health including salaries and for 21 per cent not including salaries. In 2015, it stood at US$ 205 million while in the same year the Ministry distributed medicines to hospitals and health departments to a value of 230 million shekels.

185. The national drug policy followed by the Ministry of Health aims to ensure the provision of first-rate medication, something it achieves by verifying the quality, safety and effectiveness of all medicines, medicinal herbs and dietary supplements. Thus, using different systems, the Ministry of health strives to provide secure, effective and high-quality drugs that conform to approved standards. To this end, the Ministry registers medications, certifies the factories where they are produced, inspects pharmaceutical corporations, monitors drugs in circulation and ensures that medicines are justly distributed and affordable.

186. Pharmaceutical corporations are inspected and monitored according to specific standards and rules. The drugs they produce are checked for quality then, once they are on the market, random tests are carried out in public health laboratories, which are responsible for monitoring medicines and medical devices. For its part, the general pharmaceutical department of the Ministry of Health runs an annual or biannual programme to monitor the manufacture and distribution of drugs. It also examines quality-related complaints, in which regard it takes all measures envisaged under laws, regulations and decrees, and it monitors counterfeit medications that circulate illegally.

187. As concerns appropriate training for health workers, including training in health and human rights, health teams receive constant training from the technical departments of the Ministry of Health to help them keep abreast of scientific and practical developments. In addition, specialized training is offered to new staff so as to prepare them to work in the Ministry of Health. At the same time, various forms of training (such as short and medium-length courses) are offered outside Palestine with support from international and foreign institutions such as the World Health Organization (WHO) and UNICEF. In cooperation with An-Najah National University, the Ministry of Health has provided scholarships to a number of doctors in areas such as psychology and family health. New nursing staff undergo a two-month training course in the operational mechanisms of the various sections (including health clinics) within departments of health. This training is dispensed by the heads of section.

188. Article 22 (3) of section IV of the Palestinian Children's Act No. 7 of 2004, as amended, states that the Ministry of Health is to provide free health-care services to children under the age of 6, in accordance with rules and standards defined in the Act and in a way that does not conflict with the Public Health Act, the Health Insurance Act or other relevant laws. Under article 4 of the Public Health Act No. 20 of 2004, the Ministry is to accord priority to health care for women and children, this being an integral part of development strategy. Article 5 of the Act stipulates that the Ministry is to provide preventive, diagnostic, therapeutic and rehabilitative services related to the health of women and children, including the following:

- Premarital medical examinations conducted in coordination with the Ministry of Islamic Endowments, which is the authority responsible for marriages between Muslims. In order to preserve the health of the spouses and of their eventual offspring, a marriage contract cannot be concluded until after the test has been carried out. The procedure consists in a blood sample taken at a department of health, which exist in all Palestinian governorates, which is then tested for thalassemia, hereditary haemophilia and AIDS;
- Care for women, particularly during pregnancy, childbirth and breastfeeding. Nurses at primary health-care clinics conduct awareness-raising activities aimed at encouraging mothers to breastfeed their offspring, while community activities are carried out by female health educators at the department for health education and promotion, which is part of the General Department for Public Health. The development of a pregnancy is monitored to ensure it is proceeding well and laboratory tests are conducted free of charge. Women are provided with dietary supplements, also free of charge and, in the last three months of pregnancy, inoculated against tetanus to protect their infant against that disease. Pregnant women facing complications are referred to a specialist government doctor for diagnosis, treatment and ultrasound examinations;
- Follow-up on the development and growth of the child. Nurses in "healthy child" clinics at the primary health-care centres run by departments of health monitor children's growth and development with measurements of height, weight, head and chest circumference and fontanels. In addition, departments for community health, which are part of the General Department for Public Health, monitor the motorial, psychological, mental and sensory development of infants up to the age of 3.

189. The Ministry of Health provides children with postnatal care in “healthy child” clinics and medical clinics. It monitors the children’s growth and development, promotes breastfeeding, works on the early detection of potential disabilities or diseases and administers vaccinations.

190. The department for school health monitors children in kindergartens where it conducts activities to raise health awareness among teachers and monitors the environmental health situation of kindergarten structures. The department has issued a guide for kindergarten teachers to enable them to deal with matters related to the children’s physical and psychological health and to provide first aid. The guide also identifies factors and issues that have a bearing on health, such as the kindergarten environment and the health education of the children there. In this regard, it should be noted that 54 per cent of children between the ages of 3 and 6 attend kindergartens in Palestine. The Ministry of Health is currently working in partnership with other ministries to develop a national strategy for early childhood that will cover all children from birth to age 6, including those who do not attend kindergarten.

191. Children receive various vaccinations, according to their age and the disease concerned, on the basis of vaccination protocols determined by the national immunization committee, and they undergo clinical examinations for the early detection of hip dysplasia and other physical deformities and disabilities. Preventive testing is also conducted to detect the presence of phenylketonuria. This consists in taking a blood droplet from the infant’s heel, which is then tested free of charge at the Central Public Health Laboratory. All children up to the age of 1 are given free supplements (vitamin A and D drops) as well as a dose of blood supplements between the ages of 6 months and 1 year. Treatment for sick children is provided free of charge in primary health-care clinics with parents contributing 2 shekels per dose of any medication the child requires, up to the age of 6.

192. The Ministry of Health provides sexual and reproductive health services to mothers using the methods of family planning available. It also conducts preventive health campaigns such as pap smears for the early detection of cervical cancers and free biennial breast-cancer screening for women over the age of 40. In addition to this, it provides health advice for mothers in all matters concerning the health of women and children, particularly with regard to pregnancy, childbirth, family planning, prevention of sexually transmitted diseases, cancer and the importance of early detection, breastfeeding and the importance of monitoring children’s growth and development.

193. Under the Public Health Act, the Ministry is to take preventive and therapeutic measures to limit the spread of communicable diseases. For this reason, Palestine implements a broad-ranging national immunization programme which, in line with the relevant WHO recommendations, employs vaccinations to control preventable communicable diseases. One of the most significant achievements of the Ministry of Health in this connection is the eradication of polio, no cases of which have been recorded for some 20 years. In addition to this, Palestine has been free from measles and neonatal tetanus since 1999.

194. Immunization takes place in primary health-care clinics and centres, while in the case of remote areas, small and marginalized rural communities, zones that fall within “Area C” and Bedouin areas, immunization services are provided by mobile clinics. The bulk of immunization services is provided by the Ministry of Health, followed by UNRWA, while the Union of Health Work Committees (an NGO) provides immunizations in East Jerusalem. As for mosquito-borne communicable diseases, the department for environmental health of the Ministry of Health conducts spraying operations and drains swamps and water collection sites using integrated vector management. This process takes place three times a year in areas particularly exposed to the spread of germ-carrying mosquitoes.

195. As of April 2016, there had been a total of 88 cases of HIV/AIDS. Of these, 69 were cases of persons who had tested positive for HIV and 19 were cases of persons who had developed AIDS. The Ministry seeks to prevent HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases through blood screening campaigns, which are conducted with full confidentiality by departments of health, and it runs educational and awareness-raising activities that are aimed in particular at adolescents, university students and persons who work in the occupying State. HIV tests are offered in departments of health and at two central clinics, one in the West Bank and the other in the Gaza Strip. Analyses are then conducted by the Central Public Health Laboratory. Persons who fall ill with the disease are also treated at the two aforementioned clinics. For patients with other sexually transmitted diseases, the Ministry of Health provides medicines free of charge and offers psychosocial support for patients and their families with a view to achieving acceptance and reducing the social stigma of the disease.

196. Article 6 of the Anti-Smoking Act No. 25 of 2005 prohibits the sale, distribution, display or advertising of tobacco for persons under the age of 18. Work is currently under way on drafting a law on dangerous drugs and psychotropic substances. For its part, the Ministry runs activities and campaigns at the national level to reduce smoking and curb the use of dangerous drugs. According to statistics of the Ministry of Health, there are between 80,000 and 85,000 drug users in the West Bank and East Jerusalem and 220,000 in the Gaza Strip, while drug addicts number around 22,000 or 23,000 in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and around 40,000 in Gaza. The Ministry of Health has established a centre that offers substitution treatment where addicts receive psychosocial support and help to throw off their addiction and integrate back into normal life. Around 140 heroin addicts have turned to the centre, of whom 6 per cent have been cured, reintegrated into the community and found decent work. Substitution treatment consists in giving addicts doses of heroin substitutes, under medical supervision. Patients must first undergo the necessary laboratory tests and they are provided with psychosocial support throughout the process. The Ministry of Health has plans to build two more substitution treatment centres in the northern and the southern regions of the West Bank as the current centre serves only the central region. The Ministry also plans to build a drug-addiction treatment centre in Bethlehem. The new centre will be able to offer accommodation for cases that need particular care and its services will cover the entire country.

197. As concerns mental health, article 2 (1) of Decree No. 113 of 2004 of the Council of Ministers concerning the government health insurance system stipulates that treatment for persons with chronic mental conditions is to be part of the services provided free of charge by the Ministry of Health. Thus, patients with psychological and mental conditions are treated in facilities run by the Ministry where they are provided with medication free of charge and their condition is constantly monitored by doctors, psychologists and social workers. There are 13 community psychological health centres in the West Bank as well as a specialized children's centre in the Hebron department of health, while in Gaza there are 6 community psychological health centres. In addition to this, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip each have a psychiatric hospital.

198. The strategic psychological health plan 2015–2019 highlighted the importance of continuing to develop community psychological health services and of integrating them into primary care, with a particular emphasis on interventions in times of crisis. Community psychological health services have been developed over recent years and professional staff have been trained to provide optimal services. A rehabilitation programme has been developed for patients at the psychiatric hospital, and a day centre has been established in the Gaza Strip. In 2014, a total of 2,257 new psychological cases were recorded in the West Bank (which amounts to 89 per 100,000).

199. The department for school health in the Ministry of Health is working to implement a psychological health programme in schools. This preventive programme – which is based on the principle of early detection of behavioural, psychological and neurological disorders – is being run in partnership with the educational guidance department, which is part of the department of education. Once a case has been detected, psychologists refer it for follow-up to the psychological health clinics run by the department of health. The same psychologists also organize awareness-raising activities on psychological, mental and behavioural health topics for school students.

200. The Ministry of Health is developing programmes to make psychological health services part of the public health services delivered through primary health-care clinics, and it will continue to provide training to doctors and medical staff to facilitate that end. With the signing of the Juveniles Act on the part of the President of the State of Palestine, the Ministry is also drawing up policies and programmes regarding health and juvenile justice.

Challenges and constraints

201. The Ministry of Health faces numerous challenges and constraints that significantly affect the implementation of many of its programmes and strategies. These include the following:

- The Israeli occupation, the political situation under that occupation and the complete blockade of the Gaza Strip are all factors that hinder access to health services, especially in “Area C”. Moreover, Israeli control over crossing points hinders or delays the entry of the medical equipment necessary for the work of the Ministry of Health and its institutions. In addition, the proliferation of illegal colonies increases the inflow of wastewater into Palestinian territory and makes it more difficult to travel between cities, villages and the countryside. The arbitrary policies pursued by the Israeli occupiers have also contributed to rises in indicators of disability, poverty, unemployment, psychological disorders and violence.
- The shortage of qualified personnel, particularly specialized doctors and nurses, has been provoked by a number of causes. These include the brain drain, low wages, a poor system of incentives in the public sector and inadequate human-resources planning at the national level.

Articles 13 and 14

202. Article 24 of the Palestinian Basic Law, as amended, states: “Education, which is the right of all citizens, is compulsory up to the end of the basic level at least and is free of charge in public schools, academies and institutions.” Under article 37 of Palestinian Children’s Act No. 7 of 2004, all children have the right to free education in State-run schools until completion of the secondary level; moreover, education is compulsory up to the end of the higher basic level at least, and the State take all measures necessary to prevent children dropping out of school early. Article 38 of the Children’s Act states that all children are to be able to enjoy their right to education on an equal footing.

203. The Ministry of Education and Higher Education has accorded particular attention to the roll-out of plans and programmes aimed at improving the school environment, enhancing teaching methods, enriching the curriculum, imparting life skills, developing relationships with the local community and promoting other mechanisms intended to make schools child friendly in all aspects of the educational process. In addition to this, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education has been working to develop a policy to curb violence in schools, in which regard it has issued a number of regulations and instructions prohibiting the use of any form of violence within schools.

204. The educational process in the State of Palestine includes the following stages:

- Stage 1: Pre-school education (kindergarten), which covers children between the ages of 4 and 5 years and 5 months;
- Stage 2: General education, which includes the following:
 - (a) Basic (compulsory) education: This begins when students enter first grade at the age of 5 years and 6 months, and it continues for 10 years until the end of tenth grade. These stages are compulsory;
 - (b) Secondary education:
 - Academic secondary education: This lasts two years and includes science, humanities, legal and commercial subjects. The students prepare to take the general secondary (orientation) examination and those who succeed can be admitted to university;
 - Vocational secondary education: This too lasts two years and covers five subjects: industry, commerce, agriculture, nursing and hoteliery and home economics. The students prepare to take the general vocational secondary examination, which enables them to enrol in community colleges and in some university faculties.

205. The duration of the academic year is as follows: It begins on 1 September of one solar year and ends on 30 June of the following solar year; in other words, it lasts nine months and contains an estimated 180 or 190 school days. The school week lasts five days. There are two stages of study:

- Basic education, which is subdivided into the lower basic level (first to fourth grade) and the higher basic level (fifth to tenth grade);
- Secondary education, which is subdivided into academic secondary education, which covers literature, science, commerce and law (first and second secondary grades), and vocational secondary education, which is further subdivided into home economics and hoteliery.

206. With a view to ensuring that education is consistent with the needs of life and work, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education has rolled out its third strategic plan which has a number of goals. These include promoting national identity and citizenship; focusing on strengthening the values system and the rule of law; expanding the vision of education with a view to getting beyond the mere acquisition of local or international diplomas and underlining the importance of citizenship and twenty-first century skills; student-focused learning; and promoting opportunities for creativity, enterprise and balanced development. Emphasis is also given to striking a balance between Palestinian education and the labour market. This requires an effort on the part of State institutions, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education and local and international partners to integrate vocational and technical subjects into general education through the official curriculum as well as through curricular and extracurricular activities up to the end of the basic level (tenth grade). It also requires that a greater proportion of students be enrolled in vocational courses at the secondary level. To this end, it is important to intensify awareness-raising and vocational counselling to direct parents and students towards vocational education and training; to draw attention to factors that lead to success in employment and self-employment; to adapt vocational education curricula to the needs of community life; to ensure that the skills required by the labour market are taught in existing training units; and to establish new training units that focus on life skills and business enterprise. A plan was rolled out in the academic year 2017/18 to expose students in the seventh to ninth grades to three areas of vocational training (painting and woodwork, interior décor and tailoring). In that same academic year, around 2.3 per cent of students were enrolled in vocational education (3.6 per cent in the West Bank and 0.6 per cent in the Gaza Strip).

207. Efforts have also been made to promote enterprise, creativity and the use of technology in education. In fact, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education dedicates particular care to enterprise and creativity, which it considers to be vital for leveraging the Palestinian economy, encouraging critical thinking in students, fostering a competitive and productive spirit and exploiting modern technology to bridge gaps and reconcile differences between educational areas in Palestine. Thus, in order to promote enterprise and creativity in the educational system, strategic partnerships have been forged with Palestinian, regional and international institutions. In addition, support initiatives have been launched and the technological infrastructure of schools has been brought into line with unified standards established by the Ministry of Education and Higher Education in cooperation with its strategic partners. This has opened horizons for Palestinian students with creative ideas in science or literature or who have entrepreneurial projects, to communicate with their peers in the wider world and represent the State of Palestine on the international stage. The Ministry is also pursuing digitalization as one of the most important aspects of educational development with a view to improving the quality of education in Palestinian schools through the use of information technology.

208. The smart learning programme concerns schools that focus on educating their students in the competencies and outcomes of the main curricula. Under an annual plan for 2019, the Ministry will continue to extend the smart learning programme, with two main objectives: firstly, a horizontal expansion of the schools that currently implement the programme and, secondly, the integration of an estimated 50 new schools into the programme.

209. Curricula are based on national, intellectual, social and cognitive foundations and have the goal of promoting culture and respect for others. Palestine is a peace-loving nation that pursues international understanding and cooperation on the basis of justice, equality, freedom, dignity and human rights. It adheres to values and principles that promote human beings and enhance their intellectual qualities, focusing particularly on science, work, ethics and ideals, the role of education in economic and social development and active participation in the construction of a humane society. The State works to consolidate democracy and the rule of law and to provide equal educational opportunities for all Palestinians without discrimination. To this end it ties education to development and seeks to consolidate its link to vocational and technical training, thereby responding to the economic needs of society by creating a well-trained work force and seeking to ensure that each individual can contribute to the advancement of the community.

210. The Palestinian curriculum was compiled and standardized across the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in 2000, a process that was completed in 2006. Before that date, the Jordanian curriculum had been followed in the West Bank and the Egyptian curriculum in the Gaza Strip. The new curriculum includes the following features:

- A change in the stereotypical view of women and an emphasis on their participation alongside men in social, cultural and political roles;
- The integration of certain features of international humanitarian law, children's rights and human rights.

211. Efforts are currently being made to develop a comprehensive, integrated and unified plan wherewith to evaluate and reform school curricula. The plan embraces a number of components such as a teacher training strategy, an e-learning initiative, the digitalization of the curriculum, kindergarten curricula and curricula for informal education (literacy and adult education).

212. Palestinian school curricula cover economic, social and cultural rights in the world and in Palestinian society. They also embrace issues such as gender and there are special curricula for Christian and Islamic education from first grade up to secondary (orientation) level. Students are provided with a stimulating environment thanks to guidance for teachers in the use of technical educational equipment. Moreover, students are encouraged to learn by following textbook-linked activities and to discover the environment through various educational, cultural and social activities. Curricula also focus on communication with parents and take account of the psychological needs of students thanks to the presence of educational counsellors in schools.

School enrolment fees

213. Article 24 (1) of the Palestinian Basic Law, as amended, stipulates that education is the right of all citizens, is compulsory up to the end of the basic level at least and is free of charge in public schools, academies and institutions. This is reaffirmed in the Decree-Law on Public Education which, consistent with the international obligations of the State of Palestine, promotes the right to education as enshrined in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. As concerns higher education, article 2 of the Higher Education Act No. 11 of 1998 states: "Higher education is the right of all citizens who meet the academic and substantive requirements prescribed in the present Act and in regulations issued pursuant thereto."

214. As concerns school fees and the measures taken to rescind them, contributions for schooling are collected from students on the basis of criteria established at the beginning of the academic year. According to those criteria, symbolic fees are paid by students who are able to do so, while students in difficult circumstances, families of martyrs, the injured, detainees, persons with disabilities and persons suffering from thalassaemia or haemophilia are exempted from the fees, wholly or in part. Students whose families receive cash assistance from the Ministry of Social Development are wholly exempted from payment of contributions, with the Ministry paying 50 per cent of the contributions due from each student under lists submitted by the regions to the department for social development.

215. The sharia courts also play an important role in ensuring that children of both sexes are able to exercise their right to education up to university level, at the expense of their father or, if the father is absent, of the person responsible. This is conditional upon the student being successful in his or her studies, upon not working and earning a living and, in the case of females, upon being unmarried.

216. The contributions collected at the beginning of the academic year are as follows:

- (a) Fifty shekels (US$ 15) for the basic level from first grade to tenth grade;
- (b) Seventy shekels (US$ 20) for the secondary level from eleventh grade to twelfth grade;
- (c) Seventy shekels (US$ 20) for the vocational secondary level, in addition to which vocational students of industry or agriculture are required to pay a further 60 shekels (US$ 18) in insurance, which is returned to the student wholly or in part upon graduation;
- (d) Four hundred shekels (US$ 115) if a student has to repeat the second secondary level (twelfth grade) in a State-run school and has made no other contributions.

Partial exemption from school fees

217. Partial exemption from contributions for schooling is accorded as follows:

- (a) Children of persons who – whether in service, retired or deceased – work or worked in education and higher education, in State-run universities and faculties receive a 50 per cent reduction in school fees;
- (b) A reduction of 10 shekels (US$ 2.5) is made from the fees of each student who has one or more siblings enrolled in the two levels; only the higher rate of deduction is admitted and the two exemptions may not be accumulated;
- (c) School finance and social committees are granted the power to exempt students with special needs – such as the children of the poor or of the unemployed – from between zero and 100 per cent of the fees. Any exemptions must not exceed 10 per cent of the overall school fees due to the establishment in question and the department of education is to be provided with a detailed list of the names of the students who require such exemptions.

218. Textbooks for the basic level of education are distributed free of charge to all students, with the exemption of English textbooks for which students are required to pay. This latter provision does not apply to students who are registered as special cases with the Ministry of Social Development or to the children of martyrs. Students are required to provide a uniform at their own expense, depending upon their age category.

School enrolment rates

219. There is a 55.1 per cent rate of enrolment in kindergartens most of which belong to the private sector and are not free of charge. Efforts are being made to add propaedeutic classes in State-run schools for girls, and 63 such classes were established by the 2014/15 school year.

220. Although education at the basic level is mandatory and practically free of charge in State-run and UNRWA-run schools, the overall enrolment rate in basic level education in the academic year 2013/14 stood at just 95.3 per cent. This means that 4.7 per cent of students were not enrolled in school.

221. The net enrolment rate in secondary education (eleventh and twelfth grades) stood at 68.2 per cent in the academic year 2013/14. This means that 37.8 per cent of young people of an age to pursue secondary education were not, in fact, attending school, although this proportion is dropping year on year. The net enrolment rate in basic level education for 2016/17 was 97 per cent, meaning that just 3 per cent of students were not enrolled in the system. In 2017/18, the net enrolment rate in higher education was 45 per cent (35 per cent among males and 56 per cent among females).

222. Vocational education remains weak, attracting just 1.92 per cent of students most of whom are male because, given the current social climate in Palestine, it is difficult for females to attend vocational education.

Right to education for persons with disabilities

223. The adoption on the part of the Ministry of Education and Higher Education of a policy of integrating students with disabilities into State-run schools through its inclusive education programme was followed by the enactment of the Disability Rights Act No. 4 of 1999. The Act regulates all the rights of persons with disabilities, including their right to education; however, it lacks accountability mechanisms and monitoring systems to ensure it is fully enforced. In addition to this, it conflicts with other legislation regulating disability rights, such as the Labour Code which requires employers to reserve at least 5 per cent of available posts for persons with disabilities.

224. Data compiled by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics in 2011 indicates that illiteracy rates among persons with disabilities are high (50 per cent), being greater in the Gaza Strip than in the West Bank. The statistics also show that – despite the fact that 16 years have passed since the roll-out of the inclusive education programme in State-run institutions – 37.6 per cent of persons with disabilities have never been enrolled in school at all, 33.8 per cent enrolled then dropped out without completing the secondary level and 87.3 per cent are unemployed.

225. As of the year 2012/13, 5,152 students with special needs were integrated into State-run schools in the West Bank, where they account for 0.96 per cent of the entire student body. It should be noted that the statistics do not reflect the true situation for students with disabilities because they focus solely on visible disabilities and not on other conditions, such as learning difficulties, intellectual disabilities and autism. This is due to a lack of appropriate assessment and diagnosis tools to determine the real number of students with disabilities who have been integrated into school.

226. The Ministry appointed inclusive education counsellors to monitor the students and facilitate their integration into schools; however, by the end of the academic year 2012/13, the number of such counsellors had fallen from 36 in 16 departments (an average of 2 or 3 counsellors per department in West Bank schools) to 27 (an average of one per department). The counsellors were able to attend various training courses on disability; however, they did not undergo systematic development in disability studies or follow specializations in a particular form of disability, and most of them do not have an academic background in disability.

227. Although the Ministry of Education and Higher Education has provided educational aids and assistive devices to persons with manifest disabilities (hearing aids, Perkins Braille, wheelchairs, spectacles, etc.), evidence points to a lack of equipment and facilities in many schools, particularly institutions where students with non-manifest disabilities have been integrated. It is, in fact, difficult to identify such students and precisely understand their needs in the Palestinian context due to a lack of diagnostic equipment suitable for identifying such non-manifest conditions (intellectual disabilities, autism, learning difficulties).

228. The evaluation mechanisms used lack credibility because they are unable to take account of the individual capacities of the integrated students.

229. The Ministry has produced a Braille curriculum in a number of subjects for students who are blind, although it is still in need of some readjustment in order to be suitable for all students. The physical environment has still not been adapted for all categories of disability because efforts have thus far focused only on motorial disabilities while overlooking other kinds of disability. By the academic year 2012/13, 1,013 State-run schools in the West Bank had been physically adapted with special staircases and ramps for students. A further 492 schools had not been adapted while a further 62 establishments could not be adapted.

230. A secondary level examination for students with disabilities has been developed which, at the current stage, is limited to manifest conditions (visual, hearing and motorial disabilities). This process has encountered a number of challenges, the most important of which are:

(a) The examination is presented to students with disabilities in the same way as that in which it is presented to students without disabilities. In fact, no allowance can be made for certain students with disabilities, such as by presenting the exam in Braille or printed using a special machine for students who are blind, as that would reduce the number of observers and books for other students;

(b) The examination is presented to all students without exception, without specific evaluation criteria for certain categories, some of whom have a great deal of difficulty in writing;

(c) Persons with certain categories of disability face considerable difficulties in following the established curriculum.

231. The Ministry has allocated resource rooms in the form of classrooms annexed to regular schools. The resource rooms, which contain equipment, educational games and special furniture, are staffed by special education teachers. Students spend part of their day there to study Arabic and mathematics while they study other subjects in the regular classroom. As of 2013, there were 82 resource rooms distributed across the various departments of education; however, they have still not been incorporated into the school system as a whole as an integral part of the education of students with disabilities, because there is no clear policy on how they should operate.

232. A project for resource centres was rolled out in 2005 and centres have been opened in Ramallah, in Gaza and in the department of education of South Hebron. The concept behind the resource centres, each of which has five specialists, is that they should provide support services and other facilities for speech therapy, occupational therapy, counselling and special education. The services are provided by a specialized mobile team, which makes field visits, provides evaluations and individualized plans and trains teachers and families with a view to the optimal integration of students with disabilities.

Vocational and technical education

233. Vocational schools provide students with the knowledge and skills they need to join the labour market or to enrol in institutions of higher education. Students – who are trained to master all skills related to a profession – spend half of their time studying academic subjects, in accordance with their study plan, and the other half on specialized subjects and practical training. Vocational education has various branches: industry, agriculture, home economics and hotelery. The Ministry of Education and Higher Education has developed a national strategy for vocational and technical education and training that is in line with global trends. The strategy has been reviewed by specialized teams composed of a wide range of public- and private-sector stakeholders.

Educational syllabus in vocational schools

234. Vocational syllabus: This is available to students who have successfully completed the eleventh grade of vocational education in specialized and general subjects. At the end of the secondary level, the students sit the examination for the secondary level general certificate, which qualifies them to enrol in institutions of higher education (universities and technical colleges) or in colleges that specialize in their particular area.

235. Applied syllabus: This is available to students who have successfully completed only the specialized subjects. At the end of the secondary level, they sit the vocational schools' comprehensive practical examination, which qualifies them to enter the labour market or to enrol in a number of specialized vocational diploma programmes. Once a year has passed, they can sit the examination for the secondary level general certificate in the general subjects that are still outstanding then complete their education in institutions of higher education (universities and technical colleges) or in colleges that specialize in their particular area.

236. There are 18 vocational schools in Palestine, including 13 State-run schools, which offer specializations in industry and agriculture. Vocational schools exist in all educational departments in the West Bank, except Jericho and Tubas. There are no State-run vocational schools in the educational departments of Jerusalem and its environs, or in Bethlehem. In addition, there are vocational schools, also offering specializations in industry and agriculture, in the educational departments of northern, eastern and central Gaza.

The table below shows the number of students enrolled in vocational and industrial education across all schools and centres

Year	First year of secondary education	Second year of secondary education	Total
2010/11	5 167	4 453	9 620
2011/12	5 171	4 575	9 746
2012/13	4 907	1 571	6 478

237. Overall enrolment rates for secondary education in the academic year 2012/13 were 73.5 per cent, of which 72.2 per cent in general secondary education and 1.3 per cent in vocational education.

238. The problems that hinder women from taking up vocational and technical education have been highlighted in a number of studies. They are:

- The small number of institutions offering programmes suitable for women, which limits their options regarding this form of education;
- The cultural and social heritage that underpins the general attitude of society towards vocational and technical education as being inferior;
- The limited awareness among female principals, teachers and students at the secondary level about the importance of vocational and technical education;
- The fact that a large number of girls tend towards open education, which reinforces their reluctance to enrol in institutions of vocational and technical education;
- The low rate of participation of women in the labour market (15 per cent, compared to 67 per cent among men); the reason for this is that 65 per cent of women are involved in housework and 27 per cent are studying;
- The high rate of female unemployment (22 per cent), a rate which increases with increasing level of education and reduces with increasing age.

Higher education

239. There are 52 accredited and licensed institutions of higher education in Palestine. Of these, 14 are universities in the traditional sense, 1 is an open university, 19 are university faculties and 18 are colleges. A total of 221,395 students were enrolled in the academic year 2014/15, 133,363 males and 88,033 females, while the teaching staff numbered 7,130.

240. In the academic year 2014/15, the overall enrolment rate for higher education among the population aged between 18 and 22 was 44 per cent, 34.6 per cent among males and 53.8 per cent among females.

241. The proportion of persons aged 15 and over who have completed at least degree-level university education is 12.1 per cent, while 9.4 per cent of persons have not completed any level of education whatsoever. The figures show that there is a bias in academic attainment in favour of men rather than women as the proportion of males who have completed at least degree-level university education is 12.4 per cent while the proportion of females is 11.7 per cent.

242. Students who have completed the twelfth grade in all subjects proceed to the general secondary (orientation) examination which, if they pass successfully, gives them entrance to State-run and private universities and institutes, depending upon their grades. They are accepted on the basis of standards that each educational institution sets for itself, in line with its own vision and philosophy of student admittance and university education.

243. A decree-law was enacted in March 2018 to regulate higher education in the State of Palestine. It guarantees the right to higher education under specific conditions and grants academic freedom and freedom to conduct research. The decree-law envisages the formation of the Higher Education Council and includes provision to update regulations and directives enshrined in existing laws. It also envisages the formation of the Advisory Council of the Scientific Research Support Programme (Horizon 2020) and the restructuring of the Scientific Research Council.

Literacy and adult education

244. A number of institutions are involved in activities related to adult education and literacy: the Ministry of Education and Higher Education, the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Social Development, civil society organizations, cultural centres and the private sector.

245. The most significant programmes in this regard are:

(a) Illiteracy eradication programme: This programme is offered to all persons aged between 14 and 64 who have not mastered reading, writing or numeracy and who have no formal education or who completed one or two years of basic education before circumstances forced them to leave school. Illiteracy is not a major phenomenon or intractable problem in the State of Palestine. In 2013, in fact, 96.3 per cent of the above-mentioned age group could read and illiteracy rates stood at 2.9 per cent among males and 9.1 per cent among females. Students in this field enrol for a period of two academic years at the end of which they sit an examination and, if successful, receive a certificate that is equivalent to the basic sixth grade certificate. The following figures give some indication of the efforts made by the Ministry of Education to combat illiteracy. There has been a rise in the number of literacy and adult education centres, with 90 centres in the year 2013/14 as compared to 79 in the year 2011/12. In all, 1,533 students frequented literacy centres in 2013/14, of whom 51.34 per cent (787) were males and 48.66 per cent (746) were females.

(b) Parallel education programme: This programme is offered to persons who, having completed five or six years of basic education, have dropped out of school and engaged in working life. Students in this field enrol for a period of two academic years at the end of which they sit the prescribed examination and, if successful, receive a certificate that is equivalent to the basic ninth grade certificate. There has been a rise in the number of parallel education centres, with 23 centres in the year 2013/14 as compared to 11 in the year 2011/12. In all, 277 students frequented parallel education centres in 2013/14, of whom 51.99 per cent (144) were males and 48.01 per cent (133) were females. The concept of literacy has evolved into adult education and continuing education, and a strategy for adult education was launched in 2016. The Ministry of Education and Higher Education grants permits to cultural and educational centres in the private sector that teach vocational and semi-vocational skills to the public at large, in order to serve the Palestinian labour market. In addition to this, there are continuing education centres in Palestinian universities.

(c) Evening classes programme: This is intended for secondary school students with low levels of attainment.

(d) Semi-formal and continuing education: Semi-formal education is usually provided by ministries other than the Ministry of Education and Higher Education (the Ministry of Labour and the Ministry of Social Development among others), as well as by local and international charitable organizations, employers' organizations, workers' federations, religious bodies and private institutions. Continuing education, for its part, is a key element of engagement with processes of economic and social change. Part of continuing education is vocational training, which is provided by two types of institutions: (1) Those offering formal training programmes; i.e., community colleges, Palestinian technical colleges and vocational secondary schools; (2) Those offering semi-formal training programmes; i.e., vocational training centres run by the Ministry of Labour.

Indicator	Indicator updated	Year	Value
Illiteracy rate in persons aged 15 and over	Annually	2016	3.1 %

Vocational training programmes

246. Vocational training programmes can best be summarized according to the entity responsible for delivering them, as follows:

- Vocational training programmes of the Ministry of Labour: These are basic training programmes for young persons and retraining programmes to improve the skills of adults. More than 37 training programmes are offered in centres run by the Ministry of Labour (9 centres in the West Bank and 4 in the Gaza Strip). The programmes can be divided into two groups: vocational training programmes for the industrial sector and vocational training programmes for the commerce and service sectors. In order to be admitted to the centres, applicants must be more than 16 years old and meet the academic requirements for the course they wish to follow.
- Vocational training programmes of the Ministry of Social Development: These programmes are aimed at the reintegration of young persons who have dropped out of school, persons with social issues, persons with disabilities and marginalized groups. The 26 different programmes are offered by 7 centres in the West Bank and 12 in the Gaza Strip. In order to be admitted to these youth habilitation centres, applicants must be under 19, they must have been referred by a probation officer of the Ministry of Social Development and they must be in a fit state of health. Only applicants with limited income can be admitted to centres for persons with disabilities while admittance to the other centres is conditional upon applicants being from families that already benefit from services provided by the Ministry of Social Development or being former detainees.
- Vocational training programmes of UNRWA associations specializing in long-term training: The purpose of these programmes, which are aimed exclusively at refugee children, is to turn out a trained workforce capable of performing skilled labour in the industrial and service sectors, in order to meet the needs of a developing society. There are 22 such programmes in the West Bank while 36 programmes are delivered through 7 centres run by UNRWA in the Gaza Strip. In order to be admitted to the centres to pursue specializations that result in diplomas equivalent to those issued by vocational training centres, applicants must have successfully completed the ninth or tenth grade; whereas, in order to be admitted to pursue specializations that result in diplomas equivalent to those issued by community colleges, applicants must have obtained the general secondary education certificate.
- Vocational training programmes of development institutions and NGOs: The programmes offered by these entities include basic training programmes, capacity-building programmes and special programmes for marginalized social groups. The entities involved have linked the concepts of training and development in industry, services, agriculture and management, particularly regarding the creation and running of small-scale enterprises, which are sometimes also linked to loan programmes.
- Training programmes provided by charitable organizations: These programmes mainly target marginalized social groups, particularly women, the poor and others, and their purpose is to help members of those groups access job opportunities.
- Training programmes provided by private training centres: These are provided by for-profit organizations that operate – mostly as cultural centres licensed by the Ministry of Education and Higher Education – in the field of vocational education and training with a view to building capacity in line with the needs of the local market. The courses mostly focus on management, computing, languages and other areas that do not require large financial investments. There are 91 licensed cultural centres in the West Bank and about 80 private centres in the Gaza Strip.
- Training programmes provided by government institutions: The activity of the Government has been accompanied by an expansion in the number of institutions that provide training with the specific aim of turning out qualified personnel to work in certain public-sector posts that are vital in order to construct and protect the nation. These include training, inter alia, in policework and criminology. Six government institutions in the Gaza Strip offer 22 programmes to all social groups, with the exception of the Public Security Forces and Police College, whose programmes are available only to the military and persons who work in government institutions.

- Training via literacy and adult education programmes: Adult education and training programmes are provided mainly through cultural centres, where courses focus on computing, commerce, health care, engineering, agriculture, journalism, electronics, mechanics, etc.
- Cultural centres: These centres are located throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Some are licensed by the Ministry of Education and Higher Education while others are unlicensed. The importance of cultural centres lies in the fact that they provide education and training to all sectors of society of all age groups and educational levels, enabling the targeted groups to gain all the skills and competencies they need.
- Continuing education departments in Palestinian universities: These departments provide high-quality and up-to-date training to develop and build the capacity of certain target groups, based on the needs of Palestinian society. They also contribute to identifying and defining local needs using scientific methods, promoting networking and cooperation across various sectors of society, forging regional and international relations to locate sources of material and moral support, strengthening coordination and communication, providing a resource centre for academic research and conducting polls and surveys on important issues affecting Palestinian society.
- Training and habilitation programmes for teachers and officials of the Ministry of Education and Higher Education and departments of education, as well as courses for new teachers and administrators.

Gender equality in the right to education

247. There is nothing to prevent either males or females from enrolling in education at any level. This applies particularly to kindergarten and to the basic level of education; however, there are some cultural barriers that prevent a small proportion of the population from enrolling their daughters at the secondary and/or university levels. Reasons for this include early marriage or the distance between the school or university from the female student's place of residence, particularly in "Area C" where access to schools can require students to pass close to Israeli colonies. Nonetheless, it is decreasing dramatically as a cultural phenomenon as the education of girls has become part of the culture of Palestinian society, also because of the important contribution they make to family income.

Relevant indicators

- Using the criterion of a ratio between 0.95 and 1.05 as parity or quasi-parity, most quantitative indicators show that gender parity has been achieved. The most significant of these are enrolment in kindergarten, enrolment in basic education and the rate of school retention up to fifth grade;
- Some elements of disparity have emerged in indicators regarding secondary education, the rate of school retention up to tenth grade, the completion of basic education, the rate of transition from basic to secondary education and the percentage of qualified teachers;
- Qualitative indicators regarding attainment in standardized national and international exams (Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study (TIMSS)) show that females exceed males. The same applies to the life skills indicator where females excel against males in all grades, while the school life expectancy indicator also shows a difference in favour of females;
- There are numerous studies to indicate that levels of violence, of whatever form or type, are more prevalent in male schools than female schools;
- The gap in reading ability between females and males (adults and young persons aged 15 and over) narrowed in the period 2004–2013, although reading abilities among males remain higher than among females;

- The gap in reading ability between females and males (adults and young persons aged between 15 and 24) narrowed in the period 2004–2013; reading abilities were higher among males than among females in 2004 but parity has been achieved since 2009;
- The gap in overall kindergarten enrolment rates between females and males narrowed in the period 2004–2013; overall enrolment rates were higher among males than among females in 2004 but parity has been achieved since 2013;
- In the period 2004–2013, overall enrolment rates in first grade fluctuated somewhat, sometimes in favour of males, sometimes equal and sometimes in favour of females, without following any consistent pattern;
- Over the years, the parity indicator in overall enrolment rates in basic level education has tended to move in favour of females although with some fluctuation up and down;
- The parity indicator in net enrolment rates in basic level education was even in 2004 but began to tilt in favour of females from 2009–2013 with some fluctuation in the rate of increase;
- The parity indicator regarding rate of school retention up to fifth grade (basic education) tended in favour of females in 2004; by 2009 it had evened out and, as of the current year, it remains even;
- Over the years, the parity indicator regarding rate of school retention up to tenth grade has tended to increase steadily in favour of females.

248. The Ministry has taken a number of steps to make all forms of secondary education accessible to everyone:

- It has expanded vocational and technical education, especially for females after tenth grade, whom it has encouraged to enrol in this kind of education;
- It has opened new schools and courses of study in remote areas, particularly for female students;
- It has introduced vocational guidance into schools;
- It has introduced science classes into rural schools to serve close-knit communities;
- It has separated certain mixed classes in community environments where mixing is considered unacceptable.

School dropout

249. The dropout rate for the academic 2016/17 was 0.92 percent: 1.6 per cent for males and 0.78 per cent for females. These figures are not considered to be high.

250. Nonetheless, the Ministry makes significant efforts to reduce school dropout rates to the extent possible and to address the impact of the phenomenon through outreach programmes and follow-up with individuals who have dropped out of school. It has also introduced parallel education and literacy programmes as well as other initiatives listed below:

- (a) It has opened new schools and courses of study in remote areas, particularly for female students;
- (b) It has opened new “caravan” schools for Bedouin communities;
- (c) It refers students who have left school in order to work to the child protection network, in partnership with the Ministry of Social Development, with a view to protecting them against child labour and making them aware of their right to education;
- (d) It runs programmes to integrate children with disabilities into schools.

251. The Ministry of Culture is the official body overseeing cultural life and cultural rights. It holds that authority within the institutional structure of the State of Palestine wherewith it guarantees the cultural rights of the Palestinian people within the territory of the State of Palestine. The right to participate in cultural life is enshrined in article 24 (3) of the Palestinian Basic Law, which guarantees the independence of universities, institutes of higher education and centres of scientific research and states that the law is to guarantee the freedom of academic research as well as of literary, cultural and artistic creativity. Cultural rights are an integral part of the exercise of the right to self-determination on the part of the Palestinian people, as well as being an instrument with which to resist the occupation and a means to empower individuals to achieve economic and social development.

252. The issue of cultural rights is addressed in a number of Palestinian domestic laws:

- Press and Publication Act No. 9 of 1995;
- Decree-Law No. 16 of 2015 regarding the State of Palestine Awards in literature, arts and humanities;
- Cable and Wireless Communications Act No. 3 of 1996;
- Act No. 1 of 2000 regarding charitable and civil society associations and the registration of cultural centres;
- Decree No. 367 of 2005 of the Council of Ministers regarding the establishment of a cultural development fund to support creativity and excellence.

253. A number of bills with a bearing on cultural life have been proposed and are awaiting enactment at the appropriate time. They include:

- A bill regarding freedom of access to information and confidentiality of information;
- A bill regarding copyright and related rights;
- A bill regarding the deposit of works;
- A bill regarding the Palestinian National Library;
- A bill regarding the Palestinian National Archives;
- A bill regarding the protection of intangible cultural heritage;
- A bill regarding industrial property (patents, trademarks, etc.).

254. At the institutional level, cultural rights cut across the jurisdictions of a number of official bodies in the State of Palestine, all of which are active in the cultural sphere. Thus, apart from the Ministry of Culture itself, the Ministry of Tourism and Antiquities, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education, the Ministry of Information, the Ministry of Islamic Endowments and Religious Affairs and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs all play a cultural role, in one way or another, in that their activities have a bearing on the administration of cultural property and cultural resources and they are responsible for policies that have some impact on the cultural sector. In addition to this, a number of quasi-governmental institutions also play a role. These include the Higher Council for Youth and Sports, and the Supreme National Committee for Education, Culture and Science, which is responsible for coordinating between Arab, regional and international institutions and the Government of the State of Palestine. Another body is the Supreme Council for Education, Culture and Science, which is part of the Palestine Liberation Organization; it develops public policies and strategies, publishes works by Palestinian writers and organizes initiatives such as an education project in Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon, in cooperation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

255. Under a 2009 decree of the Council of Ministers, the Ministry of Culture has established cultural advisory councils in each governorate. The councils act as an institutional infrastructure that regulates cultural interaction within the governorate, brings official and civil society institutions operating in the cultural sphere into contact with cultural personalities and figures, helps to form a pluralistic national cultural landscape and creates an environment conducive to the future development of the culture of the Palestinian people, within the framework of a humanitarian culture based on respect for others.

256. Official institutions of the State of Palestine that operate in the realm of cultural rights undertake the following activities:

- Enhancing and promoting pluralistic and egalitarian cultural awareness, and broadening the scope of cultural and artistic activities;
- Supporting the cultural status of East Jerusalem in order to preserve its special position in the formation of the Palestinian-Arab cultural identity;
- Improving the level and quality of cultural productions, supporting and nurturing creative and gifted persons, and establishing an annual tradition of motivational prizes;
- Investing in curricular and extracurricular activities aimed at establishing the values of pluralism, democracy, participation, citizenship and equality of the sexes;
- Reactivating, encouraging and developing communication between Palestinians at home and abroad;
- Strengthening and expanding the range of cultural communication and exchange with Arab and non-Arab peoples;
- Investing in the material and intangible infrastructure of cultural life;
- Investing in the protection and preservation of Palestinian heritage and cultural identity;
- Encouraging traditional and craft industries and protecting their production facilities.

257. Government institutions active in the cultural sector operate through programmes, including the following:

- The Culture for All programme, the intention of which is to foster a more enabling environment for the dissemination of a democratic and humane Arab national culture; the development of citizenship based on pluralism and respect for the values of equality, social justice and human dignity; the establishment of a stimulating environment for cultural innovation; attention to Jerusalem, marginalized areas and areas vulnerable to attacks by the occupation and settlers; and the official promotion of cultural communication between Palestinians, wherever they may be, Arab peoples and humankind;
- The Cultural Heritage Protection programme, the purpose of which is to protect and revive Palestinian national heritage by collecting, documenting, archiving and cataloguing that heritage; supporting cultural products rooted in cultural heritage as well as Palestinian traditional and craft industries, and disseminating Palestinian national heritage at home and abroad.

258. The cultural sector in the State of Palestine is notable for the plethora of activities run by both civil society and governmental institutions. These institutions have played an important role in the protection and promotion of Palestinian cultural life in the territory of the State of Palestine that has been occupied since 1967. That role has not been limited merely to promoting Palestinian cultural identity as part of the national struggle against occupation, it has also extended to embrace the rise of feminist and student movements in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip. There are currently 400 civil society institutions operating in the field of culture in the State of Palestine where they work to preserve historical and oral heritage.

259. In addition to this, a number of institutions belonging to the private sector – as well as foreign and international institutions – are also involved in cultural activities. Private companies operating in the realm of culture, though few in number, often work in the creative industries, film production and publishing. Nonetheless, the cultural role played by the private sector, particularly as regards funding cultural activities, is currently limited and infrequent in the Palestinian cultural milieu. Foreign institutions frequently act as a platform for exchange and communication between Palestinians who speak foreign languages and foreigners who reside in the State of Palestine, providing educational programmes on the cultures of the various countries in question and of the State of Palestine. Many of those same institutions are also involved in funding the activities of local cultural organizations. Some of the foreign institutions that fund such activities may not themselves be cultural in nature, such as the European Union which provides annual support for a number of cultural activities in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. Because of the poor funding of local civil society cultural institutions and the limited financial returns that cultural activities bring, many institutions rely on foreign funding to support their work. This in turn conflicts with certain elements inherent to Palestinian cultural identity such as the legacy of the struggle against occupation and the symbolic significance of martyrs and detainees.

260. Lastly, the cultural institutional structure of the State of Palestine also includes a number of artistic and cultural federations and unions. Like civil society cultural institutions, these bodies play an important role in promoting Palestinian national cultural identity in the context of the struggle against occupation. Using various channels, they offer readings of revolutionary texts, poetry and theatre that help to reinforce the cultural component of the Palestinian national movement. These bodies include the General Union of Palestinian Women, the General Union of Palestinian Writers and Journalists, the General Union of Palestinian Figurative Artists, the General Union of Palestinian Expressive Artists and the General Union of Palestinian Teachers.

Government actions

261. The Government of the State of Palestine is working to revive the culture sector through strategies of which the most recent were the strategy for culture and heritage 2011–2013 and the strategic plan for 2014–2016, which the Government adopted as part of its programme to end the occupation and to build State institutions. In partnership with the cultural advisory councils in the West Bank and with other cultural institutions, and in coordination with ministries active in cultural affairs, the Ministry of Culture has – in the context of the implementation of national plans – acted to disseminate a discourse that emphasizes the promotion of a democratic, creative and renewed national culture, a culture that respects and safeguards pluralism, ensures openness to others, works to develop citizenship and upholds the values of equality, freedom, social justice and human dignity. At the same time, it seeks to expand the circle of participants in cultural life by targeting young people in schools, universities and marginalized areas. The Ministry of Culture is also concerned to promote the developmental aspects of culture as a means of economic and social advancement by empowering different groups of people to participate actively in the formation of a renewed cultural identity and by changing negative stereotypes in society, thereby further expanding the circle of cultural participants.

262. The activities of the Ministry of Culture include the protection and renewal of heritage, the preservation of Palestinian literary patrimony and the development of a programme to safeguard the cultural status of Jerusalem in order to preserve its special position in the formation of the Palestinian-Arab national identity. The Ministry seeks to enliven cultural life in East Jerusalem by allocating grants from the Cultural Fund (fourth session) to support cultural institutions in the City. In fact, according to a decree adopted at a conference of ministers of culture of the League of Arab States on 27 October 2010, Jerusalem is the permanent capital of Arab culture and is twinned on an annual basis with each designated Arab cultural capital.

The Ministry of Culture also supports cultural exchange activities and it participates – either directly or via groups of artists – in both regional and international festivals. One of the most outstanding initiatives of the State of Palestine in this connection was the Palestinian cultural week in Tlemcen, which was designated as the capital of Islamic culture in 2011. In addition, a number of writers and artists participated in the “Philastiniat” programme in Milan and the Ministry also took part in an Arab-Chinese arts festival. In addition to this, the State of Palestine holds the annual Palestine International Book Fair, which involves local, Arab and international publishing houses and plays host to a number of Arab writers, poets and intellectual figures. As part of its efforts to promote culture among children, the Ministry of Culture organizes an annual children’s creative story writing competition in which regard it cooperates with the Ministry of Education and Higher Education to ensure the broadest possible involvement of children in the initiative. Each year, the Ministry of Culture presents the State of Palestine Awards in literature, arts and humanities the purpose of which is to motivate artists and literary figures to continue giving the best of themselves.

Higher Council for Innovation and Excellence

263. This Council – which was established under Presidential Decree No. 7 and Presidential Decree No. 95, both of 2012 and is answerable to the Office of the President – seeks to create a Palestinian society that is rich in creativity and that performs outstandingly in all areas of life. This is to be achieved by investing in the creative energies that are latent among the Palestinian people so that innovation can play its vital role in fostering strength, resilience and prosperity; to establish a culture of innovation and excellence within Palestinian society, to empower creative persons equally and to reinforce the creative structure across different sectors. The Higher Council for Innovation and Excellence has the following objectives:

- Disseminating and promoting a culture of innovation among young Palestinians through the development of a code of conduct that incorporates values, guidelines and standards that aim to stimulate creativity;
- Reinforcing the creative structure across different sectors by supporting institutions that work in the field of innovation and excellence, building their institutional capacity, encouraging them to coordinate and combine their efforts, and integrating roles so as to improve their social impact and avoid overlap; also, encouraging the private sector in the Occupied Palestinian Territory and in the diaspora to invest in innovation and to form multilateral partnerships;
- Ensuring that the State of Palestine is appropriately and effectively represented within regional and international innovation systems; this includes facilitating access to networking opportunities and transferring appropriate innovations, technology and knowledge into the national setting;
- Opening channels of communication with Palestinians in the diaspora by creating innovative ways and programmes to facilitate and encourage the use of the resources they can offer in the field of excellence and innovation;
- Defining national priorities in the field of creativity and innovation by collaborating with other competent institutions, both official and unofficial.

National register for the documentation of oral heritage

264. The purpose of the register is to gather and document Palestinian oral heritage, with a particular focus on folk stories (hikaye), and to preserve that heritage, which risks being lost due to the ongoing disintegration of Palestinian communities in the Occupied Palestinian Territory and the diaspora and adulterated by developments in technology and communications. In this regard, the Ministry of Culture has, to date, collected numerous hikaye from across the Palestinian governorates after UNESCO included the Palestinian hikaye as part of the intangible cultural heritage of humankind. Some of the hikaye have been collected in a book entitled “Law la salamak sabaqa kalamak” and a new method of writing the hikaye has been developed that accurately reflects the dialects in which such stories are recounted.

Palestinian Heritage Day

265. Palestinian Heritage Day is celebrated annually on 7 October with the involvement of a large number of cultural institutions and associations. Events are held at schools and universities in governorates across the Occupied Palestinian Territory and include various heritage-related programmes and activities organized in partnership with civil society institutions.

National Culture Day

266. The State of Palestine celebrates its National Culture Day each year on 13 March. On that day, the Ministry of Culture holds an event at which the Palestinian people can rejoice in their cultural symbols and it seeks to increase cultural interaction in order to establish a national structure to promote cultural presence and identity. Activities are held throughout the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including Palestine refugee camps in the diaspora and some Palestinian towns and villages inside the Green Line.

Scientific and technological development in communications media

267. The State of Palestine strives to promote cultural rights in parallel with advances in science and technology, particularly in the communications media, and it seeks to protect citizens from any infringement to their personal freedoms that might result from such advances. The State has taken a stance on this question that avoids any restriction of freedoms, particularly the freedom to opinion and expression. In that connection, the State of Palestine has incorporated a body of cultural rights, which it deems worthy of protection, into its national development plans, including the right of access to information and the right to individual privacy. Specifically, this covers:

- Individual privacy in the circulation of information;
- The right to access and use services without discrimination;
- The rights of persons with disabilities and persons in marginalized areas;
- Freedom of access to information.

268. Israel, the occupying power, holds a hegemony over frequency allocations in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including telephone, radio, television and satellite broadcasting frequencies, mobile phone bandwidths and international telecommunications channels. The occupying State also requires Palestinian telecommunications companies to use Israeli networks to reach abroad, which imposes a heavy financial burden on those companies to purchase licenses and strengthen networks in “Area C”. All this affects individuals and their full enjoyment of cultural rights and access to information. Moreover, people are concerned that the occupying authorities are exploiting their dominance of the communications media to keep the Palestinian people under surveillance and monitor their private information.

Cultural rights of minorities

269. The cultural rights of minorities in the State of Palestine are not excluded from the principles applicable to cultural rights in general under the Palestinian legal system, as per the tenets enshrined in the Declaration of Independence and the Palestinian Basic Law. Indeed – in line with a multiculturalism based on non-discrimination among Palestinians for any reason, including race, gender and religion – the minority cultural component is considered to be an integral part of Palestinian culture as a whole.

270. Palestinians from various ethnic groups (Syriac, Armenian, African and Samaritan) enrich Palestinian culture by exercising their right to participate in cultural activities such as scouting movements, cultural associations, libraries, museums, sporting events and special schools which, in addition to the regular curriculum, teach languages such as Syriac, Armenian and Samaritan.

Cultural rights and persons with disabilities

271. Under the Palestinian Labour Code and Decree No. 45 of 2005 of the Council of Ministers, all governmental and non-governmental institutions are required to ensure that 5 per cent of their workforce is made up of persons with a disability. This provision also applies to cultural associations of all kinds. Positive measures towards promoting the cultural rights of persons with disabilities are still relatively limited in the State of Palestine, although the Palestinian Government has made a number of attempts in that regard. These include providing financial and moral support to groups of creative persons all of whom are blind, printing children’s stories in Braille, distributing audiobooks and improving access to cultural institutions and events for persons with disabilities.

Women and cultural life

272. The Palestinian legal system envisages complete equality between men and women vis-à-vis cultural rights, in line with principles enshrined in the Palestinian Declaration of Independence and the Basic Law. However, the practical reality is that, thanks to certain factors rooted in families and local communities, some groups refuse to contemplate the creation of theatres or reject the idea that men and women can appear on stage together. In this connection, advances have been made in some regions while in other regions matters remain unchanged. The increased involvement of women in education in recent years has enhanced their access to cultural life, chiefly through educational institutions, empowering them and enhancing their capacity, not merely as spectators but as active participants in cultural life.

The occupation and cultural rights

273. The practices of the Israeli occupation of the territory of the State of Palestine affect the cultural rights of Palestinians, directly and indirectly. Direct effects include the denigration of Palestinian national culture by the occupying authorities and hostility towards the Palestinian curriculum for its adherence to the historical narrative of the Palestinian people, their forced displacement and the denial of their cultural development. This is in addition to the demonization of the Palestine national liberation movement. Such practices also include the closure of theatres and cultural institutions such as the El-Hakawati Theatre in Jerusalem, which has been repeatedly closed by the occupying authorities.

274. Indirect impacts arise from the general effect of occupation practices on the cultural rights of Palestinians. The widespread displacement, which the Palestinian people have suffered since 1948 and which is constantly renewed, has contributed to rapid and radical changes in Palestinian society, which in turn undermines national cultural identity. In addition to this, practices such as the displacement and arbitrary detention of thousands of Palestinians deprives people of an environment conducive to creativity, in culture and in other areas. Arbitrary detention, which is often carried out in violation of the right to freedom of opinion and expression, leaves many Palestinian literary and artistic figures fearful of arrest for the work they do. In addition, the military checkpoints of the occupation, the racist separation wall and all the barriers put in place by the occupying State in pursuit of its illegal settlement policies hamper Palestinian access to exhibitions, theatres and other cultural forums.

Violations of cultural rights by the Israeli occupiers extend to Palestinian history and its material and intangible heritage. This includes the Judaization of Palestinian cities, particularly occupied Jerusalem, and the evacuation of Palestinian villages, which have been demolished without any regard for their cultural and historical value. Occupation policies seek to impose an artificial reality on Palestinian cities, particularly Jerusalem and Hebron, even going so far as to give streets and neighbourhoods Hebrew names and stealing the cultural patrimony of the Palestinian people and presenting as part of Israeli heritage, such as Palestinian embroidery and Palestinian traditional foods. This goes against UNESCO decrees that aim to safeguard the educational and cultural rights of the Palestinian people and to protect Palestinian heritage sites.

Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Information received from Israel on follow-up to the concluding observations on its fourth periodic report*

[Date received: 11 March 2022]

* The present document is being issued without formal editing.

1. As requested by the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in its concluding observations on the fourth periodic report of Israel, dated October 18, 2019, the State of Israel respectfully presents the following information:

Follow-up information relating to paragraph 11 (c) and (d) of the concluding observations (E/C.12/ISR/CO/4)

2. As has been previously clarified, it is Israel's position that the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (hereinafter: "the Covenant") is not applicable beyond a State's national territory. For an elaboration of this position, see our Second Periodic Report, pp. 3–4.

3. Notwithstanding this position, in the spirit of openness with which Israel approaches the constructive dialogue with the honorable Committee, we respectfully present the following information.

Free movement of civilians and goods

4. According to international law, as a sovereign state, Israel has the authority to decide who may enter its borders. There is no right to enter the territory of the State for persons who are not citizens; this includes Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Palestinian residents of Gaza in particular, as Gaza is in a long-standing armed conflict with Israel.

5. Unlike in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip has not been under Israeli control since September 12, 2005, when Israel's last IDF forces left the area of the Gaza Strip following the implementation of Israel's "Disengagement Initiative". Since then, Israel clearly does not have effective control in the Gaza Strip. As a consequence, as also affirmed in 2007 by the Israeli High Court of Justice, Israel does not have a general duty to ensure the welfare of the population of the Gaza Strip. Rather, Israel's obligations towards the Gaza Strip stem from the continuing state of armed conflict with the Hamas terrorist organization and other terrorist organizations in Gaza. The Gaza Strip shares a border with Egypt, over which goods and persons transfer actively.

6. Following Hamas' violent take-over on the Gaza Strip, the area has turned into a "hostile zone" similar to an enemy state engaged in war against the State and its citizens. In light of the situation, the Israeli Government (GOI) (The Ministerial Committee on National Security Issues) resolved on September 19, 2007, to impose restrictions, inter alia, on the passage of goods and to limit movement of persons in and out of the Strip via Israeli sovereign territory, subject to humanitarian exceptions only.

7. The policy regarding movement between Israel, Gaza and the West Bank is decided based on security considerations, including: Hamas' control over Gaza; the non-stop violent actions of terrorist organizations against Israel from Gaza, which breach all standards of international law by launching rockets at Israel and committing and attempting attacks against Israeli citizens and soldiers; the efforts of terrorist organizations to exploit Palestinian citizens by enlisting them to commit terrorist attacks, pass along information, money or equipment for terrorist actions; and more.¹

8. In June 2010, the GOI decided on a major shift in Israel's policy towards the Gaza Strip. This policy and its implementation included three (3) major aspects:

- All goods can enter the Gaza Strip freely, with the sole exception of goods that may pose a security risk to Israel, such as dual use materials, which will require authorization;
- A substantial increase in the capacity of the Kerem Shalom crossing, through which goods can enter the Gaza Strip (hundreds of truckloads daily);

¹ H.C.J. 9518/16 Harel v. The Knesset (5.9.17).

- Increased facilitation for projects funded and implemented by the International Community, including the entry of dual-use goods that are required for their implementation, subject to appropriate supervision.

9. Since then, subject to the security situation, Israel has continued implementing this revised policy towards the Gaza Strip. The policy regarding entry of Palestinians into Israel, including in order to transfer from the West Bank to Gaza and to leave the State, is publicly available on the Civil Administration's website, and is examined regularly by the relevant authorities, based on the developing security situation. The relevant authorities approve hundreds of thousands of requests to enter Israel each year, for a variety of purposes, including employment and commerce. Each week hundreds of thousands of Palestinians enter Israel from the West Bank and Gaza, and recently the number of permits from Gaza for commerce purposes was increased significantly. Regarding residents of the West Bank, each day approximately 100,000 Palestinian workers enter Israel, alongside tens of thousands of residents who enter for medical, commercial or other purposes. Note that there is no limitation on the freedom of movement within the West Bank, and checkpoints are not operational on a day-to-day basis (checkpoints are only temporarily established following a security incident or pursuant to security-related intelligence). The exit of Palestinian residents to foreign countries is conducted through the Allenby bridge and in many cases through the Ben Gurion Airport.

10. Regarding the movement of goods to and from Gaza, all goods that are not limited by Law may be transferred. Dual-use items (from a designated list) require specific authorization to ensure that they are not used by terrorist organizations. Goods are transferred based on the supply capabilities of the "Kerem Shalom" crossing, subject to coordination of their supply and requisite checks. Each week tens of thousands of tons of goods and hundreds of thousands of liters of gasoline and fuel enter Gaza from Israel and Egypt, in unprecedented amounts as compared to recent years.

World Zionist Organization and the Jewish National Fund

11. Section 6b(b)(1) of the Status of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for the Land of Israel Law 1952-5713 states that the GOI, with the consent of the World Zionist Organization (WZO), is entitled to delegate some of its authorities regarding housing and certain other issues to the WZO via the Rural Growth and Development Division (the: "Division"). The Section specifies that agreements between the Division and the State will include mechanisms for supervision and control.

12. In Government Resolution No. 1998 (October 2016), following criticism raised regarding of the Division's conduct on behalf of various parties, the Government regulated the Division's work, delegated certain Government responsibilities to the Division and established a detailed mechanism for reviewing the Division's activities. It further included the establishment of a professional unit now under the Ministry of Hityashvut, which supervises the Division work. Additionally, the Division's financial support committee includes representation of Civil Service employees.

13. Following a petition to the High Court of Justice, the Court reviewed these delegation arrangements and approved them.² Regarding the supervision of the Division, the Court found that the Division is subject to the review and supervision mechanisms set in the delegation agreements and is forbidden from exceeding the set authorities delegated to it.

14. The State has authority over the Jewish National Fund (JNF) by law, and it is managed by the Israel Land Authority (ILA), pursuant to Israel Land Council guidelines. Such as all governmental bodies, the ILA is beholden to the principles of equality and non-discrimination regarding land management.

15. On June 19, 2018 the High Court of Justice ruled in a petition filed by the National Committee for Local Authorities, that requested the Court to cancel Section 4a(a) of the Israel Land Administration 1960-5720. This Section raised the respective portion of the JNF representatives. According to the petitioners, the mere involvement of the JNF representatives is a violation on the right to equality and dignity of the Arab population in Israel.

16. The Court determined that the JNF representation according to this section does not harm the principle of equality, as the land that is administrated by the Council is under the ownership of the Jewish National Fund. The Court emphasized that the Israel Land Council is obligated in its decision to the principle of equality and so does the Jewish National Fund Representative to the Council.³

Follow-up information relating to paragraph 17 of the concluding observations

17. The Basic Law is only one piece in the Israeli constitutional puzzle, and as was formally declared by the Attorney General, does not derogate in any manner from human rights protected under other Basic Laws of Israel (in particular Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, and Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation) and does not affect the enjoyment – and protection – of rights of minority populations in Israel.

18. The Basic Law has to be read against this background. Alongside the Nation State basic law, Israel has also enacted almost 30 years ago the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The High Court of Justice has interpreted this Basic Law as clearly protecting the principle of equality, specifically as an aspect of the right to human dignity, and defined this as a basic constitutional right. The principle of equality is deeply embedded in Israeli law as a fundamental human right that constitutes the highest of values in the Israeli democratic society.

19. The purpose of the Basic Law is to enshrine the character of the State of Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish people and the state in which the Jewish people uniquely exercise their right of self-determination in a Basic Law. This Jewish character was acknowledged by UN General Assembly Resolution No. 181 that acknowledged the need – and called for – the establishment of a Jewish State, which would serve as the home – and safe heaven – for the Jewish people.

20. The effect of the Basic Law on the enjoyment of rights covered by the Covenant was deliberated at length by the High Court of Justice, which in July 2021 issued the following ruling.⁴

21. On July 8, 2021, the High Court of Justice, presiding with a panel of 11 Judges, including the President and Vice President of the Supreme Court, rejected 15 petitions in which the petitioners argued that the Basic Law: Israel – National State of the Jewish People (hereinafter: the “Basic Law”) is unconstitutional. Moreover, the Court declared that the Basic Law is to be interpreted through “affirmative interpretation,” which reflects and realizes all other Basic Laws as well as the core principles and values of our justice system. The Court noted that the Basic Law is a part of Israel’s growing constitution, which anchors the protection of Israel’s identity as a Jewish state, without derogating from its identity as a Democratic state, as anchored in other Basic Laws, thus reflecting the State’s constitutional principles.

22. According to the petitioners, the Basic Law denies the democratic identity of the state because it violates the principle of equality as well as disrupts the balance between the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish state and its values as a democratic state as enshrined by the Declaration of Independence.

23. The Court declared in a majority ruling (of 10 to 1) written by the President of the Supreme Court, that so long as the State does not have a full constitution, the Knesset as the constitutive body has but one limitation: it cannot enact a Basic Law that negates Israel’s essence as both a Jewish and a democratic state. The Court did not interpret the Basic Law as impairing Israel’s character as Jewish and democratic.

³ H.C.J. 16/6411 The National Committee for Local Authorities v. The Knesset.

⁴ H.C.J. 5555/18 MK Akram Hasson et. al. v. The Knesset et. al. (8.7.21).

24. The Court noted that the principle of equality is a core principle in Israel's legal system, the principle of equality, which applies to the rights of all citizens of Israel, including persons belonging to a minority population. While noting that it would be preferable that the principle of equality be anchored explicitly in a Basic Law, the Court emphasized that the fact that it is not, does not detract from its status as a constitutional principle.

25. The Court specified that pursuant to affirmative interpretation, Section 1(c) which anchors the right of self-determination to the Jewish people, does not impair or negate the right to cultural self-determination of persons belonging to a minority population within the state, and furthermore, it does not diminish any of the existing arrangements concerning the rights of non-Jewish persons belonging to a minority population.

26. In regard to Section 4, which recognizes Hebrew as the official main language, the Court noted, inter alia, that it does not impair the stance of the Arabic language as an official language and does not deny development and advancement in the public sphere. The Court further noted that the State and society are to continue to promote the stance of Arabic in the public sphere, expressing that this section "should be interpreted in a way that does not impair the status of the Arabic language neither in practice nor in spirit." In relation to Section 7 of the Basic Law, which declares the development of Jewish settlement as a national value, the Court noted that this section should be fulfilled with flexibility and through balance with the right to equality, and not in a manner which could allow discrimination against individuals who are not Jewish and their rights to land.

27. In regard to claims raised by the petitioners, arguing that the Basic Law contradicts Israel's obligation according to the International Law, including human rights conventions, the Court noted that the Sections of the Basic Law on which the petitioners focused do not contradict the provisions of international law and can be interpreted in a manner consistent with them.

28. In the Court's minority opinion, Justice Karra stipulated that the aforementioned Sections do indeed negate the heart of the State's democratic identity and should be cancelled, and that no interpretative framework could mend the unconstitutionality of the Basic Law.

Follow-up information relating to paragraph 23 of the concluding observations

Improving the refugee status determination procedure

29. The Refugee Status Determination (RSD) Unit in the Population and Immigration Authority is responsible for processing asylum requests in Israel. The RSD process is anchored in Procedure 5.2.0012 (hereinafter: "the Procedure"), which regulates the process for determining cases of asylum seekers and refugees by the Minister of the Interior, pursuant to the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees 1951 and the Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees 1967 (hereinafter: "the Refugee Convention"). The process is conducted in accordance with Israeli law, in consideration of the State's commitments stemming from the Refugee Convention.

30. On 23 June 2021, the Procedure was updated, with the aim of improving the services offered to asylum seekers as well as the efficiency and professionalism of the determination process itself, while balancing relevant considerations and striving to create the most proficient and effective process possible.

31. Note that prior to its entry into force, the Procedure was presented to the public as well as to the relevant bodies involved in various aspects of the asylum process, including the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and civil society. After conducting dialogue with the relevant bodies, the Procedure was amended and entered into force.

Allowing asylum seekers to enter the labor market

32. Asylum seekers in Israel are granted temporary stay permits, which are not categorized as work permits, pursuant to Section 2(a)(5) of the Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952. However, in the framework of H.C.J. 6312/10 Kav L'Oved v. The Government of Israel, the State declared that despite the aforementioned legal status, there will be no enforcement against the employment of asylum seekers in practice. This declaration has been further anchored in Sections 1(e) and 1(f) of the RSD Procedure. Therefore, asylum seekers are able to enter the labor market, and their employment is protected under the relevant State labor laws, accordingly.

Expanding social assistance benefits

33. According to Ministry of Welfare and Social Affairs (MoWSA) Director General's Directive No. 100 for at-risk children and their families, all at-risk children, including children with disabilities, and their families, have access to any service, as is provided to any minor with civil status. Under this initiative, five (5) million NIS (approximately 1.38 million USD) is allocated every year for community solutions to be provided to those children and their families.

34. Additionally, there are various Government Resolutions pertaining to the provision of rehabilitation services to all victims of human trafficking without civil status. Under these resolutions, 580,000 NIS (approximately 160,000 USD) are transferred for the operation of a day center in Tel Aviv-Jaffa, and the annual budget for this shelter in 2020 was 771,400 NIS (242,355 USD). Migrants who may not be returned to their country of origin who are victims of trafficking or torture are integrated in these shelters and as of 2020, shelters for victims of prostitution as well. In 2020, 14 migrant women were integrated into a shelter for rehabilitation from prostitution, and in 2021 (as of November) an additional ten (10) were integrated.

35. The MoWSA Director General Circular No. 168 relates to the treatment of members of the migrant community who may not be returned to their country of origin – specifically those who are homeless, people with disabilities, and battered women at risk. Pursuant to the Circular, the Ministry offers 100% government subsidized placement in these frameworks, at the annual cost of over 10 Million NIS (approximately 2.78 Million USD).

36. Additionally, twenty (20) new social worker positions were opened in relevant localities in order to provide rehabilitation, support, and assistance to this population.

37. Regarding victims of domestic violence, according to current procedures, the Israel Police convene a meeting every six (6) months with officials from the MoWSA and local authorities to discuss general opportunities for cooperation and individual cases related to addressing domestic violence against migrant women. When a child is at risk, whether due to domestic violence or any other hardship, the child and their family are provided with solutions in the community just as any child with civil status. Additionally, as of the year 2020, two (2) Million NIS (approximately 642,258 USD) were allocated for treating migrant women who may not be returned to their country of origin who are victims of violence.

38. Note that during the COVID-19 pandemic, the MoWSA offered need-based prioritized additional grants to assist migrants who may not be returned to their country of origin that were in need.

Medical care

39. Pursuant to Patients' Rights Law 1996-5756, all persons are entitled to urgent medical care in a situation of medical emergency. Specifically, migrants, including minors, are offered the following health services (in addition to the aforesaid urgent medical treatments): preventive medicine for pregnant women, babies and infants at family health centers; primary health care in the Terem clinic for persons without civil status in Tel Aviv-Jaffa; and psycho-social and medicinal treatment in the Ruth clinic for mental health in Tel Aviv-Jaffa; and more. In addition, minors without civil status in Israel are offered subsidized medical treatments, through the Meuhedet Health Fund (an HMO). Foreign workers and employed persons without civil status are entitled to health insurance sponsored by their employer.

40. In addition, there are several specialized clinics and services which offer treatments to migrants in Israel, facilitated by non-governmental organizations or hospitals.

41. During the COVID-19 pandemic, migrants were ensured health services. In March 2020, hospital administrators and General Managers, as well as the General Manager of Magen David Adom, were instructed by the Ministry of Health to offer all relevant COVID-19 tests, treatments and hotlines to all migrants in Israel. COVID-19 testing locations were open to all free of charge. Hospitals offered full treatment, including complex intensive care ventilation, ECMO and rehabilitation, free of charge.

42. Migrants were offered to vaccinate against COVID-19, in centers established throughout the country, including a specialized center in Tel Aviv-Jaffa. As of June 2021, the level of vaccination among migrants was high and comparable to that of the general Israeli population.

43. Moreover, an inter-ministerial committee was formed to examine offering subsidized health services to migrants who may not be returned to their country of origin. The committee reviewed the “Meuhedet” Health Fund 2001 arrangement for providing subsidized health services to minors without civil status, due to the ambiguity regarding its scope of application. Accordingly, the committee also discussed the possibility to extend the arrangement to adult migrants granted temporary group protection who may not be returned to their country of origin. On December 14, 2021, the Committee submitted its report to the Minister and Director General of the Ministry of Health, recommending that certain groups of foreign minors and adults granted temporary group protection that may not be returned to their countries of origin will receive health care plan subsidized by the State. The recommendations are being examined by the Minister of Health.

Repealing the Deposit Law

44. On April 23, 2020, the High Court of Justice ruled that the obligation requiring people who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian border to deposit 20% of their salary as an incentive to leave Israel is unconstitutional and ordered its nullity. The Court determined that the deposit would be based only on the employer component (16%) and approved the operation of the “administrative deduction” mechanism, according to which, certain amounts can be deducted from the employee’s deposit, if the employee leaves the country after the departure date as set by the authorities. The law determines deduction levels in accordance with the length of the delay, and states that the deduction will not exceed 33% of the deposit.⁵

Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural RightsConcluding observations on the initial report of the State of Palestine

1. The Committee considered the initial report of the State of Palestine¹ at its 35th and 37th meetings,² held on 27 September 2023 and 28 September 2023, and adopted the present concluding observations at its 60th meeting, held on 13 October 2023.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission by the State party of the initial report and the supplementary information provided in the replies to the list of issues.³ The Committee expresses its appreciation for the constructive dialogue that it held with the State party's delegation.

3. The Committee recognizes that the ongoing Israeli occupation and partial annexation of the territory of the State party, the expansion of settlements and the continued blockade of the Gaza Strip, which are illegal under international law,⁴ pose severe challenges for the State party in fully implementing its obligations under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and lead to grave violations of the economic, social and cultural rights of Palestinians, including forced displacement and evictions, seizure of private land, house demolitions and illegal settlements, restrictions on gaining access to health-care services, destruction of cultural sites and denial of access to humanitarian aid. It recognizes that the above-mentioned challenges limit the State party's effective control of its jurisdiction over its own territory and resources and its capacity to implement the Covenant. However, it reminds the State party that the Covenant is applicable in its entire territory and that it should take all possible measures to implement it in all parts of the territory. In that regard, the Committee regrets that, notwithstanding the agreement between the Fatah and Hamas movements to end Palestinian division, signed on 12 October 2017, the State party has made limited progress in resolving internal political issues that negatively affect the full enjoyment by Palestinians in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip of their rights under the Covenant and contribute to the political and geographical fragmentation of the State party's territory. It notes that, owing to this fragmentation, Palestinians continue to be subject to multiple legal systems that impede the full realization of their rights under the Covenant.⁵

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the accession of the State party to a significant number of international instruments since its accession to the Covenant, and the issues referred to below.

C. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

Domestic application of the Covenant

5. The Committee is concerned about the interpretation of the Supreme Constitutional Court, in its decisions No. 4 (2017) of 19 November 2017 and No. 5 (2018) of 12 March 2018, according to which international treaties acceded to by the State party take precedence over national legislation only insofar as they are consistent with the national, religious and cultural identity of the Palestinian Arab people. Furthermore, the Committee is concerned about the multiple non-unified legal systems in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

6. The Committee recommends that the State party revise existing legislation with a view to preventing legal uncertainty or ambiguity that could provide grounds for legal interpretations contradictory to the State party's legal obligations, and that the State party enact legislation to ensure the unification of its legal systems, as also recommended by the Human Rights Committee.⁶ In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 9 (1998) on the domestic application of the Covenant.

Independence of the judiciary

7. The Committee is concerned about the establishment of the Supreme Council of Judicial Bodies and Authorities, as its control by the executive branch of Government significantly hampers the independence of the judicial system.

8. The Committee recommends that the State party take the measures necessary to prevent and sanction any abuse of the powers granted to the Supreme Council of Judicial Bodies and Authorities, taking into account relevant international standards, including the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary.

Civil society organizations

9. The Committee is concerned that Decree-Law No. 7 of 2021, amending the Charitable Associations and Civil Society Organizations Act (Act No. 1 of 2000), and Decree-Law No. 39 of 2022 on Anti-Money-Laundering and Terrorism Financing may unduly restrict the right to freedom of association and the funding and operations of civil society organizations.

10. The Committee recommends that the State party consider reviewing Decree-Law No. 7 of 2021, amending the Charitable Associations and Civil Society Organizations Act (Act No. 1 of 2000), and Decree-Law No. 39 of 2022 on Anti-Money-Laundering and Terrorism Financing with a view to removing unduly restrictive requirements regarding the funding and operations of civil society organizations, as also recommended by the Human Rights Committee.⁷

Human rights defenders, journalists and lawyers working on human rights

11. The Committee is concerned that certain provisions of the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960, as incorporated by the State party, notably articles 144 (insulting a public official), 150 (inciting sectarian strife), 191 (slandering a public official) and 195 (insulting a higher authority), unduly criminalize expression in the State party and have reportedly been used to silence human rights defenders, journalists and lawyers working on human rights who voice critical or dissenting opinions of the State party's activities and policies.

12. The Committee recommends that the State party review the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960, as incorporated by the State party, to bring it into full conformity with international human rights law, as also recommended by the Human Rights Committee.⁸ In this regard, the Committee recalls its statement on human rights defenders and economic, social and cultural rights.⁹

Business and economic, social and cultural rights

13. The Committee is concerned about the absence of a national action plan for businesses and human rights. The Committee is also concerned about reports of monopolies and lack of competitiveness in public tenders, in particular in the water, electricity and telecommunications sectors, as well as in the waste disposal sector, leading to higher prices and thereby negatively affecting households' ability to afford the costs of living (arts. 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15).

14. The Committee recommends that the State party enact a national action plan for businesses and human rights. The Committee also recommends that the State party ensure that companies awarded public contracts do not unduly raise prices for individuals and households to the detriment of their ability to afford the costs of living, such as for housing, food, medicine, education and cultural activities, including sports. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 24 (2017) on State obligations under the Covenant in the context of business activities.

Climate change

15. The Committee is concerned that current emission-reducing policies may not be sufficient for the State party to fulfil its obligations under the Paris Agreement (art. 2 (1)).

16. The Committee recommends that the State party take measures to achieve its nationally determined contributions under the Paris Agreement, including by increasing taxation on emissions and replacing fossil fuel in its energy mix. In this regard, the Committee recalls its statement on climate change and the Covenant.¹⁰

Maximum available resources

17. The Committee is concerned that the political divergence between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip hinders the State party's ability to effectively collect taxes and conduct cohesive economic policies, and renders it overly dependent on fluctuating levels of official development assistance, all to the detriment of the fulfilment of the rights under the Covenant (art. 2 (1)).

18. The Committee recommends that the State party redouble its efforts to end the political divergence between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to improve its ability to collect taxes and conduct cohesive economic policies and to reduce its dependency on fluctuating levels of official development assistance. In this regard, the Committee recalls its statement entitled "The pledge to leave no one behind: the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development."¹¹

Corruption

19. The Committee is concerned about reports that corruption, including nepotism, remains pervasive in many sectors of public life, in particular in appointing and promoting government officials. The Committee regrets the lack of specific information provided by the State party on the concrete measures in place to ensure the independence, transparency, effectiveness and accountability of anti-corruption bodies such as the Anti-Corruption Commission and the Anti-Corruption Court (art. 2 (1)).

⁸ Ibid., para. 40 (a).

¹¹ E/C.12/2019/1.

20. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Promptly, independently and impartially investigate and prosecute all cases of corruption, in particular high-level corruption, including corruption in the Government, and, if a person is convicted, apply penalties commensurate with the seriousness of the offence;

(b) Ensure the independence, effectiveness, transparency and accountability of all anti-corruption bodies, including the Anti-Corruption Commission and the Anti-Corruption Court, as also recommended by the Human Rights Committee.¹²

Austerity measures

21. Noting the State party's measures to balance its expenses with available resources, the Committee is concerned about the significant adverse impact of austerity measures on the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights (arts. 2 (1), 6, 9, 11 and 12).

22. The Committee recommends that the State party assess the impact on the Covenant rights when making budgetary adjustments and take all measures necessary to reduce any negative impact on economic, social and cultural rights. In this regard, the Committee recalls its statement on public debt, austerity measures and the Covenant.¹³

23. The Committee is concerned about the absence of comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation providing full and effective protection against all forms of discrimination prohibited under the Covenant and about reports of discrimination, including discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity (arts. 2 (2)).

24. The Committee recommends that the State party enact comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation that provides full and effective protection against discrimination in all spheres and contains a comprehensive list of prohibited grounds for discrimination, including sexual orientation and gender identity, as also recommended by the Human Rights Committee.¹⁴ In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 20 (2009) on non-discrimination in economic, social and cultural rights.

Equal rights of men and women

25. The Committee is concerned that gender disparities persist, in particular in relation to the gender pay gap. The Committee is also concerned that women's representation in senior positions in the public and private sector remains unsatisfactory (arts. 3 and 7).

26. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Intensify its efforts to close the gender pay gap, including by addressing the gender-based segregation in the labour market, reviewing its social and tax policies and addressing the factors that discourage women from continuing their careers or taking up full-time employment;

(b) Enhance women's participation in senior public and private positions, including by considering quotas.

27. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 16 (2005) on the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of all economic, social and cultural rights.

¹³ E/C.12/2016/1.

28. The Committee is concerned about the persistent high level of unemployment, in particular in the Gaza Strip, and the stark overrepresentation of persons with disabilities and women among the unemployed. The Committee is also concerned about reports that the policies of banking and financial institutions restrict access to loans for women working in the agricultural sector (arts. 3 and 6).

29. The Committee recommends that the State party increase its efforts to address unemployment, for example by implementing targeted public sector employment schemes and by paying particular attention to unemployment in the Gaza Strip and among persons with disabilities and women. The Committee also recommends that the State party establish loan schemes targeting women working in the agricultural sector.

30. The Committee is concerned that the youth unemployment rate, in particular among young people who have completed tertiary education, has increased in recent years and about the lack of sufficient measures to address it (art. 6).

31. The Committee recommends that the State party continue to increase its efforts to address youth unemployment, including among young people who have completed tertiary education, and that it continue its efforts to calibrate education with the needs of the labour market, such as by expanding vocational training. The Committee also recommends that the State party work with its development partners for nation-building by enhancing cooperation in training, technology, skills development, vocational guidance, project assistance, budgetary support and legislative measures to improve employment opportunities for young people who are unemployed.

Right to just and favourable conditions of work

32. The Committee is concerned about the considerable proportion of workers in the State party who are working in the informal economy and that such workers are de facto not adequately covered by the Palestinian Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000). The Committee is also concerned about reports of unsafe working conditions, including instances of injury and death, in particular in the construction, manufacturing and quarrying industries. The Committee is further concerned about reports that the legal minimum wage is not systematically paid by employers and about reports of the withholding of salaries and the deductions of exorbitant administrative fees imposed on persons working in settlements or in Israel proper. Furthermore, the Committee is concerned about the absence of specialized labour courts, despite such courts being prescribed by the Labour Code (art. 7).

33. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Take measures to regularize the situation of informal sector workers and ensure that they are covered by the Palestinian Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000);

(b) Adopt all measures necessary to ensure just and favourable conditions of work, in particular for workers in the construction, manufacturing and quarrying industries;

(c) Ensure that all categories of workers have access to medical and accident insurance, as well as to adequate compensation for work-related injuries and diseases;

(d) Enforce the payment of the legal minimum wage by employers and take measures to prevent the economic exploitation of those working in settlements or in Israel proper, including by increasing labour inspections of labour-referral agencies;

(e) Establish specialized labour courts.

34. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 23 (2016) on the right to just and favourable conditions of work.

Trade union rights

35. The Committee is concerned that the State party has not passed legislation to regulate trade unions (draft trade union organizations law). The Committee is also concerned about the dissolution of the Union of Public Employees. The Committee is further concerned about reports of punitive measures taken against teachers, including layoffs, the withholding of salaries and involuntary transferral to undesired posts, for union activities (art. 8).

36. The Committee recommends that the State party pass legislation to regulate trade unions and consider reviewing its decision to dissolve the Union of Public Employees. The State party should take all measures necessary to ensure that no one, including teachers, is subjected to punitive measures for union activities and take immediate steps to rectify any undue layoffs, pay salaries due and retransfer unduly transferred personnel. In this regard, the Committee recalls its joint statement with the Human Rights Committee on freedom of association, including the right to form and join trade unions.¹⁵

Right to social security

37. The Committee is concerned that the draft social security law has yet to be passed and that a substantial share of the population, including those who are employed, is not adequately covered by social security schemes (art. 9).

38. The State party should adopt the draft social security law and ensure that its provisions adequately ensure the right to social security, paying special attention to the needs of the most disadvantaged and marginalized groups and ensuring coverage for all, including those not contributing to private or public social security schemes through their workplace. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 19 (2007) on the right to social security.

39. The Committee is concerned about reports that the medium- to long-term financial sustainability of the public pension system is threatened by the State party's continued reliance on borrowing from the public pension fund, as this may negatively affect retirees' enjoyment of economic and social rights (art. 9).

40. The Committee recommends that the State party immediately cease borrowing from the public pension fund.

41. The Committee is concerned about the viability of the Palestinian Cash Transfer Programme, including as a result of overreliance on fluctuating donor contributions (art. 9).

42. The Committee recommends that the State party take all measures necessary to ensure that the Palestinian Cash Transfer Programme is able to disburse payments as intended, including by reducing reliance on donor contributions for its funding, such as by increasing the amount allocated by the State party.

Protection of the family and children

43. The Committee is concerned that the draft family protection law has not been passed, and that matters of personal status, including inheritance, marriage, divorce and child custody, are regulated in the West Bank by the Personal Status Act of 1976 and in the Gaza Strip by the Ottoman Personal Status Act of 1918 and the Family Rights Act of 1954, as these laws may not comply with the State party's international legal obligations under the Covenant, the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (art. 10).

44. The Committee recommends that the State party take immediate steps to pass the family protection law and review the Personal Status Act of 1976, the Ottoman Personal Status Act of 1918 and the Family Rights Act of 1954 with a view to ensuring that the laws comply with the State party's international legal obligations, including the Covenant.

45. The Committee notes with concern that many children exercise some form of economic activity, including hazardous work, in particular in the manufacturing and agriculture sectors, and that these children are also exposed to economic exploitation (art. 10).

¹⁵ E/C.12/66/5-CCPR/C/127/4.

46. The Committee recommends that the State party take urgent measures to:

- (a) Eliminate the worst forms of child labour;
- (b) Ensure that the laws on child labour are rigorously enforced;
- (c) Strengthen labour inspection mechanisms with a focus on child labour.

Right to an adequate standard of living

47. The Committee is concerned that large disparities in living standards between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and between urban and rural areas still persist (art. 11).

48. The Committee recommends that the State party pay particular attention to shortfalls and the differences in living standards between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as well as between urban and rural areas, with a view to bringing the lower living standards of rural areas and the Gaza Strip up to the level of urban areas and the West Bank, respectively.

49. The Committee is concerned about food insecurity and the poor living conditions in overcrowded refugee camps, including regarding the quality of housing, electricity, sanitation and access to safe drinking water (art. 11).

50. The Committee recommends that the State party prioritize and allocate sufficient resources to ensuring food security and alleviating poor living conditions in refugee camps, including regarding the quality of housing, electricity, sanitation and access to safe drinking water. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comments No. 4 (1991) on the right to adequate housing, No. 12 (1999) on the right to adequate food and No. 15 (2002) on the right to water, and its statement on the right to sanitation.¹⁶

51. The Committee is concerned about reports that a draft law on value-added tax will increase value-added tax on all products without sufficiently taking into account the disproportionate effect on persons and families on low incomes regarding their ability to purchase food items and basic necessities (art. 11).

52. The Committee recommends that the State party, in its application of value-added tax, take adequately into consideration the needs of persons and families on low incomes, including by applying a differentiated, lower value-added tax on food items and basic necessities. In this regard, the Committee recalls its statement on poverty and Covenant.¹⁷

53. The Committee is concerned about reports of prolonged efforts to reconstruct homes and businesses destroyed by the occupying Power, and that victims thereof go through lengthy periods of homelessness and absence of livelihoods. The Committee is also concerned about reports of forced evictions by the authorities in the Gaza Strip (art. 11).

54. The Committee recommends that the State party redouble its efforts, including by engaging with international partners, to ensure that persons whose houses and businesses are destroyed by the occupying Power are provided with adequate housing and support to maintain their livelihoods without any undue delay. The Committee also recommends that the State party ensure that evictions, when unavoidable, are carried out in accordance with due process of law, are preceded by consultations with the persons concerned and consideration of alternatives, are subject to appeal and result in adequate compensation or the provision of adequate alternative housing. In this regard, the Committee refers to its general comment No. 7 (1997) on forced evictions.

¹⁷ E/C.12/2001/10.

Climate change adaptation

55. The Committee is concerned about the absence of a national adaptation plan for climate change and that the environmental consequences of climate change, including the degradation of arable land, droughts and lack of freshwater resources, have a considerable impact on the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights in the State party (art. 11).

56. The Committee recommends that the State party develop a national adaptation plan for climate change and take all adaption measures necessary to protect the environment and address environmental degradation, taking into account its effects on economic, social and cultural rights. This could, for example, take the form of crop rotations and agroforestry, water rationing and the expansion of drip-irrigation techniques.

Right to physical and mental health

57. The Committee is concerned about the general inadequacy of funding for and the persistent disparities in access to public health-care services in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The Committee is also concerned about reports of inadequate mental health care, including for women and children who are victims of domestic violence (art. 12).

58. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Take all measures necessary to improve its health-care services and guarantee the enjoyment of the right to good-quality and affordable health care to all persons throughout the State party;

(b) Earmark funding to improve mental health-care services at both the preventive and the curative levels, including for women and children who are victims of domestic violence.

59. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 14 (2000) on the right to the highest attainable standard of health.

60. The Committee is concerned about the highly restrictive legal framework for legal access to abortion, which subjects both doctors and patients to criminal prosecution under articles 321, 322 and 324 of the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960, as incorporated by the State party, and which also results in unsafe abortions (art. 12).

61. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Amend parts of the domestic legal and institutional framework, including articles 321, 322 and 324 of the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960, as incorporated by the State party, to ensure that women and girls who undergo abortions and the doctors or others who attend to them are not subject to criminal penalties, as also recommended by the Human Rights Committee;¹⁸

(b) Duly takes into consideration the World Health Organization Abortion Care Guideline.¹⁹

62. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 22 (2016) on the right to sexual and reproductive health.

63. The Committee is concerned about reports that the State party's health insurance system is governed by multiple legislative and administrative frameworks, which increases the transactional and administrative burdens for patients and health-care providers alike, and about reports that referrals from public health-care providers to private health-care providers increase the health-care costs borne by the State party (arts. 9 and 12).

64. The Committee recommends that the State party review its legislative and administrative frameworks for health insurance to unify and simplify the system and make said revisions public with a view to ensuring transparency and reducing transactional and administrative burdens for health-care providers and patients, and strengthen its public health-care system with a view to lowering expenses linked to referrals to private health-care providers. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 14 (2000) on the right to the highest attainable standard of health.

Right to education

65. The Committee is concerned about reports of non-attendance and dropouts in the compulsory education system, in particular among children with disabilities and Bedouin children. The Committee is also concerned about the State party's inability to ensure adequate funding for the education system in a context of austerity and reduced donor support (arts. 13 and 14).

66. The Committee recommends that the State party take all measures necessary to combat non-attendance and dropouts in the compulsory education system, in particular among children with disabilities and Bedouin children. The Committee also recommends that the State party allocate sufficient resources to the education system, including by engaging with international partners and donors to this effect. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comments No. 11 (1999) on plans of action for primary education and No. 13 (1999) on the right to education.

67. The Committee is concerned about reports that students whose schools have been destroyed by the occupying Power are unable to pursue education (arts. 13 and 14).

68. The Committee recommends that the State party continue to take all adequate measures, including by engaging with civil society organizations and international partners, to ensure that students' education is affected to the least possible degree in cases of destruction of their schools.

Academic freedom

69. The Committee is concerned about reports of infringements on the academic freedom of university students and staff by the State party, including students and staff being detained by the State party's security agencies in connection with the exercise of the freedom of expression and student union activities (arts. 13 and 14).

70. The Committee recommends that the State party take all measures necessary to ensure the academic freedom of university students and staff, including by monitoring the activities of the State party's security agencies.

Cultural rights

71. The Committee is concerned about reports that law enforcement agencies do not take adequate measures to ensure the protection of independent cultural institutions and individual artists, and about reports that threats against and attacks on those institutions and individuals have increased in recent years, including as a result of a climate of impunity (art. 15).

72. The Committee recommends that the State party take all measures necessary to ensure the protection of independent cultural institutions and individual artists, and ensure that all cases of threats and attacks are investigated promptly, effectively and impartially, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence and that victims of such violations receive full reparation and redress. In this regard, the Committee recalls its general comment No. 21 (2009) on the right of everyone to take part in cultural life.

Access to the Internet

73. The Committee is concerned that the measures taken by the State party to expand access to the Internet and digital technologies, in particular for disadvantaged and marginalized groups, in refugee camps and in the Gaza Strip, have been insufficient (art. 15).

74. The Committee recommends that the State party expand Internet access, in particular in refugee camps and in the Gaza Strip, and allocate specific funding for access to the Internet by disadvantaged and marginalized groups.

D. Other recommendations

75. The Committee encourages the State party to ratify the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, as well as the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

76. The Committee recommends that the State party take fully into account its obligations under the Covenant and ensure the full enjoyment of the rights enshrined therein in the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development at the national level, including in the recovery from the coronavirus disease (COVID-19) pandemic, with international assistance and cooperation when needed. Achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals would be significantly facilitated by the State party establishing independent mechanisms to monitor progress and treating beneficiaries of public programmes as rights holders who can claim entitlements. Moreover, the Committee recommends that the State party support the global commitment to the decade of action and delivery for sustainable development. Implementing the Goals on the basis of the principles of participation, accountability and non-discrimination would ensure that no one is left behind. In this regard, the Committee draws the State party's attention to its statement on the pledge to leave no one behind.²⁰

77. The Committee requests that the State party disseminate the present concluding observations widely at all levels of society, including at the national and municipal levels, in particular among public officials and judicial authorities, and that it inform the Committee in its next periodic report about the steps taken to implement them. The Committee encourages the State party to engage with the Independent Commission for Human Rights, non-governmental organizations and other members of civil society in the follow-up to the present concluding observations and in the process of consultation at the national level prior to the submission of its next periodic report.

78. In accordance with the procedure on follow-up to concluding observations adopted by the Committee, the State party is requested to provide, within 24 months of the adoption of the present concluding observations, information on the implementation of the recommendations contained in paragraphs 36 (trade union rights), 38 (right to social security) and 44 (protection of the family and children).

79. The Committee requests the State party to submit its second periodic report in accordance with article 16 of the Covenant by 31 October 2028, unless otherwise notified as a result of a change in the review cycle. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 68/268, the word limit for the report is 21,200 words. In addition, it invites the State party to update its common core document, as necessary, in accordance with the harmonized guidelines on reporting under the international human rights treaties.²¹

Introduction

Israel ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women on October 3rd, 1991. The following is the Combined Initial and Second Report submitted by Israel to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women. The Report was commissioned by the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The Report was prepared by: Dr. Ruth Halperin-Kaddari
Bar-Ilan University Faculty of Law

Managing Coordinator: Ms. Atara Kenigsberg, Adv.

Research Assistants: Ms. Lila Margalit, Ms. Skaidrit Bateman, Ms. Elisa
Schwartz, Ms. Naama Heller-Tal, Mr. Shamaï Leibowitz,
Mr. Yehudah Bendekovski (Computer Technician)

Editor: Dr. Susan Kahn

The aim of this Report is to give a comprehensive description of the legal and sociological situation of women in Israel. Accordingly, each chapter will be divided into legal and sociological sections. The detailed questions which formulated by the International Women's Rights Action Watch guided this Report, and will be addressed to the Israeli context.

During the course of the extensive research that was required for the production of this Report, all government ministries, as well as other relevant government institutes, were requested to supply information and data concerning their areas of operation. The information contained in the Report relies heavily on the materials supplied by the various ministries and institutes, as well as on information supplied by NGOs, and on other independent and academic research.

NGOs were significantly involved in the preparation of this report. All the major NGOs that deal with women's rights and women's status in Israel were contacted at the initial stages of the work. The organizations were asked to provide information about their activities, and to offer help in their areas of specialization. In addition, the preparation of this report was announced to the Feminist Conference in October 1996, in which all feminist organizations in Israel participated. Furthermore, an announcement about this project and an appeal for help in obtaining information was placed in the Israel Women's Network newsletter, which reaches over 1500 readers.

Background Facts and Figures About Israel

1. Land and People

1. 1. Geography

With Lebanon to the north, Syria to the northeast, Jordan to the east, Egypt to the southwest and the Mediterranean Sea to the west, Israel's area, within its boundaries and ceasefire lines, is 10,840 square miles (27,800 sq. km.). Long and narrow in shape, it is some 280 miles (450 km.) in length and about 85 miles (135 km.) across at the widest point.

The country may be divided into four geographical regions: three parallel strips running north to south and a large, mostly arid zone in the southern half.

1. 2. Demographics

As of June 1996, the total population of Israel numbered 5,685,500 of whom 4,598,300 were Jews and 1,087,500 were non-Jews. According to the latest figures available for the demographic breakdown of the non-Jewish population in Israel December 1994), at that time 781,500 were Moslems, 157,300 were Christians (Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox) and 91,700 were Druze.

The birthrate in 1995, was 21.1 per thousand while the infant mortality rate was 6.8 per thousand. As of 1993, life expectancy for male Israelis was 75.3 years and for female Israelis, 79.5 years. The total fertility rate was 2.9 per thousand. 29.7% of the population was aged 14 or younger while 9.5% of the population was aged 65 or older.

Israel has a literacy rate of over 95%.

1. 3. The Economy

Israel's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in 1995 was 261.11billion New Israeli Sheqel (NIS) (approximately $85billion). GDP per capita was approximately 46,750 NIS (approximately $15,000). The external debt was $44.28billion.

The dollar exchange rate at the close of 1990 was 2.048 NIS per $1, and at the close of 1995, 3.135 NIS per $1. The annual average of the dollar exchange rate in 1990 was 2.0162, and in 1995, stood at 3.0113.

1. 4. Language

Hebrew and Arabic are the primary languages of instruction in compulsory education and either may be used by a member of the Knesset (Israel's parliament) to address the House. Israel television and radio broadcast in Hebrew, Arabic and, to a lesser extent, English.

2. General Political Structure

2. 1. Recent History

The State of Israel was founded on May 15, 1948. Israel represents the culmination of almost two thousand years of longing of the Jewish People for the reestablishment of an independent state. A guiding principle for all governments of Israel since its inception has been the "Ingathering of the Exiles," the historic return of the Jewish People to its ancestral land. This concept was enshrined in the Declaration of Independence and has continued to be a major component of Israel's national life to the present day.

Major events in Israel's history include its establishment and subsequent War of Independence (1948), the Six Day War of June 1967 and the Yom Kippur War of October 1973. In the words of Israel's Declaration of Independence, the State "extend(s) its hand to all neighboring states in an offer of peace and good neighbourliness".

In 1977 the late President of Egypt, Anwar Sadat, became the first Arab head of state to visit Israel. In 1979 a formal Treaty of Peace was signed between Israel and Egypt. The Madrid Peace Conference was convened in October, 1991. It was the first time that Israel, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan and the Palestinians met in an open and public setting for the specific purpose of negotiating peace. In September 1993 Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles in Washington DC, and in November 1994, Israel and Jordan concluded a peace treaty formally ending 46 years of conflict.

2. 2. Structure of Government

Israel is a parliamentary democracy, consisting of legislative, executive and judicial branches. Its institutions are the Presidency, the Knesset (parliament), the Government (cabinet), the Judiciary and the office of the State Comptroller.

The system is based on the principle of separation of powers, with checks and balances, in which the executive branch (the government) is subject to the confidence of the legislative branch (the Knesset) and the independence of the judiciary is guaranteed by law.

The President, Nasi in Hebrew, is the head of state and his office symbolizes the unity of the state, above and beyond party politics.

Presidential duties, which are primarily ceremonial and formal are defined by law. Amongst the President's formal functions are the opening of the first session of a new Knesset; accepting the credentials of foreign envoys; signing treaties and laws adopted by the Knesset; appointing judges, appointing the Governor of the Bank of Israel and heads of Israel's diplomatic missions abroad; pardoning prisoners and commuting sentences, on the advice of the Minister of Justice.

The President, who may serve two consecutive terms, is elected every five years by a simple majority of the Knesset from among candidates nominated on the basis of their personal stature and contribution to the state.

The Knesset is the House of Representatives of the State of Israel; its main function is to legislate. It took its name and fixed its membership at 120 from the knesset hagedolah (great assembly), the representative Jewish body convened in Jerusalem by Ezra and Nehemiah in the 5th century BCE.

Elections for the Knesset and for the Prime Minister are held simultaneously. They are secret, and the entire country constitutes a single electoral constituency.

The Prime Minister is elected directly by popular vote. Until the 1996 elections, the task of forming a government and heading it was assigned by the president to the Knesset member considered to have the best chance of forming a viable coalition government.

Knesset seats are assigned in proportion to each party's percentage of the total national vote. A party's surplus votes, which are insufficient for an additional seat, are redistributed among the various parties according to their proportional size resulting from the elections, or as agreed between parties prior to the election.

The Knesset operates in plenary sessions and through 12 standing committees: the House Committee; the Foreign Affairs and Security Committee; the Finance Committee; the Economics Committee; the Interior and Environment Committee; the Education and Culture Committee; the Labor and Welfare Committee; the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee, the Immigration and Absorption Committee; the State Control Committee; the Committee on the War Against Drug Addictions; and the Committee for Advancing the Status of Women.

In plenary sessions, general debates are conducted on government policy and activity, as well as on legislation submitted by the government or by individual Knesset members. Debates are conducted in Hebrew, but members may address the house in Arabic, as both are official state languages; simultaneous translation is available.

The Knesset is elected for a tenure of four years, but may dissolve itself or be dissolved by the Prime Minister before the end of its term. Until a new Knesset is formally constituted following elections, full authority remains with the outgoing government.

The Government (Cabinet of Ministers) is the executive authority of the state, charged with administering internal and foreign affairs, including security matters. Its policy-making powers are very wide and it is authorized to take action on any issue which is not delegated by law to another authority. The government usually serves for four years, but its tenure may be shortened by the resignation of the Prime Minister or by a vote of no-confidence.

The ministers are responsible to the Prime Minister for the fulfillment of their duties and accountable for their actions to the Knesset. Most ministers are assigned a portfolio and head a ministry; others serve without a portfolio but may be called upon to take responsibility for special projects. The Prime Minister may also serve as a minister with a portfolio.

The number of ministers including the prime minister, may not exceed eighteen, nor be less than eight. At least half of the ministers must be Knesset members, but all must be eligible candidates for Knesset membership. The prime minister, or another minister with prime ministerial approval, may appoint deputy ministers, up to a total of six; all must be Knesset members.

3. The Judiciary

The absolute independence of the judiciary is guaranteed by law. Judges are appointed by the president, upon recommendation of a special nominations committee comprised of supreme court judges, members of the bar, and public figures. Judges' appointments are for life, with mandatory retirement at age 70.

Magistrates' and District Courts exercise jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases, while juvenile, traffic, military, labor and municipal appeal courts each deal with matters coming under their jurisdiction. There is no trial by jury in Israel.

In matters of personal status such as marriage, divorce, maintenance, guardianship and the adoption of minors, jurisdiction is vested in the judicial institutions of the respective religious communities: The rabbinical court, the Moslem religious courts (sharia courts), the religious courts of the Druze and the juridical institutions of the nine recognized Christian communities in Israel.

The Supreme Court, located in Jerusalem, has nationwide jurisdiction. It is the highest court of appeal on rulings of lower tribunals. In its function as a high court of justice, the Supreme Court hears petitions against any government body or agent, and is the court of first and last instance.

Although legislation is wholly within the competence of the Knesset, the Supreme Court can and does call attention to the desirability of legislative changes; as the High Court of Justice, it has the authority to determine whether a law properly conforms with the Basic Laws of the state.

4. Basic Laws

Israel has no formal constitution. However, most chapters of the prospective constitution have already been written, and enacted as Basic Laws. The following are the Basic Laws of the State of Israel:

The Knesset (1958)

State Lands (1960)

The President (1964)

The State Economy (1975)

The Israel Defense Forces (1976)

Jerusalem (1980)

The Judicature (1984)

The State Comptroller (1988)

Human Dignity and Liberty (1992)

Freedom of Occupation (1992)

The Government (1992)

The Basic Laws are adopted by the Knesset in the same manner as other legislation. Their constitutional import is derived from their nature and, in some of them, from the inclusion of "entrenched clauses" whereby a special majority is required to amend them.

5. The State Comptroller

The State Comptroller carries out external audits and reports on the legality, regularity, economy, efficiency, effectiveness and moral integrity of the public administration in order to assure public accountability. Israel recognized the importance of state audit in a democratic society and in 1949 enacted a law, which established the State Comptroller's Office. Since 1971, the State Comptroller also fulfills the function of Public Complaints

Commissioner (ombudsman) and serves as an address for any person to submit complaints against state and public bodies which are subject to the audit of the comptroller.

The State Comptroller is elected by the Knesset in a secret ballot for a five-year term of office. The Comptroller is responsible only to the Knesset, is not dependent upon the government, and enjoys unrestricted access to the accounts, files and staff of all bodies subject to audit. The Comptroller carries out his/her activities in contact with the Knesset Committee for State Audit Affairs.

The scope of state audit in Israel is among the most extensive in the world. It includes the activities of all government ministries, state institutions, branches of the defense establishment, local authorities, government corporations, state enterprises, and other bodies or institutions declared subject to audit.

In addition, the State Comptroller has been empowered by law to inspect the financial affairs of the political parties represented in the Knesset, including election campaign accounts and current accounts. When irregularities are found, monetary sanctions are imposed.

Definition of Discrimination Against Women

For the purposes of the Convention, the term "discrimination against women" means any distinction, exclusion, or restriction made on the basis of sex which has the effect or purpose of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment, or exercise by women, irrespective of their marital status, on a basis of equality of men and women, of human rights, and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural, or any other field.

1. The Constitutional Level

Israel did not adopt a written constitution upon its establishment. Instead, it has chosen to enact "Basic Laws." In 1992, Israel enacted two new Basic Laws, which addressed human rights guarantees: 1) Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty;

2) Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation. Many jurists in Israel, Chief Justice Barak central among them, refer to these two new basic laws as a "semi-constitution," and identify them as the beginning of the judicial review process in Israeli law, meaning that courts now have the power to strike down legislation that violates basic rights guaranteed by the two Basic Laws and which does not fulfill the requirements of the limitations clause in those laws.

The right to equality is not mentioned specifically as one of the basic rights in the Basic Laws. The source of this omission is the subject of debate among scholars. Some scholars attribute this omission to the problematic history of the right to full-equality in Israeli law due to religious considerations, as will be explained below. However, the more common opinion is the one advanced by Chief Justice Barak, namely that the scope of the basic right to human-dignity is very broad and encompasses various unenumerated human rights, such as the right to equality. This interpretation was approved in a number of Supreme Court cases.

2. Equal Rights Legislation

The constitutional level is but one level of normative regulation. In addition to this level, other legal sources for the creation of human rights exist, and these levels have special significance in Israel due to the lack of a written constitution. First and foremost is Israel's "birth certificate," the Declaration of Independence, which was one of the first of its kind to include sex as a group classification for the purpose of equal social and political rights. The document states: "The State of Israel will maintain equal social and political rights for all citizens, irrespective of religion, race or sex." Although lacking any constitutional force, this document has been interpreted by Israeli courts in such a way that often makes it very close to a constitutional document with constitutional powers.

The first significant legislative effort to implement the principle of gender equality was the enactment of the Women's Equal Rights Law - 1951. The law states in section 1 that one law applies to men and women regarding "any legal action," and that any law that discriminates against a woman as such shall be null and void. The law also equates the legal status of women to that of men. However, as an ordinary statute, this law does not carry any constitutional weight and any subsequent statute prevails over it. Furthermore, even though the law deals specifically with the rights of married women regarding property ownership, and with the rights of women as mothers regarding their children, it excludes the area of marriage and divorce from its jurisdiction. For political- religious reasons, this marriage and divorce exclusionary rule was an a priori condition to the enactment of the law.

Although it lacks constitutional force and can theoretically be revoked by subsequent legislation, the Women's Equal Rights Law - 1951 was given great symbolic value in several Supreme Court cases in which it was labeled "an ideological law, revolutionary, a change of social structure." In many recent Supreme Court cases it was termed as "a majestic legislation."

The Women's Equal Rights Law - 1951 guaranteed equal rights mainly in the public sphere. It referred primarily to the government and to its delegates, and not to private actors in the private sphere. This omission, however, was at least partly repaired by two complementary initiatives, from the legislature and from the judiciary. The legislative effort centered on the area of employment, in both the public and the private sector. Judicial developments supplemented that and enhanced the notion of substantive equality.

3. Judicial Development of the Right to Equality

The judicial contribution in this area is part of an extremely broad effort undertaken by the Israeli Supreme Court, which began during the formative years of Israel's legal system. Lacking a written constitution, the Supreme Court assumed the responsibility for developing an "unwritten Bill of Rights," in which the right to equality and women's rights held an honorary position. The principle of gender equality was declared in the case law to be a fundamental tenet of the Israeli legal system. Like other "unwritten fundamental rights," Knesset legislation which contradicted it could prevail, but it was considered to be of supreme value to secondary legislation, such as administrative regulations and policies. If such practices contradicted the principle of gender equality they could be invalidated by the High Court of Justice, as indeed some of them were. Thus, for example, women were accorded the right to serve on religious municipal councils, and to become members of the election-committee of the municipal rabbi.

Lacking a statutory codification of the general right to equality, except for the Women's Equal Rights Law - 1951, the legal definition of equality and its inverse - discrimination, is found mainly in Israeli case law, and in scattered legislative expressions of the right to equality. Although most of the early cases suggest the implementation of a formal Aristotelian theory of equality, some clearly adopt the concept of substantive equality. Thus, the current legal definition of discrimination evidently fits that of the Convention.

4. The Elimination of Discrimination in the Private Sphere

It is unclear whether discrimination by private institutions and individuals is included in the legal definition of discrimination. Answers need to be deduced from the overall legal framework, including legislation and case law that involve women's rights.

First, the application of the principle of gender equality to private institutions and individuals is part of a larger legal framework known as "the privatization of constitutional norms." The central question here is whether constitutional rights and norms apply equally to relationships between individuals and to the relationships between the government and individuals. In the past few years there has been a growing judicial tendency to apply principles and norms that were developed and recognized in the public sphere to the private sphere. This is particularly true when the “private” sphere contains such “hybrid” entities whose nature could be characterized as both public and private.

Following the Equal Employment Opportunities Law - 1988, which prohibits all forms of discrimination in the workplace, the question of whether the principle of equality applies to the private sphere was resolved with respect to labor market relations. Thus, for example, a Moshav (cooperative settlement), was ordered to abide by the constitutional principle of equality and not to discriminate against women in denying them the possibility of being recognized as “heads” of families. These occasional precedents should be viewed together with other cases that prohibited discrimination by private organizations on other grounds, such as nationality, ethnicity, or sexual orientation. When taken together, one can conclude that there is a consistent trend toward broader application of the right to equality and non-discrimination in the private sphere, while its protection depends on the specific balance between this right and the weight of the rights that may be understood to oppose it.

As to whether domestic violence and battered women are also included under the legal definition of discrimination, legislation that deals with aspects of violence against women suggests that this phenomenon is conceptualized as part of larger legislative concerns about discrimination on the basis of gender. This conclusion is supported, for instance, by themes expressed in the 1996 report issued by the Parliamentary Inquiry Commission on the question of Murder of Women by their Spouses (see Article 5). The report specifically states that the murder of women, and all forms of violence against women, can be understood as expressions of more general discrimination against women in Israeli society.

As to the question of gender discrimination in the domestic sphere, this sphere has been subject to intense regulations that affect women’s status. These regulations, such as the Spouses (Property Relations) Law - 1973; the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law - 1991; and to some degree the Women’s Equal Rights Law - 1951, are all attempts of the civil legal system which suggest that the domestic sphere is not subject to laws which address gender equality.

The UN Convention's Internal Applications and Standing

Israel follows the dualistic approach to international law, whereby international law does not automatically become the law of the country, unless it is customary law. Where conventional law is concerned, it becomes part of the law of the country only insofar as it is incorporated into the local system. Otherwise, although it is binding upon the State on the international level, it cannot be enforced through the local judicial system. However, that is not to suggest that conventional law has no effect on the internal level. It serves as an interpretive tool, and in this capacity it serves as a guideline for monitoring State activities. Thus, there is a presumption that unless otherwise specifically indicated by the legislator, local law must conform to conventional law in force for Israel. Consequently, while CEDAW has no formal status under internal Israeli law, its directives function as an interpretive guide. Indeed, the fact that the UN Convention was ratified in 1991 and the human-rights Basic Laws were enacted in 1992 should be understood to be significantly related, for the Convention clearly had influence on the legislation of the Basic Laws. However, it is only in recent years that the Convention has begun to be invoked in Israeli law-review articles and in Israeli academic circles. It is hoped that these developments will soon reach the judiciary and the legislature.

As mentioned above, there are already several expressions of judicial conjecture regarding gender-equality and discrimination which are in complete conformity with the definitions set in the Convention. The stage is thus set for a more consistent, admissible use of the Convention itself in the legislature and judiciary.

No statutory or other kind of mechanism has yet been set to monitor the implementation of the Convention. However, the proposed Authority for the Advancement of Women Bill - 1996 specifically calls for the establishment of such a mechanism, as a central part of the Authority's other roles and powers. If this bill is passed, then a major advancement in securing women's rights and eliminating any gender discrimination will have been achieved.

Obligations to Eliminate Discrimination

State parties condemn discrimination against women in all its forms, agree to pursue, by all appropriate means and without delay, a policy of eliminating discrimination against women and, to this end, undertake:

- a) To embody the principle of equality of men and women in their national constitutions or other appropriate legislation if not incorporated therein, and to ensure, through law and other appropriate means the practical realization of this principle;*
- b) To adopt appropriate legislative and other measures, including sanctions where appropriate, prohibiting all discrimination against women;*
- c) To establish legal protection of the rights of women on an equal basis with men and to ensure through competent national tribunals and other public institutions the effective protection of women against any act of discrimination;*
- d) To refrain from engaging in any act or practice of discrimination against women and to ensure that public authorities and institutions shall act in conformity with this obligation;*
- e) To take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women by any person, organization, or enterprise;*
- f) To take all appropriate measures, including legislation, to modify or abolish existing laws, regulations, customs, and practices which constitute discrimination against women;*
- g) To repeal all national penal provisions which constitute discrimination against women.*

1. Legal Provisions

As explained under Article 1, Israel has no comprehensive constitution. The objectives of the Convention are realized through the provisions of specific pieces of legislation. These will be described in detail under the relevant articles. Since 1991, when Israel ratified the Convention, several especially noteworthy pieces of legislation have been enacted (all of them to be discussed in more detail in appropriate chapters below): the Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law - 1996, the implementation of which remains somewhat precarious despite its clearly extensive potential; The Single Parent Family Law - 1991; the 1993 amendment to the Government Companies Law - 1975; the 1995 amendment to the State Service (Appointments) Law - 1959 (both amendments direct the use of affirmative action); the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law - 1991; and more.

2. Legal Recourse Available for the Pursuit of Women's Rights

One of the main obstacles standing in the way of the full implementation of women's rights and the advancement of women's status in Israel is the lack of a central organization to process complaints of women whose rights have been violated or who have suffered gender discrimination. The establishment of such an organization is a central goal of the proposed Authority for the Advancement of Women Bill - 1996, which would establish a national machinery for the protection and promotion of women's rights and status.

Until this bill is passed and such an Authority and ombuds-person are established, the formal-governmental mechanisms presently available for women include: the general Public Complaint's Commissioner; the Ministry of Labour's Division for Employment and the Status of Women; the Labour Courts system; and, when the Civil Service is involved, the Superintendent over Discipline in the Civil Service or the General Supervisor on the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service. Another governmental de-facto mechanism is the office of the Prime-Minister's Advisor on the Status of Women.

In addition to the formal-governmental mechanisms, there are several legal-aid lines and services operated by women's NGOs, such as the Na'amat Legal Council and the Israel Women's Network (IWN) Legal Commission, which give initial legal or other advice to women and which occasionally provide pro bono representation, mainly in precedent-setting cases. These mechanisms will be described under Article 3.

Only four (!) complaints to the Public Complaints Commissioner, out of a total of 6000-8000 per year since 1971, concerned gender discrimination or other violations of women's rights. Three of these complaints involved sexual harassment. The fourth involved a woman pilot who was refused employment by El-Al, the national Israeli air-carrier, which claimed to have excluded her as the result of a general policy of hiring only IDF air-force veterans. In addition, since 1990, 40 complaints were made to the Public Complaint Commissioner concerning insufficient police investigation of intra-family violence or untimely closure of such investigations. Complaints concerning untimely closure of police investigations are not investigated by the Commissioner, since these are handled under judicial appeal of police decisions.

3. Governmental Machineries, Mechanisms and Measures Established to Promote the Status of Women

3. 1. Investigative and Study Initiatives by the Government

The 1975 International Year for Women served as a trigger for the designation of an ad hoc Commission on the Status of Women, appointed by the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and headed by Ora Namir, then a member of the Knesset (Labor Party), who later became Minister of Labor and Social Affairs.

3. 1. 1. General Examination of the Overall Status of Women in Israel

The Commission's main function was to investigate the issue of the status of women in Israel; it acted mainly as a fact-finding body but was also asked to present the government with proposals as to the social, cultural, educational, economic and legal measures that need to be taken in order to promote equality between men and women in all areas of life in Israel.

The Commission presented its report and recommendations in February 1978. The report made it clear that Israeli society had not been providing answers to the unique problems and obstacles that women faced in their struggle for full equality and participation. The Commission supplied the government with a list of 241 comprehensive recommendations and detailed proposals on how to improve the existing situation. These recommendations had the potential to serve as a blueprint for women's equality, yet few of them were adopted and implemented. An investigation conducted by Israel Women's Network (IWN) in 1988 revealed that out of the 241 recommendations only 32 had been fully implemented, 39 had been partially implemented, and the rest (170) had not been implemented at all.

3. 1. 2. Examination of Women's Status in Civil-Service

The Israeli government is the largest employer in Israel, and almost 60% (59.4%) of civil-servants are women. In 1989, the Koberski Commission finished its investigation of the civil service in Israel, which included a special report on the status of women in the civil service. The Commission's conclusions made it clear that discrimination against women is the major cause of women's low status in the service.

In order to implement recommendations for the improvement of the status of women, a sub-committee was established by the Ministry of Economics and Planning called the Ben-Israel subcommittee. This committee presented its proposals in December 1993. The proposals included specific directives for ensuring women's participation in tender committees; improving the function of the supervisors on the status of women in the different ministries; and securing firmer treatment of sexual harassment. Most of these proposals were adopted and incorporated into the Civil Service Code, and are in the process of being implemented.

These proposals include: 1) the decision to make the former requirement that both sexes be represented in tender committees mandatory (an exception to be made in unique cases upon the prior approval of the Commissioner), and negating the force of the decision of any committee that fails to uphold this requirement; 2) publication of a worker's rights manual for women employees in the civil service, prepared by the general-supervisor; 3) the preparation and dissemination of information and data regarding the status of women in the service among women organizations and Knesset committees; 4) the joint establishment of a Progressive Employer Award granted by the Na'amat women's organization, the Coalition of Industrialists, and the Union of Local Authorities, to be awarded to the public employer who demonstrates the greatest commitment to the advancement of women.

In addition, members of tender committees were specifically instructed not to present candidates with questions which discriminate on the basis of sex.

Other changes were made in the Civil Service Code, reflecting the progress made in recent years concerning the advancement of women. For example, the provisions that relate to family members that may accompany an employee who is being sent overseas on a mission were changed from the gender-specific term of "wife," to the gender-neutral term of "spouse," thus providing men and women employees with equal opportunities to be sent on foreign service missions. With respect to the accommodation of motherhood, the former prohibition on employing a woman who is the mother of small children in overtime work was changed so as to let her choose whether or not to work overtime.

To conclude, it should be added that there is ongoing independent academic research in the areas of women studies, women's rights, and the status of women in Israel.

3.2. Specific Mechanisms Implemented for the Improvement of the Status of Women

3.2.1. The Prime-Minister's Advisor on the Status of Women

The office of the Prime Minister's Advisor on the Status of Women, established in 1980 following the Namir Commission's recommendations, was charged with the task of advising the Prime Minister on all issues pertaining to women, and with coordinating the government's actions with relation to the status of women. The office, however, was not provided with special resources and its budget was to be drawn from the general budget of the Prime Minister's bureau. In addition, in 1992 the late Prime-Minister Rabin abolished the office of Prime Minister's Advisors altogether, including the office of the Advisor on the Status of Women. In its place, he formed a steering committee to reframe the structure of both the office of the Advisor and the function of the National Authority (described below). A new Advisor on the Status of Women was appointed in November 1993.

Following the 1996 elections, the government appointed a new Advisor on the Status of Women, and charged her with the task of putting together a campaign against family-violence, described under Article 5 below. The Advisor has also been charged with the task of composing the Israeli Report to the March 1997 UN Convention on the Status of Women, which describes the measures taken following the Beijing Conference. It is hoped that the position of the Office of the Advisor, together with the National Authority, will be promoted by the anticipated passage of the National Authority Bill, and that its operation will be facilitated by a separate budget and facilities.

3.2.2 Special Mechanisms: National Council and Authority on the Status of Women

3.2.2. The statutory Authority's functions, as set in the proposed bill, will include: 1) the formulation of policy regarding gender equality and the elimination of discrimination against women; 2) the coordination and promotion of cooperation between state government, municipalities and others in the area of women's status; 3) advising the ministries on the implementation of equality laws (particularly on the implementation of the CEDAW Convention); 4) the establishment of special programs and services for women which promote gender equality; 5) the establishment of a research and public information center; and 6) the promotion of legislative measures for the advancement of women and the elimination of discrimination. The Prime-Minister's Advisor on the Status of Women will be in charge of both the Authority and a proposed Council, to be comprised of 34 members from various government offices and organizations, including representatives from women's organizations and academia. The Council's main role will be to outline policy for the Authority. In addition to the Authority, the bill also establishes the office of Commissioner for Women's Affairs, whose role it will be to handle direct complaints from the public concerning violations of women's rights or discrimination on the basis of gender. The Commissioner is to have investigatory powers equal to those of the general Public Complaints Commissioner, including the power to demand any documents and records necessary for the investigation. One deficiency in the current version of the bill is the lack of a provision calling for an independent budget for the Office of the Advisor. The present version simply states that the budget is to be allocated from the general budget of the Prime-Minister's Office.

3.2.3. The Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women

An unusual coalition of women Knesset members from across the political map established the Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women in 1992. The Committee has been instrumental in promoting important legislative measures and in raising awareness of women's concerns. The Committee has made significant contributions to the efforts to improve women's status and to focus public attention on "women's issues."

In January 1996, the Committee was granted the status of a permanent (standing) Knesset Committee, with the following tasks: 1) the advancement of women's equality in public representation, education, and personal status; 2) the prevention of discrimination on the basis of sex or sexual orientation in all areas; 3) the reduction of wage gaps in the economy and in the labor market; and 4) the elimination of violence against women. The Committee consists of 15 members (of whom 8 are currently men), and the chair rotates between two members, from the coalition and the opposition parties, respectively. Currently, the Committee operates three sub-committees on: 1) the advancement of women in the workplace and in the economy; 2) the advancement of Arab women; and 3) personal status. All other matters are dealt with by the Committee as a whole.

Among the recent legislation facilitated by the Committee's work are the Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law - 1996; the State Service (Appointments) Law (Appropriate Representation) (Amendment no. 7) - 1995 which introduces affirmative action into the civil service; the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law (amendment no. 2) - 1996; Family Court Law - 1995. All in all, over 40 legislative measures relating to the advancement of women's status have been passed since the establishment of the Committee. In addition, the Committee has also utilized other parliamentary means, such as the establishment and operation of the parliamentary investigative committee on women's murder by their spouses, discussed under Article 5 below.

The Committee's contribution to the advancement of women extends beyond the formal level of parliamentary performance to the more informal level of women's alliance building and coordination of activities for furthering the common goal of mobilization and social change. The Committee maintains close contacts with women's NGOs, and representatives from various NGOs regularly attend their meetings. Thus, for example, the Committee took upon itself to serve as the forum where all women's NGOs submitted their reports on measures taken following the Beijing Conference. It also receives input from women in senior positions in business and academia. It thus serves as a forum where women's voices are officially heard, and as a forum for political mobilization around women's issues.

3.3. Governmental Performance in Civil-Service

In April 1985, the government adopted an additional recommendation of the Namir commission and decided that in each of the government ministries a supervisor on the status of women workers would be appointed. The roles that these supervisors were assigned include: 1) acting for the implementation of equal opportunities for women employees in all areas of the service; 2) monitoring the obligation to include women in all professional committees and in tender committees; 3) developing special tracks for the promotion of women; 4) acting for an increase in the percentage of women in top positions in the civil service; 5) handling women employees' complaints of gender discrimination, including sexual harassment complaints; and 6) preparing annual reports about progress made in this area. As with the Office of the Prime Minister's Advisor on the Status of Women, the decision did not allocate a special budget nor did it provide for additional supervisors for its implementation. Nevertheless, most ministries have appointed such supervisors. Several programs were established to facilitate their operation including a three-day seminar in which supervisors were supplied with theoretical tools to accomplish their task.

The April 1985 government decision to appoint the supervisors was part of a general resolution to promote the status of women in the civil service. Another important part of the resolution was the provision mentioned above, whereby women participate as members in every tender committee or professional committee. Other parts of the resolution, in addition to expressing commitment toward the advancement of women in civil service, ordered the establishment of a committee that would monitor the implementation of the whole resolution.

The departing Civil Service Commissioner designated a special post for the appointment of a general-supervisor on the advancement of women in the civil service, who is to be in charge of all matters concerning women and their advancement in the service and who reports directly to the Commissioner. The incoming Civil Service Commissioner proposed a reform in the civil service, which specifically included a plan to ensure the promotion of women in the service to senior positions. The effects of this reform can be seen in the 1996 establishment of a new unit in the Civil Service Commission, which is responsible for hiring and promoting women in the civil service. At the head of this Commission stands the general-supervisor mentioned above, assisted by a steering committee. In addition to handling issues related to the status of women in the civil-service, this supervisor is in charge of implementing the 1995 amendment to the State Service (Appointments) Law (Appropriate Representation) (Amendment no. 7) - 1995.

An affirmative action policy was introduced into the civil-service through the State Service (Appointments) Law (Adequate Representation) (Amendment no. 7) - 1995. This amendment obligates the Civil Service Commissioner to use all necessary means to achieve the appropriate representation of both sexes in the civil service. The initial guidelines for the implementation of this amendment require the issuance of a report from the Commission to the various ministries, and vice-versa, regarding 1) the numbers and ranks of women in the service; 2) upcoming vacancies; 3) the rate of women in top positions in each ministry relative to their overall rate in the ministry; 4) the number of women selected in internal and external tenders; 5) the number of women holding personal contracts; and 6) the participation of male and female employees in seminars, educational tours abroad and so on, to assure adequate participation of women in these areas.

Other actions adopted by the Civil Service Commission following the 1995 amendment include the reading of the amendment to committee members at the beginning of every tender-committee section, with an emphasis on the explicit provision that preference be given to the candidate of the lesser represented sex, when the candidates' qualifications for the office are similar.

3.4. Mechanisms for the Advancement of Women in Specific Government Ministries

Foremost among the specific mechanisms regarding the improvement of the status of women in the various government ministries is the Division for Employment and Status of Women in the Labour Ministry. Until February 1996, this Division was in charge of the implementation and enforcement of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law - 1988. The Division is responsible for various other aspects related to women's work; including: 1) the development of childcare programs; 2) the subsidization and supervision of childcare programs which are operated by women's organizations; 3) the provision of vocational training for unskilled women and for women who want to enter non-traditional fields of work; and 4) the dissemination of information and materials regarding women's rights, with specific focus on women's employment, and more.

3. 5. Measures Taken on the Municipal Level

As explained under Article 7 below, women's representation on the municipal level in Israel is only slightly more substantial than their representation on the national level. One measure that has been taken in order to compensate for the lack of formal representation on the municipal level is the nomination of an Advisor on the Advancement of Women in Local Authorities, appointed in 1994 by the Chair of the Union of Local Authorities in Israel. This appointment, supported by the Prime-Minister's Advisor on the Status of Women, reflects a change of attitude among municipal authorities by recognizing the need to take women's concerns more seriously. The Advisor is a member of the central administration of the Union of Local Authorities in Israel, and her policy was drafted by a Committee on the Status of Women. This Committee is composed of several members, mainly women members of local councils and is presently headed by the only woman who was elected as a head of a local council. On the basis of a decision made by the Administrator of the Union of Local Authorities, this Committee participates in all assemblies of heads of municipalities. The Advisor is in charge of establishing Women's Councils in each local council in Israel. So far, seventy such Women's Councils have been established in Israel, of which eight are in Arab localities. In addition, the Advisor is involved in promoting legislation dealing with women's daily concerns on the municipal level and cooperates closely with the Ministry of Labour and Welfare on issues such as shelters for battered women.

The aim of the establishment of local Women's Councils is to designate a special forum within which women's particular concerns and needs can be addressed. Among the tasks of these councils are: 1) coordination between all women's organizations in the specific locality for the purpose of fulfilling women's local needs; 2) promotion of special educational programs on gender equality, prevention of family violence, and technological education for girls; 3) advancement of the institution of the long school-day and better day-care facilities; 4) provision of services for women with special needs such as single mothers, older women, immigrant women and Arab women; 5) advancement of municipal legislation for opening government and municipal bureaus in the afternoons and in the evenings; and more. The Women's Councils' work-plan is based upon the model provided by the first Women's Council established in Haifa in 1978, by the current Advisor on the Advancement of Women in Local Authorities. Each of the Councils is headed by a woman who also acts as the Advisor on the Status of Women to the Head of the Municipal Council.

The main problem that these measures for the advancement of women are faced with is financial. Once again, no special budget was allocated for the full implementation of these plans. Currently there is an initiative before the Knesset to pass special legislation that would mandate the institution of Women's Councils in every municipality. However, the bill does not contain a provision for the allocation of a budget to finance the Councils and the work of the Advisors. So far, the work of the Women's Councils and their Chairs has been generally uncompensated and is voluntary.

The Development and Advancement of Women

States Parties shall take in all fields, in particular in the political, social, economic and cultural fields, all appropriate measures, including legislation, to ensure the full development and advancement of women, for the purpose of guaranteeing them the exercise and enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms on a basis of equality with men.

1. Non-Governmental Women's Organizations in Israel

1. 1. Introduction

Women's NGOs have always played a major role in advancing the status of women in Israel by changing the public perceptions of women, promoting women's role in the public and private spheres, operating day-care centers, operating emergency-lines for female victims of violence, operating shelters for battered women, and more. In addition, these NGOs have managed to put many of these issues on the public and government agendas.

The exact number of women's NGOs operating in Israel is estimated at 100. They vary tremendously in size, ideology, socio-economic characteristics of their members, activities, goals, and so on. Some concentrate on providing services to single-parent families, others to lesbian women, Arab women, and so on. The following paragraphs do not represent a comprehensive overview of all of these organizations; instead only a selection of the more major organizations are presented.

1. 2. Jewish Women's Organizations

The Israel Women's Network (IWN), founded in 1984, is known as one of the largest and most visible of women's organizations in Israel. The IWN works for the advancement of the status of women in Israel through education, legislation and legal activities. Committees of specialists have been set up on the topics of health, law, municipal and parliamentary work, violence in the family, and media/public relations. The Network works to end all discrimination against women and for equal representation of women in all political and public positions. The founders of the Network believed that women's status could best be advanced through legal action and political pressure, not through providing welfare. Training courses are offered through the Network to women aspiring to political careers. Some of the Network's concrete activities include: 1) the maintenance of a resource and information center; 2) the publication of a newsletter; and 3) the operation of a legal aid hotline.

Na'amat - the Movement of Working Women and Volunteers, was founded in 1921 by idealistic women committed to equal rights for women and their empowerment; it is presently the largest women's movement in Israel. Na'amat is affiliated with the Histadrut, the largest workers' union in Israel and currently operates more than 100 local branches in workers' councils, 60 community centers, 250 neighborhood club rooms, and 40 legal offices. It also operates 350 day-care centers, and 14 vocational training schools. Its activities encompass almost all aspects of women's life in Israel, ranging from various family issues and needs (such as family-violence, single-parent families, and adoption), through employment and professional training, to legal activities, legislative initiatives and public representation. Following the Beijing Conference, Na'amat formulated a symbolic "Contract with the Women of Israel," signed by both the government of Israel and the women of Israel through Na'amat as their representative. In this symbolic contract, which was based on the Beijing Platform for Action, the government was to allocate a specific budget for the implementation of the Platform.

WIZO (Women's International Zionist Organization), was established in 1920 and is the second largest women's association in Israel. WIZO is primarily a non-political charity organization run by volunteers. In its early years, WIZO established mother and child clinics, day care centers, training courses for homemaking, agricultural schools and youth centers. Gradually, the organization has become more focused on social change and empowerment of women. WIZO has played a major role in bringing the problem of battered women to public attention, and has established shelters and hotlines for battered women and rape victims. In addition, WIZO operates 160 day-care centers, helps in the absorption and care for new immigrants, senior citizens and single-parent families, and offers legal advice to women, mainly on family issues. Most of WIZO's resources are derived from contributions solicited abroad.

Emunah is the largest Orthodox women's Zionist organization in Israel and is the woman's division of the National Religious Party. Emunah's activities focus on community, educational and welfare work, through a network of 110 day-care centers, 4 children's homes, 6 high schools, and a women's college. It is involved in the absorption of new immigrants and works to strengthen the family unit through family counseling services, legal advice to women on family issues, and through parenting groups.

The Feminist Movement was established in the early 1970s, and is one of the more radical women's movements in Israel; it focuses on body politics, abortion, and battered women and members of the Feminist Movement established the first shelters for battered women in Haifa and Herzliya. Since its establishment, the Feminist Movement has worked in the following areas: equal opportunity for women in education and work; the rights of divorced women; fair representation of women in politics; the fight against pornography and negative female images in the media. . During the 1980s, the Feminist Movement expanded its agenda to include issues of war and peace The Feminist Movement offers courses on a variety of subjects, puts out a newsletter and operates a library on feminism.

Isha le'Isha (Woman to Woman) - the Haifa Feminist Center, strives to fight against physical, sexual and psychological violence towards women, to improve existing services for the special needs of women, and to create conditions for cooperation between women from different social groups and backgrounds. To this end, it operates a project for adult women immigrants from Russia; an employment and absorption project for Ethiopian women immigrants; a project for Palestinian women; a project for women of oriental origins, and employment projects for women returning to work. In addition, they offer a range of courses including mechanics, car maintenance, self defense and basketball.

1. 3. Organizations for the Advancement of Arab Women

Few women's organizations have been set up by Arab women for Arab women in Israel. Recently, non-governmental Arab movements have begun to encourage women's participation in order to obtain foreign aid and support from international organizations that provide funds for weaker sectors in developing societies, such as women.

1. 3. 1. Arab Organizations for the Promotion of Women

Taandi, the Movement of Democratic Women, was founded in 1951 as the women's "division" of the Communist Party known today as Hadash (the Democratic Front for Equality and Peace), was the first organization to offer Arab women the opportunity for political involvement. By the 1970s, the Women's Democratic Movement enjoyed the active support of many Arab village women. Among Taandi's achievements are the establishment and maintenance of 33 kindergartens in Arab villages and the celebration of March 8 as an International Women's Day in Arab sectors. The organization also provided vocational training for Arab village women, particularly in sewing. However, while the leaders of Hadash as well as the leaders of other Arab parties who established women's divisions in the 1970s (such as the Progressive Arab Party and the Democratic Arab Party) were known to be proud of the achievements of their women's division, they did not actually integrate them into the inner workings of the parties.

The Arraba Almostakbal Association is a community organization established to encourage women from the Arab village of Arraba to participate in public social life. The association offers courses in traditional occupations like sewing, as well as vocational courses. The association models itself after "Gafra," the Movement of Palestinian and Arab Women in Israel, founded in the town of Taibe in 1990 in order to promote Palestinian women socially, economically, and politically. These organizations are currently waging a campaign against the widespread practice of arranged marriages in Arab villages.

Al-Fanar (the lighthouse), also known as "The Movement of Palestinian Feminists," was established in 1990, as an informal study group on the status and treatment of women in Arab society. Since its establishment, the organization has primarily dedicated itself to fighting "honor" killings (the number of "honor" related murders per year is estimated between 20-40.) The organization considers acts of violence against women to be byproducts of the patriarchal structure of Palestinian society, and opposes it in the most radical fashion of all Palestinian Women's groups. Al-Fanar protests arranged marriages of women to their relatives, sexual and other physical assaults on women by their husbands and male relatives, denial of education and job opportunities to women who are taken out of school as teenagers to carry out domestic chores, and the spread of defamatory rumors and gossip about women as a means of controlling their behavior.

The organization has attracted widespread criticism for its radicalism from Arab political parties, and from the growing Islamic fundamentalist movement. On several occasions Al-Fanar's members have reportedly been threatened. However, a growing number of women have responded to Al-Fanar's advertisements for help, including assistance from a Jewish-run shelter for battered women. Currently, Al-Fanar runs on a modest budget and is supported almost entirely by its members, though it has registered as a non-profit organization and is seeking contributions. It publishes a quarterly newsletter which is distributed door-to-door, and has published articles in Israeli Arab newspapers. While no accurate information is available as to the characteristics of its members, most of its members are believed to be single university graduates who reside in Haifa.

1.3.2. Other Organizations Which Promote Arab Women

Na'amat, the largest women's organization in Israel, is composed of both Jewish and Arab women and has opened branches in many Arab villages. As of 1987, Na'amat established 70 centers for vocational training and social activities in Arab villages and cities. However, Arab women have complained that the services provided for them are not proportional to their representation amongst the members of Na'amat and more funds should be allocated to services in the Arab sector. For example, only 5.17% of the daycare centers established by Na'amat have been established in Arab villages.

The Israeli League for the Promotion of Human Rights provides legal support for Arab women, particularly regarding labor disputes. The legal support is advertised through informative pamphlets put out by the organization in Arabic.

1.4. Associations of Women's Organizations

The Council of Women's Organizations in Israel: An umbrella organization that connects Emunah, Na'amat, WIZO, ANALI - Liberal Women's Organizations, Bnai Brith Women, Hadassa - Israel, Israel Association of University Women, Soroptomist International of Israel, and Women's Israel ORT, this Council represents Israel in the International Convention of Women and the International Convention of Jewish Women, both of which have advisory status to the UN. The Council's activities include: representing Israeli NGOs in international organizations, transferring information on the activities of these organizations to those outside Israel, and bringing information to Israel on activities regarding women which are being initiated in international organizations and in institutions of the UN.

ICAR - International Coalition for Agunah Rights, Established in 1993 in response to the plight of Jewish women who are refused a divorce, ICAR's purpose is to raise public awareness of this issue and to prompt the Jewish religious establishment in Israel and abroad to create solutions to the problem.

The Coalition of Help Centers for Victims of Sexual Attacks, collects and publishes statistical data and evaluations of the seven battered women's shelters in Israel in an annual report on the centers' activities. It also offers activities to raise public awareness about battered women and offers volunteer training courses for those who wish to work in battered women's shelters.

Acceleration of Equality Between Men and Women

Adoption by State Parties of temporary measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality between men and women shall not be discrimination as defined in the present Convention, but shall in no way entail, as a consequence, the maintenance of unequal or separate standards; these measures shall be discontinued when the objectives of equality of opportunity and treatment have been achieved.

Adoption by State Parties of special measures, including those measures contained in the present Convention, aimed at protecting maternity, shall not be considered discriminatory.

1. Affirmative Action

1. 1. Affirmative Action in Government Corporations

The primary expression of affirmative action in Israeli law is section 18A of the Government Corporations Law - 1975, which was added in a 1993 amendment to the statute.

Currently, the most expansive formulation of affirmative action under Israeli law is the 1994 Supreme Court case of Israel Women's Network v. The Government of Israel (hereinafter the IWN case), which accepted the IWN's petition to void appointments of three men to the board of directors in two governmental corporations in which there were no women members. Justice Matsa's opinion, writing for the majority, is of particular significance, as it contains rigorous statements and far-reaching suggestions about the practice of affirmative action. Justice Matsa takes care to clarify from the beginning that section 18A is not simply a statutory embodiment of the well-entrenched right to equality, but the constitution of a novel norm which positively imposes proper representation of both genders in boards of directors and administrative councils of governmental and statutory corporations. Justice Matsa emphasizes the remedial purpose of the amendment, which aims at correcting the social distortion of women's minimal representation by means of positively imposing the norm of affirmative action. He then goes on to describe the special legislative measures which were essential for the entrenchment of gender equality, as opposed to the general acceptance of the principle of equality at large. In a clear statement, Justice Matsa concludes that the low representation of women in governmental corporations' boards of directors is but one manifestation of the discrimination women face in Israeli society; he notes that this discrimination is not specifically intended nor ideologically mandated, but caused by internalized social norms and practices.

In an elaborate dictum, Justice Matsa rejects the notion that the approval of affirmative action was meant only as a temporary-extraordinary measure intended to specifically correct past discrimination, and not to maintain present and future social balance, and calls for its acceptance as an integral part and a main guarantee of the principle of equality, similar to the Canadian approach. Justice Matsa proposes to interpret section 18A in the context of the comprehensive social need to advance women's share in the labour market in general, and in managerial positions in particular. This statement, together with the adoption of the broad interpretation of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom which incorporates the right to equality in the private sphere, initiates a movement towards legislative reform that would introduce an affirmative action policy into every part of the labor market, whether public or private.

1. 2. Affirmative Action in the Civil Service

In July 1995, the Knesset passed an amendment to the Civil Service Law (Appointments), proposed as a private bill by Member of Knesset (MK) Dedi Tzucker. The amendment incorporates the practice of affirmative action into the civil service. The Civil Service Council supported the passage of the amendment, and participated in the deliberations surrounding the proposal. The amendment mandates appropriate representation of both sexes in the civil service, and requires the Civil Service Commissioner to act toward the achievement of this goal. Affirmative action is defined in the amendment as "preference given to the candidates who belongs to the gender that is not appropriately represented, where the two candidates' capabilities are comparable," (see Article 2).

1. 3. Public Perceptions Regarding Affirmative Action

A survey conducted in April 1996 to examine the public's perceptions of women's participation in politics revealed some very interesting results (hereinafter - Women in Israeli Politics Survey). The survey revealed general support for the use of affirmative action, especially among women. Affirmative action was seen as particularly important in national and local politics, but also in the labour market.

Most women think there is a need for affirmative action through the use of a quota system: 64% claim parties should ensure places on their election lists for women, 60% claim this should be done in other public institutes as well, and 51% think women should be given preference in the labour market. The differences in men's and women's perceptions are consistent, and most men (64%) clearly object to affirmative action for women in the workplace.

1. 4. Affirmative Action in Other Areas

There are already signs of positive adoption of the principle of affirmative action in other areas beside employment in the labour market. In the area of sports, for example, new programs have been designed which allocate larger budgets to women's teams and to schools that operate such teams.

2. Special Measures Aimed at Protecting Maternity

The Equal Employment Opportunity Law - 1988 contains provisions which are remarkably similar to the second section of Article 4 of the Convention. The law prohibits discrimination in the workplace, whether based on gender, sexual orientation, marital status, parenthood, race, age, religion, nationality, country of birth, political or other orientation. Neither governmental nor private employers may take the above classifications into account in determining hiring, promotion, termination of employment, training, or work and retirement conditions of employees, except in special cases where the unique nature of the position makes these classifications relevant. Protections offered to women employees which take into account their special needs as women or mothers are not to be considered discriminatory, although the law specifies that any such rights offered to working mothers must equally be given to men who either have sole custody of their children, or whose wives work and have chosen not to make use of these provisions.

The specific contents of these measures are described in detail under Article 11 below. It should be added that overall, there is a steady movement away from protective-paternalistic legislation that limits women's participation in the workforce, to legislation which recognizes the need to support the family-unit as a whole and which facilitates greater involvement of fathers in child-rearing, while maintaining the exclusive special rights of women in those specific areas where women's maternal needs are directly connected to birth itself.

In addition to the legislative provisions accomodating motherhood and parenthood, there are specific provisions in collective agreements that grant working mothers special benefits such a shorter work-day, or the option of flexible working-hours, as in the Civil-Service, to fit their maternal obligations. These accommodations in collective agreements are generally granted to mothers alone.

ARTICLE 5 Sex Roles and Stereotyping

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures:

- a) To modify the social and cultural patterns of conduct of men and women, with a view to achieving the elimination of prejudices and customary and all other practices which are based on the idea of the inferiority or the superiority of either of the sexes or on stereotyped roles for men and women;*
- b) To ensure that family education includes a proper understanding of maternity as a social function and the recognition of the common responsibility of men and women in the upbringing and development of their children, it being understood that the interest of the children is the primordial consideration in all cases.*

1. Introduction

The discussion under this Article will be divided into several parts. The first part will describe women and the media in Israel, including stereotypes of women and pornography, as well as the role of women in the pornography industry. Next, select cultural and social phenomena which hamper women's advancement in society will be discussed, including: 1) the impact of religion on the status of women; 2) the specific problems facing immigrant women; 3) social factors that specifically affect Arab women in Israel; and 4) gender based violence.

2. Women Employed in the Media

A discussion of women's involvement in the Israeli media industry must be separated from a discussion of the portrayal of women in the Israeli media. The field of journalism is in the midst of a "feminization" process; the number of women in the media is increasing, and women are taking over many positions, at both high and low levels. It is hoped that the advancement of women in the field of journalism will soon have an effect on the prevalent stereotypes of women in the media, which in the past were promulgated by a male dominated media industry.

Contrary to images of women presented in the media, women who work in the media are part of a system in which progress in gender equality is clearly being made. In the years 1989-1990, 44% of the 211 new members of the various reporter unions were women, and in 1994, 49.6% of the total 274 newspaper workers were women. Among 136 local papers, 36 had a woman as editor. In addition, a woman currently acts as head of the Israel Broadcast Committee, as well as the National Committee for Cable (the two broadcasting bodies in the country.)

A study by Y. Limor and D. Caspi (1994) provided figures on the issue of women of in the Israeli press. Their studies show that throughout the years, women have been holding an increasing percentage of positions. For example, the following table shows the increase in numbers and percentages of members, active and otherwise, of the newspaper organization (in Tel-Aviv and Jerusalem).

Table 1 - Active Members of the Newspaper Organization

A second chart displays the same growth; through a breakdown by years of the number of women reporters of the major Israeli newspapers:

2. 1. Rank of Women's Positions

Much of Israel's electronic media is under the authority of The Israel Broadcast Authority. In this body much has been done in response to complaints of inequality directed at the media. Though women are obtaining high-ranking positions in newspapers, radio and television, the majority of central positions in editing and management remain in the hands of men. Although three women serve as editors of the weekend supplements of major papers, overall, women still comprise a minority of editors. The following table presents the breakdown of managers in the Broadcast Authority (1994), to illustrate the differences between men and women in upper level positions.

As of 1995, the number of women versus men in the various forms of the media shows that women still make up less than half of the positions. Note that among the Arab language broadcasts, the differences are much greater.

A decision by the Authority prompted the establishment of a Committee for the Status of Women in the Broadcasting Authority. In addition, as the result of a joint initiative of the Committee, the Broadcast Authority, the Israel Women's Network, and the participants themselves, a series of courses on "Women in Broadcasting" began in November 1996. The goal of the course was to enable women in influential positions in the Broadcast Authority to gain professional experience in an educational forum. An additional goal was to strengthen the self awareness of women in the business world in general and the field of media specifically. Due to its success, there are plans to continue the course in the future.

3. Women and Media in Israel

3. 1. Representation of Women in the Media

Israel was among 71 countries which participated in Media Watch's global media monitoring project. The results of the report clearly illustrate discrepancies between the number of male and female journalists and interviewees in Israel as opposed to other countries. Invariably, the numbers for Israel are lower than the global average.

Source: Israel Women's Network

3. 2. Content Relevant to Women

An additional category researched in the report was the number of stories that deal with issues deemed specifically relevant to woman. As the following chart shows, Israel's overall average is well below the global average, but this is due to uneven distribution among the different mediums; on television, Israel is actually above the global average.

Table 7 - Percentage of Stories Dealing with Women's Issues

Medium	Global %	Israeli %
Newspapers	15	0
Radio	10	8.5
Television	9	10

Research on television in Israel revealed that women are often presented differently than men. Women are generally introduced by their first name, sex, family status, and a supporting description (the wife of, the niece of, etc.) while men are introduced by a description of their function, their professional grade, their full name, and family name. The same held true for a study of the written press.

In June 1995, an attempt was made to remedy this discrepancy in representation through a joint effort of the Israel Women's Network and the Broadcasting Authority. The aim of this action was to increase the number of women invited as guests to the radio and television industry, and to thereby combat the great discrimination in numbers mentioned above.

3. 3. Advertising

A review of the text and images used in Israeli advertising reveals widespread exploitation of female stereotypes. Women are often portrayed as helpless, dependent, ineffectual, emotional, vulnerable, subordinate, childish, and plain stupid (Lemish, in print). Overall, images used on Israeli television and advertising transmit an almost singular message: women are marginal to the political, cultural, and economic development of society.

For example, in a study called "Representation of the Sexes and Sexist Stereotypes Appearing in Advertising in the Israeli press" it was revealed that men were portrayed in advertisements as professionals 179 times, as opposed to 83 times for women, and that women's exposed body parts appeared more often than men's. These representations create a certain perception of a woman's role in the business world, and of women as sexual objects. Studies have also shown that women are used to advertise relatively cheap products, while more expensive products are advertised by men.

3. 4. Women and Crime

Women are often portrayed in the media as victims:

Table 8 - Percentage of Women Interviewed or Mentioned

percents

Medium	% Women	thereof: Victims
Television	9	66
Radio	10	57
Newspapers	15	72

Source: Israel Women's Network

The global media monitoring project, in which Israel participated, focused on the portrayal of women in the media, particularly as victims. Internationally, 29% of the women interviewed or mentioned in television broadcasts were victims, as opposed to 10% of the men. In Israel, it was found that women appeared in the news as victims 65% of the time, which is more than double the world rate of 29%. One explanation for this statistic is that bereaved families are often shown on the news, and particular attention is often focused on grieving female family members.

3. 4. 1. Women as Criminals

A study of the representation of women criminals in the Israeli media revealed that media images of male and female offenders differ, the major difference being the attribution of responsibility (Weimann, Fishman). Female offenders are very often viewed as erring and misguided creatures who need protection and help rather than as dangerous criminals; in other words as "Pawns" rather than "Originators." This is evident primarily in cases of "male dominated crimes," such as crimes against the person, rather than crimes where male and female offenders are more evenly divided, such as fraud. The researchers conclude that this study confirms the prevalence of sex-role stereotypes in the press when women are represented as dependent, submissive, and weak, whereas men are portrayed as self-reliant, strong, and aggressive.

3. 5. Equal Language in Television

In 1993, the director of the Broadcasting Authority adopted a decision taken earlier by the Committee for Service Advertisements concerning the principle of equality between the sexes. The decision prescribes that:

- 1) Hebrew being a gender specific language, service advertisements shall address both sexes, or alternatively, use the plural "you."
- 2) It is forbidden to represent women as powerless and subservient in advertisements.

3) Advertisements which sell goods and ideas by using women as objects, sex objects, or by presenting their individual body parts, are prohibited because they are degrading to women.

4) An absolute interdiction was placed on the representation of every kind of violence, particularly violence between the sexes.

In the beginning of 1994, a second channel was added to Israel TV, which runs private advertisements. Here too, there are requirements for the approval of advertisements.

3. 6. Campaign Advertisements and Representation of Women

The last three elections have included television election campaigns. Representation of women in these television campaigns was extremely limited.

3. 6. 1. Limited Coverage

Study of the 1996 campaign revealed that only 17% of the images appearing in all printed campaign propaganda were of women, up only 1% from the earlier study of the 1988 campaign (Lemish, 1988). Moreover, women generally constituted less than 20% of all persons who represented the major parties on television. However, in the newly formed Arab parties, the percentage of women who appeared in their campaign literature reached 55%, and in the Arab-Jewish party Hadash, 60% were women. 29% of those who appeared in the left-wing party Meretz's campaign literature were women, an improvement from 12% for the party's 1988 parallel party, Ratz (Lemish and Tidhar, 1996).

3. 6. 2. Content of the Representation

Out of the total number of topics addressed in campaign advertisements, only 25 speakers (1.3%) dealt directly with topics related to the status of women. In addition, it was found that women in political advertisements were more often younger women portrayed as anonymous figures (with no mention of their name, position, or title), who appeared in shorter time allotments than their male counterparts. When female candidates were covered, their emotional characteristics were emphasized more than their political opinions.

3. 7. Women as Agents of Change

It seems that in the past several years a gradual change is taking place within the Broadcast Authority and the media at large. More programs dealing with "women's issues," both in terms of traditional themes that are thought to interest women and in terms of social themes that concern women's status are being aired, mainly on the various radio stations. Many of these developments can be attributed to women journalists who initiate many of these programs. For example, the two most popular daily news programs on the leading national radio station are hosted by women, both of whom identify themselves as feminists, and who pay specific attention to questions of women's status and advancement. The first program, which is a prime-time news program, includes a regular weekly section where "honor and dishonor distinctions" on family-violence are awarded, with the cooperation of the organization of Men Against Family Violence. The second program, which goes beyond the head-line news, is hosted by an outspoken feminist who often provides explicitly feminist social critique to the issues she features.

3. 8. Media Campaigns Against Violence Against Women

3. 8. 1. Ezrat Nashim - To Increase Awareness of Help Centers

The recently formed voluntary association of Ezrat-Nashim (literally meaning "Women's Aid", but also the name of women's section in Orthodox synagogues), is comprised of leading women from the media. This group began a campaign to increase awareness of women's help centers and to raise money and public support for their operation. As of December 1996, the slogan, "they cannot force (double entendre: rape) you to keep silent," has appeared on numerous billboards and in television and radio announcements. In addition, a national toll-free telephone number was introduced, which a person in need can call from anywhere in the country. According to the organizer of this association, the number of calls has increased sevenfold since the introduction of the campaign.

In addition, as a result of the campaign:

- 1) The Prime Minister promised to match the sum raised by Ezrat Nashim (in addition to the 3 million NIS already dedicated to a campaign against violence, as explained below.)
- 2) The Minister of Labor promised to triple allocated funding for women's help centers.

3) The Minister of Treasury is working towards inserting a permanent allocation for women's help centers in the national budget; as are many local councils.

Thus, as a result of this high profile media campaign, increased funding has been given to the centers and national awareness about this issue has been raised significantly.

3. 8. 2. The Prime Minister's Campaign

One issue that gained much attention in the last election campaign was the issue of violence against women. Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu has decided to run a 3 million NIS media campaign to increase public awareness of the issue and of the Prevention of Violence Law-1991. This media campaign is intended to raise awareness about battered women, forewarn abusive men, increase public involvement, and instill the values of equality, tolerance and non-violence in the younger generation.

3. 8. 3. Other Programming

In addition, the army radio station recently devoted a full day's program to the issue of violence against women and local TV cable stations initiated similar campaigns about violence against women and family violence.

4. Pornography

Israeli law has dealt with the problem of pornography in several pieces of legislation: the Cinema Ordinance (enacted in 1927) which authorizes the Council for Scrutiny of Films and Plays to restrict the display of such materials for reasons of moral offense or corruption; the General Import License-1978, which prohibits the importation or the mailing of any obscene materials (including, books, magazines, etc.); the Bezek Law-1982, which regulates all the television broadcasting in Israel, and provides that a producer shall not run cable programs that have not received approval from the Council for Scrutiny or that contain obscene material as precluded in the Penal Law-1977; and the Penal Law-1977 itself. Until 1991, section 214 of the Penal Law had prohibited the selling, possession, printing, display or publication of pornographic materials, where pornography was defined as material that potentially corrupts morality; case law has added the criteria of obscene material which lacks any artistic value.

A 1991 reform to the Penal Law shifted the focus from immorality to a clearer separation between the private and the public sphere, where protection from offensive materials should be guaranteed, and to increased emphasis on the dignity of the person. For example, section 214Ab(2), which was enacted in 1990, prohibits the representation of persons in a humiliating or degrading sexual manner, or in a manner that depicts the person as an available sexual object. Other provisions of the 1991 version of section 214 specifically outlaw: 1) the publication of obscene material or its preparation for publication, and 2) obscene performances in public places, or in any other place which is not private and is accessible to persons under 18 years of age. These violations are punishable by up to three years imprisonment. The use of a minor (under 18) in a pornographic publication or presentation is punishable by up to five years imprisonment.

The reforms were a result of a peculiar coalition between women's organizations and the religious parties and include the prohibition against exhibition of pornographic materials on "public boards," such as in bus stops, over public buses, on billboards and outdoor signs where the "captive audience" has no choice but to see it. The definition of "offensive representation" for this purpose includes, in addition to section 214Ab(2) mentioned above, a picture of a nude body or an intimate body part of a man or a woman; a picture which depicts sexual relations or sexual violence; a picture of partial nudity, either of a man or a woman; a picture which contains material offensive to the moral feelings of the public or of a part thereof; a picture which corrupts the public morality; or a picture which is harmful toward minors or their education.

In practice, the laws against pornography are rarely invoked. According to police data, in 1994 there were only three convictions for the offense of "Distribution of Offensive Material," though in 1995 the number rose to 16. The censorship of plays has in fact been revoked, and the censorship of films was effectively undermined in a recent Supreme Court ruling, making it largely inapplicable.

The Second Radio and Television Authority Council promulgated Rules for the Second Television and Radio Authority (Ethics in TV Advertising) - 1994, which outlaw the advertising of obscene materials or sex-services, and the broadcast of any commercial that depicts sexual relations, sexual insinuations, victims of sexual violence or initiators of sexual violence, unless there is strong public interest for such a presentation, in line with any other legal provision. Supplementing these rules, the Rules for the Second Television and Radio Authority (Prior Approval of TV Advertising) - 1994, require the submission of any commercial to approval by the Second Authority Council. The Second Authority Council's 1995 report reveals that during that year, 8 commercials were canceled because of lewd content, or 0.33% of the total commercials that year.

5. Women and Religion in Israel

No report on the state of women in Israel can be complete without discussion of the place of religion in Israeli society and the influence of religion on women's daily lives.

5. 1. Women of the Wall

One social illustration of the effect of religion on Jewish women is apparent in the case of the Women of the Wall. This affair began in December 1988, when a group of Israeli and foreign women, representing all religious streams in Judaism, prayed together and read from a Torah scroll in the women's section of the Western Wall while wearing prayer-shawls; (practices which are traditionally reserved for men alone). The group was interrupted, attacked, and dispersed by ultra-orthodox men and women who were offended by its non-traditional practices. In March 1989 the group petitioned the High Court of Justice after being violently attacked on repeated occasions when they tried to pray, even without prayer-shawls and Torah scrolls. They asked the court to protect their right to freedom of religion by guaranteeing their right to pray as they wished at the Western Wall. In December 1989, the Minister of Religion amended the Regulations on the Protection of Sacred Places for the Jewish People - 1981 to include a provision that prohibits the engagement in a religious ritual at the Western Wall that is not in accordance with the custom of the place and that offends the feelings of those praying there. The petitioners then amended their petition to include the nullification of this amendment. The Court gave its majority decision in January 1994, denying the petitions but recommending the establishment of a governmental committee to fully investigate the subject and search for an alternative solution that would guarantee the women's freedom of religion while minimizing the offense to the other worshippers at the sight. The resulting committee then recommended that the women be allowed to pray in the manner they wish but in a secluded section of the Wall, removed from the main public area. The women objected to this solution, and their struggle continues.

6. New Immigrants from the Former USSR

This subchapter will review the status of female immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Israel is a country of immigrants. Most of its citizens have immigrated from various countries and cultures and it is therefore important to evaluate immigrants' status. Indeed, the fact that Israel encourages immigration demands an in-depth analysis of the process of immigrant absorption and how this process is accelerated, an analysis that falls outside the purview of this report.

Between 1990 and 1995, 685,683 new immigrants, mostly from the former USSR, arrived in Israel. These immigrants formed 10% of the total population in Israel and 53% of them were women. The following table shows the breakdown among immigrants by sex and family status, and points to the large number of women, particularly those who are divorced or widowed among the new immigrants:

6. 1. Typical problems facing new female immigrants:

6. 1. 1. Lack of employment:

A countywide survey of new immigrants of employment age (ages 25 - 64) from the Former Soviet Union that was conducted by the JDC-Brookdale Institute in 1992 revealed some interesting facts (Naveh, Noam & Benita, 1995).

The findings of this survey indicate that half (51%) of these immigrants are employed. The employment rate is higher among men (67%) than among women (38%). The employment situation tends to improve over time, with an employment rate of 62% among immigrants who have been in the country for two years or longer (78% of men in this category and 49% of women) compared with 36% among those who have been in the country between six months and one year (57% of men, 22% of women).

Chart 1 - Employment Rates Among the General Jewish Population and Immigrants from the former Soviet Union

Source: Monthly Statistical Bulletin, 1992

According to the conventional definition, as used by Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS), a person is considered part of the work force if he or she is either employed or seeking employment (see definitions under Article 11 above). By this definition, 70% of the immigrants in this survey belonged to the work force, 51% actually employed, and 19% seeking employment. Roughly 85% of men are in the work force, and 58% of women. The rate of participation in the work force among immigrants is almost identical to that among corresponding age groups in the general Jewish population in Israel (70% and 72% respectively). The rate among immigrants who have been in the country for two years or longer is actually higher. However, the percentage of immigrants seeking employment is more than double the corresponding figure among the general Jewish population.

This pattern is comparable among both male and female immigrants. Nonetheless when comparing the former occupation of the immigrants to their occupation in Israel, the percentage of women employed in unskilled labor is relatively higher than that of men, and the percentage of women who work in the same field in which they were formerly employed is relatively lower than that among men. Furthermore, upon examination of the distribution of working immigrant women in the various economic branches, the most striking figure is the high concentration of women in health services, welfare and social work, which comprises 22% of the total work force. (The next highest concentration is in wholesale and retail trade: 12%). The following table gives some indication of this phenomenon:

6. 2. Single parent immigrant families from the former USSR:

6. 2. 1. Introduction

The number of single parent families among new immigrants is larger than their number in the population in general. In 1993, the number of single-parent families was estimated to be roughly 18,000, 13% of all families with children (as opposed to 8% single parent families among the general population in 1993). This figure is increasing at a constant rate. In Israel, as in many other countries, women generally head these single parent families. Among new immigrants,

77% of these single mothers are divorced, 14% widowed and 9% single. 80% have one child, 17% have two, and half of the children in single parent families are 10 years of age or younger.

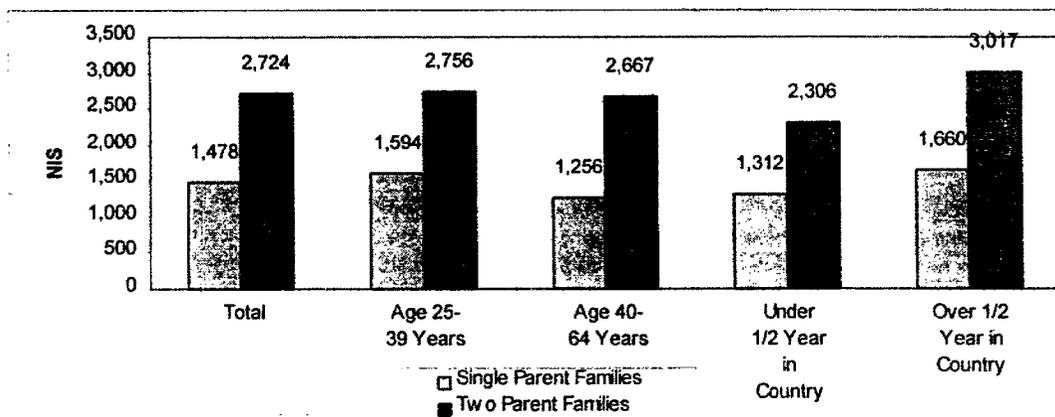

6. 2. 2. Employment in Israel

According to the JDC-Brookdale Institute study from 1992, married immigrant mothers have an economic advantage over single immigrant mothers. Among single mothers, only 26% are employed, 32% of younger women (aged 25-39) and 15% of older women (aged 40-64). Conversely, the employment rate among married women is 47- 49% among younger women, and 42% among older women. The employment rate among married women who have been in Israel for more than eighteen months (58%) is double the rate for those who have been in Israel under eighteen months (29%). Among single mothers the increase is less significant, from 21% to 32%. In addition, among single mothers there is a larger discrepancy between their field of employment in their country of origin and their employment in Israel. Married mothers also enjoy a higher level of job satisfaction than single mothers, particularly younger single mothers, who seem to be much less satisfied with their employment.

6. 2. 3. Financial Status

According to the JDC-Brookdale study that concentrated on single-mothers, the net income among the heads of single parent families is 1478 NIS. This figure is larger in younger age groups (25-39), and smaller in older age groups (40-64), 1594 NIS and 1265 NIS respectively:

Chart 2 --Average Net Income of Immigrant Families

ce: JDC Brookdale 1994

An additional indication of the increased financial difficulties faced by single parent families who are immigrants is the gap in the number of home owners. Only 7% of single parents own apartments as opposed to 32% of two parent families. This is important in a country where owning an apartment is preferable to renting.

6. 2. 4. Aid for Single Parent Immigrant Families

Single parent immigrants receive government aid provided for single parents as well as that provided for immigrants. According to the Single Parent Family Law-1992, single parents receive many benefits, as explained under Article 13 above.

In addition, single immigrant mothers may take part in professional training courses which are beneficial to their integration into the work force. More single mothers participate in these courses than single fathers (31% as opposed to 12%). This figure remains lower than the number of married female participants (31% among the single-mothers as opposed to 40% among the married mothers). Approximately half of the mothers (both single and married) who participate in these courses receive professional endorsement and half integrate into the work force in their profession. 35% of the single mothers who participated in these courses are employed, as opposed to 22% among those who did not participate. Among married mothers, 57% of those who participated in the course are employed, as opposed to 53% of those who did not participate. Thus, it is clear that these courses increase the chances of integration into the Israeli work force, though the gap in the employment rate between single and married mothers clearly remains.

7. Violence Against Women

7. 1. Sexual Violence--Legal Aspects

7. 1. 1. The Penal Law Today

According to section 345 of the Penal Law-1977, rape is defined as the penetration of a woman's sexual organ, where:

1. It has been done without her free consent, by use of force, infliction of physical suffering, exertion of pressure or threats of the above, whether these were done against a woman herself or against another individual;
 2. She has consented, but such consent has been obtained fraudulently as regards the identity of the perpetrator or as regards the substance of the act;
 3. The woman is a minor under 14 years of age, her consent being irrelevant;
- or
4. The woman was unconscious or in any other condition which prevented resistance, and was thus exploited; or the woman suffered from mental illness or mental limitations which were exploited.

A differentiation is made between rape, for which the maximum punishment is 16 years imprisonment, and aggravated rape, for which up to 20 years may be imposed. Aggravated rape consists of any of the above acts, where the rapist: 1) threatens the use of weapons; 2) causes severe bodily or emotional damage or causes pregnancy; 3) abuses the woman before the act, during the act or after it; 4) commits the rape in the presence of others who are there in order to participate--actively or passively--in the commission of the rape. Similarly, the rape of a minor under 16 years of age, where the act is considered rape for reasons other than the age of the victim, is considered aggravated rape.

While the narrow definition of rape according to section 345 of the Penal Law excludes all acts committed either against males or against parts of the woman's body other than her sexual organ, section 347 defines other acts that "are to be considered rape" when committed in the circumstances enumerated in section 345 above. Such actions, defined as "sodomy," include the insertion of a male sexual organ into a person's anus or mouth, or the insertion of any other object into a person's anus.

While consensual intercourse with minors under the age of 14 is considered rape, consensual intercourse with minors between the ages of 14 and 16 is defined as a separate offense and is punishable by up to 5 years imprisonment. An exception is made for those rare instances where a minor under 16 is married. Sexual relations with minors between the ages of 16 and 18, where the perpetrator exploits either a position of authority or a relationship of dependence, or where the perpetrator offers false promises of marriage, are similarly punishable by up to 5 years in prison. Likewise, one who exploits a working relationship or a position of authority, or who, despite being married, makes false promises of marriage in order to have sexual relations with a woman over the age of 18, is subject to 3 years imprisonment. A more specific criminal offense forbidding sexual harassment in the workplace is included in the Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988.

While the high maximal punishments provided for in the Penal Law-1977 represent a clear condemnation of sexual violence, in practice the sentences imposed rarely constitute more than a fifth of the maximum. A recently proposed controversial amendment to the Penal Law-1977 seeks to remedy this situation by instituting a minimum punishment for those convicted of rape, constituting 1/4 of the maximum that may be imposed. According to the proposal, courts are to be permitted to deviate from this minimum only under special circumstances.

Sexual attacks that do not involve actual penetration of an individual's body are classified as "indecent acts" in section 348 of the law. Where such acts are committed under circumstances comparable to those of rape above, a maximum punishment of up to 7 years imprisonment may be imposed. Where, on the other hand, such acts are committed under circumstances parallel to those of aggravated rape, up to 10 years may be imposed. Where they are committed without the consent of the victim, but in circumstances unlike those enumerated in section 345, the maximum punishment is 3 years.

An important provision, specific to sexual offenses, states that the criminal liability of one who causes a sexual offense to be committed is equal to that of the individual who actually commits the offense.

7. 1. 2. The Shomrat Case

In 1993, the Supreme Court decided what has come to be known as the Shomrat case, a tragic incident involving the gang rape of a 14 year old girl by a group of 17 year old and older boys, fellow members of her Kibbutz collective settlement. For several consecutive days the group of boys forced her to have sexual intercourse with them, using various pressure tactics to overcome her lack of consent.

The Supreme Court's decision in the Shomrat Case has been recognized as a turning point in the Court's handling of rape cases. Explicitly declaring rape to be a crime against the human dignity of the victim, and rejecting stereotypical notions of women's sexuality which promote a forgiving attitude towards those who rape "loose" women, the court adopted a strong stance against the relevance of a woman's sexual history as evidence of her consent in the instance at hand. Similarly, the Court laid down clear guidelines consistent with the laws of evidence, prohibiting the admission of any evidence relating to the victim's sexual history. The Court also explicitly acknowledged the tendency of rape victims to refrain from coming forward with their complaints, holding that such delays in coming forward, when reasonably explained under the circumstances, do not impact upon the credibility of the victim as a witness.

Recognizing that the crime of rape as defined in the Penal Law-1977 requires the use of force or the exertion of pressure against the victim, the Court held that such force need be neither immediate nor severe. Simply pushing the victim down onto the bed, or--as in this case--threatening the victim with social embarrassment, may suffice. Likewise, the Court recognized that the amended Code, which no longer speaks of the woman's will, but rather requires her consent, plainly does not demand that the victim actively resist the attempt, especially where it is clear that the victim is too frightened to do so. A verbal expression of non-consent is enough to constitute resistance, and in instances where the victim remains silent, the circumstances surrounding the incident will be evaluated to determine whether such silence implies consent. Objective circumstances--including, in the present case, the victim's age and the series of sexual acts performed upon her by a group of much older boys--may be relevant.

Despite the fact that the Shomrat case was relatively recent, many other cases decided since have relied upon and implemented its progressive approach. Some of these cases decided since the Shomrat trial, however, have raised questions regarding the extent to which the principles laid down in Shomrat will continue to be implemented by the Court in the future. In Binyamin v. The State of Israel, for example, a majority of the Justices held that where an experienced, adult woman involves herself in an intimate relationship and willingly engages in sexual activity other than intercourse, her rape by the partner with whom she is involved should be punished less severely than if she was raped by a stranger.

7. 1. 3. The Element of Consent and Issues of Evidence

Until 1982, conviction for rape could not be based on the sole testimony of the rape victim, unless such testimony was supported by corroborative evidence. In 1982, as part of a general reform of the laws of evidence, this requirement of corroboration was abolished. In its place, a special requirement was established that states that when courts decide to convict based on sole testimony of the victim, they must specify their reasons for doing so. Various steps have been taken to encourage and protect rape victims who choose to come forward. For many years, despite the general evidentiary requirement that witnesses be questioned only about relevant issues, and despite specific prohibitions on irrelevant questions intended to embarrass, deter, or frighten witnesses, courts tended to allow rape victims to be questioned about their personal sexual histories. In 1988 Section 2A was added to the Procedural Amendment Law (Questioning of Witnesses), 1957, forbidding courts from allowing victims of sexual crimes to be asked about their sexual history. The section specifies that in unique cases, where the court believes that enforcing this prohibition will cause an injustice to the accused, it may allow such questioning as long as it specifies its reasons for doing so. In the above Shomrat case, Justice Shamgar took a strong position against exposing rape victims to such lines of questioning, arguing that the stereotypes which prompt courts to view such questions as relevant must be condemned.

In 1995 the Knesset passed an additional amendment to the above law, The Procedural Amendment Law (Amendment No. 2) (Questioning of Witnesses), 1995, authorizing courts to order that the testimony of a complainant in a sexual offense be given in the accused's absence, where the court believes that the complainant or the complainant's testimony may otherwise be harmed. As this requires the making of logistical/technical arrangements in order to allow the accused to view the testimony, maintain contact with his defense attorney, and ask the complainant questions, implementation has been postponed until the beginning of 1997. This law also authorizes courts to request a professional evaluation of the victim's condition before sentencing a person convicted of a sexual offense, and determines that severe sexual offenses be dealt with by a panel of three judges (the latter provision having already begun to be implemented in 1995). Similar evidentiary provisions exist to ensure that minors testifying against their parents in cases relating to domestic violence not be required to testify in the parent's presence.

7.1.4. Sex Crimes Against Family Members

Section 351 of the Penal Law-1977 specifically prohibits the commission of sexual offenses against family members who are minors, and provides severe maximal punishments comparable to those specified for aggravated rape. Any act of rape, or any act which according to the Penal Law-1977 is to be "viewed as rape," which is committed against a family member who is a minor is punishable by up to 20 years in prison. As mentioned above, "rape" includes consensual intercourse with minors under the age of 14. Sexual, anal, or oral intercourse with a family member between the ages of 14 and 21 is punishable by up to 16 years in prison, whether or not the family member in question consents to the act. "Indecent acts" committed against minors who are family members are punishable by between 4 and 15 years. The law provides a wide definition of family-- including parents, spouses (and ex-spouses) of parents, grandparents, siblings, uncles or aunts, and in-laws. Siblings, uncles, aunts, and in-laws are liable according to this provision only if they themselves have reached the age of 15.

7.2. Family Gender-Based Violence--Legal Aspects

In 1989, The Karp Committee, headed by the Deputy Attorney General Yehudit Karp, published a comprehensive report dealing with the phenomenon of domestic violence. The report recommended various measures to clarify the criminal nature of such abuse, to encourage various governmental and social institutions to cooperate in order to treat the problem, and to provide victims with emergency access to remedies that could provide immediate protection.

Perhaps the most important result to come of the report's findings was the passage of the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law-1991. Until then, no territorial legislation existed which enabled individuals suffering from domestic abuse to obtain emergency remedies to protect their immediate safety. In the absence of such legislation, a woman wishing to obtain a restraining order could do so only within the context of her applicable personal law.

The Prevention of Violence in the Family Law-1991 operates independently of personal family law, and creates a "protective injunction," designed to provide immediate protection for those subjected to domestic violence. The law, which explicitly preserves the existing legal situation, has been interpreted by the Supreme Court as adding to the options already available according to personal law. Worded in gender-neutral language so as to protect "family members" from domestic violence, the law considerably broadens the definition of "family," so as to include various relationships, past and present, within which such violence may occur. The law also explicitly defines "spouse" as including non-marital cohabitants.

The law specifies two instances in which the court may grant such an injunction: where the subject of the injunction has either "acted recently with violence towards a family member or committed a sexual offense against a family member," or where the subject's behavior may reasonably be regarded as constituting a "true physical danger" for the family member. While opposition to the inclusion of emotional abuse prevented the term "violence" from being explicitly defined in the law, and while some lower courts have held that the law applies only to physical violence, the issue has not yet been decided by the Supreme Court. A proposed amendment to the law seeks to allow protective injunctions to be given in cases of severe emotional abuse, but requires that this be done in the presence of both parties.

The law specifies four main remedies which may be included in the injunction, and which are designed to ensure the immediate safety of the abused family member. The injunction, which may be granted for up to three months at a time, and which may be renewed as needed for a total period of time not to exceed six months, may prohibit an individual from: entering or nearing the home of the family member in question, regardless of any rights he may have in the property of that home; harassing the family member in any manner, anywhere; acting in any manner so as to burden the family member's use of her property; or carrying a weapon. The court may also issue limitations upon an individual's ability to be armed if he is a member of the security forces (army, police, etc.).

According to a 1996 amendment to the law, a court which does not include in the injunction a prohibition against carrying a weapon must justify its decision in writing. In addition, the law authorizes the courts to require an individual to post bond in order to guarantee that the injunction be obeyed or to guarantee good behavior. The 1996 amendment further provides that the demand for bond, which may include "any instruction which, in the opinion of the court, is necessary to ensure the safety of the family member," may remain in effect for up to six months, after the expiration of the protective injunction. In other words, the bond may remain in effect for up to a year. Where the injunction prohibits an individual from entering or nearing the residence of a family member, failure to abide by the injunction may result in immediate arrest.

The law recognizes the profound emotional distress of the abused individual and therefore empowers the Attorney General and police prosecutors to intervene on behalf of those adults who are unable to act. This unique provision, allowing for action to be taken by individuals other than the adult victim, implies the acknowledgment of the helplessness characterized as "Battered Women's Syndrome," that often prevents abused women from actively seeking intervention. In an additional provision intended to make it easier for victims to come forward, the law similarly requires the court to handle the bureaucracy involved in filing a request for an injunction.

The tendency of battered women to revoke their complaints after they have turned to the police has made it very difficult for the police to provide a proper law-enforcement response to domestic abuse. Steps have therefore similarly been taken within the police to ensure that cases pertaining to women who later withdraw their complaints are not closed. In order to prevent misuse of the remedies provided in the law, the law stipulates that where such misuse has been found to have occurred, the requesting party may be ordered to pay compensation.

This change of attitude reflected in the passage of the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law-1991 may be observed in the judiciary as well. In the 1995 case of Carmela Buhbut v. The State of Israel, a woman sentenced to seven years imprisonment in the District Court for killing her abusive husband, successfully challenged the severity of her punishment. Justice Dorner, consenting to the majority opinion of Justice Bach, rejected the assumption that imposing a long prison sentence would deter other victims of abuse from taking the law into their own hands. Arguing that it is society's responsibility to provide battered women with alternatives other than recourse to violence, Dorner emphasized the fact that Buhbut's entire community--indeed her entire family--stood by in silence for years as she suffered. The sentence was reduced to three years, and the efforts of various public figures, including Knesset members, have since succeeded in having Ms. Buhbut paroled. A recent amendment to the Penal Law-1977 allows courts to impose more lenient sentences on victims of severe abuse who have been convicted of murdering the perpetrators of the abuse. While the amendment is not limited to abuse within the family, it seems that this will be among its most important applications.

7. 2. 1. Other Recent Legislative Amendments

Another 1996 amendment to the Penal Law-1977 makes further progress in recognizing abusive violence within the family as a special and uniquely severe form of assault. The amendment defines violence against family members as a special offense and provides a maximum punishment that is double the usual maximum punishment for assault. This amendment aims to ensure that courts treat the issue of domestic violence with the necessary severity and to counter trends of leniency in sentencing.

The Penal Law-1977 was also changed in 1996 to extend the statute of limitations on sexual crimes committed against minors by their parents, guardians, or other family members. According to the amendment, the statute of limitations on such crimes begins when the minor reaches the age of 18. The section stipulates, however, that where ten or more years have passed since the crime was committed, the approval of the Attorney General is required before it may be prosecuted.

A 1996 Amendment to the laws of criminal procedure specifically includes reasonable suspicion that an individual committed an act of violence against a family member as grounds for arrest.

Other recent 1996 amendments to both the above Prevention of Violence in the Family Law-1991 and to the Penal Law-1977, allow courts to require abusive individuals to undergo therapy. Where the court has granted a protective injunction, and where it believes the individual in question fit to participate in a treatment program, it may now include mandatory therapy among the requirements of the injunction. Similarly, according to the Penal Law-1977, courts may now order convicts who have committed acts of domestic violence to undergo group therapy. Courts are also provided with the option of ordering therapy without conviction in relevant criminal trials. These changes, which reflect a "therapeutic-social" response to domestic violence, are intended to facilitate models such as the Be'er Sheva model discussed below, which adopt a comprehensive community approach to solving the problem.

In 1995, the Recompensation Law (Child Orphaned due to Domestic Violence), 1995 was passed so as to ensure that where one of a child's parents is killed by the other, the child will be provided for financially. The law provides that where reasonable grounds exist to presume that one parent has committed a felony resulting in the death of the other, the child or children involved are eligible to receive monthly payments from the National Insurance Institute.

In addition to the various measures discussed above which empower the courts to prevent abusive spouses from carrying weapons, a proposed bill seeks to amend section 13 of the Weapon Law-1949, so as to authorize courts which convict individuals of domestic violence crimes to suspend whatever weapon license they may have and to limit their access to such weapons when they are performing reserve duty in the army. The proposal would require courts to note the special reasons why the prosecution's request for such limitations were denied, in any instance where the court decides not to issue them.

7. 2. 2. Spousal Murder

On March 7, 1995 the Parliamentary Investigative Committee on the Murder of Women by their Spouses was established to look for ways to limit the problem of spousal murder. Its findings were published in June, 1996. According to the Committee's report, there were a total of 613 murders in the years 1990-1995, of which 73 (11.9%) involved the killing of women by their husbands or spouses. In only 17% of the cases were there previous police complaints or files of domestic violence involving the perpetrator. Focusing on the general issue of domestic violence, the Report noted a number of areas in which society's handling of the problem of domestic violence remain to be improved. Among its main criticisms was a lack of sufficient coordination between the various governmental bodies that deal with the problem of domestic violence, and the related difficulty of determining precisely what programs are available.

7. 3. Extent of the Phenomenon of Sexual Violence Against Women

It is difficult to obtain precise statistics on the number of incidents of sexual violence which occur each year. Many instances go unreported, and victims often hesitate before turning to the police or other treatment services for assistance. The Israeli Sexual Assault Victim's Help Centers Union, established in 1990, operates as the umbrella organization for various Help Centers throughout the country. Today there are eight Centers which belong to the Union, in Jerusalem, Tel-Aviv, Haifa, Ra'anana, Eilat, Be'er Sheva, Nazareth, and Kiryat Shmonah. While the Help Centers and their activities will be described below, statistics gathered by the Union may be helpful in understanding the extent of the phenomenon of sexual violence in Israel. The following table demonstrates the growth in the number of police files opened for sex crimes between 1990 and 1994.

The Israeli Sexual Violence Victim's Help Centers Union also provides useful statistics regarding the number of incidents of sexual violence each year. Again, these numbers do not provide a comprehensive picture of the frequency of such attacks, since approximately two thirds of those who turned to the Help Centers did not report to the police; thus the statistics should be viewed as complementing one another.

It is interesting to note that while the number of requests for assistance following sexual attack has been rising steadily since 1990, the vast majority of this growth occurred during 1990-1992.

In most of the Help Centers throughout the country, rape, followed by sexual assault and then by incest, were the most common complaints. Despite the growth in the numbers of reported incidents each year, the relative number of requests relating to each type of crime has remained relatively consistent from year to year.

As can be seen by the table below, an overwhelming 73.1% of those who turned to a Help Center following a sexual attack chose to refrain from reporting the incident to the police. The Help Centers, which view their task as offering moral support and assistance to victims, follow a policy of respecting the victim's wishes as to whether to involve the police.

It is interesting to note that, as can be seen from the tables regarding the types of sexual violence reported to the police and to the Help Centers respectively, the proportion of incidents of sexual violence that consist of actual rape is much higher at the Help Centers than at the police. This tends to suggest that while rape victims prefer to turn to the Centers, victims of forced indecent acts and other types of sexual assault are less reluctant to turn to the police.

7. 3. 1. Police Handling of Sex Crimes Against Women

The 1981 police guidelines regarding the handling of rape complaints, still in force today, note that officers must carry out the necessary investigations while exhibiting consideration for the victim's suffering and making certain to preserve both her dignity and her privacy. Complete discretion is to be observed, and all investigation material is to be treated as classified. The complainants name or other personal information should not be published, and any line-ups must be done in a way that ensures her privacy. Only relevant and necessary questions are to be asked, and the investigation should be handled, if possible, by a woman police officer who has specialized in the area. The victim is to be brought to the hospital for a medical examination regardless of the hour at which she arrives at the station.

The Help Centers Union, together with the Israel Women's Network, has recently implemented a Victim's Assistance Program, the purpose of which is to both involve the victim in the criminal process and to provide her with assistance in legal proceedings. The program has been developed in conjunction with both the State Prosecution's Office and the Police. The Police have also recently taken steps, including the distribution of a pamphlet prepared by the police and the Help Center's Union, which provides the victim with all the necessary information and advises her of her rights.

7.3.2. Prosecutorial Policy Regarding Sexual Violence Against Women

The State Prosecutor's Office has taken numerous steps to ensure that the interests of victims of physical violence, and especially victims of sexual violence, be protected throughout the criminal proceedings. Internal directives established in 1994 have been issued to the various prosecutors regarding assistance that should be given to victims of violent crime, including referral to relevant treatment, counseling and medical services and information on punitive damages to which the victim may be entitled as per section 77 of the Penal Law-1977.

7.3.3. Sentencing for Sex-Crimes

In their comprehensive study of gender-bias in the courtroom, Bryna Bogoch and Rochelle Don-Yechiya focused on sentences imposed for sex-crimes, as compared to sentences for other serious offenses. As their findings demonstrate, sex crimes continue to be treated in a way similar to other bodily harm offenses, despite legislative reforms which aim to increase the severity of sentences for sex crimes relative to other violent offenses. For a more detailed description of the study, see Article 15.

Despite various proposals, there is as yet no minimum punishment for sexual violence, and the trend of lenient sentencing has remained problematic. The average sentence for prison inmates in offenses for which the range of punishment is 5 years to life, is 37.5 months. For sexual offenses, the average is 24 months, while for bodily harm offenses it is 19 months. Overall, defendants tend to be sentenced to an average of one fifth of the maximum for the offense they are convicted of. In offenses against life, the average sentence is approximately 1/2 of the maximum, while in sexual offenses it is merely 15% of the maximum; in bodily harm offenses it is slightly less. Although the actual lengths of prison sentences in sexual crimes rose as a result of the reforms of 1988-90, the relatively low ratio of prison term to maximum sentence has remained constant. In rape cases, the ratio is slightly higher--1/5 of the maximum--which matches the general average noted above.

In over 1/3 of cases involving sexual violence, no prison term at all is imposed. According to this measurement, sexual offenses are not treated more seriously than other violent bodily harm offenses, where prison sentences are also not imposed in more than 1/3 of the cases. In offenses against life, no prison term is given in 10% of the cases.

Similarly, the study found that lower sentences tend to be imposed for non-sexual domestic violence than for non-sexual violence against strangers. For sexual offenses, however, higher sentences have been given to those who assault members of their family than to those who assault others.

7.3.4. About the Help Centers

In addition to providing 24-hour emergency hotlines for victims of sexual violence in various centers throughout the country and providing individualized assistance and support groups for victims who so request, the Israeli Sexual Assault Victim's Help Centers Union works to increase public and political awareness of the phenomenon of sexual violence and to lobby on behalf of victims.

The Union has also worked to promote the "Clothesline Project" in Israel. The project began in the United States and has become an international response to sexual violence, with at least eight other countries taking part. Similar programs, such as "Take Back the Night" marches and vigils, and "See, Hear, and Speak" sessions, have been sponsored in large part by the Union, in conjunction with other NGO's.

7.3.5. Funding of the Help Centers

The budget of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare includes a section on "Rape Victim Treatment," classified as part of the "Service for Girls in Distress."

In a November 4, 1996 meeting of the Knesset Women's Status Committee, it was noted that funding of the Help Centers remains approximately 10% of their overall expenses. The Minister of Labor and Welfare promised to reevaluate the amount of funding provided, and there was talk of raising funding by 40%. Meanwhile, however, the Help Centers remain in danger of closing due to lack of sufficient funds.

7. 4. Extent of the Phenomenon of Domestic Violence

As with statistics regarding sexual violence against women, statistics on the number of battered women in Israel are only estimates. According to a conservative estimate, approximately 10% of married Israeli women are subject to domestic abuse, about 7% on an ongoing basis. 1994 reports of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare show the number of battered women in Israel to have reached 200,000. 27% of the 4850 instances in which women turned to legal aid services throughout the country in 1994 had to do with issues of violence against women.

Police files, which as explained above only began to keep systematic track of domestic violence reports in 1995 show that during 1995, the police received a total of 14,706 complaints of domestic violence submitted by women, constituting 76% of all domestic violence reports. In 7774 of the cases, criminal files were opened. There were 113 reported incidents of severe spousal sexual violence against women (forced rape or forced indecent acts, 110 of which were opened as criminal files and 13 of which remained with no criminal proceedings). The relative rarity of domestic sexual violence complaints can perhaps be explained by the reluctance of most victims of sexual violence within the family to come forward.

In 1995 a total of 9577 criminal files were opened regarding domestic violence (including both men and women as complainants), and 3538 were closed on various grounds. 3679 went to the prosecution, and 1524 were heard in court. 836 are in process at the police.

In 1996, a total of 14,967 incidents of domestic violence were reported to the police by women. Exact information regarding the handling of these incidents is as yet unavailable. Of these, 13,600 involved Jewish complainants, while 1367 involved Arab women.

7. 4. 1. Police Handling of Domestic Violence

Reports

In addition to serving as the basis for various legal reforms, the 1989 report of the Karp Committee prompted a complete re-evaluation of the treatment of domestic violence by the police, which had previously focused on "peace-making" between the spouses involved, rather than on enforcing the criminal law and bringing abusive husbands to justice.

The 1990 police guidelines discussed below were implemented largely as a result of the Karp report. In 1991 the State Comptroller included in the 42nd annual State Comptroller Report a study of the phenomenon of domestic violence and the way in which it is treated by the police. Indeed, the report noted a certain amount of improvement in the situation. However, it also found the implementation of the guidelines to be lacking in certain respects. In 1993, the Police Comptroller published a report on Police Handling of Violence Between Spouses, criticizing the lack of full implementation of the spirit and letter of the 1990 guidelines, and suggesting a more comprehensive approach that would combine determined use of criminal sanctions with coordinated long-term community intervention.

More recent reports have expressed satisfaction with the current trends within the police force, which has continued to move forward both in its theoretical approach and in the implementation of its policy. For example, In June of 1996 the Parliamentary Investigative Committee on the Murder of Women by their Spouses published its findings, and praised the police for the changes in its attitude towards domestic violence and for its current policy designed to deal harshly with abusive husbands and constructively cooperate with other community services. The Committee also noted a number of areas which remain to be improved.

In October 1995, an Inter-Ministerial Committee, comprised of members of all the relevant government offices and most of the women's organizations active in Israel, was established to appraise the various agencies which deal with the issue of battered women. It made various suggestions regarding the improvement of reporting mechanisms and legal aid available to women. Its Subcommittee on Police Affairs, comprised of representatives from the Police Force, the Ministry of Labor and Welfare, the Justice Ministry, women's organizations, and shelters for battered women, also published its findings. Affirming the importance of combining law enforcement with mandatory treatment, a majority of the members pointed to the dangers inherent in community treatment models, which may fail to place enough emphasis on the criminal nature of domestic violence.

The 1990 Police Guidelines

In 1990, in response to the Karp report, steps were taken to "professionalize" the treatment of domestic violence issues within the police. A special unit was established to monitor from above the treatment of violence in the family as a distinct issue. Similarly, "supervising officers," in charge of ensuring policy implementation in the specific area of domestic violence, were appointed to police stations throughout the country.

Emphasizing the criminal nature of domestic violence and the obligation of the police to refrain from becoming involved in the substance of the conflict, the guidelines direct the police to give complaints of domestic violence high priority and act to criminally prosecute the perpetrator and to give the victim the assistance she needs. The guidelines, still in force today, also stress the importance of cooperation with welfare authorities.

Police officers who arrive on the scene of an incident of domestic abuse are instructed to stop whatever violence is taking place, assist the victim in receiving whatever medical care is necessary, take steps to record evidence and take testimony from the victims, and take the perpetrator to the station for questioning. Only where it is evident that the complaint was groundless, or where the offense committed was extremely light and there were no signs of physical harm or danger that the situation may deteriorate, may the police officer refrain from taking the suspect in for questioning. Where the couple has children under the age of 18, the officer must notify a contact in the Ministry of Labor and Welfare, who must then ensure that there is proper coordination between all social services.

When a victim arrives at the police station to complain, officers are instructed to first gather the victim's testimony. Steps must be taken immediately to locate the suspect, and the instructions require that he be questioned within one week, if possible. Similarly, the police are to ensure that medical treatment is provided where necessary.

According to the National Health Regulations (Notification of Suspected Violence), 1975, various health-care providers are required to notify the police when they suspect a patient has been subject to violence. The guidelines note that forms should be distributed in hospital emergency rooms to be filled out by hospital officials where relevant.

The victim is to be informed of the various community agencies which may assist her. Where immediate or emergency assistance is required, such as referral to a shelter for battered women and/or legal aid, the victim must be immediately assisted in contacting the relevant agencies. All requests by the victim, by her representative, or by a community treatment agency for information on the police handling of her complaint, including information on whether the suspect has been arrested or released and all information pertaining to protective measures, are to be complied with.

The guidelines specifically state that, as a rule, there is public interest in prosecuting perpetrators of domestic violence. Only where the offense is uniquely light and there has been no previous complaint, may the officer in charge of the investigation decide to refrain from prosecution.

Acknowledging the role of threats and coercion in the decision of many battered women to revoke their complaints, the guidelines also emphasize that a victim's request to have her complaint revoked should not be the determining factor in a decision to refrain from criminal proceedings.

As a rule, files will not be closed due to lack of evidence where it's the complainant's word against the suspect's. Only where there are real grounds to doubt the victim's veracity will her word be regarded as insufficient evidence to continue the investigation.

7. 4. 2. The Be'er Sheva Model

The "Be'er Sheva Model," adopted as a result of the abovementioned 1993 Police Comptroller Report, views the exposure given to the family crisis when the police become involved in a specific incident as an opportunity for community intervention; not just to put a stop to the short-term violence, but also to get at the roots of the problem and provide a long-term solution. Thus, the police, which as a law-enforcement agency is competent to deal mainly with the symptoms of the problem, are to coordinate their activities with various community agencies equipped to deal with the underlying causes of the problem. The criminal aspect of the intervention is understood as one part of a more comprehensive approach centered around mandatory therapy for the perpetrator and community assistance for the victim.

The threat of criminal action is utilized so as to bring about the suspect's participation in a mandatory therapy program. The final decision regarding the fate of the criminal proceedings is to be postponed until the suspect undergoes treatment and the professional opinion of the treatment service is obtained.

Statistical studies have shown the Be'er Sheva model to be relatively successful. "Ping-Pong" complaints (the use of mutual complaints in divorce actions) and recurring incidents dropped significantly. A more serious police attitude towards those complaints which were made was observed, more files were opened, and more offenders were indicted. In general, there was a decrease in the number of instances of domestic violence reported, but since much of the decrease may be attributed to the drop in "ping-pong" complaints and recurrence, many who had previously refrained from reporting began to come forward. Various researchers, however, have criticized the model and contended that its effectiveness remains questionable.

7. 4. 3. 1993 - Today

Since the publication of the 1993 police comptroller's report, significant steps have been taken within the police to improve implementation of the 1990 guidelines and to operate according to the Be'er Sheva community model. In the past few years, a special Community Policing Unit was established to implement this notion of community coordination on a national scale. While not limited to domestic abuse issues, the Community Policing Unit has had a tremendous impact on the police approach to violence in the family, and versions of the Be'er Sheva model have since been adopted in over 20 police stations throughout the country, including Rishon le'Tzion, Jerusalem, Haifa, and Ramle.

In 1995, in response to criticism included in the 1993 police comptroller's report, a computerized system of recording instances of domestic violence, using special codes to note the relationship between the victim and the perpetrator, began to be implemented in police stations throughout the country. While computerized codes had been in use since 1993 to denote the victim's relationship to the perpetrator in cases where no criminal proceedings were pursued, only in 1995 was this extended to those which where criminal files were opened. This both represents an acknowledgment of the unique nature of violence that occurs within the family, and makes follow-up and accurate statistical evaluation possible for the first time. Steps have been taken to put together a monthly statistical report and to enforce statistical record-keeping on an ongoing basis.

Efforts have also been made to further enhance the professionalization of those police officers who handle domestic violence. All Supervising Officers participate in special training sessions, and many stations have instituted weekly classes on domestic violence. It has similarly been decided to establish a special office within the police force to handle these issues. Criticism has recently been directed at the fact that Supervising Officers tend to be overburdened, and that they are usually responsible for areas besides domestic violence. It has been recommended that Supervising Officers be allowed to focus all their attention on the issue of violence in the family, and that special police officers be designated to deal only with this issue.

A recent 1996 amendment to the Law for the Prevention of Violence in the Family-1991 included police prosecutors as among those authorized to request defense injunctions on behalf of battered women. While most discussion of the options available to police has focused on the criminal sphere until now, this amendment will require the police to formulate a policy on when and under what circumstances to request such injunctions.

7.4.4. Statistical Data on Current Police Practices Regarding the Handling of Domestic Violence Cases

A criminal investigation file is opened by the police in approximately 50% of reported domestic violence involving women as victims.

(“P.A.” refers to instances where a criminal file has been opened, while “A.T.” refers to those instances where no criminal proceeding has been pursued.)

7.4.5. Prosecutorial Policy Regarding Victims of Domestic Violence

In addition to the various guidelines discussed above in relation to victims of sexual and other violent crime, the State Prosecutor’s Office follows special guidelines regarding the treatment of domestic violence within the family. These guidelines advise that, as a rule, the prosecution should strive to obtain the maximum sentences that may be imposed for severe instances of sexual violence. Similarly, prosecutors are instructed to consider plea bargaining where it may be difficult to obtain a conviction, or where the trial itself may cause additional harm to the victim.

7.4.6. Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence

The Ministry of Labor and Welfare maintains a number of programs and services for victims of domestic violence. Among the most important of these are the Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence. The Centers were established primarily to provide telephone assistance to both victims and perpetrators of domestic violence, and to undertake various community projects for the prevention of violence in the family--including education and programs to increase awareness among professionals and among the public at large. The services provided include: diagnosis for the parties involved, individual, couple, family, and group therapy, preventive intervention, and training sessions for relevant professionals. In 1994 there were 9 centers, and by 1995 the number had nearly doubled to 15. Today, 19 such centers operate throughout the country, 9 of which are run in collaboration with various women's organizations, such as Na'amat and WIZO, and 10 of which are run primarily by the Ministry.

Among the projects undertaken in 1995 were 24 therapy groups for battering men, 33 support groups for victims, 18 seminars, 13 training sessions, 7 orientations, 13 special training sessions for police officers, and 56 training sessions for teachers, judges, doctors, prison service employees, and the army.

An additional program aimed at preparing employees of the centers to further deal with the problems of abused children and children who have witnessed violence between their parents has been planned for 1996-7.

In addition, the 150 Social Service Departments of the Ministry which operate throughout the country offer a complementary service to that of the centers. The activities of the Departments include referral to other services in emergency cases and various treatment programs and therapy sessions for battered women and abusive men.

7. 4. 7. Shelters for Battered Women

The first shelter for battered women was established in Israel in 1977. Today there are 12 such shelters throughout the country, the average shelter equipped to house between 12-15 women, together with their children. As women stay in the shelters for several months, relatively few women can be accepted at each shelter every year. As a result, the number of shelters and their geographical distribution do not meet the needs of the thousands of victims of domestic abuse who request acceptance each year, at least two-thirds of whom are rejected due to lack of space. According to a report of the Personal and Family Services branch of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare, 472 women and 695 children were housed by the 8 existing shelters in 1995.

In addition to the emotional, legal, and economic aid offered to those women who are accepted at shelters throughout the country, the shelters in Ashdod and Herzliya have instituted the "Halfway Project," designed to assist women in their transition back into life outside of the shelter.

The establishment of the shelters was financed by various non-profit organizations, with no governmental participation. The ongoing upkeep expenses of the shelters, on the other hand, are partially funded by the Ministry of Labor and Welfare. Until 1995, approximately 50% of the expenses were covered by the Ministry. In 1996, the Ministry raised its level of funding to 75%.

According to conservative estimates of the number of additional shelters required in Israel in order to reach a ratio of shelters per population comparable to that of other Western countries, at least 8 more shelters are needed.

7. 4. 8. Hotlines

Various women's organizations, with the participation of the Women and Girls' Service of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare, operate hotlines for battered women throughout the country. There are currently ten such hotlines in Israel, one of which operates in Arabic. Ensuring complete anonymity and confidentiality, the hotlines provide a 24-hour per day option for women throughout the country who wish to stop the violence, but who are unable to turn to the police or to make contact with treatment officials. They are run by volunteers who provide the callers with various information, and who serve as sympathetic listeners.

7. 4. 9. Coverage of Medical Treatment

Previous uncertainties regarding the extent of medical coverage given to sexually or physically abused women as part of their National Medical Insurance have been resolved. Today, the National Health Insurance Law covers any and all medical expenses incurred as a result of sexual or physical abuse against women.

7. 4. 10. Future Services to be Provided

1. Absorption Apartments: The project, which was slated to begin in the mid-October 1996, aims to provide an emergency solution for high-risk battered women who are unable to stay in a shelter. The locations of the apartments are to remain confidential, well-protected, and equipped with a special emergency button with which the police may be immediately notified of any danger. In the beginning, there will be 10 such apartments provided by the Building Ministry, and equipped to handle 120-240 women, together with their children.
2. Hostel for Abusive Men: The project was approved in December 1995 as part of the Special Project Fund of the National Insurance Institute. The purpose of the hostel is to create an intensive treatment center for abusive husbands, who must participate in therapeutic programs as a condition for suspending the criminal proceedings against them. It will also provide a temporary housing solution for men who have been issued injunctions to leave their homes. The hostel will be equipped to handle between 10 and 12 men at once, for periods of 3-4 months.
3. Various other planned projects include a recorded telephone message to provide information to victims in various languages, the establishment of a single emergency hotline to be accessible from all over the country, and additional training sessions for social workers and other individuals who work with victims of domestic abuse.

ARTICLE 6

Suppression of the Exploitation of Women

State Parties shall take all appropriate measures, including legislation, to suppress all forms of traffic in women and exploitation of prostitution of women.

1. General

There are no official numbers regarding the extent of prostitution and the traffic of women in Israel, but there is a general consensus that it is becoming more prevalent. A reporter who has done work in this area estimates that over 10,00 women in Tel Aviv alone engage in prostitution.

2. The Legal Framework

In addition to Israel's ratification of CEDAW in 1991, Israel has also ratified the 1949 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, and the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child. In principle, the current Israeli legal framework for dealing with prostitution is based upon the abolitionist approach, as is the Convention's approach. However, the current legal arrangement and its method of enforcement suffer from inconsistencies and lack of protocol for dealing with the reality of prostitution. Prostitution in itself is not, and has never been, a crime under Israeli law, and the woman who engages in prostitution is not considered a criminal. Instead, the legal system engages in selective prohibition, by criminalizing exploitive conducts that surround prostitution, so that both the exploitive and practical aspects of prostitution are criminalized. Thus, engaging in prostitution as a client or sponsor is a criminal act, while prostitution itself is not.

"Procurement," defined as living off the profits or taking all or some profits from a woman who engages in prostitution, and solicitation of a woman to engage in prostitution, are crimes according to sections 199-201 of the Penal Law-1977, punishable by 5 years in prison, and up to 7 years under aggravating circumstances. Such aggravated circumstances include the following: when the woman is a minor under 18 years old; when the woman is the perpetrator's daughter, wife, or when he is her custodian, teacher, or otherwise in charge of her; when the perpetrator accused of soliciting was armed during the act. Case law, however, had interpreted solicitation to mean proven engagement in prostitution, thus making it much more difficult to prosecute for solicitation. Under section 202 of the Penal Law, soliciting a woman to leave her home with the intention of engaging her in prostitution is punishable by 5 years imprisonment, and if the woman is a minor - by up to seven years. Soliciting a woman to leave the country for the same purpose is also punishable by seven years. Section 207 imposes mandatory imprisonment on perpetrators convicted under sections 199-202, with no possibility of a suspended sentence. This is a highly unusual provision in the context of the Israeli criminal law and indicates the gravity which the legislator had attributed to these crimes.

Thus, these laws present potentially broad means to intervene for the purpose of lessening the exploitation, degradation and dangers facing women who engage in prostitution. However, these sections are rarely enforced. Instead, the prostitutes themselves are often arrested, not for engaging in prostitution - since that is not a criminal offense, but for related practices such as the enticement of others to engage in indecent acts in public places, a felony punishable by three months in prison, according to section 209(a). Usually prostitutes are released after several hours, but sometimes they are charged under section 209(a), which was never intended to serve as a regulation of prostitution, or under section 216(a)(5) which prohibits "strolling." Another criminal offense directly applicable to women who engage in prostitution, is section 215(c) which states that being in a place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution, in circumstances which pose disturbance to neighbors or obstruction of traffic is punishable by up to one year in prison. Other crimes which may also be applicable to women prostitutes are sections 204-205 of the Penal Law, according to which the maintenance and management of a place for purposes of prostitution, including a motor vehicle or a vessel, are also criminal crimes, punishable by up to 5 years in prison. Similarly, lending a place for the purpose of prostitution is punishable by up to 6 months in prison. It should be noted that case law has interpreted these provisions to include situations in which women engage in prostitution in their homes, not just in brothels, or "massage institutes." These laws, again, are rarely enforced against women, as illustrated by the data supplied by the police in the following table.

Notwithstanding the relatively large number of convictions, the overall level of enforcement remains rather low. In internal instructions issued by the State Attorney in January 1994, the police are instructed to commence investigations under each of the following circumstances: when minors are involved in prostitution; when those who engage in prostitution have been manipulated into it; when there is severe abuse of women who engage in prostitution by their procurer, including blackmail and violence; when additional criminal activity such as drug-abuse is taking place. When one of these circumstances occurs in relation to the prostitution-related offences described above, the State-Attorney Office shall consider pressing charges.

As to the specific legislation aimed at the prevention of traffic in women, the only specific expression is in section 202(2) mentioned above, regarding the solicitation of a woman to leave "the country," i.e. Israel, in order to engage in prostitution in another country. There is no parallel provision related to bringing women from another country into Israel for that purpose.

The legal framework theoretically offers means to criminally charge the clientele of the sex-industry under at least one section, namely section 210 of the Penal Law-1977, which states that approaching a minor under 16 or an adult woman with indecent insinuations is punishable by up to three months in prison. This section however, has never been enforced against clients of prostitutes.

3. Evaluation of the Actual Situation

In the last few years, the problem of prostitution has grown in Israel, particularly among foreign women. It is difficult to obtain official statements regarding the exact extent of the phenomenon, but most of this traffic in women comes from the former USSR; some of these women enter Israel as tourists, though many of them are given false identities which facilitates their immigration to Israel. According to authorities at the Neve Tirza women's prison, there has been a steady increase in the numbers of foreign women involved in sex-work who are arrested for illegal stay in Israel and who are detained before being deported to their home-countries; in over 95% of the cases, these home countries were in the former USSR.

The average time these women spend in prison is 50 days, but detention may vary depending on the time needed to verify their identities and prepare the necessary documentation for their deportation. The women themselves are supposed to pay for their expenses, but when their resources are inadequate, the Ministry of Interior finances their deportation from a special budget.

On the governmental level, a special Service for Girls in Distress in the Ministry of Labor and Social-Services is in charge of prevention and rehabilitation programs for girls in these situations, as will be detailed below.

On the non-governmental level, there is only one organization which deals exclusively with the problem of prostitution, namely Shani - Israeli Abolitionist Center Against Contemporary Slavery, which is the Israeli branch established in 1995 of the International Abolitionist Federation. Several of the more general women's organizations in Israel have also recently become involved in this area.

NGOs who work in this area observe that there is no organized "sex tourism" into Israel, although it is not uncommon for some hotels to supply their guests with information about "sex services." Outgoing "sex tourism" prompted various NGOs to advance legislation to prohibit Israeli citizens from engaging in commercial sexual-relations with minors outside the state of Israel.

4. Involvement of Minors in Prostitution

The issue of minors' involvement in prostitution is dealt with under the general provisions of the Penal Law-1977, in the sections constituting aggravated circumstances, as described above. In addition, there is a special prohibition, punishable by three years in prison, against permitting a minor (defined as a person between 2-17 years old) who is under one's supervision to live in or frequent a place of prostitution. Similarly, permitting a minor under 18 who is under one's supervision to engage in enticement under section 209(a), is also punishable by three years in prison. As part of the growing awareness of this problem, there are several related bills in progress, aimed at preventing minors from involvement in prostitution.

There are few NGO's who are devoted to work in the area of child-prostitution, of these the most prominent are Elem, which deals solely with minors, and Shani - mentioned above. Recently, as a result of the rising awareness of this problem on the international level as well as in Israel, other NGOs who deal with children's rights have joined in efforts to combat child-prostitution.

The head of the Elem organization testified in the Knesset Education Committee about the methods that are used to identify vulnerable girls in nightclubs and force them into prostitution. Once again, no statistical data has been obtained to indicate the extent of this phenomenon. According to Elem, there are not enough social services which target this vulnerable population, particularly school dropouts, which could help prevent them from being drawn into prostitution.

Another major problem, according to those NGOs who deal with minors, is the growing market for child-pornography, which although not produced in Israel, is imported and sold freely in response to ever growing demand. The use of child pornography is explicitly dealt with under the section 214 of the Penal Code, which prohibits the publication and presentation of obscene materials.

One significant aspect of the spread of prostitution is the profusion of sex service advertisements in daily newspapers. The expansion of this phenomenon led to a private bill, proposed in 1995, which would restrict these advertisements. Fearing restrictions on freedom of commercial expression, media and public representatives established an ad-hoc public committee which offered guidelines to publishers regarding these concerns. These guidelines were accepted by all the parties, including representatives of the written media. The significant consequences of this initiative were: 1) The cessation of advertisements which specifically mentioned or alluded to the age (under 18) of the women whose sex-services were being advertised. 2) The moderation of the overall tone of these ads and the pictures which accompany them.

5. Social Attitudes Towards Prostitutes

The overall attitude of courts toward prostitution can be characterized as negative; it is described as immoral and corrupt. The judicial attitude toward women who engage in prostitution is more complex, and varies according to the specific circumstances of each case. In some cases, sympathetic expressions toward these women can be found, in recognition of the harsh circumstances they face and the need to protect them from abuse and exploitation through appropriate legislation (State v. Prosper). More often, however, prostitutes are portrayed as untrustworthy witnesses and as deficient mothers.

5.1. The Connection between Prostitution and Women's Criminality (Mainly Drugs)

There is a significant correlation between prostitution and drug abuse. According to the Neve Tirza prison's officials' evaluation, of the 200 prisoners currently in Neve-Tirza, 70% are drug-addicts (mainly to heroine, which is the most common drug in Israel) and 10% are in a process of getting treated. Of the 80% with drug addictions, over 60% were involved in prostitution in order to finance their addiction.

6. Rehabilitation Programs for Women and Girls in Distress

When examining rehabilitation programs for women who engage in prostitution an important distinction should be made between those who are drug-addicts and those who are not. As mentioned above, some 80% of the women prisoners are drug addicts, and as the table below shows, there is a rise in the number of women drug abusers and other drug-related crimes.

A major rehabilitation organization for girls is the Service for Girls in Distress under the Ministry of Labour and Welfare, which treats adolescent girls age 13-22 in the Jewish population and up to age 25 in the Arab population. Of those treated at any given time, 20% are generally Arabs and 20% of are generally recent immigrants. They suffer from problems ranging from drug addiction to indiscriminatory sexual relations, and unwanted pregnancies, etc., which in many cases result from physical or sexual abuse in their families. The Service works to rehabilitate these girls and re-integrate them into society through therapy, vocational training, and IDF preparation classes which enables the Jewish girls to be conscripted into the army. The Service also operates halfway houses for girls age 17-18 who are capable of functioning independently. The length of stay in these halfway houses is generally one and a half years, and there are currently 6 such halfway houses, one of which is solely for Arab girls. In addition, there are two country-wide shelters, one for Jewish girls and one for Arab girls, which provide emergency protection and treatment of up to one month. Overall, the Service treated 5500 girls in 1993, 7744 girls in 1994, 9000 girls in 1995, and about 10,000 girls in 1996.

ARTICLE 7 Political and Public Life

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in the political and public life of the country, and, in particular, shall ensure to women, on equal terms with men, the right:

- a) To vote in all elections and public referenda and to be eligible for election to all publicly elected bodies;*
- b) To participate in the formulation of government policy and the implementation thereof and to hold public office and perform all public functions at all levels of government;*
- c) To participate in non-government organizations and associations concerned with the public and political life of the country.*

1. The Right to Vote and Be Elected

There is full equality between men and women regarding the right to vote and to be elected in Israel. Section 5 of the Basic Law: The Knesset specifically states that every Israeli citizen aged 18 or older shall be entitled to vote, and section 6 of the same law states that every Israeli citizen aged 21 or older is entitled to run for election.

1. 1. Voting Patterns

Israeli elections consistently draw turnouts which are among the highest in the democratic world (on the average 85% of those eligible to vote). There is no noticeable difference between men and women regarding the participation in the act of voting. The percentage of men and women voters remains approximately the same (85%). Women in the Arab-Israeli community show a higher rate of voting (89.1%) than the men (80.5%).

As to the question of the relevance of gender in casting a ballot, in a national survey conducted recently, an overwhelming majority of both men and women (81% and 79%, respectively) replied that the issue did not have any impact whatsoever on their voting behavior.

2. Women as Members of Political Parties

Women operate within political parties under two categories: in specific women's sections and as individual members. They are considered to have a dual role: to recruit support for the party among women constituencies, and to promote women's representation in the party. The significance of women members in Israeli political parties was accentuated in the 1992 elections when primary elections were first held. The introduction of primaries as a means for selecting parliamentary candidates sharpened politicians' sensitivity to the public mood. In the primaries, only the registered members of a certain party may vote in that party's internal elections and can thereby decide who will be the party's candidates to the Knesset.

2. 1. Party Membership and Voting

In a survey conducted recently, 17.0% of the men and 10.9% of the women respondents reported actual membership in political parties. Moreover, 44.3% of the women polled stated that they did not support nor were they active in any political party.

Table 1 - Women Elected to Knesset, by Party

Party	Number of Men	Number of Women	% of Women in Party
1996
Labor	31	3	9%
Likud	30	2	6%
Meretz	7	2	22%
1992
Labor	40	4	9%
Likud	30	2	6%
Ratz	4	2	33%

This data shows that in left-wing parties (Ratz, Meretz, Labor) women representation is higher than in right-wing parties (Likud).

Today, a small number of women hold high-ranking positions in political parties in Israel. These include: Zehava Galon - General Secretary of Meretz (Israel Democratic Party), Tamar Guzanski - Leader of Chadash (Democratic Party for Peace and Equality), Limor Livnat (Likud) - Minister of Communications, and until recently, Shualmit Aloni who founded the Civil Rights Party and served as Cabinet Minister under the government headed by the late Yitzhak Rabin. None of the religious parties had any female candidates in viable places on their party lists.

Women who attain top party positions, do not regard themselves as representing the female constituency but rather the public at large. Moreover, women members of parliament take pains to emphasize that their political careers are geared toward national ends, rather than towards promulgating women's interests.

2. 2. Public Awareness of Women Candidates

The media has a very important role in publicizing election campaigns, particularly of women. According to a poll conducted two months before the recent 1996 elections, 94% of the people interviewed said that they received information about women candidates from the media, while only 11% reported y received it from the candidates' public activity. In the same poll 68% of the people interviewed said they believed there was no discrimination between men and women by the media. 32% of the women interviewed and 25% of the men believed there was discrimination against women. The following table describes the sources by which members of the public gain recognition of the candidates.

2. 3. Securing Places for Women

In the 1996 elections, 69 women ran for elections within the parties (primaries). The Labor party secured 6 places for women on its list (out of 44) and the Likud party secured 3 places for women (out of 42). Meretz, the Citizen Rights Party, secured 3 places on its list (out of 14).

After the votes were counted only 3 women were elected from the Labor party and only 2 women from the Likud party. From Meretz only 2 women were elected out of 9 Knesset members (constituting 22%). These results are primarily because the large parties diminished in their strength.

3. Women's Representation in the Knesset

Chart 1 -Women MKs Throughout the Years

In the 1996 elections only 9 women out of 120 were elected to the Knesset. This figure represents a decline in the number of women in the Knesset.

3. 1. Women as Knesset Members

Many of the powerful seats and positions in the Knesset have never been assigned to women. For example, there has never been a woman Knesset Speaker, though in many Knessets women have served as deputy speakers. On the two most powerful Knesset committees, the Foreign and Security Affairs Committee and the Finance Committee, few women have been assigned. As in other countries, there are many women on committees which are responsible for matters associated with traditional women's interests, such as education, welfare, and social services. In addition, women Member of Knesset have been active in promoting bills and petitions which have dealt with family, welfare, social and economic matters.

In the present Knesset (1996 elections) the nine women in the Knesset serve on one or more of the following Knesset committees: 1 woman on the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee, 3 women on the Labor Committee, 3 women on the Education and Culture Committee, 3 women on the Immigration Committee, 2 women on the Interior Committee.

4. Women in Government

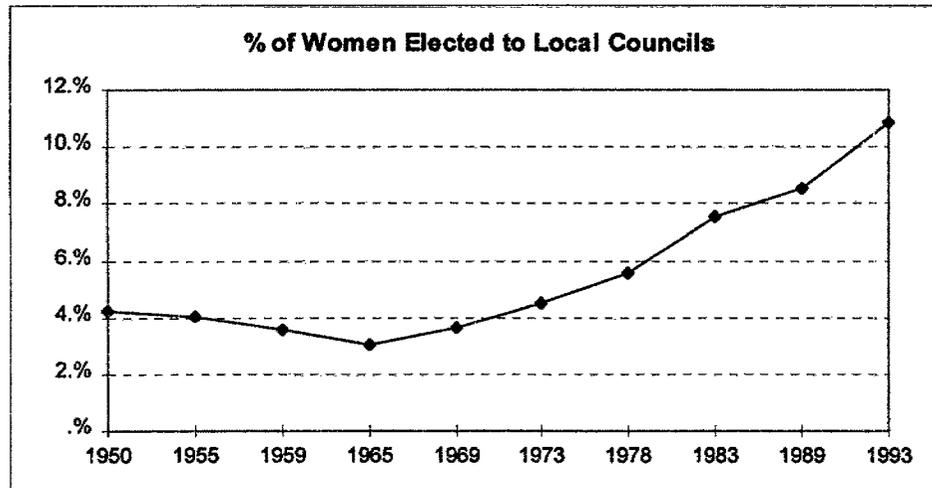

Since the emergence of the State of Israel, only one woman, Golda Meir, has served as prime minister. Having served in the Knesset since 1949, Golda Meir was elected prime minister in 1969 and held the prime minister's office until 1974.

Since the establishment of the State of Israel, six women have served as cabinet ministers. In the current government only 1 of 18 ministers is a woman (Limor Livnat, Minister of Communications). In addition, the heads of 2 government offices, the Environment Protection Department and the Justice Department, are women.

5. Women in Local Authorities

Data indicates women's representation in local authorities has been extremely limited. Nevertheless, there has been a significant increase in women's representation since the first local elections were held in 1950:

Chart 2 - Women Elected to Local Councils

During the State's existence, only six women have served as heads of local councils, none of them in a city with a population over 10,000. Currently, there is only one woman head of a local council, and seven women serve as deputy mayors.

6. Women in the Civil Service

6. 1. Ranks of Women in the Civil Service

Although women made up 59.4% of all civil-servants in December 1995, their rate among the senior staff (namely the three top ranks) of the four main classifications (which compose the main resource for managers in the civil service) was only 10.5%. Women's underrepresentation in the top positions is correlated by their overrepresentation in the lowest ranks (rank 8 and below), where they made up 64.2% of all workers in December 1995. Recent data submitted by the Civil Commission to the Knesset Committee on the Advancement of Women show that significant progress was made from December 1994 to December 1996: the number of women among the senior staff has more than tripled in those two years (from 25 to 85) so that women now make up 14% of the senior staff. However, this apparent progress is misleading, since between 1993 and 1994 a sharp decline in the rate of women in top positions took place, as a result of the new payment-agreements that were signed. This analysis is supported by an examination of the changes in the rate of women among the lowest ranks, relative to their total rate in those four main classifications: from December 1994 to December 1996 the total rate of women increased from 53.5% to 54.3%, and their rate among the lowest ranks increased from 63.7% to 64.3%. In other words, women continue to be overrepresented in the lowest ranks of the Service.

6. 2. Tenders in the Civil Service

The increase of women's participation in internal job-tenders in the civil service, both as candidates and as appointees, is quite constant: in four years the percentage of women candidates has more than doubled, from 23.2% in 1993 to 51.9% in 1996, and the percentage of women who were appointed has likewise more than doubled, from 26.1% in 1993 to 55.7% in 1996. The situation in public tenders is far less positive: from a slight increase in the percentage of women candidates and appointees (from 33.6% in 1994 to 35.2% in 1995 among the candidates, and from 36% in 1994 to 36.7% in 1995 of those appointed), there was a sharp decline among women candidates, and an even sharper one of those appointed: only 30.3% among the candidates were women, and only 28.9% of those appointed were women. The decline in the actual number of women who presented their candidacy went from 3000 in 1994 to 1670 in 1996. Furthermore, while women are consistently appointed at a higher rate relative to the rate of women who presented their candidacy (with an exception in 1994 internal tenders), this has shifted in the 1996 public tenders. The Commission tries to explain this general decline by the overall cutbacks that were imposed on the Civil Service during 1996.

In 1996, an additional regression appears in the gender-composition of the tender committees. As explained under Article 2 above, one of the changes in the Civil Service Code following the 1993 Ben-Israel committee recommendations was reinforcement of the requisite representation of both sexes in tender committees. Although there was indeed a slow decline between 1993 to 1995 in the number of committees composed of men only, both in internal and public tenders (e.g. from 5.4% to 1.6% of all committees in internal tenders, and from 33.5% to 28.6% of all committees in public tenders), there was an unexplained increase in their percentage in 1996 (3.9% in internal tenders and 30.6% in public tenders).

A final piece of information concerning tenders will conclude this examination on a somewhat pessimistic note: upon examination of data that analyses the rates of candidacy and appointment in public tenders in five leading classifications (which together made up 80% of all public tenders) along the line of specific ranks, it appears that during 1995-96, very few women presented their candidacy to the top three positions, and no women were appointed to them, except in the lawyers classification. Furthermore, there is a consistent decrease in both the rates of women candidates and the rates of women appointed as their rank increases.

Notwithstanding this analysis, an inner report of the Civil Service Commission from July 1995 analyzes the data gathered from all tender committees and concludes that at present, women stand a higher chance of being appointed in tender committees than men. The report raises the question of why so few women present their candidacy to these tenders. This is clearly one area in which more analytical energy needs to be invested.

7. Women in Public Institutions

7.1. In the General Labor Union (Histadrut)

The General Labor Union is a powerful organization which acts as an umbrella for many workers' unions in Israel.

Table 4 - Women in the Histadrut

7.1.1. Resolution Securing Equal Representation for Women

In January 1995 an important resolution was passed in the Histadrut Convention. This resolution added a provision to the articles of association of the Histadrut which demands that in every Labor Union there shall be at least 30% women. In addition, the same shall apply to all Workers' Committees.

7.2. Workers' Committees and Labor Councils

At present, 10% of all workers' committees are headed by women, and 17% of the workers' committees membership is comprised of women. There are currently 3 women secretaries of Labor Councils, 2 women deputy-secretaries of Labor Councils, and 20 women secretaries of Labor Unions. Women hold managerial positions in many Labor Councils: there are presently 4 community welfare managers, 1 educational manager, 13 treasurers, 18 community managers, 3 absorption committee heads, 3 youth committee heads, 4 consumer committee heads, 10 cultural committee heads, 8 senior citizens committee heads, 19 accountants and one spokeswoman. Altogether, there are 530 women out of 1028 overall serving in labor councils, constituting 51% of those serving in labor councils.

8. The Judiciary

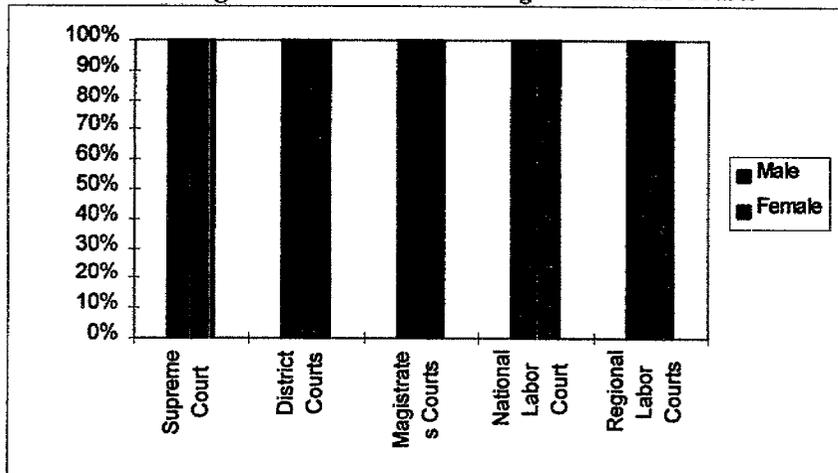

The percentage of women in the judiciary is extraordinarily high compared to other areas of public life. In all the different courts (Supreme Court, District Courts, Magistrate Courts, Labor Courts) there are 146 women judges and 229 men judges. In other words, women constitute 40% of the judiciary in Israel.

Chart 3 - Percentage of Woman and Men Judges in Various Courts

Women's relatively large representation in the judiciary is also evidenced in the public sector of the legal profession. The present State Attorney is a woman. Her predecessor was the first woman to serve in this role and was later appointed to the Supreme Court. Four out of the five District Attorneys are women. In the District Attorneys offices, there are 207 women lawyers compared to 126 men, and 237 women public service attorneys compared to 115 men.

9. Representation in Religious Bodies

9. 1. Rabbinical Courts

The Religious Judges Law - 1955 and the Druse Courts Law - 1962 have been interpreted by Jewish, Muslim and Druse religious leaders to mean that only men can serve as judges in these courts. Consequently, Israel has expressed its reservation with regard to Article 7(b) of the Convention concerning the appointment of women to serve as judges of religious courts.

9. 2. Municipal Religious Councils

In recent years, changes have taken place in the representation of women in religious bodies. Following two landmark Supreme Court decisions in 1988, women were granted the right to participate in the committee for selection of chief rabbis and the right to participate in municipal religious councils. In Poraz v. Tel Aviv Mayor, the Supreme Court allowed women to participate in the committee for the selection of the Tel Aviv chief rabbi, emphasizing that exclusion of women from serving on political committees which deal with religious matters constitutes discrimination and is therefore void. In Shakdiel v. Minister of Religious Affairs, the Supreme Court granted Leah Shakdiel the right to be elected to the religious council of the city Yeruham in southern Israel.

Despite this landmark decision, which opened the doors to women who wished to serve on municipal religious councils, the number of women on municipal religious councils remains small. Out of 139 religious councils, only 12 councils include a woman. Almost a decade after the Supreme Court decision, women still have great difficulties in getting elected to municipal religious councils.

10. Government Corporations

As explained in Article 4 above, an amendment to the Government Companies Law 1975 was passed in 1993 which requires equal representation of both sexes in the board of directors of every government corporation. Furthermore, the amendment demands that in order to promote the goal of equal representation, the Ministers shall appoint directors from the less-represented sex until such equality is achieved.

A public committee, headed by a District Court Judge, was established to oversee the implementation of this amendment. The committee discovered that in most government corporations there were no female directors. Thus, the committee's main function has been to "remind" all government agencies of their duty, in accordance with the amendment, to appoint female directors to government corporations where openings are available.

This amendment came under judicial review when two government corporations, Israel Ports and Trains Authority and Israel Refineries, appointed two men to the board of directors, in each of which there were no women. The Supreme Court decided that these appointments were invalid because they disregarded the amendment. Justice Matza, delivering the opinion of the Court, justified the use of affirmative action in light of the conspicuous inequality of women representation in government corporations. Justice Matza relied on Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, claiming that equality is an inherent attribute to a person's dignity. A more detailed description of the decision is found under Article 4 above.

According to a research conducted in 1996, this amendment's effects have been felt in 68% of government corporations. Still there are 18 corporations (16%) in which there are no women directors. In 12 corporations (11%) the number of women remains the same as it did in 1993, the year the amendment was passed. But there has been progress in many corporations: in 48% of those where there were no women directors in 1993, women have since been appointed as directors. In 21 corporations (18.9%) where women served as directors in 1993, there has been a significant increase in their number.

Although the amendment has caused a substantial improvement in women representation, progress remains to be done since in the majority of government corporations women still constitute less than 30 % of the directors.

11. Women's Political Activism

The involvement of women in extra-parliamentary political activity has been aimed at influencing the decision making process from the grassroots level. The focus of these groups has been organizing demonstrations, rallies, peace marches and other activities aimed at influencing public opinion.

In 1977 the peace movement known as Shalom Achsav (Peace Now) was established with the aim of pressuring the Israeli government to consider constructive peace proposals. Although many women participated in the activities of this movement it was not an exclusively a women's movement.

Many women have linked their broader political involvement with feminist political strategies. In 1982, after the Peace for the Galilee Operation in Lebanon, some fifty women, and a few men, joined together under the name "Parents against the Silence," to collect signatures and sign petitions calling for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon. Another group called "Women against the Invasion of Lebanon" was formed consisting of feminist activists who demanded the immediate withdrawal of the troops from Lebanon.

After the Lebanon War ended, this group continued to operate under the name "Women against the Occupation." They protested the conditions under which Palestinian women were held in Israeli prisons.

After the Palestinian uprising (intifada) broke out in December 1987, a women's peace movement was formed which protested the military policy in the occupied territories. The group, called Women in Black, gathered every Friday afternoon wearing black at a central square in Jerusalem to mourn the victims of violence and called for the end of the occupation. Later this form of demonstration spread to 33 other locations in Israel. The Women in Black became an embodiment of peaceful protest which was widely imitated around the world.

Another peace group which was formed in Haifa was called Women for Women. This organization also demanded the end of the occupation and for the recognition of a national right to self-determination for the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The Women's Organization for Political Prisoners (WOFPP) was founded in 1988 and focused on the fate of individual Palestinian women who had been imprisoned. The WOFPP continually brought human rights violations in military jails to the attention of the Israeli public.

All of the women's peace groups and activities have been guided by a desire to establish and institutionalize a Palestinian-Israeli dialogue. For this purpose, many joint conferences and demonstrations were held, and meetings between Israeli and Palestinian women were based on the assumption that concerned women could eliminate prejudices in personal conversations. The women's peace movement also managed to attract the attention of the Israeli population at large by organizing large-scale events and conferences which were open to the public. Thus, the peace initiative of the government headed by the late Yitzhak Rabin in 1993 can be partly attributed to the efforts and continued protest of the women's peace groups.

The efforts of Israeli women to join and influence the peace process continued after the Oslo Accords were signed in September 1993, when the Jerusalem Link was founded. The Jerusalem Link comprises a coordinating committee of two women's centers, independent of each other, one Jewish in West Jerusalem, "Bat Shalom" (Hebrew for Daughter of Peace), and the other Arab in East Jerusalem, "Jerusalem Center for Women". They organize joint demonstration against human rights violations in Israeli jails and organize drives to collect signatures. Both organizations are concerned with promoting feminist ideas both in the Israeli and Palestinian public.

Another women's group called Association of Women for Peace was formed since the signing of the Oslo Accords. The association holds meetings of Israeli and Palestinian women, and its goal is to strengthen the peace process and to facilitate the implementation of the Interim Agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Since the Oslo Accords, a right-wing women's group was formed in protest against Israeli concessions in the peace process. This group, called Women in Green, derives its name from its rival Women in Black. They participate in demonstrations which oppose the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the occupied territories, and protest the Israeli willingness to give up territory in exchange for peace.

12. Women in the Security Forces: Military and Police

12. 1. The Legal Framework

The Defense Service Law-1986, which replaced the 1949 version of the law, mandates service in the military for both men and women, while differentiating between the sexes regarding their conditions of service. Article 1 of the law states that the law applies to men between the ages of 18 and 54, and to women between the ages of 18 and 38. Gender-based differentiation is also made as regards the length of mandatory service in the Army, the extent of reserve duty obligations, voluntary service, and exemptions. According to the above law, women are exempt from mandatory service if they are married, pregnant, or mothers. In the very first years of the State, Prime Minister Ben-Gurion made a political arrangement with the leaders of the ultra-orthodox community in Israel, whereby young men would be allowed to postpone or cancel their service in the army in order to study in religious academies. While this arrangement continues to be utilized today, its application is restricted to a narrow segment of the population. The National Service Law, 1953 provides what may be seen as a parallel arrangement for young women who, for religious or conscientious reasons, are reluctant to serve in the Army. According to the National Service Law, 1953, a woman may substitute military service with two years of national service. This provision, however, is not strictly enforced. As will be shown below, the percentage of women who do make use of the various exemptions is significantly higher than that of men.

The Defense Service Law itself does not differentiate between the duties that may be assigned to men and those which may be assigned to women. In practice, however, IDF policy has generally been to discourage and forbid women soldiers from serving in combat positions.

12. 1. 1. The Miller Case

Until 1956, a number of women served in the Air-Force as pilots of carrier planes. Later, the decision was made that training women as fighter pilots only to employ them as pilots of carrier planes was not cost-effective, especially given their relatively short terms of service. Since then, and until 1995, there was only one instance of a woman being accepted as a pilot trainee.

In 1995, the Supreme Court decided in the landmark Alice Miller case that the IDF could not claim logistical and budgetary constraints as justifications for excluding women from serving as pilots in the Air-Force. Relying on the Defence Service Law, 1986, the Army argued that the shorter mandatory service required of women, together with their more limited reserve-duty obligations and exemptions for pregnancy and childbirth, interfered with the ability of the Army to make efficient use of the resources and funds invested in the training of each individual pilot. In three separate majority opinions, the Court rejected this line of reasoning, holding instead that the principle of equality required the Army to overcome such obstacles and accommodate the natural biological needs of women, just as it would the natural needs of men. As Justice Matza stated: "Even if the assumption were that the average total contribution of the female pilot--from the point of view of length and continuity of service-- were less than that of the male pilot, this is a difference resulting from the very fact that she is a woman. This difference may not be held against her, and it can be dealt with logistically." Justice Matza, finding for Miller, suggested the Army conduct a trial period during which it would admit a limited number of female pilots and determine whether, in fact, such admission presented insurmountable obstacles.

The Army has since taken steps to implement the Alice Miller decision. Two classes of women candidates have begun the pilot training course, and guidelines have been established to adapt army policy regarding women's service to the potential reality of women combat pilots. The guidelines include provisions requiring women pilot candidates to volunteer to serve additional time and perform reserve duty, logistical arrangements regarding sleeping arrangements, and instructions regarding the event of pregnancy. They similarly provide that despite the general policy according to which the Commanding Officer (CO) of the Women's Corps has exclusive jurisdiction over women serving in the IDF (discussed below), women pilot candidates are to be subject to the jurisdiction of their course commanders. Perhaps most importantly (in light of the army's general policy regarding women in combat), the guidelines provide instructions whereby women pilots will perform combat duties or duties in hostile territory according to the decision of the CO of the Air Force, under the advisement of the Chief of Staff.

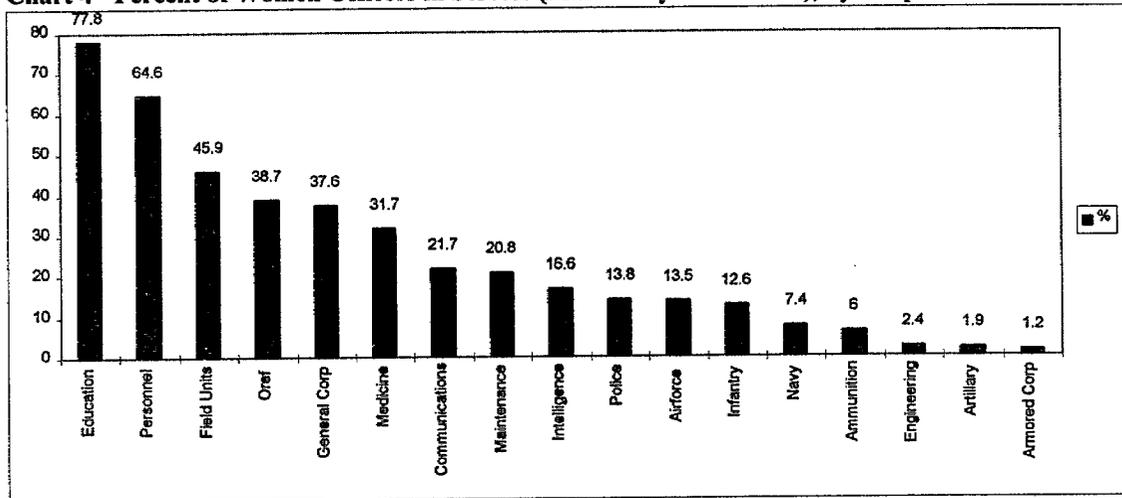

12. 2. Women and Men in the Military--Some Data

Approximately 42% of all conscripted soldiers in 1996 were women. While approximately 68% of draftable women were conscripted in 1996 (the remaining 32% receiving exemptions of one form or another), 83.3% of draftable men were enlisted.

12. 2. 1. Women and Men Officers

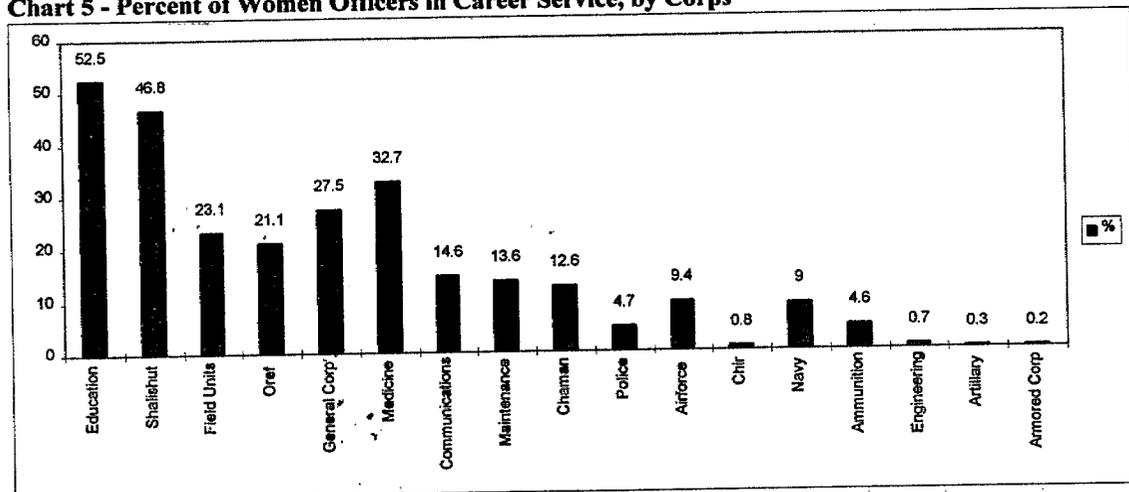

The graph below compares the 1995 proportion of women officers during mandatory service to the total number of officers, as distributed among the various corps.

Chart 4 - Percent of Women Officers in Service (Mandatory and Career), by Corps

Thus, the greater the combat component, the smaller the proportion of women officers. The graph below presents the same breakdown, this time for women career officers. It may be noted that in no corps do women constitute significantly more than half of the total career officers:

Chart 5 - Percent of Women Officers in Career Service, by Corps

Because women do not serve in combat positions, they are excluded from the upper echelons of the military hierarchy and confront a classic “glass ceiling” in their efforts to advance professionally. As can be seen from the table below, there were only nine women at the rank of

Colonel in 1985 and still only 11 in 1995, two of which served in Chen (the women's corps). In contrast, there was a significant increase in the proportion of women officers up to the rank of lieutenant colonel resulting from pressure from women wishing to move up the hierarchy and supported by the CO of Chen, as well as from the military's increased recognition of women's competence. It should also be noted that in 1995 women constituted two thirds of the second lieutenants, the lowest officer rank. The higher proportion of women junior officers among those in compulsory military service is explained by the profile characteristics of the women conscripted and the type of jobs women do. Women are recruited at what in military terms is defined as a significantly higher "quality-score" floor than men, and men with a high quality-score profile are more likely to be assigned to combat than to officer roles (Israeli, 1997). Consequently, proportionately more women than men qualify to be officers and more are used in jobs of officer rank--mainly in the Personnel Corps. Furthermore, the proportion of women among Second Lieutenants has increased significantly in the last decade, as jobs done by women or to which women were transferred, primarily in the Personnel Corps, were upgraded from Non-Commissioned Officer to junior officer, resulting in an increase in the total number of officer roles at the lowest ranks:

The following table shows the differences between men and women regarding the amount of time each serves in their rank before being promoted. At all levels, women must invest significantly more time before they are promoted to higher ranks. The graph differentiates between the General and Personnel Corps on the one hand, in which there is a relatively high participation of women, and "the rest" of the IDF, including combat related fields on the other, where women's presence is far less marked:

12. 2. 2. Distribution of Men and Women among Jobs in the Military

In recent years, more jobs have opened up to women in the army. In 1976, according to the abovementioned Commission on the Status of Women (1978), 210 out of 709 jobs were open to women, but women actually served in about half of those. Approximately 70% were in clerical positions. In 1988 women served in 234 of the approximately 500 jobs open to them. In 1996 they served in 282 of the 447 jobs open to them, while 178 were classified as combat positions and were closed to women. We can thus see that many more opportunities are open to women today than in the past.

The scope of this change, however, is significantly limited by the exclusion of women from combat roles. While the Defense Services Law, 1986 no longer differentiates between men and women as regards the jobs which they are permitted to perform in the army, IDF policy continues to exclude women from combat positions. A differentiation should be made between positions which actually involve combat--which are closed to women--and non-combat positions in combat fields, which are open to women. Thus, for example, women may serve as instructors for jobs that are in fact combat jobs, but they are not allowed to perform those duties in the field. A third category involves jobs performed in combat areas. Combat areas are in principle also closed to women, unless specific approval has been granted. No women today, for example, serve in Lebanon, regardless of the actual content of the duty they perform. Women do perform non-combat functions in the West Bank and Gaza. In addition to the actual combat positions which are closed to women, various positions, while not actually involving combat, have traditionally been viewed as requiring previous combat experience and have thus been closed de facto to women as well. These include Chief Educational Officer, CO of Intelligence, CO of Personnel, Military Spokesperson, Chief Medical Officer, Chief Mental Health Officer, Chief Military Prosecutor, and President of the Appeals Court. The exclusion of women from these high-ranking positions has been criticized as withholding from women what could be an alternative route to leadership.

The use of women instructors for combat units was introduced in the early 1980's and has become relatively accepted. Between 1983 and 1993, women's representation among instructors grew by over 400%. Serving as an instructor for men-only units is therefore among the most prestigious jobs open to women. It should be pointed out, however, that the actual number of women instructors relative to male instructors remains low. The following table presents the breakdown of jobs held by women in the army, as compared with men:

Table 9 - Distribution of Conscripts by Gender and Job Category (1995)

A look at the composition of mixed courses for various jobs in the army shows the extent to which certain jobs are still considered "feminine," while other, relatively prestigious non-combat jobs, have become gender-neutral. Over 90% of participants in personnel and education-related NCO courses are women. On the other hand, courses for computer operators, air photo decoders, field security personnel, and flight supervisors have basically equal representations of both men and women:

In certain areas, such as the technical branches, women's participation remains low despite the willingness of the army to accept women into such positions. This is mainly due to the fact that few women who are enlisted in the army have the pre-army training necessary to effectively fill these positions, and their short service makes it cost-ineffective for the army to specifically train them for these positions. As the technological services are among the most essential in the IDF, the lack of women's participation in this area of the army, together with their exclusion from combat and their exemption from reserve duty, mean that women are effectively absent from three of the most significant branches of the army. The army has recently become involved in various projects in conjunction with civilian industrial bodies, designed to encourage women to enter technological fields.

One project, which has not yet been implemented, aims to encourage 9th grade girls to enter technological areas of study in high school, the assumption being that they would then continue working in these fields both in the army and after. Another program aims to encourage women finishing high school to postpone their army service while obtaining a degree in one of the technological fields, and then serve in the army in a position connected to what they have studied. This is part of a general program, called the Atudah, which enables men and women to postpone their army service while completing their studies beforehand. Women who join the Atudah program have a higher chance of actually performing their army service in their specialized area of study than do men, since men's ability to do so is subject to the army's need for combat soldiers.

12.3. Interaction Between the Military and Civilian Life

Various researchers have referred to the paradoxical effect of the military on Israeli women's status (Izraeli 1997). On the one hand, Israel prides itself on being the only nation in the world where women, like men, are conscripted for mandatory service in the military. Given the importance of the army in Israeli society, this represents a mark of gender equality. However, military service for most women is quite different than it is for men. While a certain amount of progress has been made in the last decade regarding the improvement of women's status within the army, and while more and more jobs have been opening up to them, women continue to be excluded from combat positions. Thus women remain excluded from the upper echelons of the military leadership.

In order to understand the impact of this dynamic upon the status of Israeli women, it is necessary to understand the social and political significance of the army in Israel. As a country preoccupied with security concerns, Israel has been forced to invest a tremendous amount in the military, both financially and socially. The army is therefore one of the most important public institutions. Sociologists have pointed out the role that has been assigned to the army as a major source for the formation and recruitment of the political, and to a certain extent, economic elite (Izraeli, 1997; Yishai, 1997). It is an important channel for political recruitment and a recruitment pool for civilian managers in business and industry. It also serves as an educational and socializing agency and provides a source of personal identity as well as of national pride and identification.

As sociologists assert, the role of women within the army, therefore, has tremendous consequences for their status outside the army. The fact that no woman possesses rank over Brigadier General and that only men are found at the top echelons of the IDF, essentially means that it is only men who define and determine issues of national security. (Israeli, 1997). As prestigious combat positions are virtually the only avenue to the most senior positions in the professional army, and the symbolic rewards and glory associated with them, women's exclusion from combat units means their exclusion from the top ranks of the army.

A recent study by Professor Israeli shows that in some cases, the link between military and civilian success has even been institutionalized. For example, El-Al, Israel's national airline, recruits its pilots exclusively from the military. While this policy is currently being challenged in the Labor Court on the basis of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988 (see Article 2), and while women are currently being trained as IDF pilots, this restriction has meant that women can never be hired as El-Al pilots.

12. 4. The Chen--Women' Corps

Today, all women enter the army through the "Women's Corps" (called in Hebrew by the acronym Chen). The Women's Corps was created during the War of Independence and was based on a compromise between two competing models--the "Palmach" model, in which men and women served in mixed units, and the English model, in which women served separately in an auxiliary unit. There is no "Men's Corps" in the army, and all other corps are identified by their respective functions. Chen has formal responsibility for all women soldiers with regard to military training (including officer training), job assignments, discipline and judicial matters, as well as welfare and well-being, including protection from sexual harassment. Since 1983, Chen has had a Women's Corps Social Worker, whose job it is to assist women soldiers in handling their unique problems, including how to proceed if pregnant, how to manage various sexual issues, and how to deal with problems of sexual harassment.

Until 1987, the rank of the CO of Chen was that of Colonel. Only after intensive public pressure from women's organizations and women members of the Knesset, was the rank raised to that of Brigadier General, one rank below the CO of Personnel. Since the highest ranking woman in the IDF is a Brigadier General, and since there is only one woman of that rank, no woman is of high enough rank to participate in the meetings of the General Staff on a regular basis. The CO of Chen reports to the Chief of Personnel and may advise the Chief of Staff on matters of specific relevance to women. Until very recently, the CO of Chen was rarely consulted on matters of general relevance to women. For example, she was not party to the relevant decisions to cut women's military service from 24 to 22 and then 21 months.

Until the mid 1970s, the gender regime of the military, like most other aspects of the IDF, was not open to public critique. A number of social and political developments in the 1970s paved the way for a greater awareness of women's problems in and regarding the army, and in 1978 the report of the Prime Minister's Commission on the Status of Women challenged the prevailing myth of gender equality. The most direct frontal attack on the gender practices of the military, however, came from hearings conducted in the Knesset standing Committee on the Status of Women (1992-1996) and from the 1995 Alice Miller case (mentioned above).

12. 5. Sexual Harassment in the Army

While the army has begun to recognize and deal with the problem of sexual harassment, its handling of the issue has been criticized by women's groups for focusing on treatment and guidance for the victims or potential victims, rather than on educating the men soldiers and commanders to behave properly. In the IDF, as in the civilian sector, it is lives of the women complainants which are disrupted by their coming forward, rather than those of the sexual harassers; the preferred solution in fact being to transfer the complainant to another base rather than to suspend the man.

All women soldiers who are conscripted into the army are provided with information about sexual harassment and about the options available to those who experience it. They are encouraged to view harassment as the fault of the perpetrator and to come forward and report the incidents. Confidentiality is ensured, and the soldier's right to choose which one of the available services she turns to is emphasized (i.e. Women's Corps Social Worker, Military Police, Women's Corps CO, immediate commander, etc.). Various services, such as a hotline for sexual harassment complaints and a program in which victims of sexual harassment are provided with the counseling of a Chen officer, have recently been implemented. A comprehensive proposal for dealing with the phenomenon of sexual harassment in the army has recently been discussed, and the likelihood of its implementation is high. This proposal provides a broad definition of sexual harassment, emphasizing that it may be verbal or physical, and that it may involve explicit or implicit exploitation of authoritative position. It also obligates various officials to report to the military police all instances of physical harassment which come to their attention. Investigation by the police is then conditional upon the victim's consent and the Women's Corps Social Worker's assessment.

In 1994 the Chen Corps issued an internal report discussing the phenomenon of sexual harassment within the military, and found that most incidents of sexual harassment and indecent acts resulted only in absurdly low fines to be paid by the perpetrator. Recently, efforts have been made within Chen to ensure that punishments for sexual harassment reflect the severity of the damage caused to women soldiers who experience it, and in some cases sentences of 8 years imprisonment have been imposed. Similarly, the Personnel Division of the IDF recently decided to increase the severity of the punishments imposed and to ensure that any career soldier convicted of sexual harassment be discharged.

12. 6. Women in the Police

According to statistics of the Police Force of Israel, as of December 1995, women constituted approximately 18% of the Police (3583 women, as opposed to 16,490 men). While in 1995 women constituted approximately 25% of the applicants and only 12% of those who were eventually accepted, in the first part of 1996 (until May), women constituted 20% of the applicants and 20% of those who were accepted.

While the police force has no official policy regarding the areas within which women may serve, various positions either require army combat experience as a precondition for acceptance or indicate army combat experience as a preferred criterion. Given the policy of the IDF regarding women in combat, discussed above, this precondition effectively bars or hinders women from being able to serve in such positions.

In 1996 a petition was filed to the Supreme Court by several women applicants who felt that they had been discriminated against in their attempts to gain acceptance to the police force, and especially to what are considered "combat positions" within the force. In response to the petition, the Police decided to establish a committee to investigate the issue of women in the police force, and to reevaluate the policies according to which acceptance into its various branches is determined. The petition has not yet been decided by the Court.

ARTICLE 8

International Representation and Participation

State Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure to women, on equal terms with men and, without any discrimination, the opportunity to represent their Governments at the international level and to participate in the work of international organizations.

1. General

Women in Israel represent the Government on an international level, however the current numbers of women serving in this capacity are not yet equal to that of men. The present level of women's participation in the foreign service can be seen as a reflection women's overall position in the Israeli labor market, particularly in the civil service.

2. Details on Women's Representation

While there is no formal affirmative action policy in the foreign service, two years ago a decision to correct the discrimination in the numbers of women as heads of missions (which currently stands at 91 men and 9 women) was made, and a commitment to reach at least 50% female representation within ten years was taken. Of the 9 women heads of missions, 4 are political appointments (as are 7 of the 91 men).

3. Women Representatives to International Organizations

Israel has representatives in three of the Human Rights conventions of the UN: Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women - Dr. Carmel Shalev; Convention on the Rights of the Child - Deputy Attorney General Yehudit Karp; and Convention on Political and Civil Rights - Prof. David Kretchmer. The first two are women.

Among the representatives to the Peace Talks with the Palestinians, the percentage of women varies. For the most part, there are no women in high level positions, although at the middle working levels they are fairly represented. This is partly a result of the fact that the talks are run mainly by representatives of the army or by former army officials.

ARTICLE 9 Nationality

State Parties shall grant women equal rights with men to acquire, change, or retain their nationality. They shall ensure in particular that neither marriage to an alien nor change of nationality by the husband during marriage shall automatically change the nationality of the wife, render her stateless or force upon her the nationality of the husband.

States Parties shall grant women equal rights with men in respect to the nationality of their children.

1. Citizenship

The Nationality Law-1952 states that Israeli nationality is acquired in one of the following ways: through The Law Of Return-1950; residence in Israel; birth or naturalization. Israeli citizenship laws do not differentiate between men and women. Both genders have equal rights in regard to acquiring, changing or retaining their nationality. Neither the change of nationality by one member of a couple nor marriage to a non-citizen has any effect on one's citizenship. According to the laws relating to citizenship acquired by birth, both the father's and mother's citizenship carry equal weight.

According to The Law of Return, Jews and their relatives may acquire citizenship upon arrival in Israel. The law defines a Jew as either someone born to a Jewish mother, or a convert, and excludes Jews who have converted to another religion. The familial relationship required to determine Jewishness under The Law of Return is quite lenient and reaches back three generations. Its leniency is reflected in the fact that even one married to a grandchild of a Jew is entitled to acquire Israeli citizenship through The Law of Return.

In addition, other sections of The Nationality Law illustrate the identical rights available to both men and women. Section 7 states that the spouse of an Israeli national who has applied for citizenship through the naturalization process and who meets all the necessary requirements may obtain citizenship through naturalization even if he/she does not meet the necessary requirements. Furthermore, Section 8 of the law states that naturalization also confers Israeli citizenship on the minor children of the naturalized person who were residents of Israel or the occupied territories at the time of his/her naturalization. However, if the minor was a citizen of another country, and both parents were entitled to custody, but only one went through the naturalization process, the child will not obtain citizenship if one parent declares that he/she is against his/her child becoming an Israeli citizen. In any case, these provisions do not differentiate between the parents at all on the basis of gender.

A 1980 amendment to The Nationality Law illustrates the effort that Israeli legislators put forth to avoid discriminating against women. In section 4 of the 1952 version of the law. It states that where one is born after ones father's death, it shall be sufficient that the father was an Israeli citizen at the time of his death in order for him/her to acquire Israeli citizenship. Following the amendments this section speaks of the situation where one is born after the death of either parent. Although practically this amendment seems superfluous, it represents a legislative attempt to create total gender equality within Israeli citizenship laws.

According to The Passport Law 1952, any Israeli citizen is entitled to a passport upon request. Furthermore, in section 3 it states that a minister may allow a child under the age of seventeen to obtain a joint passport with either one of the minor's parents. There is no distinction between the parents in either acquiring an independent passport for a child or in acquiring a joint passport. Under regular circumstances the passport is obtained upon the request of one parent. However, when parents are divorced or due to other exceptional circumstances, the agreement of both parents are necessary. In addition, since there are no restrictions on women's rights to travel, Israeli lawmakers felt it unnecessary to protect these specific rights in the law. Once again, the Israeli law in this area provides for equal and identical rights for both men and women.

2. Residency

According to section 2 of the Entry into Israel Law -1952, entrance and residential visas are issued based on the discretion of the Minister of Interior. The visas are issued according to the policy set by the Ministry of Interior. According to the existing policy, visas are given to spouses of permanent residents of Israel on the basis of family unity, subject to security and other limitations, and are distributed equally to both female and male spouses.

Regulation 12 of the Regulations on Entry into Israel states that the status of a child born in Israel but who is not a citizen is determined according to his or her parents' status. If the parents have different status, the child receives the status of the father or a guardian, unless the mother objects in writing. In such a situation, the child will receive the status of the parent as decided by the Minister of Interior. Due to the inequality in this regulation, the current practice, is to skip the first stage and decide the status of the child based on the parents' request. A child will be registered as a permanent resident upon the request of the parents, after proving that the central components of the family's life are in Israel.

1. General and Legal Introduction

The Israeli educational system consists of kindergartens; elementary schools; secondary schools (vocational and general), which are sometimes divided into upper school and middle schools, teacher-training institutions, post -secondary schools for continued and vocational studies, colleges and universities. The school year is approximately ten months long, and the study week in elementary schools is between 30-35 hours. In addition to formal studies, there is an extensive range of extracurricular activities. The educational policy reflects the needs of Israeli society, including the absorption of immigrant students, the advancement of disadvantaged population groups and social and academic integration. The school system consists of two streams: State and State Religious. The State Religious system is autonomous with respect to pedagogic considerations and curriculum. The ratio of enrollment of Jewish students in the two streams is about 3/4 in the State system, to 1/4 in the State-Religious system. There are also independent "recognized" schools outside the State school system, most of which provide an ultra-orthodox Jewish religious education or Christian religious education. The independent "recognized" schools operate as non-profit organizations, financed by the government. The teachers who teach in those schools are not employed by the government, but rather by the schools themselves. The structure of the institutions and content of the studies in the non-Jewish sectors are analogous to those in the Jewish sector, with necessary differences that reflect the different languages and cultures of these populations. This Article will focus mainly on the Jewish schools within the State school system, which compose the majority of schools in Israel.

The Israeli education system is financed primarily by the central government and local education authorities. National expenditure on education has remained steady at 8.5% in recent years, but it is estimated that an increase in the prioritization of education will lead to an increase in the portion of the GNP allocated to education. According to the Long School Day Law-1990, which was passed under the initiative of the Knesset Committee on Education and Culture, and with the support of the Ministry of Education and of the social lobby in the Knesset, the duration of the school day shall soon be extended to eight hours. Although this law formally applies throughout the country, due to budgetary restraints, it has so far been implemented only in peripheral areas.

Through examining the legal basis of education within Israel, it is evident that the law provides equal opportunities for both men and women. According to The Compulsory Education Law - 1949, compulsory education is required for all children between the ages of 5 and 15. Education is provided free of charge through the age of 17, and for 18 year olds who have not yet completed the eleventh grade. In 1991 this law was amended and section 3B currently includes a prohibition against discrimination in acceptance, placement, and advancement of students. The State Education Law-1953, provides for a six day school week and determines the content and procedure of State education. It further states that State education is to be based on building society on the foundations of freedom, equality, tolerance, mutual assistance and love of mankind. It should be noted that this law applies only to State schools, and excludes independent "recognized" schools. The Minister of Education, however, is authorized, under the The School Inspection Law-1968 to apply those educational goals to the independent "recognized" schools as well. The Special Education Law-1988, mandates special education for individuals between the ages of 3 and 21 whose capacity for adaptive behavior is limited and who are in need of special education. The Council For Higher Education Law-1958 defines the tasks of the Council For Higher Education, which is responsible for accrediting and authorizing institutions of higher education that award degrees.

2. Illiteracy Rates and Educational Levels

An illiterate person is defined by the Ministry of Education as a person who has had less than four years of schooling. The table below illustrates that although the total illiteracy rate is higher among women, there has been much improvement in this area.

It is important to note that although the median years of schooling among Arab women is the lowest (9.7 years, as compared to 10.6 among Arab men, 12.2 among Jewish women and 12.3

among Jewish men), there is a steady increase in the educational level within the general Arab population, and when specific age groups are examined, within the group of Arab women.

Chart 1 -Median Number of Years of Study of over 15 year olds

Another indication of levels of education can be seen in the following table. The table illustrates that there is a somewhat low percentage of graduates of higher education. However, it difficult to gather an adequate understanding of the current percentages, since this table includes past generations, when the education system was not as advanced.

3. High Schools in Israel

3.1. Basic Description of the School System and the Opportunities Available to Students in High Schools

In order to understand the relevance of much of the statistics and research conducted, it is essential to have a basic knowledge of the Israeli education system, especially the somewhat complicated divisions within the post-elementary (secondary) schools. The first six years of schooling, from the age of 6 to 12, are conducted in elementary (primary) schools. The next three years (13-15) are spent in intermediate schools, and from the ages of 16 to 18, education takes place in high-schools. The Israeli secondary-education system is made up of both technological/vocational and general high-schools. Most of the students that take their matriculation exams study in the general schools. The students within these high-schools select, with the help of advisors, a certain track within which to matriculate. This is accomplished by choosing to study specific subjects on enhanced levels. Towards the end of the intermediate school, the tracking process begins. Researchers describe the process as beginning in eighth or ninth grade, when the students are placed with the direction of an advisor, in either the technological or general track. As of 1985, 43.6% of girls studied in the general track, while only 27.7% of boys studied in the general track. Students are able to study most subjects on a variety of levels, however, not every combination of subject and level is possible or available; in addition, in certain subjects, such as mathematics and English, a minimum required level of studies may be imposed by the school. Both boys and girls are able to learn the same subjects throughout elementary school and high-school. However, it is apparent that there are differences between the sexes regarding courses of study.

The table above depicts machinery or electronics as almost exclusively male subjects. It further shows building and architecture as subjects studied equally by men and women. Statistics reveal, as expected, that fashion and nursing/paramedics are clearly female dominated fields. Surprisingly, the majority of biotechnical engineers and technicians are women.

3.3. Matriculation Levels

In 10th grade, a gap in the math level between girls and boys becomes evident. Statistics show that in 1985 there was more than a 2:1 ratio of boys to girls in the five point math matriculation level. By 1992 there were no drastic changes in these results, but the ratio was reduced to slightly less than 2:1 (Amit 1993). It is essential to note that researchers show that the achievements of the girls before the division into levels, which is done in the 10th grade, are equal to or greater than the boy's achievements, and the gap is created only following the segregation into levels. Thus, girls tend to choose a matriculation level below their true abilities (Rom 1993). Researchers believe that the differences and gaps in the professions, levels, and achievements of the sexes are a direct result of the tracking system (Amit, Movshovitz- Hadar 1989). The tracking may limit one's access to certain areas in higher education and therefore effect the profession one will chose. Thus, many researchers contend that the tracking system only helps to amplify the inequality.

It is evident in the above table that approximately 2/3 of all matriculation examinees are girls, and that a higher percentage of girls have passed their matriculation exams. The table also illustrates that a higher percentage of male examinees took the matriculation exam with two or more scientific subjects, while a higher percentage of female examinees took the exam with two or more humanities subjects.

3. 4. Education Rates, Attendance Rates and Drop-Out Rates

Among the non-Jewish population, there has been a drastic decrease in the educational gap between the sexes. While in 1949, girls made up only 18.6% of the students in elementary schools, by 1979 they made up 46.9% of the students. However, in comparison to the Jews, non-Jewish education is still low. In 1995, the median educational rate among the Jewish population aged 15 and over was 12.2 years, as opposed to 10.2 years among the non-Jewish population. Jewish men's median educational rate was 12.3, a little higher than the Jewish women's rate of 12.2. Arab men's median educational rate was 10.6, quite a bit higher than the Arab women's rate of 9.7. However, among Arab youth the gap between the education level of boys and girls is diminishing. Statistics show that among Arab girls ages 15-17 the median educational rate in 1995 was even higher than that of Arab boys of the same age group, 10.6 years among the girls compared to 10.5 among the boys. The median rate among the 18-24 years old in the Arab sector was the same for men and women (11.6), and only among the older population group is the gap between men and women visible. Approximately 95% of the non-Jewish communities in Israel finish at least 8 years of education. The gap between the sexes that existed in Arab education has been bridged, and surprisingly enough Arab girls currently have a higher attendance rate (see table below).

As of the school year 1994/95, the attendance rates of 14-17 year olds in Jewish education revealed that 92.6% of boys and 99.6% of girls were continuing their education. Such post-elementary school attendance rates have increased dramatically within the past years, yet the gap between the sexes has remained steady. As of 1994/95, the attendance rates of 14-17 year olds in Arab education revealed that 65.7% of boys and 69.2% of girls were continuing their education. This trend of continuing education is apparent through decreasing dropout rates. In Jewish education, there has been a decrease in the dropout rates from 20.4% in 1971/72 to 5.5% in 1991/92. In Arab education, drop-out rates have fallen from 25.3% in 1971/72 to 14% in 1991/92. There is, however, a problem with determining the dropout rate since there are no official statistics taken by the Ministry. It should be noted that the statistical data here is based on the amount of students that register for school, not the actual attendance rate.

4. Talented and Gifted Children

The Minister of Education and Culture created a special Department to deal specifically with gifted children. The Ministry's express goal is to provide educational opportunities for gifted children which are suited to their special talents and skills, while adhering to the values of democracy and equality inherent in Israeli society. Some of the Department's activities include: testing gifted children throughout the country, establishing unique enrichment programs, and providing for in-service training and seminars for teachers of the gifted. The Ministry of Education's data, depicts a 2:1 ratio of boys to girls in the programs for gifted children. This ratio, calculated in both 1992 and 1996, has remained constant. The Ministry claims that this 2:1 ratio, also exists throughout the world and in professional literature.

5. Classroom Interaction and Teacher- Student Relationships

Classroom dynamics are important factors in the assessment of gender differences in the education system. Researchers state that teachers relate differently towards boys and girls, often unconsciously, and are more attentive to male students. This can be partly attributed to the fact that behavioral problems are more common among boys. Yet the message conveyed to girls is “to continue being cute and quiet,” while the message to boys is “to try harder and improve” (Avrahami-Ainat 1989). In addition, these low expectations from girls lead to self fulfilling prophecies.

6. Activities and Educational Programs Adopted by the Ministry of Education in Order to Prevent Discrimination

6. 1. Gender Stereotypes Within School Books

Research conducted on messages conveyed in school-books, from 1989-1992 examined books from various subjects and intended for different age groups. The study revealed that women are depicted as being emotionally unstable, overly concerned with their appearance, weak, lacking personality, ignorant, jealous, disloyal, dependent, overly inquisitive, and as failing to contribute to society. These characteristics create negative stereotypes of women. In addition, men are mentioned in school books three times as often as women.

In 1993, in an attempt to combat sexist stereotypes, the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport issued a new list of criteria for school books. Among these criteria are: 1) since Hebrew is a gender-specific language, grammar forms should be used in order to avoid being exclusive; 2) effort should be made to combat occupational stereotypes in textbooks and to prevent new stereotypes from being created; 3) it is important to stress that the choice of professions is open to everyone based on their individual strengths, abilities and talents, without discrimination on the basis of gender; 4) books must include equal use of descriptive character traits, so that a specific characteristic is not used exclusively for either men or women; 5) the activities and achievements of women should be described along side those of men; and 6) equality must be conveyed through the writing style; for example by not always referring to teachers in the feminine form.

Some critics of the education system point out that although the Ministry of Education has created a list of “rules” for improving the current situation, it must continue to act. These critics believe it is essential that: 1) the Ministry of Education carefully examines all the books they publish and concern itself with the content of privately published school books; 2) it is necessary to educate teachers about the existing sexist messages in school books, and to equip them with tools to deal with social messages that contrast with the goals of education and of an enlightened society; and 3) women’s involvement in the Ministry of Education, especially at the higher levels may help the next generation create a society in which there is more equality between the sexes.

6.2. Other Instructions and Intervention Programs of the Ministry of Education Which Aim to Prevent Discrimination

In addition to these concentrated efforts on the specific problem of stereotypical images in school books, the Ministry has acted in a variety of ways in order to eliminate and prevent gender discrimination. One such form of action is through issuing internal instructions and guidelines, such as those issued in 1986, in which the Ministry instructed nursery teachers to contain themselves from pressuring boys to act masculine or girls to act feminine.

There are also stipulations set out by the Ministry of Education in 1987, that currently guide girls to learn in technological schools, where in the past these schools were only for boys. This is partly implemented through cooperation with private educational initiatives, such as the Na'aleh Project. Na'aleh, an intervention program carried out in some upper and middle schools, allows for female students, parents, and school staff to work together and make careful decisions about studying sciences, such as math, physics, chemistry, and computers. These decisions include helping students decide which level matriculation exam is appropriate for them, and helping students choose a future profession. The program aims to increase the number of female students studying the sciences on a high level and to influence girls to study math on the five point (highest) matriculation level.

As a result of a report written following a one day seminar on equality within the education system, which was organized and written by the Israel Women’s Network in 1993, the Minister of education created a budget of resources and declared in the Knesset in 1995 a policy for the advancement of equal opportunity between the sexes in education. As part of the new policy, the Minister appointed a Supervisor on Equality between the Sexes within the Ministry of Education. A steering committee of the Israel Women's Network that consists of experts from different areas of education works together with the Supervisor to offer advice and provide support. One of the Supervisor's main activities so far has been the publication of a reader titled "A Gender Found Its Equality", which includes many articles, reform programs, and research findings on the issue of gender equality in education (Segen 1995). Other activities of the Ministry under the initiative of the Supervisor include: 1) building a training program for teachers; 2) establishing seminars to create awareness of the problem; 3) teaching children's magazines to be careful of hidden messages they might convey; 4) checking school books and curriculums; sending reports from time to time to the general administrator; 5) creating a connection with women's organizations in Israel; 6) establishing seminars for different audiences (teachers, advisors, administrators); and 7) coordinating activities with the educational television, academic institutions and local councils interested in the advancement of women.

The Ministry's plans for the future include, an experimental project known as "Equality 2000." Initiated by the Israel Women's Network, this project is a three year long intervention program which will be carried out within 5 different middle schools. While the execution of the program will be undertaken by the Ministry, the Network's steering Committee will also be involved. The project will involve 10-15 teachers within each school, who will be specifically trained to deal with issues of gender-equality. "Equality 2000" contains elements of both a research project and an active intervention program; it is meant to bring about change in the attitudes and behavior of teachers, advisors, administrators, students and parents regarding gender equality.

In addition, a number of books have been published recently by Israeli academic women, regarding gender equality in education. For example Her and Him in Class by Avrahami-Ainat, published in 1989, provides the teacher with important information, and suggests curriculums and activities aimed at creating equality.

6. 3. Young Leadership Programs in Schools

The position of girls in programs that cultivate young leadership seems to be at least equal, if not better to that of boys. In every school there are elections for a student council. Generally, representatives are chosen from each class. The Ministry's statistics depict a slightly higher number of girls chosen from eighth grade and above. Every school sends representatives to the local council. This council is composed of representatives from schools, community centers, youth groups, and different organizations. The national council which is made up of 40 representatives from all sectors of society: religious, secular, Druze, Arab, Bedouin; is currently headed by a girl, although the majority of the representatives are currently boys. In addition, three out of the four committees within the national council are currently headed by girls.

7. Sex Education and Education on Family Life

In 1987 the Ministry of Education stated that a program on sex education and education on family life is mandatory from first to twelfth grade. In elementary school children are taught the meaning of being a girl or boy and their respective roles in the family. In middle and high-schools the Ministry tries to convey awareness, understanding and knowledge of the meaning of force, being taken advantage of, and violence, as forbidden forms of relationships within family and outside of it. The basic view of the educational system is that sex education should not just include education on the physical aspects of sex, but rather it should also include information on the emotional and social aspects. The program concentrates on the following topics: physical development, body image, sexual identity, femininity/masculinity and equality between the sexes, family, reproduction, interpersonal and couple's relationships, and sexual health.

8. The State Religious Education

When discussing the values that the Israeli educational system wishes to promote among its students, the differentiation between the various streams within the State educational system should be noted. Specifically, it should be understood that the State-Religious education (SRE) stream is free to establish values and norms that guide its operation. According to estimates, 21% of Jewish students belong to the SRE stream, or approximately 235,000 children, 50% of whom are girls. Most SRE schools are segregated, with separate classes, often in separate schools for boys and girls. The Administrator of the SRE estimates that, in the elementary level, 35% of the classes are separate, and in the high-school level, 90% of the classes are separate. The Administrator claims that the budget allocated to girls' schools is the same as the budget allocated to boys' schools.

9. Teachers

9. 1. Teaching- as a Feminine Profession

The teaching profession in Israel is composed primarily of women. As of 1992-93, more than 75% of all the teachers in Israel were women. Among Arabs however, the gap between the sexes within the teaching profession is considerably smaller. Furthermore as the level of the educational institution increases the female majority of teachers decreases. This is illustrated through the following 1993 statistics. In 1993, women made up 90.4% of teachers in Hebrew elementary schools and 53% of teachers within Arab elementary schools. In post- elementary schools women made up 70.2% of teachers in Hebrew schools and 29% in Arab schools. These post-elementary schools can be divided into middle school and upper school. Within middle schools 76% of the teachers in Hebrew education and 32% of the teachers in Arab education are women. In high schools, 62% of teachers in Hebrew education and 26% in Arab education are women. The percentage of women teachers has been steadily increasing throughout the past years.

9. 2. Teacher's Salaries

Inequality exists in the salary levels of men and women working within the educational system. Statistics reflect this relative inequality among the teaching staff. Recent data supplied by the Treasury Ministry regarding teachers' salaries who are employed by the Ministry of Education for full-time work reveals that overall, women earn on average 87% of men's salaries.

The table below which details the number of teachers in each salary level, further illustrates the differences in the salaries of men and women within the educational system.

9. 3. Administrative Positions.

The number of men working in educational institutions increases with the level of the position. Relative to men, there are many more women who have acquired Master and Doctorate degrees, yet who still work in non-administrative positions within the educational system (Hertzog).

The number of men teaching in religious educational institutions is greater than that in secular institutions. In institutions that are more gender-segregated or that are independent (Arab or religious) men hold more teaching positions. Furthermore, men hold a large number of administrative positions within these schools.

10. Physical Education and Sports

The Sports Law-1988 provides for equality within sports and physical education. Section 10B of this law requires that the regulations of a sports union or association include statements concerning the equal opportunity of women to sports and physical education.

In Israel, girls make up 21% of all those involved in competitive sports. In countries throughout Western Europe 35%-40% of competitive athletes are women. Within athletic institutions and organizations in Israel, there are almost no women in senior positions, despite the fact that many female students graduate from physical education colleges. Only 5% of the administrators of sports unions are women, and between 10%-15% of coaches are women. In regard to competitive sports, women's teams receive a coverage of 5% relative to men's competitions.

In 1993, the Dekel Committee which was established by the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport as the committee for the advancement and development of physical education and sport in both formal and informal education within Israel, presented its recommendations. The committee requested the establishment of a sub-committee for the special purpose of examining and improving the situation of women's sports. The sub-committee suggested that a special unit for the advancement of physical education and sport for girls and women should be established.

The special unit for the advancement of women in sport, recommended by the sub-committee, was established in 1994 in accordance with the new policies of Deputy Minister of Education Culture and Sport. The purpose of the unit includes increasing the number of women involved in different branches of competitive sports, the number of women coaches, and the amount of women as decision making administrators. Furthermore this unit intends to initiate a program to widen the knowledge and research on girls and women in sport. The unit decided that there was no need for formal legislation and that the legislative situation for equality in sports was sufficient as a result of the Sports Law-1988 and the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women.

In addition, the sub-committee decided to adopt policies of affirmative action in order to increase the amount of female participation in competitive sports. This sub-committee has also created a list of instructions which it plans to enforce within the education system. For example, a school will only be allowed to participate in sports competitions on the condition that 40% of the students involved are girls. Furthermore, if a school does not have a minimum participation of 30% girls on their selected sports team, they will not receive financial aid or be allowed to participate in competitions. It is also recommended that school administrators develop programs that make teachers, parents and students, aware of the importance of the involvement of girls in sports and the importance of equal opportunities in physical education and sport. Administrators can accomplish this goal by creating programs encouraging girls' involvement in sports such as training seminars, special sports days and events, and meetings with outstanding female athletes. Recommendations to elementary schools and middle schools include requiring sport classes to consist of at least 40% girls. Recommendations for high schools include the equal distribution of resources such as convenient times for competitions, uniforms and equipment. There should also be a program parallel to that of the boys which prepare girls to be physically fit for the army.

The sub-committee stresses: 1) the importance of programs in teachers' training colleges that create awareness of the need for equality in sports and physical education; 2) the inclusion of programs for the advancement of female graduates of such teaching training colleges to administrative positions in the physical education system; 3) the encouragement of these graduates to belong to Israeli and international unions that promote the advancement of physical education and sports for women; 4) the involvement in supervising post-high school programs, such as rewarding exceptional female athletes with scholarships; and 5) the belief that they must involve the media to help change popular attitudes towards women in sport..

Until 1996 the following activities had been executed in order to improve the situation of women in sports. The Ministry of Education and Sport established a union of sports among the schools. The union includes a budget that is favorable towards the women's teams. Within the budgeting of the sports authority, there is an equal distribution of the total amount of money spent on sports for men and women, while for competitive sports, 50% more money is spent on women's teams. These extra funds are part of an affirmative action policy to improve the current discrimination

Furthermore, in 1995 Israel adopted the 1994 Brighton Declaration, which states that every effort should be made by State and government machineries to ensure that institutions and organizations responsible for sport comply with the equality provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.

In Israel, in addition to the funding from local municipalities and the Ministry, much of the funding used to encourage and support sports is acquired through the lottery. The Committee involved in the division of this money recommends that there should be no discrimination in the division of funds, and that women's sports should be equally supported. As a result, changes took place in the monetary division of the lottery funding within basketball. Where in 1994 the men's national budget was double that of women's, according to the new directives the budget would be equal.

Supplementing these developments, there has been some litigation in this area. In The Basketball Union of Israel v. L.C.N. For the Advancement of Basketball for Women, there was a discussion on the discriminatory regulations of the union of basketball in Israel. These regulations state that while the men's national league is allowed to sign foreign players, the women's league is not. Furthermore, the men's team is allowed to spend more money than the woman's team. The District Court invalidated the discriminatory sections of the regulations because they were against public policy and in contradiction to section 10 of The Sports Law-1988 (see introduction to physical education). The Israeli Basketball union appealed to the Supreme court, which accepted their appeal on formal grounds without dealing directly with the issue. The internal court within the sports union later accepted the claim of discrimination.

Recently, one of the leading women's national basketball team, turned to the High Court of Justice because they were receiving half the amount of funding as the men's team. The court decided to establish a nation-wide committee which would create tests and criteria on the issue of a local municipality's monetary support to sports groups so that there will be equality between male and female sports teams.

11. Higher Education

11. 1. Women as Students

11. 1. 1. Opportunities

Everyone, regardless of gender, has the same opportunity to study any subject, or major in whatever they wish, at the level of higher education. Opportunities are limited to the extent that certain departments have prerequisites which require students to have taken high level math or science matriculation exams. As discussed earlier, many girls do not sign up for these high level classes and as a result are limited in their choice of subjects in higher education.

11. 1. 2. Percentages of University Students and Graduates

In 1995, statistics showed that 55% of undergraduate students in Israel are women. This favorable majority of women within higher education is only matched by France, in which the female percentage in higher education slightly exceeds that of Israel. In addition, over 50% of all graduate students in Israel are women. This percentage exceeds that of all countries except the United States where the percentages are basically equal to those in Israel. The percentage of women among university degree recipients is similar to their share in the total number of students, and women participate equally in the higher education system overall. In addition, it must be noted that among the students receiving third degrees, women number less than half. In 1992/93, women accounted for 56.2% of all undergraduate students, 53.6% of master's degree students, and 43.8% of doctoral students.

The second table shows the breakdown of degrees earned by subject and level. Here too it is apparent that women concentrate in certain topics, such as humanities, and are less likely to enter fields such as Business and Mathematics / Computers.

Other statistics show that women make up a large majority of those studying health care (93%) and studying to be teachers (84%), but are underrepresented in the technological fields (20%). Their presence in the humanities is high (71.4%), while only 13.3% of those studying to become engineers and archaeologists are women. Statistics further demonstrate that there is approximately equal numbers of men and woman studying medicine (46% women), law (46% women), and the social sciences (59% women).

11. 2. Average Age at Which Students Receive Each Degree

The next two tables show the number of students in university by median age, and the percentage of students aged 20-29 enrolled in universities. Women prove to be generally younger than men when receiving their bachelor's degrees, 26.0 versus 27.6, mainly due to the fact that their mandatory army service is one year shorter than that of their male counterparts. For master's degrees, however, the median age for women is virtually identical to that for men, and for doctoral degrees, the median age for men (35.7) is a year lower than that for women (36.7).

Table 18- Median Age of Recipients of Degrees, 1989/90

Although in the past, the percentage of men aged 20-29 enrolled in university was higher than the percentage of women, by the mid-1980's the numbers were approximately even, and by 1993, the percentage of women surpassed that of the men, with more than 10% of that population group enrolled in university.

11. 3. Non-University Higher Education

Aside from Government Universities, a number of alternative institutions of higher education, and institutions which grant diplomas other than bachelor's, master's and doctorate degrees exist in Israel. The following table shows the number of men and women students earning their first degrees in such institutions in 1996, and their breakdown by various fields. Once again, while women make up more than half of the total students, it is apparent that there are certain professions preferred by each sex.

11. 4. Minorities in Higher Education

Among non-Jewish communities in Israel, the amount of female students decreases as the educational level increases. The gap between men and women who pursue post-secondary degrees, which is relatively small among Jews, is rather large among other communities. More than three times the number of men receive higher education.

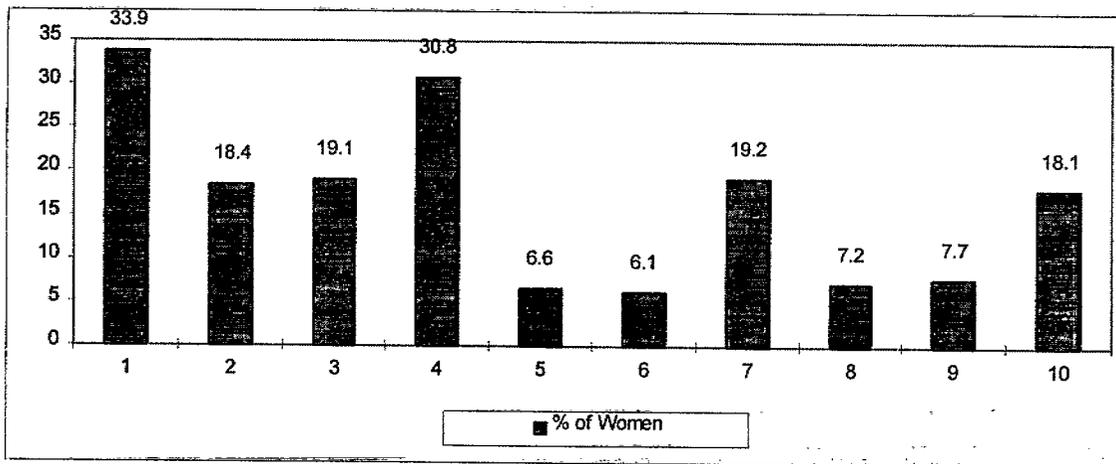

11. 5. Women in the Academic Staff

11. 5. 1. Percentage of Women Among the Academic Staff

As of 1992/93, women represented approximately 20% of senior academic staff financed by the Council for Higher Education budget, while in 1978/79 women represented only 16%. There is clearly an increase in the number of women across the ranks, but as the rank increases, the percentage of women at a given rank decreases.

The following table shows the number of women at each academic staff level, and the percentage they comprise of the total. The graph illustrates that the highest percentage women have attained is 33.9 in the humanities. And among those positions attained, the majority are of the lowest rank, that of Lecturer; while the percentages of women who are "full professor" are the lowest of all.

This next graph shows the progression of women attaining the ranks of lecturer, senior lecturer, associate professor, and full professor. The numbers have been increasing, but only slightly. Between 1991/92 and 1992/93, the percentage of women granted full professorship did not increase; and the total number of women in this category is still extremely low.

11. 6. Percentages of Women in Various Departments

A study of the influences on the division by gender between academic departments in Israel demonstrates that as the age of the department increases so do the chances of finding women professors in that department. This study also shows that the growth of the number of women in a department will increase their power, which influences their chances to reach the level of Professor.

11. 7. Activities to Improve the Situation

Women's under-representation in higher education, especially in senior ranks, has begun to draw attention in the past few years. The Knesset Committee on the Status of Women dedicated several sessions to discuss the problem, and has urged the various institutes of higher education to appoint special internal Advisors on the status of women.

12. Adult Education

The activities that the Ministry of Education began through the department of adult education include: 1) the absorption of immigrants through assistance in language; 2) cultural absorption; 3) assisting immigrants in their roles as parents and workers in society; 4) enabling the elderly the opportunity to receive elementary and high-school education; 5) providing education as a means of personal development and professional advancement; and 6) opening a center for educational enrichment and continuous learning throughout ones lifetime. In addition, there are activities geared towards parents which help provide them with tools to deal with life changes. In 1996 alone, approximately 162,621 adults will have participated in the different activities provided for by this branch of the Ministry of Education.

In certain areas of adult education, the percentage of women is particularly high. These include the schools for Hebrew language. In the field of general education, a program called "Tehila" serves all citizens who are illiterate, or have not completed their elementary education. The program strives to provide basic tools such as reading, writing, and comprehension. Approximately 90% of those studying in "Tehila" are women. There is also a program which provides a high school education for adults. The average age of those studying are 35, and 70% of the students are women. The department of adult education also provides enrichment programs where scientific, professional and artistic subjects are studied on high levels. These activities are intended to enrich ones education and provides one with the opportunity to develop hobbies and artistic skills. Out of the 35,000 students involved in these activities, approximately 70% are women.

3. Protective legislation relating to matters covered in this article shall be reviewed periodically in light of scientific and technological knowledge and shall be revised, repealed or extended as necessary.

1. Legislative Measures

1. 1. Protections Against Discrimination

Until the end of the 1980's, there were few laws which specifically dealt with matters of gender equality in the workplace. The Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law-1964 (since replaced in 1996) was perhaps the most important piece of legislation which addressed discrimination in the workplace. Its provisions were far from exhaustive, the law simply demanded that male and female workers receive comparable pay for comparable work. A more general condemnation of discrimination against women could be found in the Women's Equal Rights Law-1951, which, while not dealing explicitly with labor-related issues, demanded that "one law apply to men and women regarding every legal action." Although lacking the constitutional status of a "Basic Law," the Supreme Court has construed it as containing norms of a constitutional nature, and has held that, where possible, other laws should be interpreted so as to conform to its provisions.

This lack of legislative activity, combined with the fact that the few laws which were enacted failed to provide serious remedies or enforcement tools, resulted in a parallel lack of litigation.

In 1987, the Equal Retirement Age (Male and Female Employees) Law-1987 was enacted, prohibiting employers from forcing early retirement on women workers.

The Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988 prohibits discrimination in the workplace, based on gender, sexual orientation, marital status, parenthood, race, age, religion, nationality, country of birth, political or other orientation. Neither governmental nor private employers may take the above classifications into account in determining hiring, promotion, termination of employment, training, or work and retirement conditions of employees, except in special cases where the unique nature of the position makes these classifications relevant. Protections offered to women employees which take into account their special needs as women or mothers are not to be considered discriminatory, although the law specifies that any such rights offered to working mothers must equally be given to men who either have sole custody of their children, or whose wives work and have chosen not to make use of these provisions.

The law recognizes sexual harassment as a form of discrimination in the workplace subject to civil and criminal sanctions, and, although it provides a narrow definition of harassment and fails to address the issue of hostile working environments, it forbids employers from penalizing employees or job candidates in any manner for refusal to accept proposals or advances of a sexual nature. A 1995 amendment to the law has placed the burden of proof upon the employer in civil sexual harassment suits; where an employee has proven refusal of a sexual advance, the employer must then prove that there has been no violation of the law (i.e. that the employee has not been penalized in any manner). While, as noted, the other provisions of the law are limited to those employers who employ more than 5 workers, the provision forbidding sexual harassment applies to all employers.

Violation of the primary provisions of the law constitutes a criminal offense, punishable by fine. Unlike its 1981 predecessor, however, which merely criminalized discrimination, the law offers the worker whose rights have been violated access to civil remedies as well. Exclusive jurisdiction over civil disputes which arise under the law is given to the Labor Courts, and despite the fact that Israeli contract law generally prefers the remedy of compensation over interfering in employee-employer relationships, the Court is specifically authorized by the law to grant enforcement injunctions in cases where mere compensation would not serve the cause of justice. The statute of limitations on civil suits under this law is 12 months. Workers may also file a complaint against their employer in the Woman's Employment and Status Branch of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare.

In civil suits according to the law, the burden of proof is generally placed on the employer. In cases relating to advancement or work conditions, the employer must demonstrate that where specific requirements for the above matters exist, and where the employee has fulfilled these requirements, the employer has not violated the law in denying the relevant benefit. Where termination of employment is concerned, once the worker shows that there has been nothing in his/her action or behavior to justify termination, the employer must prove that he/she has not violated the law in firing the worker. The court may order that proceedings relating to sexual harassment or to discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation be held in closed chambers. An explicit provision of the law seeks to ensure that workers who file complaints or who assist others in doing so may not be penalized by the employer.

The issue of sexual harassment in the civil service is also dealt with in the Civil Service Code. Sexual harassment had been proscribed as a disciplinary offense in a 1990 supplement to the Civil Service Code. Its definition then was already broader than the definition in the Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988. The Code's definition related to any act with the characteristics of a sexual act, including speech or insinuation. Furthermore, it did not limit its application to circumstances involving supervisors and their workers, and covered a range of acts between co-workers as well. With respect to sexual harassment between supervisors and workers, the Code specified that the worker's consent was irrelevant, and that it did not matter whether it was the worker or the supervisor who initiated communication of a sexual nature. A 1995 amendment to the Civil Service Code added the creation of a hostile working environment to the definition sexual-harassment and provided for legal and professional aid to the plaintiff. The amendment directs the employee to turn to either the disciplinary superintendent or to the Supervisors on the Status of Women in each ministry, and designates the General-Supervisor on the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service, together with the Superintendent over Discipline in the Civil Service, to handle all complaints regarding sexual-harassment in the service. The amendment further obligates all employees who suspect sexual-harassment to report their suspicion. It is interesting to note that in a clarifying comment to this amendment, the general-supervisor mentions the Convention as a supplementary source of the government's obligation to eliminate discrimination against women.

The Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law-1996 aims to further equality and prevent gender-based discrimination in the area of work compensation. Replacing a similar law from 1964, this new legislation expands protection against discrimination by widening its definition, providing greater access to remedies, and implementing the progressive notion of pay-equity. While the 1964 version of the law dealt merely with "salaries," the law now extends to "all other forms of compensation," including benefits, additions, grants, coverage of expenditures, car/telephone expenses, and overtime--all of which previously served as "loopholes" for employers wishing to evade the spirit of the law. While the law previously required employers to pay workers in "essentially equal" positions at the same workplace equal salaries, today's law extends its protection to positions at the same workplace that are "equal in value." The law specifies that two jobs are considered of equal value, even if they differ from one another, to the extent that they demand equal qualifications, effort, expertise, and responsibility. Any deviation from this standard of equality requires the employer to prove that non-gender-related circumstances justify this deviation.

Exclusive jurisdiction over disputes arising under this law is given to the Labor Courts, which are authorized to appoint court experts to evaluate whether positions under dispute are in fact of equal value. The costs of the evaluation are generally covered by the litigants; in recognition, however, of the fact that such costs often deter potential complainants, the law authorizes the court to decide--under special circumstances--that the State cover the cost of the evaluation. Employees who are found to have been underpaid according to this law may sue for up to twenty-four months' back wages.

Suits may be filed either by the employee, the representative organization of employees, or--with the worker's consent--an organization dealing with women's rights. Class-action suits may also be filed by one worker whose rights have been violated on behalf of a number of such workers, an option that is rare in the Israeli legal system. The court is given broad powers to allow statements to be made by various non-parties to the dispute, including women's rights groups, other employees who may be harmed by the suit, etc. Employee's rights according to this law may not be forfeited, nor may conditions be attached to them. Additionally, benefits granted to workers for pregnancy or parenthood are not taken into account for the purposes of this law.

2. Women's Health and Employment

The Employment of Women Law-1954 authorizes the Minister of Labor and Welfare to regulate the employment of women in positions or fields that are uniquely dangerous to a woman's health or that are hazardous to her reproductive capabilities. The Employment of Women Regulations (Exposure to Ionized Radiation)-1979 differentiate between relatively low levels of exposure, which require supervision for all women employees, and relatively high levels to which women in their child-bearing years (defined as under 45) may not be exposed at all. Women who work in supervised areas must immediately notify employers of pregnancy, and once they have done so they may be exposed to far lower levels of radiation. Employers are similarly required to take “all reasonable measures necessary to maximally reduce the amount of exposure” in workplaces where women are employed. The Employment of Women Regulations (Forbidden and Restricted Jobs) apply solely to women under age 45 and forbid their employment in situations where they may be exposed to certain amounts of lead filings or vapors. They similarly regulate the exposure of pregnant and nursing women to various substances, including benzene, benzol, arsenic and compounds, and methyl mercury and its derivatives.

The Employment of Women Law-1954 additionally authorizes the Minister to regulate the conditions deemed necessary to protect the safety and health of women working at night. The regulations currently in force provide that women must be given transportation to and from night employment where suitable public transportation does not exist, and that women must be given hot drinks and time to rest. Likewise, subject to a number of exceptions, employers may not refuse to hire women workers who state that for family reasons, they are unwilling to work nights.

3. Pregnancy and Maternity Leave

Pregnant workers, as well as those who have just given birth, are provided with various legislated rights and protections, most of which are dealt with in the Employment of Women Law-1954. A pregnant employee must notify her employer of her condition by the fifth month of her pregnancy. From then on, she may not be employed for overtime or more than six days a week, and may not be required to work nights. A recently-proposed amendment to the law seeks to allow pregnant women to decide for themselves whether or not to work overtime. By the same token, pregnancy may not serve as grounds for termination of employment.

3. 1. Fertility Treatment and Medical Absences During Pregnancy

Both men and women are allowed to take leaves of absence, characterized as sick leave, while undergoing fertility treatments. Likewise, pregnant women are entitled to paid absences from work for routine medical examinations.

3. 2. Maternity Leave

A mandatory twelve-week leave of absence may be taken by the pregnant woman at any point after the middle of the seventh month of pregnancy. Under special circumstances, including sickness, the birth of more than one child, or the need for the baby's hospitalization, the leave may be extended. Until November 1994, employees on maternity leave received merely 75% of their missed pay from Social Security. Realizing that this constituted discrimination against women, especially in light of the full compensation given to men who miss work in order to fulfill their yearly military reserve duty obligation, the Knesset amended the National Insurance Law in 1994 so as to provide women with the full equivalent of their salaries. However, while the 75% previously granted was not viewed as taxable income, the full compensation now given is taxed as regular salary. The main practical beneficiaries of the amendment are those women who need it most--poorer women whose earnings are taxed according to lower tax brackets. Women insured by National Insurance, and in certain instances home-makers whose husbands are insured, are eligible to receive various other grants, as detailed under Article 13 below. This provision, as well as the provision for unpaid leave of absence, applies with the necessary changes to adoptive mothers. A 1996 proposed amendment to the Employment of Women Law-1954, seeks to offer fathers the right to paid paternity leave so that couples may divide the twelve week period among themselves.

3. 2. 1. High Risk Pregnancy Leave

A pregnant woman who receives medical confirmation of her inability to work for a specified period may absent herself from work, without such absence affecting her seniority rights. A recent amendment to the National Insurance Law entitles women on high-risk pregnancy leave to receive the equivalent of their salary from Social Security (as long it does not exceed 70% of the average work force wage). Women's rights organizations, making the above comparison to men's reserve duty obligations, are lobbying to further amend this provision so as to provide for full compensation. According to the National Insurance Law, it is preferable that the employee arrange with her employer to work at home while on leave and thereby continue to receive her regular salary directly from her employer.

3. 2. 2. Unpaid Leave of Absence

Mothers or fathers who have been employed by the same employer or at the same workplace for at least two years may take an unpaid leave of absence of up to twelve months following their maternity leave. The amount of leave they are entitled to is dependent on how long they have been employed.

3. 2. 3. Permitted Absences Upon Return to Work

For four months following her maternity leave, a woman who works full-time may absent herself from work for one hour each day, without such absence affecting her salary.

3. 2. 4. Dismissal

Terminating the employment of a pregnant woman who has been working for the same employer or at the same workplace for at least six months is illegal without permission from the Minister of Labor and Welfare. Women on maternity leave or on high-risk pregnancy sick leave may not be fired under any circumstances, nor may they be given previous notice that their employment is to be terminated during that time. Women who have chosen to take the unpaid leave of absence discussed below may not be fired during their leave without permission from the Minister.

4. Parenthood

In keeping with the requirements of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988 discussed above, the Employment of Women Law-1954 allows fathers whose wives have been working for at least six months to take the unpaid leave of absence instead of their spouse. This applies in like manner to fathers who either have sole custody of the infant or whose wives are incapacitated. This applies, with the necessary changes, to adoptive fathers. A 1995 proposed amendment to the Employment of Women Law seeks to entitle adoptive fathers to a paid paternity leave in addition to the unpaid leave of absence.

Similarly, other laws which seek to protect the needs of parents allow parents the freedom to choose which one of them will take advantage of the various protections offered. For example, the Severance Pay Law provides that an employee who quits his or her job during the first 9 months after childbirth, in order to care for a child, is entitled to severance pay, as long as the other parent has not done the same. According to the Sick Pay (Absence from Work due to Child's Illness) Law-1993, parents may decide which one of them will absent him/herself from work for a combined total of six days a year in order to care for a child under the age of 16. According to the above Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988, any daycare services offered to mothers, or daycare expenditures covered by employers, as well as any shortened work-days or absences offered to mothers must also be offered to fathers.

5. Affirmative Action

See discussion under Article 4, below.

6. Social Security Benefits

6.1. The National Insurance Law (New Version)-1995

The definition of the term "housewife" in the National Insurance Law varies according to the context in which it is used. Generally, however, a housewife is defined as a married woman who is not employed outside of the home and is therefore not obligated to pay Social Security. While married men are obligated to pay Social Security whether or not they are employed, married women must pay only if they are employed outside the home. Until 1995, a wife who chose to stay home was not eligible for an old-age pension, unless she chose to insure herself with voluntary insurance. In 1995, the National Insurance Law was amended so as to include home-makers in their husband's mandatory coverage, allowing them to receive the minimum old-age pension, while still exempting them from contributions. Thus, the law now gives a certain degree of recognition to the economic contribution of home-makers. However, since "housewives" are still not considered as workers, they are not eligible for income-replacement benefits, such as employment injuries insurance, maternity allowance, unemployment benefits, and the like.

7. Taxes

As in other areas of Israeli law, significant progress towards achieving legal recognition of women's equality has been made in recent years in the area of tax law. The Tax Code as it was in effect upon the establishment of the State viewed the married couple as a single unit for tax purposes, with regard to the manner in which income was calculated and to the procedural obligation to report. The Tax Code obligated the man--automatically designated "household head"-- to report the joint income of his wife and himself in all instances, and denied any option for separate calculation of income. As a result, it both refused to relate to married women as taxpayers and created a situation in which it was often not economically beneficial for women to seek employment outside the home.

In 1992, the Tax Code was amended to widen the instances where separate calculation would be allowed for husbands and wives, and to grant equal recognition to married women as taxpayers. Instead of referring to "husbands" and "wives," the Tax Code now differentiates between the "registered spouse" and the "other spouse." The registered spouse may be designated according to income level, the decision of the assessing officer, or the couple's personal preference. Whereas previously only husbands were obligated to submit income reports, today this obligation rests on the "registered spouse," with both spouses criminally and civilly liable for the information contained therein. Both spouses may appeal decisions of the tax authorities, and both may receive credit points for dependents. And while the 1992 amendment continues to view the married couple as a single tax unit, it has expanded the instances in which separate calculations are permitted. Separate calculation is now allowed not only for income earned by the "other spouse" in "personal toil," but also for income earned on property either obtained by the "other spouse" at least one year prior to marriage or inherited by that spouse during marriage.

8. Employment of Women - Data and Analysis

Participation in the workforce, distribution within the labor market, work patterns, and salary levels, are all significant indicators of women's situation in society. Generally, the Israeli experience has been ambiguous: while the level of women's participation in the labor market has risen dramatically over the years, reaching almost 50%, the occupational segregation and the glass-ceiling phenomenon remains entrenched, indeed the salary gap between men and women has even increased slightly in the past few years.

8. 1. Women in the Labor Market

8. 1. 1. Women's Participation in the Workforce

Participation in the workforce includes all people of 15 years of age and over who were either employed (i.e. worked for pay for at least one hour during the week of the survey) or unemployed. Women's participation in the workforce (i.e. the percentage of women aged 15 and over who belong to the civil workforce, from among all women aged 15 and over) has been steadily rising throughout the years, with a yearly increase of about 1%, whereas the men's participation has remained the same. Women's participation in the workforce reached 45.5% in 1995 (after reaching 44.7% in 1994 and 43.4% in 1993), compared with men's participation, which reached 62.6% in 1995 (after reaching 62.8% in 1993 and in 1994). Women composed 43.2% of the total workforce in 1995 (compared to 42% in 1992 and 33% in 1975). The increase in women's participation is evident in almost all age-groups, except for the youngest and the eldest. Jewish women's level of participation is higher than the overall women's participation, and passed the 50% in 1995 (50.5%). Nevertheless, increase in women's participation is taking place among Arab women as well, although the level of participation within that group was low to begin with (16.8% in 1994, compared to 16% in 1993 and 13.9% in 1992). The following graph demonstrates the steady increase in the overall women's participation in the work force:

The following two charts demonstrate the characteristics of population groups of men and women over 15, in terms of work or of other status. The striking differences are in the work-patterns of men and women in full-time versus part-time work, and in the category of homemaker which is exclusively female by statutory definition. Note that by definition, a homemaker is not part of the labor force, since a person who is a homemaker does not work for pay, yet does not actively seek work for pay. Consequently, the work done by homemakers is not taken into account when analyzing labor force data.

We see from the above table that women's participation in the labor-force increases as their educational level increases. In 1995, among Jewish women with 16 years of schooling and over, 77.5% belonged to the work-force, as compared to 74.9% of the Jewish men with similar level of education. Among those Jewish women with 0-4 years of schooling, only 10.1% participate in the work force. The differences in the participation rates of women according to their years of schooling are much larger than the differences in participation of men by years of schooling. This has implications on the relative educational level of men and women in the workforce, and explains the higher educational rate of women, as discussed below.

Women's marital status, the number of children they have and their age, are all variables that greatly effect women's participation in the work-force. Consistent with the steady increase in women's overall participation in the work-force, there is a constant increase in the level of participation among married women, as shown by the following graph:

Chart 3 - Married Women in the Civilian Labor Force

Source: Labor Force Surveys, 1995

Women's participation in the work-force decreases as their number of children increases, and rises with the maturation in age of their youngest child. Thus, in 1994 74% of Jewish women with one child were in the work-force, compared with 43% of those with four children or more. 54% of Jewish women whose youngest child was less than one year old were in the work-force, compared with 71% of those whose youngest child was between 10-14 years old.

The Central Bureau of Statistics data also examine the variable of employing domestic-help and its influence on women's level of participation in the work-force. Not surprisingly, the data reveals that the level of participation increases along with the increase of weekly hours of domestic-help, from 63% among those who employ domestic-help for 7 hours a week to 76% of those who employ over 16 hours of domestic-help per week. This data supports the demand for the tax-deduction of payments for domestic-help.

8. 2. Work Patterns

One of the major differences between working women and working men in Israel is in the area of part-time work. Significantly many more women (almost three times as many) work part-time, which is defined as any work between 1-34 hours per week, regardless of how the work is officially defined. Thus, for example, in 1994, 72% of those who regularly worked part-time were women. Of all working women, 38.4% regularly worked part-time, while only 10.6% of all working men regularly worked part-time. The most common reason given for women's part-time work is child-care and housework (21%). For 18.2% of women part-time workers, the work was considered full-time (as among school-teachers). Of the men part-time workers, 24.8% were self-employed, and 18.4% studied in addition to their part-time work. For 17% the part-time work was considered full-time.

An important feature in the Israeli labor-market is the fact that part-time workers accumulate social-benefits just like full-time workers, relative, of course, to the amount of hours they actually work. Similarly, a part-time worker gains tenure just like a full-time worker. In addition, the prospect of promotion is not negated by part-time work, although it may be much slower than in full-time work.

The following graph depicts the distribution of working patterns among the total working population of men and women:

The relatively high increase in the rate of women working full-time in the last few years is clear, and it remains to be seen whether this is a constant trend which will have implications for women's status in the labor-market.

According to data from the National Insurance Institute, there are further major differences in earnings between men and women who are self-employed, as demonstrated by the following table:

8. 3. Unemployment

Unemployed persons are defined as persons who did not work for pay for one hour during the week of the survey, and who were actively seeking work. As part of the general economic slowdown that occurred in Israel during the 1980's, the rate of unemployment among women rose sharply from about 6% in 1980 to 11% in 1990. The older and more educated women were those who suffered the most. The unemployment rate among women peaked at 12.1% in 1993, went down to 10% in 1994 and to 8% in 1995. The following graph demonstrates the differences in unemployment rates of men and women in the workforce throughout the last decade:

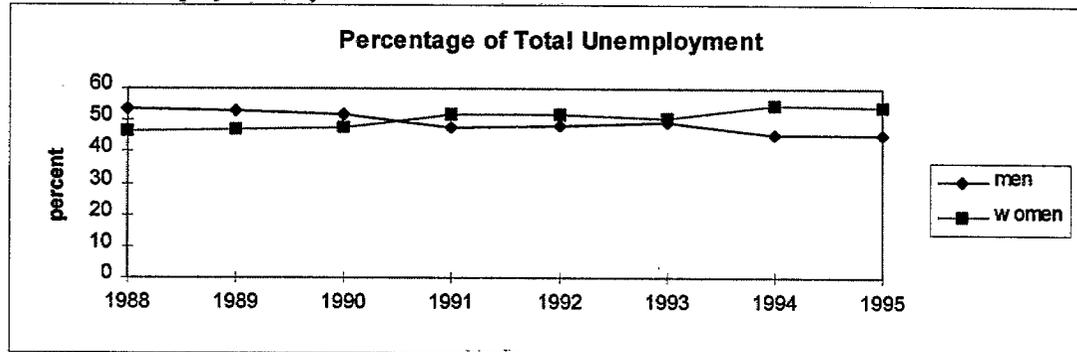

Chart 5 -Unemployment of Population Aged 15 and Over

Source: Labor Force Surveys 1995

The following graph depicts the gender makeup of the total population of the unemployed, and clearly shows the gradual process leading to over-representation of women among the unemployed, which is not proportional to their representation in the workforce in general. Thus, while women made up 43.2% of the total workforce in 1995, they made up 54.4% of the unemployed that year:

Chart 6 -Unemployment, by Years

Source: Labor Force Surveys 1995

According to the Employment Service, which is the governmental agency in charge of referring unemployed persons to available jobs, 55% of all those seeking work in the last few years were women. This rate is particularly high among unemployed women who lack job-qualifications; in some areas 70%-80% of those who are unemployed are unqualified women. Furthermore, unemployment is not evenly distributed throughout the country, and there are specific areas, particularly in development localities in the south, where the unemployment rate of women reached 15.4% in 1995 (the men's unemployment rate was high as well, 11.1%, but not as high as women's.)

8. 4. 1. Women's Occupational Distribution and Gender Segregation

Since the Central Bureau of Statistics switched to using the new classifications of economic branches and occupations in 1995, based upon the UN and the International Labor Organization recommendations, most of the data presented here will relate to the recent 1995 survey alone. The following section will analyze these data to show the gender segregation in the Israeli labor market, both in economic branches and in occupational categories.

The following charts depict the distribution of men and women in 14 primary branches of the economy.

Work-segregation is further evident when examining data regarding women's and men's occupation. In 1995, close to 30% (28.3%) of the employed women were clerical workers (a figure that has remained unchanged since 1980) compared to 8% of men, and more than 20% (20.4%) of employed women were agents, sales workers and service workers (compared to 14.4% of men). More encouraging figures concern women academic professionals (12.5%) and associate professionals and technicians (19.5%), rates that are higher than the rates of the employed men in these occupational categories (11% and 9.4% respectively). However, it should be noted that most women in these occupational categories are teachers, nurses, social workers and the like, mostly in the public services. 38% of the employed men are concentrated in industry, construction and other skilled work, (compared to only 7% of the employed women).

8. 5. The Glass Ceiling

Comprehensive data which documents the existence of a glass-ceiling at all levels of the labor market is difficult to gather, since it necessitates a complete breakdown and analysis of the job-structures within all economic branches, both in the public and private sector.

One piece of data that is examined by the Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS) and is relevant to a discussion of workplace hierarchies, concerns men and women workers in managerial positions. As management is not just an occupation, but represents authority and command (Izraeli, 1994), this data is indicative of women's overall position in the workforce. According to the CBS data from 1995, 6.9% of all working men were managers, while only 2.2% of all working women were managers. Of the total managers, 19.5% were women (18,700 out of 96,000). This represents a certain increase when compared to 1990 data, when the rate of women in management positions was 18% of all managers (12,000 out of 66,000). The CBS data further indicates that women made more than 25% of the increase in total managers during the decade between 1980-1990. Notwithstanding the gradual increase of women's representation in managerial roles, their rate is still very low when examined in light of the increase in the general rate of women in the workforce.

For example, the Union of Industrialists recently conducted a survey of 152 hi-tech corporations to examine the situation relating to women in managerial positions. The survey revealed that 14% of the total managers in these companies are women (totaling 900 women), while in 51% of these corporations there were no women managers at all. On the other hand, among the larger corporations (those with 100 employees and more,) 44% have more than one woman in managerial positions. The average age of the women managers is 39, and 77% of them are married.

The structure of women's positions in the Civil Service has been dealt with extensively under Article 7. Since information on this issue is available, and since the Civil Service is a public institution which is subject to on-going scrutiny and inspection, both formal and informal, it is illuminating to examine gender stratification in the Civil Service as an example of gender stratification in the labor-market. However, it should be noted that less than 4% (3.8%) of all working women directly belong to the civil service (32,131 out of 835,700 in 1995). The significant fact regarding gender stratification in the Civil Service is that while women made up close to 60% of all workers in the Civil Service in 1995, only 10.5% of the senior staff were women.

8. 6. Salary and Earning Gaps

In all branches of the labor market, a male employee's average monthly income was 1.7 times higher than that of a female employee (1992-1993). In other words, women's average monthly income was less than 58% than that of men. This is partly explained by the differences in the average weekly work hours, which were 46.3 for men and 34.1 for women. However, the data shows that a large gap exists in the average income per hour as well, which was 1.25 times higher for men. In other words, women's hourly income is 80% of that of the men.

This gap remains constant when other variables are taken into consideration. For example, men with 5-8 years of schooling earned 38% more per hour than women with a similar educational level. Among those with 13 years of schooling and over, men's average income per hour was 30% more than women's. The gap in income per hour increases with age, from 12% among 25-24 years olds, up to 37% among the 45-54 year olds. Even within those occupations which are dominated by women, such as clerical work, the men's hourly income is 34% more than the women's (1992).

The following four tables present a more complete picture which illustrates the break-down of earnings by age, educational level, economic branch and occupation. The tables show that when the relevant variables of women and men employees are the same, the monthly and hourly salary gaps remain constant:

Data published by the National Insurance Institute (NII) revealed that the monthly average salary of women was 55% of the monthly average salary of men during the years of 1992-94. The yearly average income of women was even lower, comprising 51% of men's salaries in 1992, 54% in 1993, and 52% in 1994. Examination of the estimations based upon the NII 1995 income survey regarding the overall rate of employees who earn less than the minimum wage (described below) reveals that 26% of all women employees do not reach the minimum wage, while only 11.7% of all men employees earn less than the minimum wage. In other words, 69% of all employees who earn less than the minimum wage are women.

Dr. Linda Efroni's specific investigation of the civil-service revealed a salary gap of 29% between men and women's average monthly salary for full-time work in 1988, slightly diminishing to 28% in 1990 (Efroni 1990). Recent data supplied by the Treasury Department indicates that the overall salary gaps between men and women have decreased somewhat, so that in 1996 the gap stood at 24%.

There is some evidence that women are unaware of these salary gaps. For example, a recent survey of employed women revealed that half of the women believed that their earning level was similar to their men co-workers' earning level (Natanzon 1997). Only 24% of the women indicated that they were aware of salary discrimination.

9. Vocational and Professional Training for Women

The primary governmental organization that provides vocational training is the Division for Training and Development at the Ministry of Labor and Welfare. Within this Division, a Unit for the Advancement of Women and Girls was established in 1996, signaling awareness of the special needs of women who seek vocational training. Among this Unit's goals is to increase professional options for women in order to improve their integration into the workforce. During 1996, the Unit created special workshops for women in the areas of self-empowerment, orientation in job-search, entrepreneurship and more. Specific workshops for Bedouin and Arab women, immigrant women, women in the army and single-parent women were also offered. Special initiatives were taken together with the IDF, local councils and municipalities and the Ministry of Education, to encourage young women to continue their education in technological fields after completing their military service.

Vocational training is also supplied by the Ministry of Labor and Welfare to unemployed persons, during which the trainees receive unemployment benefits. The conditions for eligibility are that the person has worked in the previous two years for a certain period of time. These conditions limit the options of women who have not been part of the workforce in the past, as they are ineligible for receiving unemployment benefits during the period of vocational-training. The 102 vocational courses can be roughly divided into three categories: courses that are attended mainly by men which comprise 51% of the total courses; 24% of the total courses that are attended mainly by women and offer training in traditional women's professions; and mixed courses that make up the remaining 25%. Those that are attended primarily by men offer training in higher paying professions and they tend to be longer (6 months in average), thus enabling participants to receive unemployment benefits longer. The "women's" courses are shorter (up to 3.5 months in average) and qualify in professions with fewer and lower paying job opportunities. In sum, although women comprised 44% of all trainees in these courses in 1996, which is an impressive increase compared to previous years, close to two-thirds of the training hours are allocated to men.

The time budget survey conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics in 1991-92 reveals interesting differences between men and women's participation in vocational courses and professional training.

The following two tables, taken from two different surveys of the CBS, indicate the distribution of men and women trainees within the various types of courses offered. Women are clearly concentrated in book-keeping, dressmaking and nursing, while men are more often given training in "men's jobs" such as electronics, engineering and metalwork.

10. Childcare

The childcare system in Israel is composed of both public and private programs. The public system for children up to three years of age consists of day-care centers (which operate from 7:00 am-4:00 pm) that are run by various women's organizations under the supervision and support of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare and smaller "family-centers" for up to five children, which are run by individuals in their own homes, under the license and supervision of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare. The public system for children between 3-5 years of age is made up of pre-school programs (kindergartens) (which operate from 7:30 am-1:20 pm, with possible extension programs to 4:20 pm) run by the local municipalities under the supervision and support of the Ministry of Education. In addition to the public system, there are many private day-care institutions for children up to 5 years of age. As the public system for the 3-5 years old expands, private kindergartens have increased their services for younger children. The private kindergartens and day-care centers are under no governmental supervision and do not receive governmental support. There is, however, a union of private kindergartens and many of them are members.

There are no accurate statistics on the attendance rates in each age group and their distribution among the public and the private systems. The CBS publishes overall attendance rates, based on its labor-force surveys. The following table presents its estimations regarding the Jewish population alone:

In 1996, the Ministry of Labor and Welfare operated 1532 day-care centers and 1643 family-centers all over the country. 12,000 of the 70,000 children attending day-care centers were referred to the welfare system because of dysfunctional families. These children have first priority in admission to publicly funded daycare, followed by children whose mothers work in specific areas that represent national needs (such as security forces, hospitals, and the like); priority is then given to children of single-parent families; children of distinctly large families; children whose mothers work over 40 hours a week; and children whose mothers work full-time in occupations that demand fewer hours per week, such as teachers. In 1994, the Ministry added children whose mothers are full-time students to those who get priorities in admission. According to the head of the Division on Employment and Women's Status, the quota for "welfare" children is too low, and more resources are needed to allow disadvantaged children to be cared for by the day-care system.

The tuition fees in the public day-care system are calculated on a sliding scale, according to the families' income and the number of family-members. In March 1997, the cost of tuition for a baby (from 6 to 18 months) was NIS 1171 (about $350) per month, and for a child (from 1.5 - 3 years) it was NIS 891 (about $270) per month. Parents of "welfare" children paid only NIS 312 per month for a baby, and NIS 237 per month for a child, the rest being subsidized by the Ministry of Labor and Welfare. The Ministry's subsidy composes 20% of the total cost of the system's operation, which in 1996 was to close to 1 million US dollars. The tuition paid by the parents accounts for 75% of the total cost, and the remaining 5% is supplied by the various women's organizations which operate the centers. Governmental support is also expressed in allocating budgets for building the centers, and for purchasing the equipment they need. These budgets come from the Ministry of Labor and Welfare, the Ministry of Housing, and revenues from the Lottery Institute and the Estates' Foundation.

About half of the day-care centers are currently run by three women's organizations: Na'amat, WIZO, and Emunah. Other women's organizations have joined these three in operating day-care centers. The remaining half of the day care centers are run by two other organizations - the Local Councils Organization, and the Kibbutz Movement. The Arab population suffers from a serious shortage of day care centers, and most of the centers that do operate in Arab sectors are only open until 2:00 pm.

11. Enforcement of Employment Legislation

11. 1. The Department of Supervision of Labor Laws of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare

This Department supervises the enforcement of a number of labor laws, including the Women's Labor Law - 1954, discussed in the beginning of this Article. The applications to the Department can be classified in two categories: 1) Complaints from women who have been discharged from their employment during pregnancy. 2) Employers' applications for termination permits.

In 1995 there were 840 applications submitted to the department regarding the termination of women's employment during pregnancy (as compared to 774 applications in 1994), of those 336 reached a compromise (as compared to 303 in 1994). Investigations which resulted in conclusive findings were conducted in 504 of the applications (as compared to 471 in 1994), and termination of employment permits were granted in 53% of the cases (as compared to 43% in 1994). In 1996 there was a clear rise in the number of applications which peaked at 970. Of those, 400 reached a compromise and 570 investigations were conducted, the final result of which will only be available in mid-1997.

11. 2. The Department of Labor Law Enforcement

11. 2. 1. The Equal Employment Opportunities Law

The Department of Labor Law Enforcement employs 59 supervisors. Two supervisors deal with the enforcement of the Equal Employment Opportunity Act. The supervisors investigate complaints of sexual harassment and discrimination on the basis of age, sex, religion or military profile. In addition, the act requires all employers to advertise job offers in both male and female grammatical forms. In order to enforce this section of the act, the Department issues a warning to publishers. These complaints are generally initiated by the Department itself after reviewing radio and newspaper advertisements.

The Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988 does not impose administrative penalties on employers who do not correct faulty or discriminatory advertisements, rather such employers are to be prosecuted in the labor law courts. The Department of Labor Law Enforcement has not brought any criminal charges to date. The Department conducts investigations and requires corrections of the practice, when the investigation results in findings of discrimination.

The majority of the cases dealt with by the department pertain to want ads (162 of the total 188 in 1996). In 1996, only 23 of the cases involved discrimination (including discrimination on the basis of age and race), 19 of which resulted in no findings. Only two cases were sexual harassment cases, one of which resulted in no findings. All 162 of the cases which pertained to discriminatory advertisements resulted in conclusive findings. All employers who were investigated regarding their advertisements have corrected them following the Department's requests through phone or written correspondence, with no need for prosecution.

In comparison, over the course of 1996, the Israel Women's Network's "Struggle Against Discrimination" hot line received 302 complaints, of those 42% were based on discrimination at work, and sexual harassment - in other words, 157 complaints of discrimination prohibited by the Equal Employment Opportunities Law -1988.

According to section 19 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law-1988, a public council must be established to consult the Minister of Labor and Welfare on issues concerning the application of this law and the increase of public awareness of equal opportunity rights. In addition, this council establishes conditions and facilities to enable women to enter the work force. A council of this kind was appointed and functioned until 1993, at which point it disbanded. A new council has not been appointed since.

11. 2. 2. Minimum Wage Law

The Minimum Wage Law -1987 sets a minimum wage for the employment of workers in proportion to their scope of employment. Hence, the Minimum Wage Law entitles workers earning below the minimum wage level (which is currently set at 45% of the average wage) to a wage supplement up to the minimum level, to be paid by their employers.

The Minimum Wage Law is enforced through self-initiated employee complaints, and through processes that are initiated by the Department of Labor Law Enforcement. For the purpose of enforcement of this law, the Department employs 11 supervisors who are divided into five teams which investigate worker's wages (both youth and adult) around the country. These teams work in conjunction with the Labor Union, the Worker's Council and the worker's hot line.

An employer who is found in violation of the law is sent a warning which insures payment of back salary. An employer who refuses to pay back salary is prosecuted or fined 2500 NIS (approximately $760) per employee per month. This figure is specified in the law and does not represent the difference between wages according to the law and wages actually paid by the employer.

Most research of the Israeli market indicate that adherence to the Minimum Wage Law is low, as is the level of enforcement.

12. Women's Employment among the Arab Population in Israel

12. 1. Trends in Occupations in Arab Villages

When discussing Arab women, a distinction must be made between women living in cities and women living in villages: Arab city women consistently enjoy a more prominent status in most realms of life than do those women who reside in villages. However, over 90% of Israeli Arab women live in villages.

Most Arab villages are located in Israel's periphery, far from Israel's centers of economic activity. In the past, agriculture was an integral source of income for Arab villages. The nature of the agricultural activity allowed women to play a leading role, while maintaining their traditional role as housewives. Down-sizing in the agricultural industry, which occurred as a result of the expropriation of farm lands, shifted the main economic focus of the villages to city work and left a vacuum in the job market for Arab women. Although many village men moved into the modern work sector, their female counterparts could not and did not leave their traditional roles. Thus, while men left their villages to work in the Israeli cities, women remained at home to run the households, look after the children, and work the fields, without tangible compensation.

The first wave of Arab women seeking work outside of their villages began in the 1960s; most of these women found work in nearby Jewish villages and cooperatives. The work did not require any formal education or literacy. In the 1970s, Arab women began to take on blue collar positions in factories set up near their villages. Many Arab village women worked in the textile industry, and have remained employed there. In 1987, 17% of the employees in the textile industry were Arab women, and by 1989, the percentage of Arab women who worked in the textile industry reached 29%. Many sewing shops were also established inside the villages, the owners of which were sub-contractors for the large, centrally located Israeli textile factories in Israel. The investors increased their profits by employing Arab village women with little education for low wages. The difficult conditions of employment for these women, which often include long workdays, are particularly straining for married Arab village women, who are expected to play dual roles, both as housewives and wage-earners.

During the 1990s, more Arab women have entered the Israeli job market, particularly the unskilled labor market, in order to help their families carry increasing financial burdens. Like their male counterparts, the majority of Arab village women still hold menial jobs and are compensated accordingly. In many instances, their compensation does not meet the minimum wage standards nor are they properly compensated for working overtime. However, it should be noted that in recent years more Arab women have been filling positions which require a high-school education. A significant percentage of these women teach in Arab schools, mostly elementary schools.

12. 2. Workforce Size and Unemployment Rate

Of the 350,000 Arab women who are of working age (over 15), about 83% (253,500) do not belong to the work force. The rate of unemployment among Arab women who belong to the workforce as determined by the numbers that are registered at the Employment Bureau, exceeds the unemployment rate in Israel (11.7% are unemployed, as opposed to 9.9% of their Jewish counterparts), and is especially high amongst Arab village women. However, many Arab women of working age, and specifically Arab village women, do not register themselves at the Employment Bureau, and consequently they do not enjoy unemployment benefits. Usually there are two reasons for why these women fail to register:

1. The women's parents or husbands do not allow them to leave their village for this purpose.

2. The high rate of unemployment creates pessimism in terms of their chances of finding work, even through the Employment Bureau.
3. In many cases ,the expense of the trip to the Bureau is a deterrent, since it is usually far from the village.

Currently, many jobs traditionally occupied by Arab women may be eliminated due to economic difficulties in the textile industry and decreased need for hand-sewn materials. There exists a very real possibility that about 11,000 women, which account for over 20% of the Arab women's workforce, will lose their jobs without finding alternative employment opportunities in the industry. The employment Bureau has been involved in an effort to rehabilitate some of these factories and sewing shops, in order to protect the livelihood of the Arab women employees.

Researchers conclude that the percentage of Arab village women who actually participate in the work force is much lower than their potential participation in the Arab work force. Despite the growth of this proportion since the 1960s, when a mere 9% of Arab women participated in the work force, both the proportion and its rate of growth remain significantly lower than that of Jewish women.

12. 3. Causes for Unemployment

The reluctance of the traditional Arab communities to allow women to work outside their homes stems from religious, social, and economic concerns. Several elements of the local social and economic infra-structure within villages have had an adverse effect on the scope of employment opportunities amongst the Arab village women:

1. The Arab villages are usually satellites of nearby Jewish cities and villages, from which the Arab villages receive their goods and services. Consequently , the Arab villages have not developed their own commercial centers or institutions which provide jobs, particularly for the female Arab work force. Branches of industry in which a relatively high proportion of Arab women are employed, such as the manufacturing industry, were also not developed in the Arab villages. Instead, most of the industrial ventures in the Arab villages were products of small, private ventures which could not absorb large numbers of workers, especially not women. The villages did not receive any work from outside sources other than sewing shops. In contrast to the opportunities offered by outside employers to women in nearby Jewish villages, no employers in advanced industries have been offering work opportunities for the women within villages.

2. Lack of fluency in Hebrew among Arab village women limits the scope of employment opportunities in Israel and decreases their chances of obtaining jobs, particularly in the Jewish cities and villages. Since the same opportunities to learn Hebrew exist for Arab women in both cities and villages, the difference in their levels of proficiency in Hebrew has been attributed to the effect of learning Hebrew in informal settings, namely through direct contact with the Hebrew-speaking Jewish population. Studies indicate that 61% of Arab women speak Hebrew and only 22% of employed Arab women do not speak Hebrew.

Table 12 - Knowledge of Hebrew and Its Effect on Work Participation

	Degree of Participation	Of Those Who Participate	Of Those Who Don't

Speaking Only	17.4	3.8	6.5
Reading and Writing	16.9	10.4	19.7
None	4.8	3.4	26.9

Source: Natanzon 1996

3. That Arab village women do not take full advantage of the work opportunities available to them can be understood as a result of the traditional Arab lifestyle in which women are largely confined to the home.

12.4. Differences in Employment Patterns Amongst Single & Married Arab Women

The ability to work outside the home can serve as a litmus test for examining the various different in statuses among women in Arab society at different stages of their lives. In the lower socio-economic sectors of Arab society, and especially in large families, single women are considered to be an integral source of income to the family, though often, these single women express dissatisfaction with the fact that their salaries must often be donated entirely to their families. In upper-class sectors of Arab society, the degree of independence which a single Arab woman enjoys is directly related to her parents' status and their attitude towards their daughters as autonomous beings. Thus, the percentage of both single upper-class and lower-class women working is relatively high: upper-class women work because of positive attitudes towards their abilities and role as workers, while the lower-class women work for strictly financial reasons. However, both groups of single Arab women enjoy a greater degree of freedom than married Arab women.

Arab society confers a special social and economic status to married women. For example, women may pursue their education until their wedding, at which point they may only obtain jobs which do not conflict with their ability to raise children. The labor force participation of Arab and Druze women has been found to peak at ages 18-24, and decline with marriage or the birth of a first child. Thus, after marriage, most Arab women lose much of the independence they enjoyed as single women.

Despite the social advancement of Arab women and the increasing openness to women's issues in Arab society, social norms still confine the married women to the role of caretakers of their husbands and children. According to the traditional gender-roles in the Arab family, a married woman is not obliged to take a part in providing the family income as long as there is no economic need for her to work, and as long as the expected compensation for her work outside the home is not significantly higher than the expenses which arise from leaving the house. Currently, most Arab women elect to stay at home and care for their children.

Many Arab women who work elect to take part-time positions. Thus, the percentage of employed Arab women who hold part-time positions is twice as large as the percentage of men employed part time (a corresponding percentage is found in Israeli society at large, as seen above). Moreover, twice as many Arab village women work in part-time jobs as do Arab city women.

Table 13 - Work Patterns of City and Village Arab Women

	Full Time	Part Time	Hourly
Type of Locality
Cities	73	16.2	10.8
Villages	49.3	38	12.7

Source: Natanzon 1996

This is due to the fact that many of the village women hold temporary seasonal jobs in agriculture and light industry in the nearby Jewish villages, while Arab women in the cities tend to hold jobs that require more advanced skills, such as jobs in the government, municipalities, education, the health industry, and the business sector (as office support).

The average age of Arab working women was found to be lower than that of women who did not work, and the maximum age of working women in Bedouin villages was found to be 37. These findings may be due to the fact that women in the 35-44 age groups were found to have a higher average number of children than those in the 25-34 age groups, and as the size of their families increases, it becomes increasingly difficult for women to find childcare arrangements for their children. Thus, the lack of proper childcare is another reason that relatively few Arab women with children work outside the homes.

Equality in Access to Health Care

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in the field of health care in order to ensure, on a basis of equality of men and women, access to health services, including those relating to family planning.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, States Parties shall ensure to women appropriate services in connection with pregnancy, confinement, and the post-natal period, granting free services where necessary, as well as adequate nutrition during pregnancy and lactation.

1. Introduction

This chapter will examine various curative, preventative, physical, and mental health care services available to Israeli women. In addition, it will examine the relative states of health of men and women in Israel and will focus specifically on reproductive health. There is absolutely no formal discrimination against women regarding health care, nor are there treatments for Israeli women which are contingent upon the approval or permission of their partners or parents, including birth control. It should also be noted that the subject of women's health has recently been the focus of attention, particularly following the Beijing Conference. This is evidenced both by the establishment of a steering committee on women's health needs by the Ministry of Health, as well as by the special appointment of a researcher at the National Center for Disease Control to collect data on women's health.

2. The Legal Framework

2. 1. Introduction

While foundations for public health care were laid down in the National Health Ordinance-1940, two recent laws relating to public health totally change the framework of health care in Israel. The National Health Insurance Law-1994, which went into effect on January 1, 1995, establishes a universal right to health services in Israel, and the Patient's Rights Law-1996, grants statutory recognition to patients' rights and physicians' duties. These two laws are a source of pride for Israeli society; both are based on the principle of equality and on the dignity and privacy of the individual.

2. 2. The National Health Insurance Law

The law guarantees the right of every Israeli resident to health care services. The principles of “justice, equality, and mutual aid” provide the basis for its enactment. It obligates sick funds to accept all applicants as members, and to provide them with a “basic basket of services.” The government is required to finance this basic basket of services by utilizing the budget allocated to it under the law. The law’s main source of funding is revenues generated by health tax payments. The sick funds then receive their funding directly from the government, which distributes it amongst the different sick funds in a socially just manner.

2. 2. 1. Universal Coverage Under the National Health Insurance Law

Previously, membership in a sick fund was voluntary, leaving 200,000 Israeli residents, including many children, without health insurance. The new law makes membership in a sick fund mandatory and allows residents to join the sick fund of their choice. This policy has a dual purpose: it encourages competition amongst sick funds, and ensures that even citizens who are not in good health, or would not otherwise be able to afford the membership in the sick funds, will not be denied membership. An additional feature of the new law is the right to choose the caregiver: patients have the right to be treated by any of the doctors, hospitals, laboratories, or infirmaries with which their sick funds are associated.

The new law specifies the services that must be provided in the basic basket of health care. In addition, the law places certain services, such as Mother-Child Clinics, under the direct responsibility of the Ministry of Health. This service, previously provided directly from the Ministry of Health, was to be transferred to the responsibility of the various sick funds, like all other health services. However, when realizing that this could jeopardize the goal of ensuring universal mother and child care irrespective of economic considerations, the law was changed in 1996 in order to maintain the government’s direct responsibility for the provision of Mother-Child Clinics.

2. 3. The Health Tax

Under the new law, every adult regardless of gender is obligated to pay health tax in order to cover the cost of the provision of the basic services.

The health tax is a progressive tax and is based on a member's income. However, the law exempts homemakers, or "housewives," from paying the health tax. As explained under Article 13 below, a "housewife" under the National Insurance Law is defined as a "married woman whose partner is insured and only provides domestic provisions for their own household, so that she is neither an 'employee' nor is she 'independent.'" "Housewife" exclusion stems from the fact that health taxes are collected and handled as part of the Social Security system. Since "housewives" are not insured according to the National Insurance Law, they are not included in the data base of the Social Security office (See Article 13).

While the new law ensures equality between men and women by charging married working women and men equal membership dues, some married women who work outside their homes now pay more for the coverage under the new law than they paid under the old law. This is due to the fact that under the old law, families were charged as single units, with married women receiving a 30% discount on their dues.

2. 4. Equality in Health Care

2. 4. 1. Eligibility

The criterion for eligibility is residency in Israel.

2. 4. 2. Differences in Needs as a Barrier to Equality in Israel

Under the new law, most common health care services are included in the basic basket of services.

However, it denies coverage for contraceptives, abortions performed on the grounds of extra-marital pregnancy (constituting the major cause for legal abortions), and other various gynecological services. Moreover, the current basket of services does not fully cover pre-and post-natal services. Consequently, women must pay a fee in order to receive services at the mother-child clinics.

Another source of inequality in the health-care system is the lack of awareness of gender differences in the symptoms and development of specific diseases, such as heart disease. For example, the director of heart and chest surgery in one of Israel's leading hospitals was reported to have expressed a concern in December 1996 as to the discrimination of women in the provision of health care services relating to heart disease. The tools used to diagnose heart disease amongst men are not effective in the diagnosis of women. In addition, heart disease among women develops at a significantly slower rate than heart disease among men. Consequently, doctors are more reluctant to send women who complain about chest pains to be tested, and fewer women are diagnosed in time. This causes women to be diagnosed at later stages of the disease, when the rate of successful surgery decreases. Currently, the death rate and number of complications from bypass surgery among women is 2-3 times higher than among men (2-7%, as opposed to 1-4% among men).

3. Special Health Services for Women

3. 1. Pre/Post Natal Services: Mother-Child Clinics

The Health Ministry reported in 1996 that according to a recent survey, 98% of pregnant Israeli women receive pre-natal monitoring. Of those, 20% are monitored by private doctors, and 80% are monitored through Mother-Child clinics. These clinics offer high-quality and relatively inexpensive pre and post-natal care to women on a neighborhood basis. In 1994, 435 such clinics were in full operation. Despite recent attempts to change the focus of Mother-Child clinics from pregnant women to family health, the main focus continues to revolve around childbearing. Most Mother-Child clinics offer pregnancy tests, check-ups, blood tests, nutrition advice, childbirth preparation classes, child's inoculations and developmental monitoring, all at an annual co-payment equivalent to about 35$. The co-payment is per family, and services are never denied for lack of payment. However, as mentioned above, these services are among the few that are not completely covered by the basic-basket of health services.

3. 2. Delivery Rooms and Maternity Wards

The current number of maternity wards and delivery rooms in Israel does not meet present needs in Israel, due to a sharp rise in the number of births. In 1996 the National Council of Midwives and Gynecology presented the General Manager of the Ministry of Health with a report which exposed serious malfunctions in delivery rooms, particularly overcrowding and shortage of staff (including midwives, doctors, and anesthesiologists).

3. 3. Women's Health Clinics

In recent years, a number of well-equipped women's health centers have been established to provide special services for high-risk pregnancies, osteoporosis, and various health issues regarding mid-life.

3. 4. Geriatric Services

Presently, women comprise 57% of all Israelis over 65 years of age, and 70% of all patients hospitalized in geriatric hospitals are women. Thus, geriatric services may be treated as an area of specific concern for women. Currently, hospitalization expenses for senior citizens are covered by the basic basket, but extended hospitalizations of senior citizens are not covered by the basic basket and must be covered by the patients and their families. The National Insurance Law provides a monthly allowance for the elderly (defined as men who are over 65 and women who are over 60) who are in need of a personal caretaker. By September 1996, 67,000 senior citizens, 70% of whom were women, had received this monthly allowance. In 1996 alone, the government paid a total of over 1 billion NIS in such allowances.

4. Family Planning Among Israeli Women

4. 1. Legal Abortions

The Penal Code - 1977, sections 312-321, permits abortions upon the permission of a designated committee in the following cases:

1. The woman is under the legal age for marriage or above 40.
2. The pregnancy is a result of sexual relations forbidden according to the Israeli criminal code, or is a result of incestuous or extra-marital relations.
3. The unborn child will suffer from a physical or mental deformity.
4. The continuation of pregnancy will endanger the life of the mother, or may cause her physical or mental damage.

There are no criminal sanctions against women who undergo illegal abortions. The code penalizes doctors who perform the illegal procedures.

The Committee for Approval of Termination of Pregnancies is composed of two doctors and a social worker. One of the Committee members must be a woman. No approval for the abortion is needed other than that of the committee, even if the woman seeking the abortion is a minor. Upon applying to the committee, the woman seeking an abortion must meet with a social worker, who is instructed by law to explain the physical and mental dangers of abortion, and is also instructed by the Ministry of Health to attempt to convince her to choose an alternative solution to the unwanted pregnancy. The woman seeking the abortion must also meet with a doctor instructed to explain the medical risks involved. The reports of both the doctor and the social worker must be reviewed by the committee before it makes its decision.

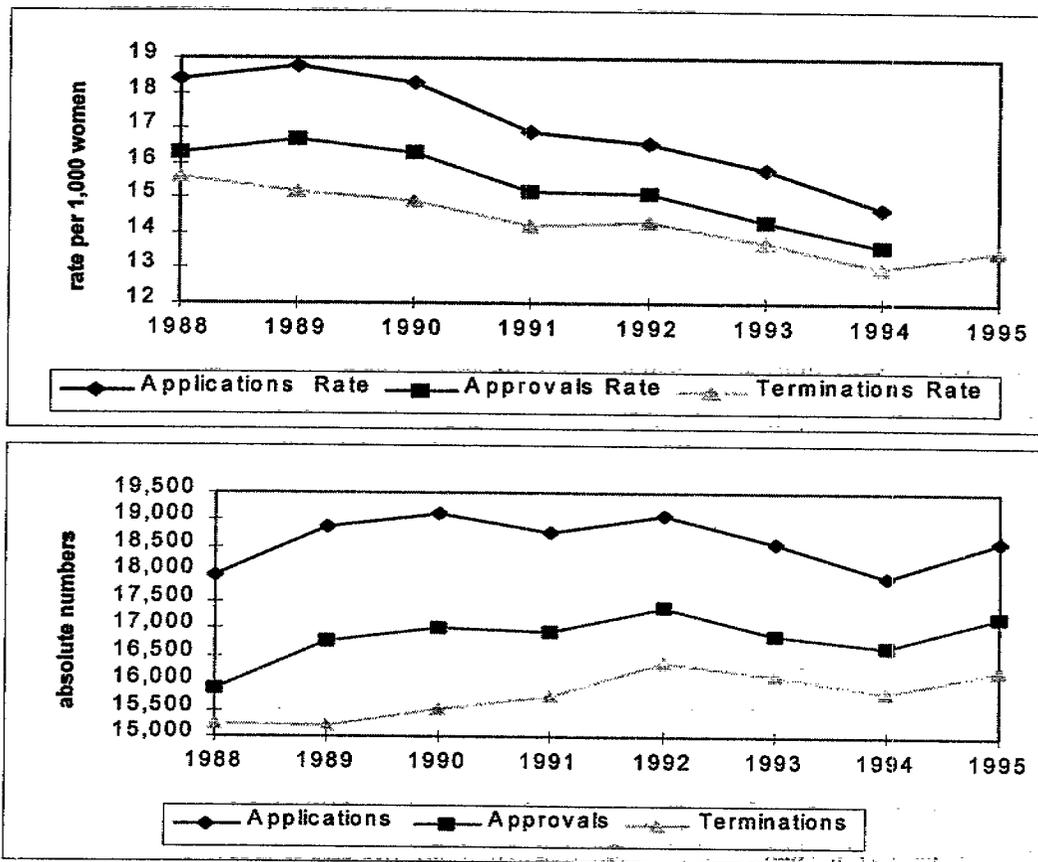

The statutory committee may not examine applications for abortions of pregnancies that have developed beyond the 23rd week, rather, such requests must be reviewed by a special committee. The special committee is composed of the director of the medical center (to which the application has been sent), the director of the Maternity ward, the director of the Neonatology ward, the director of a genetics center, and a chief social worker. So far, 6 such special committees have been formed.

Abortions performed for medical reasons or where the woman is a minor are covered by the medical insurance as part of the basic basket of health services.

4. 2. Abortion rates

Since 1980, the number of legal abortions performed in Israel has fluctuated between an estimated 14,000 to 19,000 a year.

Chart 1 -Application, Approvals, and Actual Terminations

Based on regression analysis, researchers have concluded that the level of education has no influence on the tendency to seek an abortion. The number of children before the pregnancy in question has proved to be an influential factor in the decision to apply for an abortion: the probability of application for abortion rose with the number of children a women had prior to the pregnancy in question. A recent study revealed that only 8.4% of married women in Israel sought abortions for health reasons, while the overwhelming majority sought abortions as a form of family planning.

4.3. Illegal Abortions

It is difficult to account precisely for the number of illegal abortions in Israel, yet the current estimation of the Israel Family Planning Association stands at 4000-6000 abortions per year. Researchers have noted that the numbers have risen significantly following the recent wave of immigration from the former Soviet Union. Many immigrant women are relatively uninformed about birth control and they are accustomed to receiving abortion on demand.

4.4. Pronatalism and Family Planning in Israel

Over the last 20 years Israel has witnessed a gradual expansion of family planning services in both the public and private health care sectors. However, despite fairly universal health care coverage and the broad range of medical assistance provided in the basic basket of services, contraceptives continue to fall outside of the basic basket of services offered to women. Israeli sick funds offer contraceptive devices at a fee which varies from 170 NIS for an IUD fitting at clinics operated by the General Sick Fund (which insures approximately 75% of the population) to 400 NIS in the other major funds. Although oral contraceptive pills are offered at a subsidized price (approximately 75% of the actual cost), this fact is not widely publicized and most clinics prefer to dispense the IUD to women after childbirth. Diaphragms are neither encouraged nor subsidized. Other non-prescriptive methods, such as foam, rhythm, and withdrawal are perceived as outside of medical jurisdiction, and are therefore rarely discussed by doctors as alternatives.

The Israel Family Planning Association has been actively engaged in performing services not provided by the sick funds or governmental institutions. Since 1981, the association has operated walk-in counseling centers for adolescents facing social, psychological, and gynecological problems. Trained counselors give professional advice concerning contraceptive use, sexual relationships, and pregnancy. Gynecologists give periodic on-site examinations. Currently the association has offices in several pre-dominantly Jewish cities, however, the association plans to open centers in Arab cities like Jaffa and Nazareth, to be staffed by Arab personnel trained by the organization.

4.5. Hysterectomies

Sterilization in Israel is performed on a voluntary basis, and the rate of hysterectomies is relatively low. While in the US in the late 1980s some 271 operations of this kind were performed per 1,000,000 women in the populations, in Israel, the rate was only 73 per 1,000,000.

5. Fertility Rates, Treatments, and Services

5.1. Birth Rates and Fertility Rates

The absolute number of live births per year has increased from 80,843 in 1970 to 117,182 in 1995.

The largest drop in fertility occurred among Druze, while the smallest drop in fertility occurred among Jewish women. However, the average fertility rate among Moslem women still remains much higher than the average fertility rate of Jewish women: while Jewish women were found to have an average of 2.5 children in 1995, Moslem women were found to have 4.7 children on average. Within the Jewish population, the largest drop in fertility occurred among women born in Europe and America (a 21.5% decrease, from 2.8 to 2.2 children on average), and the smallest drop in fertility occurred among women born in Israel (a 10% decrease, from 3.3 children on average to 2.5). From among the different age groups, the largest drop in fertility over the last 15 years has occurred among women in the 15-19 age group, while the biggest rise in fertility rate occurred among women in the 40-44 age-group.

The absolute number of live births to unwed Israeli women has not increased significantly in the last 20 years, measured as 1479 births in 1978, and 1490 live births in 1994. However, the number of live births per 1000 unwed Israeli women under the age of 19 has almost halved since 1978, from 1.5 births to 0.8, while the overall number of live births among unwed Jewish women has risen from 732 births in 1982 to 1251 births in 1992.

5.2. Fertility Treatments and Services

Fertility treatments in Israel are highly developed and well subsidized. Currently, Israel boasts a world record of 20 in-vitro fertilization (IVF) clinics, or approximately one such center for every 285,000 inhabitants. Insurance subsidies cover, on average, 6500 NIS for one cycle of IVF treatment, not including hospital expenses and other costs which are generally covered by the basic basket of services. Currently there is no limit as to how many treatments a woman may receive prior to conception, however, only 7 cycles of treatment, up to the birth of two live children, are covered as part of the basic basket of health services. Although there is no clear definition of infertility in the regulations defining the basic basket, couples are generally eligible for treatment if one year of sexual relations without contraception fails to result in pregnancy. In 1993, 7000 cycles of IVF treatment were performed (some women received more than one cycle of treatment). Moreover, unmarried women are now eligible for fertility treatments with donor sperm in accordance with the same provisions applying to married women.

While life expectancy for Israeli men was ranked in 1989 as the 2nd highest among 34 developed countries (after Greece), the life expectancy for Israeli women was ranked 18th. According to the WHO Regional Office for Europe, the difference in life expectancy between men and women is the smallest of 20 European reference countries. This pattern remains generally consistent for all the main causes of death. The WHO Europe Regional Office noted Israeli women's high mortality rates as a matter of particular concern in its 1996 Report on Health in Israel.

7. Mortality Rates and Causes of Death

7.1. Infant Mortality Rates

The infant mortality rate has almost halved since 1983 and currently stands at 6.8 deaths per every 1000 live births (5.5 deaths among Jewish newborns, and 9.9 deaths among non-Jewish newborns.)

The mortality rate of Jewish female Israeli newborns has been consistently lower than the mortality rate of Jewish male Israeli newborns and has remained consistently lower than that of their male counterparts during the first year for life, although the gap has been closing. However, while the average mortality rate of non-Jewish female infants was lower than the average mortality rate of non-Jewish male infants between the years 1980-1984, the average mortality of non-Jewish female infants rose above that of their male counterparts between the years 1989-1993, and has remained consistently higher than the mortality rate of non-Jewish male infants between their first month and first year of life.

7. 2. Maternal Mortality Rates

The maternal rate of mortality has remained generally low since 1985 , and in 1992 stood at 5.45 deaths per every 100,000 live births. According to the WHO Regional Office for Europe, the Israeli rate for 1990-1992 was the 9th lowest among 20 European reference countries.

Heart disease is the cause of death for 211.7 out of every 100,000 Israeli women, and 23% of deaths among Israeli women aged 65 and up. While the mortality rate of Israeli women from heart diseases was found to be approximately 30% lower than that of Israeli men, it is placed 27th lowest among the 34 Western countries to which Israel was compared by the International Mortality Chartbook, whereas the mortality rate of Israeli men from heart disease placed 17th lowest as compared to other countries.

7. 5. Breast Cancer Among Israeli Women

While the incidence of many types of cancers in Israel has generally gone down since the 1960s, Israel has witnessed a constant rise in the incidence of breast cancer over the last 30 years. It appears that Jewish Israeli women, like women in other developed countries, are at a particularly high risk of developing the disease at some point during their lives. A study conducted in 1985 revealed that one of the highest rates of breast cancer in the world is found among Jewish Israeli women, while one of the lowest rates in the world was found among non-Jewish Israeli women.

Specifically, Arab-Israeli women constitute the group with the lowest rate of breast cancer in Israel, and the rate of cancer in general among Arab-Israeli women is lower than the rate of cancer among Arab-Israeli men. However, breast cancer still constitutes 1/3 of all cases of cancer among Arab-Israeli women (Avgar, 1996).

Breast cancer has become the leading cause of death for Israeli women in the 25-55 age group, and has taken the lives of more Israeli women than all heart diseases combined. The rate of cancer among all Jewish Israeli women has risen since the 1960s from 45 cases per 100,000 women to 81 cases per 100,000 women in the early 1990s. The most dramatic rise in the number of new breast cancer cases occurred among Jewish women born in Israel (from 36/100,000 in the 60s to 92/100,000 in the 90s), as opposed to American, European, African or Asian born Jewish women, or Non-Jewish Israeli women (Avgar, 96). Between the 1987-1989 to 1990-1992 periods, there was a 37% rise in the number of new breast cancer cases. According to the figures compiled in 1995, in 1992 almost 2000 new cases of breast cancer were found among Israeli Jewish women, accounting for a third of the malignant tumors found in Israeli Jewish women during that year. Breast cancer is detected earliest amongst Israeli-born Jewish women (47.7 on average) in comparison with other groups of Jewish Israeli women. As with most malignant diseases, the rate of breast cancer among Israeli women rises with their age, reaching its peak in the 65-70 age groups, which experience outbreaks at a rate of 450/100,000 women (with the exception of American and European born Israeli women, amongst whom breast cancer peaks at later ages) and falling back to a rate of 300/100,000 women in the 70+ age group.

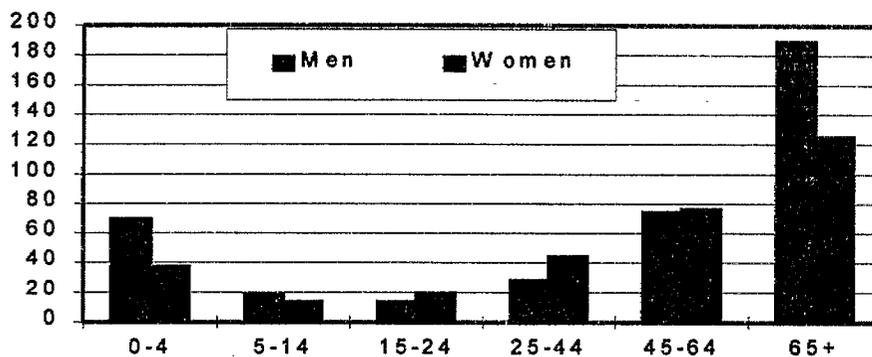

7. 6. Mammograms

The new Health Insurance Law expressly forbids the discrimination in services on the basis of sex. This has induced the general manager and the director of health services at the Health Ministry to announce in 1996 that by the end of 1997, the sick funds plan to cover all women in the 50-74 age group for a mammography examination once every two years.

8. Hospitalization

The hospitalization of Jewish females under the age of 15 is lower than that of their male counterparts. After the age of 15 the hospitalization rate amongst Israeli women exceeds the rate of men, and continues to rise sharply in every age group. By the age of 45, the hospitalization rate of males and females is approximately equal, and beyond the age of 65 the hospitalization rate of men rises above that of women. The above statistics include women hospitalized in maternity wards.

In 1995, 44% of all psychiatric hospitalizations were of women and 56% were of men. The rate of hospitalized men exceeded the rate of hospitalized women until the ages of 45+.

9. Violence as a health factor

Violence against women is thoroughly discussed under Article 5 above. The National Health Law covers any and all medical expenses incurred as a result of physical or sexual violence against women.

The 1996 parliamentary committee whose work is discussed under Article 5 above, has recommended to the Health Ministry that medical teams be trained to identify damage stemming from domestic violence and to ask questions pertaining to family violence (including mental violence) as part of the standard line of questioning during an examination. In addition, the committee has recommended that questions pertaining to violence against women be included in the Israeli Medical Board examinations for doctors, nurses, and paramedics.

10. AIDS

The total number of AIDS patients in Israeli during 1995 was 358, 312 of whom were male and 46 of whom were female. 278 of the 358 patients died that year. The number of AIDS carriers in Israel in 1995 was 1386 of whom 367 were women; most were exposed to the virus outside of Israel. Since the first statistical documentation of AIDS in Israel in the early 1980's, the proportion of Israelis infected each year by the HIV virus who are women has significantly increased, especially since 1992.

The Israel Family Planning Association has been tackling the issue of AIDS in Israel by printing and distributing educational pamphlets in Hebrew, Russian, Arabic, and Amharic (the language spoken by Ethiopian newcomers to Israel). In addition, the Association offers courses and seminars which emphasize AIDS awareness and education.

11. Women in Health care

11.1. Women in Medical School

The number of women accepted to medical schools in Israel has risen significantly over the last 26 years, from 24% in 1969, to 48% in 1995. Israeli women were found to score comparably to Israeli men in the National Medical Board examinations.

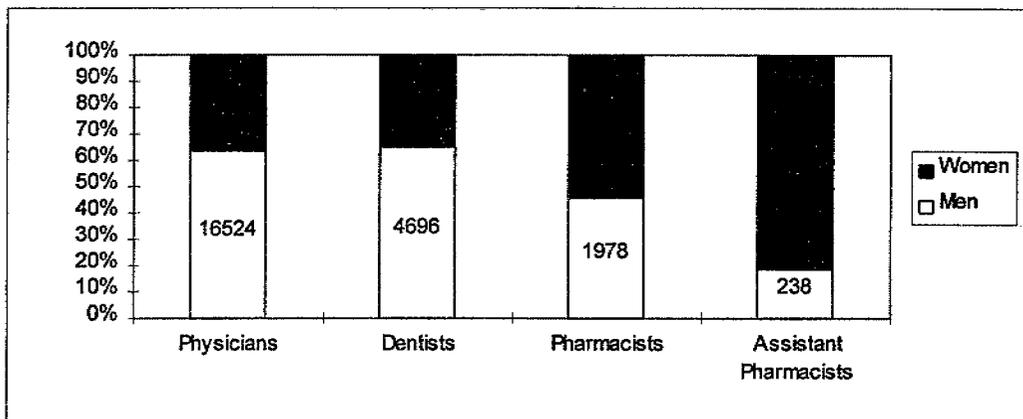

11.2. Women as Medical Personnel

By the end of 1993, two thirds of all doctors and dentists were men. Among the specialists, 74% were men. The highest rate of women specialists was in pediatrics (40%) and psychiatry (40%), followed by family-medicine (35%). The lowest rate of women specialists was in general-surgery (5%), followed by obstetrics and gynecology (15%). While 43% of all men-doctors were specialists, only 29% of all women doctors were specialists.

The mass emigration to Israel from the former USSR has significantly changed the proportion of practicing doctors who are women in Israel, from 30% to 36% by 1995 (and 35% of all practicing dentists). Twenty percent of all doctors in 1993 were new immigrants who arrived to Israel in 1990-1993.

Chart 6 --Medical Personnel

Currently, 56% of all new immigrants who are doctors are women. Figures from 1992-3 indicate that 49% of medical licenses were given to women, 90% of the whom did not study medicine in Israel.

Israeli women doctors tend to work in clinics as opposed to hospitals and are less likely than men to specialize in surgery related fields. While the proportions of Israeli women and US women who specialize in psychiatry and family medicine are similar, the proportion of women in the US who specialize in internal medicine, children's medicine, surgery, and particularly gynecology, is significantly higher than the proportion of their Israeli counterparts. Although gynecology is a specialty predominantly occupied by women in Eastern Europe, the current wave of immigrants from the former USSR did not significantly alter the number of women gynecologists in Israel.

12. Arab Women and Health Services

Prior to the enactment of the new health insurance law, health clinics in almost all Jewish cities and villages, while nearly a third of the Arab villages lacked clinics. For example, in the Arab city of Um El Phachem, which housed 27,000 residents, the General Sick Fund provided only one gynecologist for its 18,000 members. In the new law the government adopted the policy of indirectly encouraging the Sick Funds to accept members who live in Israel's peripheries, such as Um El Phachem, by allotting funds in proportion to the number of members in each sick fund, and by specifying that more funds will be allotted for those living in the peripheral areas.

Maccabi, the sick fund considered to provide the most qualitative health care services, began establishing branches in Arab villages while the new law was still being discussed in the Knesset. Thus, the new law has in fact brought an immediate improvement in the quantity and proximity of health care services to Israeli Arabs.

A recent study conducted to gauge the level of satisfaction with the changes in the health care system brought on by the new law (Berg, 1996) found that the level of satisfaction from the new law was highest in the Arab community: 31% of the Arab residents included in the study felt that health care services had improved as a result of the new law, as opposed to a mere 17% of the veteran Israeli society.

Since 1994, the Ministry of Health has joined the active effort to close the gaps in health care between Israel's minority groups and the majority by allotting a proportion of its yearly budget for this express purpose since. In 1995, 5.1 million NIS (roughly 1.5 million dollars) were allotted, which amounted to 2% of the Health Ministry's budget, and by 1996, 9.7 million NIS were allotted this purpose. Most of the funds have been used to employ more care-givers and purchase equipment for the clinics serving minority populations.

12. 1. Health Care Services offered to Arab Women

As mentioned above, the Minister of Health, through its local public health departments, operates an extensive network of 435 Mother-Child clinics throughout the country that offer high-quality and relatively inexpensive pre- and post-natal care to women on a neighborhood basis. While Mother-Child stations had been set up in all Jewish cities, in 1991 20 Arab villages still lacked Mother-Child clinics. In response, during 1993-1994, the Health Ministry approved the construction of 20 new Mother-Child clinics in Arab towns and villages. In 1995, the Health Ministry approved the construction of an additional 30 mother-Child clinics in Arab towns and villages, and 1996 the Health Ministry approved the construction of an additional 27 new Mother-Child Clinics for Arab towns and villages and spent 6.5 million NIS (roughly 2 million Dollars,) on their construction. A study conducted in 1992 among 320 Arab mothers in seven hospitals in Northern Israel found that Christian Arab women, who tend to be more educated than their Druze and Moslem counterparts, preferred private doctors to the Mother-Child care centers and visited the centers less frequently.

Geriatric services for Arab women were virtually non-existent until 1993. No Arab town had institutions with beds for geriatric purposes and geriatric care was provided for the Arab elderly mainly by family members even after the enactment of the Nursing Care Insurance law - 1988. However, caretakers who are not members of the patient's immediate family and do not live in the same household have begun to take collect the allowance provided by the Nursing Care Insurance law as compensation for their services. Presently 12% of all Arab senior citizens receive both a senior citizen's allowance and nursing care allowance, while only 6% of all Jewish senior citizens receive both allowances. In addition, the first old-age home specifically geared for the Arab community opened in 1993 in the Arab town of Deboriah.

12. 2. Life Expectancy and Causes of Death Among Arab Women

Arab women have a life expectancy of 77.1 years as compared to Jewish women whose life expectancy is 79.5 years. The leading cause of death (47%) among both Arab and Jewish women is heart disease. Cancer is the second leading cause of death among Jewish women, and only the third leading cause of death among Arab women. However, the death rate from cancer among Arab women has been rising, and the difference between the two groups has been decreasing. Strokes have been found to be the third largest cause of death among Israeli women in general, leading to the death of 165 out of every 100,000 Arab women, as compared to 119 out of every 100,000 Jewish women. High blood pressure, which is generally more common among men than women, is particularly common and dangerous to the health of Arab women.

12. 3. Infant Mortality Rates among Arab Newborns

Despite the general improvement in health services since the establishment of State of Israel, a significant gap remains between the infant mortality rates in the Arab sector as opposed to the Jewish sector.

Table 11 - Health Determinants

	Jews	Arabs

Statistical analysis completed in 1992 found that in the cities included in the study, the 9 cities with the highest infant mortality rates (spanning from 16.8% -24.6%) were cities in which the majority of the population were Arabs.

Chart 7 - Jewish and Arab Stillborns and Infant Mortality Rates & Life Expectancy

12. 4. Fertility and Family Planning

The birth rate among Israel's Arab Moslems dropped from an average of 9.22 children per family in the 1960s to 8.5 in 1975, and continued to drop dramatically until 1986, when it stabilized at 4.6. Recently there has been a small rise in fertility rates among Moslems (the rate rose to 4.7 in 1995), but a decline continued among Christian and Druze women. A study conducted in 1996, reveals a negative correlation between the fertility rate and years of education among Arab women, and a positive correlation between the number of years between each birth and the level of education. In addition, the study reveals that the fertility rate among village women is higher than that of city women. Arab women of Jerusalem were found to be exceptional in terms of this correlation, and their fertility rates were significantly higher than the fertility rates in other Arab cities.

ARTICLE 13 Social and Economic Benefits

States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in other areas of economic and social life in order to ensure, on a basis of equality of men and women, the same rights, in particular:

- a) The right to family benefits;*
- b) The right to bank loans, mortgages, and other forms of financial credit;*
- c) The right to participate in recreational activities, sports, and in all aspects of cultural life.*

The discussion under this Article will touch upon several areas relevant to the participation of women in economic, social and cultural life in Israel. As such, it will be divided into a number of parts: aspects of women in the economy; social benefits and the welfare state in Israel in relation to women's social and economic situation; and several aspects of everyday life of women in Israel (time-use and recreation).

1. Women in the Economy

1. 1. Women as Members on Boards of Israeli Companies

Women's participation in national economic life is a significant feature of full citizenship, which reflects society's willingness to accept women as leaders and decision-makers. In research conducted in 1994, the following data was collected concerning the number of women on the boards of directors in public companies traded on the stock exchange. In 61% of the public companies, there were no women appointed to the board of directors, and in 27% there was only one woman. In addition, research showed that more women serve on the boards of private or family-owned companies than on a public companies traded on the stock exchange.

According to the aforementioned research, men have a higher tendency to serve as directors of multiple companies, whereas women have a higher tendency to hold multiple jobs in the same company, in addition to serving as members of the board.

Recent data submitted to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women by the Women Managers in Industry Forum show that the situation did not improve significantly from 1994 to 1996: in both years women constituted less than 9% of the directors in public companies traded on the stock exchange, and in 702 such companies researched, only 322 had women on their boards.

1. 2. Attitude of Women Directors

The research revealed additional differences between the attitude of women and men directors: women emphasize the shareholders' interest, the ability to influence the management and social prestige associated with the job. Men, however, attach strong importance to public interest, the ability to make connections, and their own management experience. These differences reflect important aspects of how directors get appointed: men are usually appointed through friends, network connections, or business associates, while women are appointed mostly due to family connections and public activity.

1. 3. Women in Small Businesses

Another significant aspect of economic participation is expressed through entrepreneurship, particularly in small businesses. The influence of small businesses in generating employment opportunities has risen greatly in the recent years. Therefore, the participation of women in small businesses should be understood as a major channel through which women enter the Israeli economy.

In a recent national survey conducted under the auspices of the Small Business Authority in Israel, it was found that:

- 1) 8% of all women aged 22-55 were operating their own business.
- 2) The life-span of small businesses of women is relatively short: (45% operate 1-4 years, 51% operate 5-7 years.)
- 3) The major obstacle that women must overcome to be entrepreneurs is lack of experience in financial and marketing strategies.
- 4) Since women generally own less property than men, it is more difficult for them to provide sureties in order to receive necessary loans.

In 1996, the Committee for Promoting Women Entrepreneurship published a report which calls for increasing the number of women in bank managerial positions in order to influence the banks' attitude in favour of women's requests for loans and credit ratings. There is a National Fund for Promoting Small Business from which women can get loans with State guarantees.

The Small Business Authority of Israel (hereinafter: "SBAI") is a government agency designed to help, promote and assist small businesses in Israel. The SBAI established a committee aimed at helping women set up small businesses and aiding women entrepreneurs. The SBAI provides courses in business management to women all over Israel. In addition, the SBAI has set up Women Managers Clubs in cooperation with Na'amat (see Article 7).

Research done by the SBAI committee on the likelihood of women to open a small business revealed that 1) the average age of women entrepreneurs was 52, 2) their average education consisted of 13.5 years, 3) 70% of women entrepreneurs were married and 85% were mothers. The reasons and methods used for setting up a small business are summarized in the following table:

Table 1 - Women's Reasons for Establishing a Small Business

According to this data, in order to get capital most women preferred to borrow from relatives and friends rather than from banks. A small percentage of women reported difficulties in acquiring bank loans due to eligibility problems.

2. Social Benefits and the Welfare State in Israel

2. 1. The National Insurance Institute

The welfare state in Israel emerged gradually during the 49 years since the state's establishment. Israel succeeded in building a comprehensive system of social protection which encompasses social insurance and social assistance programs. The cornerstone of social insurance was laid soon after the establishment of the state, through the passage of the National Insurance Law-1953. The social insurance system is extended to include all major contingencies of income loss in modern industrial societies: old age, dependents, disability, child rearing, maternity, unemployment, and work injury.

The body responsible for administration of the social insurance programs is the National Insurance Institute (hereinafter: "NII") which operates under the supervision of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs. The NII provides welfare services to residents in need. The NII is also responsible for the payment of benefits under the social assistance program, as directed in the Income Support Law- 1980. Employment-related social benefits are described under Article 11. The following sections will describe other relevant social benefits, and will include data on recipients of such benefits.

2. 2. Social Benefits

2. 2. 1. Maternity Grant

Women are insured under maternity insurance, which provides a hospitalization grant, a maternity grant (both of which are only for the mother and not for the father) and a maternity leave allowance. Any woman who gives birth at a hospital is eligible for a maternity grant, set as 20% of the average wage, upon the birth of one child, and 100% upon the birth of twins. The conditions for eligibility for maternity leave allowance are detailed under Article 11.

During 1996, 56,000 women received maternity leave allowances, constituting 49.1% of all births that year. This means that less than half of the women who gave birth in 1996 were eligible for the allowance, in terms of working the required amount of months prior to the birth, as explained under Article 11 above.

2. 2. 2. Old Age Pension and Survivor's Benefit

96% of all women over age 65 in Israel receive an old age pension or a widow's pension for dependents. Of those receiving an old age pension, 61% receive the pension after having accrued insurance coverage, while 21% receive pensions in the form of a supplement to the spouse's pension. An additional 18% of elderly women, primarily new immigrants who were unable to accrue pension rights in Israel, receive pensions under special arrangements funded by the Treasury (general revenues.)

2. 2. 3. Longterm Care Insurance

All women, including housewives, are insured under long-term care insurance (see Article 12 above), and the conditions of entitlement are identical to that of men with one distinction: the age of entitlement for women is 60 and for men 65. Moreover, the conditions for entitlement to the benefit require at least 50% medical disability for housewives compared to 40% medical disability for other insured persons.

2. 2. 4. Unemployment Benefits

A person who is registered at the Employment Service, who is ready and able to work, and to whom the Service has not offered such work, is entitled to unemployment benefits. The daily unemployment benefit is calculated at rates determined in the law, on the basis of the daily average wage of the unemployed person during the last 75 work days of the qualifying period. In 1996, 45.4% of all women aged 15 or older were part of the work force. The number of women receiving unemployment benefits was only 3.9% of the women's work force. The comparable figure for men was 2.8%. Women's unemployment rate in 1995 was 8%, and men's unemployment rate was 5.1%.

2. 2. 5. Children's Allowances

The NII provides children's allowances to an insured parent under the law, paid to one of the parents for each child (under the age of 18) and to an insured person who supported a child who is not his or her child for at least 12 months.

2. 2. 6. Alimony Payments

The Alimony (Guarantee of Payment) Law -1972 states that any person, regardless of gender, who has received a court decision in his or her favor for alimony and who is an Israeli resident, may receive this grant from the NII according to the court decision. Currently, the sums are 25% of the average wage for the alimony of a woman alone; 39.7% of the average wage for a woman with one child; 49.6% for a woman with two children. This law is a revolutionary law, enabling entitled people who cannot succeed in implementing the court decisions on their own, to receive the sums laid down by the courts.

In 1996, 18,283 women received alimony payments. The overwhelming majority (99.3%) were women with children. About one third had one child, one third had two children, close to 20% had three children and about 10% had four children or more. The amount paid increases according to the number of children. Significantly, only 5% of the women received the sum determined in the regulations, since the sum that is decided in the courts is usually lower, and the beneficiary is entitled to the lower sum of the two. Thus, the average sum of alimony payment in 1996 was only 19.9% of the average wage.

Other information indicative of the economic situation of women receiving alimony payments through the NII is that of all women who received unemployment payment in 1996 (36,750 women), 52.5% had also received alimony payment.

2. 3. Poverty of Women

According to the definition of poverty adopted by the NII, a family is considered poor when its standard of living falls considerably below the defined poverty line. The poverty line in Israel is defined as 50% of the median disposable income (i.e. after the various social-security transfer payments and income tax), adjusted to family size.

According to the statistics offered by the NII, there are almost no gender-related differences regarding the incidence of poverty among the population, and poverty is documented in equal proportions among both men and women. In 1995, out of 1,447,900 adult women, there were 224,600 earning an income below the poverty line. Out of 1,324,300 adult men, there were 189,300 living below the poverty line. According to these statistics, women constituted 54.3% of the persons having an income below the poverty line, while men constitute 45.7% of the persons having an income below the poverty line. Since women constitute 52.2% of the adult population these figures show that the proportion of women in poverty is only slightly larger than their proportion in general in the population (54.3% vs. 52.2%).

Nevertheless, there are specific population groups which are especially vulnerable to poverty, particularly those families that are headed by women. The statistics concerning poverty in families headed by women are as follows: 21.9% of all families headed by women live below the poverty line, 25% of all families headed by elderly women live below the poverty line, and the incidence of poverty in single-parent families headed by women are estimated to be higher, but unfortunately the NII data regarding this group is not sufficient to enable a precise assessment. Regarding two-parent families, the poverty rates are smaller: 13% among families with no children; 7% among families with one child; 11% among families with two children; 15% among families with three children; and the striking figure of 40% among families with four children or more (related to the socio-demographic characteristics of such families). The impression of a higher poverty rate among women-headed families is strengthened by the data concerning income support benefit, discussed below.

Much of this information regarding the economic status of women-headed households is the direct result of the earning gaps that exist between women and men, as discussed extensively under Article 11 above. This contention is supported by the breakdown of the incidence of poverty among working men and women, when the analysis is done according to the disposable family income, adjusted by the number of family members. The NII data reveals that 14% of working Jewish women are below the poverty line, while the poverty rate for working Jewish men is only 7%. Interestingly, the opposite is true among working non-Jewish men and women. The poverty rate among non-Jewish working women is 20%, and among non-Jewish working men is 23%.

2.3.1. Single Parent Families

In 1995, around 10% of all Israeli households constituted single-parent families (data varies between the Central Bureau of Statistics and the National Insurance Institute). Over 80% of these households are headed by women. According to the NII, poverty among single-parent families is more frequent than among two-parent families. Researchers further contend that almost one third of families with children that are headed by women are poor, compared with 15% of families with children that are headed by men. Unfortunately, neither of these estimations can be presently verified, since the sample used by the NII income-survey is too small to enable statistical analysis regarding single-parent families. One indication of the limitations of these estimates is the disproportionately high rate of single-parent women who received income support benefits in 1995; in this year 41% of all women receiving income support benefits were single-mothers. Overall, the high percentage of single-parent families headed by women living in poverty has been recognized as a serious problem, which is being dealt with in several different ways.

The Single-Parent Family Law 1992 entitles single-parent families to income support, and has strengthened the social protection for single-parent families with low income, by increasing the level of their means-tested benefit as well as by awarding them child-education grants and priority in vocational training. The Single-Parent Family Law brought about an equalization of rights among the various types of single-parent families, whether headed by men or by women, under the principle of "equal treatment for families with equal needs."

The Law was amended in 1994 and the definition of "single-parent" was broadened to include women or men who are separated from their spouses for at least two years and who have started divorce proceedings, immigrants whose spouses did not immigrate with them, and agunot (women whose husbands refuse to grant them a bill of divorce). According to the Single-Parent Family Law, every single parent is entitled to children's benefits, while those that do not have any income aside from alimony payments are entitled to income support. In 1995 the benefit to deserted wives and mothers whose spouses were in jail was increased by 50% in order to combat the high rate of poverty among these families.

In addition, single-parent families are entitled to benefits in income tax, special credit points which reduce the amount of taxes they have to pay, and financial help in paying rent. Moreover, the NII provides a single parent family with a children between the ages of 6-14 with a yearly study grant.

2. 3. 2. Poverty among the Elderly

Women's organizations have pointed out that, as part of the more vulnerable population, elderly women constitute a higher percentage of persons living below the poverty line. One of the means for dealing with this problem is the Law for the Reduction of Poverty and Income Disparities 1994. Under this law, the benefits paid to the elderly and single-parent families have risen significantly. This law is likely to help more women than men since women generally live longer than men.

According to statistics submitted by the NII, however, the situation today is that poverty among the elderly is found in almost equal proportion among men and women. The percentage of elderly women living below the poverty line is 19.2%, and among elderly men is 18.9%.

2. 4. Combating Poverty

2. 4. 1. Income Support

Transfer payments play a crucial role in reducing poverty and income disparities. According to the Income Support Law - 1980, Israeli residents over 18 years old, subject to a means test that takes into account the economic situation of the family unit as a whole, are entitled to an income support benefit under certain conditions, including, for example: unemployment; employment at low wages; single-parenthood with a child up to the age of 7; and more. The benefit rates, presented as percentages of the average wage, vary according to the conditions of eligibility. Single parents with children get the highest rate of income support: with one child - 43%, with two or more children - 53%.

Income support is given on the basis of a family unit. In 1995, among all recipients of income support benefits 65% were women, of whom 34% were married with or without children, 25% were unmarried, and 41% were single-parents.

ARTICLE 14 Rural Women

1. States Parties shall take into account the particular problems faced by rural women and the significant roles which they play in the economic survival of their families, including their work in the non-monetized sectors of the economy and shall take all appropriate measures to ensure the application of the provisions of this Convention to women in rural areas.

2. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in rural areas in order to ensure, on the basis of equality of men and women, that they participate in and benefit from rural development and, in particular, shall ensure to such women the right:

- a) To participate in the elaboration and implementation of development planning at all levels;*
- b) To have access to adequate health care facilities, including information, counselling and services in family planning;*
- c) To benefit directly from social security programmes;*
- d) To obtain all types of training and education, formal and non formal, including that relating to functional literacy, as well as inter alia, the benefit of all community and extension services, in order to increase their technical proficiency;*
- e) To organise self-help groups and co-operatives in order to obtain equal access to economic opportunities through employment or self-employment;*
- f) To participate in all community activities;*
- g) To have access to agricultural credit and loans, marketing facilities, appropriate technology and equal treatment in land and agrarian reform as well as in land resettlement schemes;*
- g) To enjoy adequate living conditions, particularly in relation to housing, sanitation, electricity and water supply, transport and communications.*

The issue of rural women is not particularly relevant to the State of Israel, since only 10.4% of the Israeli population lives in rural localities. Two main groups which this Article will concentrate upon are Bedouin women and women in kibbutz.

1. Bedouin Women

1. 1. Introduction

This chapter focuses on the 100,000 Bedouins who live in the southern Israeli desert regions. Half of the Bedouins who reside in southern Israel live in one of 7 Bedouin towns that were officially founded and recognized by the State (Tel-Sheva, Rahat, Chora, Lakye, Sgav- Shalem, Aroer, and Csype,) while the remaining half are scattered across the desert and live in semi-nomadic clans.

The Bedouin community has undergone many changes since its first exposure to Israeli society. The process has had various social, political, and economic effects on the Bedouin community, and has weakened many age-old customs of Bedouin society: particularly those of Bedouin women.

1. 2. Family

Bedouin society is patriarchal and traditional. Bedouin women traditionally hold all domestic responsibilities, including upkeep of the family tent, and education of children. In addition, women were held responsible for caring for members of the tribe who were in need of communal assistance, like the elderly or the infirm.

1. 3. Israel's Influence on the Bedouin Social Structure

1. 3. 1. The Rise in Polygamous Marriages

Historically, Bedouins practiced polygamy, and in recent decades the popularity of polygamy has risen. Exposure to Israeli society has either lead Bedouin men away from their villages, or brought them back to their villages with new expectations as to their future lifestyles there, which include the expectation to marry partners who share their more western outlook and possess a similar educational background. Bedouin women, who are usually not allowed to leave their village for educational or employment purposes, have not been able to meet the expectations of their westernized male counterparts. Consequently, many remain unmarried at relatively advanced ages (late 20s early 30.) . Unmarried Bedouin women remain dependent on their families and are perceived as economic burdens by their fathers, who are traditionally in charge of family finances. In order to remedy the situation, many of these older unmarried Bedouin women are married off as second or third wives.

In the Bedouin town Rahat (the largest of the officially recognized Bedouin towns in the south) the average age of legal wives in monogamous marriages is 18.3, and the average age of the first wives in polygamous marriages is 20.5, while the average age of the other wives in a polygamous marriage is 24.24 (Alatona, 93.) In addition, the research indicates that the number of forced marriages was significantly higher among additional wives in polygamous marriages than among the first wives in polygamous marriages or wives in monogamous marriages. Polygamous marriages occur among educated Bedouins men and women as well. Often, an educated woman will be married off as a second or third wife, yet her level of education seems to be a positive variable in her status in the polygamous marriage. In Rahat, while wives in monogamous marriages received an average of 4.4 years of education and additional wives in polygamous marriages received an average of 3.5 years of education, the first wives in polygamous marriages were found to have received only .7 years of education on average. The status of the first wife in a polygamous marriage varies: some of the first wives are all but abandoned by their husbands in favor of the new wives although they are not officially divorced, while others become more prominent in their position as compared to the other wives.

Education was found to increase self-esteem among women in monogamous marriages, though educated women in polygamous marriages were found to more frustrated by their marriage arrangements because they were more aware of their educational and professional potential.

Israeli law forbids polygamy, though Bedouin men manage to circumvent the law by marrying one wife legally and the rest traditionally, later claiming to the Civil courts that the other wives are strictly maintained as "concubines." However, the Shaaria (Moslem) courts recognize the concubines as legal wives and grant them divorces as well (Alatona, 93).

1. 3. 2. Modernization as a Bane to the Status of Bedouin women

As a result of the government-sponsored transition of the Bedouin community from a semi-nomadic lifestyle to permanent residences, many of the traditional activities of the Bedouin women have been replaced by modern technology and by the Israeli educational system. The abandonment of traditional life has left a vacuum in the lives of Bedouin women that has yet to be filled by new forms of activity; these women are unequipped and unable at this stage in their lives to enter to go into the labor market or pursue a formal education. Thus, they have been left unemployed, although they are not formally recognized as such by the Israeli government. The Bedouin men see the change in their wives role in the nuclear family as a transition from a productive to a consumptive role which leads to a gradual loss of respect for their wives and the roles which they play in the family unit.

1. 4. Employment

Bedouin men still object to sending their wives and daughters to work outside of their town and villages. At present, Bedouin women are more interested in vocational training which will provide them with skills that can be utilized within their homes or villages. Since Bedouin social code dictates that women must be accompanied at all times and places outside the home, Bedouin men only allow their wives to work outside of the home provided that they are supervised at all times.

Bedouins in the Galilee have overcome these societal constraints through the supervision of Raisim, i.e. labor contractors or work supervisors, who assume the responsibility of protecting Bedouin women when they are working outside the home. The Raisim usually organize groups of women to work in factories, agriculture, and as household help, and these women are often paid through the Raisim. While in the past Bedouins were decidedly opposed to women working at night, the Raisim system has created the opportunity for village women to work night-shifts in factories and in hotels. The competition amongst Raisim to manage as many workers as possible ensures that women will not be taken advantage of. Presently, the phenomena of Bedouin women working through the Raisim arrangement is only significant in the Northern Bedouin villages located in the Galilee.

1. 5. Education

Bedouin children enjoy a public school education comparable to the public school education provided all over Israel. However, only 30% of Bedouin students complete the 12th grade, and barely 3% of the students successfully complete graduation requirements.

Currently, Bedouin girls constitute at least 50% of the student body of the recognized Bedouin schools. Many parents expect their daughters to return to their traditional roles in the Bedouin households upon graduation from 12th grade, which often results in irreconcilable differences between the traditional parents and their educated daughters who refuse to return to domestic work which does not allow them to use their education. Furthermore, many girls who are allowed to work must hand their wages over to their parents and often resent their inability to enjoy the fruits of their labor. These irreconcilable differences lead a significant number of Bedouin girls to run away from their homes to shelters and half-way houses.

Recently higher education has begun to gain acceptance among some Bedouin parents who realize that in order for their daughters to lead comfortable lifestyles and find suitable husbands (given the rise in demand for educated wives among young Bedouin men) they must have advanced education. Nevertheless, most parents still associate the university setting with decadence, and fear that sending their daughters to university will result in the desecration of their family's honor.

1. 6. Ritual Female Genital Operations (Female Circumcision)

Ritual female genital surgery (RFGS) has been found to be a normative practice in several Bedouin tribes in southern Israel. Those Bedouin women among whom the custom is prevalent do not refer to female circumcision in anatomic terms, but rather refer to it as "purification." In 1992, Bedouin women from six different tribes were interviewed regarding their circumcisions. The women interviewed were between the ages of 16 and 45. They reported that not only they, but all their sisters and the women in their close and extended family underwent RFGS. The older women who had daughters reported that their daughters had already undergone RFGS or will undergo RFGS when they reach the suitable age. The ages between 12 and 17 are considered suitable for RFGS, since they are after menarche but before the girls reach a marriageable age.

Most of the women stated that they will continue practicing RFGS on their daughters, however, two young women aged 16 and 18, who were among the younger and better educated women in the group, said they will not perform RFGS on their daughters.

A physical examination of women from the same tribes revealed that the RFGS performed on them did not involve clitoridectomy. However, all of the women recorded bleeding and pain at the time of the RFGS. Three of the women reported that they had required medical attention. All of the women reported pain on intercourse in the months after marriage. None of them felt this to be related to RFGS and many approved of the practice and intended to continue the tradition.

1. 7. Organizations for the Advancement of Bedouin Women

Currently, there are no organizations specifically run by Bedouin women. The Bedouin community itself does not provide a social framework for women outside of infrequent social gatherings under religious auspices. Some Bedouin women have shown a great deal of interest in the formation of such organizations. The social workers in the town Csyfe were the first to open a women's recreational center in a Bedouin town. Some of the activities provided by the center are workshops for learning Hebrew, classes to complete the basic requirements for a high-school diploma, and social gatherings.

1. 8. Health

The new Health Insurance law has been changing the face of health care for Israel's Bedouin residents. For example, before the enactment of the new law, 20,000 residents of the Bedouin town of Rahat (about half of the city's population) were uninsured. The remainder of the residents who were insured belonged to the General Sick Fund, which only maintained one infirmary in the entire city. The new law, which has guaranteed coverage for all of Israel's residents, has led two additional sick funds to open branches in Rahat. In addition, the Health Ministry has approved the construction of 6 new infirmaries in officially recognized southern Bedouin towns. However, the Ministry's southern district currently lacks the necessary funding and labor-force to provide the full basic basket of services for the Bedouin community. The shortage of doctors to fill the needs of the Bedouin community has been estimated at 50% and the shortage of nurses has been estimated at 30% (Belmekker, 1996). The Health Ministry has attempted to respond to the problem by appropriating approximately 200,000 NIS each year since 1995 specifically for the Bedouin sector, which have been expended on training seminars for nurses to serve the Bedouin community.

An additional problem in applying the new law concerns the 40,000 Bedouins of the south who live in areas where there are no permanent health services. They are currently forced to walk at least 5 kilometers, or wait for traveling doctors provided by the sick funds, in order to enjoy the services now included in the basic basket of services. Presently, the government maintains two traveling medical teams, and uses the services of an additional private traveling medical team. Under the new law, infirmaries providing basic services must be within a "reasonable distance" from the residence of the insured. Therefore, in order to maintain the law's instructions, more infirmaries must be erected closer to Bedouin villages. More attention should also be given to those health services where the Bedouins' need is greater, such as obstetrics and pediatrics; while 20%-25% of the population which makes use of the Soroka hospital in Be'er-Sheva are Bedouins, over 45% of the births in that hospital (11,000 in 1995) are those of Bedouin women.

1. 9. Violence Against Bedouin Women

Social workers who work in Bedouin communities maintain that they manage to prevent 20-30 girls each year from being murdered on account of having "desecrated their family's honor," and have minimized the occurrence of such murders altogether. The social workers use relatively unconventional methods to prevent the murders, such as secret abortions. Although the notion of "family honor" is deeply ingrained in the Bedouin ethos, the social workers explain that parents are reluctant to react to their daughters' promiscuous behavior unless it becomes publicly known and they are pressured to react by their community.

2. Women on the Kibbutz

2. 1. The Myth of Equality

Kibbutz movement ideology strives to create and maintain equality between the sexes. This ideological emphasis on equality however, has failed to compensate for the reality of female kibbutz member's inferior status, a problem which has existed throughout kibbutz history.

The Associated Partnership Statute (categories of associations) - 1995, defines a kibbutz as an organization which is its own settlement based on joint ownership of property, independent work, equality and joint production, consumption and education. According to this definition, women are entitled to the same rights and responsibilities as any kibbutz member. In other words, from a legal standpoint there is equality between men and women on the kibbutz.

2. 2. A Woman's Role in the Kibbutz

2. 2. 1. Education

During the past 25 years the right to higher education has been provided to both male and female kibbutz members. Statistical studies show that 69% of kibbutz men and 74% of kibbutz women, age 31- 40 have at least 13 years of education. This gap narrows in poles taken of younger people, though more men have advanced degrees.

Fields of study are often divided by gender, with most women studying social sciences, psychology and art; and most men economics, earth science and technical vocations

In other fields of study this gender division is less extreme, for example in economics and engineering.

2.3. Employment

Most female kibbutz members are employed in education, domestic work or public service, whereas most men are employed in agriculture, industry or production management. In kibbutz industries, few women are employed as "blue collar" workers, most are in secretarial positions. This division can be found in executive positions as well, where most senior positions are filled by men.

In sum, it can be concluded that there is a clear division of labor based on gender in kibbutz society. This division dictates which positions are to be allocated to women and which to men.

2.4. Appointment of Men and Women to Public and Political Positions on the Kibbutz

In the past twenty years, only 16 women have been appointed to management positions on kibbutzim; today 5.7% of those in office are women, which does not show a substantial increase from 1973. Over this same period, 34.5% of those holding the position of kibbutz secretary were women, though the number of women in other significant kibbutz management positions, such as treasurer, has remained low. The following table shows that the number of female chairpersons of committees in male dominated fields is statistically insignificant.

In sum, contemporary statistics about the division of labor on kibbutzim tend to reflect that which was reported by researchers more than twenty years ago. Men and women are active in fields which are an extension of their traditional roles; men in fields of economy and economics related to sources of livelihood and resources, and women in roles of care-givers.

ARTICLE 15

Equality Before the Law and in Civil Matters

- 1. State Parties shall accord to women equality with men before the law.*
- 2. States Parties shall accord to women, in civil matters, a legal capacity identical to that of men and the same opportunities to exercise that capacity. They shall in particular give women equal rights to conclude contracts and to administer property and treat them equally in all stages in courts and tribunals.*
- 3. States Parties agree that all contracts and all other private instruments of any kind with a legal effect which is directed at restricting the legal capacity of women shall be deemed null and void.*
- 4. States Parties shall accord to men and women the same rights with regard to the law relating to the movement of persons and the freedom to choose their residence and domicile.*

1. Legal Capacity of Women

As explained under Article 1, complete formal equality between men and women before the law is entrenched in Israeli law, except in matters governed by religious law. Women hold complete legal capacity to conclude contracts and administer property. Women have the same rights as men to make contracts in their own name, including those relating to credit, real estate and other property, as well as to make other commercial transactions, notwithstanding their personal status.

The Women's Equal Rights Law-1951 specifically relates to the issue of marriage, providing complete legal capacity for a married woman with regards to property "as if she were not married." This provision abrogated the power of religious law which designates husbands as administrators and proprietors of their wives' property.

2. Gender-Specific Legal Concepts

Two particular Israeli legal concepts apply to women and not to men: one is in the area of social benefits, namely the concept of the home-maker, or rather its gender-specific label of "housewife," which only applies to women and not to men. The other is in the area of defenses under criminal law, namely the defense of post-partum-syndrome which applies to rare cases where a woman who suffers from severe depression after giving birth, consequently kills her newborn baby. Section 303(a) to the Penal Law-1977 states that in such cases, where the baby was under 12 months of age, the maximum punishment of the mother is 5 years imprisonment. Section 303(b) makes clear that this special defense does not preclude the possibility of an absolute immunity for reason of insanity.

3. Equal Participation of Women in the Courts-System

Women are treated equally and participate equally in the civil-courts, both as litigants, witnesses, lawyers and judges (qualifications to this formal equality are discussed in the following section). The situation, however, is different with respect to the religious courts system, which is part of the national judicial system, and has exclusive jurisdiction in matters of marriage and divorce, and concurrent jurisdiction in other matters of family law.

Under Jewish law, women are not qualified to be witnesses. However, halachic (Jewish law) authorities throughout the ages have found various solutions and means to accept women's testimony, and in practice, rabbinical courts accept their testimony and accord it the same evidential weight that is accorded to men's testimony.

An interesting development had taken place with respect to the representation of clients in rabbinical courts. Certified attorneys, whether men or women, can represent clients in rabbinical courts (or in other religious courts) in any and all matters. However, both rabbinical and Moslem courts recognize the competence of rabbinical or sharia advocates to represent clients only in the relevant religious courts, without being certified attorneys. The Rabbinical Advocates Law - 1955 originally applied to men alone, since it required graduation from a yeshiva (an institute of higher learning of religion and religious law, traditionally for men alone) as a primary condition for qualification as a candidate to the profession. The law was amended in 1991 to include graduates of other educational institutes of higher learning that are recognized by the Chief Rabbinical Court as eligible candidates for the profession. However, no regulations or other directives were passed to establish the criteria for such recognition. Only in 1994, after an institute for higher Torah learning for women petitioned the High Court of Justice, did the Chief Rabbinical Court decide upon the criteria for its recognition. The High Court of Justice reviewed those criteria, and found that some of them, such as the requirement of full-time everyday studies for full two years, were intended to make it impossible for women students to qualify for candidacy, and were therefore discriminatory. Several dozen women have since passed the examinations and are now functioning as rabbinical advocates; they primarily represent women clients.

3. 1. Gender Bias in the Courts

3. 1. 1. Special Study of Gender Bias in Israeli Courts

In the early 1990s the Israeli Women's Network initiated a study on gender-bias in Israeli courts. With the support of the Ford Foundation and the academic backing of the Jerusalem Institute of Israel Research, the study was designed to determine if and how gender bias was manifested in Israeli courts. The study began in 1992, and concluded toward the end of 1996.

3. 1. 2. Main Findings of the Study

Some of the main findings of the research are as follows:

1. Judges seem to accord greater credibility to men than to women, both as defendants and as lawyers. Women lawyers were significantly less successful in persuading judges than were men lawyers, regarding both sentence length and the ratio between prison term and maximum sentence. Lower sentences were imposed when women were the prosecutors and higher sentences were imposed when women were the defense attorneys. Furthermore, men prosecutors were most persuasive when the defense attorney was a woman.
2. When the accused was a stranger to the woman victim, the prison term he was sentenced to was almost double the sentence as when the accused was a family member of the woman victim.
3. Women acting as sole judges (i.e. when not ruling as part of a panel of judges) declare lighter sentences than their male counterparts. For example, the average jail sentence in sex crimes, passed by a sole woman judge, stands at 9.5 months, as compared to 23 months passed by sole male judges, for the same crimes. Women judges tend to cite the negative characteristics of the victim. On the other hand, in cases where judgment is passed by a panel of three judges, when the panel includes a woman judge, the punishment is heavier than when it is an all male panel.
4. It was further found that the rate of convictions in "crimes against life" is lower when the victim is a woman, and that the period of imprisonment for crimes against the lives of women is significantly lower than imprisonment for crimes against the lives of men. The length of a jail sentence is approximately 2 years shorter when the victim is a woman.

A summary of the study was submitted to Justice Barak, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who decided on the establishment of a committee to investigate the results of the report and its implications.

3. 1. 3. Workshops on Gender Bias for Judges

The researchers recommend, among other things, that continuing educational programs for judges be instituted that will raise the issue of gender bias (as well as other forms of bias in the courts). Experimental programs in that direction were already initiated prior to the study by Judge Rotlevi of the Tel-Aviv District Court. However, according to her report, those seminars were not very successful, and attendance was low.

ARTICLE 16

Equality in Marriage and Family Law

1. States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in all matters relating to marriage and family relations and in particular shall ensure, on a basis of equality of men and women:

- a) The same right to enter into marriage;*
- b) The same right freely to choose a spouse and to enter into marriage only with their free and full consent;*
- c) The same rights and responsibilities during marriage and at its dissolution;*
- d) The same rights and responsibilities as parents, irrespective of their marital status, in matters relating to their children; in all cases the interests of the children shall be paramount;*
- e) The same rights to decide freely and responsibly on the number and spacing of their children and to have access to the information, education, and means to exercise these rights;*
- f) The same rights and responsibilities with regard to guardianship, wardship, trusteeship and adoption of children or similar institutions where these concepts exist in the national legislation; in all cases the interests of the children shall be paramount;*
- g) The same personal rights as husband and wife, including the right to choose a family name, a profession, and an occupation;*
- h) The same rights for both spouses in respect of the ownership, acquisition, management, administration, enjoyment, and disposition of property, whether free of charge or for a valuable consideration.*

2. The betrothal and the marriage of a child shall have no legal effect and all necessary action, including legislation, shall be taken to specify a minimum age for marriage and to make the registration of marriages in an official registry compulsory.

1. Introduction

This article is one of two that the State of Israel has ratified with reservations, due to the fact that religious law governs family law in Israel, insofar as the legal issues in question are classified as “matters of personal status,” and are not qualified by territorial legislation (i.e. civil laws that specifically apply in both religious and civil courts). The scope of the legislation termed “matters of personal status,” which covers all personal laws (except for Islamic laws), has narrowed over time, and currently includes only marriage, divorce, alimony and child support. The scope of this legislation regarding Moslems in Israel is broader, and includes child-custody and paternity matters as well.

Until 1995, jurisdiction over family matters was divided between the religious and the civil courts, and within the civil judicial system itself. This was changed by the Family Court Law - 1995, which established a new family-law division within the magistrate courts which was responsible for all family matters under the jurisdiction of the civil system. The establishment of the family-courts system, however, has not affected the jurisdictional split between the religious and the civil judiciaries.

2. Reservations to Article 16

The maintenance of religious law in matters of family and divorce is perceived to be one of the most vital components of Israeli law, since it ensures that the State of Israel is the state of the Jewish people. It is thus considered a foundational aspect of the sensitive relationship between religion and state in Israel. Due to the reservation that the State of Israel entered with regard to this article, insofar as the laws of personal status affect the laws of various religious communities in Israel which do not conform with the provisions of this Article, the following sections will not discuss the legal situation in matters of marriages and divorce, nor in matters of spousal support.

3. Some Demographic Data

Israel is a very family-oriented society. The desire to raise a family has always been ranked highly in studies of Israeli Jewish high-school students, although girls tend to rank it higher than boys. The family-oriented nature of Israeli society is illustrated by the following data, which Marriage ages for both women and men have risen over the years, while the gaps in the average and median ages of women as compared to those of men remain more or less unchanged. The low marriage age of Moslem and Druze women is particularly striking.

Divorce rates are considerably higher in the Jewish population than in the Moslem population:

*Published data is 38.8, however our impression is that this is a mistake.

It is important to note that the Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS) presents the number of marriages as they appear in the official marriage and divorce registrar records, which means those marriages and divorces that are conducted in Israel in accordance with Israeli law.

4. Non-Marital Cohabitation

The Israeli legal system recognizes the state of non-marital cohabitation or partnership, and extends rights and obligations to such unions. Thus, for example, economic rights of non-marital partners have been equated to those of married couples for purposes of pensions, social security entitlements, resident's protection against eviction, damage awards under torts law, and more. In the context of inheritance, an additional specification requires that "no prior marriage exists" (i.e. a marriage that has not been terminated) for either of the partners.

In addition to bestowing many economic rights to non-marital partnerships there is a more substantive level of recognition given to such unions. The Names Law-1956, and its 1996 amendment is an example. The amendment confirmed a 1993 case, Efrat v. The Registrar, which directed the Ministry of Interior to register the change of name of a woman who wanted to change her family name to that of the man who was her non-marital partner. Justice Barak, who deliberated on the case, went into a lengthy discussion about the legal and social attitudes toward non-marital partnerships, and concluded that it is in the public interest to encourage them as forms of family life which are as equally important to society as “formal” families.

Another illustration of the more substantive level of recognition given to non-marital unions can be found in legislation that imposes the same obligations and duties upon both non-marital and marital partners. These include obligations and duties regarding family-violence and duty of care toward minors. The legislature has not gone as far as imposing mutual positive obligations upon the unmarried partners toward each other, thus there is no statutory obligation of support, but case law has held that such an obligation could be construed as an implied commitment under the circumstances. Similarly, case law has held the rule of community property which was developed by the Supreme Court to regulate the area of matrimonial property before the enactment of the Spouses (Property Relations) Law - 1973, applies equally to non-marital partners.

Notwithstanding the broad scope of recognition, there still are some areas in which such relationships are not equated to those of formal marriage. Such areas include the provision of immunity from spousal testimony in criminal proceedings, the right of spousal entry to Israel according to the Entry into Israel Law-1952 , and the right to adopt a child together.

On the level of relationships between non-marital partners and their mutual children, as far as they are determined according to civil law, the lack of formal marriage between the parents has no significance whatsoever upon their duties and rights toward their children. The situation is different with respect to Moslems, who are governed by religious law in this area.

5. Minimum Marital Age

The Marriage Age Law-1950, states that the minimum marital age for all women in Israel is 17. No minimal age for men is set. Since the substantive law that applies in matters of marriage is derived from the individual's religious law, the minimal age for men would be drawn from religious law.

The minimal age requirement is accompanied by provisions that make the arrangement of under-age marriages a criminal offense punishable by up to two years imprisonment. The possible offenders include the person who arranges the marriage, the person who conducts the marriage, and the marrying man himself. The under-age woman is excluded. The law also provides that the mere fact that a marriage was conducted in violation of this law is a ground for divorce.

Article 5 of the Marriage Age Law-1950 provides for two alternative grounds for judicial permission of under-age marriage. The first one relates to circumstances in which the under-age woman is pregnant from or has given birth to the child of the man whom she asks permission to marry. No age limit at all is attached to this ground for exception. The second relates to unspecified "special circumstances" that would justify immediate marriage, provided the woman is over 16 years old. Since the legislature has left those "special circumstances" unspecified, the Supreme Court has taken it upon itself to provide instructions as to the substance of those circumstances. In one of the leading cases, then Justice Barak firmly stated that a community's custom and tradition do not justify marital exception, since it is those traditions and customs that the Marriage Age Law-1950 was set to abolish.

Criminal sanctions contribute to the reduction of the phenomenon of marriages involving minors. However, it has not been eliminated altogether, as can be seen from the following tables, which contain data of marital ages in Israel.

6. Bigamy

Since questions of marriage and divorce are determined by religious law alone, the secular legislature cannot decree bigamous marriages invalid, when such marriages are recognized by the relevant religious laws, but can only operate against them through criminal law. Section 176 of the Penal Law-1977, makes bigamy a criminal offense punishable by 5 years imprisonment. Sections 181-182 prohibit forcing divorce upon one's wife with no judicial decree of divorce, and makes the arrangement of such prohibited marriages or divorces a criminal offense as well.

Sections 179-180 provide exceptions for the rule against bigamy. Section 180 applies to all individuals whose religious affiliation is other than Jewish, and indicates that incapacitation of one's spouse or 7 years absence thereof may justify marriage to another person. Section 179 applies only to Jewish people, providing immunity to a person whose second marriage was permitted by a rabbinical court's judgment that underwent the specific Halachic procedure to make it religiously valid.

Since religious law accommodates bigamous marriage, further legislative intervention must be made in particular areas of law where the interests of the two wives may conflict. Such accommodations were developed in response to certain population groups who immigrated to Israel. For example, the Successions Law - 1965, specifically states (in section 146), that when the man who dies was married to two women, both of them share in the estate, where ordinarily the estate is given to the sole wife of the deceased.

7. Parents and Children

7. 1. Child Custody

The Capacity and Guardianship Law - 1962, which regulates the issue of child custody, is a territorial act. Thus, it applies to all individuals notwithstanding their religious affiliation. The act provides for equal responsibility of both parents toward their children, and directs them to act "in the best interest of the child." Recognition of both parents as equal, natural guardians of their children was also codified in the Women's Equal Rights Law-1951.

Confirming the equality of both parents' guardianship over their children, the Capacity and Guardianship Law-1962 sets a "tender years presumption," which imposes a rule of maternal preference whenever children under six years old are involved. Loss of maternal preference can occur under very rare and extreme circumstances when the mother is considered unfit. In general, most courts tend to favor maternal custody, even when older children are involved. It is important to emphasize, however, that the rule of the "best interests of the child" is the governing norm in all cases, and the maternal preference is simply an implementation of this rule, since it is usually perceived to be in the best interests of the child - especially during infancy - to remain within the custody of the mother.

7. 2. Paternity and Unwed Mothers

Marital ties between the parents or their lack thereof do not affect the relationship between the parents and the children, as far as civil law is concerned. Due to the differences in the jurisdiction and scope of Moslem law in Israel, matters of paternity are under exclusive jurisdiction of sharia courts and are governed by Moslem law. A major change recently occurred in this area, when a Supreme Court precedent removed paternity suits and child support claims concerning children born out of marriage from the exclusive jurisdiction of the sharia courts to the jurisdiction of civil law.

7. 3. Child Support

Family Law Amendment (Maintenance) - 1959 refers to the individual's personal (religious) law as the law governing questions of child and spousal support. A 1981 amendment to the law provides that the child support obligation of both parents shall be determined relative to each parents' income.

In order to deal with the problem of non-payment, the Alimony Law (Security Payment) - 1972, provides assurance of payment by the National Insurance Institute (NII) upon request by the custodian parent, once the indebted parent defaults on his or her payments. This revolutionary mechanism thus releases the creditor from tedious legal proceedings through the Executor's Office, and transfers them to the NII who will take the necessary legal actions against the recalcitrant spouse. The NII in the meantime pays the creditor the amount that was set in the regulations. This is an important expression of Israel's commitment to provide a security net to prevent dependents from falling below the poverty line. Through this mechanism, Israeli law manages to avert some of the unfortunate economic consequences of marital-breakdowns for women and children, which are often enhanced by paternal evasion of economic responsibilities.

8. Married Women's Legal Status with Respect to Property Acquisition and Division of Marital Property upon Marital Breakdown

Following the Women's Equal Rights Law-1951, the Supreme-Court's case-law removed the issue of property distribution from the rule of religious law, and ruled that this subject is to be governed by civil-secular law alone.

The governing principle regarding distribution of marital property under Israeli law is the principle of community property. This principle has developed in the Supreme Court's rulings since the early 1960's, and was incorporated into a specific law in the Spouses (Property Relations) Law - 1973. The law applies to all couples who were married after 1973, and designates their community property unless the couple contracted otherwise. The judicial "community property rule" applies to all couples who were married before that, and to non-marital cohabitants as well, and works as a presumption that the partners have an equal share in the property, provided there was a "joint effort" by both partners in the accumulation of the family assets.

In principle, the rule of community property, whether embedded in the case law or in the 1973 act, dictates equal sharing not only of property assets and rights, but also of debts and obligations, when these have accrued in relation to the communal property and are not personal in nature. So far the trend in the case law has been to make it rather difficult for creditors to prove the communal nature of the debts. .

9. Law of Inheritance

The Successions Law - 1965 treats men and women with complete equality. Husbands and wives are equally entitled to each other's estates, and sons and daughters are equally entitled to the same share in their parents' estate, and so on. There is, however, one exception in favor of women, and that is the widow's right to alimony payments from her deceased husband's estate and the right to remain in the home in which they lived together, while no such rights exist in relation to male widowers.

10. Names law

The law relating to the selection of family names has undergone a major change in the past year. Until then, section 6 of the Names Law - 1956 stated that as a rule, a married woman takes her husband's family name upon marriage, although she may keep her own name or add it to her husband's name. Practically, however, women who wanted to retain their own names discovered that their names were automatically changed upon registration of their marriages, without asking for their preferences. In February 1996 the law was amended, and section 6 now refers to both men and women, stating that upon marriage, a person may retain his or her former name, choose the spouse's family name, add the spouse's family name to the person's former name, select a new family name identical to a new one chosen by his or her spouse, or add it to the former name. In any case, the person shall notify the marriage registrar of his or her choice, making it clear that marriage does not automatically lead to a change of names. In addition to this reform, a provision that mandated that any change in the family name of married couples must be made by the husband and wife together was removed.

As to family names of children, section 3 states that a child acquires his or her parents' family name. If parents have different family names, then, as a rule, the child acquires the father's family name, unless both parents agree that the child would acquire both names. This provision was not changed in the 1996 reform.

11. Single Mothers

The Israeli legal system recognizes the growing phenomenon of single-parent families headed by women and accords them a variety of social benefits and aid. The Single Parent Family Law-1992 guarantees these social benefits to single mothers.

For example, in recent decision of the Haifa district court, the court voided a decision taken by kibbutz members not to include a single-mother with her minor child among the eligible member-families for a new family housing unit, notwithstanding her seniority, since she and her child were not considered a "family." In rejecting the kibbutz's internal decision, the district court asserted that the single-parent family is equal to that of the two-parent, normative family.

Moreover, in February 1997 a decision of the Supreme Court voided regulations that compelled unmarried women to undergo psychological and social worker evaluations before they could receive fertility treatments, such as artificial insemination and ovum donation. The regulations are to expire in 6 months, and the Ministry of Health pledged that within a month an internal directive that guarantees equal access to reproductive health services, regardless of marital status, will be issued.

12. New Reproductive Technologies and Surrogacy

There are more fertility clinics per capita in Israel than in any other country in the world. Moreover, all Israeli residents are entitled to up to seven rounds of in-vitro fertilization treatment, up to the birth of two children, as part of their basic basket of health services.

Israel has become the first state to positively sanction and regulate surrogacy, as evidenced in the March 1996 legislation: Surrogate Motherhood Agreements (Approval of Agreement and Status of Newborn) Law - 1996. This law was the result of a long process that included both the recommendations of a public-professional committee (the Aloni Committee, appointed by the Ministers of Justice and of Health in 1991), and several appeals to the High Court of Justice. The law sanctions full surrogacy (where the carrying mother is not genetically related to the resulting child), under very specific conditions. The whole procedure is legal only if done through the prior approval of the surrogacy agreement by a statutory committee composed of seven members of relevant professions (physicians, social-workers, psychologists, attorneys, with mandatory representation of three members of each gender) and a religious official of the contracting couple's religion.

The conditions for approval of surrogacy contracts are:

- 1) That all parties be adult residents of Israel;
- 2) That the carrying mother be unmarried (with possible exception under extenuating circumstances);
- 3) That there is no family-relation between the surrogate and the designated parents;
- 4) That the surrogate's religion is the same as the designated mother's religion, and;
- 5) That the sperm used is the designated father's sperm.

The petition for approval must be accompanied by a psychological evaluation of the parties and a medical evaluation as to the inability of the designated mother to become pregnant or carry a pregnancy. The Committee may approve monthly payments to the carrying mother to cover actual costs in addition to compensation for suffering, loss of time, income or earning capacity, or any other reasonable compensation. Any payment the carrying mother receives beyond the amount approved by the Committee is illegal, and subjects all the parties of the agreement, including the carrying mother, to criminal sanctions. If there is a brokerage involved, the Committee needs to see the brokerage agreement as well, but there is no provision for its approval or any restrictions on the brokerage fees.

The third chapter of the law deals with the status of children born as the result of such agreements. In principle, the law designates the contracting couple as the child's legal parents. In order to formalize this principle, within a week of the child's birth the designated parents must apply for a "parenthood order," which the court shall grant, unless convinced it is contrary to the best interests of the child. Prior to the issuance of a parenthood order, the carrying mother may ask to withdraw from the agreement, and the court may grant her petition if convinced that a change in the circumstances justifies her retraction, and the child's best interests will not be jeopardized. In such a case, the court will issue an order which decrees that the carrying mother is the child's legal mother, and may order restitution of expenses. No retraction is possible after the issuance of a parenthood order. The law contains further provisions dealing with other possible complications.

As of January 1997, the Committee has examined 10 applications and has approved 3 agreements. According to the Committee's administrative assistant, there are presently 50 couples seeking surrogacy agreements. Some couples apply through brokerage agencies, but most apply to the Committee independently.

Significantly, throughout the public debate that surrounded all stages of enactment of this law, the only public voice that was heard against legal sanction of surrogacy was that of the Israel Women's Network.

Report of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women

(Sixteenth and seventeenth sessions)

General Assembly
Official Records · Fifty-second Session
Supplement No.38 (A/52/38/Rev.1)

122. The Committee recommended that the Government introduce measures and programmes, including affirmative action, to increase women's participation at all levels of the judiciary.

123. The Committee suggested that the Government should endeavour to bring about legal change with regard to land ownership by women, especially in rural areas.

124. Recalling its recommendations contained in general recommendation 21 in this regard, the Committee urged the Government to address the issue of polygamous marriages. The Department of Women Affairs should introduce an intensive programme to discourage polygamy.

125. The Committee recommended that the Government ensure, as soon as feasible, the registration of all customary marriages, so as to ensure that women could enjoy all rights that accrued as a result of marriage.

126. While the Committee recognized the need to sustain traditional courts, it urged the Government to ensure that those courts comply with the principles of the Convention in all respects.

127. The Committee recommended that the Government of Namibia adopt the necessary measures to review the laws containing punitive measures against women who had undergone illegal abortions.

128. The Committee recommended that the Government continue its collaboration with non-governmental organizations in implementing the Convention and reporting under it.

129. The Committee strongly urged the State party to encourage political parties in Namibia to encourage the participation of women and to take all appropriate measures in that regard.

130. The Committee requested the Government to address in its next report the concerns included in the present comments and to provide information on the implementation of the Committee's general recommendations.

131. The Committee requested the wide dissemination in Namibia of these concluding comments so as to make Namibians aware of the steps that have been taken to ensure de facto equality for women and the further steps required in this regard.

2. Initial and second periodic reports

Israel

132. The Committee considered the combined initial and second reports of Israel (CEDAW/C/ISR/1-2) at its 350th, 351st and 353rd meetings, on 17 and 21 July 1997 (see CEDAW/C/SR.350, 351 and 353).

133. The representative of Israel indicated that her country saw the signing and ratification of the Convention as natural and important steps in the general process of ensuring the achievement of equality between women and men. She noted that Israel attached great importance to the process of reporting to the Committee and considered the latter to be a vehicle to achieve the advancement of women.

134. The representative observed that the compilation of the report had afforded an opportunity to take a comprehensive view of the achievements in and the obstacles to the advancement of women in Israel. It had created an institutional awareness of women's social concerns and needs. Non-governmental organizations had had the opportunity to offer feedback on the report and this had led to a new forum of ongoing dialogue between government and civil society.

135. She stated that Israel placed great importance on the situation and status of women in society, and noted that the issue of women's status in society had constantly been on the national agenda. A constitutional and normative infrastructure had been established and a continuous process of review and passage of legislation was taking place with regard to the status of women. Implementation mechanisms had been established and developed according to need. She noted that the process applied equally to all women in Israel - Jewish and Arab alike.

136. The representative elaborated the two parameters informing women's status. The first reflected the basic quality of women's lives, and the second involved the evaluation of participation of women in public life, the workplace, wage equity and educational opportunities.

137. She noted that discrimination against women was defined by Israel's legal system in conformity with the definition contained in article 1 of the Convention. The principle of equality was understood as being substantive and not merely formal and took into account de facto discrimination and the importance of affirmative action.

138. Legislative developments had done much to advance the status of all women in Israel and played an important role in educating the younger generation and the public in general concerning the special norms adopted for the advancement of women. The process of instilling norms and values of gender equality was an ongoing one, and several important bills in this area were at different stages of the legislative process.

139. The representative described various governmental initiatives to promote the advancement of women. Among them were the appointment of the Prime Minister's Adviser on the Status of Women, and the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women.

140. She indicated that education was a key factor in any real and stable change of perceptions and of gender roles. The reduction of illiteracy among women was encouraging and women's enrolment in universities was greater than that of men. Women's health was steadily improving among all population groups. Women's participation in the workforce was related to educational level and family situation but women had a greater tendency to work part time.

141. She explained that the scope of social and work-related benefits was one of the most influential factors affecting women's economic status in Israel. Maternity insurance and the system of alimony payments benefited women positively. She noted that despite the lack of sufficient data on the economic situation of single-parent families headed by women, legislation had been enacted to ensure generous support.

142. The representative described the situation in Israel with regard to marriage, age of marriage, cohabitation, child custody, property distribution, selection of family names and new reproductive technologies. She stated that much progress had been made with regard to gender-based violence in Israel.

There had been legislative developments, to which the work of several investigative and reform committees had contributed extensively, as well as practical developments.

143. There was a lack of concrete data and information on the issues of prostitution and exploitation of women and the Israeli legal framework took an abolitionist approach to prostitution. The representative drew the Committee's attention to the position of certain groups of women in Israeli society, including Bedouin women and women immigrants from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia.

144. She stated that social patterns, gender roles and stereotyping affected the advancement of women in any society. Women's involvement in the media was an example of this; the position of women vis-à-vis the Israeli media was inconsistent. Although employment of women in the media and coverage of certain women's issues were increasing, stereotyping of women as sex objects and victims continued to some extent.

145. While there had been little progress in the advancement of women at the national political level, women's participation in local politics was more positive. Women's participation at the senior levels of government and the civil service had shown gradual improvement as well. Following enactment of the relevant legislation, the introduction of affirmative action into the boards of directors of government companies and into the civil service had contributed significantly to the advancement of women.

146. The representative concluded by drawing the Committee's attention to the employment of women in the security and defence forces. That participation had received extensive attention and been the subject of debate because of the important social role played by army service in Israeli society. The "glass ceiling" phenomenon could be seen in the defence forces, with women's promotion taking, on average, nine months longer than that of men.

Concluding comments of the Committee

Introduction

147. The Committee thanked the State party for its very comprehensive and frank report, which dealt with all the articles of the Convention from both the juridical and the sociological perspectives. It also appreciated the high level of the delegation and complimented the representative of the State party for her lucid presentation.

148. The Committee appreciated the fact that the report was submitted on time and followed the Committee's guidelines.

149. The Committee was pleased that non-governmental organizations had been given an opportunity to consider the report and that they were able to submit supplementary reports.

150. The Committee was disturbed that all the questions put forward by members to the representatives of Israel were not responded to in the Government's written answers. The Committee is of the view that response to all the questions would have clarified issues and problems.

Positive aspects

151. The Committee commended the fact that Israel had developed progressive legislation as well as comprehensive programmes on violence against women and on equal employment opportunities.

152. Although equality was not part of the basic law of Israel, the Committee commended the fact that the Supreme Court could give effect to the principle of equality in its judgements.

153. The Committee noted with satisfaction that most Israeli women had a high level of education, especially at the tertiary level.

154. The Committee commended the very extensive analysis of women in the media and the programmes to reorient society against stereotypical images of women.

155. The Committee commended the existence of the compulsory National Health Insurance Law of 1995, which guarantees universal access to health care for all communities.

Factors and difficulties affecting the implementation of the Convention

156. The Committee considered that the fact that no basic law embodied the principle of equality or prohibited discrimination hindered the implementation of the Convention.

157. The Committee regretted the fact that Israel had maintained its reservations to articles 7 (b) and 16 of the Convention. It also regretted the fact that women could not become religious judges and that the religious laws that to a considerable degree govern family relations discriminated against women.

158. The Committee considered that the persistence of conflict and violence hindered the implementation of the Convention. Moreover, as a consequence of the ongoing conflict, much power was concentrated in the armed forces. Women, who were not represented in senior leadership in the armed forces, were discriminated against and their perspective on peacekeeping and their negotiating skills were not utilized.

Principal areas of concern

159. The Committee noted with concern that the Government had not formulated an overall plan or measures to implement the Convention and the Beijing Platform for Action.

160. The Committee was very concerned about the fact that there was no specific governmental machinery responsible for promoting and coordinating policies for women.

161. The Committee was concerned about the fact that non-Jewish women had worse living conditions than Jewish women. They received a lower level of education, participated less in the government service and occupied limited decision-making posts.

162. The Committee was also concerned because non-Jewish women enjoyed poorer health, resulting in very high maternal and infant mortality rates. There were also fewer employment opportunities available to them.

163. The Committee was concerned about remaining instances of polygamy, forced marriage and genital mutilation, as well as "honour killings".

164. The Committee noted with concern that a very low percentage of women occupied political decision-making posts and that the situation had barely changed over the years.

165. The Committee noted with concern that a marked disparity existed between the average earnings of women and men in many sectors and that women were also disproportionately represented in part-time employment.

166. The Committee was concerned about the fact that many more women than men worked in the informal sector and performed unpaid work, thereby prospectively limiting their access to benefits associated with the formal sector.

167. The Committee noted with concern that the public health system allocated considerable resources to in vitro fertilization, yet contraceptives were not free of charge.

168. The Committee was concerned about the fact that a large number of women were arrested for prostitution. The Committee was likewise concerned about the large number of advertisements for sex services in daily newspapers, which contributed significantly to the spread of prostitution.

169. The Committee was concerned because despite the existing legislation, cases of violence against women still occurred frequently, owing in large measure to traditional ideas of the roles of women and negative societal attitudes towards the problem of violence against women.

Suggestions and recommendations

170. The Committee recommended that the Government of Israel should ensure that the Convention was implemented throughout the territory under its jurisdiction.

171. The Government or the parliament should adopt an overall plan for the implementation of the Convention and the Beijing Platform for Action through specific measures and within a definite time-frame.

172. The Committee recommended that the right to equality and the prohibition of both direct and indirect discrimination against women should be reflected in a basic law.

173. The Committee suggested that in order to guarantee the same rights in marriage and family relations in Israel and to comply fully with the Convention, the Government should complete the secularization of the relevant legislation, place it under the jurisdiction of the civil courts and withdraw its reservations to the Convention.

174. The preamble to the Convention states that full development and the cause of peace require the maximum participation of women on equal terms with men in all fields. The Committee thus recommended that all necessary measures be taken to ensure peace with the full participation of all women, Jewish and Christian, Muslim and Druze alike. This was necessary to create an environment where women could enjoy their rights fully and so that equality of opportunities in economic and social development, especially of rural women, could be assured.

175. The Committee looked forward to the adoption of the bill creating the governmental machinery to be known as the "Authority on the Status of Women" and hoped that the machinery would be given sufficient resources to carry out its work.

176. The Committee recommended that measures to guarantee the exercise of human rights of non-Jewish women, including those living in the rural areas, particularly in relation to health, education and employment, should be intensified. Special measures should be taken to close the gap between Arab and Jewish schools and address the higher drop-out rates of Arab and Bedouin girls. Adequate resources should be allocated for school facilities and education opportunities, including scholarships. Further, the participation of Arab women in the civil service and in decision-making posts should be increased.

177. The Committee recommended that the Government strengthen its efforts and expand its actions to eliminate violence against women, especially violence within the family, in all communities.

178. The Committee strongly suggested that the Government of Israel take necessary steps to eliminate practices which could not be justified on any grounds, such as forced marriages, female genital mutilation, honour killings and polygamy.

179. The Committee recommended that satellite accounts should be used to evaluate the value of unpaid work and that they should be incorporated into the national accounts.

180. The Committee recommended that some of the resources allocated to the treatment of infertility should be used to study its causes and its prevention.

181. The Committee recommended that public health services supply free and accessible contraceptives.

182. The Committee requested the Government of Israel to address the following issues in its next report: the status of disabled women; how indirect discrimination in the workplace is dealt with; the leave entitlement of mothers and fathers for the birth of a child or when they have young children, and the actual use made of such entitlement; the impact on the social roles of women and men of programmes aimed at changing stereotypes; programmes for gender sensitization of the judiciary, police and health professionals; and financial support provided by the Government for all non-governmental organizations in the territory of Israel.

183. The Committee requested the wide dissemination in Israel of these concluding comments so as to make individuals aware of the steps that have been taken to ensure de facto equality for women and the further steps required in this regard.

Luxembourg

184. The Committee considered the initial and second periodic reports of Luxembourg (CEDAW/C/LUX/1 and 2) at its 338th, 339th and 344th meetings, on 9 and 11 July 1997 (see CEDAW/C/SR.338, 339 and 344).

185. The reports were introduced by the Director of the Ministry for the Advancement of Women, who thanked the Committee for considering the reports so soon after their submission. She informed the Committee that Luxembourg had recently assumed the Presidency of the Council of Ministers of the European Union and would put emphasis on the equality of women and men during its term, in particular in the context of the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women and in the negotiations on the expansion of the European Union to include

INTRODUCTION

The Government of Israel is pleased to submit its Third Periodic Report Concerning the Implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination¹ of all Forms of Discrimination against Women. This Report describes the developments that took place since the submission of the Combined Initial and Second Report in 1997, taking into account the CEDAW Committee's Concluding Observations as well as the General Recommendations adopted by the CEDAW Committee. In line with the reporting guidelines, this Report builds upon and continues the previous one. Accordingly, it refrains from repeating previous information and explanations, and only refers to them whenever necessary (For further reading, we recommend Israel's periodic Reports to the ICESCR, ICCPR, CRC, CAT, and CERD). As was done with the previous Report, non-governmental organizations were consulted prior to the writing of this Report, and their contributions were given substantial consideration.

The general constitution of the Report is one of continuing gradual progress, although it may sometimes appear to be a slow one. The legislative sphere continues to advance in impressive measures, while its implementation sometimes takes longer to catch up. An important machinery introduced in 1998 in line with the Committee's recommendations, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, will hopefully strengthen this sphere as well. In keeping with the reporting guidelines calling for the specific address of issues raised in the Beijing Platform for Action, a separate section was added on the Girl-Child, as it was felt that while most of the other areas that the Platform for Action dealt with were already covered in the Report, this specific gender perspective deserved a more thorough treatment. Furthermore, two additional themes are introduced in the Report: Women with disabilities, and Jewish women immigrant from Ethiopia.

Also, as done in the previous Report, a legislative supplement is included, containing the most significant new legislation in this field, all of which is discussed throughout the Report.

The Report was commissioned by the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and prepared by Dr. Ruth Halperin-Kaddari, under the auspices of the Ruth and Emanuel Rackman International Center for the Advancement of Women at Bar Ilan University Faculty of Law. The project was coordinated by Ms. Atara Kenigsberg, Adv. Special thanks are also due to Mr. Eric Lifschitz, Adv., Ms. Irit Hermell for their invaluable input, and for Mr. Jean-Marc Liling, and Ms. Rachel Shakerdge.

Article 1

Definition of Discrimination Against Women

1. The Constitutional Level

As explained in the previous Report, while the right to equality is not explicitly included in the two Basic Laws enacted in 1992 (Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty; Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation), the common opinion, led by Chief Justice Barak, is that the scope of the basic right to human dignity is very broad and encompasses various unenumerated human rights, such as the right to equality. This interpretation was approved in a number of Supreme Court cases. Moreover, many jurists in Israel, Chief Justice Barak central among them, regard these basic laws as establishing a constitution, and as empowering the courts to exercise judicial review. This analysis was approved and was recently implemented by the Supreme Court on two separate occasions, in the cases of Chambers of Investment Managers in Israel v. The Minister of Treasure and Sagi Tzemach et al. v. Minister of Defense. In other words, courts now indeed have the power to strike down legislation that violates the basic rights guaranteed by the two Basic Laws, and which does not fulfill the requirements of the limitations clause in those laws. In any case, however, legislation that existed prior to 1992 is immune from any kind of review, and is subject only to interpretation, which accommodates the Basic Laws.

These two developments, namely the labeling of the right to equality as a basic right guaranteed by Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and the implementation of judicial review, could have a profound implication on the issue of gender based discrimination, as future legislation that violates the right to equality could be struck down (see previous Report).

2. Equal Rights Legislation

Several significant developments took place on the legislative level since the previous Report. First and foremost, in terms of norms-setting legislation, the Women's Equal Rights Law – 1951 has undergone a substantial reform in its jubilee year. The 2000 amendment was introduced after two years of deliberations, and while it did not repeal the exclusionary rule regarding license and prohibitions in marriage and divorce, it does represent an almost complete revision of the 1951 law. The full text of the amended law is attached in the Legislative Supplement. In a nutshell, the amendment starts with a declaration of the law's intention to ensure total gender equality and women's advancement in 'all areas of the state, the society, the economy and the family and goes on to prohibit all forms of discrimination against women, whether intentional or de facto. It then proceeds with the guarantee of substantive equality, including through affirmative action, and explicitly relates to equality in human dignity, including the delineation of social rights. It expressly ensures a woman's right over her body and provides for protection from violence, sexual harassment, sexual abuse and trafficking. The amendment also includes a broad provision of adequate representation in public bodies, and concludes with a provision of equal service in security forces. Many of the provisions, such as the protection from violence and sexual harassment, are reiterations of already existing legal norms (as explained below regarding the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law – 1998). Some, such as the mandate for adequate representation or for affirmative action, are an expansion of existing norms, and some present completely novel rights. Such is for example, the guarantee of a woman's right over her body, which clearly implicates the issue of reproductive freedom.

While the amended Women's Equal Rights Law may represent the most significant legislative development on the level of the principle of gender equality, several other legislative developments may prove to supercede its significance for women's every-day reality on the practical level. Such is the Authority for the Advancement of Women Law – 1998 which has established the anticipated national authority whose significance cannot be underestimated, as indeed mentioned in the previous Report and in the Committee's Concluding Comments, urging the passage of the Authority for the Advancement of Women Bill – 1996. The text of the law is found in the Legislative Supplement, and its main provisions are detailed under Article 2 below.

Beyond the authority for advancement of women law which expresses concrete national commitment to secure women's rights and eliminate any gender discrimination in a systematic manner, through a national institution, the following pieces of legislation, which are all detailed throughout this Report and are found in the legislative supplement, requires mentioning, should be noted here as well, since they, taken all together, reflect a picture of comprehensive efforts to advance women in all aspects of their lives. These include, among others, the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law – 1998; the 1998 and 2000 amendments to the Penal Law – 1977 relating to sexual offences, pornography, and trafficking; the Local

Article 1 Definition of Discrimination Against Women

Councils Law (Advisor on the Status of Women) - 2000; the 1998 amendment to the Corporate Ordinance (recently replaced by a similar section in the 1999 Corporate Law) and several others.

3. Judicial Development of the Right to Equality

The judiciary has continued its contribution to the development of the right to equality in general, and of gender equality in particular. The principle of gender equality has been reiterated in many cases and has served for further implementation of the progressive equal rights legislation. In terms of norms-setting, the most significant case has been the case of The Israel Women's Network v. The Minister of Labor and Welfare et al., detailed under article 4 below, which has set a new norm by holding that expansive affirmative action is required in public bodies' employment policies even where there is no statutory provision to that effect. This constitutes further expansion of the concept of substantive equality required by the Convention.

4. The Elimination of Discrimination in the Private Sphere

The legislative provisions of discrimination against women all apply to the private as well as the public sphere.

Furthermore the requirement of fair representation for women in public institutions has been to the private sector by section 239(d) of the Corporate Law - 1999, which mandates that one of the directors appointed as public representatives in every public corporation should be a woman, if there are no other women on the board of directors.

Article 2

Obligations to Eliminate Discrimination

1. Legal Provisions

Since the submission of the Combined Initial and Second Report (herein - the previous report), Israel has enacted several pieces of legislation aimed at eliminating discrimination against women. Indeed, the fourteenth Knesset (1996-9) saw the legislation of 16 laws pertaining to the advancement of women. Among the most important laws recently adopted is the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law - 1998, which the CEDAW committee in its concluding comments has urged Israel to adopt. Other significant laws are the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law - 1998, the Local Councils Law (Advisor on the Status of Women) - 2000 and the 2000 amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law - 1951. These laws and others will be detailed in the appropriate chapters below.

2. Legal Recourse Available for the Pursuit of Women's Rights

The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law - 1998 has established a statutory Authority for the Advancement of Women which replaced the narrower mechanism of the Prime Minister's Advisor on the Status of Women. The Authority is vested with advisory powers and may suggest policies to the government designed to advance the status of women, promote gender equality, eliminate discrimination against women and prevent domestic violence targeted against women. In addition, the Authority supervises the gender policies of the different governmental bodies. The functions of the Authority are detailed below.

Despite its central role, the new Authority has not undermined the importance of other establishments and institutions working for the promotion of women's rights and status, rather, it concentrates on coordinating and managing cooperation between all existing organizations. It must be noted that the Authority lacks the power to handle direct complaints emanating from the public. Nevertheless, the Authority does receive dozens of complaints directly from the public, which it refers to the appropriate establishments for further handling.

Article 2 Obligations to Eliminate Discrimination

The prime office for handling complaints and grievances from the public, including women's complaints remains the Public Complaints Commissioner. Recent data indicates that of the approximately 6,400 complaints to the Public Complaints Commissioner between September 1999 and September 2000, 1,249 were submitted by women (not necessarily relating to women's issues). 16 of these complaints dealt with various social benefits, such as alimony payments, maternity grant, birth allowance and high-risk pregnancy grant; 2 other complaints dealt with the unlawful dismissal of pregnant employees.

In addition, other governmental bodies - such as the Ministry of Labor's Division for Employment and Status of Women, the Labor Courts system, the Superintendent over Discipline in the Civil Service and the General Supervisor on the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service - as well as various Women's NGO's are still available for women who seek legal recourse.

3. Governmental Machineries, Mechanisms and Measures Established to Promote the Status of Women

3.1. Investigative and Study Initiatives by the Government

The past few years have seen several governmental investigative initiatives, focusing on specific issues such as domestic violence and women in the civil service. Indeed, as detailed under Article 5, both the Parliamentary Investigative Committee on the Murder of Women by their Spouses and an Inter-Ministerial Committee on domestic violence operated in 1998-9. Within the civil service, as detailed under article 11, a special research was carried out to examine gender salary gaps in 1999, in addition to its regular annual report on the status of women within the civil service.

3.2 Mechanisms Implemented for the Improvement of the Status of Women3.2.1 The Authority for the Advancement of Women in Israel

As mentioned in the previous report, the establishment of the Authority for the Advancement of Women was a long-awaited development. The functions of the Authority, as put forward in section 5 of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law - 1998, are as follows:

- 1) Coordinating and promoting cooperation between state government, municipalities and others in the area of women's status;
- 2) To monitor and follow-up the activities of the various government offices which relate to the topics which have been assigned to the Authority;
- 3) Advising the ministries on the implementation of laws relating to the Authority's jurisdiction;
- 4) Ensuring that the recommendations of the State Comptroller on these issues will be implemented;
- 5) To deepen the public awareness, which includes the educational system and the media, of the topics it oversees;
- 6) The formulation of policy regarding gender equality and the elimination of discrimination against women;
- 7) To act as an information center as well as initiate researches on topics which it oversees;
- 8) The establishment of special programs and services for women which promote gender equality;
- 9) To promote the implementation of Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination against Women;
- 10) To prepare the official periodic reports due according to Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination against Women;
- 11) To initiate and maintain ties with international organizations and organizations in other countries which deal with the same topics.

Note that all these functions are in conformity with the committee's concluding comments to the previous Report.

The Head of the Authority is to be appointed by the government, based upon the Prime-Minister's recommendation, and will be aided by a staff and an advisory committee, to be comprised of 35 members from various government offices and organizations, including representatives from women's organizations and academia. A nine-member board will be selected from among the advisory committee to work in close cooperation with the Head of the Authority.

Article 2 Obligations to Eliminate Discrimination

Currently, some of the activities and programs initiated by the Authority include:

- 1) The enforcement of laws relating to women's rights in the workplace, including equal pay, equal opportunities, prevention of discrimination, as well as shattering of the "glass ceiling". In this area, the Authority plans the future establishment of a mechanism for the supervision of the implementation of affirmative action provisions in various laws and institutions.
- 2) The establishment of a Program for Gender Equality in the schools, currently being implemented throughout the educational system, from pre-school through teacher-training colleges throughout the country. This program is scheduled to run for four years.
- 3) The consolidation and monitoring of funds allocated to the advancement of the status of women in the various ministries and statutory authorities, in order to maximize efficiency.
- 4) The initiation of an outreach program for the early detection of breast cancer among the more inaccessible women population groups, such as women in Jewish Arab villages in the periphery and especially Bedouin women, Druz women, new immigrants and Ultra-Orthodox women.
- 5) The establishment of an informative web-site for women.
- 6) The initiation of a project of informative and educational lectures and programs for civil servants, municipal councils employees and members of the Israel Defense Forces, with an emphasis on the prevention of domestic violence against women.
- 7) The sponsorship of a series of literacy projects for women in Arab villages in the periphery and especially Bedouin women, Druz women.
- 8) The sponsorship of a project of empowerment among single-parent families headed by women, focusing on skills needed for finding and maintaining employment.
- 9) The instruction of Cabinet Ministers to establish a complete list of names of women qualified to serve on the boards of directors of government companies and other senior positions.
- 10) The establishment of a National Authority for the Advancement of Girls and Women in Science and Technology. The Authority is involved with putting forward concrete policies to insure the advancement of women within academia, as well as within the education and industry sectors.

3.2.2 The Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women

The Committee, established in 1992 and granted the status of permanent Knesset Committee four years later, has continued to operate as a vital force enhancing the advancement of the status of women. Currently, the Committee consists of 15 members, Jews and Arab, females and males, from various political parties. The committee operates three sub-committees with different areas of activity:

- 1) The advancement of women in the workplace and in the economy.

- 2) The advancement of Arab women.
- 3) Women's health (The latter is a joint sub-committee of the Committee for the Advancement of Women and the Labor and Welfare Committee).

Recent legislation promoted by the Committee's work include the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law - 1998, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law - 1998, the 2000 Amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law - 1951, and the Local Councils Law (Advisor on the Status of Women) - 2000.

The Committee has initiated discussions and visits related to themes within its purview. The Committee also raised numerous motions for order transferred to it by the Knesset in areas such as violence against women, trafficking in women and women's health. After returning its conclusions to the Knesset, it has called on the relevant ministers to report on their implementation.

3.3 Governmental Performance in the Civil Service

Since its establishment in 1996, the Department for the Advancement of Women within the Civil Service has been active in various areas including the implementation within the Civil Service of legislation oriented towards the improvement of women's status, the promotion of information and counseling for women within the Civil Service, as well as the formation and professional orientation of professionals working to promote the advancement of women in the Civil Service. The Department has also served as an address for the complaints of female workers and has worked at maintaining on-going contact with organizations dealing with women's status in furtherance of common objectives, as well as with the Knesset's various committees to advance women's rights legislation.

In the context of action aimed at implementing the 1995 amendment to the Civil Service Law (Appointments) - 1959, a steering committee was formed to make recommendations to the Civil Service Commissioner. As a result of the committee's suggestions and the relevant department's efforts, section 15A of this Law has been revised once again in December 2000 (as discussed under Article 4 below). A current project being undertaken by the Department is the safeguarding of senior positions for women, by creating a resource of information, statistics, and guidelines for cooperation with the ministries' administrators.

With regards to the implementation of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law - 1998 and the reinforcement of awareness on the subject, the Department has been involved on several levels: dissemination of information and explanation of the Law to more than 10,000 workers in 1999 alone, and provision of tools to the supervisors on the status of women so that they may receive the workers' complaints. Indeed, since the passage of the Law in 1998, the number of complaints of sexual harassment received by the Department has increased dramatically (with 20 complaints received in 1997, 30 in 1998, 61 in 1999 and 75 complaints received in 2000). These Complaints are handled in cooperation with the Unit for Discipline and the Investigations Department within the Civil Service Administration. Women who submit complaints of sexual harassment to the Department are provided with legal advice, and are accompanied and supported throughout the investigative process and the trial.

During the course of 1999 - upon the initiative and financial support of the National Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women - the Department held a wide range of activities on the subject of domestic violence and violence against women, including information and counseling sessions which drew as many as 13,500 male and female workers and employees.

As part of the training and professional orientation of Supervisors on the Status of Women in government offices, the Department held 3 training courses as well as approximately 30 sessions and conferences while providing on-going updates of relevant information and material to deal with issues relating to the status of women (in 2000, for example, 60 circulars were distributed to the Supervisors by the Department), in addition to biannual meetings that take place for the purpose of regulating and supervising the Supervisors' work. Apart from guiding and supervising the Supervisors, the Department is also in direct contact with female Civil Service employees through information dissemination and personal meetings.

In addition to all the above, the Department has served as an address to which women workers can turn to complain of discrimination, injustice and injury in their status and work conditions. Dozens of such complaints are received each year, concerning a wide variety of subjects. For example, in 2000, the Department processed and dealt with a total of 149 complaints relating to recruitment procedures for administrative positions which discriminated against women, as well as with the non-application of labor laws concerning maternity leaves, sexual harassment, and lack of proper representation of women in state tenders.

3.4 Mechanisms for the Advancement of Women in Specific Government Ministries

As stated above, the Department for the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service is responsible for the training and orientation of 80 Supervisors on Women's Status in all the governmental ministries and auxiliary units. The role of these Supervisors consists of distributing relevant information as well as organizing counseling and guidance activities in a variety of subjects relating to the status of women. The Department overlooks the implementation of labor laws regarding the status of women.

3.5 Measures Taken on the Municipal Level

The number of Women's Councils within the local councils has increased, particularly in the Arab sector. According to 1999 data, more than 70 such councils have functioned, among them 20 in Arab local councils. In addition, 16 more Women's Councils were being established at the time.

The major development in this area has been the Local Councils Law (Advisor on the Status of Women) - 2000, passed in August 2000, which mandates every local council to appoint an advisor on women's status issues. A direct subordinate of the head of the local council, the advisor will insure ongoing communication between it and the local Women's Council (when it exists) as well as the outlining of policy for the advancement of the status of women within the purview of the local authority, while insuring that necessary resources are provided to this end. In order to further her role, the advisor shall be invited to all the meetings of the local council and any of its committees, and will be given the opportunity to express her opinions in every subject that relates to the status of women. Furthermore, the advisor is expected to give an annual report to the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women as well as to the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women and to the Local Council to which she is attached.

It must be mentioned furthermore that the law grants the Minister of the Interior the authority to order local councils to follow the law's directions, and where the local councils fail to do so, to appoint the advisor himself. The law states that the advisor - who must be ranked within one of the four top ranks of the administration's hierarchy - can be removed from position only by a decision of the local council.

The Development and Advancement of Women

Women's organizations continue to play a very active and important role in the promotion of gender equality in Israel. The previous Report contained a detailed description of the major women's NGOs, categorized into types and areas of operation. These organizations and increasingly many more continue to operate in full force, thus representing a very strong and active civil society. On the political front, the women's peace movement had a major role in influencing public opinion that supported Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon. On the legislative front, women's organizations continue to work in close cooperation with the Knesset Committee on the Advancement of the Status of Women. One of the most recent successful initiatives was the enactment of the Victims' of Offences Rights Law – 2001, on which many Egos had collaborated, as explained under Article 5 below.

Article 4

Acceleration of Equality Between Men and Women

1. Affirmative Action

1.1. Expanding Affirmative Action to Public Institutions

The last few years have witnessed some major developments in the area of affirmative action. While the use of this doctrine was limited in the past to governmental corporations and the civil service (through section 18A of the Government Corporations Law - 1975, and section 15A of the Civil Service Law (Appointments) - 1995 respectively), there is a trend towards wider implementation of affirmative action in other segments of the labor market, and the public life at large.

In the 1998 case of The Israel Women's Network v. The Minister of Labor and Welfare (herein - the IWN case), the Supreme Court was asked to scrutinize the appointment of a male deputy director general of the National Insurance Institute. The Supreme Court examined the legal framework of the matter, asserting that no provision in the existing legislation explicitly sets the principle of adequate representation of women to that specific office. The court then turned to the "emerging doctrine" of appropriate representation derived from the general principal of equality to state that anyone responsible for the appointment of public officials must do everything possible to induce the appropriate representation of women in all public institutions.

On an operative level, the Court ordered the Minister of Labor and Welfare to actively seek suitable women candidates for the office, and recommended not to proceed with a conclusive appointment of the man who had already been temporarily appointed for a trial period. The Court, however, declined to actually void that appointment.

The 2000 Amendment to the Women's Equal Rights Law - 1951 offers an express statutory confirmation of the broader approach expressed in the IWN case, by expanding the span of institutions in which the principal of affirmative action is required by statute. The added section 6c of the Law, "Adequate Representation", mandates adequate representation in all governmental ministries, local authorities, municipal corporations, statutory corporations and governmental corporations (See attached Legislative Supplement).

1.2. Affirmative Action in the Civil Service

A December 2000 amendment to section 15A of the Civil Service Law (Appointments) - 1959 expands the use of the affirmative action mechanism within the Civil Service. According to the amendment it is obligatory to apply affirmative action in all sorts of hiring for the Civil Service. This includes actual appointments and non-tendered appointments. This amendment also authorizes the safeguarding of certain positions for women. While the amendment carries tremendous significance with regards to the implementation of the Law, its application might prove to be problematic given that these principles have been simultaneously employed for the advancement of other populations - minorities and people with disabilities. It is still not clear how the Civil Service will adapt to the application of this important amendment.

As noted under Article 2, the Department for the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service supervises the affirmative action policy asserted in section 15A of the Civil Service Law (Appointments) - 1959. Preliminary data that has been received from the Department, which will be detailed under article 11, portray an unchanging situation, in which the representation of women within the higher ranks of the Civil Service is far from being adequate, and the rate of their success in Civil Service tenders remains low. Regarding this issue, some scholars suggest that the important role assigned to the Department requires the strengthening of its status by promoting its Head, giving her position an integral part in the decision-making body.

1.3. Affirmative Action in Governmental Corporations

The special 1998 State Comptroller Report on Governmental Corporations addressed, among other issues, the implementation of section 18A of the Governmental Corporations Law - 1975, directing the use of affirmative action. After citing the Governmental Corporations Authority's data referring to a 30% rate of women on boards of directors in March 1998, it nevertheless concluded that the implementation of the law has not been fully satisfactory.

According to 2000 data the rate of women on boards of directors has since then increased, currently constituting 39% of the directors. It must be noted, however, that according to this data only one woman (2%) serves as a head of a board of directors, only 8 (10%) serve as CEO's of governmental corporations, and in 14% of all governmental corporations no women are present on the board of directors. In addition, the rates of women within new appointees seem to have dropped recently (from 44% in 1998 and 43% in 1999 to only 32% in the first 8 months of 2000).

1.4. Affirmative Action in Public Corporations

A research conducted in 1994, concerning women on the boards of directors in public corporations traded on the stock-exchange, revealed that more than 61% of the corporations had no women at all on their boards of directors, and in 27% of the remaining companies, there was only a single woman on their boards (Israeli and Talmud 1996).

This grim reality did not escape the eyes of the legislator. Indeed, the most current legislative intervention in the form of affirmative action has been a 1998 amendment to the Corporate Ordinance (recently replaced by a similar section in the 1999 Corporate Law). Unlike the affirmative actions dispositions regarding the civil service and governmental corporations, the aforementioned amendment orders a much weaker form of affirmative action. It only refers to the two directors who are appointed as public representatives in every public corporation (defined as a company whose stocks are listed in the Tel-Aviv Stock Exchange or are offered to the public), mandating that one of them should be a woman, but only where there are no women at all on the board of directors. Nevertheless, even this move is far from trivial, as it expresses willingness on the part of the legislator to actually intervene in the private market in order to eliminate existing discrimination against women.

1.5. Affirmative Action in Other Areas

As mentioned above, both the high court decision in the IWN case and the 2000 amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law - 1951 established an all-encompassing basic principle in the Israeli legal system, of the legitimacy of affirmative action as an integral part of the principle of equality. They also established a requirement of adequate representation of women in public bodies, as part of the principle of equality. This basic principle is not limited to the area of employment, but rather may well encompass other areas of activities as well.

2. Special Measures Aimed at Protecting Maternity

The move from protective-paternalistic legislation which confines the participation in the workforce of pregnant women and women who gave birth to legislation which considers the family-unit as a whole and promotes greater involvement of fathers in child-rearing - having started in the mid 1990's - continued in the past few years, resulting in some very important legal provisions. Among these provisions (reviewed in detail under Article 11) are the 1997 and 1998 amendment to the Employment of Women Law - 1954, which provide women with the option to decide whether to work over-time during their pregnancy and allow couples to decide for themselves who will take the second half of the maternity-leave. As for the actual use of this option made by couples, in response to the committee's inquiry in its concluding comments, see under Article 11 below.

Article 5

Sex Roles and Stereotyping

1. Introduction

The discussion under this Article will be divided into several parts. The first part will describe women and the media in Israel, including stereotypes of women and pornography. Next, the impact of religion on the status of women will be reviewed. Finally, the major part of this article, as in the previous Report, will discuss the phenomenon of gender based violence against women.

2. Women and Media in Israel: Ranks and Positions

Much of Israel's electronic media is under the authority of The Israel Broadcast Authority (IBA), responsible for public broadcasting. While women head the IBA Council, the majority of central positions in editing and management remain in the hands of men. A 1997 internal examination in the IBA revealed that while women made up 41.5% of all workers, their rate in journalist and management positions was 10% lower than men's. Most significantly, within the senior ranks in the IBA, men constituted 80% of the department managers, and 90% of the unit managers (the highest position). In 80 internal tenders issued between 1995-97 for senior positions in the IBA, there were twice as many men candidates, and only 13 women were selected. Current data from December 2000 indeed indicates regression: the overall rate of women within the IBA went down to 41%, the 12 unit managers in the Hebrew and Arab television and the Hebrew radio were all men, and only within the Arab radio 2 out of the 3 unit managers were women; the rate of women among the journalists and reporters in the Hebrew televisions and radio was 27.6%, and in the Arab television and radio it was only 15.6%.

In 1994, a Second Authority for Television and Radio was established, controlling private broadcasting. Interestingly, the position of women within it is better than that of the IBA. Within the Second Authority Council, responsible for policy issues, a third of the members (5 of 15) are women. Within the Second Authority itself, women make up 60% of all workers, 50% of the senior managers are women (3 of 6), and 37.5% of the rest of the managers are women.

3. Pornography

A 1998 reform to the Penal Law - 1977 is primarily concerned with the regulation of the emerging problems of child pornography, computer pornographic materials and the advertising of sex services.

This reform was prompted by the convening of a World Congress Against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children in Stockholm, in August 1996, and the international concerns and initiatives that followed it. The preparations for this Congress had stimulated a process of inquiry and examination of this issue in Israel. One concrete result of this process was a 1997 bill to considerably reform the Penal Law in relation to prostitution and pornography. In 1998, the bill was partially passed. Significantly, of the substantive provisions relating to prostitution and the contents of pornography, mostly those that dealt with minors had passed. Thus, until this reform, only the actual use of a minor (under 18) in a pornographic publication or presentation was punishable by up to five years imprisonment. Realizing the growing phenomenon of pedophilic networks, its advanced technological operation, and the extent of the harm it causes, the law now also prohibits the mere possession of such pornographic materials (including computer materials) that contain minors or images of minors, even if it is for personal use only. This new offense is punishable by up to three years imprisonment, while the former offense of the use of a minor for pornographic publication or presentation was separated into two different offenses: that of publication, punishable by up to five years imprisonment; and that of preparation of such publication, or the use of a minor in a live show, punishable by up to seven years imprisonment. When these are done by the minor's guardian, or with the guardian's consent, the maximum sentence of the guardian is ten years imprisonment. (See previous report: definition of pornography)

The 1998 reform also broadened the definition of the terms 'publication' and 'publish' to include computer materials and the dispensation of materials through the use of computers, including the Internet, and other modes of computer-communications.

Another form of publication, which brings pornography and prostitution together, is the advertising of sex services. The 1998 reform explicitly prohibited, for the first time, any advertising of prostitution services by minors, including such services that are rendered out of Israel, an offense, which is punishable by up to five years imprisonment. The advertising of adults' prostitution services is also prohibited now and is punishable by up to six months imprisonment, except in special publications that are separate from other publications, marked as such, and given only upon specific request. Three police investigations are currently being conducted against two national newspapers and one local newspaper editors on these grounds.

4. Women and Religion in Israel

4.1. "Women of the Wall"

An interesting illustration of the effect of religion on Jewish women is the case of the "Women of the Wall". This group of women, representing all religious streams of Judaism, petitioned the High Court of Justice with the request to protect their right to freedom of religion by guaranteeing their right to pray in the manner they wished in a group with prayer shawls and Tora scroll, at the Western Wall. As reviewed in the previous Report, their petition was denied by the court, while the recommendations of the governmental committee established to investigate the case, that the women be allowed to pray in the manner they wish but in a secluded section of the Wall, was dismissed by the women, in principle and for practical reasons. In May 2000 a unanimous three justices' Court had finally accepted the women's position, and directed the government to make within six months, the appropriate arrangements for enabling the women's group to pray at the Wall in their manner, with minimum offense to other worshippers, and with the provision of the necessary security measures. However, the State's request for a rehearing of the case with an expanded panel of justices was granted, and the case is still pending before court.

5. Violence Against Women

5.1. Sexual Violence - Legal Aspects

5.1.1. Prevention of Sexual Harassment

The area of sexual harassment has undergone major normative change with the 1998 enactment of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law - 1998, and several recent high-profile cases of sexual harassment, some of which have reached the Supreme Court.

The new Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law - 1998 which is one of the most comprehensive laws of its kind, marks a dramatic normative development by making sexual harassment both a criminal and a civil offense, not limited to the context of workplace at all. The law states that it is aimed at preserving the dignity and the privacy of the person harassed, and at the promotion of gender equality. Sexual harassment is broadly defined to include unwanted sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and any sexual verbal or physical conduct that demands such behavior or that conditions promotion or benefit upon such behavior. In order to be considered as harassment, the advances and the references must have been specifically rejected by the harassed person, unless it is done in the context of hierarchical working relationships, medical treatment or psychological therapy, or the harassed is a minor or a "helpless" person as defined in the penal law. In these latter cases, even consensual sexual advancements or relations may be considered as harassment. No harm needs to be proved in order to bring a criminal complaint or file a civil suit. The court may order up to 50,000 NIS in damage (approximately $12,000) even without proof of harm. Any sexual harassment that leads to actual harm is defined as aggravation, punishable by three years imprisonment (compared to two years for harassment). The law applies to the army, as well as to educational institutions. Its innovation includes obligating employers to take steps to prevent sexual harassment in the workplace, including the setting-up of a mechanism for processing complaints, and the publication of regulations for this purpose.

Recently, the Supreme Court made important judicial contributions to the developing area of sexual harassment in two cases. Both cases dealt with events that preceded the enactment of the new sexual harassment law, but it is fair to assume that they will both serve as leading sources for future cases, as the justices clearly had the new law in mind when they formed their opinions, and indicated their reliance on the principles of the new law.

The first one, The State of Israel v. Ben Asher, dealt with college student's allegations against her professor for nonconsensually embracing and caressing her, and asking her out against her will. A complaint that was issued to the Civil Service Disciplinary Tribunal based upon these allegations was dismissed, stating that although the professor's behavior was despicable, it did not amount to sexual harassment. The Supreme Court accepted the State's appeal, and the professor was convicted of improper behavior according to the Civil Service Code (The Civil Service Code provisions regarding sexual harassment were detailed in the previous Report). The second one, Anonymous v. The Chief of Staff and Others, known as the Galili case, was a very high-profiled case that generated tremendous public debate. The High Court of Justice revoked the decision of the head of General Command and the Defense Minister to promote Brig. Gen. Galili to major-general, in spite of his former conviction in a court-martial of "indecent sexual behavior", that was accompanied by suspension of promotion for two years. Galili's former clerk, with whom he had sexual relations, who had also accused him of raping her, but later dropped those allegations, brought the appeal against the promotion. The High Court of Justice accepted the woman's contention of the unreasonableness of the decision of the head of the General Command and the Defense Minister, and blocked the promotion.

In both cases, the Court's attitude was very firm in condemning both men's behavior, and it used particularly strong rhetoric in denunciation of sexual harassment, clearly acknowledging its role in setting the standards for acceptable social behavior in light of the changing social and legal norms. The court's emphasis put on sexual harassment as an offense against the woman's dignity and liberty is in line with the new constitutional jurisprudence, following the enactment of the two basic laws in 1992. This concept was also strongly advocated by the promoters of the new Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, and was indeed embedded into its first section, as mentioned above.

The most recent case in a series of high-profile sexual harassment cases, which attracted a lot of public attention, involved former Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, who was convicted in two out of three charges of sexual assault and sexual harassment. Mordechai was serving as Minister of Transportation at the time of the allegations, and was considered to be a leading politician, having retired from the army after serving as Commander of the Northern Region and being a candidate to the post of Chief of Staff. The two cases in which Mordechai was found guilty concerned incidents that occurred when he was still a high-ranking army official, while the one put by the woman who has stepped forward first related to the more recent period of Mordechai's political career. In March 2001 he was found guilty in two out of the three charges, and faced a maximum sentence of seven years in prison. In April 2001 a split panel of three judges gave him an 18-month suspended sentence. The two male judges wrote that they weighed Mordechai's public achievements and military past in determining the sentence, whereas the dissenting judge, a woman, gave him 4 months in prison (with no possibility of service work) and a year of suspended sentence. Both the State and Mr. Mordechai have appealed the decision.

5.1.2. Rape Law

The most recent legislative amendment in the area of sexual violence against women took place in June 2001. It amended the actual definition of rape in section 345(a) of the Penal Law - 1977, removing its major part, leaving in only the requirement that the penetration of a woman's sexual organ be done without her free consent. Apparently, the rest of the definition that detailed possible causes for the lack of the woman's free will (such as "the use of force", as explained in the previous Report) was seemed redundant, especially in light of recent case law that had already interpreted the penetration itself as constituting "the use of force".

5.1.3. Victims of Offences' Rights Law – 2001

Another recent legislation, representing significant achievement for women's NGOs, and reflecting change of attitude and policy of law enforcement agencies towards victims, is the Victims of Offences' Rights Law – 2001, passed in March 2001. Following a struggle of several years, as described in the previous Report, a coalition of NGOs, including the Israel Women's Network, the Help Centers Union, the National Council for Children and the Association for the Advancement of Rights of People with Disabilities, has succeeded in convincing the legislature that a balance must be struck between the rights of the accused, the charged and the convicted on the one hand, and the rights of the victim on the other. The law grants a long list of rights, with special emphasis on victims of violence and sexual offences, including the right to protection in every stage of the criminal proceedings; the right to be notified on the proceedings' developments; the right to be notified on the perpetrator's arrest or release from arrest; the right to be accompanied by a companion during investigations; the right to express an opinion prior to proceedings' hold-up, plea-bargain, parole or clemency; and more, as can be seen in the Legislative Supplement.

5.1.4. Stalking

Another legislative initiative which has yet to bear fruit is the Stalking Bill – 2001, drafted by Na'amat women's organization. The Bill was tabled by four women Members of Knesset and is currently being by the Ministry of Justice. In its current version the Bill provides for the issuing of a prohibitive injunction against a person who engages in stalking, but does not make stalking a criminal offence.

5.1.5. Minimum Punishments and Protection of Witnesses

Other legislative developments, include the 1998 amendment to the Penal Law - 1977, which instituted a minimum punishment for those convicted of rape, of indecent acts and of sex crimes against family members, constituting 1/4 of the maximum that may be imposed. The amendment still permits deviation from this minimum, but only under special mitigating circumstances which should be detailed in the judgement. However, case law has proved the amendment to be faulty, since the legislature failed to mandate that the prison term be actually served and not merely suspended. Another initiative to set minimum punishment relates to domestic violence and will be described below.

In addition, regulations for implementing the provisions of The Procedural Amendment Law (Amendment No. 2) (Questioning of Witnesses), 1995, authorizing courts to order that the testimony of a complainant in a sexual offense be given in the accused's absence, whenever the court believes that the complainant or the complainant's testimony may otherwise be harmed, were promulgated in 1997, providing for the use of close-circuit television systems in such cases. Such systems were set up in the five District Courts, and in the Magistrate's Court in the city of Eilat.

5.2. Family Gender-Based Violence - Legal Aspects

5.2.1. Recent Amendments to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law-1991

Throughout the last few years, the normative framework of the area of the prevention of domestic violence has continued to develop, resulting in two substantial legislative amendments to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law-1991.

A 1997 amendment to the law has added two grounds for issuing a protective injunction aiming at protecting those experiencing domestic violence. According to the amendment, the court may grant a protective injunction where the subject of the injunction has either "unlawfully confined a family member", or where there is severe and prolonged emotional abuse, such as where there is the behavior that does not allow the victimized family member reasonable and sound management of life. In the latter case, though, the injunction will be issued only in the presence of both parties, unless the perpetrator does not show up in court. The 1997 amendment also extended the maximal periods of protective injunctions and probations, setting them at one year each (compared to 6 months each before the amendment).

In recognition of the injunction's importance as an immediate protective remedy designed for emergency situations, the 1997 amendment allows appeals of decisions pursuant to Prevention of Violence in the Family Law, to be heard by a single judge of the District Court instead of the previously required panel of three, so as to ensure that such appeals be made within a reasonable period following the granting – or the rejection - of the injunction.

A 1998 amendment to the law further broadened the already extensive choice of jurisdictions available to the requesting party, by further giving religious courts the jurisdiction to grant protective injunctions. It is believed that this amendment may ease the plight to women in ultra-orthodox communities who often hesitate to turn to civil courts.

5.2.2. Other Legislative Developments

According to Israeli laws of evidence, spouses, children and parents may testify to the detriment of their family member only in cases of violent crime. This limitation had created an odd situation, whereby a wife; for example, who requested a protective injunction was not able to testify to the detriment of her husband regarding non-violent violations of the injunction. As she is often the only witness of such violations, this limitation placed a serious obstacle on the implementation of the law. A 1997 amendment to the Evidence Ordinance [New Version] - 1971 has included such violations of protective injunctions among the instances where a spouse (or other close family member) may testify.

A 1997 amendment to the Weapon Law - 1949 followed the existing legislation aiming at restricting the possession of a gun by a person against whom a protective injunction was issued, or who was arrested under the suspicion of committing an act of violence against a family member. According to the amendment, a court which convicts an individual of any violent crime is not to refuse the prosecution's request to suspend whatever weapon license that individual might have, or to deposit that weapon with the police. Any refusal of such a request must be accounted for with special reasons. The amendment, however, does not address the issues of individuals who are members of the security forces or who perform reserve duty in the army, nor the proposal to require welfare officials to notify the official in charge of weapon license registrations whenever they have reason to believe that an individual may endanger a family member if he is allowed to carry a weapon, even though various bills that prompted this amendment did address these issues.

Two recent legislative developments attempt to aid battered women on the economic level. The first is the Employment of Women Law (Amendment 19)(Limitations of Dismissals of Worker who stays in a shelter for battered women)- 2000, aimed at protecting from being fired, women who miss work due to their hiding in shelters from being fired. The employer is restrained from dismissing the woman during her stay at the shelter for a maximum period of six months, and during the 30 days following her return to work, provided her stay was approved by the welfare authorities and the employer was notified accordingly. During that time period she is to receive a social security benefit instead of a salary from the employer. Furthermore, if the woman quits her job as a result of her stay in the shelter, her resignation is to be regarded as dismissal, for purposes of eligibility to receive worker's dismissal compensations. The second legislative initiative is the 2001 amendment to the Single Parent Families Law - 1992, which added women who stay more than 90 days in battered women's shelters and started divorce proceedings to the definition of "single parent" eligible to several welfare benefits, as explained under Article 13 of the previous Report. This is an important step in freeing battered women from being economically dependent on their spouses. The economic dependency has often precluded them from initiating divorce proceedings. Another legislative development is a 2000 amendment to the Penal Law - 1977, which sets a minimum punishment for grave acts of assault and violence against family members, constituting a fifth of the maximum that may be imposed.

5.2.3. The Inter-Ministerial Committee for Treatment of Domestic Violence

In 1998, an Inter-Ministerial Committee was set to examine the problem of violence against women within the family, continuing the work of the 1996 committee mentioned in the previous Report. The committee's working premise and final goal was to set-up the mechanism for a comprehensive coordination between all the organs that operate in this area. Accordingly, the committee examined the situation on almost all-governmental and operational fronts, and many of its recommendations are indeed geared at a broad spectrum that cuts across various governmental ministries and organs.

The Committee's report proposes a line of thorough reforms needed throughout the system, starting with some further legislative amendments, through professional training, information gathering and monitoring, development of risk-evaluation tools, educational programs, special needs population groups, civil and military possession of weapons, and cooperation on the local level. Much of the committee's plans for professional training are in line with the CEDAW Committee's inquiry about gender sensitization programs for the police. The overall budget requested for implementing these recommendations was approximately $50 million.

In April 1999 the government adopted the Report's recommendations, deciding on a gradual implementation over several years, and ordering the inclusion of the necessary budget for a list of projects approved for immediate implementation. In 2000, 12,000,000 NIS (approximately $3,000,000) were directly allocated by the Ministry of Finance for the implementation of these projects, with additional 12,000,000 NIS granted by various government ministries. These sums were allocated with the commitment of continuing similar annual allocations.

5.3. Extent of the Phenomenon of Sexual Violence Against Women

5.3.1. The JDC-Brookdale Institute Survey

Precise statistics regarding the extent of the phenomenon of sexual violence against women are difficult to obtain, as most instances go unreported, and victims generally hesitate before turning to the police or even to other treatment services for assistance. However, a recent JDC-Brookdale Institute 2000 survey (based on data collected in 1998) enables, for the first time, to have a relatively accurate impression as to the real situation. Unlike previous statistics, derived from police and Help Centers records, the data here reflects self reporting of a nationally representative sample of adult women (i.e. over 22 years old) regardless of whether they turned to official authorities or to any help services. The researchers, however, qualify their findings, warning that this too is a minimal estimation. According to the survey, 2% of adult women in Israel (34,000 women) had at some time been victims of rape, 4% (68,000) were victims of sexual violence, and 8% (136,000) were victims of physical violence. No data was obtained as to the number who suffered violence during the year prior to the survey. Significantly, only one third of the rape victims, one third of the sexual violence victims, and 42% of the physical violence victims had sought some kind of medical aid (Gross & Brammli- Greenberg 2000, 49- 52)

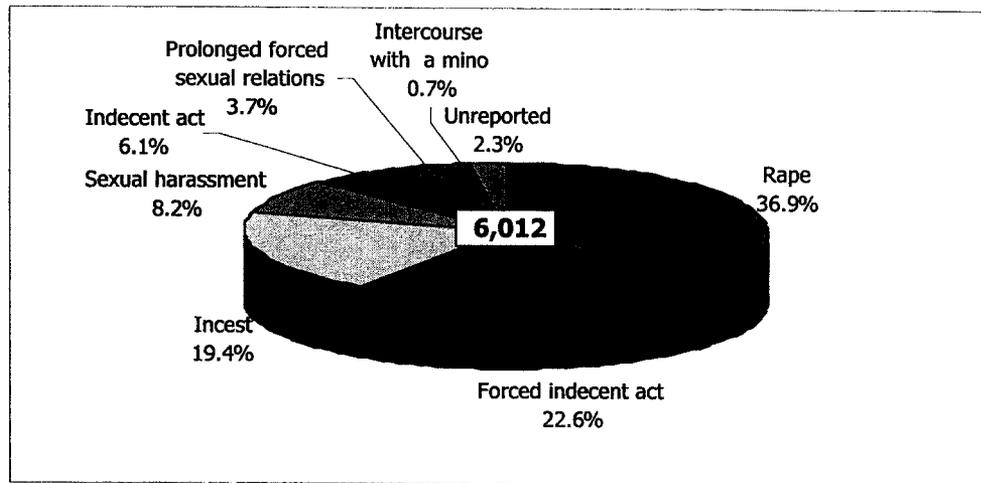

5.3.2. The Sexual Assault Help Centers Data

Not a formal authoritative institute, but still involving some degree of exposure on the part of the victims, the Help Centers Union also supplies important data. The Israeli Sexual Assault Victim's Help Centers Union, established in 1990, currently operates thirteen centers, spread throughout the country, including one in Jerusalem that specifically serves ultra-Orthodox Jewish women and takes calls from around the country, and two (in Haifa and in Nazareth) that are specially geared towards serving Arab women. The Help Centers Union's annual reports show consistent increase in women's appeals for help, which is conventionally explained as a combination of an increasing level of violence against women, and a growing awareness on the part of women. As the Help Centers serve as a junction not only for sexual assault victims but also for other situations of distress, in addition to serving as an information center, the following chart depicts the increase in requests in general and for assistance following sexual assaults in particular. Data presented below is from 1997, the most recent year where data is available.

Chart 1 - Appeals to the Help Centers, 1990-1997

Source: Help Centers Union, Sexual Violence in Israel 1997

In 1997, rape, followed by sexual assault and incest were the most common complaints received by the Help Centers. Despite the growing number of appeals for help each year, the relative number of requests relating to all types of sexual assault has remained relatively consistent from year to year. Significantly, what has changed in recent years was the relative number of sexual harassment complaints (8.2% of all complaints in 1997, compared to 4.4% in 1994). This may be explained by increasing public awareness of sexual violence in general, following public campaigns, and of growing legitimization to report and seek help for any kind of sexual violence, even if previously perceived as negligible. Undoubtedly, the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law in addition to the high profile cases has had their impact in this respect.

The Help Centers statistics further reveal that in 1997, similar to previous years, the majority of women who turned for assistance following a sexual attack were acquainted with the assailant. In 62.7% of the cases there was some form of previous acquaintance. In 25% the assailant was a family member, and in 7.5% of the cases the assailant was the victim's spouse. In only 11.4% of the cases was the assailant a stranger, contradicting the accepted misconception of rape as a crime generally perpetrated by strangers.

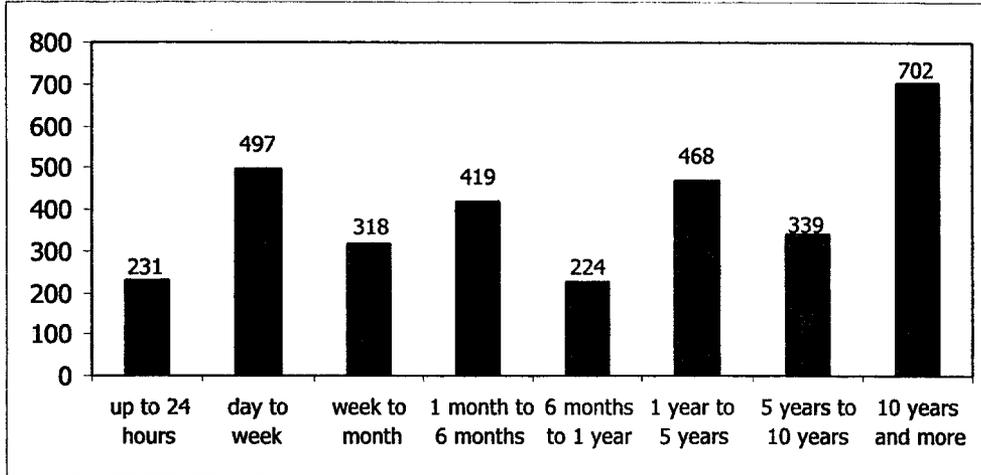

Similarly, approximately 1/2 of the attacks took place in areas deemed "safe," such as the victim's or assailant's home, school, or workplace, where the victim had come of her own free will. In 28.1% of the cases, the attack took place in the home of the victim or of the perpetrator. In 1/4 of the instances they took place in the victim's home. In contrast, only 13% reported incidents outside or while hitch hiking.

As in previous years, the majority of victims in 1997 -- about 72%-- were under the age of 25 at the time of the attack. The largest group was of adolescents (between 13-18), comprising 21.4% of the total, followed by girls (up to 12), comprising 18.1% of the total. On the other hand, the stratification of the age of the victims at the time of reporting is different. Forty percent of the women were between 13-25 years old, 12% were over 26, and 11.4% were under 12. To a great extent the discrepancy is the result of the time that usually passes between the attack and the turn to help.

The next two charts show that only a minority of victims of sexual violence (about 12%) seeks immediate professional help within a week of the attack, and that an overwhelming

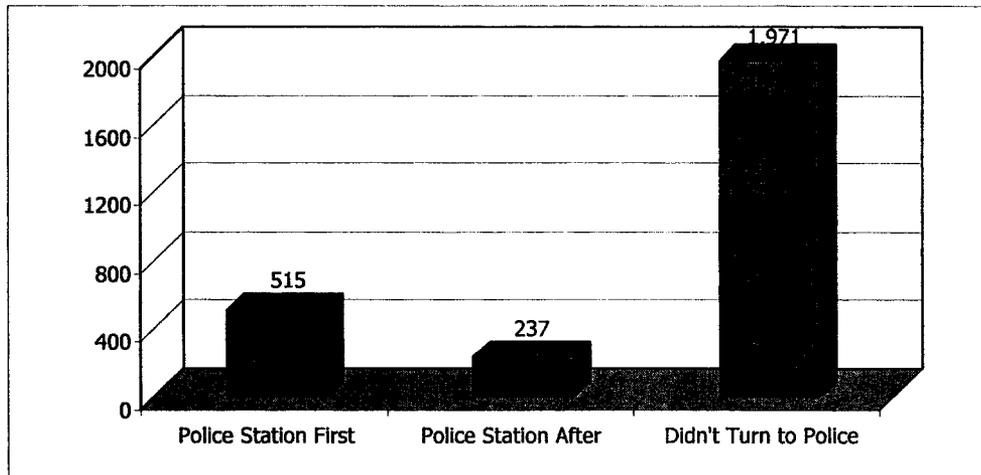

72.4% of those who did turn to a Help Center chose to refrain from reporting the incident to the police (compared to 73.1% in 1994).

5.3.3. Police Handling of Sex Crimes Against Women

In attempting to assess the extent of sexual violence against women, police data can only serve as an indication of the trend that takes place, and not of the actual scope. In this respect, the overall direction is of an increase in the number of sexual violence cases in general, and of grave sexual offenses (defined as rape or forced indecent acts) cases in particular.

Table 1 - Police Handling of Sexual Violence Complaints, by Offense, 1996-1999

In 1999, criminal investigation files were opened by the police in approximately 85% of reported sexual violence involving women as victims (an increase from the 80% rate in 1997 and 1998).

5.3.4. Prosecutorial Policy Regarding Sexual Violence Against Women

In 1996, the Sexual Assault Help Centers Union collaborated with the Israel Women's Network in promoting the establishment of a Victim's Witness Assistance Program, described in the previous Report. During the first two and a half years of its operation, 150 victims received assistance and support throughout the criminal proceedings. In addition to the invaluable backing for the victims, prosecutors have attributed successful prosecutions to the project, finding that the emotional support that the victims received have made them better witnesses, and have enabled the prosecutors to exclusively concentrate on their professional role.

5.3.5. Sentencing for Sex Crimes

As has been previously mentioned, the 1998 amendment to the Penal Law - 1977 established a minimum punishment ceiling for sexual violence. There is no available data regarding the effect this reform has had since its adoption.

5.3.6. Funding of the Help Centers

The lion share of the Help Center's operational budget comes from the private sector, mostly from independent fund-raising. The governmental subsidy for the Help Centers Union comes from the budget of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare. Between 1995 and 1998 the Ministry of Labor and Welfare had substantially increased its support to the help centers. The most significant raise came during 2000, when the ministries' subsidy to the Union of the Help Centers has undergone a five-time increase, to $600,000, making it 35% of the Help Centers Union's operational budget. This move is even more significant, since the budget now comes from a specially designated item in the ministry's budget, so that it is no longer up to the ministry's officials whether to allocate it and how much.

Another governmental source of support are annual grants from the Estates' Fund, which started supporting the Centers in 1997 (see also Table 3, presented below).

5.4. Extent of the Phenomenon of Domestic Violence

5.4.1. The JDC-Brookdale Institute Survey

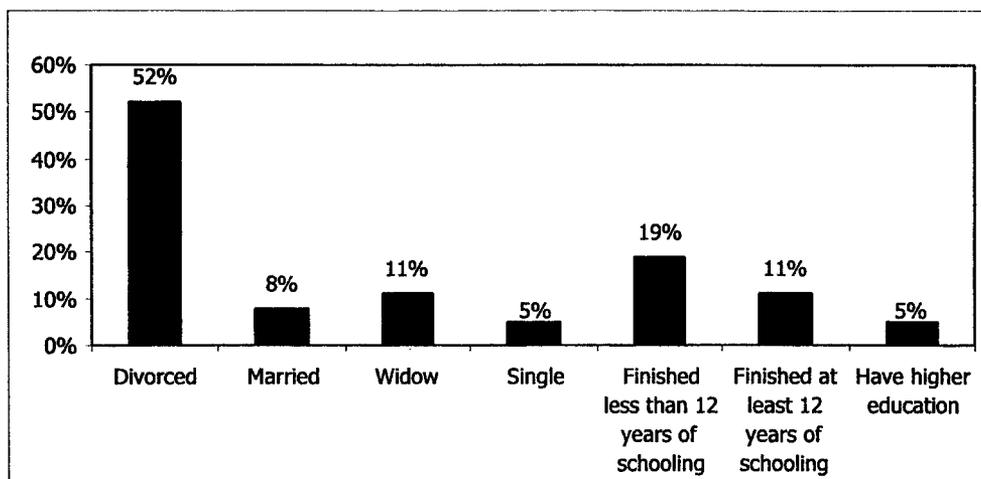

The JDC-Brookdale Institution 2000 survey, mentioned above, confirms earlier estimates of the phenomenon of domestic violence, estimates which were presented in the previous Report. From interviewing a nationally representative sample of 850 women aged 22 and over, the researchers conclude that approximately 200,000 women in Israel (11% of the adult population of women) have been victims of violence at least once by their spouse, and approximately 67,000 (4% of the adult population of women) have been victims of domestic violence during the year prior to the survey. Among those who had been victims in the past year, 19% reported that violent incidents occurred every day or several times a week, 42% reported occurrences several times a month, 14% reported several times a year, and 25% reported less frequent occurrences. As the survey was part of an international study, it also enables a comparative perspective.

Table 2 - Domestic Violence Against Women, in the U.S.A. and in Israel, 1998

	U.S.A.	ISRAEL
Percentage of Women Reporting of Domestic Violence	31%	11%
Thereof: Talking to a doctor	29%	22%
Incidents in which the Doctor Initiated the Conversation	20%	9%
Incidents in which the Doctor Sent the Woman to the Police	23%	16%
Incidents in which the Doctor Sent The Woman to Support Services	48%	32%

Source: JDC-Brookdale Institute 1998, as Reported in Ha'aretz, October 2000

In addition to a general assessment of the phenomenon, the survey also provided analysis of its scope among various population groups. While a significant rate of violence was found among all strata of society, it was higher among those with low education. Of those women who had not graduated high-school, 19% reported having at some time been the victim of spousal abuse, while 11% of the high school graduates and 5% of the women with higher education reported the same. Also, the rate of victims of spousal abuse was particularly high among divorcees (52%), compared with 11% among widows, 8% among married women, and 5% among single women. The researchers suggest that the figure relating to married women might reflect under-reporting, since the survey was conducted through telephone interviews, which might have taken place while other family members, including spouses, were at home. While this survey did not examine other demographic variables, such as ethnicity or origin, and other scientific sources are not available on this subject, welfare authorities and others involved in treatment services have previously indicated the higher level of domestic violence among immigrants, both from Ethiopia and from the former USSR, sadly reflected in a disproportionately high presence of these social groups in cases of women murdered by their spouses.

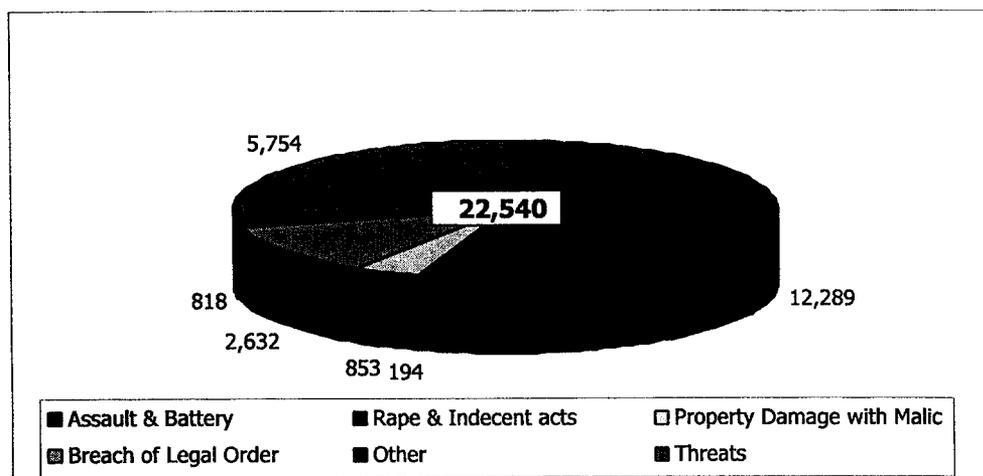

Chart 5 - Reports of Spousal Violence Among Women, 1998

Source: JDC-Brookdale Institute 1998, as Reported in Ha'aretz, October 2000

According to recent data from the National Service for Social Work within the Ministry of Health, hospitals reported to the Ministry's national database of a mere 1,472 battered women admitted for medical care in 1999. This figure reflects a very low detection rate of domestic violence incidents, and calls for the initiation of appropriate educational and training programs, as the CEDAW committee has also indicated in its concluding comments. Indeed, several such programs were already adopted in the last few years, including regular visits to shelters of battered women as an integral part of a course at the Haifa University Medical School and the of the field of sexual assaults, which was added to the curriculum of the Tel Aviv University Medical School gynecology course. In addition, a new training program, which includes seminars, workshops and lectures, is currently being operated, targeted at practicing medical personnel.

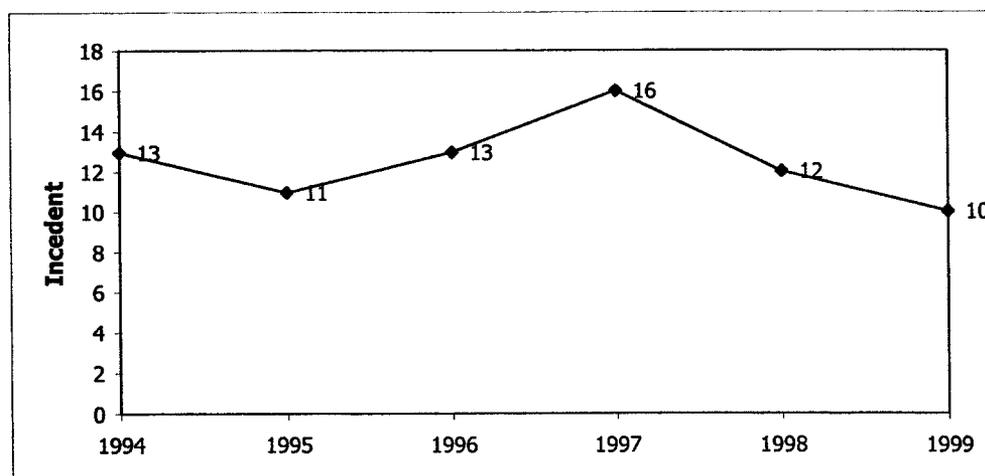

5.4.2. Police Handling of Domestic Violence

Police records show constant rise in complaints of domestic violence. Thus, in 1998, the police received a total of 21,912 complaints of domestic violence submitted by women, which constituted 76% of all domestic violence reports (compared to 14,706 complaints in 1995, which constituted the same ratio - 76% - of all domestic violence reports). These alarming numbers continue to grow, as 22,540 files of domestic violence were opened in 1999, 194 of which dealt with severe spousal sexual violence against women, which falls into the categories of forced rape or forced indecent acts (an increase from 113 such incidents reported in 1995).

Domestic violence in its extreme form can be a threat to a woman's very existence. Between 1990 and November 1998 a total of 113 women were killed by their spouses in Israel. These murders constitute 13% of all murders during that period.

One result of the increasing extent of the phenomenon of domestic violence is the growing number of arrests of involved suspects, especially in cases of assault and battery offenses. However, as will be detailed below, a recent survey reveals that only in a small minority of the cases arrests were actually made during all levels of handling (Eisikovitz & Griffel 1998).

Chart 8 - Total Arrests in Spousal Violence, Including Assault & Battery, 1995-1999

In 1998, an evaluation study on Police Intervention in Intimate Violence was commissioned by the Ministry of Internal Security. The study supplies some concrete statistics regarding the area of domestic violence. In addition, a thorough analysis of the policemen's own attitudes and perceptions of violence against women within the family revealed that the professed goals of the police in the area of domestic violence are not fully achieved. The study's findings, as well as the section that follows on police practices, also serve as a response to the committee's inquiry about gender sensitization programs to the police and their impact.

The research first point out that there was a 61% increase in the rate of initiation of criminal proceedings between 1995-98, from 50% of all complaints in 1995, to over 78% of all complaints in 1998. This growth, however, is hardly matched by the subsequent handling of the cases, and could in fact be related to the rise in the severity of the cases: in 1997 66% of the cases involved battery, while in 1995 only 40% were cases of battery. As for the rest of the proceedings, in only 9% of the cases arrests were made during all levels of handling, and in only 6% of them the police arrested the suspect on the scene. This finding is further contrasted by the views expressed by the police personnel themselves, 75% of whom believe it is the police's duty to arrest a man who beats his wife, and 87% of whom actually state that they routinely arrest the man when arriving to the place where violent against the woman took place. Similarly, while 71% of them agree that a battering man has to be forced to receive some treatment, their findings reveal that referrals to treatment, in any stage of the proceedings, were made in only 8% of the cases (Eisikovits & Griffel 1998).

Perhaps most striking is the finding that out of 1000 cases analyzed, only 14.5% of the suspects were actually put to trial, only 6% were convicted, and only 1.2% of the total (i.e. 12 out of 995) were sent to jail. In addition, in only 8% of the cases were there referrals to treatment. The study further reveals that only 57% of the police workers surveyed for the research stated that they were well-versed with the laws in this area, and 84% were interested in obtaining more information in this respect. The research put the lack of knowledge of relevant laws and regulations among the leading causes for the non-satisfactory handling by the police of spousal violence.

Major parts of the study provide a close focus on the actual attitude of police personnel towards the subject-matter, as reflected from the routine handling of the files themselves, through quantitative evaluation of the questionnaires, and careful analysis of the in-depth interviews conducted with them. A survey of the files revealed overall neglect regarding their handling, so that, for example, no testimony of the victim was found in 6% of the cases, and in 61% there was no certification of the complaint filed. More alarming, of course, is the finding of partial legitimization towards wife battery: 7.7% of the police personnel agree that "sometimes the woman deserves to be beaten", 9.3% believe that "a man is allowed to beat his wife only if she cheats on him", 17% believe that "a woman who keeps quiet, will forestall beatings from herself", and 26% believe that "sometimes, the woman causes the man to beat her".

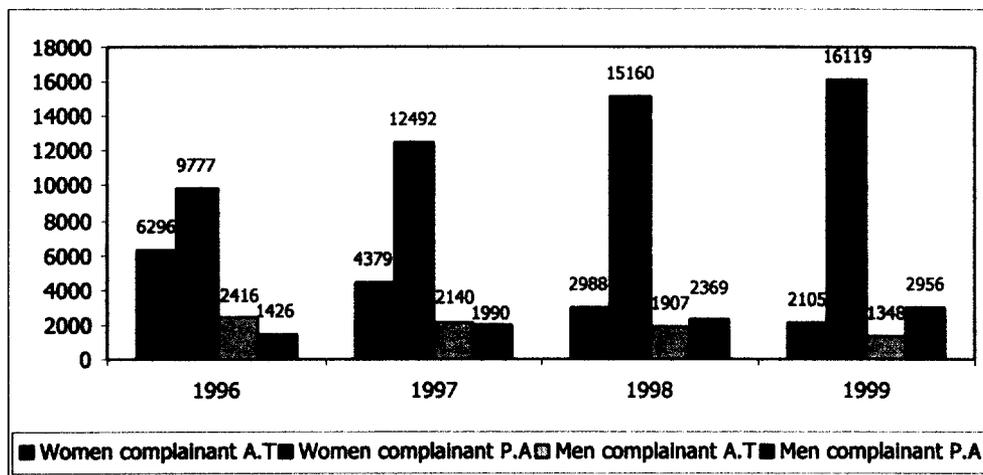

On a more positive note, it must be emphasized that gradual progress has been made in police's handling of domestic violence in recent years. Continuing the steps taken in 1990, reported in the previous Report, a national investigative-system focusing solely on domestic violence was established in 1998 in all police stations throughout the country, consisting of 120 specially trained investigators who only handle domestic violence cases. Fifty other investigators handle these cases in smaller police stations in addition to doing other work. According to Israel police, there are currently at least two investigators specializing in domestic violence in each police station, and most of these units are headed by an officer, often a woman officer. Nine of the 120 positions were reserved for Arab women investigators in stations that serve the Arab community. The five-day preparatory course for these investigators includes theoretical and practical knowledge in the sociological and legal aspects of the field of domestic violence as well as the various police regulations in this field. The course consists of lectures, discussions, workshops, analysis of investigation files as well as a visit to a shelter for battered women.

The cooperation between the police and welfare officials is also worth noting. The formal procedure requires the referral of complainants (upon their consent) and suspects to the welfare officials. These officials will, in turn, send reports to the police, concerning suspects they examined.

5.4.3. Statistical Data on Current Police Practices Regarding the Handling of Domestic Violence Cases

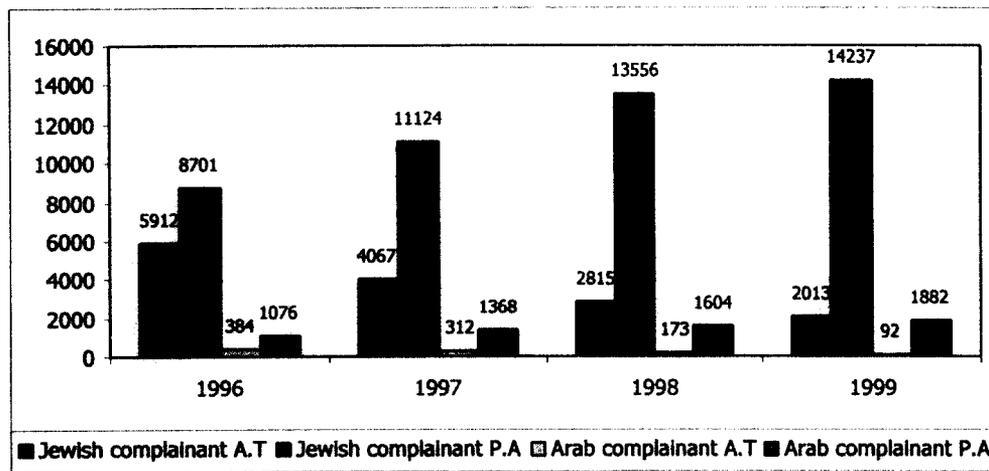

As noted earlier, there was a sharp increase in the rate of initiation of criminal proceedings in domestic violence cases in recent years, from 50% of all complaints in 1995, to over 84% of all complaints in 1999. The following charts further exhibit this data by complainant gender and religion.

5.4.4. Sentencing for Domestic Violence

As already mentioned, the 1998 study on Police Intervention in Intimate Violence revealed that out of 1000 cases analyzed, only 14.5% of the suspects were actually put to trial, only 6% were convicted, and only 1.2% of the total were sent to jail. The study further revealed that the most common sentence for those convicted was a suspended prison term (in 65% of the convictions, compared to 22% of the convicted who were sentenced to actual prison terms).

Between 1997 - 2000, a total of 16,336 suits, based on the Prevention of Violence within the Family Law provisions, were filed. At the same time, 8,606 requests for various injunctions offered as part of the law were granted. The following chart exhibits a substantial increase in restraining orders granted by the courts in recent years:

Chart 11 - Restraining Orders Issued Against Husbands

Source: Ministry of Justice, Legal Aid Services, as reported in Ha'aretz, August 2000

One additional piece of information regarding sentencing for domestic violence offenses relates to appeals made by the State. According to data supplied by the State Attorney's office, appeals of acquittals and of sentences in the area of domestic violence comprise the majority (60%) of all the appeals that the State makes.

5.4.5. Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence

The number of Centers for the Treatment and Prevention of Domestic Violence keeps rising steadily, currently standing at 31 such centers throughout the country (compared to 19 at the time of writing of the previous Report). In 1997, 3000 families were treated in these centers, compared to 1770 in 1994. In 1998, 4700 families were treated in the centers, while each center's budget is intended to cover only 120 families a year. The centers' budget comes mostly from the Ministry of Labor and Welfare (75%) and from the local authorities (25%), and it has been 6 times larger in 1999 than the first budget in 1993. In 2000 their budget stood at about $1.75 million. However, due to their overload, most of the centers (70%) routinely report a budgetary deficit. The tremendous growth in the number of families treated by the centers can be attributed to the increase in the number of centers available, and to greater awareness of the problem by the public. The results of the treatment have been very positive, and according to reports from the centers, in most families who were treated, the violence either stopped altogether or decreased significantly.

5.4.6. "Noam Home"

One particular treatment program, which is unique worldwide, is a hostel for battering men. Called the "Noam Home", this hostel, established in 1997, houses 12 men at a time, each for a period of four months. Geared towards the most difficult group of violent men who were issued injunctions prohibiting their entering their homes, the hostel conducts group and individual treatments, aiming at their “withdrawal” from violence, as the term used by the project’s promoters in the media. The project was started as a special “experiment project” under the National Insurance Institute, and showed remarkable success according to its evaluators. Up to date 130 men were treated in the hostel.

A similar project, targeted at sexual violence criminals is currently being promoted by a group of professionals and professors. The project will consist of hostels, in which convicted sexual violence criminals will stay upon their release from prison for 6-24 months.

5.4.7. Shelters for Battered Women

In 1998, 737 women and 1026 children were housed by 13 shelters for battered women, a significant increase from the 1995 figures reported in the previous Report (when the shelters housed 472 women and 695 children). Still, these numbers obviously do not meet the needs of the thousands of victims of domestic abuse who request acceptance each year. Consequently, the immediate budgetary request of the 1998 Inter-Ministerial Committee for Treatment of Domestic Violence was to establish two more shelters, one for Arab women (in addition to the existing shelter serving the Arab sector) and one for ultra-Orthodox women. The latter shelter was in fact established in mid 2000. Other initiatives in this field include the adaptation of the shelters to house women with disabilities (so far one of the shelters is qualified for this mission, and two others are undergoing required arrangements), and the organization of all shelters enabling them to receive women on a 24 hours basis (compared to one such emergency shelter operating currently).

In addition to the operating 13 shelters, there are currently 43 “transitional apartments”, designed to assist women in their transition back into life outside of the shelter. In 1998, 61 women and 116 children passed through these apartments; the average length of their stay is one year.

As reviewed in Israelis previous Report, the establishment of the shelters for battered women was financed solely by various non-profit organizations. The ongoing upkeep expenses of the shelters, on the other hand, were partially funded by the Ministry of Labor and Welfare and by the local authorities. Until 1995, the Ministry covered approximately 50% of the expenses. Since 1997, the Ministry formed a new scale of subsidizing the shelters, and their operational expenses are now divided between three sources: the Ministry of Labor and Welfare – 56.25%; the local authority – 18.75%; the operating NGO – 25%. The Ministry’s budgetary allocation for the shelters has dramatically increased over the last few years, and is 23.5 times greater in realistic terms in 2000 (about $2.3 million) than it was in 1993. Nonetheless, in 2000 it decreased 11% compared with 1999. The local authorities' budget for the shelters has similarly increased 16 times since 1993, and in 2000 it stood at approximately $0.75 million.

5.4.8. Hotlines

There are currently ten hotlines for battered women throughout the country, one of which operates in Arabic, and one national hotline which operates through a toll free 1-800 number. The most recent data regarding the number of calls received by the hotlines appeared in the 1998 Inter-Ministerial Committee for Treatment of Domestic Violence Report, and estimated that the national line takes around 5000 calls a year, and the ten municipal lines served 7000 callers in 1997.

5.4.9. Violence Against Women within the Arab Community

According to the 2000 JDC-Brookdale Institute Survey, the rates of domestic violence incidents are highest within the Arab sector (17%, compared to 14% within the Jewish sector). However, according this survey, Arab women are less likely to discuss domestic violence incidents with their doctor or any other medical professional. In addition, it should be noted that very few Arab women turn to Help Centers and report domestic violence incidents. For instance, in 1997, only 254 Arab women turned to the Help Centers, constituting a mere 4.2% of all applicants that year. In addition, as already exhibited in chart

10 above, very few complaints regarding domestic violence are being reported within the Arab sector (Gross & Brammli- Greenberg 2000).

According to HRA (Arab Association for Human Rights), in 1998, 6 Arab women were murdered in the name of what is known as “family honor”. In relation to the CEDAW Committee’s call on the State of Israel to eliminate all forms of unjustifiable practices, including “honor killings”, it should be mentioned that the police treats these cases as it treats all grave murder cases. The serious concern and handling of such incidents is also reflected in the case law where courts consistently denounce the attempt to claim “family honor” as a mitigating ground and entirely condemn these practices. On the procedural level, courts consistently refuse to free suspects in these cases on bail, even in such circumstances where the suspect, the victim’s grandfather, was eighty years old.

Suppression of the Exploitation of Women

1. General

The State of Israel regards the phenomenon of trafficking with severity, and the topic is high on the agenda of law enforcement authorities, with the aim of increasing strict enforcement over the major causes of the phenomenon, namely the procurers and the traders. The early results of this policy are reflected in the tables below. There are no official estimations of the extent of prostitution and trafficking in Israel. However, in a 1997 research conducted by the Israel Women's Network, the total number of prostitutes in Israel was estimated at between 8,000 and 10,000. NGOs estimate that close to 3,000 women are trafficked to Israel each year (Israel Woman's Network 1997, 2- 3).

2. The Legal Framework

Recent events, such as the publication of a report by Amnesty International concerning the trafficking of women from the former USSR into Israel's sex industry, have triggered some change in public and governmental attitude with regards to the treatment of women who engage in prostitution in Israel. This has been reflected - among other things - by various legislative initiatives which have been pushed forward in the Knesset: The Women's Equal Rights Law – 1951 was reformed in early 2000, with an explicit inclusion of the right of a woman "to be protected from violence, sexual harassment, sexual exploitation and trafficking". More specifically, an amendment to the Penal Law – 1977 was passed in July 2000 concerning prostitution and trafficking, explicitly prohibiting trafficking in people and allowing imprisonment for up to 16 years. The amendment further stipulates that the punishment for procurement and other related offenses is to be increased where aggravating circumstances exist, or in cases where minors are involved (a dividing line being drawn between minors under 14 or over, the former leading to double the original length of imprisonment, the latter to an additional 2-5 years to the original imprisonment duration). Moreover, the amendment provides for an extension of the offense previously under section 202 - making the causing of a person to leave his or her state of residence (regardless of what state that is) in order to engage him or her in prostitution a criminal offence and increasing the maximal punishment for that offense to 10 years.

Increased awareness and alarm from State authorities is also reflected in the establishment of a Parliamentary Investigative Committee on trafficking of women, in June 2000, as well as in the establishment of an intra-ministerial committee for outlining recommendations to face the phenomenon of trafficking, both on the criminal level and of the level of treating the women victims of the phenomenon. During its deliberations, the committee examined the possibility of establishing a central hostel where women who had been trafficked could stay during the period of giving evidence and testifying in court. The committee has also raised the possibility of having the governmental Legal Aid represent trafficked women (who are all illegal aliens) in court proceedings, after it was revealed that procurers often hire lawyers to release the women and prevent their deportation in order to continue using them for prostitution. The committee's report and recommendations were due shortly after the conclusion of this Report.

On the side of law enforcement agencies, the State Attorney has directed the various districts to take the testimony of trafficked women in a pre-hearing, so as not to prolong their stay in the country. In early July 2001 the State Attorney's office has distributed guidelines explaining the handling of the issue by the various State authorities. Later that month the Minister of Internal Security has convened a one-day seminar on trafficking, with the presence of the Attorney General, the State Attorney, Members of the Knesset, police officials and NGOs representatives.

On the international level, Israel plans to sign the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish the Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime (2000), and is considering joining other new international conventions against trafficking, such as the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (2000).

3. Evaluation of the Actual Situation

As an expression of a stronger commitment to combat trafficking in women, new Police internal directives were issued in June 2000 aimed at insuring the stronger enforcement of the law. Among these directives are instructions for every regional and special police investigation unit in Israel to conduct at least one thorough investigation per year in the realm of trafficking of women. Another directive encourages cooperation with international police forces through the naming of 8 police representatives across the world, cooperation with Interpol and national police forces, as well as with foreign police representatives working in Israel. One of the immediate results of these directives can be traced in the significant increase in the number of investigations relating to the issue of prostitution, which have been opened in the last few months. Furthermore, the police points to a more conciliatory and victim-oriented approach towards foreign women working illegally as prostitutes who come forward to testify against procurement or related crimes. Instead of being arrested and immediately deported from Israel, the women are currently released from prison and given support until court proceedings can take place. During July 2001, the police financed the stay of 30 women in hotels and in hostels, in anticipation of their testimony in court.

Data regarding the enforcement of the law in this area confirms the need for firmer commitment, while showing increased enforcement over the years. Between 1997-2000, the trial was over in only 17% (273 out of 1,606) of police files that were opened for prostitution-related crimes (including procurement, solicitation to prostitute and to engage in prostitution, keeping a place of prostitution, kidnapping for the purpose of prostitution, and trafficking since mid 2000). Of the more specifically male dominated crime of procurement only 180 files were opened in the first place, and 25 were over by July 2001, as can be seen in the following table. No data exists as to the rate of convictions and sentences. On the other hand, the following table does show increased enforcement, reflected in the numbers of files opened throughout the years. This is particularly evident when comparing the 1997 data with 1999-2000 in the categories of procurement and keeping a house of prostitution. Probably most significant in terms of increased awareness and severe attitude is the data concerning the new offence of trafficking, showing that 25 files were opened in a period of only 7 months. It is also reflected in the data concerning arrests, particularly detention pending trial, as seen in Table 3 below.

The following table shows the number of arrests made in each category of prostitution related crimes, as well as the number of cases in which suspects were put into detention pending trial. It should be explained that a new law, passed in 1996 and came into effect in May 1997, had severely limited the option of criminal arrests in general and of detention pending trial in particular. Of special interest is the relatively high rate of detention pending trial in the new category of trafficking. This policy was approved by a Supreme Court ruling from October 2000, which stressed the severity of the offence, and affirmed its basis for detention pending trial.

4. Involvement of Minors in Prostitution

The issue of minors' involvement in prostitution is dealt with in the amendment to the general provisions of the Penal Law – 1977. As mentioned above, the involvement of a minor is considered an aggravating circumstance of the crime committed, in effect imposing a heavier sentence on the perpetrator. Most significant is the amendment's handling of the clients, in innovating a prohibition to engage in prostitution with a minor, punishable by a relatively severe three years imprisonment. Another notable addition is a special prohibition in section 208, punishable by three years in prison, against permitting a minor (defined as a person between 2-17 years old) who is under one's supervision to live in or to frequent a place of prostitution. Regarding the involvement of minors who are forced into prostitution, and more generally the commercial sexual exploitation of children, a fundamental change has been effected with the passing of a 1998 amendment to section 15(b) of the Penal Law – 1997, designed to combat outgoing “sex tourism” with minors. The amendment establishes an extraterritorial jurisdiction for prostitution-related crimes against minors, and makes it possible to put the perpetrators on trial in Israel for crimes committed outside of it, regardless of whether or not such acts would be considered crimes in the places where the acts were committed. On a more procedural level, the amendment also shifts the burden of proof on the accused to prove his claim of unawareness as to the prostitute's age.

All these provisions seem to be in line with a stricter attitude towards involvement of minors in the sexual industry and a stronger commitment to protect minors from abuse and exploitation. One should note the gender-neutral language introduced in the law's provisions that deal with prostitution.

5. Rehabilitation Programs for Women and Girls in Distress

There are no rehabilitation programs specifically geared for girls who are sexually exploited. The major general rehabilitation program for girls is the Service for Girls in Distress under the Ministry of Labor and Welfare. This service treats childless, mentally sane adolescent girls aged 13-21 in the Jewish sector, and up to age 25 in the Arab sector. Overall, the Service has treated 11,800 girls in 1997, more than double the number in 1993.

The service suffers from chronic lack of sufficient budget. In his 1998 Annual Report, the State Comptroller severely criticized the Ministry of Labor and Welfare, who finances 75% of the social workers' operational costs, and the government in general, for not allocating sufficient budgets to enable a reasonable level of operation. The report found that the average load of girls for every full time social worker was more than one hundred girls, and in some cases the load was nearly doubles that. Even more alarming was the fact that the total number of girls in distress was estimated by the Service at 21,000, almost half of who could not be treated at all for lack of resources. The situation is particularly difficult with respect to Arab girls; it was estimated by the superintendent on treating Arab girls that 10,000 need treatment, while only 2,100 are receiving it.

Article 7

Political and Public Life

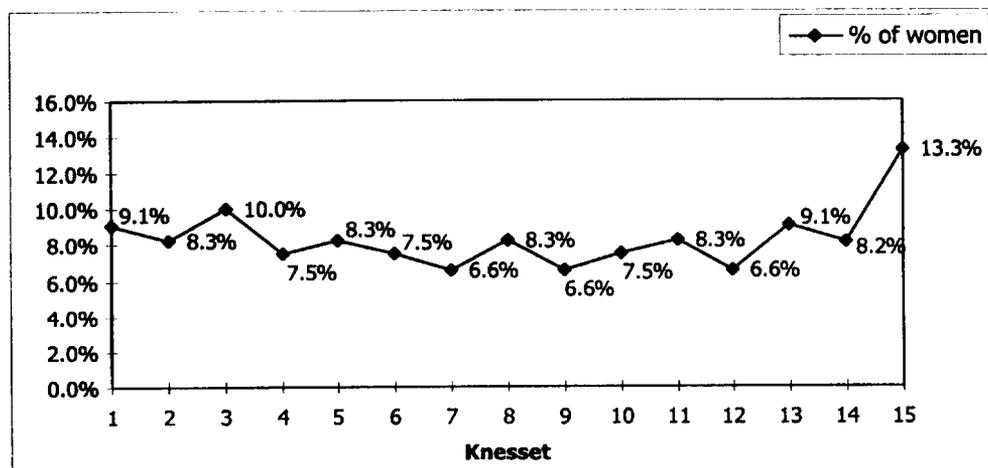

1. Women in Political life in Israel

In contrast to the conventional assumption that a woman’s entry into politics conflicts with her domestic role, statistics show that women who succeed in Israeli politics are those with families and children. Thus for example, 94% of the women elected in the 1998 local elections have children, and 82% of them are married. It must be mentioned, however, that the average age of the women elected is 48.

2. Women’s Representation in the Knesset

The recent 1999 elections for the 15th Knesset marked an improvement in the overall representation of women in the Knesset, with 14 women elected – that is 11.6% of Knesset members (this number of women MKs has increased to 16, with the resignations of two male MK and the appointment of women in their places). In addition, for the first time an Arab woman was elected to the Knesset, Hussniya Jabara of Meretz.

Chart 1 - Women MKs throughout the Years, 1948-2001

Source: Yishai, Yael. 1997. Between the Flag and the Banner, <http://knesset.gov.il>

Notwithstanding this improvement, When compared to other countries, Israel still has room to improve in respect to women's representation in the legislature. One possible explanation may be found in the fact that since the early 80s, there has been no woman MKs representatives within religious parties. With 28 seats occupied by religious parties out of a total of 120 (one more than during the 14th Knesset), close to 25% of the places in the Israeli parliament are almost by definition closed to women. At the same time, the 3 biggest non-religious parties have exhibited a significant increase in the rate of women MKs elected, as can be seen in the following table:

Table 1 - Women elected to Knesset, by Party, 1992, 1996 and 1999

2.1. Women as Knesset members

Despite the fact that there still has never been a woman Knesset Speaker, the current Knesset does have two women serving as Deputy Speakers. The present Knesset has assigned two women to the Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee. Beyond this, three women head other Knesset Committees, and three women head three sub-committees.

Significantly, according to the Knesset Statistical Report, which quantifies the legislative and parliamentary activity of different Knesset members, it is evident that women's legislative production is disproportionately superior to their representation in the Knesset. Generally, while women constituted only 7.5% of the legislators in the 14th Knesset, they were responsible for 15% of the laws passed. Women MKs were present on 90% Knesset deliberations days, while the average MK participation stands at 77%.

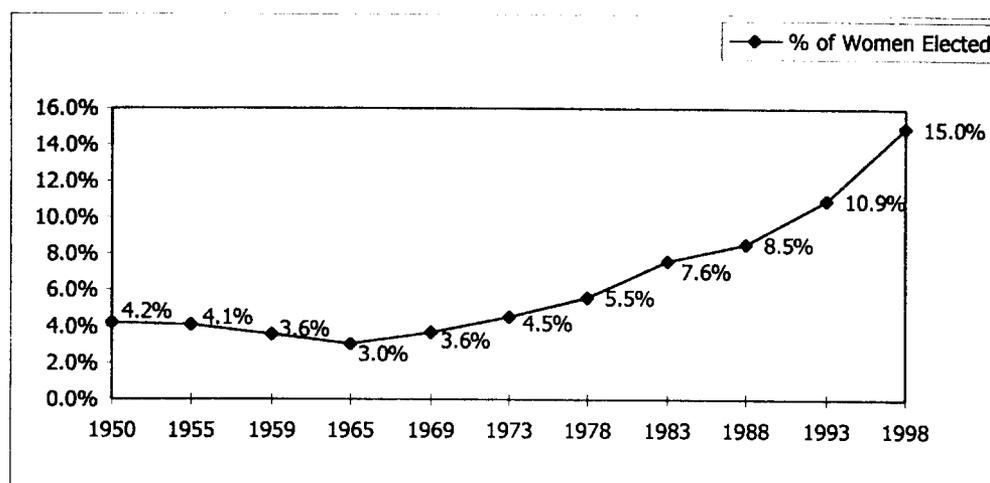

The significance of women's presence in the legislature is clearly seen in the following data: Between 30-50% of the bills put forward by women MKs during the 13th and 14th Knessets involved issues concerning the status of women.

3. Women in Government

In the 1996-99 cabinet, only one of 18 ministers was a woman and three women held the position of general-director of a government ministry. The recent cabinet of PM Ehud Barak had two women ministers and one deputy-minister out of a total of 23 ministers within the cabinet. Following the special election for Prime Minister in early 2001 the present cabinet has three women ministers (out of a total of 26 ministers within the cabinet), with another precedent of a woman Deputy Minister of Defense.

4. Women in Local Authorities

The recent 1998 local elections saw the election of 240 women, making up 15% of the total, a jump of 40% in comparison with the 10.9% elected as a result of the 1993 elections. Overall, women are currently present in 70% of the local authorities. This quantitative evolution can be attributed at least partly to a qualitative change in the way women have entered the local authorities - through the use of independent parties, many of them set up and headed by women.

Chart 2 - Women Elected to Local Councils, 1950-1998

Source: Israel Women's Network, 1994, Women in Israel - information and analysis; Union of Local Authorities in Israel.

While up until the last elections, few women had served as heads of local councils, and only one had been a mayor of a city, the recent 1998 local elections witnessed an important evolution with the election of two women as mayors of fairly large and central cities (Herzlia and Netanya). Twenty-nine women serve as deputy mayors, and two women were elected to head regional authorities. It must be mentioned however, that these achievements relate to the Jewish population of Israel. Only one Arab woman to date has served as a head of a local council since the establishment of the State (Violet Khoury, elected in 1972 to be the head of the Kfar Yassif Local Council), and in the 1998 elections two Arab women were elected to municipal councils.

Another point worth mentioning with respect to local authorities is the Local Councils Law (Advisor on the Status of Women) - 2000, as detailed under article 2 above.

5. Women in the Civil Service

5.1. Ranks of Women in the Civil Service

The rate of women among the top three ranks of the senior staff of the Civil Service's four main classifications – which compose the main source for administration managers - remains relatively low. In 1997, when women made up 61% of all civil servants, that rate was still less than 15%, and in October 1999, when women made up 61% of all civil servants, the rate stood at 16.4%. Women's low level of representation in the top echelons of the administration stands out yet more when contrasted with their representation in the lowest ranks (i.e. 8th rank and below), where their overrepresentation only seems to be growing: from 66% of all workers in 1997, to 71% in 1999. Between 1993-1999, not one woman occupied the highest rank of the administrative or the technical classification, two of the most prestigious classifications in the service.

5.2. Tenders in the Civil Service

The method of appointments to the Civil Service through internal and external tenders is explained in the previous Report. While the increase of women's participation in internal job-tenders in the Civil Service, both as candidates and appointees, is quite constant, the situation in public tenders is far less positive. Beyond the overall decline in the number of female candidates and appointees through the tenders system, the trend which consistently tended to appoint women at a slightly higher rate relative to the rate of women who presented their candidacy was reversed in recent years. For example, while 38% of the candidates for public tenders in 1998 were women, they constituted only 36% of the appointees. All this is in spite of the affirmative action provisions in the 1996.

6. Women in Key Positions within Israel's Economy and Public Life

Women's general advancement in the past few years is also reflected in other key positions within the economy and public life occupied by women. Thus, for example, in the Ministry of Finance, the Supervisor on State's Income and the Supervisor on the Financial Market, Savings and Insurance are both women. In addition, women serve in positions of Chief Scientist in the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Science and the Ministry of Environment. Another precedent appointment has been the appointment of Ms. Orit Adato, former Chen (IDF Women's Corps) Commander to the position of Chief Commander of Israel's Prisons Service in May 2000.

7. The Judiciary

The number of women judges continues to increase, this in conjunction with the rising number of judges in general. In January 2001, there were 200 female judges (including three Christians and one Muslim female judges) out of a total of 459 judges, meaning that women constitute 43.6% of the judiciary in Israel. A comparison with 1999 data indicates that 14 of the 16 new appointments since 1999 were of women judges. Furthermore, the number of women Justices in the Supreme Court has impressively reached a proportion of 28.5% (4 out of 14 Supreme Court Justices) in 2000. In contrast, in more peripheral areas of the judicial field, such as labor courts, where lay people operate as public-representatives (representing employees and employers' unions) side by side with professional judges, only 12% of the public-representatives in 1999 were women. Significantly, women compose the majority of professional labor judges (60% of the judges, and 71% of the registrars).

Article 7 Political and Public Life

Women's relatively large representation in the judiciary is also evidenced in the public sector of the legal profession and is clearly related to it. The present State Attorney is a woman, and her predecessor was the first woman to serve in this role and was later appointed to the Supreme Court. In August 2000, in the State Attorney and the Attorney General offices, there were 325 women lawyers compared with 148 men, and 318 women public service attorneys compared with 163 men. In addition, six of the eight District Attorneys were women, as well as the heads of the Criminal Department, the Criminal Department for Special Issues, the Civil Department, the Labor Conflicts Department, the Fiscal Department, and many other senior positions ranking high in the Civil Service, in much higher proportions than any other ministry or Civil Service unit. All in all, 16 of the top 20 positions within the public sector of the legal profession are women.

8. Government Corporations

Data submitted by the Government Corporations Authority indicates a clear improvement over the years in women's general presence among board of directors, but far less encouraging data regarding women's participation as Board Chairs: in September 1999, 40% of the directors were women (235 compared to 364), a significant rise even from 1996, when 25.6% of the directors were women. However, there is still only one woman who serves as Chair of the Board of Directors, compared to 50 men, and only 8 women serve as director-generals of government corporations, compared to 73 men – data that shows no improvement in this realm over the years.

9. Women in the Military

9.1. The Legal Framework

In January 1999, a bill to amend the Defense Service Law [Consolidated Version] – 1986, providing for equal military service for men and women passed its first reading, and a year later it became law. This legislative change - which leaves no excuse for the continued differentiation between men's and women's military positions – is aimed to ensuring substantial equality in opportunities for placement and positions within the military, as well as in duties that accompany such positions which are designated by the Minister of Defense, according to the law. By enabling the army to demand a longer period of service from women who volunteer to the newly opened jobs, the army has de facto admitted its willingness to place women in such positions. This opening of new positions to women includes those previously referred to as “combat positions”, and the Chief of Staff has already issued instructions for inclusion of female soldiers in all combat areas, based solely on their qualifications. The only type of military vocation which remains closed to women's recruitment is infantry combat, as it involves specific physical qualifications which, according to military officials, are beyond women's capabilities. This inclusion is within the law's legitimate criteria for exemption.

This legislative “revolution” is clearly an answer to and a reflection of the opinion among the young women recruits themselves. According to IDF surveys of current women recruits, 78% of them believe that combat positions should be opened for women, and 70% believe that women should be allowed to serve in combat areas (such as Lebanon, before the Israeli withdrawal in May 2000).

9.1.1. Implementation of the Miller Case within the Air Force and beyond

The army has continued to take steps to implement the conclusions reached in the decision regarding the landmark Miller case, discussed in the previous Report. Female candidates have joined all pilot training courses opened since the decision was rendered, and the first female navigator graduated in December 1998.

The guidelines and instructions to adapt army policy regarding women's service to the reality of women combat pilots – including, amongst others, provisions for women pilot candidates to serve additional time and perform reserve duty, instructions regarding pregnancy, the potential performance of combat duty or duties in hostile territory according to the decision of the Commanding Officer of the Air Force, under the advisement of the Chief of Staff – have in fact served as a prelude to the present process whereby the whole organizational framework of women's military service is undergoing fundamental change. Indeed, changes are noticeable at all levels and in every realm, from the actual recruitment of women to the placement process, including the nature and length of service and there is a genuine willingness in the IDF to adopt gender-related changes. As of the draft of summer 2000, women recruits are to undergo a process of pre-selection just like men recruits, enabling them to make an advance decision on their preferences and allowing the army to fully assess the recruits' qualifications for their most efficient placement. Thus, women receive booklets delineating all the new occupations that are open to them, including both combat and non-combat options. According to IDF surveys, 37% of the women new recruits already express interest in serving as pilots, a similar rate as that of the men recruits.

During 1999, women already began training in combat related occupations, such as in border surveillance, as combat task officers, and in armor divisions – this following the Chief of Staff's instructions on the inclusion of female soldiers in all combat areas, as mentioned above. The training for these positions is the same for men and women, and women who volunteer for these positions will have to sign up for a 30 months service (compared to the mandatory 21 months service for women, and 36 months service for men).

In addition, a recent decision, approved by the Chief of Staff, concludes that women will serve in the reserve forces until they reach the age of 38 (30 for women in combat positions). Pregnant women and mothers will be exempted from this reserve duty.

Within the military's special preparation and arrangement for women's entrance into all military jobs, particularly notable are the adjustment what is known of as "strain ruler" to women's physiological capabilities as well as the adaptation of specific military equipment (such as shoes) to women's needs.

The following tables compare data from 1995 and 2000, regarding the amount of time men and women serve in a certain rank before being promoted, and at what average age they receive these promotions. The comparison shows continuing differences between men and women, as the latter must invest significantly more time before being promoted to higher ranks.

9.2.2. Distribution of Men and Women among Jobs in the Military

On the level of job stratification along gender lines – the fuller integration of women within the army has made clear headway. While 70% of the jobs open to women in the late seventies were in clerical positions, in 1999 – prior to the complete opening up of most military jobs to women, less than a quarter of the women soldiers served in clerical positions. The following chart depicts some other data regarding the profound changes in the distribution of women among jobs in the military, throughout the last decade. Note that the “quality” job category includes jobs that require higher personal qualifications and longer training courses.

9.2.3. Women Scientists and Engineers in the I.D.F.

An in depth examination of women as scientists and engineers in the I.D.F., appears in a recent report by the National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology. The report reveals that female officers in engineering roles are mostly in the lower ranks, both professionally and formally (30% of academic professional officers, but only 0.4% senior academic officers; 29% of lieutenants, 0% of colonels), as can be seen in the following table:

Table 5 - Engineers in Career Service, by Rank (percents)

	Academic Professional		Lieutenant	Captain	Major	Lt. Colonel	Colonel	Brigadier

Women	30	0.4	29	6	12	3	0	0

The Women's Corps in the I.D.F. has initiated several programs intended to promote female soldiers and officers and to support them in their careers. These programs include workshops on empowerment, women's status and career planning. The Women's Corps is also responsible for special programs, designed to encourage prospective female candidates to go into technological careers. However, the number of women receiving deferments in order to undertake technological studies before their military service is low and has actually declined over the past two years, as depicted in the following table:

9.2.4. Exemptions from the Military

The next chart portrays the distribution of reasons for exemptions from the Military for men and women. Overall, the rate of exempted persons is higher for women than for men (37% compared to 21%), mainly because many more women are discharged from the army on religious grounds (26% compared to 7% of the men).

9.3. The Chen – Women’s Corps

Since 1997, as part of the overall Gender reform process within the army, the posts of Chen (the Women's Corps, see previous Report) officers within each unit were virtually abolished. Similar to male recruits, women soldiers are now subject to the commandment of units' officers for all purposes, including disciplinary and judicial matters. Regional Chen officers remain, serving as a resort to female soldiers who face problems such as sexual harassment, gender-based discrimination, or gynecological problems. In subjecting female soldiers to the direct supervision of the unit officers, in a similar manner to that of the male soldiers, another barrier to women's full integration in the army has been crossed.

9.4. Sexual Harassment in the Army

Sexual harassment of women within the army remains a problem. Yet, parallel to the ongoing revolution in women's entry into all military jobs mentioned above, the army is undergoing a process of change in its treatment of sexual harassment. Among the events which have prompted this change have been the enactment of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law – 1998, the Galili and Mordechai affairs discussed under Article 5, and the intensive pressure exerted by the Knesset Committee on the Advancement of Women as well as other women's organizations.

Expression of this change has been found, amongst other things, in the publication of a semi-annual report on sexual harassment in the army, which includes the number of complaints and their outcomes, thus precluding any possibility of cover-up. Furthermore, various services, such as a 24 hours hotline for sexual harassment complaints and a program in which victims of sexual harassment are provided with the counseling of a Chen officer, have been operating since 1996.

A comprehensive program aimed at dealing with the phenomenon of sexual harassment in the army which has also been implemented since 1996 has undergone adjustments to conform to the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law - 1998, with most instructions emanating from the Chief of Staff's office coming into effect in April 2000. These instructions provide a broad definition of sexual harassment, emphasizing that it may be verbal or physical, and that it may involve explicit as well as implicit exploitation of an authoritative position. They also obligate commanders to report all instances of grave physical harassment (such as rape or forced indecent act) to the military police, even if the victim refuses to complain. In 1999, the army began screening a movie on sexual harassment to all new female recruits, which explains the differences between legitimate courtship and sexual harassment. The movie was to be screened to all new male recruits as well.

The policy has borne fruits. The past few years have witnessed an increase with respect to complaints of sexual harassment in the army. More complaints – 54.7% in 1999 – were transferred to the military police instead of being dealt with through disciplinary proceedings within the units. The new instructions further mandate a maximum length of time (45 days) that the investigative procedures in harassment cases should not exceed. Most significant has been the change in policy regarding the punishments imposed on career soldiers convicted of sexual harassment, who are now expected to be discharged from the army. Indeed, in the first half of 1999, out of 35 convictions in sexual harassment of career soldiers, 30 were discharged from service. In general, it can be said that sexual harassment is no longer trivialized by the military, and is viewed not just as a "women's problem", but rather as part of a larger social problem.

10. Women in the Police

10.1 The Legal Framework

As in the army, significant changes were also made regarding women in the Israeli Police since the Initial Report.

Police regulations prescribe that no difference should be made in the recruitment of men and women within the police force. In addition, they insure - in principle – that all positions within the police force will be open to women and that they be paid salaries on par with those paid to men with equivalent positions.

Current Police recruitment practices are largely a result of a 1996 petition presented to the High Court of Justice by women who contended that they had suffered from discrimination in the context of their recruitment and promotion within the Israel Police Force. The High Court of Justice ordered the Police Force to explain the discrimination against women recruits and come-up with a plan to promote the equality of women within the force. As a direct result of this Court injunction, a committee was set up to recommend measures intended to promote effective equality for women within the Israel Police. Among the recommended measures:

- A declaration of principles guiding the police force, underlining a clear intent on its part to promote equal opportunities for women
- Raising the numbers of women serving in the force to at least 25% within a decade
- Finding appropriate women candidates for designated positions, encouraging specifically the recruitment and promotion of women in ranks and positions where women are under-represented
- Locating female officers in order to fill territorial-command positions
- Setting up a committee overseeing the application of the above measures

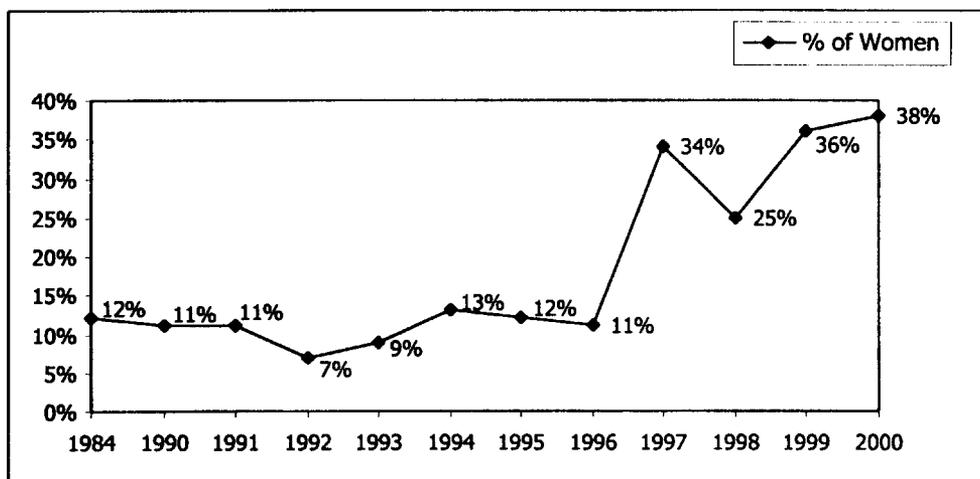

In addition, internal instruction giving priority in recruitment and in promotions to veterans of IDF combat units were abolished. In April 1999, the High Court of Justice gave its final decision in the case, accepting in essence the police position showing the significant advances made in promoting women within the Israeli Police.

10.2. Women in the Police – Field Data

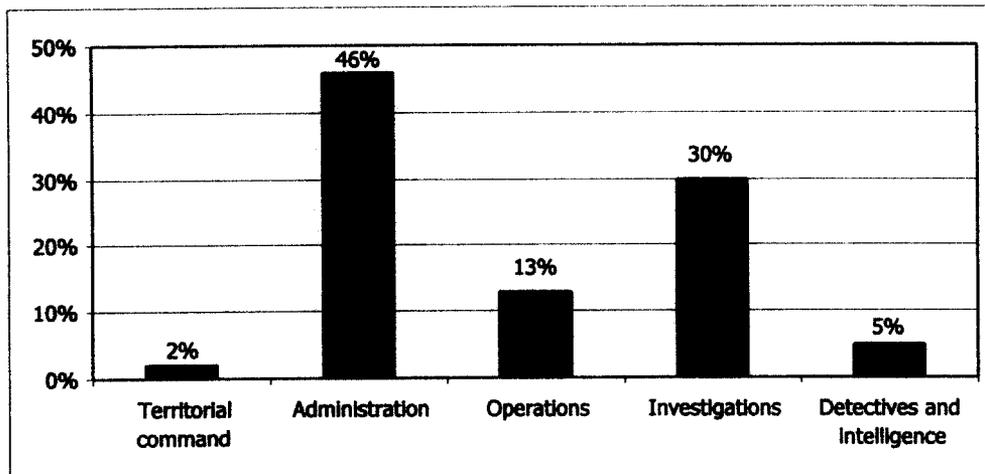

Altogether, women make up 23% of the police force, and 21% of the permanent police force. Since 1996, largely as a result of the aforementioned reforms, the proportion of women serving in the police force has continually increased, in accordance with the substantial increase in the rate of women among new recruits, as can be seen in the following chart:

Chart 5 - Recruitment of Women, Various Years

Source: Israel Police Unpublished Data, 2000.

However, the increase in the proportion of women in the police has not affected all positions equally. Of 178 different positions available within the force, 70 have few or no women within their ranks. Women are strongly represented in administrative positions (where they make up 46% of the force) and are well represented in the investigations department (where they make up 30% of the force), but are noticeably under-represented in positions of territorial command as well as in intelligence and detective units (where they make up only 2% and 5% respectively).

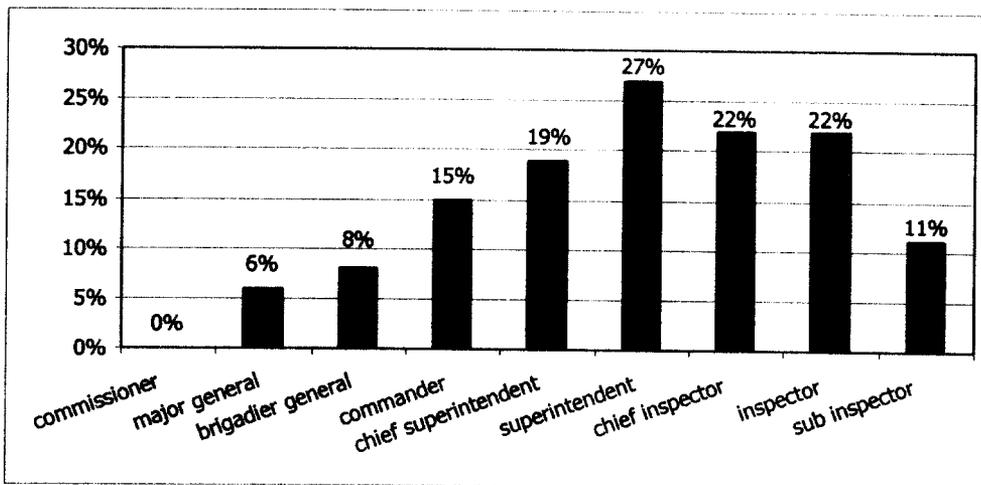

Chart 6 - Percentage of Women in Police Career Service, 2000

Source: Israel Police Unpublished Data, 2000.

The above numbers indicate that women systematically serve in positions which are characterized by psychological or behavioral sensitivity, in addition to traditional clerical work. In contrast to this, they are seldom present in patrol positions requiring the application of physical force – for example, scattering protests, capturing criminals, etc. Although the police have tried to justify this policy, the Kremnitzer Committee (an investigative committee on police violence, operated in 1995/96) has recommended the inclusion of women within the active police force as a means to soften the contact between police and citizens.

Furthermore, women seem to be under-represented in the higher ranks of the police force while being over-represented in the lower echelons of the force. Indeed, only one woman today serves in a position of police-station commander, and none serves as district or sub-district commander to date.

Source: Israel Police Unpublished Data, 2000.

10.3. Women in the Border Police

The number of women in the Border Police is continually increasing. Of the women serving in the Border Police at present, 23% serve in combat-related positions where they perform combat missions like their male counterparts, 38% of the women serve at different border-passages as border controllers, 18% serve as guards in public places, performing standard security duties and 21% serve in administrative positions.

10.4. Sexual Harassment within the Police Force

Even before the passing of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law in 1998, the Police sought to act against the phenomenon of sexual harassment within its ranks. Among the different measures adopted were the enactment of directives expressing the responsibilities and duties of the police in dealing with sexual harassment cases within its ranks, activities of information and explanation in the midst of the police force (including the publication of reports on sexual harassment within the police and reports of inappropriate treatment of harassment cases), and an improvement in the treatment and punishment of harassment cases, including both judicial and administrative measures.

Beyond these measures, during 2000 a survey was conducted to evaluate the extent of the sexual harassment phenomenon in the police. Questionnaires were distributed to all policewomen, with a return rate of 28%. The survey's results were published and disseminated at all levels of the police force – as well as in the national press - thus reinforcing consciousness of the widespread nature of the phenomenon of sexual harassment.

Among the survey's findings:

- 12.5% of the women serving in the police have been exposed to some form of sexual harassment, with 3.3% exposed to actual sexual assault
- sexual harassment by superiors was less wide-spread, though more damaging than sexual harassment by colleagues
- women-victims of sexual harassment rarely deal with their plight by turning to outside help

The extent of sexual harassment within the police did not exceed that of other professions, or of other police forces worldwide.

International Representation and Participation

1. Women's Representation in the Foreign Service

The issue of international representation is an integral part of the discussion regarding the status of women in the State of Israel.

First, it should be noted that in recent years more women enter the Foreign Service as cadets, as exhibited in Chart 1.

Chart 1 - Percentage of Women New Recruits, 1972-1999

Source: Ministry of Foreign Affairs

The Foreign Ministry has noted that the percentage of women, taking the test for the Cadet Course, remained the same percentage of women admitted for the course.

The Foreign Ministry and the diplomatic missions are composed of an Administrative Wing and a Diplomatic Wing (which, in it, consists of an Administrative-External Section and a Political Section). The rate of women within the Political Section of the Diplomatic Wing is considerably lower than their rate in other parts of the Foreign Service (20% compared to 55%, in 2000).

The following table further details the rate of women within the Diplomatic Wing of the Foreign Service, by ranks:

2. Women Representatives and Independent Experts in International Organizations

Currently, Israel's delegation to the UN consists of men in diplomat positions only; in summer 2001; a woman is expected to join this delegation. In addition, Israel has two women independent experts for UN human rights Treaty bodies: The Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women (Prof. Frances Raday) and the Convention on the Rights of the Child (Deputy Attorney General Yehudit Karp). Furthermore, 18 Israeli women, headed by the then Minister of Environment, Dalia Itzik, participated in the "Beijing+5" women's convention, held in New York in 2000.

Article 9

Nationality

As explained in the previous Report, Israeli citizenship and residency laws do not differentiate between men and women. Both genders have equal rights with regard to acquiring, changing or retaining their nationality or residency. Neither the change of nationality by one member of a couple nor marriage to a non-citizen has any effect on one's citizenship. According to the laws relating to citizenship acquired by birth, both the father's and mother's citizenship carries equal weight.

An interesting development took place since the previous Report with respect to same-sex couples, as explained under Article 16 below: In recent years, the Ministry of Interior had adopted a policy (that is equivalent to its policy towards heterosexual non-marital cohabitants), awarding homosexual foreign partners of Israeli citizens residents status.

Article 10

Education

1. Legal Developments

Two recent legislative measures seek to expand the concept of free education for all in Israel. According to the Long School Day Law-1997, which was passed shortly before the submission of the previous Report, the duration of the school day shall be extended to eight hours. Although this Law formally applies throughout the country, due to budgetary restraints, it has only been implemented in peripheral areas thus far. In 1999 the Knesset voted on a ten-year gradual implementation plan of the 1984 amendment to the Compulsory Education Law – 1949, providing free nursery school education for ages 3-4. Here too, the implementation of this amendment has been postponed until recently, due to budgetary constraints.

In addition, a mention should be made of the 2000 amendment to the Women's Equal Rights Law - 1951, according to which, "Any woman and man have the equal right to an existence in human dignity, including equality...in education".

2. Illiteracy Rates and Educational Levels

The total rate of illiterate persons, defined as persons who have had less than four years of education, is on a continuing fall, as exhibited in the following table:

A comparison between the data presented here and the data submitted in the previous Report reveals an overall improvement in the level of illiteracy within all population groups. Thus, while in 1995, 6.4% of all Jewish women and 3.5% of all Jewish men were considered illiterate; the 1999 figures have decreased, respectively, to 5% and 2.7%. At the same time, the rate of illiterate Arab women fell from 20.2% to 16.2%, and the rate of illiterate Arab men fell from 9.1% to 8%.

3. High Schools in Israel

3.1 General and Technological / Vocational Tracking

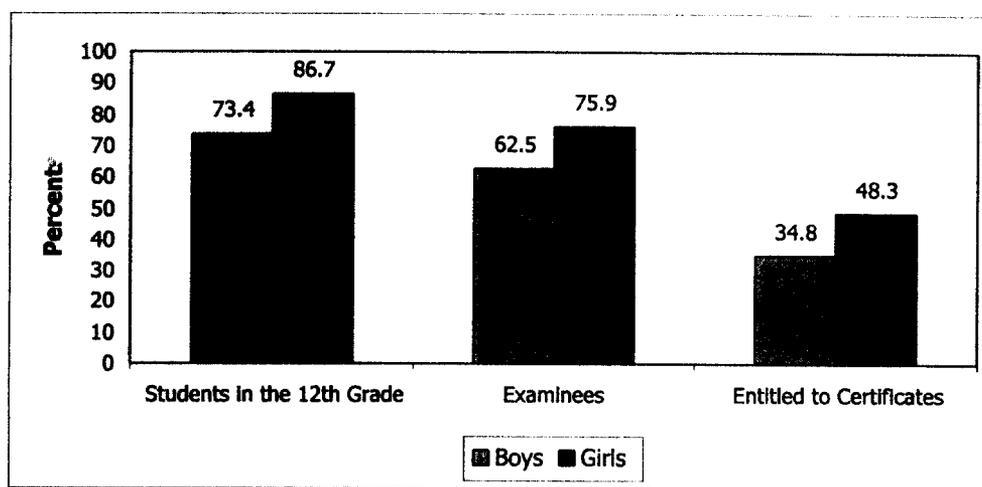

The Israeli secondary-education system is composed of both technological/vocational and general high schools. Most of the students that take their matriculation exams study in the general schools. In 1996, 71% of the girls in 12th grade studied in the general track, while only 58% of the boys in 12th grade studied in the general track.

3.2. Matriculation Levels

Article 10. Education

In terms of matriculation examinations and success, girls consistently fare better than boys. More girls than boys take the exams, and their success rate is higher than their counterparts. In 1999, 86.5% of all girls within the 12th grade age group studied in school, compared with only 73.5% of the boys. Girls' entitlement to matriculation degree was also much higher, and stood at 48.5% of all the age group, compared with less than 35% of the boys.

Among the Arab Population, boys' eligibility rates were higher than girls' until the mid-1990s, but since then the situation there has resembled that in the Jewish population: a majority of girls among those taking the exams and among those eligible for certificates.

Other gender differences are evidenced when inspecting the levels of the exams taken by both boys and girls. The 2:1 ratio of boys to girls in the five points math matriculation level, measured in 1985, remained almost the same in 1999, when 21.7% of the boys who took the math matriculation exam, but only 13.5% of the girls, took the enhanced five points level. The success rates, however, were generally higher for girls than for boys, as shown in the following table:

However, while girls do better than boys in the matriculation exams, more boys than girls take enhanced scientific exams, which are critical for acceptance to universities. Thus, while more girls than boys pass the exams, fewer girls meet the minimum requirements for acceptance to university. In 1999, for example, while 88.2% of boys who passed their exams met these requirements, only 85.6% of girls did so. This marks an improvement since 1996, when only 82.1% of girls met the requirements, as opposed to 84.3% of boys.

3.3. Education Rates, Attendance Rates and Drop-Out Rates

Parallel to the decrease in illiteracy rates, educational levels in Israel have been steadily increasing throughout all population groups. Within the Jewish population, the median educational level (namely the number of school-years which half the population is below and the other half is above) for men and women have always been close. The small gap that did exist has finally vanished in 1998, when the median education level for both Jewish men and women reached 12.4. Within the non-Jewish population the gender educational gaps had been much larger, but they too are decreasing. Thus, Arab men's level rose from 10.6 in 1995 to 11 in 1998, whereas Arab women's level rose from 9.7 in 1995 to 10.4 in 1998. Moreover, among non-Jewish youth the gender gap is altogether diminishing. In 1998 the median educational level of non-Jewish boys and girls aged 15-17 was the same (10.6), and the level of 18-24 years old women was even higher than that of men (11.9 and 11.8 respectively).

Another important indicator of school performance is the rate of attendance. Among the non-Jewish population, there has been a dramatic increase in the overall attendance rate. The increase in this sector is much greater for girls than for boys, resulting in a growing attendance gap, in favor of girls, within the non-Jewish population. For instance, in 1998/99, the attendance rate of non-Jewish girls stood at 83.5%, while the rate for non-Jewish boys was 75.3%, an attendance gap of 8.2%. The 1994/5 gap was a mere 3.5% (deriving from attendance rates of 69.2% and 65.7% for non-Jewish girls and boys, respectively).

Higher attendance rates for girls is also characteristic of the Jewish education: 98.2% and 92.9% respectively. More detailed data can be found in the following table.

Supplementing this information dropout rates should also be indicated. Nearly 15,000 boys and 7,000 girls in grades 9-11 dropped out of school in 1997/8. The dropout rates in the Jewish system are 8% of boys and 4% of girls. Dropout rates are substantially higher in the Arab system, and here, too, the dropout rate among boys exceeds that among girls (18% and 10%, respectively).

4. Activities and Educational Programs Adopted by the Ministry of Education in order to Prevent Discrimination

4.1. Gender Stereotypes within School Books

Following similar activities in the Jewish education, described in the previous Report, attempts have been made to remove stereotypical messages from textbooks used within the Arab sector in recent years. Inasmuch as sincere efforts were made to follow this policy, the 1999 State Comptroller Report revealed that the Ministry of Education lacks the means to implement it, and very few of the school books actually undergo review. Consequently, the Minister of Education has decided to “lift the advanced censorship” over the school books, while maintaining the policy of prohibiting the use of books that still contain racist or sexist messages.

4.2. Other Instructions and Intervention Programs of the Ministry of Education which Aim to Prevent Discrimination

The highlight of the Ministry of Education initiatives aiming at preventing discrimination has been the Equality 2000 project, which was implemented in 1996 as an experimental project, initiated by the Israel Women’s Network. In its experimental phase, the project was a three year long intervention program intended to be carried out within several different middle schools, involving 10-15 teachers within each school who were specifically trained to deal with issues of gender-equality. Following the experimental phase which included 1 elementary school, 4 middle schools and 1 nursery teachers advanced school, the program is currently being implemented in more schools, and is rapidly becoming a permanent part of the Ministry's curriculum. Its methodology, though, was slightly changed to reach more educators capable of acting as agents of change. It contains elements of both a research project and an active intervention program; it is meant to bring about change in the attitudes and behavior of teachers, advisors, administrators, students and parents regarding gender equality.

Additional activities overseen by the Education Ministry in the last few years with an aim at encouraging gender equality have included the preparation of an anthology in the Arabic language – “Women within the Ranks”, the opening of courses on gender equality in teachers’ training colleges as well as the organization of study seminars on gender equality for various kinds of educators. The last two years have seen the opening of gender-equality departments in 13 pedagogic centers (9 in the Jewish sector, 4 in the Arab sector), as well as various intervention programs in some 30 schools, in addition to short-term seminars on gender equality in 10 municipalities (6 in the Jewish sector, 3 in the Arab sector, 1 mixed).

In addition to all of these, there are plans to make gender equality the Education Ministry’s main overall theme for the 2001-2002 academic year.

The Supervisor estimates that to date some 5,000 school and kindergarten teachers have been exposed to the program. This was achieved through a sharp increase in the budgeting of the program, from 300,000 NIS in 1999 to more than 2,000,000 NIS in 2000 (approximately $500,000). The budget for 2001 is expected to stay the same.

5. Sex Education and Education on Family Life

In addition to its advancement within the Jewish sector in the last few years, as discussed in detail in the previous Report, sex and family life education have been growingly promoted in the Arab sector as well in recent years. Professional advisors have been trained to work with teachers of adolescents, and nationwide conventions and group-training sessions have been held. Arabic language curricula, adapted to Arab society, have been created and taught by advisors, counselors and teachers belonging to the Arab community. It should be noted, however, that sex education has not been promoted in the Druze or Bedouin communities thus far, due to particular sensitivities to such issues.

In 1994 and 1997 the Education Ministry issued guidelines emphasizing the importance of teaching students about classroom violence and child abuse, and as noted in the previous Report, programs on gender violence constitute an integral part of the sex education curriculum. The past few years, however, have witnessed a rise in sexual violence within the school system. Concerns have been expressed about the educational system’s ability to deal with this alarming phenomenon, and some of the criticism has been directed towards alleged deficiencies within the sex education curriculum. Thus for example, critics have noted that teachers, who are not required to study sexuality as part of their training, are in many ways unequipped to deal with questions students may have on the issue.

6. The State Religious Education

The Israeli school system is made up of various types of schools, including State, State-religious, and ultra-orthodox independent "recognized" schools. The ultra-orthodox schools which, in 1999 comprised close to 14% of Jewish primary schools and about 10% of Jewish secondary schools have always maintained separation between boys and girls. State religious secondary education has also traditionally been separate, and in the past few years, such separation has been increasing in elementary state religious schools as well. In both streams, sex-segregate education entails various curricula differences, although these do not necessarily imply lesser quality or lower resources for girls' education.

In State religious schools (which comprised in 1999 21% of all primary schools and about 18.5% of the post primary schools), especially within elementary schools, the main difference between the girls and boys is in the religious subjects. Currently, however, a slow change is taking place in State religious schools in this respect, as more and more girls' schools have added, as an independent initiative, the study of Gemara (the oral Jewish law), previously exclusively designated for boys, to the curriculum.

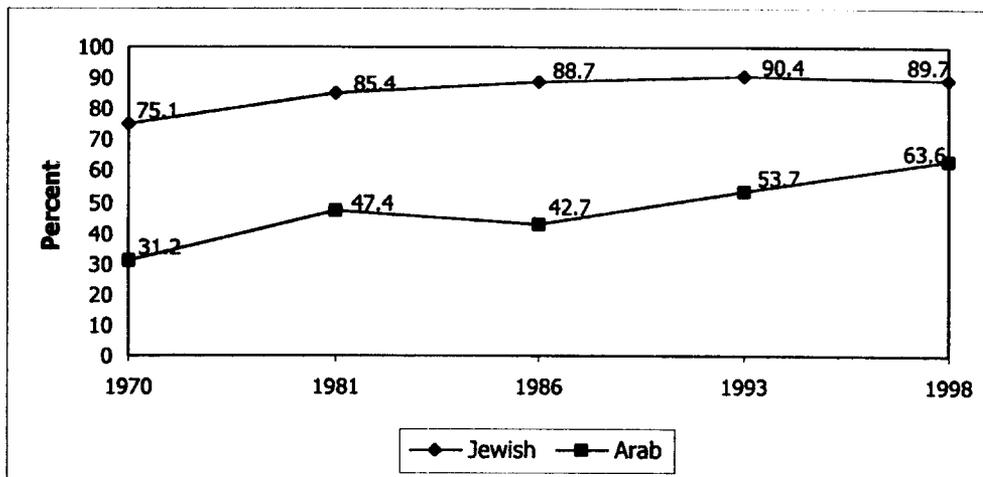

Another positive and gradual change that is taking place within the State Religious Education is in relation to the educational programs dealing, as a whole, with the issues of sex-education, gender-equality, and the advancement of women. All these are dealt with under the topic of Family-Life Education, since officially, there is no explicit topic of sex-education under the State Religious Education. The State Religious Education has recently initiated a program to adapt the main anthology used by the general education system for gender-equality education to the framework of the religious educational system.

7. Teachers

7.1. Teaching as a Feminine Profession

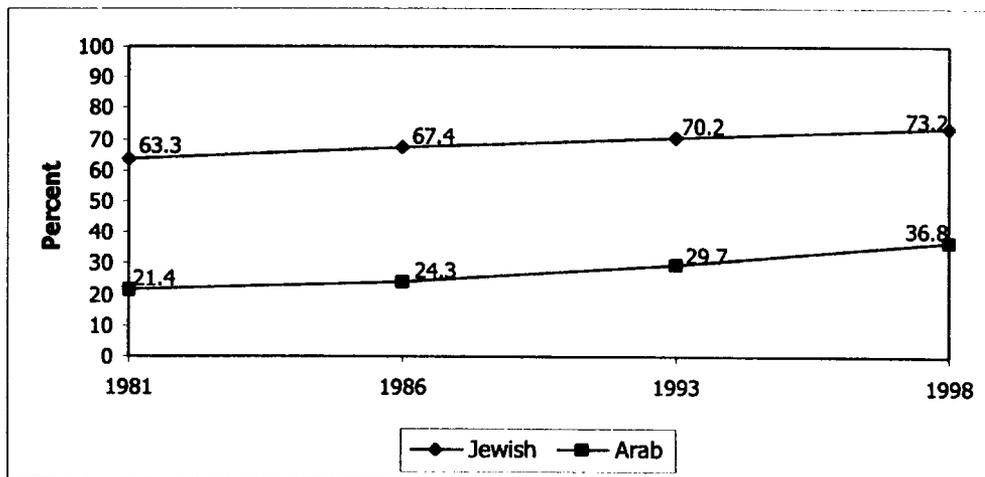

As noted in the previous Report, the teaching profession in Israel is composed primarily of women. Moreover, the percentage of women teachers has been steadily increasing throughout the past number of years, as depicted in the following charts. The charts portray two other interesting findings: First, the gap between the sexes within the teaching profession among Arabs is considerably smaller and second, as the level of the educational institution increases, the female majority of teachers decreases.

7.2. Teachers' Salaries

Notwithstanding the predominance of women in the teaching profession, their position within this profession is inferior to that of men. This is evidenced by their comparative salary levels and by their representation among high ranking administrative positions within the profession. Inequality exists in the salary levels of men and women working within the educational system. Statistics reflect this relative inequality among the teaching staff. Data supplied by the Treasury Ministry in 2000 regarding teachers' salaries who are employed by the Ministry of Education for full-time work reveals that overall, women earn on average 91% of men's salaries. Although this figure portrays a significant improvement from the 87% ratio measured in 1996, it still suggests that future steps should to be taken in order to eliminate any trace of inequality.

The tables below, which detail the rate of teachers in each salary level, further illustrate the differences in salaries of men and women within the education system.

The clear trend in all teachers' groups is the increase in their academic level, expressed in the growing rate of the third, second and first degrees' salary levels. While the trend is slower to reach the Arab educational system, it is nonetheless evidenced there as well, at the first-degree level. However, the gender gaps remain stable, particularly in the Jewish system, where over 60% of the men teachers are at the top two levels, while 80% of the women teachers are at the second and third levels.

As with the case of salary levels, an examination of authoritative-administrative positions reveals that the number of men working in educational institutions increases with the level of the position and the institution. In 1997/98, men made up 37.6% of all principals in elementary schools, and 67.3% of all high school principals. Further examination reveals that the extent of inequality is far greater for the Arab sector, as shown in the table below.

7.4. Teachers Training Colleges

Data concerning teachers training colleges illustrates that the rate of women teachers is unlikely to drop in the near future. Throughout the last decade the rate of men training to be teachers has remained around the 15%-17% interval, a small increase from previous decades' figures. In contrast, the amount of Arab men training to become teachers has dropped dramatically. Although during 1969/70 they made up almost half of those in teacher training programs, Arab men made up less than 8% of the Arab students in teachers training colleges by 1999/00.

8. Physical Education and Sports

Sport funding in Israel comes from the sports authority under the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport, as well as from local municipalities and the lottery. A number of recent court decisions have further regulated the issue of women's sport funding in Israel.

For instance, the regulations of the Union of Basketball in Israel stipulated that the men's national league was allowed to sign foreign players, while the women's league was not.

Furthermore, the men's league was allowed to spend more money than the women's league. While the District Court had invalidated these regulations as being contrary to public policy and to the express provisions of the Sports Law, the Supreme Court had accepted the Union's appeal on formal grounds. Nevertheless, the internal tribunal of the Sports Union had later accepted the claim of discrimination, and women's league is now equal to the men's with respect to those regulations.

However, funding was still only half of that of men's teams. Once again, the intervention of the courts had to be sought. This time it was the team of "Elitzur Holon", one of the leading women's basketball teams in the country and in Europe, which had appealed to the High Court of Justice to force the city of Holon to employ equal criteria in funding men's and women's teams. Following a compromise that was reached at the High Court of Justice, a committee, headed by Chief Justice Dov Levin was formed. The committee established rules for equal distribution and allocation of funding for sport teams by local municipalities. The head of the Unit for the Advancement of Women in Sports estimates that some municipalities abide by these rules.

The Elitzur case had also prompted the establishment of the Israeli Foundation for the Advancement of Women in Sports in 1997, which aims at increasing girls' education on physical fitness, promoting sports among girls, and encouraging and nurturing girls and women with athletic promise through scholarships. The foundation has already engaged in countrywide self-defense classes for girls, and established special programs to advance girls' sports in Arab, Druze and Bedouin villages in the Galilee. Some other encouraging developments took place in 1997: A national women's soccer league was established, including a national women's team and a junior team; an annual women's walk under the title "Women Go Far" was established, drawing many thousands of women from all around the country to celebrate women's physical activities.

As all these developments were taking place, Israeli women athletics have had some very impressive achievements in competitions, better than their male counterparts. In 1999, Ramat Hasharon women's basketball team reached the finals of the prestigious European Roncati tournament before being narrowly defeated; the girls' team of Kiryat-Sharet School in Holon had won the World Schools basketball championship; Israel's women's fencing champion won the bronze medal in the World Youth Fencing Championship; and two Israeli women sailors placed fourth in the finals of the World Sailing Competition.

There has also been a mild rise in the participation of women in the Olympic Games, over the years, as the chart below indicates:

Table 10 - Athletes in the Olympic Games, 1992, 1996, 2000

	Barcelona (1992)		Atlanta (1996)		Sydney (2000)
	Percent	Percent	Percent	Percent	Percent	Percent
Total Athletes	30	100%	33	100%	40	100%
Male	26	87%	25	76%	30	75%
Female	4	13%	8	24%	10	25%

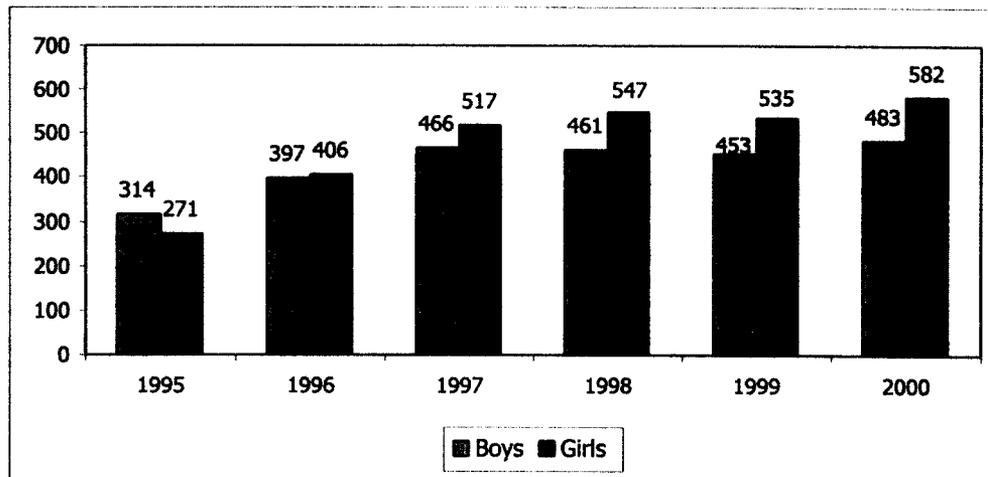

This, quite obviously, is not an extreme change. All in all, it indicates a general trend within society, towards recognition of women as an integral part of Israeli sports.

One of the most important tasks is to allow women to play a bigger role, not only in the sporting activities themselves, but also in the various decisions making bodies and managerial roles.

The Sports Association for Schools has set itself the goals of enhancing the number of female students, involved in competitive sport and the training of women for managerial roles within the Association itself and beyond. Another aim is to change the views of female school principals with regards to sporting activities on the school premises and create a more sympathetic and positive environment for such activities.

On the practical level, the Association decided that every sport club, at the school, should include at least one competitive group for girls as well as for boys. This is to be a pre-condition for recognition and support by the Association and is to be implemented by all parts of the population.

It is important to take notice of the fact that the female group was given 50% more than its male counterpart, budget-wise. At a later stage, that affirmative action was abandoned, after it had been decided that the transition period for affirmative action was over and it was time to allow an uninterrupted development.

Chart 5 - Number of Sport Groups in Schools, by Gender, 1995-2000

Source: Ministry of Education, Unit for the Advancement of Women in Sports

As exhibited in the chart above, the number of girls' sport groups exceeds that of boys groups. This is a result of the special emphasis given to girls' sports group by the Sports Association for Schools. This is an indication that when formal support frameworks are put in place, female participants are easily drawn.

The issue of increasing female managerial involvement has also been dealt with in recent years. Nowadays, women hold 3 out of the 10 management positions within the Association.

On the other hand, the Israeli Olympic Committee includes only 2 women out of 31 members of the board (6%) and only 6 women are members of the Olympic Plenum (6%). The overall percentage of women active in the field of competitive sports was 12% in 1994 and has increased to 14% in the year 2000.

9. Higher Education

9.1. Women as Students

The proportion of women among all students has been rising steadily - from 43.3% in the 1987/88 academic year to 56.8% in 1998/99.

In addition, women today constitute a majority among first, second, and, for the first time, third degree students. However, as the following table and chart depict women continue to concentrate in the humanities and are less likely to enter fields such as Mathematics, Sciences and Engineering.

Ever since the mid-1980's women's enrollment rates in universities have been significantly higher than the rates of men. Moreover, the gap between the sexes in enrollment rates is steadily increasing, as can be seen from the following table:

Aside from State universities, a number of alternative institutions of higher education, and institutions which grant diplomas other than bachelor's, master's and doctorate degrees exist in Israel. The following table shows that while women make up more than half of the total students, it is apparent that their representation in technology, economics and business administration is particularly low. While women comprised 84% of the teachers training colleges' students and 69% of the communication students, they made up only 24% of the students of technology sciences.

9.2. Minorities in Higher Education

Among non-Jewish communities in Israel, the number of female students decreases as the educational level increases. Within the Moslem population in Israel, still more Moslem men receive higher education than do Moslem women. Nevertheless, a significant increase in non-Jewish women's entry into higher education has been taking place, and their participation among non-Jewish students in general has grown more than four-fold in twenty years, from 8.9% in 1971/72 to 41% in 1992/93.

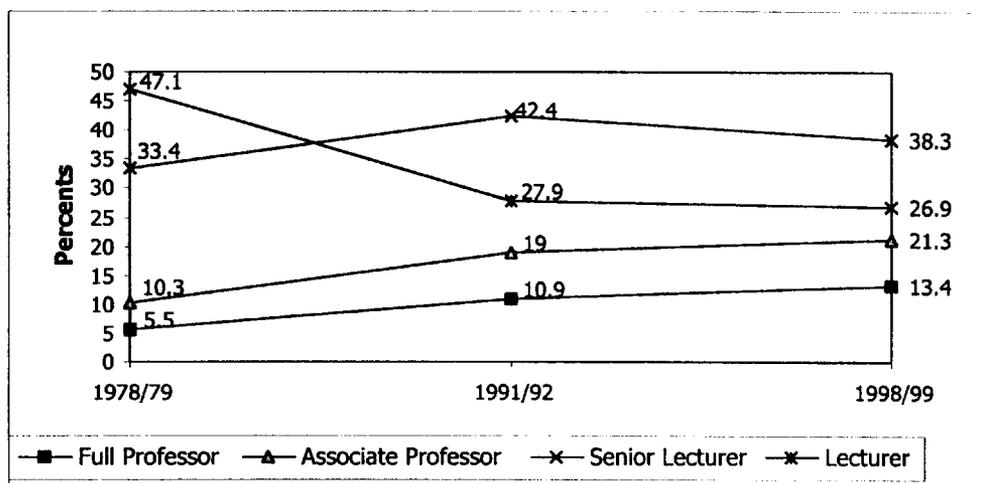

9.3. Women on the Academic Staff

Article 10 Education

9.3.1. General Data

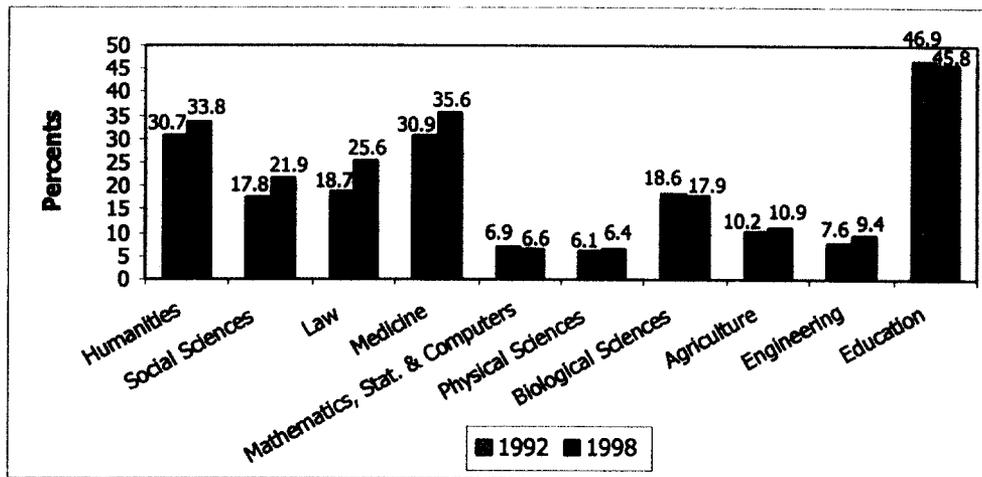

In 1998/99, women represented 22.4% of senior academic staff financed by the Council for Higher Education budget, compared to their 20% rate in 1992/93. Although there is clearly an increase in the number of women across the ranks, it seems that as the rank increases, the percentage of women at given rank decreases, as exhibited in the following chart.

Chart 7 - Percentage of Women among Senior Staff, Various Years

Source: Council for Higher Education, Planning and Budgeting Committee

The following chart shows the rate of women in each academic field. The chart illustrates that while women represent a relatively large proportion of the senior academic staff in fields such as the humanities and medicine, they constitute a relatively small proportion of senior academic staff in the physical sciences, mathematics, computer science, engineering and agriculture. The chart also portrays an impressive increase in the rate of women within fields such as law, the social sciences, humanities and medicine.

Chart 8 - Women as Senior Academic Staff, by Subject, 1992, 1998

Source: Council for Higher Education 2000

The next table shows the stratification of women in the senior academic staff, compared to the general stratification of all senior academic staff. Some gradual progress is noticeable by comparing this data with the data contained in the previous Report. For example, the rate of women among all full professors stood at 8.6% in 1997/98 (compared to 7.3% in 1992/93). At the same time, the rate of women as associate professors increased from 14.2% to 18.7%, and their rate as senior lecturers rose from 30% to 33.1%. Other significant increases are evident in the rate of women among almost all ranks in the field of law, in which, for instance, 25.3% of senior lecturers (compared to merely 7% in 1992/93) were women.

Interestingly, Prof. Nina Toren of the Hebrew University, who conducted a thorough study of women on the academic staff in Israel, notes that despite the fact that women are better represented overall in the humanities, they actually fare better in the exact sciences with regard to advancement in the academic ranks. In the humanities, women faculty tend to be far more concentrated at the lower levels, while in the sciences they are more evenly distributed among the academic ranks. Toren attributes this phenomenon to the greater objectivity of evaluation criteria in the sciences. Toren's study further demonstrates that as the age of the department increases so do the chances of finding women professors in that department. This study also shows that the growth of the number of women in a department will increase their power, which influences their chances to reach the level of full professor. As women's power grows within the department, through the number of professors, the number of women in that field of study increases. In addition, larger departments advance more women to the position of professor. It was also found that female professors with more children (3-4), were found to publish more articles, while single female professors were the least professionally productive. These findings stood in stark contrast to the widespread belief that being both a mother and a wife has a negative effect on one's professional productivity.

Women's under-representation in higher education, especially in senior ranks, has begun to draw attention in the past few years. The Knesset Committee on the Status of Women dedicated several sessions to discuss the problem, and has urged the various institutes of higher education to appoint special internal advisors on the status of women. The most recent attempt of the Knesset Committee to generate change in this area is the establishment in early 2000 of a Forum for the Promotion of Women in Science and Academia, headed by Prof. Toren, with the cooperation of the Council on Higher Education.

Another initiative to improve the situation is the establishment of the Israel Association for Feminist Studies in early 1998. Among its aims is the advancement of gender and feminist research and studies in Israel, and the creation of a network of support for those engaging in these fields within Israeli academia. It is also hoped that the Association will serve as a vehicle to advance women within the academic world in general.

9.3.2. Arab-Israeli Women in the Academic Staff

According to a 1999 "Sikkuy" Association report, the rate of Arabs amongst academic staff, which numbers approximately 5000 people, is extremely low, as only 50 (1%) Arabs are members of the Academic staff. In light of this reality, the Maof Program has been set up to encourage the promotion of young outstanding scientists within the Arab-Israeli sector, with the explicit intention of integrating them within academia at the rank of lecturer, including 3 years' financing and a commitment of permanent integration within the standard framework. The founding of this program can be attributed to a study conducted within the academic staff in Israel pointing to a very low proportion of Arab academic lecturers within Israeli academia. During the six cycles of the program which has taken place since 1996, there have been 36 candidates and 26 recipients admitted – 4 amongst them having been women.

10. Science and Technology Education for Women

The last few years have witnessed several initiatives aiming at encouraging girls to enter the fields of science and technology. One such program, entitled "The Future Generation of Hi-Tech", encourages students in general, and female students in particular, to aim for a career in science and technology, through the creation of partnerships (currently 23) between industries and junior high schools throughout the country. Another program, the "GES" project (Girls to Engineering Studies), aims to increase the number of high school girls who study industries and junior high schools throughout the country. Another program, the “GES” project (Girls to Engineering Studies), aims to increase the number of high school girls who study mathematics and physics at the level required to make possible enrollment in university degree-level engineering studies.

Article 10 Education

In addition, the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sport has recently initiated a special scholarship program in which undergraduate students in engineering and exact sciences can receive a yearly stipends of NIS 10,000 (about EUR 2,500), in return for 100 hours of service in the National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology programs aimed at promoting women in science. Examples of such activities are: (1) Meetings with high school students and other groups where they can serve as role models; (2) Tutoring schoolgirls in mathematics and sciences; (3) Helping in the organization of conferences and other events.

Despite all these efforts, a recent study conducted by Dr. Dina Doron illustrates that there is a need for even more initiatives intended to increase the number of women entering the fields of science and technology. The study revealed that although high school girls are successful in university-run science enrichment activities (“Science Oriented Youth”), girls constitute only 35% of total enrollment overall, and their relative weight in the exact sciences and technological fields is even lower.

11. The Girl-Child

In accordance with the new reporting guidelines following the 1995 UN Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing, requesting the expansion of particular issues raised in the Beijing Platform for Action beyond the general information in the CEDAW Reports, a separate section on the girl-child was added to this Report, relating to aspects other than education, which has been dealt with in the preceding parts of this chapter.

11.1. The Adolescents and the Different Societal Systems

The following information is mainly based upon a World Health Organization cross-national study, published in 1997 and based on data collected in 1994 (Hereinafter - the HBSC study). The study involved the distribution of questionnaires to more than 7,600 students attending grades 6-11. Due to its transnational scope, the data enables a comparative perspective.

11.1.1. The Family

The family is an important agent for the physical and psychological health advancement of the child. Family relationships are known to influence the adolescent's self-esteem, mental health, social adaptation and physical health.

The HBSC study mentioned above, revealed some interesting findings regarding perceptions of family support among Israeli adolescents. Regarding their ability to talk with their parents, it was found that the situation of the adolescents in Israel is relatively good. As for the readiness of parents to help their children in their studies, Israel was actually ranked first and second in the majority of the age and sex categories. Significantly, family ties are weaker among new immigrant families, as well as families that come from a low social-demographic background. It is also clear that parents in new immigrant families are less involved at school.

Girls fare better than boys by most measures, including those that deal with communication within the family and parents' support at school. The only exception is the rate of children who find it easy to talk to their father about disturbing issues, which is higher for boys than for girls (69.4% of the 15 year-old boys, compared to 53.5% of the girls belonging to the same age group).

11.1.2. The School Environment

With regards to school, the HBSC study revealed that the situation of girls seem to improve between the ages of 11 to 15. The Israeli girls are ranked particularly high in answers to questions measuring feelings of acceptance by their peers (80.4% of Israeli girls at the age of 15 felt they are being accepted as they are by their friends - 3rd in the world - compared to 76.4% of the boys). Israeli girls do not feel that their parents or teachers expect too much of them, contrary to Israeli boys who do experience these feelings. For instance, 23.9% of the 15 year-old boys feel their parents expect too much of them, as opposed to only 14.6% of the girls.

By the age of 15, the rate of girls who feel stressed or very stressed by the studies at school is far greater than that of boys (36.9% compared to 22.1%). It is interesting to note, however, that at the ages of 11 and 13 the rate of girls and boys who feel stressed (or very stressed) is almost the same.

11.1.3. The Peer Group

Article 10 Education

According to the aforementioned HBSC study, the Israeli adolescent has a positive concept of hobbies. Most of the Israeli adolescents go out some evenings every week. Also, most of them feel they can converse with their friends about disturbing subjects and can receive social support from them. Nevertheless, the rate of Israeli youth that feel lonely is one of the world's highest, and it is higher for girls than for boys. In addition, this phenomenon is more common among new immigrant families, as well as families that come from a low social-demographic background.

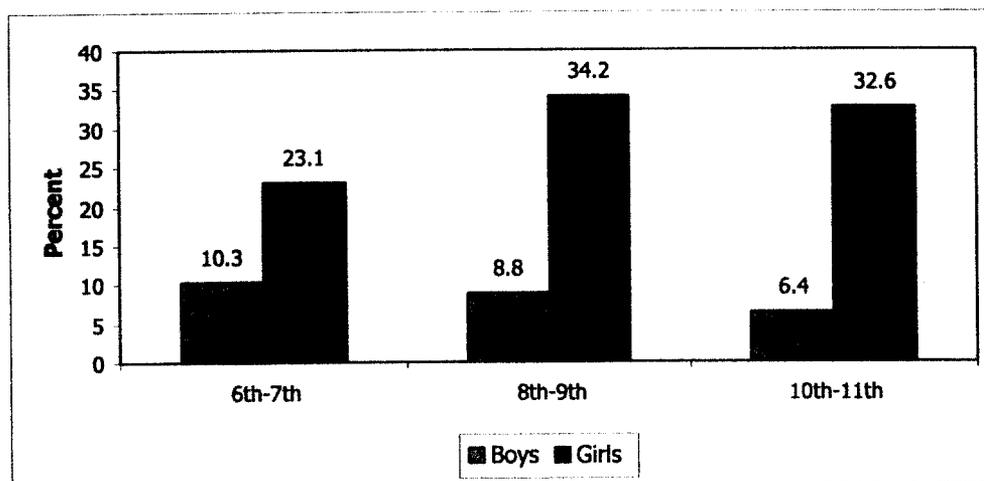

The phenomenon of daring (talking each other into dangerous and prohibited activity) is very frequent with a rate of about 46%, and is much more predominant for boys in all age groups (60.4% of the boys compared to 36.8% of the girls, in the 8-9 grades, for instance).

11.2. Health Risk Behaviors and Leisure Activities

11.2.1. Nutrition, Eating Habits and Physical Activity

A gender gap in the domain of nutrition and eating habits exists within Israeli youth, as 30% of Israeli girls go on a diet to lose weight, compared to 8.6% of the boys. Israel is in fact ranked 1st in the rate of girls who are dieting.

Chart 9 - Percentage of Students on a Weight-loss Diet, 1994

Source: HBSC Survey, 1997

A quarter of Israeli girls report that they do not do sport, compared to 10% of the boys. The combination of these findings indeed reflects themes in Israeli culture, in which not much importance is attached to the advancement of physical education as a contribution to health, whereas a lot of attention is put on young women's body image. It is clear that health advancement programs should be developed to transform this reality, by increasing the girls' physical activities' level, while reducing their excessive interest in dieting and hours devoted for watching television (which are highest for Israeli girls, according to the HBSC cross-national study).

11.2.2. Smoking

The HBSC study referred to previously revealed that 26.9% of all 6-11 graders have smoked at least once in their life and 8.7% of Israel's youth reported smoking at least once a week. These rates are increasing with age, and in each age group they are higher for boys than for girls. However, the gender gap is decreasing with age.

11.2.3. Alcohol Use

As with smoking, Israeli boys drink alcohol more than girls do, although the gender gap decreases with age. According to the HBSC study, 37.9% of the 6-7 grade boys reported drinking at least one alcoholic beverage in the month prior to the survey, compared to 15.3% of the girls. As for the 10-11 graders, 43% of the boys, compared to 27.6% of the girls, reported drinking at least once in the preceding month. In addition, the number of "drinking days" (number of days in which alcohol was consumed within the last month) is increasing with age for girls while decreasing for boys. In fact, girls in the 10-11 grades reported slightly more drinking days than did boys in the same age group (4.6 days compared to 4.5).

11.2.4. Drug Use

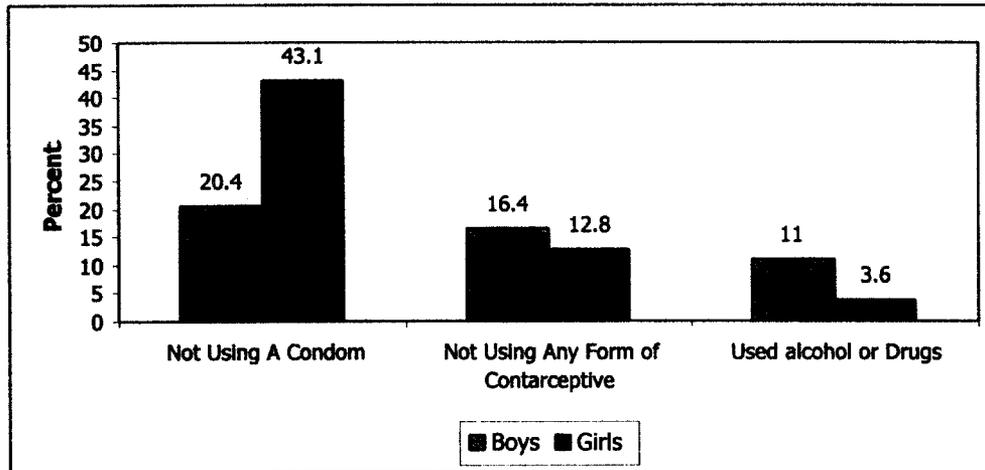

With the exception of dieting pills (that were consumed almost equally by boys and girls), the use of drugs is far greater for boys than for girls. Thus, for example, 7.0% of the boys, compared with 2.7% of the girls, reported using Hash or Marijuana in the preceding year; 8.0% of the boys used sleeping pills, as opposed to 5.9% of the girls; 5.0% of the boys used Opium or Heroin, compared to 0.7% of the girls; and 4.4% of the boys used Crack or Cocaine, compared to 0.9% of the girls.

11.2.5. Sexual Behavior Among High School Students

According to the HBSC study, 2.6% of the girls reported being pregnant at least once in their life, and 10.6% of the boys reported causing pregnancy.

While 20.4% of the boys reported they did not use a condom the last time they had sex, the rate of girls who did not practice safe sex was more than double (43.1%). It is important to note that while the rate of American boys who do not use condoms is much higher (38.4%) compared to their Israeli counterparts, the rate for American girls is only slightly higher (46.5%) than the rate among Israeli girls.

Chart 10 - Percentage of Students who Did not Practice Safe Sex the Last Time They Had Sexual Intercourse, 1994

Source: HBSC Survey, 1997

11.3. Physical and Mental Health

11.3.1. General Feeling and Body Image

The HBSC study sheds light also on data regarding happiness, helplessness, self-confidence and body image.

As for feelings of happiness, the rate of girls who experience a good mood decreases substantially with age. Only 19.6% of the 10-11 grade girls described themselves as "very happy", compared to 40.5 of the 6-7 grade girls. The decrease for boys, although significant, is not as sharp (22% and 38.4%, respectively). In addition, the rate of helplessness and lack of self confidence among girls is increasing with age: While 20% of the 6-7 grade girls felt helpless and 31.4% felt insecure, these figures inflate to 32% and 39.2% for girls in the 10-11 grades. The respective figures for boys are much more stable and range in the 20%-25% interval for all age groups in these two measures. It must be noted, however, that Israel is ranked last for feeling of helplessness among 15 year-old girls and 6th from last for lack of self-confidence among 15 year-old girls.

Physical appearance is of extreme importance to Israeli girls. 36.8% of 6-7 grade girls think they are "too fat", compared to 46.5% of 10-11 grade girls who think so. On the other hand, many of the boys think they are too thin (19.4% of 6-7 graders and 24.5% of 10-11 graders). On the whole, 57.7% of the girls in the 10-11 grades report negative body image, compared to 46.8% of the boys.

11.3.2. Physical and Psychological Symptoms

Israel is ranked 1st in the world regarding students who feel angry or nervous almost every day. Israel also came top with regards to students who suffer from head, stomach or back aches or dizziness more than once a week. Girls suffer more severely from these symptoms, as 49.1% of the 15 year-old girls felt angry on a daily basis, and 26.0% of them experienced one of the aforementioned physical symptoms more than once a week (compared to 32.2% and 23.7% of the boys, respectively). The HBSC survey also reveals that girls experienced more difficulties in falling asleep (25.9% compared to 21.2% of the boys), but that the rate of students who felt tired upon going to school is almost identical (26.2% compared to 26.6%) (Harel, Kanny and Rahav 1997, 134).

11.3.3. Consumption of Medications

A significant gender gap in the consumption of medications was tracked in the HBSC survey, as 59.7% of all girls reported taking a medication in the month that preceded the survey, as opposed to only 40.1% of the boys. It should be noted, however, that both these figures are considered relatively low, compared to other countries. An interaction between gender and age is also apparent: while among girls the use of medications increases with age, among boys an opposite pattern is witnessed.

11.4. Injuries, Violence and Suicide

11.4.1. Injuries

There is no national authority responsible for the advancement of health and security of adolescents in Israel. International comparisons show that the rate of general injuries within Israeli youth is relatively high. However, obtainment of such data is difficult, as many cases of injuries go unreported by the schools. Data gathered in the HBSC survey reveals, that most boys' injuries at school are a result of quarrels and sports activities, while for girls the main reasons for school injuries are falls and faintings.

A huge majority of adolescents report never wearing a helmet when riding a bike (91%), and 40% of all teenagers do not wear a seatbelt. No substantial differences between boys and girls have been traced.

The Ministry of Health has established a database in 27 of 33 general hospitals, of children who were admitted to emergency wards with injuries following domestic violence and neglect, and who were subsequently referred to the social services. In 1998, 1.860 minors were recorded as having visited the emergency room as a result of injury due to violence. Just over half (52%) of these were girls. Among younger children (0-5), slightly larger proportions of children reaching the emergency room (55%) were boys, predominantly as a result of neglect and withholding of care. In the 6-14 age group, 55% of those injured were girls, and among this age group, the category with the largest gender gap was that of sexual abuse, in which twice as many girls were victims as compared to boys. Among adolescents (15-18) girls predominated in all categories of abuse, with the exception of the "neglect" category.

Article 10 Education

11.4.2. Violence

The Israeli youth is confronted, on a day to day basis, with a high rate of interpersonal violence, both verbal and physical. More than half of all students were subject to bullying, when boys were more involved in at least one such incident in the year preceding the survey both as victims (48.3% of boys in the 10-11 grades, compared to 28.6% of the girls) and as aggressors (50.3% of boys, compared to 22.7% of girls).

11.4.3. Suicide

According to the HBSC survey, suicidal tendencies are more common for girls (20.6%) than for boys (13.5%). However, the rate of actual suicides is higher for young men than for young women; Between 1991 and 1993, the mortality rate as a result of suicide was 11.7 for 100,000 men aged 15-24 and only 2.5 for 100,000 women of the same age group.

Article 11 Employment

1. Protection from Discrimination within the Workplace

The most important recent additions to the already progressive Israeli legislation aimed at protecting women against discrimination in the workplace are the enactment of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law in 1998 (detailed under Article 5) and the 2000 Amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law - 1951. As noted earlier, this amendment expands the use of affirmative action to public institutions and states the right of women to be appointed to every position within the security forces. In addition, the amended section 6 of the Law, entitled "Equality in social rights", declares the right of every woman and man for equality in the area of employment. Also, the Equal Employment Opportunities Regulations - 1999, established a public council holding advisory powers with regards to the implementation of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law - 1988.

Other recent amendments in employment legislation wish to improve the status of two of the weakest groups of employees in Israel, namely the foreign employees and those employed through temporary manpower contractors. As will be detailed below, the rate of women within these weak groups is relatively high.

In January 2000, an amendment to the Foreign Employees (Unlawful Employment) Law - 1991, sought to regulate this neglected field and, in particular, to prevent situations of exploitation and oppression which were common in the past. For instance, sections 1A - 1E were added to the Law, stating that every employer must provide his or her foreign workers with a detailed employment contract written in a language they understand. In addition, employers should provide their foreign workers with medical insurance as well as with appropriate lodgings. Any deduction from the worker's salary for the purpose of covering the above expenses must be limited to a proportion determined by the Minister of Labor and Welfare. According to another added section, which is due to take affect in January 2001, the Minister of Labor and Welfare may establish a fund and determine a monthly payment to be paid by employers. Up to a third of this payment may be deducted from the foreign worker's salary. The accumulated sums and any profits added to them will be paid to the worker upon leaving Israel.

Another field in the workforce arena in which major changes are about to take place is that of employment through manpower contractors. A major problem that seemed to dominate this field in the past was that many employers took advantage of this method of employment to hire workers for very long periods of time, without having to pay them various benefits which directly employed workers enjoy. As a result, two categories of workers have emerged within the workplace. A 2000 amendment to the Law on the Employment of Workers by Manpower Contractors - 1996 tries to deal with this phenomenon by requiring that every worker employed through a manpower contractor for more than 9 months will in effect be considered an employee of the actual employer where the worker was placed. In addition, the employment conditions that exist in the workplace will be applied to those employed through a manpower contractor. This amendment is due to take effect only in June 2001. It constitutes a major reform, affecting about 6% of the salaried workers in Israel, particularly for the public sector, thus a period of adjustment is necessary. The amendment necessitates a reconsideration of the employment forms of thousands of contract labor workers in the public sector.

The role of the courts in interpreting and enforcing the various legislative measures aimed at protecting women from gender-related discrimination in the workplace was exhibited in several recent court decisions.

In the 1997 case of Plotkin v. Izenberg Brothers Ltd, the National Labor Court accepted an appeal filed by a woman, who claimed to have been discriminated against, and not hired for a job because of being a woman. Ms. Plotkin answered a job advertisement in a newspaper. She was invited to an interview and her handwriting was sent to a graphologist. During the interview, she was told that women were not suitable for the job, as it entailed being a salesperson outside the office. After Ms. Plotkin did not get the job, she filed suit together with the Israel Women's Network in the Regional Labor Court. The Court found that Ms. Plotkin was discriminated against, but awarded her damages in the amount of one-month salary of a junior employee only. Her appeal to the National Labor Court was accepted, setting a precedent in terms of appropriate compensation in cases of discrimination. The Court stated that the employer's conduct, namely his comment to Ms. Plotkin and his blind acceptance of the graphologist report, was found to be tainted with a stereotypical approach and thus was sufficient, by itself, to render the employer's conduct wrong. The Court ruled that questions of stereotypical nature, be it in an interview or tender invitation forms, are sufficient to make a potential employer responsible. In addition, the Court also held that such a graphological test was problematic and excessively intrusive upon the privacy of a person. As for compensation, the Court held that its purpose in this case is two fold - one, to compensate Ms. Plotkin for her actual damages, and two, to educate the employer in this case, and all other employers, in order to achieve non-discriminatory, non-stereotypical conduct. Aiming at deterrence, the Court held that the compensation must be effective, and ordered the employer to pay Ms. Plotkin 50,000 NIS ($14,200) in punitive damages.

In 1999, the Be'er Sheva District Labor Court, applying the pay equity provisions of the Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law - 1996, decided that an employer must release details regarding the salaries of male employees in the work place to the claimant. Preferring to address the principle of equality and the claimant's right to sue her employer and choosing to ignore potential damage to the secret nature of other workers' salaries, the Court accorded the claimant the right of discovery (Simi Nidam v. Rali Electrics and Electronics).

One last observation concerns the number of complaints regarding gender-based discrimination submitted by employees in the Civil Service. While the overall number of complaints dealt with by the Unit for the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service has remained stable, the rate of sexual harassment complaints has increased from 25% in 1998 to 45% in 1999 and to 53% in the first 8 months of 2000 (57 out of a total of 107 complaints).

2. Women's Health and Employment

A recent survey concerned with the relationship between women's physical and mental health and their work sheds some light on the outcome of the perpetual work-family conflict. The 2000 Brookdale Institute Women's Health Survey (mentioned under Article 5 above) examined women's attitudes towards accommodating family and work obligations. Not surprisingly, only 23% of the women who were satisfied with their accommodations reported a high level of depression, compared with 50% of those who were not satisfied with the accommodations that they were making. Likewise, of those who were satisfied, 86% graded their general health as being good, compared with only 56% who were not satisfied. On the more general issue of working conditions and health, the survey revealed that the less control the woman feels that she has over her work, the more likely she is to report a high level of depression, and the less likely she is to report good health condition. In terms of the type of work, a high rate of women who work in menial jobs report a high level of depression (54%), compared with only 24% of the women who work in “white collar” jobs (Gross & Brammli-Greenberg 2000, 49- 52).

3. Pregnancy and Maternity Leave

As mentioned under Article 4, there is an ongoing move from protective-paternalistic legislation which confines the participation in the workforce of pregnant women and women who gave birth, to legislation which sees the family-unit as a whole and advances greater involvement of fathers in child-rearing.

For example, the 1998 amendment to the Employment of Women Law -1954 has given the pregnant woman the option to decide whether or not to work over-time, provided she supplies her employer with a medical certificate. The law thus trusts the woman as capable of assessing her exact physical and emotional condition, and economic needs.

The similarly criticized prohibition against employing a woman during her maternity pay-leave, was also amended in 1997, to allow the couple to decide for themselves who would take the second half of the maternity-leave, namely the period of the six-twelve weeks following the birth of a child. Indeed, data from the National Insurance Institute indicates that this time the law has surpasses the public by far. In 1999, two years since its enactment, only 218 of the fathers have taken advantage of this option to take the six weeks leave instead of their wives. When compared to the total requests presented that year, this constitutes a mere one-third percent (0.33%) of the requests. This amendment was originally limited to three years, which ended in May 2001. Following public criticism, the option was newly enacted, with slight variations, in July 2001.

Correspondingly, the right to the 12 weeks of maternity pay-leave in the case of an adoption of a child, given until 1998 only to women, is now being awarded to either of the adoptive parents according to their own choice.

In addition, the Sick Pay (Absence from Work due to Pregnancy and Childbirth of Spouse) Law - 2000 states that an employee is entitled up to 7 days of leave per year due to treatments or medical examinations related to his spouse's pregnancy, or due to the birth of his newborn. taken from the total amount of his attributed “sick days”.

The 1998 amendment to the Employment of Women Law -1954, discussed above, has also expanded the protection against dismissal, given to pregnant women, women on maternity leave or on high risk pregnancy leave under the old law, for an additional 45 days upon return to work. Thus making it far less tempting for employers to hire replacements during the employee's absence that simply stay on once the employee can be legally fired. An additional amendment from 2000 prohibits the inclusion of the 45 days period within the necessary period of advanced notice prior to dismissal. The 1998 amendment further prohibits any cutback in a pregnant employee's position without permission from the Minister on Labor and Welfare. However, it must be noted that the number of permissions for dismissals or for cutback of pregnant employees positions, on grounds that such dismissal or cutback is unconnected to the pregnancy, has increased: from approving 50% of the requests in 1997, to 54% in 2000.

Another new protection against dismissal relates to fertility treatments. While the law directed employers to allow workers to be absent from work in order to receive fertility treatments, it did not prohibit the employers from dismissing those workers. A 2001 amendment to the Employment of Women Law -1954 now prohibits such dismissals.

4. Parenthood

On the legislative level, a 2001 amendment to the Sick Pay (Absence from Work due to A child's Sickness) Law - 1993 extends the time period that a worker (man or woman) can take as a leave to tend to a sick child from six to eight days a year.

Some development took place in the courts. A 1999 Tel Aviv District Labor Court decision has adopted a broad interpretation to the privilege of a working mother to pass her right for a shorter working day to her spouse. The Court stated that this privilege is reserved for all working mothers, regardless of whether they are hired employees or self-employed. The Court has held that this interpretation, which expands the circle of male workers willing to tend to their children while their spouse is out working, is in accordance with the principles of basic equality as well as with the object of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, and should be seen as encouraging the incorporation of women into high-ranking positions. It must be pointed out that the Na'amat Women's Organization joined in the case alongside the husband-claimant (Menahem Yahav and Na'amat v. The State of Israel).

Article 11 Employment

Another Labor Court case, which suggests a broad interpretation to a parental right, is the 2000 National Labor Court case of Jacky Gross v. Tal Traveling and Tourism Inc.. The Court examined section 7 of the Severance Pay Law - 1963, concerned with the eligibility to severance pay of an employee who quits his or her job during the first 9 months after childbirth, in order to care for a child. According to the traditional interpretation of this section, severance pay will be attributed to a female worker that started working in another, new place of work, as long as the number of hours spent working at this new place of work are significantly inferior to those spent at the first workplace. This interpretation was recently extended in a decision given by the National Labor Court which determined that even in cases where the number of hours spent working at the more recent job was not significantly inferior to that worked at the first place of work, but the new place of work is closer in distance to the worker's home and baby, the female worker will be entitled to severance pay. The Court decided that in such cases, "it isn't the number of hours worked which is relevant, but the fact that the claimant-mother is physically closer - and thus more available - to her baby, should he/she need her."

Another subject which pertains indirectly to the relationship between parenthood and employment is illustrated by cases where an unemployed woman reporting to the state employment agency has refused to accept a job that has been offered to her by that agency, and in so doing has forfeited her right to receive unemployment benefits from the National Insurance Institute. In the Employment Service v. Gila Gaon case, the Court took in consideration the special circumstances relating to the woman-worker's situation (the fact that the plaintiff was a mother to small children, that she lived at a distance from the place of work, etc.) to ignore the unemployed woman's refusal to accept the job offered her and thus not cancel her entitlement to the NII compensation. It must be mentioned though that the jurisprudence of the Labor Court regarding this matter is by no means harmonious, and that since the handing down of the aforementioned decision, numerous contradicting decisions have been handed down in regional courts.

7. Employment of Women - Data and Analysis

7.1. Women in the Labor Market

7.1.1. Women's Participation in the Workforce

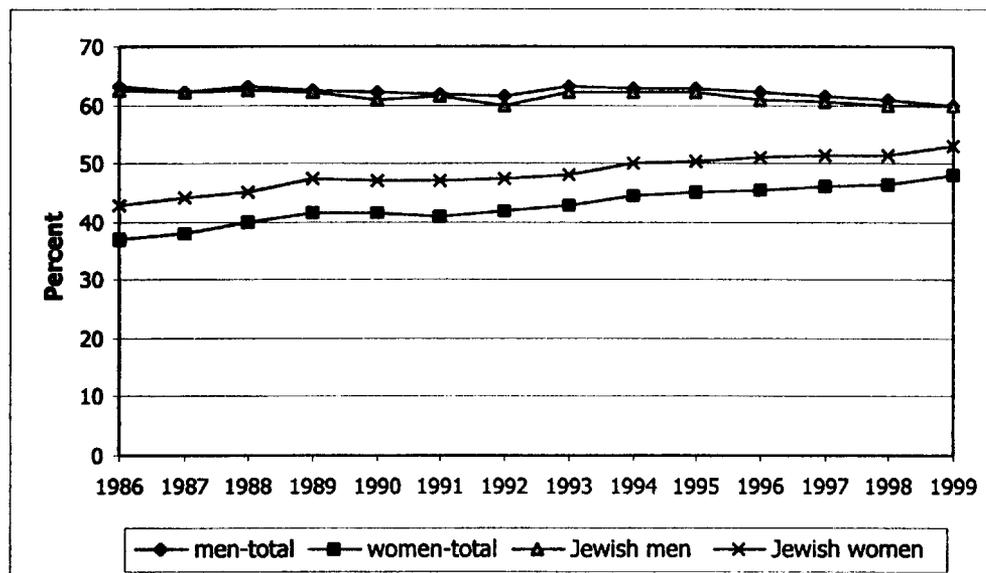

In recent years, women's participation in the workforce (measured as the percentage of women aged 15 and over who belong to the civil workforce, from among all women aged 15 and over) has continued to rise slowly, whereas the men's participation has decreased.

Chart 1 - Population Aged 15 and over in Workforce, 1985-1998

Women's participation in the workforce steadily increased to 46.3% in 1998 (after reaching 45.7% in 1995), compared with men's participation, which went down to 61.2% in 1998 after peaking at 62.9% in 1995. Women composed 44.2% of the total workforce in 1998 (compared to 43.2% in 1995 and 33% in 1975). Jewish women's level of participation is higher than overall women's participation, reaching 51% in 1998. It is also interesting to note that the level of participation among Jewish women is the highest in the age group of 35-44 (67.9% in 1998). Increase in women's participation is taking place among Arab women as well, though the level of participation within the latter was low to begin with (22.3% in 1998, compared to 18.3% in 1995 and 16.8% in 1994).

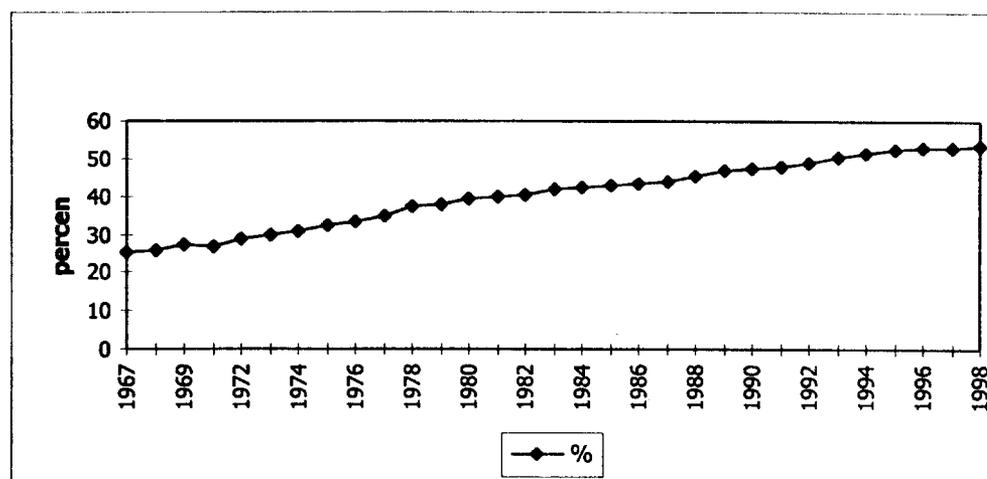

Chart 2 - Percent in Workforce of Total Population Aged 15 and over, by Religion and Sex, 1986-1999

The correlation between women's participation in the labor-force and their educational level, discussed in the previous report, gets further support from recent data. In 1998, among Jewish women with 16 years of schooling and over, 78.1% belonged to the work force, as compared to 75.8% of Jewish men with a similar level of education. Among those Jewish women with 0-4 years of schooling, only 5.6% participate in the work force. The differences in the participation rates of women according to their years of schooling are much larger than the differences in participation rates of men by years of schooling. For example, the increase in two years of high-school for women (from 9-10 years of schooling to 11-12 years, which may also indicate the difference between having a matriculation report and not having one), carries a 20% increase in their rate of participation (from 32.2% to 51.9%), compared with only 7% increase among men in the parallel groups. Thus, the correlation between educational level of women and their rate of participation in the work force is clearly much stronger than the parallel connection among men.

By 1998, married women's participation in the labor-market has reached 53.4%. In 1998, 41% of non-married women were in the work force, compared with 51% of the married women and 63.7% of the divorcees. This is explained by the fact that the group of non-married includes younger women who are still in their course of studies. The data that concerns the higher participation of divorced women undoubtedly expresses the more pressing economic need of that group of women.

As noted in the previous Report, women's participation in the work force decreases as their number of children increases, and rises with the maturation in age of their youngest child. In 1998, 76% of Jewish women with one child were in the work force, compared with 49% of those with four children or more (in 1994 the respective rates were 74% and 43%). 58% of Jewish women whose youngest child was less than one year old were in the work-force, compared with 80% of those whose youngest child was between 10-14 years old (the 1994 figures were 54% and 71%, respectively).

7.2. Work Patterns

Women continue to dominate the group of part-time workers (defined as employees who work between 1-34 hours a week), though to a lesser extent than before. Thus, in 1998, 65% of those who regularly worked part-time were women (compared to 72% in 1994). Indeed, an examination of labor-force data throughout the 90's reveals a steady increase in the rate of women working full-time, from 40.6% of all women in the work force in 1990, to 46.6% in 1998.

Of all working women, 36.4% regularly worked part-time, while only 15.5% of all working men regularly worked part-time. The most common reason given for women's part-time work is child-care and housework (22%). For 20.3% of women part-time workers and for 20% of the men, the work was considered full-time (as is in the case of schoolteachers). Of the men part-time workers, 24.3% were self-employed, while only 10.3% of the women were similarly self-employed.

The Central Bureau of Statistics data also depicts the rate of those who were temporarily absent from work during the week in which the survey was taken. These data enable an interesting comparison between the rate of maternity leave (still used by women mostly) and army reserve service leave (used almost exclusively by men) as causes for absence among the total temporary absents. While in 1995, military reserve service caused 7.8% of the absents, slightly more than the 7.2% which were caused by maternity leave, in 1998 reserve service absents went down to 4.3%, while maternity leave absents increased to 9.3%. A partial explanation is the cuts that have been made in the past few years regarding the army reserve duty, leading to fewer call-ups and for shorter periods of time. From the other direction, fertility rates have slightly increased in the late 90's, as observed under Article 12, and women's general work-force participation has also gone up.

Another difference between women and men is in the worker's status. In 1998, while 87.3% of all the working women were employees, only 77.5% of the working men were salaried workers (i.e. employees). The difference is clearer when the data concerning employers and self-employed is examined: while 18.5% of the men participating in the labor-force in 1998 were employers, self-employed and cooperative members, only 5.5% of the women participating in the labor-force were in similar status. This difference has far-reaching consequences in terms of earnings. According to the National Insurance Institute, there are significant earning differences by work status: while in 1996, 4.5% of all self-employed earned up to 4 times the average earning rate, only 1.6% of all employees reached that earning rate.

The global phenomena of the overrepresentation of women in the informal sector (which includes unsupervised and unreported hired house-work and childcare help, as well as unsupervised and unreported workers) and the contingent labor force (consists of workers who lack explicit or implicit contracts for long-term employment, or who work minimum hours that vary unsystematically), seem not to have escaped Israel. Naturally, since the informal sector is unaccounted for by definition, its scope cannot be gathered by formal workforce statistics. To date, no governmental research was done in Israel to discern the extent of the informal workforce.

As for the latter phenomenon, estimates given by NGO's who research in this area suggest that over 7% of the Israeli workforce consists of temporary manpower companies, almost 30% of the public sector workers are employed through such companies, and over 80% of them are women. These workers are usually much more vulnerable to workforce instabilities and cutbacks, and lack many of the standard workers social conditions and benefits. This reality called for a legislative intervention in the shape of the 2000 amendment to the Law on the Employment of Workers by Manpower Contractors - 1996 discussed above.

Another class of even more vulnerable workers which has recently been emerging in the Israeli labor market, is the class of foreign workers. Hopefully, here too the recent 2000 amendment to the Foreign Employees (Unlawful Employment) Law - 1991, will help improve the existing situation.

One other development taking place in Israel's economy, that has special implications for women, is the "high-tech revolution". Recent research revealed that during the first two years after graduation, 15% of the men and 13% of the women reach senior positions, but four years into their careers, 54% of the men and only 33% of the women are being promoted to senior positions. It is believed that the structural impediments that are built into the high-tech industry, which include very long work hours and very little flexibility in work patterns, added to the lower rate of women graduates of computers, technology, sciences and management, lead to disproportionately lower numbers of women in the industry, especially in managerial positions.

A recent report by the National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology compared the results of a 1999 survey on the status of women in the hi-tech industry, covering nearly 220 companies, to those of a previous survey carried out in 1996. Among the findings:

- 1) The number of female managers in hi-tech industry is growing rapidly. In 1999, women constitute about 20% of managers in this field, up from 14% three years before. However, most female managers in hi-tech industry are in human resources or finance departments, i.e. non-technical ones.
- 2) Currently, 68% of electronics and software companies employ at least one women manager, in comparison to 48% three years ago. The number of firms employing at least one female manager is higher in electronics (76%) than in software (60%).
- 3) The average monthly salary of female managers has increased by 11% since 1996. However, the average salary of a male manager is generally higher.

7.3. Unemployment

The rate of unemployed persons (defined as persons who did not work for pay for one hour during the week of the survey, and who were actively seeking work) has increased in the second half of the 1990's, due to a recession in the Israeli market. Interestingly, while the rate of unemployed men has increased by almost 50% (from 5.8% in 1995 to 8.5% in 1999), the rate of women rose by a mere 10% during this time (from 8.5% in 1995 to 9.3% in 1999). As a result, the historical gap between unemployment rates among women and men dramatically decreased, as portrayed in the following chart:

Chart 4 - Percent Unemployed Persons of Civilian Workforce, by Sex

Article 11 Employment

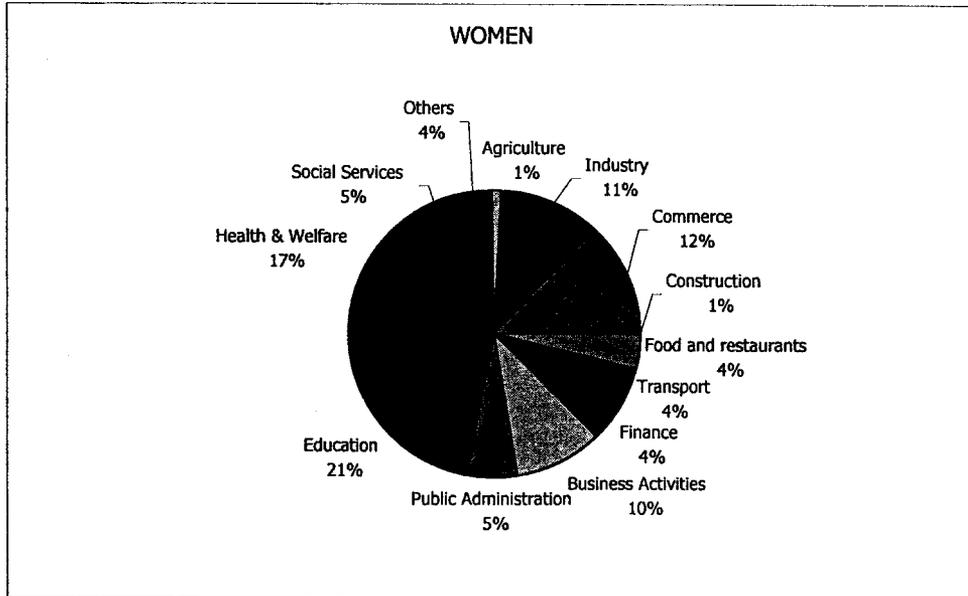

The diminishing gap between women and men is depicted by other data as well. For instance, while the rate of women within the entire workforce slightly increased in the last years (as was discussed above), their rate among the unemployed decreased quite substantially, from 54.4% in 1995 to 47.3% in 1998. Furthermore, according to the Employment Service, women comprised 50.5% of the total population seeking employment in the last few years, compared to 55% in the first half of the 1990's.

7.4. The Careers of Women: Levels and Salaries7.4.1. Women's Occupational Distribution and Gender Segregation

Women's Occupational Distribution did not change much since the submission of the previous report and patterns of work segregation still seem to exist. Thus, when adding together the percentages of women in education, health, welfare and social-work services, with other branches of services (both public and private), the aggregate comes close to 60% of all working women who work in services activities. The picture is totally different among employed men, who dominate most other activities, such as agriculture, manufacturing, electricity and water, construction, trade and repairs, transport and communications, business activities and public administration.

B. Men

Work-segregation is further evident upon examination of the data regarding women's and men's occupations. Women predominate occupations such as clerical workers (where they constitute 73% of employees) and sales and services workers (54% of these are women). More encouraging figures concern the rates of female academic professionals (13%) and associate professionals and technicians (19.7%), as they are higher than those of the employed men in these occupational categories (12.2% and 10.5% respectively). It is, however, important to note that most women in these occupational categories are teachers, nurses, social workers and the like, mostly in the public services.

Article 11 Employment

7.4.2. The Glass Ceiling Phenomenon

According to the Central Bureau of Statistics data from 1998, 7.9% of all working men were managers, whereas only 2.9% of all working women were managers. Of the total managers, 26,100 out of 116,600 were women, a total of 22.4%, an increase in comparison to the 1995 data, when the rate of women in management positions was 19.5% of all managers (12,000 out of 66,000). Of all women managers, 8% are CEOs (Chief Executive Officers) or director-generals, 65% are senior managers, and 27% are other managers, whereas of all men managers a total of one third are CEOs/director-generals, which is four times the number of women managers in this category. Forty-five percent of the men managers are senior managers, and 21% are other managers.

Another source of information on women in managerial positions is the Forum of Women Managers in Industry. The Forum has conducted a research among industrial companies in 1997, revealing that 45% of them do not employ women in managerial positions at all, 34% employ only one, 16% employ between two to four, and only 5% employ more than four women in managerial roles.

A 1998 research, conducted by the Forum, reveals that the proportion of female executives in industry has increased from 16% in 1994 to 20% in 1997. However, according to the research, the growth in the rate of female executives has not been matched by equalization of their terms of employment with those of their male counterparts. Women's wages are relatively low, and only one third of the women executives receive special benefits (a car, car maintenance, etc.) compared with more than half of male executives. According to the research, 46% of female executives have a BA degree, while 12% hold a MA or Ph.D. 66% of the female executives with academic degrees have a degree in social or management sciences, 24% in natural sciences or exact sciences and 7% in humanities. The research does not indicate any substantial difference in the evaluation of the performance of male and female executives. However, women executives were found to have a certain advantage in human relations and level of motivation. Men, on the other hand, were considered to have a certain advantage in professionalism, assumption of responsibility and decision-making. According to the interviewees, the main reason for the low rate of women in management positions is women's lack of time, due to the need to take care of the family.

Gender stratification in the civil service can also be viewed as a case study of the glass-ceiling phenomenon in the labor-market. It should be noted though, that less than 4% of all working women directly belong to the civil service. As already mentioned (under Article 7 above), while women made up 62% of all workers in the civil service in 1999, less than 12% of the top three ranks in the four main classifications of the service (which serve as the main resource for managerial positions) were women. An additional fact that is more related to salary gaps that are discussed below, is that in 1999, women made up only 19% of civil servants employed through senior contracts. Although this marks a 7% increase from their 12% in 1997, it is still only a third of their overall rate in the service.

7.4.3. Salary and Earning Gaps

Salary gaps between men and women continue to characterize the Israeli labor market, though to a somewhat lesser extent. According to the Central Bureau of Statistics' data of the year 1998, in all branches of the labor market, a female employee's average monthly income was about 61% of their male counterparts (compared to 58% in 1992-3). This is partly explained by the differences in the average weekly work hours, which were 46.4 for men and 35.9 for women (compared to 46.3 hours and 34.1 hours, respectively, in 1992-3). However, close inspection of the data reveals a large gap in the average income per hour as well, which was 1.21 times higher for men, a slight decrease from the 1.25 index in 1992-3.

This gap remains constant when other variables are taken into consideration. For example, men with 5-8 years of schooling earned 36.5% more per hour than women with a similar educational level. Among those with 16 years of schooling and over, men's average income per hour was 23.5% more than women's. The gap in income per hour increases with age, from only 5% among 15-24 years olds up to 31% among the 45-54 year olds. Even within those occupations which are dominated by women, such as clerical work, a man's hourly income remains 30% more than that of a women's. The following tables present the full data discussed here.

According to the National Insurance Institute, women's general average monthly income in 1996 was only 56% of that of men's. Furthermore, of all married male employees in 1996, 37.3% earned less than half the average monthly salary, while 58.7% of all female married employees earned less than that. Of all married male employees, 3.4% earned four times the average monthly salary, while only 0.4% of all married female employees earned that amount. Examination of the adult population income survey reveals that in 1996 women made up 57% of all employees earning less than the minimum wage. Of all women who worked full-time in 1997, 13.6% earn less than the minimum wage, compared with only 5% of all men who worked full-time. While NII data reveals that the general earning gap has somewhat decreased, so that in 1997 women's average monthly salary reached 61.2% of men's, a thorough analysis of earnings' stratification according to place of residence indicates that the gender earning gaps are far from diminishing: one of the main findings of this analysis is that the earning gap increases as the men's salary rises. The highest gap was observed in the localities where men's earnings were the highest, so that in the locality with the highest average men's income, women's income was only 43% of the men's. The analysis further shows that every 10% increase in men's income leads only to 8.2% in women's.

The Civil Service 1998 Report concerning salary gaps between men and women within the civil service (relating to salary data of 1996) showed consistent gaps in all classifications, reaching a 25% gap at the administrative classification, with the exception of the professional attorneys classification where women's earnings surpassed that of men's by 8%.

Current data supplied by the Ministry of Finance indicates that the overall salary gaps between men and women within the government ministries stands at 28.2%. Once again, the professional attorneys classification is an exception (along with physiotherapists), while significant salary gaps exist in the Foreign Service, in Ministries Chambers, among Doctors and Journalists (government) classifications, in which men's earnings exceed those of women by 38.9% for the first two classifications and 28.2% for the latter two. The following table exhibits salary gaps in selected professions:

8. Time Use

As mentioned above, there is still a substantial difference in the average amount of time men work compared to women. It is believed that this variance in time spent on work affect men's and women's careers in terms of promotions, jobs that carry greater economic rewards, and so on, and thus they bear at least an indirect effect on men's and women's salaries.

Article 11 Employment

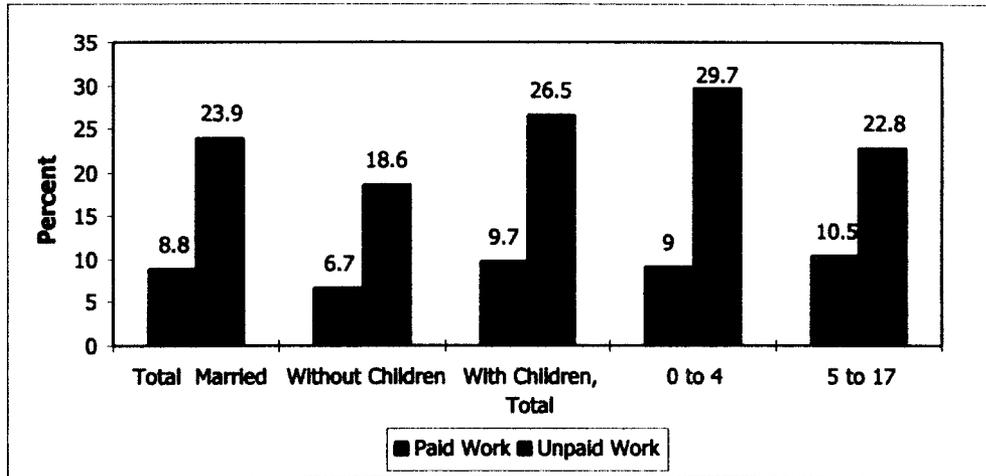

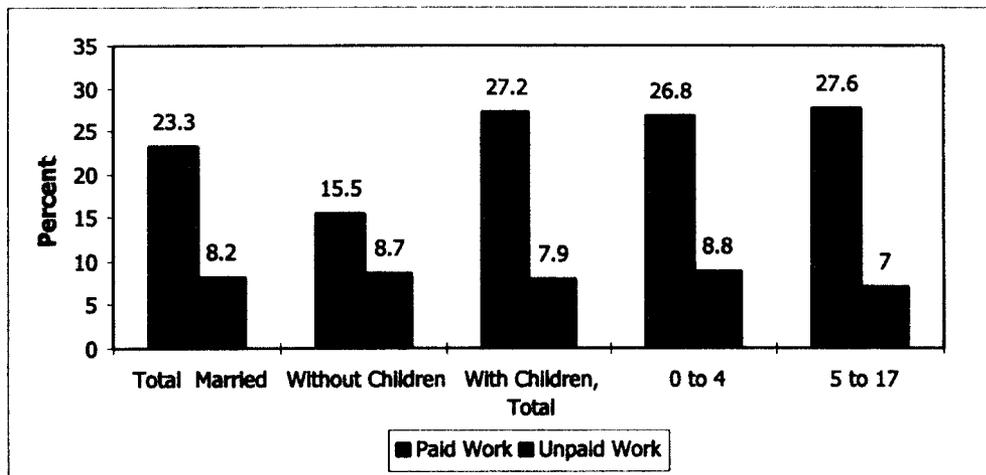

An original time budget survey that was conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics in 1991-92 and examined the time use in Israel reveals some very interesting findings that are relevant to this subject. According to the survey, men devote most of their working-time to paid work, more than twice (2.5) as much as women. Women devote most of their working-time to unpaid work, almost three times (2.75) as much as men. Women devote 11% of their time to care of home, in contrast to 2% of men. Women devote 4.3% of their time to care of children, in contrast to 1.4% of men.

Among the age group of 30-44, most of the time is spent on work (36% in general). However, men spend most of it on paid work (28%), while women spend most of it on unpaid work (25%). Overall, of the total time men and women of all age groups spend on work, 74.4% of men's working time is spent on paid work, while 71% of women's working time is spent on unpaid work.

Perhaps the significant observation that comes out of this survey is that even among those employed in full-time jobs, women spend more than twice as much time on unpaid work than men (14.8% compared to 6.1% respectively), making the total time spent on all work equal for men and women who are employed in full-time jobs (38%). Interestingly, of those who are employed in part-time jobs, women spend much more time than men on work in general (33.5% and 25.1% respectively), since men who work part-time hardly increase their share of unpaid work in the home.

There is a high correlation between the number of children aged 0-17 in a household and the amount of time that married women spend on unpaid work: as expected, this amount increases in direct proportion to the number of children. Whereas without children a married woman devotes 19% of her time to unpaid work, this amount grows to 31% when she has 3 children or more. Men's work, on the other hand, is not correlated to children at all: the amount of unpaid work of married men is small compared to married women (8%), and it remains small, with no relation to the number of children in the household. Married women with 3 or more children in the household spend a daily average of 7 hours and 20 minutes on unpaid work, compared to 2 hours per day spent on this by married men with 3 or more children.

The following two charts demonstrate the differences between the average rate of time that men and women spend on paid and unpaid work, according to their family status and the ages of their youngest children:

9. Vocational and Professional Training for Women

In 1999, women comprised 44% of all trainees in vocational courses provided by the Division for Training and Development in the Ministry of Labor and Welfare. Within retraining courses for people who hold an academic degree, women comprised 53% of all trainees. Recently, the Division for Training and Development (joined by the Women NGO's Council) initiated a unique project, aiming at increasing women's participation in its courses.

Regarding the Arab sector, 1997 saw a fall in the number of courses offered to Arab women as well as in the choice of fields open to them. Indeed, the number of trainees in the Tel Aviv,

Beer Sheva and Jerusalem districts fell from 250 in 1996 to 120 in 1997, and the number of courses offered fell from ten in 1996 to only four in 1997. Nevertheless, since the total budget of the Department for Adult Training has increased by 10% between 1996-2000, it is hoped that more resources will be allocated to women in general, and to Arab women in particular.

The following table depicts the distribution of men and women trainees within the various types of courses offered. Women are clearly concentrated in book-keeping, clerical work and nursing, whereas most men are trained in engineering, electronics, driving and building.

10. Child-care

The social services departments in the Ministry of Labor and Welfare refer children to day-care centers due to dysfunctional family situations. Throughout the second half of the 1990's an average of 14,000 "welfare children" stayed within the governmentally subsidized day-care centers. Since 1994, the governmental support of the program has increased by 120%, compensating for the decrease in Women's organization contributions to the program.

11. Enforcement of Employment Legislation

11.1. The Department of Supervision of Labor Laws of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare

The Department of Supervision of Labor Laws of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare supervises the enforcement of a number of labor laws, including the Employment of Women Law - 1954. In recent years, the number of applications to the Department, regarding complaints from women who have been discharged from their employment during pregnancy, and employers' applications for termination permits, has risen steadily, and now reaches around 850 cases per year. As was noted above, the number of permissions for dismissals or for diminishing pregnant employees positions has increased: from approving 50% of the requests in 1997, to 54% in 2000.

Thus, in the first 9 months of 2000, 339 permissions for dismissals were given (77 of the permissions were justified by the financial difficulties facing the workplace at the time of dismissal, and another 43 permissions followed the employee's consent). In 82 of the 213 cases in which permissions were denied, the employee returned to work before the decision was known.

Table 7 - Applications and Permissions for dismissals of pregnant employees, 1997-2000

1997	760	385
1998	844	468
1999	828	419
2000 (First 9 months)	627	339

As to the procedural aspects of handling these cases, it should be noted that internal instructions delineating the parameters for approving dismissals do not exist. This is attributed to an ideology not to restrict the department supervisor's discretion.

In the course of 2000 the supervisor was instructed to provide the dismissed worker with the right to examine the employer's request for her dismissal.

11.2. The Department of Labor Law Enforcement

This department is responsible, among other things, for the enforcement of The Minimum Wage Law - 1987, which was amended in 1997, increasing the rate of the minimum wage from 45% to 47.5% of the average wage.

According to Israel's Report on the Convention on Economic and Social Rights, in 1997, more than 2,500 work places employing 45,000 workers were inspected by the department in compliance with the Minimum Wage Law. Violations were found with regard to approximately 2,650 workers, who received compensation totaling NIS 3.3million. The comparison with data from 1996 point to a fall in the number of violations, as well as to a clear improvement in the amounts paid in compensation for these violations. Previous research conducted by the Research Department of the Bank of Israel found the obedience to the law to be only partial (30%), with four times more women than men earning below the minimum wage. Critical research points to presently on-going violations and low levels of obedience.

In the last few years, the Enforcement Division of the Ministry raised its activities under the Equal Employment Opportunities Law - 1988: it conducted 290 investigations during the year 1999 and 597 during 2000 (until August). The legal department pressed charges during year 2000, until August, in 6 cases, and had at that time 51 more indictments in preparation. Many cases involve unlawful advertisement. A few cases involve alleged substantial discrimination. It must be noted, however, that no data concerning the number of cases involving discrimination against women is available.

12. Women's Employment among the Arab Population in Israel

Among the Israeli Arab working population, in 1999, as in 1995, the large majority is men, 51 percent of whom were employed as skilled industrial workers. Labor force participation of Arab women remains low, though rising slowly. In 1999, the proportion of employed Israeli Arab women among all Israeli Arab workers increased from 21% in 1995 to 24% in 1999. Among the main reasons for this specific situation are the traditional attitude taken, within the Arab community, towards the role of the woman, and the reluctance and lack of support from husbands and families to women that do leave their homes to work. Furthermore, 90% of the small workplaces are located far from the Arab settlements and there remains a lack of services for working women, such as transportation, daycare services, and kindergartens. Only 44% of three year-old Arab children attend kindergartens in comparison with 95% of Jewish children of the same age.

Of the women who were employed in 1999, 28% work in academic and professional fields, 36% were clerical and sales workers and 34% were employed in industry as skilled and unskilled labor. The conditions of those Arab women who work for wages outside their homes are far from being satisfactory. A 1998 survey on the conditions of women working in the private sector in Nazareth, the largest employer for Arab women, revealed that 61% of the women were paid less than the minimal wage; 72% had no legal contract; and only 35% received overtime payment. Furthermore, when asked what and how much the minimum wage was, only 30% of the women could answer correctly (Farrif, 1998). Research on the connection between place of inhabitancy and salary levels, based on Central Bureau of Statistics data from 1997, revealed that among the 72% of the municipalities and townships in which women earned less than the general average wage earned by women (which was 75% of the average wage earned by men as explained above), all 71 Arab municipalities and townships were included (Adva center, 1999).

With regard to employment opportunities for Arab women in Israel, the Authority for the Status of Women and the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women focused in 1999 and 2000 on encouraging Arab women to join the police force and to train as social workers in the Arab sector which lacks social workers. Furthermore, as part of the Multi-Year Plan for Development of Arab-Sector Communities adopted by the government in a resolution taken in October 2000 which addresses all aspects of social development of Arab-Sector Communities, the government committed to allocate a total amount of 268 million NIS (Approximately $65 million) for setting up engineering-technician and vocational training courses, NIS67 million for each of the years 2001-2004. This includes an amount of 24 million NIS for opening supplementary education classes for women, 6 million NIS for each of the years 2001-2004.

Article 12 Equality in Access to Health Care

Article 12 Equality in Access to Health Care

1. Introduction

Since the publication of the previous Report, some significant steps have been taken to improve women's health care in Israel. After the 1995 UN/NGO Fourth World Conference on Women held in Beijing, women's health was placed on Israel's national agenda, with forthcoming results. Among the results obtained were the appointment of a counselor to the Minister of Health on women's issues as well as the establishment – under the Minister of Health's authority - of a National Council on Women's Health which has been active since February 2000. Since then the Council has met in May, July and October of 2000 (the Council convenes four times a year).

The functions of the Council are: Advancement of the area of women's health; Clarification of areas of medicine requiring special attention within the female population; Recommendations for policy making in the areas relevant to women's health; Raising public awareness on the topic; Organization of activities on the topic of women's health. The Council has five committees on the following topics: Heart disease, health education, mental health, research and education for medical and paramedical teams. In addition, the National Center for Disease Control appointed a special researcher to collect data on women's health. Even more fundamental was the establishment of women's health care centers in every major hospital in Israel.

However, while these advances are positive in and of themselves, a number of women's particular health needs and concerns currently remain unanswered and consistent gaps between the relative situation of men and women in terms of health indicators – to the detriment of women – are still found in many realms.

In terms of research and information availability, two important developments have taken place recently: the Israel Women's Network (IWN) together with the Hadassa Institute published a resource book on Women's Health in Israel, gathering all available information and data on the subject; and the JDC-Brookdale Institute conducted a national survey, collecting for the first time data on women's health and welfare state and on women's experiences with the Israeli health care system (see also under Article 5 above). The survey included telephone interviews with a sample of 850 adult women and the scope ranged from physician-patient relationships, health education, availability to health services, physical and mental health state, violence against women, and care for ill and disabled relatives. The survey was conducted in cooperation with the US Commonwealth Fund, and this joint enterprise provides for comparative perspective, enabling a broader understanding of the findings. Both of these research initiatives support previous assessments of women's lower health status, and stress the importance of continuous research and dissemination of information among health professionals, policy makers, and recipients themselves.

2. Equality in Health Care

Under the law, most health care services available for men and women residing in Israel are included in the basic basket of services. However, up until recently, a range of medications for treating the gender-related illnesses of breast cancer and osteoporosis were beyond the basket's realm. Breast cancer is the most prevalent cause of death among young women in Israel, and osteoporosis affects women over 65 four times more than it affects men over 65 (24% and 6% respectively).

Recent protests and reports in the mass media by women's organizations have helped spark a public outcry over the lack of treatment. In a move perhaps influenced by this uproar, the Gertner Institute for Epidemiology and Health Policy Research, a research institute supported by the Ministry of Health, convened a Consensus Conference in December 1999 to publicly discuss the inclusion of specific medications for osteoporosis (Alendronate and Raloxifan). Following the conference, recommendations were made to the public committee in charge of determining the medication and treatment available in the basic basket of services, and in January 2000, it was decided to include the aforementioned medications, as well as the expensive Herceptin drug, - a novel anti-cancer therapy approved by the FDA (USA Food & Drug Association) in 1998 - within the basic basket of services.

3. Special Health Services for Women

3.1. Pre/Post-Natal Services: Delivery Rooms and Maternity Wards

The Health Ministry has recently begun to focus on the improvement of hospitalization conditions in maternity wards. The need for a revamping of hospital facilities and a rethinking of hospitalization conditions appear all the more urgent presently due to a sharp rise in overall births: 15% from 1993 to 1998. Beyond the important rise in the number of births, the Health Ministry has reported a dramatic 46% increase during that 5 year period in the number of infants with birth weights of 1,500 grams and less. This sharp rise in births, with its high percentage of infants requiring intensive care, has stretched Israel's maternity wards, delivery rooms, and pediatric intensive care units well beyond capacity.

Yet despite the heavy criticism, a study of 1,760 women giving birth in hospitals found 70% of the women reporting high levels of satisfaction with the overall treatment they were given. Significant to the changing norms of health providers in Israel, who still hold onto the paternalistic doctor-patient relationships, satisfaction was highest among women who reported a high degree of control in decision-making and intervention, and receiving precise information from the medical staff. Also, in choosing a hospital to give birth, women gave high priority to the presence of an intensive care unit and advanced neonatal care – elements which seem to have been found in a majority of cases.

3.2. Geriatric Services

In 1998, the average life span for Israeli women was 80.3 years, and for men 76.1 years. In Israel as in most other industrialized nations, women live longer lives than men, yet Israeli women maintain a smaller life span advantage than do their counterparts in other countries. Moreover, researchers note that the quality of life of elderly women is in general worse than that of elderly men. They point to differences in health factors such as chronic disease (including high blood pressure, presented by 53% of women and 42% of men; and osteoporosis, presented by 24% of women and only 6% of men), in addition to subjective perceptions of health status: 44% of men over 65 but only 30% of women over 65 described their health as being “good” or “very good”.

Seventy percent of elderly women and 56% of the men estimated their health as being “not good” or “not very good”. Elderly women in general are less independent in daily activities: 42% of the women and only 27% of the men need help in at least one of the domestic daily activities. Gender difference are also reflected in mental health among the elderly: more women than men report depression (15% and 9%, respectively). This finding is in line with gender difference in parameters of mental health in the younger age groups. Experts note that more efforts should be put into enhancing functional independence during aging, in order to increase the quality of life.

Meanwhile, elderly women are still the main recipients of both institutionalized and "community" cares. As was already mentioned in the previous Report, in 1996, women – who comprised 57% of all Israelis over 65 years - made up 70% of all hospitalized patients in geriatric hospitals. Furthermore, in 1998, women comprised close to 73% of all 81,000 recipients of long-term care benefits, with an increasing proportion being treated through the community rather than through geriatric institutions. Usually, this “communal care” is in fact the care given by just one person, either a relative (most often a woman relative) or a professional caregiver.

Article 12 Equality in Access to Health Care4. Family Planning among Israeli Women*4.1. Legal Abortions

As mentioned in the previous Report, the only approval required for an abortion is that of the Committee for Approval of Termination of Pregnancies. In 2000, 42 such committees were operating and reviewing the cases of women requesting an abortion. Beyond these 42 committees, as a result of a 1994 Ministry of Health directive which stated that statutory committees were not permitted to examine applications for abortions of pregnancies that have developed beyond the 23rd week, special regional committees were set up to review these less routine cases. In the year 2000, six such special committees existed. Between 1995 and 1998, they reviewed the application of 594 women and approved 498 of them (84%) – overwhelmingly based on clause 3 of the penal law's dispositions on abortions (namely the possibility of mental or physical disability of the future child).

4.2. Abortion rates

Since 1980, the number of legal abortions performed in Israel has fluctuated between an estimated 14,000 to 19,000 a year. The number of abortions performed in 1999 remained within this bracket: 18,785, accounting for 12.2% of all known pregnancies that year.

The second half of the 1990s seems to have witnessed a slight change in the proportions of abortion approvals per applications, as well as the actual number of abortions performed. While in the early 1990s, 91% of the applications were approved and 94% of those approved were actually performed, by 1999 the rate of approval reached 95.6%, and the rate of performance was 95.5%. Central Bureau of Statistics in-depth research into the demographic and social characteristics of applicants to the committees suggest not to conclude that the committees' policy has changed, but rather to attribute this to the prior selection conducted by the social worker before the application actually reaches the committee. The ratio of the various clauses for approval has remained unchanged: out-of-wedlock pregnancy remains the major reason for approving termination of pregnancy, constantly comprising over 40% of the approvals since the late 1980s, reaching over 50% in 1998.

Article 12 Equality in Access to Health Care

Within the Jewish population, the largest drop in fertility occurred among women born in Europe and America (from 2.8 in the early 1980'-s to 2.3 children on average in 1998), and the smallest drop occurred among women born in Israel of African origins (from around 3 children on average in the early 1980'-s to 2.84 in 1998). Significantly, the group of women who are Israeli born, whose origins are also Israeli, has actually experienced an increase in birth rates (from 2.7 in the early 1980'-s to 3 in 1998). It should be noted that while all population groups have experienced consistent decrease in fertility rates since the early 1980'-s, this trend has changed in the mid 1990'-s, and since then there is a slow but steady increase back to the rates of the 1980'-s in all population groups except the Druze. It is still too early to tell whether the present trend represents a turning point or only a temporary change.

Fertility treatments in Israel continue to be both highly developed and well subsidized. Israel continues to hold a world record of 22 in-vitro fertilization (IVF) clinics, one such center for every 270,000 inhabitants. In May 1999, four more clinics were in the process of being approved, which would bring the rate to one center for every 230,000 inhabitants. In 1994, 8,000 cycles of IVF treatment were performed, with some women receiving more than one cycle of treatment. The cost covered by the medical insurance per one cycle of treatment stood at 12,000 NIS in 1999 (about $2,800).

Relating specifically to women's life expectancy, it should be noted that the life expectancy of Arab women is lower than that of Jewish women: in 1998 the life expectancy of Jewish and Arab women was 80.7 and 77.7, respectively.

7. Mortality Rates and Causes of Death

In 1997, an equal number of men and women died of illnesses – 17,000 of each sex. One third of the deaths among both men and women were from cardiovascular diseases and almost one fourth were from cancer. Deaths caused by external factors accounted for 3% of all deaths of women and for 7% of all deaths of men.

7.1. Infant Mortality Rates

From 1983 to 1999, infant mortality rate has more than halved, standing in 1999 at 5.8 deaths per every 1000 live births (4.5 deaths among Jewish newborns, and 9 deaths among non-Jewish newborns).

7.2. Maternal Mortality Rates

The maternal mortality rate has remained generally low since 1985. In 1995 maternal mortality stood at six deaths per every 100,000 live births, fewer than in the European Community, the United States and the United Kingdom.

7.4. Breast Cancer and Mammograms

A 1998 national survey of women's health found that 52% of Jewish women and 24% of Arab women had a mammography screening in the two years prior to the survey. More information on Arab women and mammograms is supplied below.

8. Hospitalization

8.1. General

Overall, women visit doctors 30% more frequently than men (7.7 visits a year per woman and 5.9 per man), but the frequency of women's hospitalization in comparison to the rate of men's hospitalization in fact vary greatly according to age groups. Hospitalization rates for male infants, up to one year of age, are 30% higher than those for baby girls. Hospitalization of females under the age of 15 remains lower than that of their male counterparts. After the age of 15, hospitalization rate among Israeli women exceeds the rate of men, and continues to rise sharply in every age group. Between 15-44, hospitalization rates among women (not including admissions to maternity wards) are almost 60% higher than those of men. By the age of 45, the hospitalization rate of males and females is approximately equal, and beyond the age of 65, the hospitalization rate of males rises by almost 40% above that of females. Not surprisingly, higher hospitalization rates for women correspond with their fertility years.

8.2. Mental Health and Psychiatric Hospitalization

In 1995, women comprised 44% of all psychiatric hospitalizations. Although the rate of hospitalized men exceeded the rate of hospitalized women until the ages of 45, hospitalization rates for attempted suicide and self-inflicted injury were higher for women than for men in all of the age groups (except for the over-75s, in which rates are identical for men and women). Indeed, women comprise 60-65% of all reported attempted suicides. In the younger age group, over 80% of attempted suicides between 1990-1996 were female.

In the 2000 Brookdale survey 39% of the women were found to be suffering a high level of depression – a rate similar to that of their US counterparts. However, only 9% of the Israeli women, compared to 17% of the American, were diagnosed by their doctors as suffering from depression. The researchers view this as further support to the theory of under-diagnosis of depression in women, and the gravity of this problem in Israel. They also reveal the difficulties women have in access to mental health services, and call for developing more frameworks for these services.

9. Risk Behaviors as Health factors

9.1. Smoking

Smoking is twice as prevalent among men as among women: 34% and 16% respectively among those aged over 20. In the 25-44 age group, the rates are 42% for men and 21% for women. One explanation for the high numbers of smokers in this age group is the high prevalence of smoking during army service.

9.2. Eating Disorders

As in all industrialized countries, Israeli women and girls are at high risk for eating disorders, with intense pressure to meet an elusive and unhealthy ideal of thinness. For teenagers, Israel seems to be the dieting capital of the world: in 1994, about one in three teenage girls reported dieting to lose weight. This finding put Israel ahead of 23 other developed countries for dieting among teenage girls. Interestingly, though boys in Israel diet less than do girls, they too lead in international ranking of dieting. In a study conducted in the late 1980s, 2.5% of women aged 21-45 reported vomiting as a form of weight control; 1.3% of women in this age group said they had been diagnosed as anorexic (Woman's Health in Israel, p.147). More on eating disorders is found under the new section on the Girl-Child.

9.3. Violence as a Health Factor

Violence against women is increasingly being recognized as an important factor in women's state of physical and mental health. Most domestic violence takes the form of rape and physical abuse. According to the WHO Regional Office for Europe, Israeli women were ranked in 1992 close to the European Union's average with respect to mortality from homicide and purposeful injury. The 2000 Brookdale research - which for the first time provided formal findings on the extent of physical and sexual violence against women as well as findings concerning domestic violence against women in Israel - found that 2% of all adult women in Israel (34,000) were victims of rape, 4% (68,000) were victims of sexual violence, and 8% (136,000) were victims of physical violence. More than one in every ten women (11.5%) have experienced some form of domestic violence, ranging from threats to physical or sexual attacks – about 200,000 women which according to some researchers should be considered a minimum estimate.

Indeed, the distressing reality of domestic violence as a major health hazard is confirmed by the numbers obtained by the recently established Ministry of Health database which quantifies the number of women and children admitted to emergency wards with injuries following domestic violence and neglect - and who were subsequently referred to social services - in 27 of the 33 general hospitals in Israel. The data show that in 1998, 1512 women aged 18-64, 131 women over the age of 65, and 1,860 children were admitted to emergency room as a result of violence. Among women under age 65, the overwhelming majority of the cases (89%) were of physical abuse. Among older women (65+), just over half were cases of physical abuse, and 35% were cases of neglect or withholding of care. Of the children, just over half (52%) were girls. Among younger children (0-5), a slightly larger proportion of children reaching the emergency room (55%) were boys, predominantly as a result of neglect and withholding of care. In the 6-14 age group 55% were girls. The category with the largest sex difference was that of sexual abuse, where twice as many girls as boys were victims. Among adolescents (15-18) girls predominated in all categories of abuse, with the exception of the neglect category.

Despite the aforementioned alarming statistics and contrary to recommendations made by the 1996 Parliamentary-Investigative Committee, medical professionals in Israel still lack appropriate training to handle domestic violence and violence against women. On the academic training level, an inquiry with the Ministry of Health in 1997 revealed that none of the medical schools had included the subjects of domestic violence and violence against women as specific courses in the regular curriculum. On the concrete-practical level, statistics from the 2000 Brookdale survey found that a very low rate (22%) of the women victims of domestic violence discussed it with medical professionals (doctors, nurses, etc.), where most of the conversations (77%) having been initiated by women and only 9% by the health professionals. Even when conversations took place, only 16% of the women were referred to the police, and 32% were referred to domestic violence support services. Likewise, while 73% of the women who had been subjected to sexual and physical violence and turned to medical care were asked about the cause of their injuries, only 18% being referred to support services such as the sexual violence help centers

The total number of AIDS patients in Israel during 1999 was 622 (494 male and 128 female). That year, 440 of these patients died. There were 2,078 known cases of HIV-positive individuals in Israel in 1999. Of these, 34% (707) were women, a definite increase from 1995, when women comprised 26% of HIV-positive individuals. Most of these women had contracted the virus outside of Israel. Since the first statistical documentation of AIDS in Israel in the early 1980s, the proportion of female HIV carriers has increased, significantly, especially since 1992.

11. Women in Health Care

11.1. Women in Medical Schools

By 2000, women made up almost 50% of all medical students in Israel; a 10% rise in one decade, and comprised 68% of third degree medical students.

While by 2000, more than 37% of all practicing doctors in Israel were women (10,749 out of about 28,600), no woman heads a major hospital, one woman heads a peripheral mental hospital, one serves as a deputy head of an intermediate size hospital, and four women are administrative directors of hospitals.

11.3. Senior Positions for Women in the Health System

The National Insurance Law - 1994 established a Health Council whose functions are described in the Law. Section 49 of the Law stipulates the makeup of the Council, stating that "in the makeup of members that are appointed amongst government workers there will be representation of both sexes in at a least a quarter of the total makeup."

In four out of the five districts of the Health Ministry, the district's doctor is a woman. The

Article 12 Equality in Access to Health Care

of each district has extensive authorities that are given validation by the ordinance for the nation's health and the regulations of the Health Ministry on different topics such as public health, preventative medicine, family care (mother and child/nursing), supervision and licensing of medical institutions, burial, etc.

In addition, the Ombudsperson in relation to the National Health Insurance Law is a woman, filling an important statutory role on the topic of insured persons' rights for state health insurance.

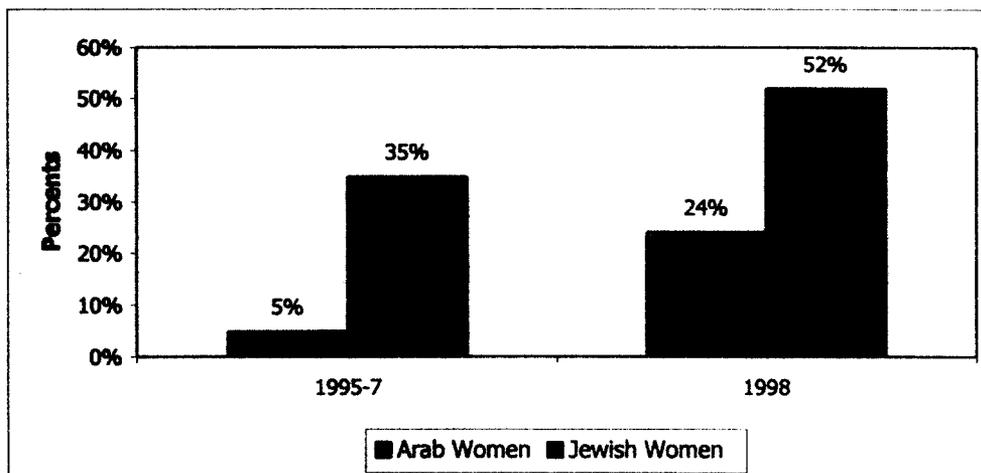

12. Arab Women's Health

12.1 The Relationship with the Doctor Providing Treatment, Access to Services and Health Awareness

According to the 2000 JDC-Brookdale Institute Survey (discussed earlier under Article 5), an astoundingly low percentage of Arab women are treated by female doctors (8%), compared to 49% of Jewish women. Amongst Arab women, 22% (in comparison with 8% of Jewish women) do not feel comfortable talking to their family doctor about issues relating to their health. In general, Arab women express a relatively low level of appreciation for their doctors and visit them less often than Jewish women. Eighty-three percent of Jewish women saw a gynecologist regularly, compared to 64% of the Arabs. Most of the Arab women (60%) preferred a female gynecologist, compared to 33% of the Jewish women. Higher rates of Arab women said that at least once during the previous year they had not received medical care when they believed they required it (41%, compared to about 10% among Jewish women); had not seen a specialist when they believed they needed it (57%, compared to about 20% among Jewish women); and had not bought medication due to cost (29%, compared to about 15% among Jewish women). Higher rates of Arab women also reported encountering difficulties when seeking medical or mental health care. Regarding health promotion activities, lower rates of Arab women reported discussing health promotion issues such as smoking, diet, physical activity, Hormone Replacing Treatment and calcium intake with their physician than did Jewish women. More than twice as many Jewish women said they knew about osteoporosis or took calcium supplements that did Arab women.

12.2 Mammograms in the Arab Sector

As mentioned in the previous Report, according to the National Health Insurance Law - 1994, the sick funds cover all women in the 50-74 age group for a mammography examinations once every two years. During 1998, a project for early detection of cancer was initiated in the Arab sector. The project yielded an almost five-fold growth in the rate of Arab women undergoing mammography screenings, while still falling behind Jewish women. The full rates are presented in the chart below.

12.3 Other Health Data

Statistics from a survey conducted by the Center for Disease Control Amongst Females, published in 1999, indicate that 17% of Jewish women and 5% of Arab women receive hormone replacement therapy. An additional 13% of Jewish women and 6% of Arab women have received this treatment in the past.

Of the 520 maternity centers that currently exist in Israel there are 175 (35%) in Arab settlements.

One of the Brookdale 2000 survey's findings is that a higher proportion of women with a high level of depression exists within the Arab sector (45% of Arab speaking women interviewed, compared to 34% of the survey's Hebrew speaking subjects). Moreover, 39% of Arab speaking women suffering from a high level of depression were not diagnosed as such by a physician (compared to 28% of Hebrew speaking women).

Article 13

Social and Economic Benefits

1. Social Benefits and the Welfare State in Israel

1.1. Social Benefits

The social insurance system in Israel covers all major contingencies of income loss in modern industrial societies, including short-term payments aimed to replace the wages of those temporarily out of the work force (due to dismissal, work injury, giving birth or military reserve service) and long-term payments, aiming to guarantee subsistence to those permanently out of the work force due to old age or disability, to dependants and to families facing the economic burden of raising children. All long-term benefits (except for child allowances, which are nominated in monetary values) are calculated as a given percentage of the average monthly wage, which as of January 2001 stands at 6,964 NIS (approximately $1,700). The National Insurance Institute (NII) is responsible for the administration of the social insurance programs.

The issue of social Benefits has a special significance to women due to their high presence within social benefits recipients in Israel. Thus, for instance, in 2000, women comprised close to 73% of all recipients of long-term care benefit, a figure obviously related to women's higher longevity. Furthermore, while only 12.2% of the male recipients of old-age pensions also received income supplement, 20% of the female recipients received both benefits.

The following will present developments and changes in this area since the submission of the previous Report.

1.1.1. Maternity Insurance

One of the main social benefits women may receive is the maternity insurance, which covers a hospitalization grant, a maternity grant, a birth allowance and a maternity leave allowance. A 1998 amendment to the National Insurance Law - 1995 provides for the granting of a maternity grant, with adequate adjustments, to those who have adopted a child under the age of 10 years (when a couple adopts a child, a grant is given only to one of the parents). A recent 2000 amendment to the law has doubled the amount of maternity grant payable from the fifth child onward, and set it as 40% of the average wage.

Article 13 Social and Economic Benefits

In 2000, 132,000 women received a maternity grant, a 2% increase from the 1999 figures. In addition, close to 70,600 women received maternity leave allowances (equal to the woman's net income), constituting 53% of all births that year. While this rate suggests that only slightly more than half of the women who gave birth in 2000 were eligible for the allowance in terms of working the required amount of months prior to the birth, it still reflects a consistent increase in the rate of women who are eligible for the allowance. In fact, it is more than a 60% increase from 1990, which is explained by the increase in women's general participation in the workforce, as discussed under Article 11 above. Significantly, according to 1997 data, 94.5% of the women who received maternity leave allowance in 1997 were Jewish, a rate which is totally disproportionate to their rate among women who gave birth that year, which was only 70.5%. This disproportion reflects the huge difference in the rate of Jewish and non-Jewish women's participation in the workforce: 93% of the women who participated in the workforce in 1997 were Jewish, and only 7% were non-Jewish.

Another benefit under maternity insurance is the high-risk pregnancy grant, which entitles a woman on high-risk pregnant leave to receive the equivalent of her salary from social security. Recent amendments to the National Insurance Law - 1995 have refined and expanded this benefit in several ways. Thus, a 1998 amendment to the National Insurance Law - 1995 provides for the inclusion of high-risk pregnancy as part of the work period.

In addition, a 2000 amendment to the Law raised the limit of this benefit setting it at 100% of the average wage (compared to 70% in previous years).

1.1.2. Old Age and Survivors' (Widows') Benefits

Old age and survivors' benefits comprise the largest insurance branch at the NII (34.7% of the total benefits paid in 2000). The number of old age and widows' benefits recipients rose to more than 657,000 in 2000, a 3.4% rise from the previous year. This rise reflects mainly the growing number of the elderly population in Israel, and is not due to immigration, since the flow of immigration has slowed down in recent years.

The basic old-age benefit amounts to 16% and 24% of the average wage for a single person or for a couple, respectively. Recipients of old age and widows' benefits who have no other income, or whose income from another source is low, are eligible to receive income guarantee according to the Income Support Law - 1980. In 2000, this amounted to 30.8% of all recipients of old age and widows' benefits.

Various attempts have been made in recent years to legislate an obligatory pension law for all workers in Israel, thus far without success. It must be noted, in this context, that more women than men suffer from the lack of employment pension, since more women retire without ever having participated in the formal labor-force, or without ever having a pension plan, or without accumulating enough pension rights due to their irregular work patterns.

1.1.3. Disability Insurance

Every Israeli citizen aged 18 or over and not yet 60 (women) or 65 (men), and whose degree of disability is at least 75% is entitled to a means-tested monthly disability pension at the rate of 25% the average wage for a single person, with additional dependent's increment paid for the dependent spouse and children. A housewife, however, is entitled to a dependent's increment for her children only. Other benefits under General Disability Insurance include attendance allowance, a grant following decease, a disabled child benefit and a special benefit for a new immigrant.

In December 2000, more than 138,000 people received disability Insurance benefits, a 12% increase from the previous year. The rate of working women among recipients was 32.3%, while 10.3% of recipients were housewives.

1.1.4. Unemployment Benefits

A 1999 amendment to the National Insurance Law - 1995 reduced the limit for unemployment benefit, setting it at the average wage for the first 5 months of unemployment, and 2/3 of the average wage from the sixth month onwards. Two other amendments from 2000 reduced the total period of unemployment benefits eligibility in all categories.

1.1.5. Children's Allowances

Children's allowances are progressive allowances, that is the amount of the allowance in a given family increases from the third child onward. A 2000 amendment to the National Insurance Law - 1995 further emphasized this characteristic by substantially raising the amount of children's allowances paid from the fifth child onward (by 47%, 33% and 43% for the fifth, sixth and every additional child, respectively), whereas no change in the amount paid for the first four children was made.

1.1.6. Alimony Payments

In 2000, 22,884 women received alimony payments, an increase of 25.2% from their number 4 years earlier in 1996, as appeared in the previous Report. The overwhelming majorities (99.4%) were women with children: 36.8% had one child, 32.9% had two children, 17.2%

Article 13 Social and Economic Benefits

had three children and 12.5% had four children or more. In 2001, the allowances stood at 25% of the average wage for the alimony of a woman alone (i.e. 1,741 NIS, approx. $425 per month), 39.8% of the average wage for a woman with one child (i.e. 2,789 NIS, approx. $680 per month) and 49.8% for a woman with two children (i.e. 3,485 NIS, approx. $850 per month).

1.2. Poverty of Women

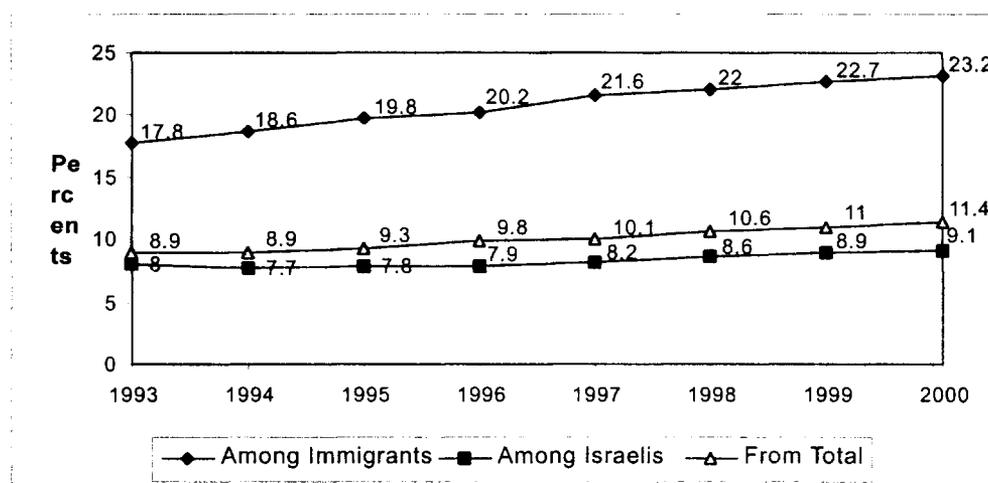

Statistics supplied by the NII (National Insurance Institute) show almost no gender-related differences regarding the incidence of poverty among the population at large, and poverty is documented in more or less equal proportions among men and women. Thus, in 1999, out of 2,003,000 adult women, there were 341,500 living in families below the poverty line (defined as 50% of the median disposable income). Out of 1,855,000 adult men, there were 282,700 living below the poverty line. These statistics show that women constitute 54.7% of the persons with income below the poverty line (having constituted 54.3% in 1995). Since women constituted 52% of the adult population in 1999, the conclusion that emerges is that the proportion of women in poverty is only slightly larger than their proportion in general in the population.

While this shows that in contrast to other western countries, an overall phenomenon of feminization of poverty has not taken place in Israel, analysis of further statistics reveals that among specific population groups with higher poverty rates, women's presence is higher. The sections that follow will discuss these groups.

1.2.1. Single-Parent Families

In 2000, single-parent families comprised 11.4% of all families in Israel, an increase from 9.3% in 1995. Moreover, while the yearly growth of the general number of families with children in Israel is 2%, the yearly growth of single-parent families has been 6-8% throughout the second half of the 1990's. A partial explanation for this growth is the immigration from the former USSR: in 2000 the rate of single-parent families among immigrants was 23.2%. Among immigrants the number of divorced and widowed women (about 6,000) is three times greater than the number of divorced and widowed men. Of the almost 105,000 single-parent households, in close to a third (31,826) of them the parent was an immigrant who came to Israel after 1990.

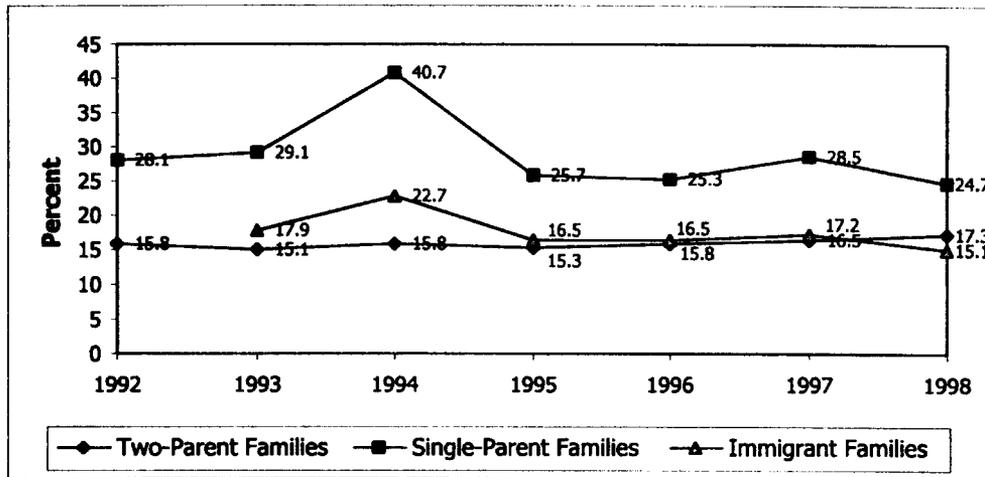

Chart 1 - The Rate of Single Parent Families, by Year, 1993-2000

Source: The National Insurance Institute, Unpublished data, 2000.

The overwhelming majority of the single-parent families (96%) are headed by women. The incidence of poverty among single-parent families is much higher than within the general society: in 1997, 28.5% of the single-parent families were below the poverty line, compared with 16.5% of two-parent families with children in general. This marks an increase from a rate of 25.3% in 1996, following a sharp decline in 1995 and 1996 as a result of the Law to Reduce the Scope of Poverty and Income Gaps. The incidence of poverty among children of single-parent families is even higher, and stood at 36.5% in 1997, also an increase from 28.4% in 1996. This means that every third child of a single-parent (overwhelmingly single mothers) was below the poverty line. The general incidence of poverty among children in 1997 stood at 21.8%, meaning that every fifth child in Israel was below the poverty line. NII researchers explain that the main reasons for the regression in the economic state of single-parent families are gradual erosion in income-support benefits relative to the average wage, and the increase in the rate of single-parent families where the parent is unemployed.

Nevertheless, data from 1998 is more encouraging, as poverty among single-parent families and immigrant families decreased substantially (from 28.5% in 1997 to 24.7% in 1998 for single-parent families, and from 17.2% to 15.1% for immigrant families). It should be noted that 1998 data relates to a larger population survey group, that includes residents of East Jerusalem as well as self-employed persons.

Source: The National Insurance Institute, Unpublished data, 2000.

1.2.2. Poverty among the Elderly

Current statistics from the NII mark a substantial decrease in the level of poverty among the elderly, especially among elderly women. Thus, in 1998, 15.9% of elderly women were considered poor, compared to 16.3% of elderly men (the figures for 1995 were 19.2% and 18.9%, respectively).

Article 14

Rural Women

Since rural population in Israel is more or less limited to the Bedouin society and to some parts of the Arab population, it was decided to include further discussion of other vulnerable groups of women under this Article. Thus, this Article first discusses Bedouin women, and then proceeds to discuss women immigrants from Ethiopia, and women with disabilities. Both these subjects were not discussed in the previous Report, and the latter was specifically requested by the CEDAW Committee's in its Concluding Observations.

1. Bedouin Women

Only 8.6% of the Israeli population live in rural localities. The following paragraphs focus on one of the major population groups within this sector, the Bedouin community in the southern Israeli Negev desert. The Negev Bedouin numbers approximately 100,000 men and women. Half of them live in one of 7 Bedouin localities that were officially founded and recognized by the State, while the remaining half are scattered across the desert, living in villages and semi-nomadic encampments. A basic description of Bedouin women's situation appeared in the previous Report. For some more information regarding Bedouin women's personal status see Article 16 below.

1.1. Education

The Bedouin population in Israel suffers from low educational rates. In general, six out of ten Bedouin pupils in the Negev drop out of school, and only two per one thousand Negev Bedouin have university degrees.

The higher dropout rates for Bedouin girls remain a problem. Recent data shows that throughout grades 1-9 the boys make up more than half (51.4%) of the total number of pupils, except in grades 4 and 8. In the ninth grade boys already make up 53.7% of the pupils. In the unrecognized localities the situation is even worse: girls make up only 43.7% of the ninth graders.

Article 14 Rural Women

However, there is some development regarding the Bedouin's attitude to education, particularly to girls' education, so that experts now contend that most of the Bedouins believe in the importance of education and are not against educating their daughters. The problem is not attitude but economics, since parents are unable to finance academic studies. Consequently, special programs to encourage Bedouin women to continue into academic studies, such as developed by Ben Gurion University of the Negev, the academic institution closest to the areas in which the Bedouin reside, are of particular significance.

Some progress in terms of women's participation in academic studies is indeed indicated in the following data. Between 1977 and 1998, 143 Bedouin students completed their studies at Ben Gurion University of the Negev. The number of graduates is increasing annually, from one graduate in 1977 to 18 graduates in 1998. While the number of the Bedouin graduates is increasing we can still note a large majority of males, with some improvement in recent years, as depicted in the following table:

Table 1 - Bedouin Graduates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, by Year and Gender

Year	Gender of Graduates
	Males	Females

In 1999, there were some 250 Bedouin graduate and undergraduate students at Ben Gurion University; 95 were women, 13 of who are graduate students. In addition, 29 of the first year students were Bedouin women.

Most of the female Bedouin students are enrolled in the faculties of Humanities, Social Sciences, and Health Sciences and come from very large families living close to or below the poverty line. Before they could enroll in the university their grades had to be improved through private preparatory programs so they could close the gap separating them from other Israeli students.

1.2. Employment and Welfare

The Bedouins experience low participation in the labor force, and a high level of welfare services recipients, higher than that of the national rate.

With regards to women's salaries, the average monthly wage of a female Bedouin employee is only 50% of an Israeli female employee (while a male Bedouin employee's monthly wage is 55.8% of Israeli employee), as indicated by the following table, comparing the average monthly income of employees in Rahat (Israel's largest Bedouin locality) with the southern district and with Israel as a whole:

Table 2 - Average Monthly Wage of Employees, by Gender, 1994, 1995

In NIS

Rahat	3,201	2,941	3,360	692	1,313	1,726

Source: Statistical Yearbook of the Negev Bedouin, no.1 1999

Some progress regarding women's participation in the labor force is ironically indicated by the fact that women in the recognized localities have started turning to the Employment Service to receive unemployment benefits.

The low income per person in Bedouin families is reflected in the large number of recipients of income support benefits, which is almost six times higher than the national rate, as indicated in the following table:

Rahat	658.5	9.8	303.9	95.0

1.3. Health

1.3.1. Infant Mortality

Infant mortality is still high in the Bedouin community compared to the total rate in Israel. For example, in 1996 there were 12.1 deaths per thousand live births in Rahat, compared to 4.5 among the Negev's Jewish population, or to the national figure which stood at 6.3 that year. Major causes of death of Bedouin infants were congenital anomalies, premature births, respiratory distress syndrome and infectious diseases.

1.3.2. Other Health Indicators

A glance at the demographic data and the figures on immunization of infants and children reveals significant improvement within the Bedouin community. The rate of Bedouin infants immunized up to the age of one year is increasing from year to year, from 43.8% in 1985 to 80.5 % in 1995. The percent of toddlers immunized up to age two has increased at the same rate. Likewise, the number of infants registered at a Mother and Child clinic is on the rise too. In 1995 82.8% of all Bedouin infants were registered, compared to only 58.4% in 1985.

However, the data on immunization of infants and children reveal a gap between the recognized and unrecognized localities, with a higher percentage in the former. In both types of localities, most of the children receive the first inoculation of the triplex vaccine but less get the second and third inoculations in the unrecognized localities. In the unrecognized localities, in particular, there is lack of awareness of the importance of the vaccine and of completing the course of three inoculations.

As for Bedouin women's physical and mental health in general, a survey conducted by Ben-Gurion University researchers in 1999 among a representative sample of 202 Bedouin women (and a control group of 526 Jewish women) revealed higher rates of repetitive unitary infections, anemia, respiratory disorders reported by Bedouin women, as well as higher rates of exposure to family violence. Likewise, more Bedouin women reported depression and low self-esteem; the former in connection to family violence and the latter in connection to spouse's unemployment (36% of the Bedouin women reported unemployment of their spouses). The average number of children per Bedouin women who participated in the survey was 5.8, 14.4% were pregnant at the time and 55% reported being pregnant the year before the survey. The average marital age was 18.6, 60% reported being married to a family relative, and 35% reported being married in bigamous marriages.

1.3.3. Ritual Female Genital Operations (Female Circumcision)

No significant change took place in this area since the previous Report.

2. Immigrant Women From Ethiopia

2.1. Preface

During the 1980's, the State of Israel absorbed immigrants from two main countries: Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union. The Ethiopian immigration differs from the Soviet one in several aspects. First of all, in its size: In 1990, the Soviet immigration reached an outstanding number of approximately 30,000 immigrants per month, whereas the total number of Ethiopian immigrants reached 50,000. Secondly, Ethiopian Jewry evoked a special interest in Israeli and Jewish consciousness emanating from both its uniqueness and heroic operations taken prior the immigration. Finally, but most significantly, comes the immense cultural difference stemming from the distinct background of the Ethiopian immigration to Israel. These cultural differences have had major implications for the women immigrants.

Several factors have joined to effect the condition of the Ethiopian women immigrants: the general condition of women in Israeli society; the immigration process and the difficulties in the transition into Israeli society; and above all the culture gap between the Ethiopian and Israeli societies. The family structure in Ethiopia was traditional and patriarchal with a set hierarchy and strict rules. The division of labor between man and woman was clear. The father had a dominant rule in the household, which was expressed by his control of the financial resources. He was also in charge of decision-making, and privileged in acquiring an education. The man worked outside the home, being the sole provider of the family, and was the family representative. Handicraft, such as weaving and pottery, were mainly done by men. Consequently, the Ethiopian woman was totally dependent on the man. The woman was responsible for the household, raising the children and assisting the men in working the land. As a result, Ethiopian women immigrated to Israel lacking a profession.

On the other hand, there were certain social arrangements in Ethiopia intended for the protection of women's rights, some of which have been lost during the absorption into Israeli society. These included preserving the woman's maiden name after marriage; equal right in acquiring aid from the community during a marital dispute; equal right to divorce; right to have a resting period during menstruation and after birth. Furthermore, every woman in Ethiopia had one or two "protectors" who were usually her husband's friends that were in charge of protecting her from being hurt by her husband.

2.2. Education

The majority of the Ethiopian Jews did not take part in the educational system in Ethiopia. Among the few who did, women were a minority. Therefore, most Ethiopian women immigrants over the age of 18 do not have any formal education. On the other hand, their spoken Hebrew is better than that of the male immigrants due to having more contacts with the Israeli social institutions and agencies.

The condition of the younger women differs from that of the elder women, in that they participate in various educational institutions. The dropout rate is higher among men than women in all the various educational institutions. In High Schools, the dropout rate among the Ethiopian community as a whole is higher than among the Israeli population, 6.2% compared to 3.5%, respectively. Among the Ethiopian community itself, there is an especially high rate of dropouts among the boys compared with that of the girls (9% and 3.5% respectively). On the other hand, more than twice the number of men than women completed their studies in Higher Education Institutes.

2.3. Health Awareness

Ethiopian female immigrants are less aware of the use of contraceptives and of pregnancy tests. In addition, they are not aware of preventive testing such as breast cancer detection. Furthermore, as a result of keeping secrecy in issues concerning sexual transmitted diseases, they are more vulnerable to contracting Aids.

2.3.1 Ritual Female Genital Operations (Female Circumcision)

An academic study published in 1997 revealed that Ethiopian Jewish women immigrants to Israel report that ritual female genital operation was normative in their culture in Ethiopia, but expressed no desire to continue the custom in Israel (Grisaru, Lazer & Belmaker, 1997). The study found a variety of lesions in a third among 113 women who had undergone gynecological examination, with 27% showing total or partial clitoral amputation. The study reports the total cessation of the custom among this community after immigration to Israel.

2.4. The Family Unit

The role changes within the family that took place upon immigration to Israel are a source of tension in the home. Generally, the men are threatened by these changes which signify their loss of their previous uncontested control, and aim in preserving the previous family structure, whereas the women are interested in adopting the new changes. When conflicts arise, women tend to find aid in the social institutions within Israeli society, more so than men do. These institutions represent equal rights for both sexes and are run mostly by women. The men prefer to seek aid in the traditional manner by turning to mediation by relatives and elderly who represent the traditional Ethiopian social order and are run by men.

There is a relatively large number of Ethiopian single mothers, a phenomenon new to the Ethiopian community in Israel, that didn't exist in Ethiopia. Divorced or widowed women in Ethiopia would go back to their original families. In Israel, the original families are incapable of absorbing the single women due to poor housing conditions and financial difficulties. In addition to financial and parental difficulties, such women are exposed to harassment by men from the community, including their former husbands. The following table gives some idea as to the scope of the phenomenon of single women as a result of divorce or widowhood among Ethiopian women. Particularly noticeable is the high rate of divorcees among the immigrants.

2.5. Employment

One of the most important parameters measuring the success of an immigrant community is its integration into the workforce. Several studies were conducted by the Brookdale Institute during the 90's to evaluate this, and some of their findings are presented below. These study were conducted among men and women of various ages who had participated in various studies and job-training programs offered to Ethiopian immigrants by the Brookdale Institute. The studies were conducted as a tool to measure and evaluate the effectiveness of the different programs.

2.5.1. Professional Job Training

Much concern and efforts are invested in vocational training for the Ethiopian immigrants in order to equip them with knowledge and skills needed in Israeli industry. Special programs are geared for adults with emphasis on job training, and for the youth, with emphasis both on job training and on social integration.

Allocation of vocational training resources is problematic in terms of women's participation, since state funded professional job training is given to the family member who is regarded by the authorities as the family provider. In most cases, the family representative and provider is the male, thereby leaving the female under his patronage. Furthermore, vocational training is characterized by a sex biased occupational division. Study programs in absorption centers offer different workshops for men and women. Women are offered workshops training them for domestic occupations such as childcare and house chores, whereas men are trained for occupations outside the home. Nevertheless, where there are no male family members, female immigrants receive equal job training.

2.5.2. Finding Employment

Among the adult graduates of vocational training courses, the Brookdale studies found gender differences in employment rates. Most of the women graduates did not work in the field that they were trained, and a large number worked in non-professional jobs. In comparison, about 75% of the male graduates worked in the areas in which they were trained. Some of the men already worked at the time that they joined the course. Among the youth, on the other hand, there was no difference in the rate of employment among the sexes. About 50% of the Youth Project graduates and 80% of the Higher Education Institutes worked, both males and females. One common trait was found throughout the study, namely the visibly higher average salary of the men than that of the women.

2.5.3. The Effect of the Marital Status on Employment

Fewer married women join the workforce than single women. For example, among the graduates of the Youth Project 28% of the married women compared to 54% of the non-married join the workforce. The results of the study also indicate a higher rate of employment of women who are not mothers than that of women who are. The opposite is true with respect to the men: a higher rate of workforce participation was found with married men or men who have children.

2.5.4. Professional Ambitions among Ethiopian Youth

An interesting part of the study was ascertaining professional and personal aspirations among Ethiopian youth, including family roles. Almost all the girls (95%) want to work after they are married. Very few said that they would not work or that it depends on their spouses' approval. However, a much lower percentage (65%) said that they would work once they had children. It is important to note that a much lower number of men said that they would want their wives to work, but 20% said that it was dependent on their spouses' opinion. It would seem that the stand on the women working is independent of their economic status. Neither the men nor the women saw economic distress ("only if we need money") as an important reason for women to work, whether after marriage or after childbirth. No noticeable difference was found between the girls that have been in Israel a short time and those that have been here longer.

Article 14 Rural Women

Among high school students gender difference was found with regard to the vocation that they expect to acquire for the future. These expectations reflect the students' ambitions and how they view themselves as adults. These expectations can direct the abilities of the students to reach certain goals. Generally, it was found that Girls prefer to work in more academic fields- medicine, law and psychology, while, more boys prefer occupations in liberal and technical professions- engineers, teaching, journalism or acting.

3. Women With Disabilities

3.1. General and Legal Framework

About 10% of the Israeli population are people with disabilities. It is estimated that about half of them are women, although there has never been a thorough research to appraise the scope of this population nor to assess its particular needs.

In recent years, Israel has stepped forward in terms of its treatment of disabled people. On February 23, 1998, the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law - 1998 was adopted by the Knesset, anchoring for the first time the right to equality and human dignity of people with disabilities and creating a new system of obligations for the State of Israel vis-a-vis its disabled citizens. The principal impetus for enactment of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law - 1998 was "The Report of the Public Committee to Review Comprehensive Legislation in the Matter of the Rights of People with Disabilities" (hereinafter the "Public Committee") which was submitted to the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labor and Welfare in July 1997.

The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law - 1998 came into effect on January 1, 1999. The Law eventually adopted was only part of the complete Bill. It includes basic principles, general principles, equality of employment, accessibility of public transportation and establishment of a commission on equal rights for people with disabilities. The remaining chapters of the Bill were re-tabled before the Knesset within the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill - 1999, which has passed first reading in March 2000.

On August 1, 2000 the establishment of the Commission for Equal Rights for People with Disabilities was formally declared and is presently in its formative stages. Nevertheless, although two years have elapsed since the entry of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law - 1998 into effect, the majority of its provisions have not yet been implemented. One of the tasks put to the Commission is the particular promotion of women with disabilities, as it became clear in recent years that they suffer distinct problems and impediments in all areas of life. Thus, for example, according to the Commission, women with disabilities are subject to severe discrimination in the area of access to health services in general and in particular in the area of gynecological care. Apparently however, not only their particular needs remain unanswered, these needs and concerns are in general not even known to the relevant authorities.

In terms of non-governmental activities, within an NGO established in the early 90s called "B'Zchut" (with right, or entitlement) to protect and promote the status and rights of people with disabilities, a women's forum has been convened several times in recent years. Its aim was to focus attention to the status of women with disabilities, and it tried to advance the establishment of special health clinics to cater for women with disabilities, in cooperation with the Minister of Health Advisor on Women's Health. Unfortunately, the initiative did not come through and the forum was dismantled.

3.2. General Economic and Personal Situation

As a welfare state, Israel provides for subsistence means to all its residents, particularly to weak population groups who cannot earn a living, including the elderly, the unemployed, and the disabled. Accordingly, a chapter was added to the National Insurance Law in 1970, providing for minimal subsistence to anyone who due to physical, mental or emotional disability cannot earn a living, or whose earning capacity was cut down by 50% or more, and is not covered by any other law that provides for disability pensions. Since 1977, women who are home-makers were added to those eligible to disability pensions according to this law, even though they are exempt from social security payments (as explained in the previous Report). Israel is one of the few countries worldwide which grants this pension to home-makers.

In terms of subsistence support, there are three main categories of disabled people, in line with the source and type of their support: IDF (Israel Defense Force) disability pension, employment disability pension, and general social security disability pension. There are more men than women in all categories. The men's rate is particularly much higher among the IDF disability pension recipients and the employment disability pension recipients: women make up between 5%-7% and less than 10% of these two groups respectively. In late 2000 a Women's Forum Within the Army (IDF) Disabled Veterans Organization was established, aiming to re-examine the rights and benefits awarded to women disabled veterans and to act as their support group.

Article 14 Rural Women

While women's rate could be expected to exceed the men's rate within the category of the general social security disability pension recipients, they still make up less than half of those getting the general disability pension, due to a higher standard of disability which is required from women who are home-makers to be eligible for the pension. Women who are home-makers (as explained in the previous Report, only women can be classified as home-makers according to the National Insurance Law) have to prove a 50% medical disability, while others have to prove only 40% in order to be eligible for the pension.

With respect to general disability pension recipients, in 1997 they made up 3% of the adult female population (between 18-60) and 3.9% of the adult male population (between 18-65). Among this group of pension recipients, the rate of married women was lower than that of married men: 49% and 54% respectively. Moreover, 14% of the women were divorced or separated, compared to only 9% of the men. Within the general population of disabled people it is estimated that over half of the women with disabilities do not get married, and 17% are divorced or separated.

3.3. Special Health Concerns of Women with Disabilities

The family plays a very important role in the life of disabled women, as in the life of any other woman. However, what is taken as obvious for any woman may present immense difficulties for a woman with a disability. Gynecological services, delivery rooms, preventive medicine procedures such as mammography examinations are generally not equipped to fit the special requirements of women with disabilities. There is no separate discussion of examination and treatment of women with disabilities within the general education and training syllabus of gynecologists. There are very few special gynecological examination beds nation-wide, and disabled women report difficulties in receiving appropriate treatment. Special impediments are encountered by disabled women in relation to fertility treatments. Efforts by activists and NGOs have been going on for several years to promote the establishment of a special health clinic for women with disabilities. It is hoped that the establishment of the Commission will promote this initiative.

3.4. Employment

The majority of people with disabilities are not being employed and most of them have never held steady jobs. In a survey conducted by the Service for the Blind of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare it was found that the rate of unemployment of blind persons was 72% (March 1997). The estimate of the Rehabilitation Department of the Ministry of Labor and Welfare with respect to the rate of unemployment among people with severe disabilities, physical illness, mental illnesses and retardation is 70%-75%. In a needs survey (1992), unemployment levels among deaf people aged 30-64 were found to be at 18%-22%. It is estimated that the situation of women is even worse.

The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law - 1998 regulates the right of people with disabilities to employment equality in a central chapter: section 8 of the Law prescribes a prohibition on discrimination in employment on the grounds of disability, including an obligation to make reasonable accommodations. These accommodations include: ramps, elevators and flexibility in arrival and departure of the disabled to and from work, translation into Braille writing, and more. Pursuant to the Law, the Minister of Labor and Welfare and the Minister of Finance are charged with the enactment of regulations to determine State participation in financing the accommodations; regulations have not yet been enacted. Section 9 of the Law prescribes, as a transitional provision for seven years, the duty of a person who employs more than 25 employees to ensure adequate representation of people with disabilities, and in addition section 28 of the Law contains an indirect amendment of the State

Article 14 Rural Women

Service (Appointments) Law - 1959 with respect to the duty of adequate representation of people with disabilities in the State Service.

Article 15

Equality before the Law and in Civil Matters

The Committee has requested the Government of Israel to address the issue of gender sensitization of the judiciary. The research on gender bias within the Israeli court system that was conducted in the mid 90s was described in the previous Report. Following the publication of the research as a book in 2000, several conferences took place, and its results are currently being studied within the judicial system. According to Justice Orr, the Head of the Institute for Judges' Seminars, the subject of gender bias is on the Institute's agenda, and is to be included within the coming year's (2001-02) program, either as a subject in itself or as part of a broader seminar.

Article 16

Equality in Marriage and Family Life

1. Introduction

In view of Israel's constitutional system and its respect for religious pluralism as well as its recognition of the autonomy of recognized religious communities in matters of personal status, Upon ratifying the convention, Israel entered a reservation to article 16 insofar as the laws of personal status binding on the several religious communities in Israel do not conform with the provisions of this Article. In addition, Israel entered a reservation with regards to Article 7(b) of the convention, concerning the appointment of women as judges of religious courts, where such appointment is prohibited by the laws of any of the religious communities in Israel.

Having reviewed these reservations, in light of General recommendation no. 4 of the CEDAW Committee adopted in 1987, and its reporting guidelines on this matter, Israel maintains that it is unlikely that the circumstances in the foreseeable future will permit any change.

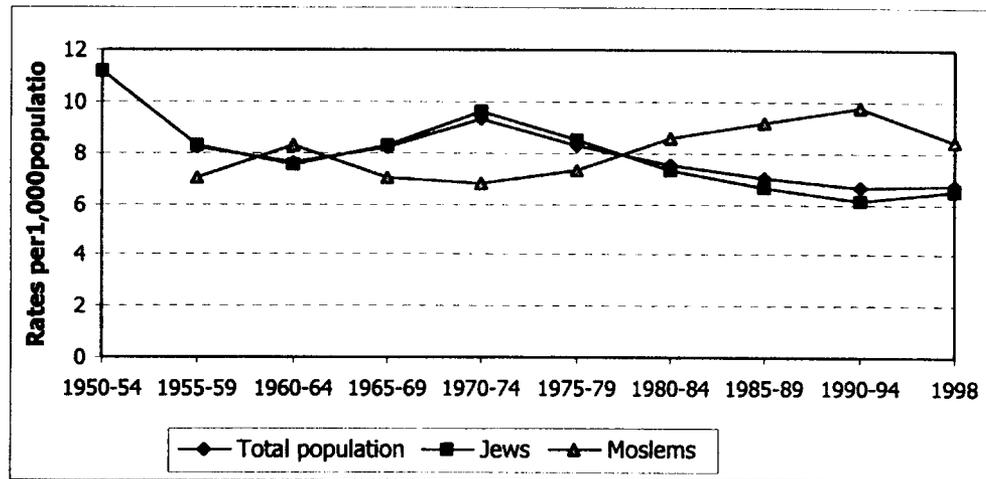

2. The Family in Israel: Some Demographic Data

As already mentioned in the previous Report, Israel is very much a family-oriented society. A 1999 study of familism and family-perceptions in Israeli society ranks Israel first among 21 post-industrial states in which, like Israel, women's educational level and workforce participation have significantly increased in the last 20 years. Relative to the other states in the study, marriage rates in Israel remain high, divorce rates are low, and birth rates are significantly higher (Fogiel- Bijaoui 1999, 130- 134).

2.1. Marriages

The familial characteristic of Israeli society is reflected in the following chart and table, detailing marriage rates, marital status and percentages of non-married and never-married men and women in different age groups.

When the rates of never-married people are examined separately, it is evident that throughout the different population groups, as Israelis grow older, those who never get married find themselves in increasing minority.

Another indication of the centrality of family-life in Israeli society is the relatively low marriage age, especially that of women, compared to other Western societies. The overall trend in all population groups is the rising of marriage ages for both women and men, while the gaps in the average and median ages of women as compared to those of men, in all population groups, remain more or less unchanging.

It should be noted that the data above depicts only marriages that are listed by the official marriage and divorce registrars, namely only those that are conducted by the formally recognized religious organs, since there are no civil marriages and divorces in Israel.

3. Minimum Marital Age

Until 1998 no minimal marital age for men appeared in the Israeli legislation, as oppose to women, whose minimal marital age was set at 17. A 1998 amendment to the Marriage Age Law-1950 has set a minimum marriage age for men at 17 too, and adapts the grounds for approval of under-age marriages (according to section 5 of the Law, as explained in the previous Report) accordingly.

The minimal age requirement is accompanied by provisions that make the arrangement of under-aged marriages a criminal offence. Despite the criminal sanctions, the phenomenon of minors' marriages has not been eliminated altogether, especially within the Moslem population, as the next table clearly shows:

The rate of approval of petitions to under-age marriages, according to section 5 of the Law (detailed in the previous Report), is extremely high, and stands at 75%. It must be noted, though, that the number of petitions brought to the court is a mere fraction of the actual number of minor marriages. Thus, between 1.1.97- 26.11.00, only 122 petitions for judicial permits to under-age married were brought to courts throughout the country. Of these, 89 were approved.

4. Same-Sex Couples

The broad approval of non-marital cohabitation in Israel, as discussed in the previous Report, has had an undeniable effect on the possibility of legal recognition of same-sex couples. This could be clearly seen in the most significant step thus far in that direction, namely the precedent setting Danilovitch case from the mid-90s, in which the El-Al Airline was ordered to award an air steward the same benefit in the form of a free ticket for his homosexual partner, as he would be awarded for a heterosexual partner, whether married or not. The Danilovitch holding can be understood in light of two developments within the Israeli legal system: first, a 1992 amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunity Law- 1988, which added sexual orientation as a prohibited ground for employment discrimination; and second, the widespread recognition of non-marital partnerships.

The most pertinent cases on this question are cases involving children of same-sex couples, which are mainly relevant to lesbian couples. This subject has risen in the late 90's, and several developments took place since then. The first one relates to equal access of lesbian women to the new reproductive technologies for purposes of raising a family. The procedures of Artificial Insemination and In Vitro Fertilization in Israel are regulated in the Public Health (In Vitro Fertilization) Regulation- 1987 and in an administrative directive issue by the Director-General of the Ministry of Health. Both arrangements had limited single women's (including lesbians) access to the reproductive technologies, and demanded they undergo psychological or social-worker evaluation before being accepted to treatment. These regulations were challenged in 1997 by several women and a declared lesbian couple, claiming they were discriminated. The High Court of Justice accepted the appeal, declared the regulations to be void, and ordered the Ministry of Justice to publish an administrative directive mandating equal access to reproductive treatments. The CLAF lesbian organization (described in the previous Report) reports a growing use of these methods by lesbian couples.

The most recent legal victory in that direction has been the High Court of Justice's decision to register a lesbian partner of a biological mother as the child's second mother, based upon a prior adoption order issued in California. While the majority holding, which was comprised of two women justices, was careful to emphasize the narrow and almost technical basis of the decision, namely the lack of the registrar's discretion to refuse the registration according to a foreign adoption order, the social policy implications of the decision cannot be ignored. Still, the registration is only administrative and has no substantive validity, and legally the Court's decision does not entail the granting of substantive recognition of lesbian non-biological motherhood, nonetheless in granting the second mother registration the Court does declare that at least officially, if not legally, “this child does have two mothers”.

A genuine substantive confrontation of the recognition of lesbian motherhood has taken place in one of the most prolonged legal battles in that direction, in which a lesbian couple who have been raising together three children born to each one of them through artificial insemination, have been pursuing legal recognition of their mutual parenthood over the children through a second-mother adoption order. During the course of their legal battle, Judge Yehudit Shtofmann, then Deputy President of Tel-Aviv and Center Family Court, has issued a guardian order for each woman over the biological children of her partner. On the other hand, their petition for joint second-parent adoptions was rejected by the Family Court, and at the time of writing, their appeal to the District Court was still pending.

Legal developments regarding same-sex couples have been taken place in the administrative area as well. Thus, for example, the ACRI (Association for Civil Rights in Israel) reported in 1998 that in response to a ACRI’s petition, the Civil Service Commission had adopted a new policy regarding beneficiaries’ rights, providing cohabitants of deceased civil servants with beneficiaries’ rights regardless of their sex. Likewise, the Ministry of Interior had adopted a policy, that is equivalent to its policy towards heterosexual non-marital cohabitants, awarding homosexual foreign partners of Israeli citizens with residents status.

5. Parents and Children

5.1. Child Support

Several Supreme Court cases in recent years have raised the age of obligatory child support until the child finishes military service. The scope of the obligation, though, is to be about a third of the scope of the obligation toward children under 18.

6. New Reproductive Technology and Surrogacy

As discussed in the previous Report, Israel has become the first state to positively sanction and regulate surrogacy, as legislated in the Surrogate Motherhood Agreements (Approval of Agreement and Status of Newborn) -1996.

As of October 2000, 78 surrogacy agreements were approved, resulting with the birth of 26 children in 19 childbirths (due to the prevalence of twins). Two other surrogate mothers are currently pregnant. 25 couples whose agreements had been approved terminated the process midway, or completed the surrogacy process which did not result in a pregnancy. Two of the prospective parents gave births to children unaided by a surrogate after the approval of their surrogacy agreements.

7. Personal Status of Arab Women

As mentioned above, the Marriage Age Law-1950 prohibits marriages under the age of 17. According to the National Council of the Child, 33% of Arab women aged 17-18 are married. This rate compliments data shown in Table 5 above, according to which the number of Arab women who are known to be married under the age of 17 and even 16 is quite large. However, during the years 1990-96, only 16 complaints of underage marriages were registered in all the police departments in Israel. 13 of these cases were closed.

As discussed in the previous Report, bigamy is considered a felony, punishable by up to 5 years in prison, under the Penal Code - 1977. Despite this, according to a 1999 HRA (Arab Association for Human Rights (NGO)) survey in the Negev, 40% of Arab Bedouin women surveyed answered that they live in polygamous marriages.

INTRODUCTION

1. The Government of Israel is pleased to submit its Fourth Periodic Report Concerning the Implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women. This Report describes the developments that took place since the submission of the Third Report in 2001, taking into account the General Recommendations adopted by the CEDAW Committee. In accordance with the reporting guidelines, this Report builds upon our previous reports. Accordingly, it refrains from repeating previous information and explanations, except when necessary.
2. All relevant governmental ministries and institutes were requested to supply data and information concerning their areas of operation. Non-governmental organizations were also asked to provide information prior to the compiling of this Report.
3. The Report was compiled by the Department for International Agreements and International Litigation in the Ministry of Justice.
4. The State of Israel has been conscious and aware of the issue of women equality from its very beginning, the Equal Rights for Women Law, 5711- 1951 ("Equal Rights for Women Law") was enacted only three years after the State was founded, and is a testimony to the emphasis given to women-related issues.
5. As will be demonstrated throughout our report, there is an overall positive progression in the implementation of CEDAW in Israel. The legislative sphere continues to advance with impressive measures, albeit its implementation is somewhat more moderate. Nonetheless, there are many legislative developments and court decisions, which demonstrate an across-the-board willingness and desire upon to uphold its CEDAW responsibilities in a good faith manner.
6. Similar to previous reports, a legislative supplement is included containing significant new legislation, which is described in details throughout the Report.

Legislative Measures

7. The main legislation enacted since our previous report, concerning the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women is:
8. The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law, 5761-2000 ("The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law"), this law prohibits discrimination by an individual operating a public place. Violation of the law is both a civil wrong and a criminal offence punishable by fine. The law applies to the State as well and has been interpreted broadly as applying to a host of public places, including schools, libraries, pools, stores, and other places serving the public. Court decisions have upheld this broad interpretation of the law.

9. Another major legal development was the amendment of the Employment of Women Law, 5714-1954 ("Employment of Women Law") (Temporary Provision) from 2004, granting men the privilege to share maternity leave with their wives and the eligibility for maternity leave allowance, provided their wives waive the privilege for the remainder of the maternity leave and return to work. This amendment was recently extended and is in force until the end of April 2007, thus enabling free choice as for the identity of the family provider during the maternity leave.
10. An additional significant law enacted, is the Limitations on the return of a sex Offender to the Surroundings of the Victim of the Offence Law, 5765-2004, ("The Limitations on the Return of a Sex Offender to the Surroundings of the Victim of the Offence Law"), granting a court (including a military tribunal) the authority to prohibit an offender from residing or working near the location of the victim's residence or employment. This, provided the Court finds that a possibility exists that the victim will suffer concrete mental damage due to the offender's proximity. The court is also instructed to take into consideration any damage caused to the sex offender due to these limitations.
11. Also, Section 2B of the Public Tender Law, 5752-1992 ("Public Tender Law") stipulates that in a governmental tender, a woman-controlled business (a business controlled by a woman, holding 50% or more of the means of control, alone or with other women, enabling her to direct its activity) shall be preferred in a tender, when receiving an equal score to a non woman-controlled business.
12. Another important amendment is Amendment no. 5 (2000) to the Prevention of Violence in the Family Law, 5751-1991 ("Prevention of Violence in the Family Law") which encompasses a significant change in attitude regarding firearms to those given a protective injunction. Previously, when a Court convicted an individual of a violent crime, it was not to refuse the prosecution's request to suspend whatever firearm license that individual might have had, or to deposit that firearm with the police, without special reasons. Pursuant to Amendment no. 5, of the abovementioned law a person given a protective injunction shall be prohibited from carrying or bearing a firearm, including one issued to him by the security forces or another state authority. This means a person is usually denied his right to carry and bear firearm following an injunction – unless certain conditions specified in the law are met. A permit to carry and bear a firearm requires specific conditions and circumstances - a court hearing in the presence of both parties, followed by a permit listing the conditions to safeguard the family members' safety.
13. Another important revision is Amendment no. 36 (2002) of the Criminal Procedure Ordinance, adding sections 59A and 62A. According to these sections, a police officer and/or a public prosecutor may not rely solely on a spouse's request not to conduct an investigation or prosecute in a sexual or violent offence among spouses, due to lack of public interest.

Judicial Measures

14. The main judicial measures taken since our previous report, concerning the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women are:
15. An innovative decision, anchoring affirmative action, by the High Court of Justice is H.C.J. 5325/01 The Association for the Advancement of Women's Basketball v. Ramat HaSharon Local Council et al (02.06.04). The Court examined the issue of fund allocation to sports institutions. The Court based its ruling on section 3A of the Budgetary Principles Law, 5745-1985 ("Budgetary Principles Law"), which establishes the criteria of equality for budget allocations to public institutions. The Court here applied the allocation criteria, adopted by the Ministry of Culture, Science and Sport, which sanctions affirmative action and grants women sports activities with 1.5 times the budget allocated to male sports activities. The Court ruled that the need for equality also concerns local councils and their allocation of funds. The Court held that the Ramat HaSharon Council, the Head of the Council, and the Ramat HaSharon Center for Education and Sport are to allocate funds according to the above criteria.
16. Another important ruling is H.C.J 6845/00 Eitana Niv et al. v. the Klalit Sick Fund (9.10.02). The ruling dealt with early-retirement arrangements for the Fund's employees, which provided preferable benefits to male employees up to the age of 65, whilst granting female employees these provisions benefits only up to the age of 60. The Court defined discrimination as "an unequal and unjust treatment given to equal persons". The Court thus stipulated that the Fund must provide women with the same rights as men within the retirement arrangements and that the Fund discriminated against the petitioners. The Court also stated that equality is a fundamental value in the Israeli legal system and that gender-based discrimination is one of the gravest forms of discrimination. The State of Israel, throughout the years, anchored equality between the genders and only exceptional considerations would justify overpowering it. Discriminating against women is clearly contrary to public order and essentially null. Subsequently, the Court ordered the removal of the discriminating provisions of the early-retirement arrangements.
17. Also, in September 2004, the Supreme Court ruled against publicizing complainants' identities in sex offences, following the conclusive acquittal of the accused (C.A.A 5877/99 Haim Yanos v. The State of Israel (28.09.04)). The Court stated that when it rejects the complainant's claims, it no longer has to continue and protect the complainant and her interests (privacy, dignity and reputation). However, above all, stands the significance of the public interest to encourage women to come forward and complain. The society's wish to expose criminals will be badly hurt if the names of complainants, even false-complainants, will be published.
18. Additionally, the Family Court in Jerusalem, in a landmark decision, ordered a husband to pay his battered wife 90,000 NIS (20,000 $) compensation, mostly as "punitive damages”) F.C.C 018551/00 K.S v. K.M (07.06.04)). These damages were awarded to the wife for “five years of on-going grievance by way of abuse, scorn, humiliation and enslavement”. The court here implemented the option stipulated by law for increased damages, due to harsh circumstances which she faced.

19. In another landmark decision from January 2005, the Supreme Court accepted the appeal of two women, a same-sex couple, to adopt each other's children. The Court ruled that under the Adoption of Children Law 5741-1981 ("Adoption of Children Law"), each case should be examined on its own merits and all the relevant circumstances need to be taken into consideration. The Court emphasized that the decision solely concerns this couple and is not a principled one, thus setting aside the question of same-sex relationships for future deliberation. The Court recommended that the Knesset amend the law to provide a solution to a real problem, and attempt to bypass controversial ideological problems that the issue presents. (C.A. 10280/01 Yaros-Hakak v. The Attorney General (10.01.05)).
20. In an innovative judgment, the Nazareth District Court determined, that the term "man and woman" in the Inheritance Law, 5725-1965, ("Inheritance Law") includes spouses of the same gender. The judgment was based upon the general inclination to broaden the interpretation of the term "spouse", in the Inheritance Law. (C.A. 3245/03 A.M. v. the Attorney General (11.11.04)).

Administrative Measures

21. Several major additional measures taken by the Government, concerning the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women were:
22. The Civil Service Commission added a segment in tender announcements regarding affirmative action for women. The Commission also established educational programs on the issue of affirmative action for women for members of tender committees.
23. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor initiated a special program to integrate single parents into the labor market, specifically those receiving income guarantees and alimony payments, with the intention of increasing single parents' earning capabilities, while raising their employment qualifications. The program grants its participants with the following benefits: a 9,600 NIS grant to those who increase their income by at least 1,200 NIS compared to their income in May-July 2003; single parents' full time employers are entitled to a financial grant of up to 12,000 NIS; travel expenses refund; vocational and professional training; and participation in fees for children in kindergarten and day-care centers. The program began in August 2003, and by March 2004, 30,000 single parents approached the Bureaus, 13,000 of them were referred to positions and 5,100 were placed accordingly. The dropout rate is about 30%. Also, 630 single parents are currently attending vocational courses, and 372 of them placed their children in day-care centers.

Current Situation

24. The following data reflects the current situation of women in Israel and the advancement achieved in the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women:
25. The legal field is one of the professions in which women have closed the gap as will be illustrated in the following figures.
26. The number of female judges continues to climb in conjunction with the rising number of judges in general. In October 2004, there were 262 women judges out of a total of 542 judges, (48.3% of the judiciary in Israel). The number of female Justices on the Supreme Court has risen to 40% (six out of fifteen Supreme Court Judges). Women continue to compose the majority of professional labor judges (67.3% of the judges, and 57.1% of the registrars), nearly half of the District Courts judges (41.3%), almost half of the Magistrate Courts Judges (48.7%) and more than half of the registrars (56.9%). Women have also increased their role as public-representatives in the labor courts (constituting 14.8%) representing employees and employers' unions side by side with professional judges.
27. Women remain a majority in the public sector of the legal profession. The retiring State Attorney was a woman, and as of July 2004, 113 (66.9%) of the 169 legal advisors in the Ministry of Justice were women, and a parallel percent of women were working in the State Attorney's and the Attorney General's offices (432 women and only 210 men) and the Public Defenders office (33 women compared to only 15 men). There were also 201 female legal-interns to 120 male legal-interns, and 22 women in the senior judge-equivalent ranks and only 8 men.
28. Women's representation on the Boards of Government Corporations is rising. At January 2005, women constituted 37% of the directors. There were 5 women (11.36%) serving as head of a board of directors (4 new nominations since our previous report), and 9 women (11.84%) served as CEO's of governmental corporations.
29. Higher Education - Women still constitute a majority among the first (55.9%), second (57.1%) and third (52.7%) degree students. There are no dramatic changes in the percentages when compared to previous figures. Women comprise a majority in fields such as humanities (71%), social studies (63%) medicine (50%), and life sciences.
30. Medical Administration - Women still compose a majority (5 out of 7) of the Ministry of Health's District Doctors. Women also head five major departments in the Ministry, and there are two women deputy director generals. There are 12 women (26%) in the National Health Insurance Council.

Article 1 - Definition of Discrimination against Women

The Constitutional Level

31. As elaborated in our previous report, although the right to equality is not explicitly included in the two Basic Laws enacted in 1992 and 1994 (Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, 5752-1992 ("Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty"); Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation, 5754-1994 ("Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation"), it is encompassed within the basic right to human dignity. This interpretation was repeatedly approved by the Supreme Court (H.C.J 6845/00 Eitana Niv v. the Klalit Sick Fund (09.10.02) - detailed above and below) as well as by many jurists in Israel, led by Chief Justice Barak.
32. Israel's legal system is multilayered, as detailed in our previous reports. The process of legislating basic laws is complicated and necessitates balancing between the various sectors among the Israeli society. Following the completion of this process, the state will report to the Committee accordingly.
33. Furthermore, the Israeli Constitution, Law and Justice Knesset Committee is in the process of preparing a consensual-based constitution, and has held over 60 sessions on drafting its text. Among the topics discussed are: due process guarantees, freedom of speech and assembly, the right to form and join trade unions, and the right to adequate standard of living.

Equal Rights Legislation

34. Since our previous report, several significant developments took place on the legislative level, with regard to women's representation in public bodies.
35. In June 2004, Amendment no. 9 to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 5748-1988 ("Equal Employment Opportunities Law") added pregnancy as one of the grounds of prohibited discrimination in the workplace, both as a job applicant and as an employee.
36. Section 2B of the Public Tender Law, added in a 2003 amendment, stipulates that in a government tender, a woman-controlled business, shall be preferred, when receiving an equal score to a non woman-controlled business.
37. In 2002 a new amendment to the Planning and Building Law, 5725-1965 ("Planning and Building Law"), added a mandatory representative of women's organizations to the National Council for Planning and Building.
38. In 2004, Section 9B, 9A was added to the Sports Law, 5748-1988 ("Sports Law") and concluded that all sports organizations, including sports associations, unions and federations, supported by the state, shall provide appropriate representation to women.

39. Further elaboration concerning these laws and others will be provided throughout this report.

Judicial Development of the Right to Equality

40. Over the years, the judiciary has contributed significantly to the development of the right to equality in general, and to gender equality in particular. The most recent judicial statement against gender discrimination was made by the High Court of Justice in H.C.J. 6845/00 Eitana Niv v. the Klalit Sick Fund (9.10.02). This petition concerned early-retirement arrangements for the Fund's employees, providing preferable benefits to male employees up to the age of 65, whilst granting female employees these benefits only up to the age of 60. The Court defined discrimination as an unequal and unjust treatment given to equal persons. The Court thus stipulated that the Fund must provide women with the same rights as men within the retirement arrangements and that the Fund discriminated against the petitioner. The Court also stated that equality is a fundamental value in the Israeli legal system and that gender-based discrimination is one of the gravest forms of discrimination. The State of Israel, throughout the years, anchored equality between the genders and only exceptional considerations would justify overpowering it. Discriminating against women is clearly contrary to public order and essentially null. Another innovative decision, applying affirmative action to the funding of female sport activities, was given by the High Court of Justice in a petition (H.C.J. 5325/01 The Association for the Advancement of Women's Basketball v. Ramat HaSharon Local Council et al (02.06.04)) filed by the Association for the Advancement of Women's Basketball against the Ramat HaSharon Local Council and others. The Court examined the issue of fund allocation to sports institutions and held that the need for equality also concerns local councils and their allocation of funds. The Court based its ruling on section 3A of the Budgetary Principles Law, which established the criteria of equality in budget allocations to public institutions. These criteria, adopted by the Ministry of Culture, Science and Sport, sanction affirmative action and require women sports activities to receive 1.5 times the budget allocated to male sports activities. The Court ruled that the Ramat HaSharon Council, the Head of the Council, and the Ramat HaSharon Center for Education and Sport are to allocate funds to female sports activities in accordance with the updated version as mandated by the Sports Associations' criteria.
