605. It may be said, however, that the disclosure of information by government authorities has not yet become as firmly rooted in practice as it is in the decisions of the Supreme Court. The absence of legislation imposing a duty of disclosure by public authorities, the lack of efficient, computerized archiving, and perhaps even a certain misplaced understanding of official secrecy deriving from the prevalence of legitimate security concerns in everyday life, have led to an unfortunately common set of habits and attitudes in some quarters of the public service, in which ordinary, proper requests for information relevant to the public or to the applicant are not always routinely granted, and sometimes are denied without sufficient justification. In recognition of the need to remedy this state of affairs, the Knesset is in the final stages of enacting a Freedom of Information Law, based on a previous draft bill prepared with the involvement of a coalition of NGOs. The draft law imposes a general duty of disclosure on ministerial offices, other State institutions, local and municipal authorities and corporations controlled by them; any refusal to disclose must have written justification.

606. Censorship of films and plays. Pursuant to Mandatory legislation, theatre productions and films have been subject to prior censorship by a civilian Censorship Council to protect against violations of public morals or sentiments or of public order. Over the years, the Supreme Court has considerably restricted the scope of the Censorship Council's discretion to restrict freedom of expression, firmly upholding the right "to create any creation, whether of sublime artistic merit or wholly lacking artistic merit, and even if, in the [Censorship] Council's view, it is a 'perverse mix of erotica, politics and deviance of all types'" (H.C.J. 14/86, La'or, supra; see also H.C.J. 4804/94, Station Film Ltd. v. Council for Review of Films, 97(1) Takdin 712).

607. Under the Cinematic Films Ordinance, 1927, no film may be screened without prior approval by the Film Censorship Council. The Council has the authority to disqualify a film in its entirety, to censor specific segments, or to set a minimum viewing age. The Ordinance provides no substantive standards for the decisions of the Council, and initially the Supreme Court displayed a reluctance to intervene in the discretion of the Council without a specific statutory foothold (see, e.g., H.C.J. 383/73, Avidan v. Geri, 28(2) 766), provided that the considerations weighed by the council were broadly related to questions of morals and good taste (H.C.J. 146/59, Cohen v. Minister of Interior, 14 P.D. 283). In the early 1960s, the Court for the first time applied the "near certainty" test to a cinematic production, overturning the decision of the Council to disqualify a newsreel which showed a violent altercation between citizens and the police. H.C.J. 243/62 Israel Film Studios v. Geri, 16 P.D. 2407. In the mid-1970s the Court applied this doctrine for the first time to a non-news film, in overturning the Council's decision to forbid the screening of "The Night Watchman", a film which involved a daring erotic plot against the background of the Holocaust. H.C.J. 549/75, Noah Films Ltd. v. Council for Review of Films, 30(1) P.D. 757. A decade later, the Court significantly expanded the protection given to artistic expression in films by holding that the Council could disqualify a film for injury to public sentiments only if there is a "near certainty of a severe, extreme, deep and crass injury to such sentiments, which may not be avoided". H.C.J. 806/88, Universal Studios Inc. v. Council for Review of Films and Plays, 43(2) P.D. 22 (decision to disqualify "The Last Temptation of Christ" by Martin Scorsese as injurious to sentiments of the Christian community overturned). The Court rejected the role of the Council as the arbiter of truth or of moral and educational standards, and will allow disqualification of a film only as a last resort, if less severe methods, such as setting a minimum viewing age, cannot prevent such a severe and near-certain violation of public order. H.C.J. 14/86, La'or v. Council of Review of Films and Plays, supra. Even the fact that a film contains material which constitutes a criminal offence, such as a violation of religious sentiments or obscenity (sects. 173, 214 of the Penal Law, 1977) is not sufficient to justify a prior restraint on screening. H.C.J. 806/88, Universal Studios, supra.

608. All television stations in Israel are bound, by law or practice, not to screen films which have been disqualified by the Censorship Council. This obligation does not apply to foreign televisions or satellite broadcasters.

609. The statutory arrangements regarding censorship of plays were similar to those regarding films, and were administered by the same Council. Following mounting criticism of the Council's decisions in this area, and the severe narrowing of its discretion by the Supreme Court, the Knesset decided in 1991 to repeal the Council's authority with respect to plays, initially for a two-year trial period, and then permanently, in favour of new criminal sanctions for obscene displays and publications (Penal Law, 1977, sect. 214). The term "obscenity" is not defined in new provision, and has yet to be interpreted by the Supreme Court.

610. Confidentiality of journalists' sources Unlike certain types of communications, such as between attorney and client, doctor and patient, psychologist and client, and sensitive security-related information, the right of a journalist not to reveal documents or sources of information is not protected by statute. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has recognized such a "journalist's privilege", to the extent that disclosure is not essential, or at least of substantial importance, to the prosecution of justice in connection with serious criminal offences, to avoid serious wrongdoing to persons or grave violations of public order; even then, a court will not order disclosure of the journalist's sources or information unless it is shown to be crucial in the concrete circumstances of the case, and other available evidence cannot fulfill the purpose for which the privileged information is sought. Cr.M. 298, 368/86, Citrin v. Disciplinary Tribunal of the Chamber of Advocates, Tel-Aviv District, 41(2) P.D. 337; H.C.J. 172/88, Time, Inc. v. Minister of Defence, 42(3) P.D. 139.

611. A Government bill to entrench the journalist's privilege is in the advanced stages of preparation, and will be submitted in the near future to the Ministerial Committee on Legislation.

612. Sub judice rules. As mentioned above, the Courts Law, 1984, prohibits publication of accounts of pending legal proceedings if there is a "reasonable possibility" that they will affect the course or outcome of the trial. One of the rare instances in which this sub judice rule was enforced involved articles published in a major daily newspaper during the trial of John Demjanjuk for crimes against humanity, in which the author purported to show that Demjanjuk was in fact "Ivan the Terrible" from Treblinka, a central question of fact in the trial and appeal. The paper, as well as its editor and the author of the article in question, were convicted of a violation of the sub judice rule after Demjanjuk's counsel successfully petitioned the High Court of Justice to force the Attorney-General to initiate criminal proceedings. H.C.J. 223/88, Sheftel v. Attorney-General, 42(4) P.D. 356.

613. In addition to the sub judice rule itself, the Penal Law also prohibits publications which express contempt or scorn for a judge and his manner of deciding cases, unless the criticism is "honest and courteous", and the matter is of public interest.

614. In practice, Israelis are inundated with local and foreign media. There are nearly 60 newspapers regularly published in Israel, of which 14 are dailies; 8 of the daily newspapers are in Hebrew, 1 in Arabic, and the others in English, Russian, and other languages. Literally hundreds of foreign newspapers and periodicals are sold on newsstands, and all people may subscribe to them freely. Radio broadcasts from around the region and beyond are easily received, and cable and satellite television broadcasts bring in an extremely broad range of foreign news and programming. Israel is host to a disproportionately large number of foreign journalists, who generally have the same freedoms, and are subject to the same censorship limitations, as Israeli journalists. They meet freely with government and military officials, and are provided daily with translations of articles from the Hebrew press by the Government Press Office. In certain instances, the freedom of foreign journalists is greater than that of their Israeli counterparts, such as in gaining access to areas where there is a risk of violence.

615. Prevention of discrimination based on political or other opinion In addition to the measures described above under this article, several laws contain provisions which aim to prevent interference with the free expression of political or other opinions. Under the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 5748-1988, both governmental employers and private employers with six or more employees are forbidden from taking a person's political or other opinions into account in making decisions regarding hiring, promotion, termination of employment, training, or wages and conditions of employment. The Council for Higher Education is forbidden from imposing any restrictions on freedom of opinion or conscience in rescinding accreditation for an educational institution (Council of Higher Education Law, 5718-1958, sect. 18). In national elections, all parties, candidate lists and prime ministerial candidates are given a fixed amount of free radio and television broadcast time (Elections (Modes of Propaganda) Law, 5719-1959, sects. 15-15 A).

Article 20 - Prohibition of propaganda relating to war or racial, national or religious hatred

616. War propaganda. The dissemination of war propaganda is prohibited by section 166 of the Penal Law, 5737-1977, which provides as follows:

"166. A person who, by making a speech in a public place or at a public gathering or by publishing any writing, endeavours to incite hostile acts against the government of a friendly State is liable to imprisonment for three years."

Under the standard of mens rea defined in the Penal Law (sect. 20), the above prohibition will apply not only to a person who clearly intends to incite to war, but also if that person is merely indifferent or careless regarding the possibility that such hostilities might occur.

Racism, national or religious hatred

617. Until the mid-1980s, there was no legislation specifically forbidding incitement to racism or national-ethnic hatred. Persons advocating racial, national or religious hatred could, and have been, prosecuted for sedition under section 133 of the Penal Law, which is defined to include "promoting feelings of ill-will and enmity between different sections of the population" (Penal Law, sect. 136). In such cases, the "near possibility" that a seditious statement would reach the ears of persons in Israel is sufficient for conviction (See Cr.App. 3795/95, Attorney-General v. Balhasan (person who advocated a campaign against "Satanic Islam" convicted of sedition)). For the most part, however, racist incitement was generally dealt with in judicial decisions in the context of the right to freedom of expression, with the courts displaying a wariness of placing prior restraints on racist expression, for fear of compromising the principle of free speech. As the court held in one case, "... the weakness of racism and incitement is the lie which they harbour, which is laid bare to everyone precisely by that free competition of opinions and ideas that makes democracy unique". E.A. 2,3/84, Neiman v. Chairman of the Central Elections Committee of the Eleventh Knesset 39(2) P.D. 225.

618. Two landmark decisions by the Supreme Court during the mid-1980s, which followed the approach to racist speech noted above, ended up prompting legislative reform. In the Neiman judgement (E.A. 2,3/84, supra), the Court overturned the decision of the Central Election Committee which disqualified the Kach party list, led by Rabbi Meir Kahane, from running for election to the 11th Knesset on free speech grounds, as well as on the ground that the right to be elected should not be limited without explicit statutory authorization. In another controversial judgement involving Rabbi Kahane's Kach party, the Supreme Court annulled the decision of the Israel Broadcast Authority, which refused to broadcast statements made by Rabbi Kahane or other members of the Kach party, except for those having "distinct news value", due to the inflammatory nature of the party's views and statements. H.C.J. 399/85, Kahane v. Broadcast Authority, 41(3) P.D. 255. In invalidating the decision of the Broadcast Authority, the Court relied not only on general principles of free speech, but also on the fact that the Kach faction was a legitimate political party, represented in the Knesset.

619. Legislative reform. In the aftermath of the Supreme Court's decisions Neiman and Kahane v. Broadcast Authority noted above, the Knesset enacted two legislative provisions specifically prohibiting racist incitement. The first was an amendment to the Penal Law, which made the publication of any utterance for the purpose of inciting to racism punishable by five years' imprisonment (sect. 144 B), whether or not the publication is true or actually resulted in racism. "Racism" is defined in section 144 A as "persecution, humiliation, display of hostility, or violence, or causing strife against a group or segments of the population, all due to colour or belonging to a race or national-ethnic background". Possession of material containing racial incitement, so defined, is punishable by a maximum prison sentence of one year. A later amendment to the Penal Law stiffened minimum and maximum sentences for roughly half of the offences in the entire Penal Law if they are committed with a racist intent, as defined above (Penal Law, sect. 144 D1). The offences covered by this amendment include all offences against a person's body, life, liberty, property and welfare; threats and extortion, hooliganism, nuisances, and abuse of office by public servants. Three of these offences are relevant to the obligations under this article. Under section 173 of the Penal Law, a person who "publishes any print, writing, picture or effigy calculated to outrage the religious feelings or belief of other persons", or who "utters in a public place and in the hearing of another person any word or sound calculated to outrage his religious feelings or belief" is liable to imprisonment for one year. Section 194 (b) of the Law forbids insulting a person in a public place "in a manner likely to provoke a person present to commit a breach of the peace"; and section 198 prohibits all acts "likely to cause public mischief". If any of these latter offences are committed with racist intent, then the maximum sentence is doubled.

620. The Knesset also amended Basic Law: the Knesset, to forbid any political party from running for election to the Knesset if, inter alia, its objects or actions, explicitly or by implication, show incitement to racism or denial of the democratic character of the State (Basic Law: Knesset, sect. 7 A). On the basis of this amendment, the Kach party was disqualified from running in the subsequent national elections, as its objects and actions were deemed by the Supreme Court to be "frighteningly similar to the most horrible examples which the Jewish people has experienced". E.A. 1/88, Neiman v. Central Elections Committee of the Twelfth Knesset, 42(4) P.D. 177, 197.

621. To justify the curtailment of the right to be elected, it must be shown that the racist incitement is one of the party's central and controlling aims, an eminent reflection of its identity, and not merely a marginal concern; the party's candidacy in the elections must be a means to realize such racist objectives; and the evidence of such racist objectives or actions must be clear, convincing and unequivocal. E.A. 1/88, supra at 196 (per P. Shamgar). The amendment of Basic Law: Knesset, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, has thus lowered the standard for placing prior restraints on racist speech in the context of Knesset elections, as it no longer requires a "near certainty" that the racist election propaganda will actually endanger the public peace. Similarly, the Parties Law, 5752-1992, prevents registration of a political party on the same grounds provided for disqualification of a party's candidate list in Knesset elections.

622. At the same time, the Knesset amended its own by-laws, to forbid the submission of any legislative bills which, inter alia, are racist in content (Knesset By-laws, by-law 134 (c)).

623. The Kach movement was disqualified from running in three successive Knesset elections. In 1994, following the massacre of Muslim worshippers at the Tomb of the Patriarchs by a Jewish fanatic, the Government outlawed the Kach movement and its offshoot, Kahane Chai, even though they were not involved in the massacre itself.

624. Under the Second Television and Radio Authority Law, 1990 (sect. 46 (a) (2)), the holders of concessions for cable television services may not broadcast any material containing racial incitement, and they bear a duty to ensure that none of their broadcasts will be liable to incite discrimination on grounds of religion, race, nationality, ethnicity, lifestyle or origin.

625. The defamation of any group as such, including national, racial or religious groups, is prohibited by law (Prohibition of Defamation Law, 1965, sect. 4). To the extent that such defamation, in each case, constitutes incitement to discrimination or hostility, then it arguably falls under the provisions of this article.

626. The Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 1948, section 4 (a), makes it an offence to publish, in writing or orally, any praise, support or encouragement to acts of violence that are likely to result in death or injury.

627. In practice, the laws described above, including those prohibiting incitement to racism and group defamation, are used sparingly, and only in the most extreme cases, so as not to infringe upon the freedom of expression.

628. In practice, the advocacy of racial, religious or national hatred contemplated under this article may often be controlled or prevented by the need to receive a permit to hold a public demonstration. The Israel Police has the authority to deny, restrict or place conditions on such a demonstration permit due to the likelihood of incitement or violence having a racial or religious cast. In such cases, the formal reason for denial of a demonstration permit will be a concern for violation of public order and security. Challenges to such denial of permits are discussed in the context of the right to freedom of assembly, under article 22.

Article 21 - Freedom of assembly

629. Although the right to peaceful assembly is not mentioned in any Basic Law, it has been recognized as among the fundamental freedoms deriving from the democratic character of the Israeli polity. H.C.J. 153/83, Levi v. Israel Police Southern District Commander, 38(2) P.D. 383, 398-399. As developed by the Supreme Court, the right includes the freedom of assembly, of procession and of demonstration, all of which involve the physical congregation of a group of people who wish to express, by speech or conduct, their views on a given issue in public. The Court has clarified in many decisions that the right to assembly, while not absolute, is to be enjoyed by all persons, regardless of the views they wish to espouse:

"There are those who argue that the intellectual basis for this liberty is the desire to guarantee the freedom of speech, which in turn contributes to the discovery of the truth. Others maintain that at the root of this right lie the existence and functioning of the democratic polity, which is based on freedom of information and freedom of protest. Still others claim that the freedom of demonstration and procession are essential components of the general freedom of a person to self-expression and autonomy of thought ... It would appear that the freedom of demonstration and assembly stands on a broad ideological basis, at the centre of which is the recognition of the value of the human being, of his dignity, of the freedom given him to develop his personality, and the will to maintain a democratic form of government. By this freedom, a means of expression is given to those who cannot avail themselves of the official or commercial means of expression. It is thus accepted in our system of law, as in those of other enlightened democracies, that the right to demonstration and assembly holds a place of honour in the hall of fundamental human rights ... Freedom of expression and freedom of demonstration do not mean only the freedom to express things that are pleasant to the ear. [It is] not only the freedom of children with bouquets of flowers in their hands to march in the city streets, but also the right to march of persons whose views are not accepted, when the very fact of their marching is irritating and maddening ... Both are entitled to march, and their right is not related to the degree of approbation or anger that they arouse ..."
Levi v. Israel Police, supra, 38(2) P.D. 393 at 398, 411.

630. In decisions handed down after enactment of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, the Supreme Court has indicated that the freedom of speech may be deemed to be included in the general guarantee of human dignity in section 2 of the Basic Law. It may thus be said that the right to peaceful assembly now has a definite, if implicit, textual footing in Israel's constitutional law. See, e.g., Dayan v. Israel Police Jerusalem District Commander et al., 48(2) P.D. 456, 458.

631. The restrictions on the right to peaceful assembly may be found in the Police Ordinance [New Version], 5731-1971, and in the Penal Law, 5737-1977. Under section 83 of the police Ordinance and relevant Police standing orders, a demonstration will require a permit if at least 50 persons will participate, and if it involves either (a) an assembly out of doors in order to hear a speech or an address on a topic of political interest, or to discuss such a topic, or (b) an assembly out of doors in order to proceed together from one place to another. Thus, no license is needed if the meeting or procession involves fewer than 50 persons; if it takes place indoors, or if it is not devoted to listening to a speech or an address on a topic of political interest or to discussion of such a topic, no matter how many persons participate; or if the participants at an outdoor protest or vigil stand and hold signs, without hearing a speech or lecture on a political topic or discussing such a topic. To hold a meeting or a march without a permit where the law requires one, or to disobey the conditions stated in the license, is a criminal offence. (Police Ordinance, sect. 89).

632. The Penal Law defines an "unlawful assembly" as any gathering of three or more people - even if they have received a license to demonstrate - who conduct themselves in such a way as to give "persons in the neighbourhood" reasonable grounds to fear that the persons assembled will cause a breach of the peace, or that their assembly will "needlessly and without reasonable cause" provoke other persons to commit a breach of the peace (Penal Law, sect. 151). Participation in an unlawful assembly is punishable by up to one year's imprisonment, and the Police may order the dispersal of any such assembly.

633. Requests to hold an assembly or procession in the Knesset building or precincts are considered not by the police, but by the Speaker of the Knesset under the Knesset Building and Precincts Law, 5728-1968.

634. Once a request for a license to hold an assembly or procession is submitted, the district police commander may either agree or refuse to grant the license as requested, or he may grant the license subject to time, place and manner restrictions that he deems necessary and appropriate. The request must be filed at least five days prior to the day of the planned demonstration. The district commander is bound to take the following considerations into account when deciding on a permit application (Police Standing Order 12.01.06 - Licensing of Assemblies and Processions):

(a) In general, the commander may refuse the license only if there is substantial evidence showing a "proximate certainty" that holding the assembly or procession as requested will result in a breach of public security or public order, or a violation of other equally fundamental interests, and then only if the police cannot, with a reasonable effort, allot the forces necessary to control public order and thus enable realization of the right to demonstrate. The "proximate certainty" standard for restricting the right to demonstrate due to danger to public order or security is the same as that adopted in Israeli law with respect to restraints on freedom of speech generally. In assessing the likelihood of a breach of public order or security, the Police may consider past experience with the group applying for the license;

(b) The views of the demonstrators or the subject of the lecture or speech are explicitly excluded from consideration;

(c) The police may refuse or restrict a license if there is reasonable basis to suspect that the demonstration will involve criminal offences such as rioting, incitement to rebellion or racism, incitement of people in the army to disobey a legal order, or incitement to any other offence;

(d) The fact that holding a demonstration would oblige the police to deploy personnel in order to preserve security and order, is not in itself sufficient cause to refuse a license. The police have a duty to allot personnel resources to enable the exercise of the right to peaceful assembly. Only in special circumstances, when needs of a higher priority do not enable the police to allocate the necessary personnel at the requested place and time, may the Police demand a change in the time, manner or place of the assembly. For example, in H.C.J. 1928/96, Council of Settlements of Judea, Samaria and Gaza v. Amit (not yet reported), the Supreme Court upheld the refusal of the Jerusalem District Police Commander to grant a license to a group that opposed the Oslo peace agreements from holding a procession that would pass down a major traffic artery and end next to the hotel where the President of the United States was staying at the time. Due to the unusually severe demands on Police personnel occasioned by the President's visit, as well as the increased security made necessary in the aftermath of several terrorist bombings, the Court ruled that the Police Commander was justified in demanding, as a condition for granting the license, that the demonstration take place away from the hotel where President Clinton was staying, or that the number of participants be limited;

(e) When necessary, the police must strike a balance between the right to demonstrate and the public's interest in unimpeded traffic. In general, the police will not have properly balanced these contending interests if it allows a demonstration at a time or on a route which frustrate the demonstrators' aim of attracting the attention of the public, such as allowing the demonstration when the streets are empty, or at a location where there are no passers-by;

(f) A license for a demonstration on private property will not normally be given without the owner's or custodian's consent. Private property rights will be respected even when the planned demonstration relates to a public figure, as, for example, when the Supreme Court upheld the refusal to grant a license to hold a demonstration opposite the Foreign Minister's private residence. H.C.J. 456/73, Kahane v. Israel Police Southern District Commander (unreported);

(g) The police should also consider whether the planned time and place of the demonstration would likely injure the "religious or traditional sensibilities" of the residents living nearby;

(h) The District Commander may not refuse to grant a permit unless the conditions, reservations and alternative solutions have been thoroughly examined with the aim of finding a way to allow the demonstration, and finding a proper balance between contending rights or values reflected in the time, place and manner of the demonstration (sect. 7 (a) (3), Police Standing Order 12.01.06).

635. The Supreme Court has upheld denial of a demonstration, on the grounds of a near certainty of substantial violation of public security or order, in the case of a protest against religious coercion to be held on the eve of the Jewish Sabbath at the entrance to an ultra-Orthodox neighbourhood in Jerusalem and opposite Orthodox academies, H.C.J. 606/87, Marciano v. Israel Police Southern District Commander, 41(4) P.D. 449; in the case of a procession by a group called the Temple Mount Faithful through the Old City of Jerusalem, and requests by the same group to hold a prayer assembly at the entrance to the Temple Mount, H.C.J. 292/83, Temple Mount Faithful v. Israel Police Jerusalem District Commander, 38(2) P.D. 449, H.C.J. 411/89, Temple Mount Faithful v. Israel Police Jerusalem District Commander, 43(2) P.D. 17; in the case of a planned demonstration opposite the Egyptian Embassy in Tel-Aviv, H.C.J. 496/85, Servetman v. Israel Police Tel-Aviv District Commander, 40(4) P.D. 550; and others.

636. Once a license to demonstrate is issued, the police bear an affirmative duty to maintain security during the demonstration and to protect those who participate in it, within the framework of its overall resources and priorities (sect. 9, Police Standing Order no. 12.01.06). As the Supreme Court held in this regard:

"The force at the disposal of the police is indeed limited, and must be apportioned according to the order of priorities set by those responsible therefor, according to their overall responsibility under the Police Ordinance ... However, the above-mentioned setting of priorities must not be arbitrary, discriminatory or irregular. When setting the above-mentioned order of priorities, the right to demonstrate must not be left out. Furthermore, it is not right that one march should receive the necessary police protection, while another does not receive it just because of the ideological difference in the content of the demonstration. The police are not in charge of ideology. They must apportion their forces according to needs and not according to opinions. The argument that holding a gathering on the requested route constitutes 'a significant burden to the police, which would have to allot a large force, which would require special preparations' is not a proper argument. It is the function of the police to allot the manpower required to maintain normal existence, which of necessity includes various processions and demonstrations. The task of the police is to allot manpower to maintain democratic order, which includes the right to demonstrate; and therefore it is their duty to make special preparations therefor, and the 'significant burden' is not a reason to refrain from doing so. The question which the police must ask themselves is whether all of the demands facing them at any one time can be met." H.C.J. 148/79, Sa'ar v. Minister of Interior and Police, 34(2) P.D. 169, 178-179.

637. In 1983, in the aftermath of an incident in which a demonstrator was killed by a hand grenade thrown by an onlooker, the Attorney-General and the Police Inspector General issued a joint policy statement, as follows: "Due to the danger to the foundations of the democratic regime from attacks on assemblies and demonstrations, priority will be given to combating hooliganism in this sphere, and the prosecution will act to expedite judicial procedures and demand that severe penalties be imposed on anyone found guilty of criminal behaviour against demonstrators." Prosecutorial policy in this matter has not changed. At roughly the same time, the Attorney-General also published detailed official guidelines for the police regarding the licencing of demonstrations and dispersal of gatherings ("The Freedom to Demonstrate", Guidelines of the Attorney-General 21.566, volume 3 (1 April 1983)).

638. Under the Attorney-General's guidelines mentioned above and police standing orders, State-owned property which is normally closed to the general public, such as buildings containing government offices or halls open only to persons on official business there, are deemed to be "private" property for the purpose of allowing demonstrations, and hence may be used as the site for an assembly only with the agreement of the State or its authorized representatives. On the other hand, State-owned areas open to the general public, such as roads, public parks, squares or open areas next to government offices, are by their nature suitable for holding assemblies, and normally the State is assumed to have agreed in advance to hold demonstrations at such sites.

639. If an assembly is or becomes illegal - that is, if the conditions of the licence are violated, or if a demonstration is held without a licence where one is required, or if there is reasonable fear of a breach of the peace as mentioned above and reasonable measures cannot prevent such a fear - then police personnel are authorized to take various steps against those suspected of having committed the illegality, in an ascending order of severity. First, the police should try, if possible, to prevent the offence and allow the holding of the demonstration legally, for instance, by asking the demonstrators to refrain from blocking a road or to return to the permitted route of the procession. If the demonstrators commit an offence, such as blocking a road and disturbing the traffic, without a license or against the stipulations in the license, a police officer is authorized to ask them to disperse; if they resist, the police are permitted to use a reasonable amount of force in order to overcome those resisting them in the fulfilment of their duty. In addition, under sections 153 and 154 of the Penal Law, if three or more people riot, or there are grounds to fear that they are about to riot, a police officer may order them to disperse and if they resist, may do anything required to disperse them. Of course, should a police officer have reasonable cause to suspect that a person has committed a criminal offence, including the offence of illegal assembly, he or she is authorized to demand that the person accompany him to a police station, or to arrest the person.

640. As mentioned under article 6, the Israel Police began compiling separate statistics regarding the excessive use of force by police personnel at demonstrations during the latter part of 1995. In 1996, 32 complaints for excessive use of force at demonstrations were filed; as of the submission of this report, statistics are not yet available regarding the outcome of disciplinary or criminal proceedings undertaken in those cases.

641. To assist in the apprehension and prosecution of persons who commit offences at demonstrations, as well as of police personnel who may use excessive force against demonstrators, and in general to help in supervising and improving the handling of demonstrations, the police enacted standing orders allowing for video recording of assemblies (Standing Order 14.02.10).

Article 22 - Freedom of association

642. Introduction. The freedom to associate with other persons or groups in order to pursue any lawful aim has long been recognized in Israel as a fundamental civil right and a cornerstone of any democratic regime. See, e.g., M.F.H. 16/61, Companies Registrar v. Kardosh, 16 P.D. 1209, 1220; H.C.J. 124/70, Shemesh v. Companies Registrar, 25(1) P.D. 505, 509. As with the other basic freedoms to which it is related - speech and expression, assembly, thought and conscience - the freedom of association is not absolute, and must be reconciled in appropriate circumstances with other legitimate fundamental interests of the society, such as the maintenance of social order, public security, or the very existence of the State. H.C.J. 507/85, Tamimi v. Minister of Defence, 41(4) P.D. 57, 59. As a general matter, the freedom of association may be thus restricted only by express legislative authorization. The one exception to this rule in Israel's history involved the disqualification of a party running for election to the Knesset on the grounds that its purpose was to work towards the elimination of the State. E.A. 1/65, Yardor v. Chairman of the Central Elections Committee for the Sixth Knesset, 19(3) P.D. 365. Since then Basic Law: Knesset was amended to provide explicitly for disqualification of a Knesset list on such grounds, as discussed in detail under article 25. Furthermore, although the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the issue, the freedom of association may fall under the ambit of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, enacted in 1992; as a consequence, any restriction on this freedom must not only be by express authorization of the Knesset, but also for a legitimate purpose and to an extent no greater than necessary to achieve such purpose.

643. There are three types of statutory restrictions on the freedom to associate in Israeli law: the first type is found in statutes that regulate the formation and operation of corporations, cooperative associations and the like; the second class of restriction involves statutes which aim to prevent the formation or activity of subversive organizations, including terrorist groups; the third involves direct or indirect restrictions on the freedom to form professional associations in certain fields or the requirement that certain professionals belong to such an association. These different statutory limitations shall be discussed in turn below.

Corporations, cooperative societies and Amutot

644. The Companies Ordinance [New Version], 5743-1983, which is largely similar to the ordinance enacted during the British Mandate, gives the Minister of Justice "absolute discretion" to allow or disallow the incorporation of a company (sect. 17 of the Ordinance). The Supreme Court, however, has held that the Minister's discretion in this regard, which is exercised in practice by the Companies Registrar, must be used to promote the purpose for which such discretion is granted by the Ordinance. For example, the Court has annulled a refusal by the Companies Registrar to register a company whose members had been convicted previously of publishing without a permit a newspaper which had been found to include incitement against the State; the Registrar based his refusal on the grounds that the members of the company were likely to use the company to spread views endangering State security. The Court held that such a prospective evaluation of the company's activities was not a proper exercise of the Registrar's discretion, and allowed the company to be registered. H.C.J. 241/60, Kardosh v. Companies Registrar, 15 P.D. 1151; M.F.H. 16/61, Companies Registrar v. Kardosh, 16 P.D. 1209. The Registrar may also refuse to register a company under a particular name which is "likely to violate public policy or public feelings" (sect. 36 (a) (3) of the Ordinance), or which was chosen by its founders for an improper or fraudulent purpose. These latter restrictions, however, do not affect the right to incorporate as such, but rather to the name chosen by the company.

645. Non-profit organizations in Israel were regulated until 1980 under the Ottoman Law of Association, No. 121 of 1327 (1909), as amended by Mandatory and Israeli legislation. "Ottoman associations" under that law needed no permit as a condition for their formation (sect. 2), but had merely to notify the Government of their formation, purposes and by-laws. The only substantive restrictions upon the formation of Ottoman associations were that they could not have any purposes contrary to law or public morality; they could not aim to violate public order, to change the political regime in the State; and they could not be based on national or racial distinctions. Minors and persons convicted of a felony were not allowed to become members of an Ottoman association. In 1980 the Ottoman Law of Associations was replaced by the Amutot Law, 5740-1980; non-profit organizations established thereunder are called amutot (sing. amutah). The Amutot Law empowers the Amutot Registrar to refuse to register an amutah if "one of its purposes is to negate the existence of the State of Israel or its democratic character, or if there are reasonable grounds to conclude that the amutah will serve as a cover for illegal activity" (sect. 3 of the Amutot Law). To justify a claim that an amutah aims to negate the existence of the State or its democratic character, it would appear, based on Supreme Court judgements interpreting the parallel provisions in Basic Law: Knesset, that the Registrar must show by "convincing, clear and unequivocal evidence" that the forbidden aim is in fact central to the amutah or to its founders; that the amutah was founded to pursue the forbidden aims; and that the expression of such aims by the founders of the amutah is not only clear but extreme. With regard to the other ground noted above for refusal to register an amutah, the Supreme Court has interpreted "reasonable grounds" strictly, to require that the Registrar show by convincing, verified evidence, rather than mere speculation, that there exists a "proximate certainty" that the amutah will in fact be used as a cover for unlawful activity (C.A. 1282/93, Amutot Registrar v. Kahane, 47(4) P.D. 100). It may be noted that prior to the enactment of the Parties Law, 5752-1992, discussed below, political parties were governed either by the Amutot Law or by the Ottoman Law of Association, depending on when they were formed.

646. The Amutot Law empowers the District Courts to order the winding up of an amutah if it, or its purposes, are aimed at the negation of the existence or the democratic character of the State; if it violates the law or its own by-laws; if it is unable to pay its debts; or if "reasons of justice or equity so require" (sect. 49). A similar provision in the Companies Ordinance is used to wind up companies for reasons related to the law of companies, and not to restrict freedom of association (see U. Procaccia, The New Companies Law in Israel (Jerusalem, 1989), 534-535); it may be assumed that the provision in the Amutot Law would be applied in a similar manner, especially in view of the enactment of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation.

647. "Cooperative societies", another form of association recognized under Israeli law, are similar to corporations, except that their purposes must involve "the cultivation of savings, self-help and mutual assistance between persons with common economic interests, in order to bring about an improvement of their living conditions, business affairs and methods of manufacture, or a society formed in order to facilitate the activities of such societies" (sect. 4 of the Cooperative Societies Ordinance, 1933). The Cooperative Societies Registrar may refuse to register a society "without giving any reason for such refusal" (sect. 9 (1) of the Ordinance); however, if the Registrar does give reasons for a refusal to register, the courts may review the validity and reasonableness of his reasoning under principles of administrative law.

648. Israeli law allows persons to form partnerships under the Partnerships Ordinance [New Version], 5735-1975, which are registered upon fulfilment of certain technical requirements, such as notification to the Registrar regarding the name, address and nature of the partnership. No administrative authority has the power to prevent registration of a partnership on any substantive ground.

649. The activities of each of the types of associations discussed above are regulated by the appropriate Registrar pursuant to legislation. In general, such associations must file annual reports to the Registrar, must comply with other technical regulations regarding, for example the proper use of the organization's name or financial auditing, and may not pursue illegal objectives or activities. They may be wound up or liquidated, inter alia, in the event of financial insolvency or non-compliance with technical or legal requirements. The ideological or political content of the association's activities is not properly the subject of administrative review, except in those cases where an amutah aims to negate the existence or democratic character of the State.

Subversive organizations

650. Several statutory provisions aim to prohibit the formation and operation of subversive organizations. Sections 145-150 of the Penal Law, 5737-1977, adopt earlier Mandatory provisions regarding unlawful associations. Under section 145 of the Penal Law, "unlawful associations" are defined as

"(1) any body of persons, incorporated or unincorporated, which by its constitution or propaganda or otherwise advocates, incites or encourages any of the following unlawful acts:

"(a) the subversion of the political order of Israel by revolution or sabotage;

"(b) the overthrow by force or violence of the lawful government of Israel or of any other state, or of organized government;

"(c) the destruction or injury of property of the State or of property used in commerce within the State or with other countries;

"(2) any body of persons, incorporated or unincorporated, which by its constitution or propaganda or otherwise advocates or encourages the doing of any act having as its declared or implied object sedition within the meaning of article One [of the Penal Law];

"(3) any body of persons which does not notify its rules as required by law or continues to meet after being dissolved by law;

"(4) any body of persons, incorporated or unincorporated, which is or appears to be affiliated with an organization which advocates or encourages any of the doctrines or practices specified in this section;

"(5) any branch, centre, committee, group or faction of an unlawful association and any institution or school managed or controlled by it."

651. Membership in such an unlawful organization is punishable by imprisonment for one year. The Penal Law also makes it an offence to solicit contributions to such an association, to contribute money to it, to publish or transmit writings for or in the interests of such an unlawful association, or to advocate or encourage the acts that constitute an unlawful association under section 145, with maximum punishments ranging from six months to three years' imprisonment. While commentators have noted the potential infringement on the freedom of association occasioned by section 145 (4) above, which does not require those affiliated with an unlawful association to have actual subversive intent (see, e.g., A. Rubinstein, The Constitutional Law of the State of Israel (4th ed., Tel Aviv 1991), p. 813, n. 33), no indictment filed under these provisions has been appealed to the Supreme Court.

652. The second set of statutory prohibitions against seditious associations is found in sections 84-85 of the Mandatory Defence (Emergency) Regulations, 1945. These regulations are stricter than the above provisions of the Penal Law both in scope and in terms of the punishments they prescribe. Under Regulation 84, the Minister of Defence may declare any body of persons to be an "unlawful association" if it incites or encourages the overthrow by force or violence of the political order or Government of Israel; the bringing into contempt or arousal of disaffection against the Government or its ministers in their official capacity; the destruction of or injury to government property; or acts of terrorism directed against the Government of Israel or its servants.

653. Finally, the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance, 5708-1948, which was enacted shortly after the establishment of the State, defines a "terrorist organization" as a body of persons which in its operations uses acts of violence which are liable to cause the death of a person or injure him, or threatens such acts of violence. Activity in a terrorist organization is punishable by 20 years' imprisonment; membership in such an organization carries a maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment. The Ordinance also forbids support or encouragement of terrorist organizations, possession of propaganda of such an organization, allowing one's property to be used by a terrorist organization or its members, or identification with such an organization through the unfurling of a flag, display of a symbol or slogan or singing of a hymn which clearly indicates such identification or support for a terrorist organization. A provision forbidding contacts with members of declared terrorist organizations was repealed following the signing of the Declaration of Principles by Israel and the PLO. In addition to specifying methods of proving that a group of persons is a terrorist organization, the Ordinance empowers the Government to declare a given group of persons as a terrorist organization, and such notice is prima facie proof in any legal proceeding that that group is in fact a terrorist organization "unless the contrary is proved". The Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance has been employed primarily against Palestinian organizations which have engaged in terrorist activity against the Israeli population; but it has also been employed against Jewish organizations, such as the Lehi (Stern Gang) immediately after the establishment of the State, and, more recently, against the Kach and Kahane Chai movements.

Trade unions and professional associations

654. International conventions. Israel has ratified ILO Convention No. 87 concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize, of 1948, and Convention No. 98 concerning the Application of the Principles of the Right to Organize and to Bargain Collectively, of 1949. While these conventions have not formally been made a part of Israel's internal law, they have had a significant influence on the development of Israeli law and practice regarding the right to organize, the activity of trade unions and collective bargaining agreements. In fact the Collective Agreements Law, 5717-1957, was enacted specifically on the basis of the above conventions, and gives effect to their substantive provisions.

655. The right to form trade unions. The right of workers and employers to organize in trade unions for the promotion of their interests is not yet expressly articulated in Israeli legislation, although it is firmly entrenched in the decisional law and is an underlying presumption of existing collective bargaining legislation, as detailed below. A draft Basic Law: Freedom of Expression and Association, a previous version of which has been approved by the Ministerial Committee on Legislation, would give firm written constitutional status to the right to organize, as provided in sections 6 and 7 of the draft Basic Law:

"6. Every citizen or resident of the State has the freedom to associate.

"7. (a) Employees are entitled to organize by their choice in employees' organizations, and employers are entitled to organize by their choice in employers' organizations; an employees' organization may engage in a collective agreement with an employer or an employers' organization.

"(b) Employees are entitled to strike for the protection of their rights and for the promotion of their interests as employees.

"(c) Financing of the activities of employees' organizations or employers' organizations with the participation of the employees or the employers, and the manner of collection from them, may be determined in a law or pursuant thereto.

"(d) The rights under this section shall be respected according to the principles of labour law in Israel."

656. In the current absence of such an explicit statutory right to organize, or legislation which regulates the formation of and conditions for joining trade unions, the National Labour Court has established that the freedom of association in trade unions and the freedom to engage in collective bargaining, as guaranteed in ILO Convention Nos. 87 and 98, apply to all workers in Israel. L.C.A. 35/5-1, Markovitz v. Hahistadrut Haclalit et al., 6 P.D.A. 179. As the Court stated:

"The fundamental right of association carries special meaning in the realm of labour relations ... [in which] this right has been consolidated as a 'right to organize' and as a right to 'freedom of association', which complement one another ... The right to freedom of association is the right of workers and employers to establish organizations, and, subject only to the regulations of the organization in question, to join the organization which they choose without need of prior permission from the governmental authorities. One of the basic principles underlying the freedom of association is the right of the organization to determine its constitution, subject to the laws of the State, to the extent that those laws do not contravene the principle of freedom of association."

657. The right to organize in trade unions thus includes the right to form a union, the right to join or not to join a union, and the freedom of the union's operation.

658. Collective agreements and the attributes of authorized trade unions
Section 1 of the Collective Agreements Law, 5717-1957, defines a collective agreement as "an agreement between an employer or employers' organization and an employees' organization, made and submitted for registration under this Law, with regard to hiring a person or terminating his employment, terms of employment, labour relations, rights and duties of the organizations which are parties to the agreement, or part of these matters."

659. As a general rule, any group of workers may form a trade union; however, to be legally empowered to act as a union, it must meet a series of recognized characteristics of a workers' organization and must be "representative". The Labour Courts have developed the following tests for identifying an organization as a legally empowered trade union:

(a) Stability - the organization must have been created in such a manner that it will continue existing without time limit, or at least for a long period, and not merely for a particular bargaining session;

(b) By-laws - the organization must have by-laws regulating its aims, its institutions and their powers, conditions for membership, and the like;

(c) Personal and voluntary membership - a trade union must be based on the free consent of each individual worker to become a member or to forfeit membership;

(d) Workers' representation - the vast majority of a union's members must be employees;

(e) Aims - first and foremost among a trade union's aims must be to engage in collective bargaining with the employer for the purpose of fixing working conditions and workers' rights within collective agreements;

(f) Independence - a trade union must be independent from the employer, and must be free to operate without external intervention;

(g) Internal democracy - a trade union must respect basic democratic principles such as periodic, free and equal elections of representatives, in which all member workers participate, public accountability of the representatives, freedom of speech for the employees and maintenance of principles of non-discrimination.

660. Representation requirements for trade unions are defined in the Collective Agreements Law, 5717-1957, according to the type of agreement involved. The Law (sect. 2) distinguishes between a "special collective agreement", which relates to a particular employer or place of employment, and a "general collective agreement", which relates to branches of employment in the entire country or in a distinct area. In both types of agreements, the union must represent "the greatest number of organized employees to whom the agreement is to apply". In the case of a general agreement, representation is a function purely of membership in the union; in the case of special agreements, representation may be determined either by membership or by other means, such as a special decision by the workers; in any case, the union must represent not less than one third of the total number of employees to whom the special agreement is to apply (sects. 3 and 4 of the Law).

661. All rights conferred by a collective bargaining agreement on employees as individuals may not be waived (sect. 20, Collective Agreements Law), nor may a collective agreement derogate from any rights granted to employees by law (sect. 21).

Limitations on professional associations

662. The right to form trade unions may be restricted narrowly with regard to specific classes of workers or professionals when an overriding public interest justifies doing so. For example, section 93 B of the Police Ordinance [New Version] prohibits the formation of a union by police personnel, although they may join regular trade unions; and standing orders of the Israel Defence Forces General Headquarters, which have the status of law, forbid military personnel from forming their own union. Judges traditionally do not consider themselves free, as a matter of judicial ethics and policy, to organize in a union, even though they are not prohibited by legislation from doing so. Other civil servants, however, with the exception of police employees as noted above, are subject to no restrictions regarding their right to organize, and they have done so.

663. Certain professional associations, such as the Israel Bar Association, are created and function pursuant to Knesset legislation as the sole professional association to which members of those professions may belong. Thus, while the freedom of association of the profession as a whole is maintained, the right of individual members of those professions to choose their preferred form of organization and its rules is limited in the interest of enabling uniform oversight of their qualifications, activity and ethical conduct.

Structure and membership of trade unions

664. The Histadrut. Most salaried employees in Israel are organized in trade unions. The vast majority of such employees are members of the New General Federation of Labour, known as the Histadrut, an organization which predated the establishment of the State. Under the Histadrut by-laws, any worker aged 18 or over who is not a member of another labour organization may become a member. The Histadrut represents salaried employees in industry, agriculture and service industries, including public sector employees, musicians, social workers, pharmacists, actors and directors, employees in the printing and binding, diamond and textile, chemical and petrochemical, plastics, building, garment and other industries, physiotherapists and other therapists, tour guides, nurses, academics in the humanities, biochemists and microbiologists, engineers and technicians, clerks in a broad range of institutions, hotel employees, metalworkers and electricians, food service employees, housewives, retirees, students and others.

665. The highest executive institution of the Histadrut is its National Conference, and its House of Representatives is the primary legislative organ. The members of both bodies are elected in proportional and secret elections from the lists of candidates associated with various political parties. All of the major political parties are represented. Until 1994, the Labour Party maintained a majority in the National Conference; currently, the Conference is controlled by a coalition of Labour and a new list which won the 1994 elections. The Secretary-General of the Histadrut has always been a Knesset member from the Labour Party, except for a period of roughly two years between 1994 and 1996.

666. Histadrut trade union activities are conducted through a three-level institutional structure: the workers' committees in each plant, which represents all workers at the plant; a local or regional workers' council; and the national unions, organized by profession, occupation or industry. There are currently 37 such national unions operating under the Histadrut umbrella. Each national union is empowered to sign collective agreements on behalf of the Histadrut.

667. The activities of the Histadrut have extended beyond those of a typical union, including mutual aid, culture and education. As the dominant workers' organization in the country, the Histadrut has also traditionally been active in shaping the social security system and the labour economy itself. General collective agreements between the Histadrut and the Coordinating Council of Economic Organizations (which represents private sector employees) or the Government (for most public sector employees) are the most influential instruments shaping labour relations and working conditions in Israel today, especially if such agreements are extended to other groups or classes of employees not covered by the original agreement, which occurs frequently.

668. Until 1995, membership in the Histadrut was linked to membership in the General Health Fund, the largest provider of health services in the country, such that members of the General Health Fund became members of the Histadrut, even if they were not employees. With the inception of the new model of health care under the National Health Insurance Law, 5755-1995, the link between the Histadrut and the General Health Fund was severed, resulting in a certain decrease in Histadrut membership. Although the Histadrut no longer discloses exact membership figures, there is no doubt that its ranks dwarf those of all other trade unions taken together.

669. Trade unions other than the Histadrut. Other labour unions include the Israel Medical Association, the National Union of Israeli Journalists, the Organization of Upper School, Seminar and College Teachers, the organizations for the Teaching Faculty at universities, and the National Organization of Workers. Some of these other unions overlap in membership with the Histadrut, in which case they generally divide between them the authority to bargain with employers over different matters. Certain unions which are organized formally within the Histadrut itself enjoy a high degree of autonomy, such as the Union of Engineers and Architects.

670. In addition, there are a few other unions of general character, which have a relatively small membership and much less political and social influence than the Histadrut. The largest such organization is the National Workers' Federation, which propounds a platform with nationalist political overtones, in comparison with that of the Histadrut, which retains a fair degree of the socialist tenor of its early days. The National Workers' Federation does not publish membership figures, and for the most part has not been successful in becoming the representative organization in places of employment.

671. Several small labour organizations with a religious orientation generally have come to agreements with the Histadrut, which grant them representation in particular places of employment.

672. Individual freedom to join a trade union Under principles developed in the case law, no employee in Israel may be forced to join a trade union, and every employee may resign from union membership. L.C.A. 1975/5-1, Markovitz v. Histadrut, supra; L.C.A. 1985/5-2, Histadrut v. Paz Senior Workers' Association, 14 P.D.A. 367, 385. Collective agreements generally operate on the "agency shop" principle, under which the employer recognizes the labour organization with which the agreement is made as the authorized representative for collective bargaining, and agrees that the collective agreement will apply to all employees, whether or not they are members of the representative organization, but the individual workers still are free to choose whether or not to join the union. Non-member employees generally pay a "trade union service fee", which is considered a fair contribution in return for services, and by law may be deducted from the employee's wages (Wage Protection Law, 5718-1958).

673. Freedom of operation of trade unions In addition to general civil liberties, such as the freedom of expression and the freedom from arbitrary arrest or imprisonment, which apply as a matter of course to the activities of trade unions in Israel, the procedure for recognition of collective agreements and the limitation of interference by the State are an important aspect of the ability of trade unions to operate freely. The Collective Agreements Law, 5717-1957, provides that a collective agreement need only be filed to be registered, giving the registrar no discretion on the matter. Furthermore, a challenge to representation by a trade union may be initiated only by another employees' organization (section 6 of the Collective Agreements Law).

674. On the other hand, as collective agreements have the effect of law for the workers to whom they apply, the agreements may not contravene the law or fundamental public interests. For example, the Labour Court has held that principles of general contracts law, such as the duty of good faith in contract negotiations, or the grounds for rescission, apply to collective bargaining and agreements.

675. Because the Histadrut developed as a more or less centralized labour union prior to the establishment of the State, and was fully in place far before most employers or Israeli labour legislation came into existence, many of the struggles common to employees in other countries in attempting to form unions have not presented themselves to any significant extent in Israel.

676. The right to strike. As with the right to form trade unions, Israeli legislation does not explicitly confer the general right of employees to strike or the right of employers to stage a lock-out. These rights have been affirmed by decisions of the Labour Courts, and are protected and regulated by the Settlement of Labour Disputes Law, 5717-1957. Under section 3 of the Settlement of Labour Disputes Law, the parties in a labour dispute between an employer and all or some of its employees are the employer and the labour organization representing most of the employees affected by the dispute, or, in the absence of such a labour organization, the representatives elected by a majority of the employees. The representative employees' union must give formal notice of its intent to strike at least 15 days in advance; the same rule applies to employers who intend to stage a lock-out. Employees who participate in a strike duly called by the representative workers' organization are exempt from liability for breach of their employment contract, including their obligations under a collective agreement, or from liability in tort for causing the employer or others to breach contractual relations. Collective Agreements Law, section 19; Civil Wrongs Ordinance [New Version], section 62 (b). The strike only suspends the labour contract, but does not constitute grounds for its termination. In addition, a duly called strike does not interrupt continuity of employment for the purposes of calculating benefits such as pensions, severance compensation, annual leave and veterans' rights. The Employment Service may not interfere with strikes, and is prohibited from referring potential employees to replace striking workers, except in the case of unprotected strikes in the public sector (sect. 44 of the Employment Service Law, 5719-1959).

677. The right to strike extends to economic disputes involving the determination of new employees' rights in collective bargaining, as opposed to "legal" disputes regarding the enforcement of rights which have been determined in the past, for which the proper remedy lies in enforcement proceedings before the Labour Courts. L.C.A. 31/4-4, Committee of Employees of the Cable and Electric Wire Company Ltd. v. Cable and Electric Wire Company Ltd., 4 P.D.A. 122, 134.

678. Restrictions on the right to strike. The Knesset has imposed special limitations on the right to strike of civil servants, local government employees, health service employees, educational personnel, and employees involved with the production or supply of gasoline, water, electricity and telecommunications. Any strike by such employees that occurs while a collective bargaining agreement is in force will be "unprotected" and illegal, unless it does not relate to a dispute over wages or benefits, and it is approved by the central management of the union. Even if there is no collective bargaining agreement in force, a strike by such employees will not be "protected" unless it is duly approved by the authorized employees' organization. Unprotected strikes expose employees to liability for breach of their employment contract and causing breach of contract by their employers. In the event of a partial unprotected strike by such public sector employees, the Law establishes a special procedure under which the employer must apply to the Labour Court for an order declaring the existence of a partial, unprotected strike, at which time the employees become entitled to receive half of their normal wages. Afterwards, the employer or employee may apply to the court for payment of any differential in wages, based on work actually performed (sect. 37 of the Dispute Resolution Law).

679. Collective agreements themselves often contain provisions limiting the right to strike. Moreover, the Labour Courts have held that collective agreements contain an implicit presumption that the employees' organization has obligated not to strike. Unless the collective agreement indicates otherwise, a strike conducted during the period of a collective agreement will generally be deemed unlawful, so long as the employer has fulfilled its obligations under the agreement.

680. Trade unions also often provide, in their constitutions or by-laws, for certain obligatory procedures that must be followed prior to staging a strike. For example, the constitution of the Histadrut requires an initial series of consultations and voting procedures, involving the national union representatives, local workers' committees and the Histadrut Workers' Council, before declaring a strike. Failure to comply with these preliminary procedures will make the subsequent strike unlawful.

681. Criminal sanctions against coercive behaviour The Penal Law, 5737-1977, protects members of either side of a labour dispute from violent or threatening interference. Section 164 of the Law makes each of the following acts punishable by imprisonment for one year, when done in the context of a labour dispute and with intent to compel another person to do an act which he or she is not legally bound to do, or to abstain from any act which he is entitled to do:

- (a) Using violence against or intimidating another person or his wife or children, or injuring his property;
- (b) Persistently following such a person about from place to place;
- (c) Hiding any tools, clothes or other property owned or used by such other person or depriving him of or hindering him in the use thereof;
- (d) Watching the house or other place where such other person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, or prevents access thereto;
- (e) Following such other person in a disorderly manner in any street or road.

However, the Penal Law expressly allows a person, on behalf of any of the protagonists in a labour dispute, to seek peacefully to obtain or communicate information or to persuade persons to work or to abstain from working (sect. 64).

682. Compliance with ILO conventions. Israel submitted its most recent report under ILO Convention No. 87 with respect to the period 1994-1995, and responded separately to General Direct Request 1995^{bis} of the Committee of Experts under that Convention by referring to the provisions of section 19 of the Collective Agreements Law, 5717-1957, discussed above. Israel's legal protections of the freedom of association and the right to organize are fully in accord with the provisions of ILO Convention No. 87. Israel's most recent report under ILO Convention No. 98, and relating to the years 1995-1996, was submitted in December 1997. The substance of Israel's responses to questions submitted by ILO supervisory bodies in recent years in the context of reporting under the above two conventions is included in the discussion under this article. No further comments or special direct requests have been forwarded to Israel by ILO supervisory bodies under those conventions in at least a decade.

683. Stay-at-work orders. In the past, the Government and its ministers exercised their broad emergency powers under section 9 of the Law and Administration Ordinance, 1948, to issue "stay-at-work" orders against strikes by workers deemed to provide essential services. These stay-at-work orders typically do not entail any attempt to resolve the labour dispute itself, but rather require some workers - generally only a small number from among the participants in a strike - to remain at work in order to prevent interruption of the most essential services. With the entering into force of the amended Basic Law: Government, in June 1996, the scope of governmental emergency powers is substantially narrowed: only the Government as a whole, not individual ministers, may enact emergency regulations, and such regulations or orders must not exceed what is actually required by the circumstances of the emergency at hand. It may be expected that henceforth the Government will employ its emergency powers sparingly, and only when the interruption of truly crucial services may damage the State's vital interests.

684. Frequency of strikes. The following table shows the frequency and scope of strikes and lockouts in Israel over a period ending in 1994.

Table 15. Strikes and Lock-outs, 1960-1994

In view of Israel's relatively small population (approximately 5.8 million), the above figures demonstrate how extensively employees in Israel have made use of their right to strike.

Political parties

685. The discussion of the registration and activity of political parties in this and the following sections should be read in conjunction with the discussion of the right to be elected under article 25.

686. The right to organize political parties is recognized in Israel as an important facet of the freedoms of speech and association (E.A. 2/84, Neiman v. Central Elections Committee of the Eleventh Knesset, 39(2) P.D. 225). In 1992, the Parties Law, 5752-1992, which regulates the formation and activities of political parties, was enacted as part of a broader electoral reform which included the direct election of the Prime Minister and other amendments to Basic Law: Government. Prior to the enactment of that law, political parties were regulated by the laws relating generally to non-profit organizations, either as Ottoman associations or amutot, as noted above; there was no registration procedure for "political parties" as such, as the Elections Law speaks only of "candidate lists", and so it was not necessary to associate as a "political party" in order to participate in national or local elections, or for a Knesset faction to receive public funding under the Party Financing Law. With the enactment of the Parties Law, only registered political parties may submit candidate lists for election to the Knesset, only a representative of a registered party may run for the office of Prime Minister, and public funding is given only to registered parties which run for election. Existing political parties were required to register under the new law within six months of its enactment. As of the submission of this report, there are 30 registered political parties in Israel, including 19 parties which are represented in the Fourteenth Knesset, either alone or in combined factions with other parties.

687. Under the Parties Law, a political party is defined as "a group of persons which has associated to promote lawfully political or social aims and to bring about their representation in the Knesset by elected representatives" (sect. 1); the law thus does not apply to political organizations operating purely at the local level, or, apparently, to those which seek to realize their aims outside of the parliamentary process. Any group of at least 100 persons may organize as a political party, according to a registration procedure which is similar to that of non-profit organizations generally: the application must state the name of the proposed party, its purposes, the names and other basic information regarding its founders, and a set of proposed by-laws (sect. 4). The by-laws must include, inter alia, conditions for acceptance of new members, as well as for their suspension or ejection; members' rights and duties; arrangements for disciplinary proceedings and sanctions; the powers of branch offices; the functions, composition and manner of operation of party institutions; and the method of choosing candidate lists for Knesset elections (sect. 14). Notice of the application for registration is given to the Central Elections Committee, to representatives of all Knesset factions or candidate lists, and is published in the Official Gazette and newspapers.

688. Any citizen residing in Israel may file an objection to the registration of a political party within 30 days after the notice of application has been published (sect. 6 (a)). The Parties Registrar, appointed by the Minister of Justice, is empowered to rule on these objections, and his decisions are appealable by leave to the Supreme Court. Ultimately, the Parties Registrar decides whether or not to approve registration of the party; any refusal to register a party must first be approved by the Supreme Court (sect. 6 (d)). The scope of the Registrar's power to refuse to register a party for non-compliance with technical registration requirements, such as inclusion in the by-laws of all matters enumerated by the Law, is not entirely clear from the wording of the Law itself, and has not yet been reviewed by the Supreme Court. The law also provides that a party may not be registered under a name which is likely to be confused with that of a current or previously existing party, to be misleading generally or to "violate public policy or public feelings". Here, too, the scope of the Registrar's powers is not yet entirely clear: while it would appear that the Registrar may actually refuse to register a political party under a particular name which, in his opinion, falls under the prohibitions noted above, one may assume, based on judicial interpretation of similar powers given to the Companies Registrar and the Amutot Registrar, that such powers will be construed narrowly, and must be balanced against the fundamental right to form political parties, especially if the decision whether or not to register a party is made relatively close to a Knesset election.

689. As mentioned under article 25, the Parties Registrar may refuse to register a political party if, by its purposes or actions, it may be deemed, expressly or implicitly, to negate the existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State; to incite racism; or if there is reasonable basis to conclude that the party will serve as a cover for illegal activity (sect. 5). Since enactment of the Law in 1992, the Registrar has not refused to register any political party. Petitions against the registration of two different political parties, one Arab and one Jewish, were rejected by the Supreme Court. M.L.A. 2316/96, Isaacson v. Parties Registrar (not yet reported); M.L.A. 7504/95, Yasin v. Parties Registrar (not yet reported). Although the Court has not yet ruled squarely on the issue, it would appear that these substantive grounds for refusal to register a political party shall be interpreted very narrowly, as are the parallel provisions in Basic Law: Knesset and the Amutot Law, and shall be upheld only in the most extreme instances. See, e.g., H.C.J. 5364/94, Welner v. Chairman of the Israel Labor Party (not yet reported). Reference is made to the discussion of those parallel provisions in Basic Law: Knesset under article 25 of this report, and under the Amutot Law in this section. While the Parties Law, on its face, does not clarify whether a party may be stricken from the register by court order if it is found later on to be pursuing any of the prohibited aims mentioned above, the parallel provision in Basic Law: Knesset gives such authority to the Central Elections Committee and the courts with regard to parties which seek to participate in a Knesset election.

690. Controls on activity of political parties Political parties have a dual character: they are at once voluntary associations, subject to the provisions of private law, and "constitutional" entities many of whose actions are subject to review under norms of public law. H.C.J. 1635/90 Zharzhevsky v. Prime Minister, 45 (1) 749, 836. At least in matters having a public dimension, government authorities, including the courts, will display a reluctance to intervene in the activities of a party, so long as it does not violate its status as "public fiduciaries". See H.C.J. 5364/94, Welner v. Chairman of the Israel Labor Party, supra (per D.P. Barak). For example, the Supreme Court has held that coalition agreements between political parties must be made public, in order to give voters a chance to gauge their support of the parties involved (H.C.J. 1601/90, Shalit v. Peres, 44 (3) 353); and the Court will nullify such coalition agreements if they are illegal or patently violate public policy (H.C.J. 1635/90, Zharzhevsky v. Prime Minister, supra.) Recognizing the public character of political parties, the Parties Law, 5752-1992, makes them fully subject to audit by the State Comptroller in matters related to management of financial affairs and compliance with applicable law (sect. 13 (b) of the Law). The Law also prohibits parties from engaging, directly or indirectly, in business activities (sect. 21), except for investing its assets and receiving income from "properties which are intended for party activity, even if they are not so used at the time" (sect. 25). In addition, the Party Financing Law and the Parties Law set various limits and restrictions on contributions during primary and election campaigns, as well as in between elections. Parties may not receive contributions, in money or in kind, from domestic or foreign corporations (sect. 8 (a) of the Party Financing Law), from minors or from anonymous donors. Parties may receive up to NIS 500 (roughly $150) from individual families, or up to NIS 1,000 (roughly $300) in a campaign year, unless the party waives the right to public funding, in which case the ceiling for individual contributions rises to NIS 60,000 (roughly $18,000). Contributions to cultural or educational enterprises managed by a political party are not subject to the above limits, so long as that enterprise does not finance any election propaganda or party activity (sect. 8 (b) of the Party Financing Law). Persons running in party primaries may not receive more than NIS 5,500 (roughly $1,700) from individual donors and may not exceed a prescribed maximum aggregate amount in contributions; as with the parties themselves, primary candidates may not receive contributions from corporations, minors or anonymous donors, and all contributions may be used only for the primary campaign (sect. 28 A-28 BB of the Parties Law).

691. Activities of human rights organizations The State of Israel places no legal restrictions on the right of organizations to engage in activities for the promotion and observance of human rights. For legal purposes, they are indistinguishable from any other organization: to the extent that they are registered as amutot, they must comply with applicable law; in every other sense, human rights organizations fully enjoy the freedom to associate and to pursue their various aims. There are dozens of organizations in Israel which work freely and fruitfully in all areas of human rights, including the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, several organizations which promote the rights of Arabs, a coalition of 53 different organizations working in the area of children's rights, over 100 organizations involved in womens' rights issues, the Religious Action Centre of the Movement for Progressive Judaism and other organizations involved in issues related to freedom of religion, organizations working to promote the rights of the disabled, homosexuals, minorities, organizations working to promote freedom of information and speech, and many more. These groups have played a crucial role in the development of human rights law in Israel. They have filed petitions and acted as legal counsel in a great number of landmark Supreme Court cases related to human rights. They also are significantly involved in legislative lobbying and, through elected representatives, in the initiation of legislation bearing on human rights. Their reports and conferences are generally widely covered in the media, and their publications are freely circulated in Israel and abroad. They cooperate with international human rights organizations, and conduct varied publicity and fund-raising activities abroad. The activities of human rights organizations have not been curtailed in any way by government authorities.

Article 23 - Protection of the family

692. Introduction. As discussed under article 18, Israel has preserved the Ottoman and Mandatory arrangement under which the principal religious communities apply their own religious laws to their members in matters of "personal status". The scope of "personal status" matters is defined by relevant legislation to include marriage, divorce, alimony and child support, and in some cases succession. The jurisdiction of Muslim (Shari'a) courts is broader than that of other religious denominations, including child custody and paternity. Israel retained the application of religious law in these matters for two principal reasons. On the one hand, the new State wished to preserve the tradition of non-intervention by the ruling regime in the affairs of the many long-established non-Jewish religious communities. On the other hand, the application of Jewish religious law to the entire Jewish population in matters of personal status is a crucial pillar in the delicate constitutional edifice which Israel has created to strike a balance between its aspirations as a Jewish and a democratic State. Israel entered a reservation upon ratifying the Covenant, explaining that matters of personal status are governed in Israel by the religious law of the parties concerned, and that to the extent that such law is inconsistent with its obligations under the Covenant, Israel reserves the right to apply that law. As a result, the discussion under this article does not address the law and practice in matters of marriage and divorce or spousal support.

693. In 1995, a new family court division within the Magistrates' Courts was established with jurisdiction over a broad range of family-related matters, including adoption, alimony, change of name, paternity and maternity, child custody, succession and family violence. Family Courts Law, 5755-1995. These family-related matters were hitherto adjudicated in several different courts within the civil system. The new Law, however, does not alter existing jurisdictional divisions between the civil and religious courts in matters of personal status, as many such matters remain under the parallel jurisdiction of the various religious courts. For example, in certain circumstances a Jewish religious court, which has original jurisdiction over divorce suits between Jewish spouses, may, in the context of the divorce proceedings, also decide matters of alimony and child custody at the request of the party filing for divorce. If a suit for divorce has not yet been filed, however, then either of the parties may initiate proceedings in the civil courts, which can decide on alimony and custody but lacks the power to issue a divorce decree (get). In addition, child custody and succession matters pertaining to Muslims remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Shari'a courts.

694. Meaning of "family". Although the family is firmly acknowledged, under both religious and civil law, as the basic, natural group unit in Israeli society, Israeli law contains no single definition of "family". The past two decades have witnessed significant demographic changes in the structure of families in Israel. Single parenthood has risen dramatically, almost doubling over the last decade (1985: 54,600; 1995: 91,900); non-marital cohabitation, with or without children, has also become more common. For various purposes such as entitlement to benefits, social insurance and income taxation, Israeli law and practice recognize various forms of family, including "extended" family and non-marital cohabitation. Homosexual couples have received partial recognition by administrative authorities in matters such as entitlement to pensions. The administrative programmes and policies of the Government aim at supporting the family without showing a preference for a particular form or concept of family. A recent legislative amendment has expanded the support programmes for single-parent families, including cash entitlements, education grants, job training, housing loans, and preference in day-care placements. Single Parent Family Law, 5752-1992. Families with four or more children receive from the National Insurance Institute a higher monthly allowance and cash grant upon birth for each child from the fourth onward. At the same time, special benefits are given to families which care for ageing or sick relatives within their own homes, thus encouraging the strengthening of extended family ties.

Non-marital cohabitation

695. Israeli law recognizes non-marital partnerships, and in most areas gives such unions a status equal to that of formal marriage. Non-married partners enjoy the same rights as formally married couples for purposes, among others, of social security entitlements, pensions, resident's protection against eviction, tort damage awards, income taxation. Non-married spouses have the same inheritance rights as married spouses provided that they are not legally married to someone else. The Supreme Court has articulated in several decisions the policy that non-marital partnerships are as important to the strength and stability of society as traditionally married spouses, and that it is in the public interest for the State to support such unions. In one such case, the Court ordered the Minister of Interior to register the name of a woman who wished to change her family name to that of her non-married spouse. H.C.J. 69/91, Efrat v. Director of Population Administration, 47(1) P.D. 749. In 1996, this landmark holding was incorporated by legislative amendment into the Names Law, 5716-1956. The right to take the family name of a common-law spouse has even been upheld recently in a case where one member of the couple was still married to another person. H.C.J. 6086/94, Nazeri v. Director of Population Administration, 96(1) Takdin 679.

696. To the extent that relations between non-married spouses and their children are determined by civil law, non-married spouses bear the same statutory obligations as married (or divorced) parents with respect to the duty of care toward their children or other minors in their care, except in the case of Muslims, for whom religious law applies in this regard. They also bear the same statutory rights and duties as married parents in cases of family violence. Although non-married spouses bear no statutory duty to support each other, the courts have held that an implied commitment to support may exist in appropriate circumstances. The "community property" rule, which applies in Israel to matrimonial property relations for those marriages entered into prior to 1973, has been extended by case law to non-marital partners.

697. In certain specific matters, non-married spouses do not enjoy the same rights as married spouses. Among others, they are not immune, as are married spouses, from testifying against one another in most criminal proceedings not involving family violence; they do not enjoy the right of non-resident spouses to enter Israel under the Entry into Israel Law, 1952; and they do not have the right to adopt a child together within Israel, although they may adopt a baby from abroad under applicable law, as discussed under article 24.

698. Minimum marriage age. Under the Marriage Age Law, 5710-1950, women from the age of 17 onward may marry freely. Women under the age of 17 may not marry, regardless of the religious law applicable to them, except in two sets of circumstances: a court may allow an under-age woman to marry if she is pregnant with or has given birth to the child of the man whom she seeks to marry; the court may also permit a woman who is at least 16 years old to marry in "special circumstances", which specifically do not include community custom and tradition. There is no statutory minimum marriage age for men; as a result, the individual's religious law will apply. The current legal arrangement regarding minimum marriage age for men, and its difference from that applying to women, is presently under review by the Supreme Court; at the same time, a private member's bill which would eliminate the discrepant arrangements for men and women is currently being considered by the Knesset.

699. The Marriage Age Law prescribes criminal penalties of up to two years' imprisonment for anyone who arranges or conducts the marriage of an under-age woman without court permission, as well as for the man who marries her. The woman is excluded from liability. Moreover, the mere fact that a marriage was made in violation of the law is a ground for divorce.

700. The rate of Jewish and Muslim marriages involving minors has steadily declined in Israel over the last two decades, as can be seen from the following table:

Table 16. Marriage of minors up to age 17 (per thousand registered marriages)

Year	Jews			Muslim

* Statistics are not available for this year for Muslims.

701. The right to marry and civil marriage Due to the application of religious law in matters of marriage and divorce, neither civil marriages nor marriages between people of different religions are performed in Israel. Each religion applies its own rules regarding validity of marriages, including consanguinity restrictions.

702. Marriages which are prohibited or invalid under religious law are nonetheless recognized if conducted outside Israel, so long as they are conducted in accordance with the laws of the country where the marriage took place. Divorces in such cases, however, if done in Israel, must be in accordance with relevant religious law; in some cases a person who has married or divorced in a civil ceremony outside Israel will need the approval of the proper religious court if he or she wishes to remarry in Israel.

703. There are no mandatory waiting periods or blood tests for persons of any religion wishing to marry in Israel. The law of each religion prescribes its own consanguinity restrictions.

704. Bigamy. As bigamous marriages are recognized under relevant religious law, and the validity of marriages is determined solely according to religious law, the Knesset has acted to limit the practice of bigamy by making it a criminal offence punishable by up to five years' imprisonment (Penal Law, 5737-1977, sect. 176). A person who conducts a marriage ceremony which is bigamous for either the bride or groom is also subject to the general criminal prohibition against conducting marriages forbidden by law or marriages which amount to a criminal offence (Penal Law, sect. 182).

705. There are two exceptions to the rule of criminal liability for bigamy. A Jewish man will be immune from prosecution for bigamy if he is given permission to have a second wife by a final judgement of a rabbinical court which is confirmed by the President of the Rabbinical Court of Appeals. Persons belonging to other religions will be immune from prosecution if they can show that their first spouse is unable, due to mental illness, to perform actions necessary to annul or terminate the marriage; or if the first spouse has been absent for at least seven years in circumstances which indicate a reasonable probability that he or she is no longer alive (sects. 179-180).

706. Specific legislative arrangements have been made to safeguard the interests of wives in bigamous marriages, such as section 146 of the Succession Law, 1965, which provides that both wives of a bigamous husband shall share in his estate upon his death.

707. To prevent unilateral divorce, and thus indirectly to lower the possibility of bigamous marriages, the Penal Law (sect. 181) also makes it an offence, punishable by up to five years' imprisonment, for a man to divorce his wife against her will without a proper judicial divorce decree.

Measures of protection

708. Social insurance and entitlements. The State of Israel operates several entitlement programmes through the National Insurance Institute (NII) as well as other benefits which aim to preserve the family's standard of living and to enable them, directly or indirectly, to bear the economic burdens of raising children. All families residing in Israel, regardless of income, receive a "children's allowance", a monthly cash grant which increases with the number of children in the family. In December 1996, for example, a family with one child received NIS 141 a month (approx. $43); a family with two children received NIS 282; with three children - NIS 564; four children - NIS 1,135; and five children - NIS 2,144 per month. In 1994, 795,000 families received children's allowances, amounting to 21.3 per cent of the total benefits paid by the NII and approximately 1.7 per cent of GNP. Families also receive income tax deductions according to the number of children in the family.

709. The NII administers several general programmes which protect the family by insuring against loss of income, such as unemployment and disability. The NII also pays income support benefits to families and individuals who do not earn the minimum level of income as determined by the Income Support Law, 5740-1980, and who are not covered by other income maintenance programmes. Eligibility for income support benefits is determined by income and by proof of inability to integrate into the labour market. In 1994, these benefits were paid to approximately 35,000 families.

710. Persons who receive old-age pensions, survivors' pensions or disability allowances from the NII are granted incremental benefits for dependents. Under the NII's disability insurance programme, families with disabled children receive a special allowance to help them shoulder the financial burden of caring for the child at home. Similarly, the NII provides an in-home care grant for families who wish to care for sick or disabled elderly family members in their home.

711. The NII grants the full range of allowances (children's, disability, and income supplements) to children whose parents live abroad, including primarily those children who have immigrated to Israel with relatives other than their parents.

712. Until recently, the NII followed a policy of setting off children's allowances against any income tax debts of the parents. This policy had a disproportionate effect on poorer families. After a significant lobbying effort by NGOs working in the area of children's rights, the NII agreed to refrain from setting off child allowances against tax debts; a private bill to amend the National Insurance Regulations in this regard has passed its first reading in the Knesset.

713. State institutions and voluntary organizations offer a variety of health services serving virtually the entire population, as well as a broad range of welfare services for families with particular needs and difficulties. These programmes are discussed under article 24.

Maternity and paternity assistance

714. Israeli labour law, together with a comprehensive system of cash entitlements and other benefits, provides support for mothers and their families during pregnancy, birthing and postnatal care. A pregnant woman must notify her employer of her condition by the fifth month of pregnancy. Thereafter, she may not be employed for more than six days a week, on the weekly day of rest, or at night, and she may not work overtime hours without her consent and a physician's permission. A pregnant woman who has been working for the same employer or at the same workplace for at least six months may not be fired by her employer without special permission from the Minister of Labour and Welfare. Any employer who fires a pregnant woman without ministerial permission is subject to criminal liability, and the employee is reinstated. In the event that a pregnant employee is fired before she informed her employer of her pregnancy, she will be reinstated without any criminal sanctions imposed on the employer.

715. Pregnant women are entitled to paid absences from work for routine medical examinations. A pregnant woman who receives medical confirmation of her inability to work for a specified period may take a paid leave from work with no effect on any seniority-related rights. Under a recent amendment to the National Insurance Law, women who are unable to work due to a high-risk pregnancy receive the equivalent of their salary from the NII, up to 70 per cent of the average wage.

716. The cost of the birth mother's hospitalization during childbirth is paid by the NII directly to the hospital as part of the basic basket of health services. Costs are also covered in the event of a stillbirth. Immediately upon birth of the baby, the mother receives a "maternity grant", equal to 20 per cent of the average wage, or more in the event of a multiple birth, to help cover some of the initial costs of preparing their home for the baby. The maternity grant is paid to all women residents or wives of residents, even if they gave birth in a hospital outside of Israel, and to women working in Israel or wives of men working in Israel, provided they gave birth in a hospital in Israel. A similar grant is given to adoptive parents. The maternity grant is currently equivalent to roughly $300.

717. From the third child onward, families receive an additional "birth allowance" for six months, equal to 50 per cent of the average monthly salary for the third child, 75 per cent for the fourth child and 100 per cent for the fifth and subsequent children.

718. The Employment of Women Law, 5714-1954, gives all working women a 12-week paid maternity leave, which can be extended in special circumstances such as sickness, multiple births or hospitalization of the infant. Maternity leave is mandatory - an employer may not employ a female employee during her maternity leave - although the woman may choose when to begin her leave at any time after the middle of the seventh month of pregnancy. A recent amendment to the Women's Employment Law allows the father to take half of the 12-week maternity leave in place of the mother, even if she is not employed. During maternity leave, the mother's or father's employer, as the case may be, must continue payments to the employee's retirement fund and to any other recognized employer-employee contribution-driven plans. The mother's or father's salary during that period is paid as a "maternity allowance" by the NII, at a rate equal to 100 per cent of his or her average salary during the three months prior to the leave, up to a certain maximum ceiling. Until 1994, the maternity allowance was 75 per cent of the pregnant woman's average salary, but was not taxable.

719. After the end of the paid maternity leave, the mother is entitled by law to take an additional leave without pay for a period of up to 12 months depending on how long she has been employed, with full security against termination of employment. Fathers whose wives have been working for at least six months may take the unpaid leave of absence instead of their spouse. This right also applies to fathers who have sole custody of the infant or whose wives are incapacitated, as well as to adoptive fathers. During the first four months after the maternity leave, full-time working mothers may take off one hour from work each day with no decrease in salary. Adoptive mothers enjoy the same rights and benefits as biological mothers with respect to maternity leave. Other laws enable parents to devote themselves to caring for their children without suffering undue economic loss. For example, the Severance Pay Law entitles an employee who quits his or her job during the first nine months following childbirth in order to care for a child to receive severance pay, so long as the other parent has not done the same. Under the Sick Pay (Absence from Work due to Child's Illness) Law, 5753-1993, parents may decide which one of them will take an absence from work for a combined total of six days a year to care for a child under the age of 16. In addition, under the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 5748-1988, any day-care services, shortened work days or maternity absences offered to mothers, as well as day-care expenditures covered by employers, must also be offered to fathers.

720. All of the maternity and paternity assistance programmes just described are available to all citizens of Israel, regardless of race or religion. Only persons who have failed to pay their social insurance dues for a minimum number of months during the two years preceding birth may not receive NII benefits.

New reproductive technologies

721. Fertility treatments in Israel are highly developed and well-subsidized. Israel currently has 20 in-vitro fertilization (IVF) clinics, or approximately one centre for every 285,000 inhabitants, the highest per capita rate in the world. Insurance subsidies cover, on average, NIS 6,500 (approx. $1,900) for each cycle of IVF treatment, not including hospital expenses and other costs which are generally covered by the basic basket of health services. Although there is no clear standard of eligibility for subsidized fertility treatments, couples are generally eligible if one year of sexual relations without contraception fails to result in pregnancy. The basic basket of health services covers the cost of seven cycles of treatment, up to the birth of two live children; there is no limit to the number of non-subsidized treatments a woman may receive prior to conception. Unmarried women are now eligible for fertility treatments with donor sperm in the same manner as married women. In 1993, 7,000 cycles of IVF treatment were performed (some women received more than one cycle of treatment).

722. Israel has become the first country to give full legislative sanction to surrogate motherhood. The Surrogate Motherhood Agreements (Approval of Agreement and Status of Newborn) Law, 5756-1996, sanctions full surrogacy (where the carrying mother is not genetically related to the resulting child) provided, among others, that all parties are adult residents of Israel; that the carrying mother is unmarried, except perhaps in certain extenuating circumstances; that the surrogate and the designated parents have no family relation; that the surrogate and the designated mother have the same religion; and that the sperm used is that of the designated father. The request for surrogacy must be approved by a seven-member statutory committee composed of physicians, social workers, psychologists, attorneys and a member of clergy of the contracting couple's faith. All requests must be supported by a psychological evaluation of the parties and a medical examination regarding the inability of the designated mother to become pregnant or to carry a pregnancy to term. The committee may approve monthly payments to the carrying mother to cover actual expenses in addition to compensation for loss of income, time, or other reasonable compensation. Any payment to the carrying mother beyond the amount approved by the committee is illegal, and subjects all parties to the agreement to criminal liability. To become the child's legal parents, the contracting couple must apply for a "parenthood order" within one week of the birth; such orders are issued by a court unless it is convinced that to do so would be contrary to the best interests of the child. Prior to the issuing of the parenthood order, the carrying mother may ask to withdraw from the agreement, and the court may decree that she is the child's legal mother, provided that her retraction is justified by a change in circumstances, and the child's best interests will not be jeopardized. No retraction is possible after the parenthood order is issued.

723. The first birth in Israel by a surrogate mother - who gave birth to twins - took place in February 1998.

724. Child custody. Under the Capacity and Guardianship Law, 5722-1962, parents are recognized as the equal, natural guardians of their minor children. They bear both a statutory obligation and a right to attend to the child's needs, including education and upbringing, vocational training, and maintenance of the child's property; their guardianship also includes the right to custody of the child, the right to determine the child's place of residence, and the authority to represent the child (Capacity and Guardianship Law, sect. 14). In all matters related to their guardianship, parents are obligated by law to act "in the best interests of the child in the manner that dedicated parents would act under the circumstances" (sect. 15). In the event that one parent dies, the surviving parent retains the duty (and the right) to be the child's guardian.

725. The "best interests of the child" doctrine is also applied in determining the custody of children between biological parents, or in cases in which children may be removed from parental custody. Courts typically consider a number of factors in determining what is in the child's best interests, such as who was the primary caretaker, the relationship that each parent (or third party) has with the child, and, depending on the child's age, the child's preference. In custody disputes between parents, the Capacity and Guardianship Law establishes a presumption that maternal custody is to be preferred for children under six years old. This presumption may be rebutted in rare and extreme circumstances when the mother is deemed unfit. In general, most courts tend to favour maternal custody, even with older children, and liberal visiting rights for the father. Joint custody arrangements have become somewhat more common over the past several years. In cases involving the removal of a child from parental custody, the interests of the child alone are not sufficient to warrant a denial of parental custody: it is also necessary that specific statutory grounds for denial of parental custody be fulfilled, such as if the parents are incapacitated or incapable of fulfilling their obligations, if they refuse without reasonable justification to care for the child's needs, or if the child's physical or mental well-being is found by a welfare officer to be at risk (See, e.g., Capacity and Guardianship Law, sects. 27, 33 and 38; Child Adoption Law, 5741-1981, sect. 13 (4); Youth (Treatment and Supervision) Law, 5720-1960, sect. 3 (4)).

726. Maintenance and child support in the event of separation or dissolution of marriage. Under the Family Law Amendment (Maintenance) Law, 5719-1959, the "personal" law of the husband and wife - that is, the substantive law of the religion with which they are affiliated - governs questions of child and spousal support. Under a 1981 amendment to the law, the parents' child support obligations shall be determined according to their respective incomes.

727. Several legal remedies are available under Israeli law to ensure payment of maintenance and child support. As a judgement debtor, the non-paying parent may be subject to the full range of remedies available for enforcement of judgements, such as garnishment and attachment of assets, preventing departure from Israel, restrictions on financial activity and, in extreme cases of bad faith avoidance, even imprisonment for up to seven days. In any bankruptcy proceedings against the non-paying parent, child support payments are given preference over the claims of other creditors, including the tax authorities. Finally, under the Maintenance (Guarantee of Payment) Law, 5732-1972, the NII will act as guarantor for the parent in default, upon request by the custodial parent. The NII not only pays the creditor the monthly amount set in regulations, but takes on the burden of handling execution proceedings against the recalcitrant spouse. Currently, the amount paid by the NII is 25 per cent of the average monthly wage if the woman has no children; 39.7 per cent of the average wage if the woman has one child; and 49.6 per cent for a woman with two children. However, if the court has previously set alimony and child support payments at an aggregate amount less than that set by the regulations, the NII will pay the lower amount.

Division of marital property during marriage and upon dissolution

728. Under the Women's Equal Rights Law, 1951, married women enjoy equal rights in marital property. The law, however, specifically does not apply to determining the status of marriage and divorce itself, which is governed by religious law. As the question of dividing marital property arises, for the most part, upon divorce or separation, Israeli jurisprudence has witnessed a certain conflict and overlap regarding the law to be applied in dividing marital property. As mentioned above, the civil and religious courts both may claim jurisdiction over division of marital property, the former by original jurisdiction, and the latter by ancillary jurisdiction in the context of a divorce proceeding. Religious courts must apply civil law, not religious law, in matters of spousal property distribution, on the ground that property distribution is not, strictly speaking, related to the "personal status" of the spouses, which is the basis for application of religious law. H.C.J. 1000/92, Bavli v. Rabbinical Court of Appeals, 48(2) P.D. 221. The Court held that the Rabbinical Court must divide marital property in accordance with the equality provisions in the Women's Equal Rights Law, 5711-1951, and thus may not decide upon a distribution that discriminates against the wife.

729. Under Israeli law, the distribution of marital property is governed by the principle of "community property", which treats all earnings, profits and assets acquired during the marriage as owned jointly by husband and wife, regardless of their respective incomes. Property acquisitions by gift, bequest, or devise, and property acquired before marriage are considered separate property. The community property principle was developed in case law as a presumption that the partners have an equal share in marital property provided that there was a "joint effort" by both partners in the overall family enterprise. In 1973, the Knesset incorporated the community property principle into law, in such a manner that all couples married from 1973 onward are deemed to share equally in the marital estate, unless they contract otherwise; the "joint effort" requirement does not apply to couples covered by the statute. Spouses (Property Relations) Law, 5733-1973. The judicial community property rule, which requires a showing of "joint effort", continues to apply to all couples married prior to enactment of the Law, as well as to non-married couples.

730. Under principles developed in the case law, the presumption of shared spousal ownership of all marital assets vests only upon the dissolution of the marriage. This rule makes it difficult for creditors to recover judgements against one spouse from assets held by or registered in the name of the other spouse, so long as they are married. It also can impair the ability of one spouse to recover his or her share of the marital property in the event that the couple, for some reason, is unable to get divorced.

Inheritance

731. To the extent that matters of inheritance are adjudicated in civil courts, they are governed by the Succession Law, 5725-1965, which gives husbands and wives equal inheritance rights in the event of an intestate death. The surviving spouse inherits either one half or all of the estate, depending on whether or not there are children or grandchildren living at the time of death. Sons and daughters receive equal, proportional shares in the estate. There are two exceptions to the equality of intestate inheritance rights: a widow is entitled to alimony payments from her deceased husband's estate, and may remain in the home in which they lived together; no such rights exist for widowers.

Choice of family name

732. Until recently, the Names Law, 5716-1956, section 6, provided that as a rule, a married woman takes her husband's family name upon marriage, although she may keep her own name or add it to her husband's name. In practice, however, the Ministry of Interior would automatically change the woman's family name upon registration of her marriage, without asking what she preferred. A February 1996 amendment to the Names Law placed men and women on equal footing, clarifying that upon marrying, either spouse may retain his or her former name, choose the spouse's family name, add the spouse's family name to the person's former name, select a new family name identical to a new one chosen by his or her spouse, or add such a new name to a shared former name (Names Law, sect. 6). The amendment further provides that the husband or wife shall notify the marriage registrar of his or her name preference at the time of registration, instead of having the wife's name changed automatically. In addition, the law no longer requires any change in the family name of married couples to be made jointly by the husband and wife.

Article 24 - Protection of children

733. During the nearly 50 years of its existence, Israel has built a thorough foundation of law, social institutions and services for the protection and welfare of children. In roughly the first two decades following its establishment, Israel set in place the basic components of a comprehensive system of social protection characteristic of a modern welfare State, including social insurance, income support programmes, health care and universal education, and special programmes designed to meet the needs of disadvantaged groups. At the same time, the Knesset enacted a body of legislation establishing a framework of rights of children to protection and treatment in various areas of their lives, extending from parental obligations to controls on child labour, protection of disabled children and children in danger, special treatment of children in the legal process, and so on.

734. The past decade has witnessed a heightened awareness on the part of State agencies and society, as well as significant legislative development and the institution of new social programmes in areas such as child abuse, violence in the family, the family court system, health care, treatment of children in detention, involuntary hospitalization and child labour.

735. In 1991, the State of Israel ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Israel's initial report under the obligations of that Convention will be submitted in the near future. In July 1997 an expert committee headed by a District Court judge was appointed by the Minister of Justice to undertake a comprehensive review of Israeli legislation bearing on the rights and welfare of children, and to recommend any legislative changes necessary to bring Israeli law and practice fully into accord with the provisions of the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

736. As a fundamental principle in Israel's legal system, the right to equality, and the corresponding right to freedom from discrimination, extends to the protection of children and is enforceable in the courts, even in the absence of a general constitutional prohibition of discrimination. The occurrence of de facto discrimination will be addressed in the specific contexts in which it may arise in the discussion under this article.

Primary responsibility

737. Parents bear the primary responsibility for the protection and upbringing of children in Israel. Under the Capacity and Guardianship Law, 5722-1962, as the "natural guardians" of their minor children, parents bear both a statutory obligation and a right to attend to the child's needs, including education and upbringing, vocational training, and maintenance of the child's property; their guardianship also includes the right to custody of the child, the right to determine the child's place of residence, and the authority to represent the child (Capacity and Guardianship Law, sect. 14). The rights attendant to parental guardianship have been interpreted as "the right to fulfil their obligations" (B.D.M. 1/81, Nagar v. Nagar, 38(1) P.D. 365, 393). In all matters related to their guardianship, parents are obligated by law to act "in the best interests of the child in the manner that dedicated parents would act under the circumstances" (sect. 15). In the event that one parent dies, the surviving parent retains the duty (and the right) to be the child's guardian.

738. Child custody. As discussed under article 23, "the best interests of the child" doctrine is applied in determining the custody of children between biological parents, or in cases in which children may be removed from parental custody. However, in the latter class of cases, the interests of the child alone are not sufficient to warrant a denial of parental custody: it is also necessary that specific statutory grounds for denial of parental custody be fulfilled, such as if the parents are incapacitated or incapable of fulfilling their obligations, if they refuse without reasonable justification to care for the child's needs, or if the child's physical or mental well-being is found by a welfare officer to be at risk (See, e.g., Capacity and Guardianship Law, sects. 27, 33 and 38; Child Adoption Law, 5741-1981, sect. 13 (4); Youth (Treatment and Supervision) Law, 5720-1960, sect. 3 (4)). In general, a decision to remove a child from parental custody is made by the Court; in urgent circumstances, however, a welfare officer may place the child in the custody of the State, provided that the matter is brought promptly before a Youth Court for its consideration. The child has a right to be heard before a court decides to remove him or her from parental custody.

739. Adoption. The Child Adoption Law, 5741-1981, prescribes a series of standards designed to protect the interests of children put up for adoption. First, adoption is permitted only after a court has been satisfied that the biological parents have given voluntary and informed consent, or that there are other appropriate grounds for waiver of such consent. In circumstances in which the welfare of the child urgently requires the removal of a child from the parental home, the welfare case officer may place the child in the home of the prospective adoptive parents or elsewhere even without first receiving parental consent or a court order sanctioning waiver of such consent, so long as the court approves the removal within 14 days (Child Adoption Law, sect. 12). Second, if the child is at least nine years old, or is younger but shows a suitable level of understanding, the court will not issue an adoption order unless it is satisfied that the child wants to be adopted by his or her prospective adoptive parents. The fact of the adoption will not be disclosed to the child only if he or she does not know that the adoptive parents are not his or her biological parents, all indications point to the desire of the child to continue the relationship with the adoptive parents, and the interests of the child are deemed to require non-disclosure (sect. 7). Third, an adoption order will not be granted until after the child has lived with his or her adoptive parents for at least six months and the welfare case officer gives a favourable written report regarding the child's condition and welfare in the adoptive home. Finally, the child and his or her adoptive parents must be of the same religion (sect. 5).

740. The adopted child has a right to know, upon reaching the age of 18, the identity of his or her biological parents.

741. In part because of the relatively small number of Israeli-born children put up for adoption, as well as the requirement that the child and the adoptive parents share the same religion, many parents in Israel who wish to adopt a child have found it necessary to adopt children from other countries.

The absence of clear local guidelines and controls on international adoptions, the lack of adequate staffing to handle the caseload at the Ministry responsible for overseeing these adoptions, and other factors conspired to make adoption of alien children a dauntingly expensive, risky and time-consuming affair. Recently, following the ratification of the Hague Convention on Protection of Children and Cooperation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993, the Knesset enacted a substantial amendment to the Child Adoption Law which establishes guidelines and procedures for international adoptions. Among other things, the amendment provides for a system of duly accredited private adoption agencies which may handle requests by Israeli residents who wish to adopt a child from another country; standards for evaluating the fitness of the adoptive parents and for the oversight of the work of the private agencies; and coordination with the authorized organs of the foreign State to ensure that adoption by Israeli parents is in the best interests of the child and that the necessary legal conditions under the law of the foreign State for putting the child up for adoption have been met.

Oversight and support of the primary care giver

742. Parental role. As discussed above, Israeli law requires parents to provide for their minor children to the extent of their financial abilities. Failure of parents to provide adequate support can lead to removal of the child from parental care. In addition, the Penal Law, 5737-1977, sections 361 et seq., prescribes criminal sanctions against parents or other primary care-givers for abandonment and neglect:

"361. A person who unlawfully abandons or deserts a child under the age of two years, whereby its life is endangered or its health is or is likely to be permanently injured is liable to imprisonment for five years.

"362. The parent of a child under 14 years of age or of an invalid unable to provide for his own needs (each of these in this and the next section referred to as a 'helpless person'), or a person bound by law or agreement to provide for the needs of a helpless person in his charge, who does not supply him with food, clothes, bedding and other essentials of life to the extent required to preserve his well-being and health is liable to imprisonment for three years unless he proves that he took steps which in the circumstances were reasonable in order to secure the means of supplying those essentials and that he is unable to supply them.

"363. The parent of a helpless person, or a person bound by law or agreement to provide for the needs of a helpless person, who refuses to receive the helpless person in his charge from a person not bound to provide for his needs or leaves him in the hands of a person who has not agreed so to provide is liable to imprisonment for six months; if he abandons the helpless person, he is liable to imprisonment for three years.

"364. A person who offers or gives consideration for permission to have possession of a minor under the age of 14 years or asks for or receives a consideration for such permission is liable to imprisonment for three years, and it is immaterial whether the consideration is money or money's worth.

"365. (a) A parent or guardian of a minor under 14 years of age who surrenders the minor, or permits him to be surrendered, to a person not his parent or guardian, such surrender involving repudiation of his obligations or rights with regard to the minor, is liable to imprisonment for two years.

"(b) It shall be a good defence to a charge under this section if one of the following is proved:

"(1) the minor was surrendered for the purpose of adoption under the Adoption of Children Law, 5720-1960;

"(2) the minor was surrendered for a determinate period and with the consent of a welfare officer within the meaning of the Welfare Services Law, 5718-1958;

"(3) the minor was surrendered to his grandparent, uncle, aunt, brother or sister and the surrender was in the interest of the minor."

The mechanisms for enforcement of child support obligations by non-custodial parents in case of separation or divorce are discussed under article 23. The special arrangements for protection of children exposed to abuse or neglect within the family are discussed below.

743. Financial support programmes. The National Insurance Institute (NII) is responsible for the administration of all social insurance programmes in Israel. The NII administers several general programmes which indirectly benefit children by covering the major contingencies of income loss, such as unemployment, disability and maternity. Children's allowances are paid to all families with children, regardless of income, according to the number of minor children in the family. The amount of the allowance for each child in a given family increases from the third child onward, thus helping large families attain a minimum income necessary for the care and upbringing of their children. In 1994, 795,000 families received children's allowances, amounting to 21.3 per cent of the total benefits paid by the NII and approximately 1.7 per cent of GNP.

744. The amount of the children's allowance provided to the fourth and subsequent children is higher for families in which at least one of the members served in the military. Since most of the Arab population is exempt from military service, the level of benefits has not been equal for larger Arab and Jewish families. In January, 1994, the Government began a four-year programme to equalize benefits paid to families whose members have not served in the military so that all families will receive children's allowances based solely on family size.

745. The NII also pays income support benefits to families and individuals who do not earn the minimum level of income as determined by the Income Support Law, 5740-1980, and who are not covered by other income maintenance programmes. Eligibility for income support benefits is determined by income and by proof of inability to integrate into the labour market. In 1994, these benefits were paid to approximately 35,000 families.

746. Special income supplements are also given to single-parent households, including education grants for their children. Child disability allowances are given to families with children who have a recognized disability. The NII also gives income supplements for "abandoned" children, which includes, among others, orphans, children who have been removed from the parental home due to neglect, abuse or incest, children whose parents are unknown, and children whose parents live abroad. This last category embraces primarily the considerable number of children who have immigrated to Israel with relatives other than their parents. Recently, the NII decided to grant the full range of allowances (childrens, disability, and income supplements) for these children in the same manner as if they lived with their parents in Israel. In certain circumstances where the child has no legal guardian in Israel, the allowances are paid directly to the minor. In addition to income supplements for single-parent families, the Single Parent Family Law, 5752-1992, gives preference to single parents in job training, acceptance to day care programmes, and makes them eligible for a special housing loan.

747. Other grants and benefits, such as birth grants, guarantee of maintenance payments by the NII, orphan's grants, and maternity and paternity leaves, are discussed under article 23.

Health care

748. Until January 1995, when the new National Health Insurance Law came into effect, roughly 95 per cent of Israel's population was covered by health insurance. Insurance and health care was provided by four major sick funds, similar in nature to health maintenance organizations, and were financed by personal contributions, employer contributions and government subsidies. The largest and oldest of these health funds, Kupat Holim Clalit, operates its own hospitals, clinics and family health centres; the smaller funds often contract with private physicians for primary care, and generally purchase hospital services from Government-owned hospitals, the Kupat Holim Clalit and other agencies. Following an ongoing crisis in the Israeli health care system, a governmental commission recommended sweeping reforms, including the passage of a national health insurance law, decentralization of the hospital system, and the divestiture of the Ministry of Health from most of the service provision functions it had carried out until then. Thus far, the principal reform has been the enactment and implementation of the National Health Insurance Law in January 1995. The new law provides for automatic coverage of all residents of the State, regardless of ability to pay; even if a child's parents do not pay their health fees, a child will always have health coverage. The health funds provide a mandatory service package in return for an annual payment by the Government for each member, drawn from the health fees paid by each person or family to the National Insurance Institute, and are required under the new law to assume responsibility over time for certain services previously provided or funded by the Government in areas such as mental health and prevention, including the family health centres. Patients are free to choose among the competing funds, which are prohibited from denying membership to anyone on the basis of age, health status or place of employment.

749. Specialized medical care for children in Israel includes a centrally-located Children's Hospital and designated children's wings in a number of general hospitals, preventive services and specialized mental health services, child abuse teams in general hospitals and special out-patient child abuse units.

750. The cornerstone of preventive health care for children has been the network of mother-child clinics (Tipat Halav), which focus on the well-being of women during pregnancy and of children from birth to age five. These centres offer prenatal examinations, vaccinations, early detection of mental and physical handicaps, abuse and neglect, and health education and counselling. Parents pay a nominal fee every six months for well-child care including immunization. Those unable to pay are referred to social workers for financial counselling and financial assistance if necessary; in any case, health care is never denied due to an inability to pay. The centres are community based, and most nurses become acquainted with the families during pregnancy and early development of all children. Thus these clinics are considered by the families as a source of support, and serve almost the entire population. It is estimated that 95 per cent of all families of childbearing age visit the mother-and-child clinics during pregnancy and the child's first two years. The rate of utilization drops sharply after children reach 2½ years of age.

751. In 1995, Israel's infant mortality rate was 6.8 per 1,000 live births. While there remains a steady difference in the infant mortality rates of Jews and non-Jews, the absolute difference in these rates has declined significantly over the past two decades. In 1979, the overall infant mortality rate was 18.7 per 1,000, 12.9 for Jews, 16.8 for Christians, 24.8 for Druze and 24.6 for Muslims. In 1995, the infant mortality rate was 5.5 for Jews, 6.7 for Christians, 7.1 for Druze and 9.7 for Muslims.

752. Children with diagnosed or suspected developmental problems are often referred to one of 26 child development centres. Some of these centres are affiliated with the health funds or the Ministry of Health, and a few are connected to general-care hospitals. The centres deal with early diagnosis, counselling and treatment for children up to age five who may be suffering from developmental or functional disabilities. Some centres also provide support services and guidance for parents. Children requiring treatment after the age of five are usually referred to a special educational facility or other medical framework.

753. School-based public health services. In elementary schools, preventive health services funded largely by the Ministry of Health are provided by specially trained public health nurses. Services in the schools include health education on topics such as nutrition, personal hygiene and puberty- and sex-related issues, immunizations and periodic hearing and vision tests.

754. Municipalities and regional authorities are responsible for preventive health services in high schools. The services provided are mainly educational in nature, with emphasis on preventing drug and alcohol abuse, communicable diseases including AIDS, and issues of safety.

755. The Ministry of Health, in conjunction with social service agencies and the Kupat Holim Clalit, give services at specialized centres to adolescents in addition to school-based services. These centres focus on sex education, including medical check-ups, treatment of adolescent problems such as acne and weight problems. At the time of submission of this report, the number of these centres is still small in relation to the total adolescent population.

756. Public mental health services include diagnostic testing, counselling and psychotherapy, and parental guidance which are provided by local Child and Adolescent Mental Health Clinics. In-patient treatment is given in special children or adolescent mental health wards by specially trained personnel. Out-patient clinics, serving particular catchment areas, are generally free of charge or charge only nominal fees. Nevertheless, the Ministry of Health has acknowledged that these mental health services serve middle-class families more effectively than the truly needy or disadvantaged, in part due to a lack of outreach to more difficult populations, such as less cooperative or multi-problem families. To redress this gap in services, the Ministry began by recently establishing a mental health centre for children and youth in Beersheva, serving the southern region of the country, and specifically dedicated to reaching more disadvantaged families and dealing with such problems as child abuse and family violence, which are discussed in more detail below.

757. Recent legislative developments related to children's health care include an amendment allowing minors to undergo testing for AIDS without parental consent; a new law which gives minors increased autonomy regarding consent to medical treatment; and a sweeping amendment of the Youth (Treatment and Supervision) Law, 5720-1960 which redefines the grounds for involuntary psychiatric hospitalization of minors, clarifies that commitment may be employed only if there is no less restrictive alternative, recognizes for the first time the right of minors to be heard in legal commitment proceedings, and provides for independent legal representation of the minor in such proceedings.

Welfare services

758. General. Under the Welfare Services Law, 5718-1958, personal social services for youth and children in Israel are provided by local authorities to individuals and families in need, with professional supervision and regulation by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. The State's budget for operating welfare services is supposed to be based on a fixed formula, under which the State pays 75 per cent and the local authorities pay 25 per cent. In practice, the local authorities often bear more than their share of the cost. Moreover, poorer authorities are more dependent on State funding, which results in a certain discrepancy between local authorities regarding the extent of services and the ability to meet local needs.

759. Most personal social services are delivered through an extensive system of social service offices that operate on a local neighbourhood basis. These offices are staffed with professional social workers, who provide direct counselling services to members of the community. Local authorities are also responsible for the development and regulation of other programmes and services such as home help for families and after-school programmes. Other services are provided directly by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, such as probation services, adoption services and most out-of-home services.

760. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs is responsible for meeting the needs of three major populations of children and youth: children living in poverty, children who are victims of abuse or neglect, and young people who engage in socially deviant behaviour. Within the Ministry, the Division for Personal and Social Services (DPSS) addresses the needs of children who are at risk or are disadvantaged. Local welfare offices serve the needs of poor and disadvantaged families under the supervision of DPSS, working with families as a whole while addressing the needs of the children in those families. Workers at these offices have, at minimum, a bachelor's degree in social work (BSW). Financed by various national insurance programmes, these workers provide counselling, advocacy, referrals, and to a certain extent can arrange direct financial aid, including assistance in purchasing basic household equipment (35,000 families received such help in 1995), temporary assistance in housing expenses (140,000 received assistance in 1995), home help to families who have difficulties managing their households (4,500 such families received home help in 1995), and assistance with placing children in day care, particularly while the mother is looking for work in compliance with the family's rehabilitation plan. In 1995, a total of 180,000 disadvantaged families, not including the elderly, received services from the DPSS. Over the past several years, in an attempt to help prevent future problems for children in young families, the DPSS has been involved in developing specialized programmes for poor and disadvantaged families, particularly for young multi-problem families with at least one child under the age of six. These programmes emphasize the acquisition of basic life skills (such as managing the family budget and looking for employment) and improving family relationships and parental functioning.

761. The DPSS is also responsible for the implementation of several recent laws dealing with cases of custody disputes, marital problems, family violence and child abuse. A national network of 19 family-violence prevention centres has been established to work with families in which violence occurs. The DPSS also operates 74 family counselling stations serving approximately 9,500 families per year (35,000 children) through counselling to help improve parenting skills and solve marital problems. In child custody cases, specially-appointed family welfare officers are responsible for reviewing the family involved and making recommendations to the court regarding the preferred custodial arrangement. The DPSS also operates several centres where parents and children can meet in cases where the court has determined that one of the parents may not live at or visit the home; and 38 counselling and support centres for single-parent families.

762. The Service for the Child, a unit within the DPSS, bears statutory responsibility for placing children in adoptive families, including choosing appropriate adoptive parents. In 1992, the Service served approximately 400 children, placing more than 200 in adoptive homes, and also served nearly 300 young unwed mothers through residential programmes and counselling. The Service operates two transitional facilities for children before adoption and one hostel for pregnant girls.

763. Another unit within the DPSS bears primary responsibility for providing services to children and youth who are victims of abuse or neglect, or are otherwise at risk. These services are given within the community and, when necessary, in out-of-home residential programmes. The community services include counselling for families and children, day care subsidies for children at risk of abuse and neglect, after-school settings providing recreation, therapy and hot meals, and a series of programmes aimed at improving parental skills and preventing further abuse. Reported cases of abuse and neglect are investigated by trained child protection officers, who have authority to appear in court and apply for protective orders for children at risk. Under the Prevention of Family Violence Law, 5751-1991, the child protection officer, as well as other persons, may apply to the court to have the violent parent or other person removed from the home, for periods ranging from several days to a total of a year. Following the enactment of legislation that mandated reporting of child abuse and neglect, which is discussed below, and a sharp rise in the number of reported cases, a network of emergency centres has been established by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs in cooperation with other non-governmental organizations, to give short-term residential services for up to three months and longer-term out-patient services in complex cases by referral.

764. The bulk of the DPSS's budget for handling cases of children at risk is devoted to residential placements. In 1995, approximately 7,700 children were living in residential homes and 1,700 were living with foster families, comprising roughly one-quarter of the children at risk in the care of the DPSS. Even when residential placement is voluntary, the placement must first be approved by a local committee consisting of social service workers, doctors, teachers, psychologists and health clinic nurses. In recent years, the Ministry, in an attempt to expand the range and effectiveness of out-of-home services for children at risk, has begun developing several alternative forms of residential placement, including community-based residential homes, group homes, residential homes operated by private families, and "day homes" in which the children return to their own homes at night. The Ministry has also begun developing special settings for mentally-disturbed children who have been transferred from closed institutions.

765. The delivery of effective social services to children at risk in Israel faces several problems common to many social service systems: the necessity to work within budgetary constraints, which limit the number of children who may be served, particularly those over the age of six, and the development of programmes which may best fit their needs along with those of the family; a certain reliance on out-of-home placements rather than family-centred intervention programmes, in part due to the relative scarcity of community-based settings with adequate resources; inefficiencies arising from overlapping responsibilities within the Ministry; and the difficulty of ensuring the quality of care in residential facilities. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs has invested significant resources over the last several years in developing standards and practices to improve the quality of care in residential facilities.

766. Another department at the Ministry, the Division for Correctional Services and Services for Youth in Distress, handles marginal youth populations, such as juvenile offenders, children with substance abuse problems, those who have dropped out of school or have behavioural problems. Although juvenile crime and substance abuse are less widespread than in some Western countries, they have become increasingly common in Israel, particularly among high-school drop-outs. Two separate youth services, one for boys and one for girls, provide rehabilitative treatment for young people between the ages of 13 to 22, who have dropped out or are in the process of dropping out of educational frameworks and have shown other symptoms of behavioural problems. These services provide therapy, vocational training and educational enrichment, and operate youth clubs and runaway shelters, serving approximately 15,000 adolescents and young adults annually. They also operate services for battered women and rape crisis centres in conjunction with volunteer organizations. Another unit at the Ministry places youths who have not been integrated successfully into regular educational frameworks in alternative schools and work-study programmes.

767. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs also bears primary responsibility for handling cases of juvenile delinquency, investigating allegations of child abuse and neglect not involving the family, and investigating sex-related crimes involving children under the age of 14 either as victims or as witnesses. In each case involving a juvenile criminal defendant, a case officer at the Juvenile Probation Service within the Ministry prepares a pre-trial report on the defendant's behaviour, physical and mental health, and potential for rehabilitation, as well as post-trial sentencing and treatment recommendations. The Youth Protection Authority operates 37 rehabilitative residential settings for delinquent and severely troubled youth, including locked detention facilities, boarding schools, half-way houses, apartments and hostels, as well as a diagnostic centre.

768. The Israel police has special youth units that investigate alleged juvenile offenders, locate minors in distress and refer them to social service agencies. The police also run or participate in several outreach projects which aim at preventing drug abuse and reducing violence in the schools.

Methods of intervention for children in need

769. When a welfare officer has reason to believe that a minor is in need of assistance, he or she is authorized by law to begin intervention for the safety and welfare of the child. A "child in need" is defined by law as meeting any of the following criteria:

"(a) The person responsible for him cannot be found;

"(b) The person responsible for him is unable to care for or supervise him, or neglects such treatment or supervision;

"(c) He perpetrated an act which is a criminal offence and was not brought to trial;

"(d) He is found loitering, begging or peddling in violation of the Child Labour Law, 5713-1953;

"(e) He is subject to harmful influence or lives in a place that serves continuously as the site of a criminal offence;

"(f) His physical or emotional health is harmed or is likely to be harmed for any reason;

"(g) He was born suffering from drug withdrawal syndrome."

[Youth (Treatment and Supervision) Law, 5720-1960, sect. 2.] In such circumstances, if the parents or the person responsible for the child does not agree to the welfare officer's recommendations for treatment, or if the child's guardian agrees but the child refuses to comply, then the welfare officer may apply for an order from a youth court or family court, as the case may be. The court may require the child, or the parents or guardians, to carry out any measures deemed necessary for the treatment or supervision of the child, including with regard to education and psychological rehabilitation; it may appoint a "friend" for the child, who functions as a counsellor with powers and tasks defined by the court, or may place the child under the supervision of a welfare officer; or it may order the removal of the child from the custody of the parent or guardian if there is no other way to ensure the treatment or supervision of the child. The court may also order that the child undergo psychiatric diagnosis or treatment. Under a recent legislative amendment, the courts are also authorized, under certain circumstances, to notify the guardian of positive AIDS test results (sect. 3 of the law).

770. In all court proceedings regarding the treatment of the child, the court may not issue any decision without giving the child, his or her guardian and the welfare officer the opportunity to have their claims heard, and without receiving a written report by the welfare officer (sect. 8 of the law).

771. In severe cases involving imminent danger to the child, or in which urgent medical treatment (not including psychiatric diagnosis or hospitalization) may not be delayed, the welfare officer may take such measures necessary to prevent such danger or provide such medical care without the consent of the parent or guardian, and without a court order, provided that the child is not removed from the custody of the guardian for more than seven days without court approval (sect. 11 of the law).

772. Confidentiality. To help prevent unnecessary damage to children in need, the Treatment and Supervision Law makes it a criminal offence to publish any information which may enable identification of the child, in such a manner that discloses that the welfare services or the courts have intervened in the child's case, that the child has attempted or committed suicide, or which suggests that the child has committed a crime or an immoral act, or that he or she is a relative of a person who has committed such an act (sect. 24 of the Law). A currently-pending legislative bill would expand the prohibition to include information leading to the identification of a child as a victim of a crime. Welfare officers and any persons with knowledge relating to psychiatric diagnosis or treatment of a child bear strict duties of confidentiality; no written or computer records of a child's psychiatric hospitalization may be kept beyond the child's personal medical file at the treating hospital, except if the child is diagnosed as having a mental illness which endangers himself or herself or others (sect. 23 of the Law).

Child abuse

773. Over the last decade, significant legislative reform in the area of child abuse has resulted in a dramatic increase in the detection and treatment of such cases, and in public awareness of an acutely harmful phenomenon the dimensions of which had remained largely hidden until then. In 1989, the Knesset enacted the Child and Helpless Persons Abuse Prevention Law, which created special criminal offences for assault and molestation - including physical, emotional or sexual molestation - of children or helpless persons, in addition to already-existing offences in the Penal Law.

774. The Penal Law (sect. 368 A) provides increased sentences for assault or molestation by a broadly defined category of persons deemed to have some degree of responsibility over the victim:

"Person responsible for a minor or helpless person" means any of the following:

"(1) A parent or a person who is responsible for the sustenance, health, education or welfare of a minor or a helpless person, by operation of law, judicial decision, express or implied contract; or a person who is responsible as aforesaid for a minor or a helpless person by virtue of an unlawful or forbidden act that he has done;

"(2) A member of the family of a minor or helpless person, who is at least 18 years old and is not a helpless person, and is one of the following: the spouse of a parent, grandmother or grandfather, offspring, sister or brother, brother- or sister-in-law, uncle or aunt;

"(3) A person with whom the minor or the helpless person resides or is with on a permanent basis, who is at least 18 years old, provided that there exist relations of dependency or mastery between them."

775. Furthermore, the law imposes a duty, under pain of criminal liability, on all persons to report suspected cases of abuse against children or helpless persons to a welfare officer or to the police; professional workers, such as doctors, nurses, educational staff, social workers, psychologists, and staff at youth residential facilities, bear an augmented duty of disclosure (sect. 368 D of the Law). This new policy has had an important role in increasing reporting of child abuse. In 1994, the welfare services intervened in roughly 3,000 cases. At the same time, its implementation has raised certain difficulties when the duty of disclosure conflicts with a duty to maintain confidentiality, as in the case of a psychologist who learns of a suspected case of child abuse from his or her patient.

776. The Family Violence Prevention Law, 5751-1991, added an important new means of protecting children in families suffering from domestic violence by giving the court the power, in cases of actual or reasonably imminent violence or sexual abuse, to issue ex parte protective orders for a period of seven days, extendable if necessary for up to one year, which forbid the violent family member from entering the home, from harassing family members in or out of the home, from impairing the lawful use of property by the other family members, or from carrying firearms. During the seven-day period a hearing is held in the presence of the parties regarding the extension of the order. The court is entitled in such proceedings to depart from the usual rule preventing family members from testifying against one another.

777. A recent law makes it possible for witnesses in sexual abuse trials to testify by closed-circuit video (Criminal Procedure Amendment (Sexual Offences Testimony) Law, 5756-1996). This law also empowers the courts to require a victim impact statement by a welfare officer regarding the victim's condition, and requires trials for sex offences to be heard by a three-judge panel instead of by a single judge. In response to the recognition that incest victims frequently take many years to file complaints, the Penal Law was amended in 1996 to extend the 10-year statute of limitations in cases of incest, such that the period of limitation begins to toll not from the date of the offence but from the date on which the victim turns 18 (Penal Law (Amendment no. 47), 5756-1996).

778. The conviction and sentencing patterns since the above legislative reforms indicate a certain rise in conviction rates and the severity of sentences in cases of child abuse and incest. One Supreme Court decision, overturning an earlier decision by the same Court acquitting a father of incest on the ground that the daughter "was not in a situation preventing opposition", held that a child victim of incest is presumed to be unable to object to the act. F.H. 6008/93, State of Israel v. Anonymous.

779. Corporal punishment. As discussed under article 7, corporal punishment of students by teachers or school administrators constitutes criminal assault, and may ground a claim for civil damages in appropriate circumstances. Disciplinary guidelines published by the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport prescribe series of alternative disciplinary measures, ranging from an oral reprimand to dismissal from school, as well as procedures that educational staff must employ prior to taking disciplinary action, including discussions with the student and his or her parents. Several years ago, following intensive lobbying efforts by NGOs, the Knesset decided to strike a provision from an amendment to the Penal Law which would have created a defence to criminal liability for any "reasonable" acts, including "reasonable" corporal punishment, taken with regard to a child by parents, teachers and other persons entrusted with authority over a child.

Protection of children in legal proceedings

780. Apart from the system of special safeguards throughout the criminal process for minor suspects or defendants, which are discussed under articles 9, 10 and 14, Israeli law provides for several legal institutions which help protect the welfare of children involved in various legal proceedings. Except in cases of violence or sexual abuse within the family, testimony by a child against his or her parent, or by the parent against the child, are inadmissible in any criminal proceeding (Evidence Ordinance, sect. 3). Victims of or witnesses to sexual offences under 14 years old may not be called to testify, nor may any written statement they give be admissible, without the permission of a specially-trained youth investigator. If the youth investigator gives such permission, then the child is generally examined only by the youth investigator, and his or her testimony is heard only in the presence of the prosecutor, the defendant and his or her counsel, and the youth investigator, unless the court permits other persons to be present (Evidence Amendment (Child Protection) Law, 5715-1955, sect. 2). If the youth investigator does not allow the child to give testimony, then the investigator testifies in the child's place. When a minor testifies against his or her parent for sexual abuse, the court may order the accused parent to vacate the courtroom if it is deemed necessary to avoid emotional damage to the child (sect. 3 of the Law). Publication without court permission of any information enabling the identification of a minor who testifies in a sexual abuse trial is punishable by six months' imprisonment and a fine (sect. 6 of the Law).

781. Under a special procedure, the testimony of a child victim of a sex offence may be taken immediately, either in court after an indictment is filed, or even during the criminal investigation, provided that the youth investigator handling the case so consents (Criminal Procedure Law [Consolidated Version], 5742-1982, sect. 117 A). In 1995, a system of family courts was established with jurisdiction over a broad range of family-related matters, including family violence, adoption, alimony, change of name, paternity or maternity, child custody and succession. In all proceedings before these courts, minors have independent standing to file suits and to appear before the court, either by themselves or through a "close friend" in any matter in which their rights might be substantially impaired (Family Courts Law, 5755-1995, sect. 3 (d)). The court may also hear the testimony of a minor in camera, and may prevent the examination of a minor if the judge feels that the minor might be harmed thereby (sect. 8 of the Law).

Education

782. Education in Israel is compulsory for children between the ages of 5 and 15, or until the end of the 10th grade, whichever ever comes earlier; public education is free of charge, except for books and materials, for all children aged 5 to 18 (Compulsory Education Law, 5709-1949, sect. 6). Most 3- and 4-year-olds attend publicly supervised and subsidized kindergartens. The vast majority of Israeli youth continue their schooling beyond the age of 15. Almost all children attend public schools that are regulated by the Ministry of Education, with funding from the Ministry as well as local authorities. Some secondary schools are operated by voluntary organizations, but remain part of the governmental education system. Entirely private schools that operate outside this system are relatively rare, and are found primarily in the Arab sector and among the ultra-orthodox Jewish population.

783. Under the Schools Supervision Law, 5729-1969, schools regulated by the Ministry are required to maintain standards of health and hygiene, security, curriculum, physical plant, pedagogic training and quality, and financial solvency. No teacher may be employed unless he or she has a permit to do so from the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport; the Director-General of the Ministry may refuse to grant a teaching permit if, among other things, it has been shown that the teacher's behaviour has a harmful influence on the students (sect. 16 of the Law).

784. The public education system is organized in two main sectors: Jewish (serving 83 per cent of all students) and non-Jewish (Arab, Druze, Christian and other religious minorities), each with its own curriculum and institutions. The Jewish educational sector has three different streams - State-secular, State-religious and independent (primarily ultra-Orthodox) - each of which has separate schools.

785. Special education. The Ministry of Education operates a series of special education programmes and facilities free of charge for eligible youth between the ages of 3 and 21. Under the Special Education Law, 5748-1988, children with physical, mental or learning disabilities or behavioural disorders are entitled to special education at an appropriate institution in their residential area or as close as possible thereto. The policy of the Ministry of Education has been, to the extent possible, to place such children within the regular school system, either in special education classes or in regular classes with supplementary tutoring. This policy has been implemented primarily in the case of hearing- and visually-impaired children. The Special Education Law also mandates adequate training for full-time special education teachers, an individual study plan for each child, and the provision of para-medical and psychological services for special education students.

786. The Ministry of Education offers a series of support services for children who have problems adjusting to a school environment, in addition to those services provided by the welfare agencies. These services include counselling and psychological assessment, afternoon programmes, running drop-in centres, remedial classes with special budgets to permit smaller size classes, a "Grade 13" programme for students who complete the 12th grade without having fulfilled the subject requirements for a matriculation certificate, and others.

787. Boarding schools are attended by approximately 10 per cent of the school population aged 13 to 18. Historically, boarding schools were used primarily by refugees prior to and after the Second World War who arrived without their parents. Today, the boarding schools are attended by new immigrants, primarily from the Former Soviet Union and Ethiopia, and by youth from disadvantaged backgrounds. In addition, many of the better students among orthodox Jewish teenagers attend religious boarding schools. Roughly one-fifth of the boarding school population consists of children who are placed out of the home by the welfare services or the Ministry of Education due to severe family problems or behavioural problems at school.

788. Educational disparities. The separation of educational institutions into Arab and Jewish sectors, and according to level of religious observance, enables each segment of the population to maintain its language and cultural identity, and limits the possibility of cultural tensions among students within the schools themselves. However, as there is a correlation between religious observance and low socio-economic status in the Jewish sector, and a lower socio-economic status in the Arab sector generally, the separation of educational tracks may help preserve disparities in educational attainment levels. In general, there remain significant disparities between the Jewish and Arab sectors in the number of years of schooling completed, in the levels of school attendance, particularly in kindergartens and after the age of 14, in the number of students per class, and in the level of support services and facilities. At the same time, there have been dramatic improvements in many of these areas over time. In 1975, 35.8 per cent of the Arab population had four years or less of education, compared to 11.9 per cent of the Jewish population; by 1992, the proportion of persons with four or less years of schooling decreased to 18.1 per cent in the Arab population and 6.2 per cent in the Jewish population. Over the same interval, the proportion of students completing at least 13 years of education rose from 4.5 per cent to 10.0 per cent in the Arab sector, and from 17.7 per cent to 31.2 per cent in the Jewish sector.

789. School attendance rates for both Jewish and Arab children aged 5 to 13 are well above 90 per cent. Prior to age 5 and after age 13, however, there are significant differences between the two populations. Approximately 95 per cent of all Jewish children also receive pre-school education, as compared to an estimated 44 per cent of Arab three-year-olds and 71 per cent of Arab four-year olds. In the 14-17 age group, the discrepancy in attendance rates increases with age, as indicated in the following table:

Table 18. Attendance Rates in regular education frameworks, by age and sector (per cent)

Age	Jewish sector	Arab sector
3	95.0	44.0 (est.)
4	99.0	71.0 (est.)
5	99.5 (est.)	90.0 (est.)

15	97.8	72.4

790. Nevertheless, a dramatic increase in attendance rates may be noted over the last 25 years, and a corresponding narrowing of the gap in attendance rates between Arabs and Jews. In the 14-17 year-old group, for example, attendance rates in the Arab sector rose from 29.4 per cent in 1969-1970 to 64.4 per cent in 1991-1992, as compared to a rise from 66.8 per cent to 91.8 per cent in the Jewish sector. Within the Arab sector, attendance rates are significantly higher in the Christian community than in the Muslim and Druze communities. In 1994, about 30 per cent of Arab students were eligible for a certificate of matriculation, as compared to 48 per cent of Jewish students.

791. In 1995, the average number of students per class was 27.4 in the Jewish sector and 30.9 in the Arab sector. During the period from 1980 to 1995, the average number of students per class declined in the Arab sector (31.1 in 1980), while it actually increased in the Jewish sector (25.8 in 1980). Over the last several years, the Government as well as private institutions have initiated programmes to eliminate the gaps in educational services between the Jewish and Arab sectors through increased funding and special programmes. In the four years between 1989-1990 and 1993-1994, the total number of teachers in Arab schools has increased 24 per cent, and a higher percentage of teachers had academic training. Over the last decade, the number of middle and high schools in the Arab sector has nearly doubled. In addition, significant investments have been made in funding for educational services such as day-care centres, tutors, psychological counselling and home-based programmes.

Child Labour

792. Israel is a party to International Labour Organization (ILO) Convention (No. 138) concerning minimum age for admission to employment. Except in special circumstances, the minimum age of employment in Israel is 15. In practice, however, the effective minimum age is 16, as the Child Labour Law, 5713-1953, generally forbids employment of 15-year-olds if they have not yet fulfilled their compulsory education requirements, unless the Minister of Education, Culture and Sport specifically exempts the child from completing his or her compulsory education, or unless the child is employed in an approved apprenticeship programme, as discussed below. Minors 14 years of age or older may be employed during school vacations, in light work which will not harm his or her health or development (Child Labour Law, 5713-1953, sects. 2, 2 A). By approval of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, children under 15 may be employed in artistic performances, subject to any conditions the Minister may deem fit to safeguard the child's health as well as his or her physical, educational and moral development, and to ensure that the child has at least 14 hours' rest from one work day to the next (sect. 4 of the Law).

793. The Child Labour Law also enables the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs to forbid or restrict employment of minors under 16 in any place or type of enterprise which is likely to harm the child's health, welfare, or development. Recently-enacted regulations forbid employment of a child in work involving exposure to underground mines, wells or sewage, explosives, cleaning motor engines, lifting cranes, a range of heavy machinery and cutting instruments, highly flammable substances, certain types of laser instruments, extreme hot or cold temperatures, dangerous or poisonous organic substances, mental hospitals or hospital departments which pose a risk of contracting infectious diseases, and others (Child Labour (Prohibited or Restricted Employment) Regulations, 5755-1995). In addition, jobs requiring manual lifting and carrying bear restrictions on the number of hours of heavy exertion and maximum weights allowable (ibid.). A child may not work in any job until he or she first passes a free medical examination to ensure that labour involved is within his or her physical capacity. In certain types of potentially hazardous jobs, the child must undergo annual or semi-annual medical examinations.

794. The Child Labour Law also sets limitations on the hours of work and rest of all minors under 18 years old which are stricter than those for adults. Minors may not work more than 8 hours per day and 40 total hours per week, and an employer who exceeds these limitations is subject to criminal penalties. Night-time work is generally forbidden, except in special circumstances by permit of the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs. Working youth have the right to a longer daily break, weekly rest day and annual vacation than adults. Other statutory provisions ensure that the employment of all minors under 18 will not interfere with their education or vocational training (Child Labour Law, sects. 20-27). Employers who deprive minor employees or apprentices of legally-required food, clothing and lodging are liable to three years' imprisonment (Penal Law, sect. 366). Minors who work enjoy all of the rights given to adults under Israeli labour law in such matters as wages, severance pay, and other benefits.

Other measures of protection

795. Israel has ratified several conventions which bear on the protection of children, including the Geneva Slavery Convention of 1926 and the Amending Protocol of 1953; the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices similar to Slavery; the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others. In addition to criminal sanctions for child abduction, Israeli law has incorporated the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction of 1980 into domestic law, making the provisions of that convention enforceable in Israeli courts (Hague Convention (Return of Abducted Children) Law, 5751-1991). The International Division of the Ministry of Justice, reporting to the Attorney-General, bears primary responsibility for handling cases of international child abduction.

796. Among the other legislative measures aimed at protection of children the following may be noted:

(a) The Helpless Persons Protection Law, 5726-1966, prohibits various forms of exploitation of children under 14 years of age, or any disabled minor, by an adult responsible for the child.

(b) The content, language, and presentation of advertisements intended for children are regulated so as to avoid exploitation of children's innocence or impressionability for commercial ends, creation of peer pressure to buy a certain product or service, gratuitously violent, frightening or sexually inappropriate advertisements, or the encouragement of dangerous or illegal behaviour (Consumer Protection (Advertisement Directed at Minors) Regulations, 5751-1991).

(c) An interministerial committee was set up following the Stockholm Conference to develop adequate legislative and other safeguards against commercial sexual exploitation of minors. The committee's report and recommendations are currently being reviewed by a Knesset committee, and a bill creating new criminal sanctions against those involved in child prostitution is currently pending.

(d) Children's games and playgrounds must meet a series of safety and health specifications.

797. Recent legislative activity bearing on the protection of children includes an amendment to the Youth (Treatment and Supervision) Law that makes it a criminal offence to publish any pictures of naked children under nine years old (sect. 24 of the Law); and an amendment to the Execution Law, 5727-1967 that prohibits the carrying out of an order to garnish property at a debtor's home in the presence of a child alone.

Registration and nationality

798. Under the Population Registry Law, 5725-1965, the Population Registry must be notified within 10 days of all births which occur in Israel, either by the director of the institution at which the birth occurred, or, in the event that the birth did not occur at an institution, by the parents of the child and the physician and midwife who attended to the birth (sect. 6 of the law). Every person so registered must be given a surname and first name, with special provisions for cases in which the parents have different surnames or are unmarried at the time of birth. Where the parents fail to agree on the child's first name, each of them may give the child a name (Names Law, 5716-1956, sects. 2-4).

799. As discussed under article 2, all persons born in Israel at the time that one of his or her parents was an Israel national is an Israeli national. The same rule applies whether or not the parents were married at the time of birth. If the child is born after the death of one of its parents, it is sufficient if such parent was an Israeli national at the time of his or her death. Children born outside of Israel also acquire Israeli nationality if at least one parent acquired Israeli nationality by the Law of Return, by virtue of residence in Israel, by naturalization or by having been born in Israel of at least one Israeli parent. When the parents of a child born in Israel are both permanent residents, then the child automatically acquires permanent resident status, which entitles the child to the full range of social and health-care benefits accorded to nationals. When one parent is a permanent resident and the other is neither a permanent resident or a national, then the child acquires the status possessed by his or her father or guardian, unless the other parent objects (Entry into Israel Regulations, 5734-1974, regulation 12). In the latter case, the policy followed by the Minister of Interior is to grant permanent residency status to such children upon a factual showing that the child's life is centred in Israel.

800. Participation of minors in armed conflict As a general matter, persons below the age of 18 may not be drafted into the Israel Defence Forces or other security services. In certain circumstances, a minor who has reached the age of 17 may enlist for his or her regular army service with parental consent.

Article 25 - Access to the political system

801. The right to vote is the principal mechanism for participating in the Israeli political system. All citizens at least 18 years of age are entitled to vote, without distinction as to gender, race, colour, ethnicity, wealth, property, or any other status (Basic Law: Knesset, sect. 5). While a person may be denied the right to vote only by judgement of a competent court pursuant to valid legislation (Basic Law: Knesset, sect. 5), no statutory provisions have yet been enacted to enable denial of the right to vote. However, the technical requirement that a person "may vote only at the polling station where the list of voters includes his name" (Knesset and Prime Ministerial Elections Law [Consolidated Version], 5729-1969 (hereinafter - the Elections Law), sect. 7) has in the past prevented hospitalized persons, diplomatic personnel abroad, prisoners and detainees, and citizens temporarily outside of the country from voting. Over the past decade the Knesset, recognizing that considerations of administrative convenience should not operate in a manner that restricts such a fundamental right, has enacted several amendments to the Elections Law guaranteeing the exercise of the right to vote for prisoners and detainees (1986), for diplomatic and consular personnel (1992) and for hospitalized persons (1996). The Elections Law also includes special arrangements for voting by persons in active military service, police, prison staff, and persons serving on Israeli sea-going vessels (sections 89-116 of the Law). The expense of transporting voters in Knesset elections to and from the ballot station is paid for out of the State Treasury if on election day they are not in their permanent place of residence (Party Financing Law, 5733-1973, sect. 18).

802. Beginning with the national elections to the current 14th Knesset, which were held in June 1996, Israeli citizens elect the entire Knesset and the Prime Minister at the same time, but by separate ballots. Formerly, national elections were held only for the Knesset, and the candidate, typically the head of a party list, who was deemed to have the best chances of forming a Government was invited by the President of the State to do so within a limited time period. If that person succeeded in doing so, then the head of that party's list would become Prime Minister. Under the new system, the Prime Minister is elected by direct ballot; the Prime Ministerial candidate who receives the most votes is similarly invited to try to form a governing coalition, even if his or her party did not receive the most votes in the Knesset elections. National elections are "direct", in the sense that there are no electors or other intermediaries. Knesset members are not elected from particular geographical districts, but as part of a national party list.

803. The right to run for national public office Any citizen 21 years of age or more may run for Knesset, subject to three sets of exceptions. First, if a person has been sentenced to imprisonment for at least five years for certain offences against State security, and five years have not yet passed since the end of that term of imprisonment, then the person is ineligible to run in national elections. Second, a court may deny an individual the right to run for office pursuant to legislation (Basic Law: Knesset, sect. 6 (a)); as a practical matter, however, no such legislation exists. Third, several public officials are precluded from running for election to the Knesset by virtue of their position: the President of the State, the two Chief Rabbis and other members of clergy who earn wages from their religious function, any active judge of a general or religious court, the State Comptroller, the IDF (Israel Defence Forces) Chief of Staff, Police and Prisons Service personnel, and senior public servants and army officers of certain rank (sect. 7 of the Basic Law). Such senior public servants or army officers may run for national election if they leave office at least 100 days prior to the elections (Elections Law, sect. 56 (A1)). Other, less senior public servants and military personnel may run for elected office so long as they vacate their positions by the date of submission of the candidates list; if elected, they are deemed to have ceased their service so long as they remain members of Knesset (Elections Law, sect. 56 (b)). Dual nationals may run for election to the Knesset, but if elected they may not take the oath of office until they have taken all steps necessary to relieve themselves of the other nationality, nor will they hold the rights of Knesset members until they do so (Elections Law, sect. 16 A).

804. Candidates for the Office of Prime Minister must meet all of the above conditions for Knesset candidates, with the exception that the minimum age is 30 years. In addition, the Prime Ministerial candidate must generally be the head of a list of candidates for Knesset elections; in special Prime Ministerial elections, which are to be held only in extraordinary circumstances, such as when no Prime Minister is elected by the normal process, or the elected Prime Minister fails to present a government within the 45-day statutory time limit, or the Knesset decides, by a majority of at least two-thirds of the entire House, to remove a serving Prime Minister from office, the Prime Ministerial candidate need not be the head of a party list, but merely a member of Knesset (Basic Law: Government, sect. 8).

The election process

805. Proposal of Knesset Candidates List Only registered political parties may propose candidates for Prime Minister or for the Knesset (Elections Law, sect. 4; Basic Law: Government, sect. 9). A political party may be constituted by a group of 100 people, provided that they meet the requirements of the Parties Law. Aside from technical registration requirements, the Parties Registrar may refuse to register a political party on the same grounds that were earlier enacted to enable disqualification of a list of Knesset candidates: that is, if the party, by its purposes or actions, may be deemed to negate the existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic

State; to incite racism; or if there is reasonable basis to conclude that the party will serve as a cover for illegal activity (Parties Law, section 5). Having met this standard, the political party may propose a list of up to 120 Knesset candidates. The candidate list is chosen by internal party primaries, by the party central committee or by other mechanisms, according to rules adopted by each party. A recent amendment to the Elections Law repealed the precondition that at least 1,500 voters confirm their support for the candidate list (Knesset and Prime Ministerial Elections (Amendment No. 31) Law, 5756-1996). The formal barriers, then, to proposing a list of candidates for election to the Knesset have become almost symbolic.

806. Proposal of Prime Ministerial Candidate Under the new electoral system in Israel, the nomination procedures for the Prime Ministerial elections are rather thoroughly linked to those for the Knesset elections. An incumbent Knesset faction, or group of factions, holding at least 10 Knesset seats may nominate a candidate for Prime Minister, so long as they have filed a list of Knesset candidates for the impending elections. A party which holds no seats in the current Knesset, but has duly filed a list of Knesset candidates for the impending elections, may also nominate a candidate for Prime Minister if it can provide written confirmation of 50,000 registered voters for their candidate (Basic Law: Government, sect. 9). In the event of an extraordinary Prime Ministerial election, the parties not represented by a Knesset faction may not nominate a candidate (ibid.).

807. Knesset and Prime Ministerial elections are overseen by a three-tiered system of election committees: local Ballot Committees and Regional Election Committees, which carry out largely technical functions; and the Central Elections Committee, which is chaired by a Justice of the Supreme Court and is responsible for the lawful organization and holding of elections. Among other things, the Central Elections Committee must approve or disqualify each list of candidates and its identifying symbol or letters, which are used in election propaganda and on the ballots themselves; it must approve all broadcast election propaganda for compliance with statutory restrictions; it has quasi-judicial powers to rule on all complaints regarding acts or omissions under the Elections Law; and it publicizes the results of the elections. A list of candidates may be disqualified not only for technical reasons, but also, once again, if its platform or actions clearly and substantially evinces an intention, explicitly or by implication, to negate the existence of Israel as the State of the Jewish people, to negate the democratic character of the State, or to incite to racism (Basic Law: Knesset, sect. 7 A). Approval or disqualification of candidates' lists by the Central Election Committee may be appealed to the Supreme Court. The Court has twice upheld disqualification of a list by the Central Election Committee: first, in 1965, prior to the enactment of substantive standards for disqualification, the Court upheld the disqualification of the "Socialist List" based upon a finding that the party's platform aimed to "undermine the existence of the State" (E.A. 1/65, Yardor v. Central Elections Committee of the Sixth Knesset, 19(3) P.D. 365). Later, following enactment of section 7 A of Basic Law: Knesset above, the Court upheld the disqualification of the Kach Party, led by the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, for negating the democratic character of the State and incitement to racism (E.A. 1/88, Neimann v. Central Elections Committee of the Twelfth Knesset, 42(4) P.D. 177). Section 7 A actually had been enacted following a 1984 Supreme Court decision which overruled the disqualification of the same "Kach" Party list in the previous elections, on the ground, among others, that the right to be elected should not be limited without explicit statutory authorization (E.A. 2,3/84, Neiman v. Central Elections Committee of the Eleventh Knesset, 39(2) P.D. 225). The approval of a candidate list by the Central Elections Committee may also be appealed to the Supreme Court by the Attorney-General, the Chairman of the Committee or one-quarter of its members, on the grounds that the list falls under the ambit of one of the prohibitions in section 7 A of the Basic Law above-mentioned (Elections Law, sect. 64 (A1)).

808. Citizens cast their ballots in booths which ensure their privacy. Special booths suitable for use by disabled persons are required by law (Elections Law, sect. 68 A). The presence of persons at the voting facility is limited to a closed list of persons associated with the election committees, election observers or police personnel whose presence is necessary, in the opinion of the ballot committee, to ensure order (sect. 73 of the Law). Upon presenting one's personal identity card, the voter is given two envelopes, one each for the Knesset and Prime Ministerial elections. Inside the voting booth, the voter selects the slip containing the name of the Knesset list (or Prime Ministerial candidate) of his or her choice in the appropriate envelope, and places the sealed envelope into the ballot box in the presence of the local ballot committee (sects. 74 A, 75 of the Law). The voting slips, as well as instructions for voting posted inside each booth, are printed in Hebrew and Arabic. Persons who due to illness or disability are unable to follow the above procedure alone may be accompanied by an assistant, whose identity is registered in the protocol of the ballot committee.

809. The 120 Knesset seats are divided among the candidate lists according to the proportion of the total popular vote received by each of them, with two important exceptions: first, a party must pass a statutory threshold of 1.5 per cent of the total national vote to be given a Knesset mandate. Second, as a practical matter of arithmetic, the division of the popular vote into the 120 Knesset mandates leaves one or more Knesset seats to be allotted among the rival lists according to the proportion of "extra" votes received by the lists, under a special procedure prescribed by statute (Elections Law, sects. 81-82). Members of ethnic and religious minorities and of other groups protected under the Covenant vote for Knesset lists along the entire political spectrum. In addition, as discussed under article 27, Arab political parties have been represented consistently in the Knesset, as is the case in the current, fourteenth Knesset.

810. The results of national elections may be appealed to the District Court for any illegalities in the conduct of the election, in the division of votes and mandates, or in the manner in which votes were secured for a particular candidate list, provided that the alleged illegality might have influenced the outcome of the elections (Elections Law, sect. 86). The Court is empowered to annul the elections and to order new elections, to determine the correct distribution of Knesset mandates among the rival lists, or to declare that a particular member-elect of Knesset will be replaced by another person (ibid). The Court also may annul the voting results at a particular polling station if there is sufficient evidence of procedural irregularities.

811. Local and municipal elections. The fundamental right to vote and be elected applies as well to participation in local government. Burstein et al. v. Minister of Interior et al., 42(4) P.D. 462.) A series of statutes regulating elections of mayors, municipal and local councils generally mirror the arrangements for national elections, including the requirement that elections be "equal", "general", "secret", "direct" and "proportional"; the right of all persons 18 years of age and over who reside in the municipal area in question to vote in such elections; the right to run for election, subject to exceptions for judges, convicts, those lacking legal capacity, and certain classes of civil servants; and the right to propose candidate lists. (See Local Authorities (Elections) Law, 5725-1965.) For the purposes of this article, the principal differences between local and national elections are that non-citizen residents may vote in local elections, but not in national elections, and that persons who have been declared bankrupt by a competent court are ineligible to run for local office (sects. 7 (8), 13 of the Law).

812. In certain non-urban areas, local and regional government is regulated by laws which do not explicitly require that elections be equal. (See, e.g., Local Councils Ordinance [New Version], N.V. 256, sects. 2, 3, 38.) Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has applied the principle of equality and the right to run for local public office to invalidate ministerial orders enacted pursuant to such legislation which restricted the right of residents of certain cooperative settlements to be elected to the local council unless they already serve as directors of a parallel entity within their community. (H.C.J. 753/87, Burstein v. Minister of Interior, supra.)

813. Women and ethnic minorities in public office For a discussion of the participation of women in national and local political life, reference is made to the discussion under article 3, and to Israel's initial and first periodic report to the Committee for the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. The participation of members of ethnic minorities in political life is discussed under articles 26 and 27.

814. Campaign financing. Since the 1970s, political parties running for election to the Knesset receive campaign funding from the State Treasury, in an amount based on the number of mandates they win in the election in question. Under current law, a three-member public committee headed by a judge determines the amount of the "funding unit" for a given election (Party Financing Law, 5733-1973, sect. 1 A-B). Following publication of the election results, parties which were not represented in the outgoing Knesset receive an amount of "funding units" equal to the number of mandates they won in the election, plus an additional funding unit; parties which were represented in the outgoing Knesset receive an amount of "funding units" based on the average between the number of mandates they held in the outgoing and incoming Knessets, respectively, plus an additional funding unit (sects. 2 and 3 of the Law). Other parties which fail to win a Knesset mandate, but receive at least one per cent of the popular vote, receive an amount equal to one "funding unit" (sect. 2 (A1) of the Law). The Party Financing Law also sets limits on campaign expenses based on the number of mandates each party holds in the outgoing Knesset, on the expenses of parties not represented in the outgoing Knesset, and on the amount of individual campaign contributions (sect. 7 of the Law). In this manner, the statutory arrangements attempt to preserve substantial equality of the economic resources available to the parties contending for election. In a line of important precedents, the Supreme Court, recognizing that "economic inequality among the various [Knesset] factions creates inequality of political rights" (H.C.J. 141/82, Rubinstein v. Chairman of the Knesset, 37(3) P.D. 141, 153), has intervened in parliamentary decisions regarding campaign financing which are deemed to violate the requirement in section 4 of Basic Law: Knesset that Knesset elections be "equal". For example, the Court held invalid an amendment to the Party Financing Law which conferred retroactive legitimacy on campaign spending well above the statutory limit by several parties which ran for election to the tenth Knesset, holding that such a violation of the equality principle could be approved only by an absolute majority of the Knesset, under the terms of the entrenchment clause in Basic Law: Knesset. (H.C.J. 141/82, Rubinstein v. Chairman of the Knesset, supra.) More recently, the Court annulled a decision by the Knesset Affairs Committee which retroactively changed the amount of the "funding unit" following the elections to the twelfth Knesset, in a manner which appeared intended to cover overspending by the ruling Likud faction. (H.C.J. 2060/91 MK Ran Cohen et al. v. Dov Shilansky et al., 46(4) P.D. 319.) In the aftermath of this latter judgement, the Knesset amended the Party Financing Law to give the authority to determine the "funding unit" to the external public committee as mentioned above, replacing the Parliamentary Affairs Committee of the Knesset.

815. The financing of Knesset election campaigns by political parties is subject to thorough oversight by the State Comptroller, and parties which exceed the spending limit may be obligated to pay the State Treasury the difference between allowed and actual expenses.

Access to public service

816. The State of Israel employs more than 83,000 civilian employees.* With very few exceptions, as discussed below, civil servants are selected pursuant to legislation and the Civil Service code of bylaws, known as the Takshir, which establishes a merit-based civil service system. The State Service (Appointments) Law, 5721-1961, generally requires that civil servants be appointed through a competitive tender process which clearly defines minimum qualifications for the position in question. In the case of certain positions, such as the director-general of Government Ministries or Government companies, applicable legislation allows for appointments based on political affiliation (see State Service (Appointments) Law, 5721-1961, sects. 12, 23), although all appointments to such positions are reviewed by an impartial committee headed by a retired judge, to ensure adequate professional qualifications. In addition, Government Ministers may choose certain personal aides without a tender for positions which are deemed to involve a particularly high degree of personal trust, such as spokesperson, bureau director, secretary, advisors, and driver. While no official statistics are available as of the submission of this report, it is estimated that roughly one government service position in one thousand is filled without a tender, not including temporary appointments.

* Source: Statistical Abstract of Israel, 1996. This number includes permanent, special contract and temporary employees of Government Ministries and other bodies directly related to them. It does not include the staff of the President's office, the Knesset staff, the State Comptroller's office, the Attorney-General, judges and judges in rabbinical courts, teaching staff of the educational system, the staffs of the Employment Service and the National Insurance Institute, the Airport Authority, Bezek - Israel Communication Company, the Postal Authority, Israel Railways, local staff in embassies abroad, soldiers and civilians employed in the army, and the staff of the security authorities.

817. Several layers of legislation aim to protect against discrimination in access to the civil service. Both the Employment Service Law, 5719-1959, and the Equal Opportunity in Employment Law, 5748-1988, which apply to private and public employers generally, forbid discrimination among job applicants on the basis of religion, race, nationality or national origin, sex, sexual orientation, age, personal or marital status, personal worldview or political affiliation. These provisions apply, mutatis mutandis, to civil service hiring without a tender, to terms of employment, promotion, on-the-job professional training, and termination of employment. The State Service (Appointments) (Tenders and Examinations) Rules, 5721-1961, obligates members of tender committees to avoid as much as possible questions relating to controversies between political parties. (See also Takshir, paras. 11.61 and 12.367, and Civil Service Commissioner Notice 56/12.)

818. Despite the legislative guarantees of equal access to the public service, the actual representation of women and ethnic minorities in the civil service is still far from adequate. Though women constitute roughly 60 per cent of all civil servants, for example, they are on the whole vastly underrepresented in senior positions. To help redress this entrenched phenomenon, the Knesset enacted in 1995 an amendment to the State Service (Appointments) Law requiring that members of both sexes be adequately represented in the civil service, and imposing a duty on the Civil Service Commissioner to remedy unequal representation of members of either sex in a particular ministry, department or type of position, including through affirmative action programmes. Since the above amendment, the Civil Service Commissioner has drafted guidelines for promoting women's representation in the civil service which, among other things, require governmental bodies to report on the number of women employees and their distribution according to rank, as well as on job vacancies and tenders. In addition, even prior to the amendment, the Civil Service Bylaws (Takshir) was amended to require that tender committees for civil service positions must include members of both sexes as for the results of the tender (that is, the selection of a particular person for the position in question) to be lawful (Civil Service Bylaws, sect. 11.461).

819. Arabs and Druze are also under-represented in the government service as a whole. In 1994, the Government decided to take affirmative action measures to enhance the integration of Arabs and Druze into the civil service, among other things by issuing tenders for mid-level positions solely to members of those minorities. Between 1 January 1994 and April 1996, 661 Arabs and Druze were appointed to government service posts. At present there are roughly 2,300 members of ethnic or national minorities in the government service (not including the Israel Police, the Prisons Service, or those bodies mentioned above), out of a total of roughly 50,000. Employees in local and regional government bodies largely reflect the demographic composition of the locality or region. In the 88 local councils or municipalities which serve towns and settlements in which the population is primarily composed of Arabs, Druze, Bedouin or Circassians, the employees of the local government bodies are almost exclusively composed of members of those minorities. In larger municipalities with mixed populations, such as Jerusalem, Haifa and Lod, members of minorities are employed at a level which approaches their representation in the population, although less so at the most senior levels.

Foreign nationals

820. As mentioned above, only Israeli citizens may run for election to the Knesset or the office of Prime Minister. In addition, the President of the State, the State Comptroller, members of the Postal Authority Council and the Jerusalem Development Council, the Chief Rabbis, judges in courts of general jurisdiction, and judges in Jewish, Muslim and Druze religious courts must be Israeli citizens. Dual nationals who are candidates for election to the Knesset, the office of Prime Minister or for judicial appointment in the general courts bear a special statutory obligation to take all steps necessary to be relieved of their other nationality (Basic Law: Knesset, sect. 16 (a); Courts Law [Consolidated Version], 5744-1984, sect. 5).

821. Employment of aliens in the civil service is also restricted. Under section 16 of the State Service (Appointments) Law, 5719-1959, only an Israeli national may be formally appointed as a civil servant. However, foreign nationals may be hired under "special contracts", which may be renewed periodically. Civil servants with dual nationality are not required to relinquish their other nationality.

Article 26 - Equality before the law

Other international conventions

822. Israel is a party to several international conventions bearing on the prevention of discrimination, including the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (seventh, eighth and ninth periodic reports submitted in July 1997); the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, since 1991 (initial and first periodic report filed in March 1997); the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, since 1991 (Israel's initial and first periodic report submitted in November 1997); the International Labour Organization (ILO) Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), since 1959 (Israel's most recent report relates to 1992-1993); the ILO Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention 1962 (No. 118), since 1965 (Israel's most recent report covers the period between 1991-1993); the ILO Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), since 1965 (Israel's last report covers the years 1991-1993). As is the case with the present Convention, these conventions have not been made part of Israel's internal law by Knesset legislation, although they have exerted an important influence on the development of Israeli law, including in legislation and judicial decisions bearing on the promotion of equality. The discussion under this article, and other related articles in this Convention, substantially covers many of the anti-discrimination concerns dealt with in reports under the above-mentioned Conventions.

The status of the right to equality in Israeli law

823. Constitutional norms. As mentioned elsewhere in this report, Israel did not enact a constitution upon its establishment, as called for in its Declaration of Independence. Instead, it has chosen to enact Basic Laws regarding different components of its constitutional regime; these Basic Laws, taken together, comprise a "constitution-in-the-making". In 1992, the Knesset enacted two Basic Laws - Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation - which give written constitutional footing to a series of fundamental individual rights. The general right to equality before the law, however, is not specifically enshrined in these, or in any other of Israel's Basic Laws (only Basic Law: Knesset contains a provision requiring equality in parliamentary elections). Indeed, earlier legislative proposals for a bill of rights which included a general guarantee of equality failed to garner a majority necessary for enactment. The parliamentary history of these earlier proposals, as well as of the initial efforts to enact a constitution after Israel's founding, suggest that the absence of a written constitutional guarantee of equality has derived in no small part from the difficulty in reconciling a comprehensive equality principle with the dictates of religious law, in which equality is not necessarily a paramount value, and from the effect of that value-conflict in the arena of coalition politics.

824. Despite the lack of an explicit, written constitutional guarantee, the right to equality has been firmly entrenched as a binding, overarching principle in Israeli law since the beginnings of the post-independence legal system. Israel's Declaration of Independence, drawing on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, provides that "[t]he State of Israel will maintain equal social and political rights for all citizens, irrespective of religion, race or sex". Although the Declaration, strictly speaking, lacks binding constitutional force, the Supreme Court has relied on it, as well as on common-law doctrines requiring administrative authorities to act in good faith and consistently with public policy, to establish the right to equality before the law as "the life breath of our entire constitutional regime" (H.C.J. 98/169, Bergman v. Minister of Finance, 24(1) P.D. 693, 698), and to make that right enforceable in the courts.

825. Statutory guarantees and judicial development of the right to equality
In lieu of a constitution, the right to equality has been secured until recently either through specific statutory guarantees of equality in matters such as women's rights and employment, and through the case law, as part of the Supreme Court's painstaking development of an "unwritten Bill of Rights". The first significant equal rights legislation was the Women's Equal Rights Law, 5711-1951. This law prescribes equality of legal status between men and women, requires that "one law" apply to men and women regarding "any legal act", and declares that any law that discriminates against a woman as such shall be null and void. It guarantees equal rights mainly in relation to acts of government authorities, and deals specifically with property rights and parental rights of married women, but excludes matters of "personal status" themselves, such as marriage and divorce, in which the relevant religious law is dispositive.

826. The Supreme Court's broad development of the right to equality has taken two principal forms: first, in the willingness of the Court, sitting as High Court of Justice, to intervene in the exercise of administrative discretion so as to require all arms of the executive branch to act without unlawful discrimination; and second, by creating a presumption of statutory interpretation under which the purpose of any given statute is presumed to favor the promotion of equality rather than its curtailment, unless the statute explicitly states the contrary. Until recently, the Court, in deference to the constitutional supremacy of the Knesset in the Israeli scheme of government, has refrained from invalidating Knesset legislation which it deemed to violate fundamental rights, including the right to equality; it has, however, invalidated ministerial regulations or administrative policies ("secondary" legislation) on these grounds.

827. The enactment of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty may well elevate the right to equality to full-fledged supreme normative status, superior to any ordinary Knesset statute. Based on Section 1 of the Law, under which "[f]undamental human rights in Israel ... shall be respected in the spirit of the principles in the Declaration of Independence" - i.e., including the guarantee of full equality of political and social rights - several justices of the Supreme Court have already expressed the view that the right to human dignity protected by the Basic Law includes the right to equality - even though a provision in early drafts which specifically guaranteed equality and forbid discrimination was not included in the final text of the Basic Law. (See, e.g., H.C.J. 453/94, Israel Women's Network v. Government of Israel, 48(5) 501; H.C.J. 5394/92, Huppert v. "Yad Vashem", 48(3) P.D. 353; H.C.J. 721/94 "El-Al" Israel Airlines Ltd. v. Danilovitz, 48(5) P.D. 749 (per Barak, D.P.); H.C.J. 5688/92 Wechselbaum v. Minister of Defence, 47(2) P.D. 812). Another view, espoused by several members of the Court, holds that "the Basic Law protects against violation of the principle of equality when that violation results in humiliation, that is, in a violation of human dignity as such. Such is the case ... in certain types of discrimination against a group, including discrimination on the basis of sex ... and ... race." (H.C.J. 4541/94, Miller v. Minister of Defence [cite] (per Dorner, J.)). As of the submission of this report, the Court has yet squarely to face this issue. To the extent that the Court decides to include the principle of non-discrimination within the ambit of the rights protected by the Basic Law, the Court will be empowered to void discriminatory Knesset legislation which does not comply with the terms of the limitation clause (sect. 8) of the Basic Law.

828. Elimination of discrimination in the private sphere Thus far, discrimination by private actors is prohibited in Israeli law only to the extent that legislation explicitly so provides. Such is the case, for example, with the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 5748-1988, which prohibits all forms of discrimination by private or public employers; the Goods and Services Supervision Law, 5717-1957, which prohibits any unreasonable refusal to provide goods or services covered by the law; the Patient's Rights Law, 5756-1996, which prohibits discrimination between patients on the basis of religion, race, sex, nationality, country of origin or any other such grounds; the Council for Higher Education (Accreditation of Institutions) Rules, 5724-1964, which forbid an institution from discriminating between students or in academic appointments on the grounds of race, sex, religion, nationality or social status; and various statutes which ensure gender equality in domestic relations, such as the Spouses (Property Relations) Law, 5733-1973, the Family Violence Prevention Law, 5751-1991, and the Women's Equal Rights Law, 5711-1951. A recently enacted law prohibits automobile insurance companies from gathering information from insurees related to their religion or nationality, in order to prevent the possibility of discrimination in setting insurance premiums (Motor Vehicle Insurance Law, 5758-1998). Over the past several years, the view has been advanced, in obiter dicta and by legal scholars, that the rights protected by Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty apply in the private as well as the public sphere. (See, e.g., C.A. 239/92, "Eged" Cooperative Ltd. v. Mashiach, 48(2) P.D. 66; A. Barak, Interpretation in Law (vol. III: Constitutional Interpretation)(Jerusalem: Nevo), p. 649 et seq.). In any case, there would appear to be a growing tendency in Israeli law to apply the right to equality in the private sphere, while the degree of protection afforded will depend on the specific balance struck by the Court between the right to equality, on the one hand, and countervailing rights in the particular circumstances of each case.

829. Affirmative action. In matters of government funding, Israel has long embraced the notion that special allocations or benefits may - and ought to - be made available to members of disadvantaged or needy groups in matters such as housing, teaching hours in schools, and the like. It is only recently that the Government and the Knesset have instituted policies involving affirmative action in hiring or appointments to public institutions. Two recent legislative acts - a 1993 amendment to the Government Companies Law and a 1995 amendment to the State Service (Appointments) Law - impose a positive obligation to pursue hiring and appointment practices that ensure appropriate representation for women in the civil service and on the boards of government companies, respectively. In addition, the Civil Service Commission has pursued an affirmative action policy over the last several years designed to increase the representation of Arabs, particularly those with academic degrees, in mid-level civil service positions, as discussed under article 27.

830. The Supreme Court's equal rights jurisprudence has evolved in this respect as well. While most of the early decisions adopt a formal, or Aristotelian, conception of equality, over the last decade the Court has repeatedly affirmed a more substantive approach which considers the equality of outcomes, including for members of disadvantaged groups. As a result, the Court has confirmed the legality of government policies and practices which give preferences of various sorts to members of groups singled out for special treatment. For example, in denying a petition filed by a Jew who wished to participate in a special offer to sell housing plots solely to Bedouins at favourable rates, on the ground that the government housing programme impermissibly discriminated on the basis of national or social origin, the Court stated:

The principle of equality serves the aim of achieving a just outcome. It is not "technical" or "formal" equality that is worthy of protection, but rather substantive equality, that is, equality among equals. Persons, or groups of persons, often differ from one another in their conditions, characteristics and needs, and sometimes it is necessary to discriminate between unequals to protect, encourage and advance the weak or needy.

831. The Court has interpreted statutory affirmative action guarantees expansively, going as far to suggest, without holding, that the purpose of affirmative action is not only to remedy past discrimination, but also to ensure present and future equality (see Israel Women's Network v. Government of Israel, supra, in which the Court annulled appointments of three men to the boards of directors of two government companies which had no women directors).

832. Israel as a "Jewish and democratic" State Israel aims to be at once a Jewish State and a democracy. This dual political foundation finds its expression not only in the Declaration of Independence, but in Basic Laws and specific statutes. The stated purpose of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty is "to protect human dignity and liberty, in order to entrench in a Basic Law the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State" (sect. 1). An amendment to Basic Law: Knesset allows for disqualification of a list of candidates for Knesset elections which, among others rejects "the existence of Israel as the State of the Jewish people", or which rejects "the democratic character of the State" (sect. 7 A). In several areas of law and practice, such as the granting of citizenship to Jewish immigrants under the Law of Return, the residential development activities of the Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund, and elsewhere, the State differences exist between the Jewish and non-Jewish populations in different ways that derive from Israel's fundamental identity as a Jewish State. Moreover, Israel acknowledges that over the course of its turbulent history, inequalities have arisen between Jews and non-Jews in the degree to which they enjoy the State support in a variety of fields, many of which are addressed in this report. Nevertheless, Israel remains committed to a policy of closing the gaps in treatment between the Jewish and non-Jewish sectors, and to ensuring equality of social and political rights for all of its citizens. While progress remains to be made in a variety of realms, such as housing and development, pre-school education, funding of religious services, and the integration of non-Jews into senior government positions, important advances have been made in many areas, as described under article 27 and other articles in this report, as well as below under this article.

Equality in employment

833. The Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 5748-1988, is the cornerstone of equal rights legislation relating to the workplace. The law prohibits discrimination in the workplace based on gender, sexual orientation, marital status, parenthood, race, age, religion, nationality, country of birth, political or other orientation. Neither governmental nor private employers may take the above classifications into account in hiring, promotion, termination of employment, training, terms of employment or retirement arrangements of employees, except in special cases where the unique nature of the position makes such classifications relevant. The prohibition of workplace discrimination in the Law applies not only to explicit discriminatory practices, but has also been interpreted to apply to terms of employment which are non-discriminatory on their face but in fact amount to impermissible discrimination, such as requiring previous military service (which very few Arabs perform) when such a requirement is not relevant to the job in question. Protections offered to women employees which take into account their special needs as women or mothers are not deemed discriminatory, although the Law specifies that any such rights offered to working mothers must be given equally to men who either have sole custody of their children, or whose wives work and have chosen not to use their rights. The Law also recognizes sexual harassment as a form of workplace discrimination subject to civil and criminal sanctions.

834. Violations of the substantive provisions of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law constitute a criminal offence, punishable by a fine. They also entitle the employee to a range of civil remedies including compensation, including when no material damage is proved, and, in appropriate circumstances, enforcement injunctions against the employer. Civil proceedings under the law can be initiated by an employee, a trade union or a voluntary association for the protection of civil rights.

835. The Enforcement Division of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs is authorized under the law to investigate complaints by individuals; in 1996, workplaces employing more than five persons were investigated, among others, for possible violations relating to sexual harassment, discrimination in hiring, promotion and wages, exercise of parental rights and discriminatory employment advertisements. Since 1988, relatively few cases of employment discrimination under the law have reached the courts, and most of these have involved the unlawful publication of employment advertisements. One possible reason for the relative paucity of discrimination or harassment suits under the law may be the low damage awards typically determined by the labour courts.

836. The anti-discrimination provisions in the Equal Employment Opportunities Law are mirrored in the Employment Service Law, 5719-1959, which regulates the operations of the government agency that matches public and private employers with persons seeking work. Section 42 of the latter Law forbids the Employment Service, in deciding which prospective employees to send to available positions, from discriminating against any person on the basis of age, gender, race, religion, nationality, country of origin, political affiliation or opinion. The Law also forbids any employer which registers with the Employment Service from refusing to accept any job applicant on the above grounds whether or not that applicant was referred to the employer by the Service (sect. 42). An exception is made, once again, for jobs which by their nature make any of the above classifications relevant, or which prevent the hiring of a particular person for reasons of State security. The Law further forbids employers from publishing job notices which have the effect of discriminating on the basis of any of the classifications noted above.

837. Similarly, the Hours of Work and Rest Law, 5711-1951, forbids an employer from refusing to hire a person "solely because he has given notice upon being hired, that he does not agree to work on the weekly days according to a religious prohibition which he observes", and prohibits employers from demanding that an employee obligate to work on his weekly rest day as a condition for being hired (sect. 9 C).

838. Other equal rights legislation in the field of employment relate mainly to gender equality. The Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law, 5756-1996, requires equal compensation for men and women in positions that are "equal in value", which the law defines as any two jobs that demand equal qualifications, effort, expertise and responsibility. Any deviation from this standard of equality requires the employer to prove that non-gender-related circumstances justify the discrepancy in compensation. Employees who are found to have been underpaid may sue for up to 24 months' back wages. The Law empowers the Labour Court to appoint a job-analysis expert at its own initiative, or at the request of either party, to examine the "value" of the two jobs in question; it also allows for the possibility of class action suits, which are rare in the Israeli legal system. Statistical information regarding the implementation of gender equality in the workplace may be found in the discussion under article 3.

839. The Equal Retirement Age (Male and Female Employees) Law, 5747-1987, prohibits employers from forcing women workers to retire earlier than their male counterparts, despite the fact that women may by law elect to do so with full pension rights several years earlier than men. Measures aimed at maintaining equality of status for working mothers are discussed under articles 23 and 24.

Education

840. Background and legislative provisions The Israeli public educational system is divided into several "streams" at the pre-school, primary and secondary levels: State schools, which serve the majority of the Jewish and Arab population; State Religious schools, which serve roughly one fifth of all enrolled students, and retain autonomy with respect to curriculum and pedagogy; and recognized "independent" schools, most of which provide an ultra-orthodox Jewish religious education or a Christian religious education. These independent schools operate as non-profit organizations, financed by the Government. Jewish and Arab schools within the State educational system maintain separate curricula and institutions.

841. The Compulsory Education Law, 5709-1949, as amended in 1991, prohibits any discrimination in acceptance, placement, curriculum or advancement of students on the basis of ethnicity. In addition, the rules of the Council for Higher Education, which accredits institutions of higher learning, prohibit all accredited institutions from discriminating in the acceptance of students and appointment of academic staff on the basis of race, gender, religion, nationality or social status. (Higher Education Council (Recognition of Institutions) Rules, 5724-1964, rule 9.)

842. Within the Jewish sector, problems of discrimination have arisen historically in cases where schools have refused, or been reluctant, to accept students of Oriental (Sephardi) extraction. Such overt ethnic discrimination by now is a rare phenomenon, confined mainly to "independent" ultra-orthodox institutions, which receive State funding and are subject to less stringent supervision by the Education Ministry than State schools. During the last decade, the influx of recent Ethiopian immigrants into the educational system has given rise to a special set of challenges and difficulties. On the one hand, Israel has made an extraordinary effort in bringing the Ethiopian community to Israel and integrating them into the society, including through vast funding for housing and other benefits which are higher than those given to any other group, immigrant or otherwise. On the other hand, the very magnitude of the task of helping an entire community make an abrupt transition to a different culture, society and language has challenged the capacities of a range of government authorities, including in the field of education. The vast majority of Ethiopian youth who arrived in Israel since 1985 were placed initially in separate classes or educational frameworks, necessary to help these students, many of whom had little formal education, to bridge educational gaps. In the first several years following Operation Solomon, the mass airlift of over 20,000 Ethiopians in 1990, roughly 90 per cent of Ethiopian teenagers were sent to boarding schools, where students tend to have lower levels of academic achievement and often come from disadvantaged or distressed backgrounds. A high proportion of all Ethiopian students were placed in separate classes in which all or most of the students were Ethiopian. At the secondary and post-secondary level, a large proportion of Ethiopian students are routed to vocational educational tracks which lessen the likelihood that such students will matriculate and go on to university. Attendance of Ethiopian children in pre-school frameworks has been far lower than the rest of the population, in part due to the inability of their families to shoulder the cost of such programmes. As a result, Ethiopian students have shown significantly lower educational attainments than other sectors of the population on the whole, and delinquency, unheard-of in the Ethiopian community before their immigration, has become a worrisome phenomenon. To respond to the special educational needs of Ethiopian youth, the Education and Absorption Ministries, which bear primary responsibility for the complex task of integrating Ethiopian students into the educational and social mainstream, have initiated special educational enrichment programmes at several schools. In 1992, an interministerial decision forbid schools from placing Ethiopian students in separate classes, and the Ministry of Education issued an order requiring that Ethiopians not make up more than 25 per cent of the student body at any particular school. As a result, the degree of segregation of the Ethiopian students from the general student body has decreased considerably over the last several years. Recently, an interministerial task force has begun to develop a long-term plan for improving the integration of Ethiopian students into the educational mainstream, which is to include training of teachers and supervisors, broader enrichment programmes, an educational evaluation process which emphasizes learning potential rather than standardized performance indicators, and the like.

843. Education in the Arab sector. As discussed under article 24, the Arab educational system in Israel has suffered, on the whole, from problems of pedagogical method and quality, from a lower level of educational achievements by students, a relative shortage of adequate facilities and a lower level of government funding in comparison with the Jewish educational system. Over the last five years, the Government has made impressive advances towards equality of the Jewish and Arab educational systems. Hundreds of new classrooms have been built in the Arab sector over this relatively brief period; the number of middle and high schools in the Arab sector has nearly doubled over the last decade. The number of classroom hours per school and per student have increased dramatically, reaching parity with the Jewish educational system in 1995. In the 1994/1995 school year, a special educational-care index was introduced in the Arab sector, similar to that used in the Jewish system. This index enables a calibration of the needs of each school for additional classroom hours, and has resulted in the addition of tens of thousands of classroom hours, particularly in the neediest schools. The total number of teachers in Arab schools increased 24 per cent between 1989-1990 and 1993-1994, and more of these teachers had proper academic training; 20 Arab academics were hired during the last several years to senior positions, such as school inspectors. The Ministry of Education has instituted technology education programmes in Arab schools, including laboratories in 40 primary schools, 35 middle schools, and 47 high schools, as well as science and technology instructional kits in 15 localities. The drop-out rate among Arab students has declined precipitously over the past two decades, and decreased 30 per cent in a single year (1994-1995); at the same time, matriculation rates and other indicators of academic performance have increased as well. A special educational programme for gifted Arab children was initiated in 1993; in 1996, 1,655 schoolchildren participated in the programme. The Minister of Education recently announced his intention to develop a long-term educational plan for the entire Arab sector. Significant progress remains to be made, together with local government authorities, in nursery and pre-school education, in which the Arab sector suffers from a shortage of facilities and trained staff; in special education, despite increased funding for teaching hours, there remains a severe shortage of facilities, trained personnel, and professional supervision.

844. Citizenship and residency. As discussed under article 2, there is a clear difference in the treatment of Jews and non-Jews regarding the acquisition of citizenship. With very few exceptions, any Jew who immigrates to Israel, as well as any Jew born in Israel may automatically become a citizen under the Law of Return. Non-Jews may become citizens through birth, residency, or naturalization. As a result of amendments to the Law of Return, 5710-1950, and the Nationality Law, 5712-1952, almost all Arab residents of Israel are citizens, and all persons born in Israel, regardless of religion, who have at least one parent who is an Israeli citizen automatically become citizens at birth. The principal difference, then, in the acquisition of citizenship between Jews and non-Jews relates to immigrants or persons born in Israel whose parents are not Israeli citizens.

Military service and subsequent entitlements

845. Under the Security Service Law [Consolidated Version], 5746-1986, all permanent residents of Israel, men and women, are obligated to perform military service. In practice, the military does not draft certain sectors of the population, and the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that it will not review the military's exercise of discretion in this matter. With very few exceptions, Christian and Muslim Arabs are not enlisted, while Druze and Circassian men perform their compulsory service, following the request by the heads of their communities in the 1950s to allow their enlistment. Ultra-orthodox Jewish men who can show that they are studying in a religious institute (yeshiva) may postpone their military service for renewable periods of one year, so long as they remain in the yeshiva full-time and do not perform any work for pay. The number of Jewish men who have taken advantage of this arrangement has grown roughly fivefold over the last 30 years, reaching a total of approximately 30,000 in 1997. The great majority of them end up performing no military service whatsoever, or an extremely short tour of duty. Others eventually serve a truncated regular tour of duty and are integrated into the military reserves. Several petitions challenging the postponement arrangement for yeshiva students for impermissible discrimination on religious grounds were all denied by the Supreme Court. (See, e.g., H.C.J. 40/70, Becker v. Minister of Defence, 24(1) P.D. 238; H.C.J. 448/81, Ressler v. Minister of Defence, 36(1) P.D. 81; H.C.J. 910/86 Ressler v. Minister of Defence, 42(2) P.D. 441). In the last of these challenges, the Court held that the Minister of Defence's reasons for not drafting yeshiva students - their doubtful effectiveness as soldiers and other, non-security related reasons - were not sufficiently unreasonable to warrant the Court's intervention. At the same time, the Court indicated that their decision might change if the number of yeshiva students granted postponements increased to the point where it significantly affects security considerations. (H.C.J. 910/86, Ressler v. Minister of Defence, 42(2) P.D. 441, 506). A pending petition to the Court asks that the IDF reexamine the practice of exemptions for yeshiva students in light of its dramatic increase over the years.

846. Orthodox Jewish women are exempted from military service if they file a declaration stating that religious reasons prevent them from serving in the IDF, that they observe Jewish dietary laws and do not travel on the Jewish Sabbath (Security Service Law, sect. 40). In practice, a small but significant number of women thus exempted perform one or two years of non-military "national service". Non-Jewish women are not conscripted into military service, although in rare cases they serve as volunteers. Recently, it was decided that non-Jewish women can volunteer for national service, and as a result they are eligible to receive the benefits given to such volunteers.

847. While men bear considerably heavier military obligations than women in Israel, the Supreme Court, in holding that the failure to admit a woman to the Air Force pilot's course amounted to impermissible discrimination, determined that the principle of equality requires that women be allowed to waive their preferential status and to bear the same duties as men. (H.C.J. 4541/94, Miller v. Minister of Defence (49(4) P.D. 94.)

848. Benefits given on the basis of military service Because the policies of exemption from military service draw a clear distinction on the basis of national origin, benefits granted to released soldiers have been scrutinized closely to ensure that the fact of military service justifies the benefit in question. Until 1994, applicable law granted a series of privileges to released soldiers for a three-month period, including tuition subsidies, preference in acceptance to university and university housing, and preference in hiring for certain positions in public institutions or in job placements through the Employment Service. One particularly problematic benefit was the "released soldier's allowance" which the National Insurance Institute paid to families with at least three children in which at least one family member served in the military. The underlying justification for the allowance was the increased financial burden that military service placed on the soldier's family, the soldier's own loss of income during the several years of mandatory service, and the desire to grant a veteran's benefit in recognition of military service. In effect, such families received significantly higher "children's allowances" than families - particularly in the Arab sector - in which no one had performed military service. Shortly after entering into office in 1992, the Government led by Yitzhak Rabin initiated a broad reform of veterans' benefit arrangements. The "released soldier's allowance" was eliminated, and the level of children's allowances given to all families was equalized over a three-year period ending in 1997. Moreover, non-monetary benefits, such as preference in acceptance to university and vocational training programmes, were eliminated. Although these benefits were in themselves a legitimate form of aid to released soldiers who had foregone university study or vocational training for at least three years, it was deemed preferable to make all such benefits more directly monetary. Under the Released Soldiers Absorption Law, 5754-1994, soldiers and persons who perform National Service are given a small cash grant upon their release, and may receive an additional grant for purposes such as education, opening a business, or buying housing within five years from their release. In addition, soldiers may apply for partial or total exemptions from university tuition based on economic need, or for parallel tuition exemptions regardless of economic need in certain fields in which there is a proven need for additional personnel. Under criteria applied by the Ministry of Housing and Construction, released soldiers receive an enlarged government-sponsored mortgage for acquiring their first apartment.

Housing and land

849. Over the course of Israel's history, serious disparities between the Jewish and Arab populations in the availability of housing and of land for development have become entrenched. A significant part of the problem derives from expropriations of land in the aftermath of the War of Independence. Only 7 per cent of all land in Israel is privately owned, 4 per cent by Arabs and 3 per cent by Jews. The remaining 93 per cent is managed by the Israel Lands Administration (ILA) on behalf of the owners of the land: the Keren Kayemet Leyisrael, an organization funded by private Jewish donations (10 per cent of ILA-managed land); the Development Authority (10 per cent), and the State (80 per cent). The ILA has, over the years, leased or transferred significant land holdings for development of Jewish towns and settlements, while for the most part new Arab localities have not been established through similar arrangements, except for the eight Bedouin towns established in the southern Negev region. Another source of the gap in housing and development is the historic lack of approved town plans in the Arab sector, which made it exceedingly difficult to develop existing Arab localities to meet the needs of the Arab population, which has grown sixfold since 1948.

850. Over the past decade, the Government has taken measures designed to reduce the considerable differences in housing and development between the Jewish and Arab sectors. Among others, the ILA has allocated land for residential projects, industrial areas and public buildings in several Arab localities; the Ministry of Interior has approved town plans for 29 Arab local authorities (out of 81), is close to approval of five other town plans, and has begun expedited development of town plans for 41 more localities; the land area of several localities has been enlarged for use in development, and plans for the enlargement of nearly 20 other Arab localities are currently under review; many Arab localities have been included in highest-priority development areas, which enables entrepreneurs to develop land and, in appropriate circumstances, to lease land at a fraction of its real cost; government ministries have increased their funding for development of residential and industrial infrastructure considerably over the last five years; the Interior Ministry has initiated a variety of programmes aimed at improving the effectiveness of Arab local authorities in spurring and managing development in areas under their jurisdiction, and actively encourages the formation of economic corporations which make it easier to receive public and private development funding (thus far 17 such corporations have been formed). In addition, a rule that allowed only army veterans to receive subsidized mortgages in development towns was abolished several years ago, on the basis of the Attorney-General's opinion that the rule was impermissibly discriminatory. Other government development activities in the Arab sector are discussed under article 27. Further progress remains to be made before the level of housing and land development can approach equality between the Jewish and Arab sectors.

851. The Bedouin community. The Bedouin population in Israel, particularly in the Negev Desert area, is perhaps the most disadvantaged single community in Israel in terms of per capita income, unemployment, and the level of infrastructure and services in their communities. There are approximately 100,000 Bedouins in the Negev, and roughly 38,000 in the Galilee. For most of Israel's history, the Bedouins have been engaged in a dispute with the Government over possession of lands and housing rights, which recently appears to be significantly closer to its resolution.

852. The Bedouins were originally nomadic tribes, whose economy was based on camel and sheep herding. They began settling in Eretz Yisrael in the fifth century A.D., and their numbers increased gradually throughout the centuries. Among themselves, land possession and ownership was determined by internal custom, which did not involve any written deeds of sale or ownership. Most of the lands used by Bedouins for herding and cultivation are of the legal category known as muwat, that is, land which is not privately owned or possessed. Under applicable Ottoman and British Mandatory Law, the possession of such muwat land is conditional upon receiving a permit; those who lacked permits were liable to prosecution for trespassing. (Ottoman Land Law of 1858, sect. 103; Land Ordinance (Muwat), 1921.) Alternatively, persons who cultivated such land prior to the enactment of the 1921 Mandatory Ordinance were entitled to receive formal rights to the land by submitting a request to the Land Registrar within two months of its publication. Although the Bedouins did not register the land that they inhabited, and had no written documents proving their rights, the British Mandatory authorities decided not to evacuate them.

853. Beginning in the 1950s, the Government pursued a policy of concentrating the Bedouins in the northern Negev, particularly in the Sayig area, which covers roughly 1.5 dunams, 40 per cent of which is used by the Bedouins for habitation, agriculture, and animal grazing; and of settling them in new government-planned towns, which had the unfortunate effect of uprooting them from their traditional way of life. Much of the hundreds of thousands of dunams over which Bedouins claimed ownership by force of possession and cultivation was transferred to State ownership. Seven towns were built in the Negev area, which today are the homes to roughly 50,000 persons, or half of the Negev Bedouin, who received compensation and very favourable terms for building or purchasing housing. The others live in unplanned, unlicensed homes and settlements, often without basic services such as water, electricity, roads, health care and educational facilities. In some cases, the Government provides these services without proper planning and legal arrangements. In other cases, the Ministry of Interior demolishes homes which have been built without permits. The Bedouins wish to be permitted to form rural settlements, where they can maintain their traditional way of life, and demand that the Government recognize existing structures and settlements, sanction the establishment of local authorities and town planning councils, and fund the development of infrastructure. The Government's position has been to find a workable solution within the framework of the law which will not force upon the Bedouins a housing solution inimical to their traditional way of life, but will also not involve a duty to create local government institutions and fund infrastructure in every place where members of the Bedouin community wish to live. According to a Ministry of Interior survey, it is estimated that there are over 100 illegal settlements, many consisting only of a small cluster of structures, spread over the Negev area alone, involving 108 tribes, over 9,000 housing units, and roughly 50,000 inhabitants, or slightly less than 1 per cent of the national population. Another 3,000 Bedouins live in illegal settlements in the Galilee region.

854. Over the past five years, the Government has taken important steps towards solving the land and housing problem in the Bedouin communities and towards bringing their quality of life to a level closer to that of the rest of the population, while preserving their way of life. Eight Bedouin settlements were recognized by the Government during 1994-1996, and consultations are currently taking place between the Government and Bedouin representative organizations regarding the recognition of a ninth settlement. Official recognition allows these settlements to receive government funding prior to the approval of town development plans. Consultations over other, smaller illegal settlements, mostly comprised of single families, are continuing, with the intention of integrating these settlements into larger, recognized settlements. Zoning and development plans for these newly-recognized settlements are being prepared, and the Government made a special allocation of NIS 5 million in 1996 for immediate infrastructure development in these settlements. In addition, plans developed by the Housing Ministry call for the construction of two or three new urban localities (each accommodating 600-800 families), two or three agricultural settlements (each containing up to 600 families), 10 agricultural farms (to be inhabited by 30 families each), and five to seven shepherding settlements for a total of roughly 100 families. In 1996, a parliamentary commission which reviewed the condition of the Bedouin communities recommended that sufficient resources be allocated for the development of these new localities, and that arbitrators be appointed to expedite processing of Bedouin land claims.

855. Government investment in the Bedouin sector has increased markedly over the last several years. Overall funding by the Housing Ministry increased from NIS 50 million in 1989-1992 to NIS 138 million in 1993-1995. Several years ago, the Minister of Housing issued guidelines requiring that investments in infrastructure in the Bedouin communities be allocated on a level comparable to those granted to Jewish localities. The Israel Lands Administration invested NIS 128 million in infrastructure between 1991 and 1995, as well as NIS 50 million in compensation for Bedouin land claims. As part of the settlement of such land claims, the ILA also subsidizes 80 per cent of the cost of plots sold to Bedouins. In addition, the ILA has approved an NIS 280 million sewage-system installation project, has developed industry and crafts areas in three Bedouin localities, and, together with the Agriculture Ministry, has funded the construction of several commercial greenhouses.

856. The Ministry of Interior has approved outline development plans during the past five years for each of the seven existing Bedouin towns, which will facilitate the construction of housing, industrial areas, public institutions and public works. In addition, the Interior Ministry has significantly increased its regular allocations to Bedouin local and regional authorities, as part of its campaign to eliminate the disparity in allocations between Arab and Jewish municipal authorities generally.

857. Aside from its efforts at resolving the problems of land ownership and municipal organization in the Bedouin communities, the Government has pursued a range of activities aimed at improving the level of social services and the quality of life, including the following:

(a) The Ministry of Energy and Infrastructure has helped fund the connection of Bedouin localities to the electricity grid and has set up lighting at traffic intersections and in towns.

(b) In 1993, the Health Ministry submitted a plan to improve health services in the Bedouin communities, including the establishment of family clinics, health-education programmes, dental clinics, and drug prevention programmes. In 1994, four new family health clinics were built in Bedouin towns, and another two were completed in 1995-1996.

(c) The Ministry of Industry and Trade has worked to establish industry and crafts areas in all of the existing Bedouin towns, has invested NIS 11 million in new enterprises, and has established a business promotion centre in Rahat, the largest Bedouin town to counsel and train entrepreneurs.

(d) The Ministry of Education has increased school hours in Bedouin communities, doubled the number of comprehensive high schools, and has approved a budget for building 37 standard classrooms in Bedouin communities.

Nevertheless, the Bedouin communities still need a great deal of assistance in opening pre-school facilities, reducing truancy, hiring and training qualified teachers, busing students from remote localities, developing special education facilities, and improving the educational performance of their students.

(e) A course for qualified Bedouin nurses has been opened, with the intention that such nurses will serve as role models in the Bedouin community in the field of primary preventive health care.

858. In 1996, an interministerial committee was established to oversee and implement all government programmes related to the Bedouin communities. Within the National Infrastructure Ministry, a Directorate for the Advancement of Bedouins has also been set up, and has begun developing new plans for continued resolution of housing, land and development problems.

859. Disabled persons. Over the past decade, several new statutes have been enacted to ensure equality of treatment for persons with physical or other disabilities. The Special Education Law, 5748-1988, establishes the right of all children with special needs to appropriate special education. The Assistance of the Deaf Law, 5752-1992, requires that one quarter of originally-produced, non-live television broadcasting on each television channel must have subtitles, and that the Israel Broadcast Authority must broadcast at least one news programme per week with simultaneous sign-language translation. The Prohibition of Discrimination Against Blind Persons Accompanied by Guide Dogs Law, 5752-1992, forbids discrimination against blind persons in entering public places or using public transportation on account of the fact that they use a guide dog. The Disabled Persons Parking Law, 5754-1994, entitles disabled persons to park in no-parking zones, with certain restrictions. Other municipal or building and planning laws which require provision of access to the disabled are not stringently enforced, including at places such as health funds, welfare offices, local council offices, museums and office buildings. In response to one recent petition, the Supreme Court obligated a local authority to install adequate means of access in all public buildings. (H.C.J. 7081/93, Botzer v. Maccabim-Reut Local Council 50(1) P.D. 19.)

860. Following the findings of a public commission appointed by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, a bill currently is being considered by the Knesset which would create comprehensive legal arrangements for protecting the rights and needs of disabled persons. The first part of the law will be enacted shortly following the submission of this report.

Equality in other contexts

861. The safeguarding of equality is discussed in specific contexts under many of the other articles in this report, particularly in articles 3 (Equal rights of men and women), 12 (Freedom of movement), 18 (Freedom of religion and conscience), 19 (Freedom of opinion and expression), 23 (Protection of the family), 24 (Protection of children), 25 (Access to the political system), and 27 (Rights of minorities to culture, religion and language).

Article 27 - Rights of minorities to culture, religion and language

862. Introduction: Defining minority groups Israel was founded as a homeland for the Jewish people in which all citizens, regardless of religion, race or ethnic background would enjoy equal social and political rights. Its Jewish population is composed largely of immigrants and the descendants of immigrants from countries spanning virtually the entire globe. Many Jews in Israel maintain cultural, linguistic and traditional ties with others from the same geographical origin through a plethora of voluntary organizations, newspapers and electronic media programming in the language of their country of origin, and other, informal contexts. Members of these subcommunities, moreover, participate in social and political action groups to advance their interests, and in two cases have created political parties with significant representation in the Knesset (the Shas Torah Guardians party, composed of orthodox Jews of Oriental (Sephardi) ethnic origin, and the Israel Ba-aliya Party, founded largely by immigrants from the former Soviet Union). Although the process of integration into Israeli society often inevitably involves a dissipation of traditional cultural practices in these subcommunities, their members are in no way limited in their capacity to engage in cultural or linguistic activity within their communities; in many instances they receive government support for such activities, as in radio and television programming in nine different languages on government-owned stations, direct funding to voluntary organizations for cultural activities, and various government-administered programmes in education and culture. At the same time, some of the immigrant communities have confronted considerable difficulties in areas not directly related to the rights enumerated under this article, particularly in the initial stages of their integration into the larger society. Over the first decades of Israel's history, many Jews who immigrated from Arab countries (known as Sephardim or Oriental Jews) suffered from a relative lack of economic opportunity, lower educational attainments, and a lower level of participation in the conduct of public affairs in comparison with Jews of European (Ashkenazi) extraction. These gaps, as well as the social tensions attending them, have by and large narrowed considerably over the last two decades. More recently, the mass immigration of Jews from the Soviet Union since 1989, and particularly of the bulk of Ethiopian Jewry in 1990, have given rise to special problems in meeting the needs of these immigrant communities in such areas as education, vocational training, housing, and personal status. To respond to many of these needs, and to ease what for many is an abrupt cultural transition, the Government has instituted an array of policies and programmes which, to a greater or lesser extent, treat these subcommunities as distinct groups.

863. Despite the fact that different Jewish subcommunities are often viewed, both by the public and by official authorities, as distinct groups within Israeli society, they are not deemed minorities for the purposes of reporting under this article. Rather, only the non-Jewish communities - Muslims, Christians, Druze, Circassians, and Baha'i - will be considered as minorities, properly so-called, in the discussion below.

864. The definition of minorities in Israel straddles certain ethnic and racial categories. Most Muslims and Christians in Israel are of Arab ethnicity. The Circassians are non-Arab Sunni Muslims originally from the area of the Caucasus. Within the Muslim community there are several sub-groups, such as the Bedouins and the Ahmadis, a small sect living primarily in the village of Kababir in the Carmel mountain range. The Christian community is comprised of 10 different recognized denominations, as discussed under article 18, and several other small subcommunities which function independently of any official sanction. The Baha'i residents of Israel come from a variety of ethnic backgrounds.

865. Minority populations. At the end of 1996, Israel's total population was 5,759,400, of whom 4,637,400 (80.5 per cent) were Jews, 842,500 (14.6 per cent) were Muslims, 183,200 (3.2 per cent) were Christians, 96,300 (1.7 per cent) were Druze, approximately 5,500 were Circassians, concentrated in the towns of Kafr Kama and Rehania, and between 600-700 Baha'i, who live in the Haifa area and in Acre, close to the two sites holy to the Baha'i in Israel. The following table shows the growth of the major population groups (Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Druze) from the establishment of the State until 1995.

866. Several larger cities, such as Jerusalem, Haifa, Tel Aviv-Jaffa, Acre, Lod and Ramla have mixed Jewish and non-Jewish populations. Apart from these, however, the members of non-Jewish minorities generally reside separately from the Jewish population in smaller cities, towns and villages. Most of the Druze population lives in 13 towns or villages which are either entirely or nearly all Druze, with the remainder spread out among other Arab or Circassian towns.

Participation in the conduct of public affairs

867. The Knesset and political parties. Members of minorities have been elected to every Knesset since Israel's founding. Until the 1980s, nearly all Arab Knesset members were affiliated with the Israel Communist Party (Maki) and its offshoot, the New Communist Party (Rakah). More recently, a number of Arab or mixed Arab-Jewish political parties, such as the Democratic List for Peace and Equality (which subsumed the New Communist Party together with the Sephardi "Black Panther" activists and other Jewish and Arab groups), the Arab Democratic Party and others, have run in national elections and have received up to five Knesset mandates. In addition, Arabs and Druze have held seats in the Knesset factions of several other parties. Of the nine minority members in the current Knesset, two are Christian, one Druze, and six Muslim. No Arab has yet served as a minister in any of Israel's Governments. In the Government headed by the late Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres between 1992 and 1996, two Arabs and one Druze served as deputy ministers. The Chairman of the Knesset Interior Committee is Druze. In the past, there have been several Arab Deputy Speakers of the Knesset.

868. The judiciary. As of October 1997, out of a total of 410 judges serving in the civil court system, there were seven Christian judges (one in the district court, five in the magistrates courts, and one in a regional labour court); eight Muslim judges (three in the district court, four in the magistrates courts and one traffic court judge); and four Druze judges, all in the magistrates courts. Thus far, the highest judicial rank achieved by a member of a minority has been the deputy president of a district court. Present and past members of the Judicial Selection Committee, including several justice ministers, Supreme Court judges and the courts director, have expressed great interest in appointing more members of minorities to the bench, including to the Supreme Court, which has never had an Arab justice, and they continue to take informal steps to encourage applications by qualified minority members of the bar. All judges in the Muslim, Christian and Druze religious courts are members of the religion in question, and they apply the substantive law of that religion to matters of personal status over which they have jurisdiction, as discussed under article 18.

Participation in the civil service

869. In the late 1980s a government committee (the Kobersky Committee) undertook a comprehensive review of the civil service and of other bodies supported by State funds. The Kobersky Report, submitted in 1989 and adopted by the Government in 1990, called for strenuous efforts to include more members of minorities in the civil service. To begin to redress the severe under-representation of minorities in government ministries, the Government adopted a three-year plan to create 160 new mid-level positions in the ministries and actively to seek out and hire properly-qualified Arabs (Muslims and Christians) and Druze to fill those positions. Under the terms of this affirmative action plan, three quarters of the positions were reserved for Arabs and one quarter for Druze. The project was ultimately completed successfully in June 1997. Actually, over that period the number of minority employees in government ministries grew by almost 1,000, from 1,369 to 2,357, out of a total of roughly 56,000 total employees. It has been observed that the Government affirmative action programme seemed to have had the effect of breaking settled assumptions both on the part of the ministries and among the Arab population itself. In addition, the Civil Service Commission decided during this period to publish all job tenders for government ministry positions in Arabic newspapers, not just those positions specifically relating to the Arab sector, which may also have had some role in the increase of minority job applicants over this period. The following table summarizes the distribution of these minority employees according to religious/ethnic affiliation and level of education.

Table 20. Arab and Druze ministry employees, according to religion, ethnicity and educational level
(as of June 1997) (not including school employees)

870. Of these 2,357 minority employees, 925 have managerial positions, 219 are doctors, and 768 are nurses, 33 are social workers, 27 are biochemists or microbiologists, 22 are certified x-ray technicians, and 19 are engineers. The ministries which employ the highest number of minorities are the Health Ministry (1,370), the Ministry of Religious Affairs (316, including Muslim religious judges (qadis)), the Finance Ministry (219), the Labour and Social Affairs Ministry (119) and the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport (101). These figures do not include over 15,000 teachers, principals and educational inspectors employed by the Ministry of Education in the Arab educational system.

871. Recently, the Civil Service Commission formed a new commission to weigh the continuation of the affirmative action project. Further progress remains to be made, not only in the overall representation of minorities in government ministries, but also in their appointment to senior positions. Until now, no Arab has served as a Director-General of a ministry, and one has served as a Deputy Director-General (in the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport). The current Ambassador to Finland is Arab, and the Consul-General in Bombay is Druze. During the previous government, there was one Consul-General in the United States. Although members of minorities have in recent years been appointed as directors of government corporations and have been hired to professional positions in such corporations, minorities are still vastly under-represented in this area as well.

872. Among the 20,056 regular employees of the Israel Police (including the Border Police) as of October 1997, 1,963 (9.8 per cent) are members of minorities. More than half of these minority employees are Druze, roughly one quarter are Muslim (including Bedouins), 15 per cent Christian, and the remainder Circassians, except for one Samaritan. The distribution of rank held by minority employees is summarized below.

Israel Police Rank	# Minority Officers
Senior Commander (second highest rank, after Commissioner)	1
Commander	4
Chief Superintendent	18
Superintendent	73
Chief Inspector	105
Inspector	55
Sub-Inspector	11
Senior NCO (Non-Commissioned Officer)	11
Senior Staff Sergeant Major	69
Adv. Staff Sergeant Major	357
Staff Sergeant Major	13
Sergeant Major	660
Deputy Sergeant Major	317
Sergeant	189
Corporal	46
Lance Corporal	26
Constable	8
Total:	1 963

In addition, as of October 1997, 140 members of minorities were serving in the Police or Border Police in fulfilment of military service obligations, including 26 Muslims and Bedouins, 17 Christians, 17 Druze, one Circassian and one Samaritan.

873. In the Prisons Service, minorities are relatively well-represented, including among the ranks of officers, in relation to their representation in the general population: 23.5 per cent of all personnel (834 out of 3,542) are members of minorities, including 13.6 per cent of those holding officer rank. As of late 1997, there were two minority prison officials holding the rank of Commander, one Chief Superintendent, 37 Superintendents (10.5 per cent of all personnel at that rank), 51 Chief Inspectors (16.3 per cent), 30 Inspectors (19.1 per cent), and 14 Sub-Inspectors (46.7 per cent). Among minority employees of the Prisons Service, the vast majority are Druze (791 out of 834); of the remainder, there are 25 Bedouins, 11 Christians, five Muslims and three Circassians.

Local government

874. In Israel, local and regional authorities are largely responsible for providing public services in many areas of civic life related to the rights specifically enumerated in this article - particularly education and culture - as well as other services which indirectly relate to the advancement of minorities, such as building and planning and economic development. The participation of minorities, then, at the local government level, is central to the enjoyment of rights under this article. In Israel, the membership in local governing councils and the administrative personnel in local authorities generally reflect the demographic make-up of the local population. Due to the demographic separation between different population groups outside of several larger cities as described above, there are 82 local authorities in which the members of the executive organs and the employees are exclusively or almost exclusively members of minorities, out of a total of 241. Of these local authorities, 61 of the non-Jewish and 72 of the Jewish localities have formal local councils; 15 of the local authorities are in Druze localities, two are in Circassian towns, and the remainder are defined as Arab councils, without distinguishing between those in which the population is primarily Muslim or Christian, respectively. As of 1995, there were roughly 650 Arab members of local councils and roughly 7,500 Arab employees in local authorities or municipalities.

875. In the larger cities with mixed population, the level of representation of minorities on municipal councils and among local government employees tends to be somewhat lower than their representation in the local population. In Jerusalem, in which roughly 30 per cent of the population is Arabic, those Arabs who became residents of Israel following the June 1967 war choose, by and large, not to vote or to put forth candidates in municipal elections; they are, however, fairly well-represented among the ranks of municipal employees. It has been the policy of recent governments, as part of a general effort to achieve equal civic and social rights of minorities generally, to encourage the hiring of more members of minorities at the local government level. The activities taken at the local government level to help ensure the realization of rights under this article are discussed below.

Language

876. Arabic, like Hebrew, is an official language in Israel. It is the primary, virtually exclusive language of social intercourse within the Arab and Druze communities, and, of course, there are no official restrictions on its use in all facets of communal life. Arabic is the language used in the State-run educational system in Arab localities and in Arab communities within the larger, mixed cities, as well as in independent religious schools. Virtually all of the teachers, and all but one of the principals in Arab schools are members of the community. The curriculum, which is administered by each local authority with oversight by the Department for Arab Education at the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport, places an emphasis on Arabic language, culture and history, and includes required hours of instruction in religious (Christian, Muslim or Druze) topics.

877. There are over 40 privately-published newspapers and magazines in Arabic, including two dailies (al-Ittihad, affiliated with the Communist Party, and al Kuds, published in Jerusalem), one bi-weekly (al-Sinara, the largest-circulation Arabic newspaper in Israel, published in Nazareth), several weeklies (including Kol il-Arab, Panorama, Saut-al-Hak wal-Huriyah (published by the Islamic Movement), and Fasl-al-Mekal), several Arabic-language periodicals on culture and current affairs (some of which receive partial government funding), and six Arabic-language book publishers.

One licensed local-radio station, as well as a substantial number of currently unlicensed stations are owned and operated by Arab concerns, providing a full range of radio broadcasting to the Arabic-speaking minorities in addition to Arabic programming broadcasted on government-owned radio. The government-owned first television channel currently broadcasts roughly 19 hours of Arabic-language programming each week. Radio and television broadcasts from many Arabic countries, such as Jordan, Lebanon, Egypt and Morocco, are freely available through ordinary radio and television reception and cable television operators.

878. In the larger sphere of Israeli civic life, the right of Arabic-speaking minorities to use their language is generally recognized and observed. Official forms used by government ministries are generally produced in both Hebrew and Arabic (as well as English, Russian and Amharic in certain instances). The government-owned television and radio stations include daily Arabic-language broadcasts. The franchisees of the second television channel are required by law to provide a minimum level of Arabic-language programming as well. In January 1994, the Civil Service Commission decided, as mentioned above, to publish all civil service job tenders in Arabic-language newspapers, which had not previously been the case. Similarly, in December 1995, the Minister of Finance promulgated regulations requiring all notices of tenders administered by that Ministry to be published in a daily or weekly Arabic newspaper of wide circulation.

879. One area in which the use of Arabic in the public realm has not been fully realized is in road signs, which sometimes appear only in Hebrew and English. Two recent Supreme Court decisions have buttressed the status of the Arabic language in this regard. In December 1993, the Court issued a consent decree requiring the city of Haifa to include Arabic inscriptions in all municipal signs within two years. In 1995, the Court invalidated a municipal law requiring all notices posted in the city of Nazareth Illit to be entirely or mostly in the Hebrew language. In this latter decision, the Court gave constitutional status to the right to use the Arabic language, as part of the broader right to freedom of expression:

"The freedom of expression includes the freedom to express oneself in the language of one's choosing. Freedom of expression cannot be guaranteed without ensuring freedom of language. Language is central to expression."

(C.A. 105/92, Re'em Engineers and Contractors Ltd. v. Nazareth Illit Municipality, 47(5) P.D. 189) In spite of these judicial developments, a fair portion of traffic signs, particularly on inter-urban roads and highways, do not yet include Arabic inscriptions. Recently, the Government, at the instigation of NGOs, has committed to post Arabic inscriptions on road signs throughout the country over a period of three years.

880. Religion. As discussed in detail under article 18, the religious minorities in Israel enjoy full freedom of religious worship, including the statutory right to observe holidays and weekly rest days according to the dictates of their faith. The integrity of holy places of all major religions is protected by statute. Funding for non-Jewish religious services and institutions has increased substantially over the last several years.

Governmental measures to foster cultural life of minorities

881. Arab (Muslim and Christian) communities Until 1988, the Government did not pursue activities in any structured manner to promote cultural and artistic life in the Arab sector. In that year, a Department for Arabic Culture was formed within the Ministry of Education and Culture, with offices in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Nazareth; since 1992 the Department has been headed by an Arab professional, Mr. Muafak Hourri. The formulation of programmes and policies by the Department is guided by a public committee appointed by the Minister (now the Minister of Education, Culture and Sport), which consists primarily of prominent cultural figures in the Arab community. The Department has initiated or helped administer a broad range of cultural programmes for the Arab communities, including the following:

(a) Community centres. In conjunction with other Government ministries and local authorities, the Department has helped establish 28 new community centers in Arab localities, which serve as a local home for cultural life and extrascholastic programmes.

(b) Theatre. The Department has aided in the establishment or funding of six different Arab theatre companies - the Haifa Arabic Theatre, the Beit Hagefen Arabic Theatre, the al-Gorbal Theatre in Shfar'am, the as-Sakfa Children's Theatre in Kafr Kama, the Azhbana Theatre, and a theatre in Kfar Tamra - as well as helping sponsor theatre programmes in the schools.

(c) Music. The Department assists in the funding of six Arabic orchestras playing traditional music, in Haifa, Nazareth, Tarshiha, al-Gorbal, Kfar Yasif, and 'Ablin, as well as in 16 different after-school music programmes, each of which are attended by 70-150 students.

(d) Plastic arts. Four art galleries displaying the works of Arab and Jewish artists, in Nazareth, Umm el-Fahm, Kfar Yasif, and Daliat al-Carmel, receive support from the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport.

(e) Dance. In conjunction with local authorities and local workers' committees, the Ministry provides partial funding for 64 different traditional Arab dance (debka) troupes, as well as for annual trips abroad for 30 to 35 such troupes to participate in international festivals.

(f) Libraries and literature. Fifty-one public and school libraries in Arab localities are partially funded by the Education Ministry, enabling the purchase of tens of thousands of books annually. For the last eight years, the Ministry also gives awards to promising writers which allow them to devote their full energies to writing for one year. Five such prizes are awarded annually. In addition, until 1996 the Ministry assisted in funding the publishing costs for books in the Arabic language, either directly or by buying a predetermined number of copies of the book upon publication.

(g) Festivals. The Ministry provides substantial funding for an annual Arabic Culture and Literature Week in 35 to 40 different localities; Arabic folk music festivals in conjunction with the Kaukab and Shfar'am local authorities; a folkdance festival in Majdal Kurum; the annual Nazareth Festival for Theatre Arts; and the participation of Arabic theatre productions at the annual Acre Theater Festival.

882. Druze and Circassian communities. In 1993, a Department for Culture in the Druze and Circassian sectors was established at the Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport upon the recommendation of a public committee which examined education and culture in the Druze community. The new Department was also given responsibility for mixed communities in which Druze reside. The policy of the Department, as formulated by a public council composed of cultural professionals from the Druze and Circassian communities, has been to deepen and rekindle the engagement with the Druze and Circassian cultural heritage, on the one hand, and on the other hand to integrate Druze culture within the larger Israeli culture through association with nationwide cultural programmes. Since 1994, the Department has used its budget to help fund a wide range of cultural and artistic programmes, including the following:

(a) Local music, theatre and folklore festivals, as well as participation in international cultural festivals (15 local authority recipients total).

(b) The establishment or preservation of four cultural museums.

(c) Three musical centres and a Druze choir company, eight different theatre troupes, mounting of exhibitions by plastic artists, cash prizes to artists and art students, art camps for youth funding of folklore and plastic arts workshops, and the production of movies and television programmes related to Druze culture.

(d) Publication costs and other support for nearly 60 different writers or book projects, and funding for public libraries in conjunction with 13 different local authorities.

(e) The Druze community archive at the University of Haifa, the Institute for the Study of the Circassian Community, and other cultural programmes or centres.

Development of infrastructure and economic opportunity

883. Over the past several years, the Government, recognizing the need to close a substantial gap in funding given to the Jewish and non-Jewish sectors, respectively, has dramatically increased its budget and activities aimed at developing infrastructure and economic opportunities in Arab, Druze and Circassian localities. The implementation of policy and budget allocations to these communities is supervised by two recently-formed interministerial committees, one for the Druze and Circassian communities and the other for the rest of the Arab communities, both of which are coordinated through the Prime Minister's Office.

884. Between 1992 and 1997, governmental funding for development to the Arab sector increased from roughly NIS 230.7 million to NIS 604 million (approved 1997 budget). In addition, the direct allocations to Arab local authorities to cover operating expenses, hiring additional personnel and the cost of municipal works increased from NIS 230.7 million in 1992 to NIS 604 million in 1997, bringing it to parity with the average of such allocations to Jewish local authorities. It may be noted that despite severe budget cuts in the budgets of all ministries in fiscal 1997, no cutbacks whatsoever were made in any allocations to the Arab sector; in certain cases, such as in allocations to local authorities for operating expenses and development, the budgets earmarked for use in the Arab sector increased substantially while parallel funding in the Jewish sector was decreased.

885. Among the broad spectrum of government measures related to development in the Arab sector during this period, the following may be noted:

(a) The Government has included many Arab localities in the geographical areas designated as "Development Area A", which receive highest priority in government development programmes. The inclusion in Development Area "A" confers the highest level of funding, incentives and entitlements to commercial ventures and private citizens alike. Among other things, entrepreneurs in approved ventures receive the highest level of government stipends and various tax incentives; land allocated by the Government for industrial or residential projects is sold to entrepreneurs at far less than its real value (69 per cent discount on land for residential projects, 89 per cent discount for industrial projects); commercial enterprises located in the high-priority development area receive preferential treatment in government tenders; substantial government support is given for building infrastructure in commercial and residential development projects; individuals are exempted from various payments, such as for government-sponsored nursery schools; and other entitlements.

(b) The Ministry of Interior has enlarged the land area of several Arab localities for use in development by adjusting borders to include land previously under the jurisdiction of other local authorities or land lacking municipal status. Plans for the expansion of roughly 20 other localities are currently being reviewed.

(c) Since January 1996, eight new Arab local authorities have been established, and two other previously-unrecognized villages have been accorded official recognition of their status within larger regional authorities. The acquisition of independent municipal status is a crucial spur for economic development, as it enables direct assessment of municipal taxes and the full range of government funding for municipal services and development projects.

(d) The Ministry of Interior also carries out several programmes aimed at improving the ability of Arab and Druze local authorities to exploit opportunities for economic development. The Ministry actively supports and encourages the formation of economic corporations and associations partially owned or managed by local authorities, which make it much easier to receive government and private funding for development projects, and which serve as a vehicle for planning and implementing such projects. Since 1989, 17 economic corporations have been created in Arab localities, and five more are in the process of formation. In addition, the Ministry has overseen the formation of 13 different municipal associations which provide an efficient vehicle for funding and carrying out a range of culture and social programmes. Finally, the Ministry provides organizational counselling to local authorities, courses in organizational management to local officials, and training of Arab and Druze organizational counsellors, to help improve the efficiency of the municipal administration in matters that affect the capacity of local authorities to plan, fund and execute economic development projects.

(e) Allocations for developing residential infrastructure in Arab localities increased fourfold between 1992 and 1996.

(f) The Government has directly funded extensive building of access roads, water works and sewage projects, and connection of towns and villages to the national electricity grid.

(g) Since 1991, municipal "outline" development plans have been approved for 29 of the 81 Arab local authorities, and outline plans for five others are in advanced stages of the preparation and approval process. Recently the Government has initiated an ambitious programme to expedite preparation and passage of municipal outline development plans for an additional 41 existing Arab localities, and for eight other areas inhabited by Bedouins in the Galilee to which the Government decided to accord full-fledged municipal status. These outline plans allow for fullscale development of industrial areas, residential neighbourhoods, public structures and municipal works. Over the years, the lack of approved outline plans in many Arab localities has been a major obstacle to economic development. Typically, the process of approving such long-term municipal outline plans takes many years. The Government has recently decided to commit substantial funding and staff to shorten the planning process drastically. Implementation of the planning process is being coordinated by an interministerial task force, and Arab professionals are to make up a significant proportion of the planning staff.

(h) Various government ministries have been involved in setting up industrial zones in 30 Arab localities, including in the allocation of State-owned land, planning, building of infrastructure, and marketing the projects through State-sponsored tenders.

(i) The Small Businesses Authority has set up five regional offices to assist and advise entrepreneurs in the Arab sector in the various stages of setting up private ventures. Informative materials on government assistance programmes have been distributed in Arab localities and published in the Arabic-language press.

(j) Direct government grants have been given to several agricultural enterprises in the Arab sector, including the expansion of greenhouses, export crops, farm roads, water systems and water for irrigation.

(k) The Ministry of Environment has created eight regional environmental protection units in the Arab sector, serving over 50 Arabic municipalities and local authorities, as well as several regional authorities with large Arab populations. These units handle such matters as solid and hazardous waste disposal, environmental education programmes in the Arab schools, creation of landfills, waste recycling, and agroecology. The personnel at these field units come from the local population. Since 1993, the Ministry's budget for waste recovery in the Arab sector has been increased fourfold, and currently comprises 28 per cent of the total national waste recovery budget. Over the same period, as part of a nationwide effort to control and supervise waste disposal, roughly 100 illegal dumps near Arab localities have been closed, and two central landfills and a sorting plant have been created in the northern Galilee region, serving Arab and Jewish localities alike.

(l) The Ministry of Tourism has been involved in the development of tourism projects in the Arab sector, such as in Nazareth, Acre and Jisr es-Zarqa, as well as in consulting and training courses for Arab tourism professionals.

(m) Several hundred classrooms were built each year under the auspices of the Ministry of Education, which used over 30 per cent of its development budget for projects in the Arab sector (which, in turn, comprises 19 per cent of the national population).

(n) A special educational programme for gifted Arab children was initiated in 1993; in 1996, 1,655 schoolchildren participated in the programme.

(o) Many Arab municipalities have been included in the first stage of a national longer-school day programme.

886. Other measures. In 1994, the Ministry of Health earmarked a budget of NIS 33.6 million for the establishment of family health centres in underserved Arab villages and townships over a four-year period. Under this programme, the Ministry provided partial funding for the building of 20 new family health centres in 1994, and for 30 such centres in 1995.

887. The Government has concluded a special agreement to eliminate disparities in funding and development for the Druze and Circassian communities over a five-year period, involving a total allocation of NIS 1,070 million, which will be dedicated among other things to the building of cultural centres, libraries, mother-child care clinics, religious court buildings, roads, water and sewage systems, and the development of industry and tourism.

The Bedouin community and culture

888. Although the Bedouin community in Israel shares a common religious and ethnic heritage with the other Muslim Arabs in Israel, in certain significant senses they are culturally distinct. While about half of the roughly 100,000 Bedouins who live in the southern Negev Desert region, and a majority of those in the northern Galilee region, reside in several towns set up by the State over the years, the remainder are scattered among small, unrecognized settlements and maintain, to a greater or lesser degree, a traditional, semi-nomadic way of life. While the Bedouins maintain traditional cultural practices, their encounter with modern Israeli society has placed certain characteristic strains on the social and family culture. Other problems facing the Bedouins are discussed under article 26; issues related directly to the rights enumerated under this article are discussed below.

889. Bedouin social culture is patriarchal and highly traditional. Bedouin women generally assume all domestic responsibilities, from upkeep of the family tent to education of children and care of the elderly or infirm. As a result of the State-sponsored transition of a large segment of the Bedouin population from a semi-nomadic way of life to permanent residence in towns, the context for the traditional roles of women has been altered, and, in some areas such as education, largely removed. The abandonment of their traditional way of life has left a vacuum in the lives of Bedouin women who are often unequipped or unable to enter the labour market or to pursue a formal education. On the whole, moreover, Bedouin women are not allowed to leave their village for educational or employment purposes. Although Bedouin girls constitute at least 50 per cent of the student body of recognized Bedouin schools, very seldom do girls go on to higher education, as many parents expect their daughters to return to their traditional roles in the household, and, if they are allowed to work, to hand over their wages to their parents. At the same time, Bedouin men are more apt to leave their villages to work or study, thus becoming exposed to a modern, western form of social life, and often returning home with more "modern" expectations regarding the proper role of women in the home and beyond.

890. One result of the changes in social practices arising from urbanization and the encounter with a modern society has been a deterioration in the status and prestige of Bedouin women in the community, who have been deprived to a certain extent of their traditional role, while at the same time being less able to meet the more modern conceptions of their male counterparts. Many Bedouin women remain unmarried at relatively advanced ages (late 20's to early 30's), and are perceived as economic burdens on their families. As a result, quite a few of these older unmarried Bedouin women are married off as second or third wives, often in forced marriages, leading to a rise in polygamy. Recent research of marriage ages in Rahat, the largest Bedouin town, showed that the average age of legal wives in monogamous marriages was 18.3 years old, the average age of first wives in polygamous marriages was 20.5 years old, while the average age of subsequent wives in a polygamous marriage was 24.24 years old. Although polygamy is a criminal offence, it is generally not enforced among the Bedouin population.

891. At the same time, many Bedouin women who do manage to get an education find the strictures of their traditional role difficult to accept, leading a significant number of young Bedouin women to run away from their homes to shelters or half-way houses. Recently, higher education has begun to gain acceptance among some Bedouin parents who realize that in order for their daughters to lead comfortable lifestyles and find suitable husbands (given the rise in demand for educated wives among young Bedouin men), they must have an advanced education. Nevertheless, most parents still associate universities with decadence, and fear that sending their daughters to study will result in the desecration of their family's honour.

892. Female Circumcision. Ritual female genital surgery, or female circumcision, has been found to be a normative practice among several Bedouin tribes in southern Israel. Generally, the circumcision occurs between the ages of 12 and 17, as the girls have passed menarche but have not yet reached a marriageable age. A physical examination of women from the tribes in question showed that the surgery performed on them did not involve clitoridectomy. However, all of the women recorded bleeding and pain at the time of the ritual surgery, several required medical attention, and all reported pain during intercourse in the months after marriage. Those Bedouin women among whom the custom is prevalent refer to it as "purification". On the whole, it would appear that most women in these tribes will continue to practice ritual genital surgery on their daughters. The State has not intervened to control or prevent the practice of female ritual genital surgery among the Bedouin tribes. In several specific cases, government social workers have advised Bedouin women of the possibility of refraining from the practice.

Related rights

893. The equal enjoyment by minorities in Israel of certain other rights under the Convention, such as the freedom of movement, the freedom of expression, the right to vote and be elected, which bear an important relation to the rights specifically enumerated in this article, is discussed under articles 12, 19, 25 and 26.

HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITTEE
Sixty-third session

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES
UNDER ARTICLE 40 OF THE COVENANT

Concluding observations of the Human Rights Committee

Israel

1. The Committee considered the initial report of Israel (CCPR/C/81/Add.13) at its 1675th, 1676th and 1677th meetings (see CCPR/C/SR.1675-1677), held on 15 and 16 July 1998, and adopted the following concluding observations at its 1694th meeting (CCPR/C/SR.1694), held on 28 July 1998.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the initial report submitted by the Government of Israel, and notes with satisfaction that it was largely prepared in accordance with the Committee's guidelines concerning the form and contents of initial reports. The Committee, however, regrets the considerable delay in the submission of the report, which was received five years after the date on which it was due.

3. The Committee notes that the report, while providing extensive information on prevailing legislation in the field of human rights in Israel, lacks sufficient information on the implementation of the Covenant in practice and on the factors and difficulties impeding its effective implementation. This was partly rectified by the oral information provided by the delegation during the examination of the report, which enabled the Committee to embark on a frank and constructive dialogue with the State party. The Committee expresses satisfaction that the Government had widely disseminated the report among non-governmental organizations prior to its consideration by the Committee.

B. Factors and difficulties affecting the implementation of the Covenant

4. The Committee notes the security concerns in the State party, the frequent attacks on the civilian population, the problems linked to its occupation of territories and the fact that the State party is officially at war with a number of neighbouring States. However, the Committee draws attention to article 4 of the Covenant, which permits no derogation from certain basic rights even in times of public emergency.

C. Positive factors

5. The Committee notes with satisfaction that Israeli society is a democratic one in which sensitive issues are openly debated and that an active non-governmental community has taken firm root. It expresses appreciation for the wide dissemination of the initial report of Israel among professionals in the justice system who work directly in matters relating to the promotion and protection of human rights and among non-governmental organizations. It welcomes indications that the inter-ministerial network of persons that have worked together on the drafting of the present report may soon be institutionalized.

6. The Committee welcomes the fact that the report includes many references to decisions of the Supreme Court upholding rights protected under the Covenant.

7. The Committee welcomes the recent establishment of the Public Defender's Office. It also welcomes efforts to implement the recommendations of the Krennitzer Committee, which address questions of police violence, and of the Goldberg Committee regarding rules of evidence. It welcomes the progressive steps which have led to the amendment of the Criminal Code and to the establishment of the Department for Investigation of Police Misconduct within the Ministry of Justice to review complaints of maltreatment by members of the police and security forces. The Committee takes note that the State Comptroller's Office is responsible for acting as Ombudsman, and would welcome further information on its activities, particularly as regards measures to combat discrimination.

8. The Committee notes with satisfaction the establishment of bodies in various ministries to address questions relating to the status of women, and particularly welcomes the activities of the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women. It also notes with satisfaction: the establishment of a national authority on the advancement of women with a wide range of responsibilities; the amendment of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law placing the burden of proof upon the employer in civil sexual harassment suits; and the enactment of the Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law.

D. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

9. The Committee notes with regret that, although some rights provided for in the Covenant are legally protected and promoted through the Basic Laws, municipal laws, and the jurisprudence of the courts, the Covenant has not been incorporated in Israeli law and cannot be directly invoked in the courts. It recommends early action in respect of recent legislative initiatives aimed at enhancing the enjoyment of a number of the rights provided for in the Covenant, including proposals for new draft Basic Laws on due process rights and on freedom of expression and association. It also recommends that consideration be given to enacting further laws to give effect to any rights not already covered by Basic Laws.

10. The Committee is deeply concerned that Israel continues to deny its responsibility to fully apply the Covenant in the occupied territories. In this regard, the Committee points to the long-standing presence of Israel in these territories, Israel's ambiguous attitude towards their future status, as well as the exercise of effective jurisdiction by Israeli security forces therein. In response to the arguments presented by the delegation, the Committee emphasizes that the applicability of rules of humanitarian law does not by itself impede the application of the Covenant or the accountability of the State under article 2, paragraph 1, for the actions of its authorities. The Committee is therefore of the view that, under the circumstances, the Covenant must be held applicable to the occupied territories and those areas of southern Lebanon and West Bekaa where Israel exercises effective control. The Committee requests the State party to include in its second periodic report all information relevant to the application of the Covenant in territories which it occupies.

11. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the continued state of emergency prevailing in Israel, which has been in effect since independence. It recommends that the Government review the necessity for the continued renewal of the state of emergency with a view to limiting as far as possible its scope and territorial applicability and the associated derogation of rights. In this regard, the Committee draws attention to article 4 of the Covenant, which permits no derogation from articles 6, 7, 8 (paras. 1 and 2), 11, 15, 16 and 18, and requires that permitted derogations be limited to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation.

12. The Committee expresses serious concern over deeply imbedded discriminatory social attitudes, practices and laws against Arab Israelis that have resulted in a lower standard of living compared with Jewish Israelis, as is evident in their significantly lower levels of education, access to health care, access to housing, land and employment. It notes with concern that most Arab Israelis, because they do not join the army, do not enjoy the financial benefits available to Israelis who have served in the army, including scholarships and housing loans. The Committee also expresses concern that the Arabic language, though official, has not been accorded equal status in practice, and that discrimination against members of the Arab minority appears to be extensive in the private sector. In this regard, the Committee urges the State party to take steps without delay to ensure equality to Arabs and to proceed as soon as possible with the planned formulation of a draft law on discrimination in the private sector and to adopt it at an early date.

13. The Committee is concerned that Palestinians in the occupied territories who remain under the control of Israeli security forces do not enjoy the same rights and freedoms as Jewish settlers in those territories, in particular in regard to planning and building permits and access to land and water. The Committee is also concerned at the policies of confiscation of lands and settlement in the occupied territories. The Committee recommends that coordinated and targeted efforts be made to establish basic standards that are applicable equally to all persons under the jurisdiction of Israel.

14. The Committee is also concerned at the discrimination faced by Bedouins, many of whom have expressed a desire to continue to live in settlements in the Negev which are not recognized by the Israeli Government and which are not provided with basic infrastructure and essential services. The Committee recommends that members of Bedouin communities should be given equality of treatment with Jewish settlements in the same region, many of which are also dispersed and populated by small numbers of people.

15. The Committee expresses concern over the situation of women who, despite the advances noted in paragraph 8, continue to face discrimination in many aspects of life, including in military service and in religious institutions, and that they are underrepresented in the conduct of public affairs. The Committee notes that no clear plan of action exists which addresses the situation of the most disadvantaged group of women, namely those belonging to the Arab minority. The Committee recommends that targeted measures be considered to accelerate progress towards equality, in particular for Arab women.

16. The Committee regrets that women brought to Israel for purposes of prostitution, many under false pretences or through coercion, are not protected as victims of trafficking but are likely to be penalized for their illegal presence in Israel by deportation. Such an approach to this problem effectively prevents these women from pursuing a remedy for the violation of their rights under article 8 of the Covenant. The Committee recommends that serious efforts be made to seek out and punish the traffickers, to institute rehabilitation programmes for the victims and to ensure that they are able to pursue legal remedies against the perpetrators.

17. With respect to article 6 of the Covenant, the Committee is concerned about the number of Palestinians who have been killed by the security forces, as well as all persons who have been the victims of terrorist attacks. The Committee expresses concern over the use of rubber-coated metal bullets by the security forces in the occupied territories in dispersing demonstrations. This type of rubber bullet is reported to have killed many Palestinians, including children. The Committee urges the State party to enforce rigorously the strict limitations on the operational rules as to the use of firearms and the use of rubber bullets against unarmed civilians. It requests that the next periodic report include precise information on the number of deaths, including those caused by rubber bullets, the number of complaints arising from their use and the number of defence and security personnel that have been punished or disciplined as a result.

18. The Committee regrets the introduction by the Government of a draft law which would deny victims compensation for excesses committed by members of the security forces against Palestinian residents of the occupied territories. It requests that detailed information on these matters be included in the next periodic report of the State party.

19. The Committee is deeply concerned that under the guidelines for the conduct of interrogation of suspected terrorists authority may be given to the security service to use "moderate physical pressure" to obtain information considered crucial to the "protection of life". The Committee notes that the part of the report of the Landau Commission that lists and describes authorized methods of applying pressure remains classified. The Committee notes also the admission by the State party delegation that the methods of handcuffing, hooding, shaking and sleep deprivation have been and continue to be used as interrogation techniques, either alone or in combination. The Committee is of the view that the guidelines can give rise to abuse and that the use of these methods constitutes a violation of article 7 of the Covenant in any circumstances. The Committee stresses that article 7 of the Covenant is a non-derogable prohibition of torture and all forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The Committee urges the State party to cease using the methods referred to above. If legislation is to be enacted for the purpose of authorizing interrogation techniques, such a law should explicitly prohibit all forms of treatment prohibited by article 7.

20. Further in relation to article 7 of the Covenant, the Committee notes that prisoners may be segregated in Israel as a preventive measure for the protection of security, the maintenance of order or to guarantee the safety of the prisoner. Noting that segregation involves substantial isolation and may be extended over long periods of time, the Committee recalls its General Comment 20 (44) in which it noted that prolonged solitary confinement of a detained or imprisoned person may violate article 7. The Committee recommends that efforts be made to avoid prolonged isolation of segregated prisoners.

21. The Committee remains concerned that despite the reduction in the number of persons held in administrative detention on security grounds, persons may still be held for long and apparently indefinite periods of time in custody without trial. It is also concerned that Palestinians detained by Israeli military order in the occupied territories do not have the same rights to judicial review as persons detained in Israel under ordinary law. A specific concern of the Committee is that at least some of the persons kept in administrative detention for reasons of State security (and in particular some Lebanese) do not personally threaten State security but are kept as "bargaining chips" in order to promote negotiations with other parties on releasing detained Israeli soldiers or the bodies of deceased soldiers. The Committee considers the present application of administrative detention to be incompatible with articles 7 and 16 of the Covenant, neither of which allows for derogation in times of public emergency. The Committee takes due note that Israel has derogated from article 9 of the Covenant. The Committee stresses, however, that a State party may not depart from the requirement of effective judicial review of detention. The Committee recommends that the application of detention be brought within the strict requirements of the Covenant and that effective judicial review be made mandatory.

22. While acknowledging the security concerns that have led to restrictions on movement, the Committee notes with regret the continued impediments imposed on movement, which affect mostly Palestinians travelling in and between East Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, and which have grave consequences affecting nearly all areas of Palestinian life. The Committee considers this to raise serious issues under article 12. In regard to persons in these areas, the Committee urges Israel to respect the right to freedom of movement provided for under article 12, including the right to return to one's country.

23. In regard to Palestinians who are resident in East Jerusalem, the Committee is concerned that the increasingly restrictive conditions for maintaining the right to permanent residence, the denial of requests for family reunification and the difficulty experienced by non-Jews in obtaining building permits and accommodation have resulted in increasing numbers being forced to move to the occupied territories. The Committee expresses its profound concern at the effect of the unpublished directive of the Ministry of the Interior, under which Palestinians may lose their right to live in the city if they cannot prove that East Jerusalem has been their "centre of life" for the past seven years. The Committee notes that this policy is being applied retroactively to both Palestinians who live abroad and to those who live in the West Bank or in nearby Jerusalem suburbs, but not to Israeli Jews or to foreign Jews who are permanent residents of East Jerusalem. The Committee recommends that the rules and procedures relating to permanent residency status be applied without discrimination.

24. The Committee deplores the demolition of Arab homes as a means of punishment. It also deplores the practice of demolitions, in part or in whole, of "illegally" constructed Arab homes. The Committee notes with regret the difficulties imposed on Palestinian families seeking to obtain legitimate construction permits. The Committee considers the demolition of homes to conflict directly with the obligation of the State party to ensure without discrimination the right not to be subjected to arbitrary interference with one's home (art. 17), the freedom to choose one's residence (art. 12) and equality of all persons before the law and equal protection of the law (art. 26).

25. The Committee is also concerned that the Israel Lands Administration (ILA), responsible for the management of 93 per cent of land in Israel, includes no Arab members and that while the ILA has leased or transferred land for the development of Jewish towns and settlements, few Arab localities have been established in this way until recent years. The Committee recommends that urgent steps be taken to overcome the considerable inequality and discrimination which remain in regard to land and housing.

26. The Committee regrets that the authorities appear to be placing obstacles in the way of family reunion in the case of marriages between an Israeli citizen and a non-citizen who is not Jewish (and therefore not entitled to enter under the Law of Return). These obstacles, which include long waiting periods for entry permits, a "probation" period of over five years' residence to establish that the marriage is genuine and a further waiting period for citizenship, are applied even more rigorously in the case of Arab citizens, particularly those who marry persons resident in the occupied territories. The Committee considers such obstacles to be incompatible with articles 17 and 23. It is recommended that the Government reconsider its policies with a view to facilitating family reunion of all citizens and permanent residents.

27. The Committee is concerned that Arab women citizens of Israel have in some cases been required to relinquish their citizenship should they marry a Palestinian and apply for residence in the occupied territories. It welcomes the Israeli Government's response that this policy no longer applies and recommends that those already affected be made fully aware of the relevant legal provisions and that their status be restored.

28. The Committee is concerned at the preference given to the Jewish religion in the allocation of funding for religious bodies, to the detriment of Muslims, Christians, Druze and other religious groups. The Committee recommends that regulations and criteria for funding be published and applied to all religious groups on an equal basis.

29. The Committee is concerned that the application of religious law to determine matters of personal status, including marriage and divorce, and the absence of provision for civil marriage effectively deny some persons the right to marry in Israel, and result in inequality between men and women. It is also concerned that the minimum age of marriage for girls, fixed by law at 17, may be reduced by the religious courts, and that no minimum age is fixed for men. The lack of provision for civil burial is also a matter of concern. The Committee urges early implementation of measures currently under consideration to facilitate civil marriages and civil burial for those who do not belong to a religion. It recommends that the State party take into account international standards for the age of majority in its current review of the minimum marriageable age for men and women.

30. The Committee recommends that the Government consider ratifying the Optional Protocol to the Covenant.

31. The Committee requests that the Government of Israel submit its second periodic report, which is due by June 2000. It also requests that the next report include information on the implementation of the Covenant in all lands over which Israel exercises effective control during the period covered by the report.

32. The Committee recommends the publication and distribution of the concluding observations of the Committee to public bodies, media agencies, and non-governmental organizations working in the area of human rights.

Introduction

1. This is the Second Periodic Report of the Government of Israel, submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Committee (HRC) in accordance with the requirements of article 40 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (the "Covenant" or the "ICCPR"). This report has been compiled by the Department for International Agreements and International Litigation at the Ministry of Justice, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and other Israeli government departments. Israeli Non-Governmental Organizations ("NGOs") were invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of the present report, and their contributions were given substantial consideration.

2. Since the submission of the Combined Initial and First Periodic Report (UN document - CCPR/C/81/Add. 13) by Israel in 1998 (the "Initial Periodic Report"), many legislative, administrative and judicial developments relevant to the Covenant occurred. This report provides a comprehensive account of these developments.¹ It also addresses the comments made in the concluding observations by the HRC (CCPR/C/79/Add.93) dated August 18, 1998.

3. We should note that Israel underwent substantial policy and legislative changes since the Initial Periodic Report was submitted. Some policy and legislative changes, although decided upon, will no doubt take time until they are fully implemented. In many areas, however, substantial changes are already visible. A short summary of the main changes is included below.

4. In terms of legislation, between 1998 and today significant steps have been taken to promote human rights issues. Some of the more prominent new laws include the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, 5758-1998, and the amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law, 5711-1951 adopted by the Knesset (Israel's parliament) in the year 2000 (both laws are described in detail under Article 3 of this report), the Freedom of Information Law, 5758-1998 (described in detail under article 19) and the Equal Rights for People With Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 (described in detail under article 26). Another significant legislative act, now in its drafting stages, is the Israeli Security Agency Bill, described in detail under article 2.

We should note that Israel has not enacted any further basic laws (Israel's constitutional law) on human rights since the submission of its Initial Periodic Report. Nevertheless, the fundamental rights protected by the Present Covenant which are still not included in legislation, are effectively protected through judicial decisions and otherwise.

5. With respect to judicial decisions, The Supreme Court of Israel has continued playing a major role in the implementation of civil and political rights. The Supreme Court, led by its president, the Honorable Chief Justice Aharon Barak, has issued a number of precedent setting decisions on human rights issues, often creating a quick, apparent change in the practices of the relevant governmental agency. The court has faced many challenges over these years, and confronted head-on problematic and highly political and security-related contentious issues. Such cases include H.C. 5100/94 Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. The State of Israel, in which the court has held that the Israeli Security Agency is unauthorized to employ investigation methods which involve the use of physical pressure against persons suspected of engaging in terrorist activities; C.F.H 7048/98 Anonymous v. The Minister of Defense, in which the court invalidated the detention of Lebanese citizens held in Israel; and H.C 6698/95 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration, which effectively prohibited the allocation of State land on the basis of a discriminatory criteria.

6. On the administrative level many administrative decisions and regulations have been promulgated, enhancing human rights principles. A major advancement to be noted is the proposal to establish a Human Rights Commission in Israel. Once established, the Commission should play an important role in strengthening and enforcing the protection of fundamental rights. This proposal carries with it an additional declarative value, stating Israel's commitment to the protection of human rights and the assurance of effective remedies to all persons, without distinction of any kind, as required under article 2 of the Covenant. Thus, the establishment of the commission shall serve to enhance human rights consciousness within Israeli society, strengthening and enforcing the protection of fundamental rights.

7. The following report addresses the main issues raised by the covenant between the submission of the Initial Periodic Report and September 2000, as well as concerns raised by the Human Rights Committee. As instructed, the report shall be presented in the order of the Articles of the covenant.

Applicability of the ICCPR to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip

8. In its Concluding Observations on Israel's Initial Report, the Committee questioned Israel's position regarding the applicability of the Covenant to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel has consistently maintained that the Covenant does not apply to areas that are not subject to its sovereign territory and jurisdiction. This position is based on the well-established distinction between human rights and humanitarian law under international law. Accordingly, in Israel's view, the Committee's mandate cannot relate to events in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, inasmuch as they are part and parcel of the context of armed conflict as distinct from a relationship of human rights.

Furthermore, pursuant to the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement of 1995,² and the consequent documentation and undertakings of the Palestine Liberation Organization (P.L.O),³ the overwhelming majority of powers and responsibilities in all civil spheres (including civil and political rights, as well as a variety of security issues, have been transferred to the Palestinian Council, which in any event is directly responsible and accountable vis-a-vis the entire Palestinian population of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip with regard to such issues. In light of this changing reality, and the jurisdiction of the Palestinian Council in these areas, Israel cannot be internationally responsible for ensuring the rights under the ICCPR in these areas.

The fact that the Palestinian Council does not represent a State, does not, in itself, preclude its responsibility in the sphere of human rights protection. In fact, this is also evident under Article XIX of the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, according to which the Palestinians have taken it upon themselves to exercise their powers and responsibilities "with due regard to internationally accepted norms and principles of human rights and the rule of law". Similarly, under Article II(C)(4) of the Wye River Memorandum, the Palestinian Police is obliged "to exercise its powers and responsibilities with due regard to internationally accepted norms of human rights and the rule of law, and be guided by the need to protect the public, respect human dignity and avoid harassment”.

Article 1 - Self Determination

9. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s Initial Periodic Report and no change has occurred in this area since the Initial Periodic Report was submitted in 1998.

Article 2 - Implementation of the Rights in the Covenant

10. General. As described in detail in the Initial Periodic Report, international agreements are not, as such, part of Israeli internal law, and the Knesset generally does not legislate by way of direct reference to such agreements. Accordingly, the provisions of the Covenant have not been made a part of internal Israeli law by an enactment of the Knesset. Thus, as a matter of domestic law, the Covenant does not, by itself, create private rights directly enforceable in Israeli courts. However, as described under other articles of this report, Israeli legislation and case law have continued to offer effective protection and remedies for the basic rights protected by the Covenant.

11. Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. This law, which was described in the Initial Periodic Report, is one of the fundamental backbones of Israeli Human rights legislation. This law has continued to influence the enactment and amendment of new laws, as well as the judicial interpretation of these laws, and continued to influence a wide range of legal and social practices, from the amendment of the arrest and detention procedures of military personnel, to the physical disciplining of children.

12. Publicity and Dissemination. The Initial Periodic Report concerning the implementation of the ICCPR, and the HRC’s comments, were translated into Hebrew and widely distributed, thus contributing to the creation of a public discussion on human rights issues.

13. Towards The Establishment of a Human Rights Commission. In April 2000, the Ministry of Justice appointed a steering committee, composed of government officials, academics and representatives of NGOs, in order to establish an Israeli Human Rights Commission. The steering committee was instructed, for the first time since the establishment of the State of Israel, to guide the conducting of thorough research on the development of a human rights commission in Israel. The objective of the committee is to advise the director general of the Ministry of Justice on issues regarding the proposed structure of the Commission, the desired scope of the Commissioner’s responsibilities and the legislation and required practical measures for the establishment of the Commission.

At the time of writing this report, researchers at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem’s Minerva Center for Human rights, supported by the steering committee, have already completed a comparative study of human rights commissions throughout the world. The recently completed study aims to identify and develop a model for a commission to suit Israel's unique political and social structure. The steering committee and the research team will present their recommendations for a draft law to the Minister of Justice.

Once established, the Commission will play an important role in strengthening and enforcing the protection of fundamental rights. The creation of a Human Rights Commission carries with it not only a huge practical change, but also an important declarative value, stating Israel's commitment to the protection of human rights and the assurance of effective remedies for all persons, without distinction of any kind, as required under Article Two of the Covenant. Thus, the establishment of the commission shall serve to enhance human rights consciousness within the Israeli society and government.

14. The newly-established Commission for the Rights of Persons with Disabilities makes for another first step in the ongoing process towards the implementation of human and civil rights in Israel (see article 26 for a detailed survey of the commission).

15. Human Rights Education. The Ministry of Education has increased its efforts in the area of human rights education. The main educational theme for the 1998-99 academic year was "The right to dignity and the duty to respect", putting an emphasis on human rights related materials in the schools. The Ministry of Education has also taken targeted measures to eliminate gender bias from schools, and promote equality between men and women. In Addition, the Convention on the Rights of the Child has been introduced and studied in the schools, in order to increase children's awareness to this instrument.

16. Equality. The implementation by the State of Israel of its obligation to maintain equality in the enjoyment of the rights under the Covenant is discussed in detail under many of the other articles in this report, and in particular articles 3, 26 and 27.

17. Nationality. As described in detail in Israel's Previous Report (sections 47-52), one way of acquiring Israeli citizenship is by way of Return: Jews who immigrate to Israel will automatically be accorded the status of oleh (new immigrant) which entitles them to citizenship, unless the person is deemed likely to endanger public health, the security of the state, or the public welfare, or the person is "engaged in an activity directed against the Jewish people". Under section 4A of the Law of Return, 5710- 1950 rights of an oleh, are also extended to the spouse of a Jew, to the child and grandchild of a Jew and to their spouses, respectively. For many years, The Ministry of Interior's policy has been to interpret the Law of Return as extending also to the Non-Jewish spouses of Jews who were already Israeli nationals (and not new immigrants), according them a status similar to that of a Jewish person, and of an oleh under the Law of Citizenship 5712-1952.

On 1995, the Ministry of Interior has changed its policy, and started to apply a different interpretation to the law. Under the new interpretation, the Law of Return will not, henceforth, apply to the Non-Jewish spouse of a person who already is an Israeli national, so that he or she will no longer receive the benefits of a Jewish new immigrant, including the right to automatically acquire Israeli citizenship.

Thus, the Ministry of Interior no longer favors Jewish Israeli nationals by automatically granting a citizenship to their foreign national spouses. At present, the foreign spouses of persons who are already Israeli nationals, whether Jewish or Non-Jewish, may attain Israeli nationality by way of naturalization (For further details regarding naturalization, please see Israel's Previous Report under section 50).

A petition challenging the new policy was dismissed by the High Court of Justice which affirmed the new policy (HCJ 3648/97 Stamka v. The Minister Of the Interior). A later request for a further hearing in this case was also dismissed by the High Court of Justice.

The Israel's Security Agency Draft Law

18. For the last 52 years, the Israeli Security Agency (the ISA) has operated under the government's general residual authority, as specified by section 40 of Basic Law: The Government. The scope of the ISA's authority, its structure and its roles were only partially regulated by Israeli law, although a number of sensitive issues, such as electronic surveillance, information regarding criminal record, the transfer of information between governmental agencies, and communications were regulated in specific legislation. For several years, a team of experts from various governmental ministries had been working on the drafting of the Israel's Security Agency Bill (in its current form, the "ISA Bill"). The ISA Bill, which seeks to offer an explicit legal description of all of the aforementioned matters, was developed after a thorough study of similar in the legislation of western democracies, such as Canada, Australia, Germany and the UK. At present, it is in the process of enactment by the Knesset.

19. Under article 7(a) to the ISA Bill, the ISA's roles comprise of protecting the security of the State of Israel and the democratic system against threats of terror, espionage, disclosure of national secrets and other similar threats, as well as the protection and promotion of other vital national interests. This, subject to the decisions of the Government of Israel, and to Israeli Law

20. Supervision over the Agency will be on a four-tier basis. The Agency will be supervised by an independent comptroller (who is not a member of the ISA), by a special Knesset committee, by a special ministerial committee and by the Prime Minister.

21. Under this draft legislation, an applicant for a classified job, rejected by the ISA for security reasons, can appeal against his/her rejection. A committee of three, headed by a district judge or a retired district judge, shall hear the appeals.

Article 3 – Equal Rights of Men and Women

22. General. In its comments on the Initial Periodic Report, the HRC expressed concern over the ongoing discrimination against women. The HRC recommended that targeted measures be considered to accelerate progress toward equality, in particular for Arab women.

Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, there has been significant progress in the status of women in Israel. This progress is apparent in the adoption of several new notable acts of legislation, in the precedent setting decisions given by the courts, and in actions and initiatives taken by the different government bodies. It is also true, however, that in some areas of Israeli society, women are still relatively underprivileged. Some legislative changes have been rapidly implemented, as in the case of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law, 5758-1998. Other changes are harder to implement, for many reasons. For example, the integration of women within the formerly male dominated Israeli Defense Forces (the "IDF") is still quite far from desirable, as is the status women hold within the religious establishment.

Hopefully, all the positive changes detailed below, in conjunction with the constantly rising gender awareness in Israel, shall serve to further enhance the status of Israeli women in the years to come.

23. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (the "AASW"). The AASW was established by the Knesset in a unanimous vote in March 1998, marking International Women's Day. The functions of the AASW include the formulation of policy regarding gender equality and the elimination of discrimination against women; coordination and promotion of cooperation between state government, municipalities, and other formal institutions; advising the ministries on the implementation of Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998; establishment of special programs and services for women which promote gender equality; promotion of legislative measures for the advancement of women and the elimination of discrimination; and provision of information and tools necessary for the achievement of these goals to the government. Additionally, the law has specifically charged the AASW with the responsibility to heighten public awareness of violence against women through use of the educational systems and the media and to promote activities designed to decrease all forms of such violence.

A detailed survey of the Actions and Programs of the AASW is provided in the AASW's National Report on the Status of Women in Israel "Beijing 5+", published in June 2000, and provided as an Appendix to this report.

24. The amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law, 5711-1951, adopted by the Knesset in 2000, was another substantial step toward gender equality. The amended law establishes the principles of equality in all areas of life, adequate representation of women, a woman's right over her body, affirmative action as an essential means to achieve equality and women's right to social equality.

25. Women's Representation in Political Parties and the Knesset. Women are still under-represented in political positions, both in the national and municipal levels. However, there have been significant positive changes in the past few years. In the municipal elections of 1998, two women were elected to head larger cities, (Netanya and Herzliya) together with a 40 per cent increase in the number of women serving on local and municipal councils throughout Israel. In national elections, for the first time, several of the large parties included women's representation as a dominant factor in the establishment of party lists (through appointments, quotas, affirmative action etc.). Of the 120 members of the Knesset, 15 are women, among them the first Arab woman ever to be elected to the Israeli parliament.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak appointed two women as cabinet ministers, and a third as a deputy minister. Several other women were appointed to important Knesset committees.

Women in Government, Local Authorities and the Civil Service

26. Since its establishment in 1996, the Department for the Advancement of Women within the Civil Service has been active in various areas including the implementation within the Civil Service of legislation oriented towards the improvement of women's status, the promotion of information and counseling for women within the civil service, as well as the formation and professional orientation of professionals working to promote the advancement of women in the Civil Service. The Department has also served as an address for the complaints of female workers and has worked at maintaining on-going contact with organizations dealing with women's status in furtherance of common objectives, as well as with the Knesset various committees to advance women's rights legislation.

In the context of action aimed at implementing the 1995 amendment to the Civil Service Law (Appointments) 5719-1959, a steering committee was formed to make recommendations to the Civil Service Commissioner. As a result of the committee's suggestions and the relevant department's efforts, section 15A of this law has been revised once again in December 2000. A current project the Department is preparing is the safeguarding of senior positions for women, by creating a resource of information, statistics, and guidelines for cooperation with the ministries' administrators.

27. The Prevention of Sexual Harassment within the Civil Service. With regards to the implementation of the Law on the Prevention of Sexual Harassment 5758-1998 and the reinforcement of awareness on the subject, the Department has been involved on several levels: dissemination of information and explanation of the Law to more than 10,000 workers in 1999 alone, and provision of tools to the supervisors on the status of women so that they may receive the workers' complaints. Indeed, since the passage of the Law in 1998, the number of complaints of sexual harassment received by the Department has increased dramatically (with 20 complaints received in 1997, 30 in 1998, 61 in 1999 and 75 complaints received in 2000). These Complaints are handled in cooperation with the Unit for Discipline and the Investigations Department within the Civil Service Administration. Women who submit complaints of sexual harassment to the Department are provided with legal advice, and are accompanied and supported throughout the investigative process and the trial.

As part of the training and professional orientation of Supervisors on the Status of Women in government offices, the Department held 3 training courses as well as approximately 30 sessions and conferences while providing on-going updates of relevant information and material to deal with issues relating to the status of women (in 2000, for example, 60 circulars were distributed to the Supervisors by the Department), in addition to biannual meetings that take place for the purpose of regulating and supervising the Supervisors' work. Apart from guiding and supervising the Supervisors, the Department also holds direct contact with female Civil Service employees in the manner of information dissemination and personal meetings.

In addition to all the above, the Department has served as an address to which women workers turn to complain of discrimination, injustice and injury in their status and work conditions. Dozens of such complaints are received each year, concerning a wide variety of subjects. For example, in 2000, the Department processed and dealt with a total of 149 complaints relating to recruitment procedures for administrative positions which discriminated against women, as well as with the non-application of labor laws in the realms of maternity leaves, sexual harassment, and lack of proper representation of women in state tenders.

28. Affirmative Action in the Civil Service. A December 2000 amendment to section 15A of the Civil Service Law (Appointments) 5719-1959 expands the use of the affirmative action doctrine within the civil service. According to the amendment it is obligatory to apply affirmative action in all sorts of hiring for the civil service. This includes actual appointments and non-tendered appointments. This amendment also authorizes the safeguarding of certain positions for women only. While the amendment carries tremendous significance with regards to the implementation of the law, its application might prove to be problematic given that these principles have been simultaneously employed for the advancement of other populations – minorities and people with disabilities. It is still not clear how the civil service will adapt to the application of this important amendment .

The Department for the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service supervises the affirmative action policy asserted in section 15A of the Civil Service Law (Appointments) 5719-1959. Preliminary data that was received from the Department, portrays an unchanging situation, in which the representation of women within the higher ranks of the civil service is far from being adequate, and the rate of their success in civil service tenders remains low.

29. Ranks of Women in the Civil Service. The rate of women among the top three ranks of the senior staff of the civil service's four main classifications – which compose the main source for administration managers – remains low. In 1997, when women made up 61% of all civil servants, that rate was still less than 15%, and in October 1999, when women made up 61% of all civil servants, the rate stood at 16.4%. Women's representation in the top echelons of the administration stands out yet more when contrasted with their representation in the lowest ranks (i.e. 8th rank and bellow), where their overrepresentation only seems to be growing: from 66% of all workers in 1997, to 71% in 1999. Between 1993-1999, not one woman occupied the highest rank of the administrative or the technical classification, two of the most prestigious classifications in the service.

30. Tenders in the Civil Service. The method of appointments to the civil service is through both internal and external tenders. While the increase of women's participation in internal job-tenders in the civil service, both as candidates and appointees, is quite constant, the situation in public tenders is far less positive. Beyond the overall decline in the number of female candidates and appointees through the tenders system, the trend, which consistently tended to appoint women at a slightly higher rate relative to the rate of women who presented their candidacy was reversed in recent years. For example, while 38% of the candidates for public tenders in 1998 were women, they constituted only 36% of the appointees.

31. The Judiciary and Lawyers in the Public Sector. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, the percentage of women in the Judiciary has grown, most notably in the higher courts, with a growth of 72 per cent in the National Labor Court, 42 per cent in the District Courts and 28 per cent in the Supreme Court. In all of the different civil courts combined, there are 200 women judges and 262 men judges, such that 43 per cent of the civil judiciary in Israel is composed of women (compared to a total of 40 per cent in 1998).

 Figures are as of 16 November 2000.

32. Government Corporations. The 1993 amendment to the Government Corporations Law, 5735-1975 (section 18a) set a requirement for appropriate representation of both genders on the board of directors of every government corporation. Since the enactment of section 18 (a), there has been a significant increase in the number of women appointed to the board of directors of government corporations. According to recent data, 253 of a total of 685 directors (37 per cent) are women.

33. Under the above-mentioned amendment, a feminist NGO won a suit against the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs following the appointment of a male deputy director general of the National Insurance Institute, in violation of the principle of adequate representation of women. In a precedent setting ruling, the Supreme Court declared that anyone responsible for the appointment of public officials must take every possible measure to uphold the doctrine of adequate representation of women (H.C.2761/98 Israel Women's Network v. The Minister of Labor and Social Affairs).

Women in the Military and Police

34. Under recent legislation, all military professions in Israel, including combat positions will be open to both men and women. The military leadership has also committed itself to placing women in higher ranks and positions. The Israeli Air Force has continued the implementation of its egalitarian policy regarding women's service as air crew, which was still in its initiative steps by the time of the submission of the Initial Periodic Report. Today, four women are already serving in this capacity.

35. The IDF has embarked on several programs aimed to advance the status of women in the military forces. Among which are a program of workshops and empowerment courses to encourage junior officers to advance within the military, along with the appointment by the chief of staff of an advisory committee to identify female officers with potential for senior leadership positions. Another program, initiated in conjunction with the Ministry of Education, encourages female recruits to choose to enlist in technological branches of the military and discharged female soldiers to continue their technological education.

Equality in Employment

36. Over 60% of Israeli women are still concentrated in a small number of large, female-dominated, labor intensive, and low-paying occupations, which encompass less than 25% of the range of occupations in Israel. It is thus not surprising that women comprise more than 70% of those who earn less than the average minimal wage. In addition, women are the first to be hit by unemployment. In 1998, while the annual national unemployment rate was 8.6, women's unemployment reached nearly 10 per cent. Several legislative changes, which will be detailed below, seek to solve this problem and close the gender gap, which still exists in certain areas of [text missing at this point].

37. The 1998 amendment to the Women's Employment Law, 5714-1954 protects women requiring hospitalization for themselves or their infants after child birth, prohibits dismissal during pregnancy of both permanent and temporary women workers, prohibits dismissal within 45 days after maternity leave, and prohibits dismissal for reason of absence from work for health reasons after giving birth.

Additional provisions prohibit dismissal after unpaid leave following (paid) maternity leave and reduction of work hours of pregnant women. According to the new legislation, a woman may, under certain conditions, work overtime, even after the fifth month of pregnancy.

38. Legislation mandating the integration of supplementary benefits (e.g. travel and clothing allowances) into salaries has recently been passed in the Knesset. This legislation is intended to help eliminate gender discrimination and to correct wage gaps, which have persisted despite equal pay legislation.

39. The Department of Women's Employment at the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs has established the Unit for the Advancement of Women, specifically dedicated to the development of models for several types of empowerment workshops, including courses for Bedouin and Arab women.

40. In recognition of the wave of unemployment and its implications for women, the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs, in conjunction with the AASW, seeks to revise the traditional programs of occupational training, to provide women with training in more viable professions, such as computers, communications and technological education.

41. Only a handful of women attain top posts in management, whether in industry, government, the public sector or academia. Only 2% of women serve in positions of senior management and/or on the board of directors of large companies.

42. Occupational Distribution. Differences in employment patterns between men and women in Israel are shown in the following table, showing the relative level of employment in various branches of the economy. Few significant changes have occurred in the occupational distribution of women since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report. However, at present, 3.5% of all employed women in Israel are employed in managing positions – an increase of 75% since 1998.

43. The ability of a woman to continue working right after childbirth has been enhanced through a recent decision in the Circuit Labor Court in Tel Aviv. This court adopted a broad interpretation of a provision of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, 5748-1988, under which a female parent, entitled to a shorter working day, can pass that right to her spouse, regardless of whether her being a hired worker or an independent businesswoman. The court has held that this interpretation, which expands the circle of male workers, willing to tend to their children while their spouse is out working, is consistent with the view that objects to gender based discrimination. The court further emphasized that it is unjustified to discriminate between men and women as to their chances and ability for equal employment, a flourishing career, self fulfilment and satisfaction at the work place (Labor 031993/96 Yahav v. The State of Israel).

44. Education. The Ministry of Education has instituted “Equality 2000”, a unique program, designed to further equal opportunity between the genders in the education system. The program, scheduled to run for four years, will reach pupils, teachers and counselors as well as parents. A pilot program has been operated in four schools whose populations represent different sectors of Israeli society and the program will be expanded in the coming year.

45. Women in the Media. The Commission on the Status of Women in Radio and Television, under the purview of The Israel Broadcasting Authority, actively attempts to promote the participation of women at all levels of Media. The commission has sponsored courses for women within the broadcasting authority. These courses provide information on women’s rights, awareness training concerning the role of the media in advancing the status of women, skills for working in male-dominated environments, and personal and professional empowerment.

46. Equal rights in the Domestic Sphere. Israeli law and practice regarding the equality between spouses, and between spouses and their children, are discussed under articles 23 and 24.

Violence Against Women

Domestic Violence

47. Protection from violence is provided at 12 shelters for battered women, located throughout the country. Due to their particular cultural and religious needs, there are special centers for Arab women (one) and for ultra-Orthodox Jewish women. Together, these shelters provide emergency intervention for nearly 1,600 women and children yearly.

The shelters provide professional counseling, legal advice and assistance, as well as childcare and rehabilitation. Several shelters also have multi-lingual staff and volunteers in order to assist immigrant women. Children continue in community-based day care or elementary school frameworks while residing in the shelter. In addition, there are thirty transitional apartments, which provide women with additional options when they are ready to leave the shelters.

A unique shelter for abusive men who have been removed from their homes by court orders has been established. In this shelter, the men receive group and individual treatment, as well as consciousness-raising and behavior modification counseling.

48. At least ten hotlines are devoted to battered women throughout the country; one is devoted to Arabic speakers, while Russian and Amharic (Ethiopian) speakers are available on most of the others. Callers receive advice and information from trained volunteers.

49. During the course of 1999 – upon the initiative and financial support of the National Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women – the Department held a wide range of activities on the subject of domestic violence and violence against women, including information and counseling session which drew as many as 13,500 male and female workers and employees.

50. There are 25 centers for the prevention of family violence, located throughout the country. These centers are jointly funded and administered by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, women's organizations, and the local authorities. The centers provide direct treatment, visiting centers where parents and children who have been separated can meet (under supervision if necessary); and legal advice and research and information.

51. The Knesset has recognized the Battered Women's Syndrome, acknowledging the right of a battered woman to defend herself against her attacker and effectively broadening the definition of "self-defense".

52. Furthermore, the Knesset has passed an amendment to the Penal Code to allow the courts to impose more lenient sentences on victims of severe abuse who have been convicted of murdering the perpetrator of the abuse. While the amendment is not limited to abuse within the family, it seems that this will be among its most important applications.

53. Police treatment of Domestic Violence. Police personnel currently receive special training for dealing with family violence. Police policy dictates that domestic violence be treated as a violent crime, and that the victim be protected. Furthermore, the police may continue to investigate a complaint of violence even if the woman withdraws her complaint. However, as in most countries, the majority of abused women do not file complaints with the police.

The police also have the prerogative of filing a report even if the abused woman declines to do so. Women's organizations report that cooperation with the police is generally effective, and the Minister of Public Security has appointed an advisor on violence against women.

54. In March 1995, the Knesset appointed a parliamentary committee of inquiry to investigate the subject of women murdered by their spouses and life partners. The committee further broadened its mandate to investigate the subject of violence against women, so as to investigate the subject of violence against women and presented its conclusion and recommendations in June 1996. This comprehensive report analyzed the causes of domestic violence, the adequacy and efficacy of existing services, and gaps in service-provision. The report presented comprehensive, integrated and binding recommendations to each of the relevant Ministries.

55. Building on this report, the government decided in 1998 to establish an inter-ministerial committee to deal with issues of law enforcement and strengthening of existing services. The committee was chaired by the director general of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, and included representatives from the Prime Minister's Office, the AASW, the Ministry of Public Security, the Ministry of Health the Ministry of Education and women's organizations. In 1997-98, the Prime Minister's Office sponsored a national media campaign against violence against women, including a national hotline and referral service.

Sexual Harassment

56. In March 1998, the Knesset passed a far-reaching sexual harassment law, one of the most comprehensive laws of its kind in the world. The law provides a broad definition of sexual harassment, and makes such behavior both a criminal and civil offence. The law applies not only to the civilian labor market, but also to the military, police, as well as all institutions of higher education. The law holds the employer responsible for instructing his workers in abstaining from sexually harassing behavior. Furthermore, the employer must establish procedures for submitting complaints and is required to deal with all complaints effectively.

57. In the past year, there has been a significant increase in complaints. This can be attributed to both the new legislation, and to the growing public awareness of the subject fostered by it.

58. As the sponsors of the bill had hoped, the law has also served as a springboard for numerous institutions to initiate a process of discussion and awareness of gender equality among both men and women. Following its enactment, the AASW, together with numerous women's organizations, is conducting extensive educational campaigns. The AASW further provides supervision, follow-up and monitoring of all government ministries, municipalities, local councils, and academic institutions regarding enforcement of the Sexual Harassment Law.

59. The Supreme Court has issued several precedent-setting decisions in regard to sexual harassment. Even prior to the enactment of the Sexual Harassment Law, the court has held that a professor who sexually harassed a student was to be convicted in the offence of behaving in a manner inappropriate for a civil servant, asserting that sexual harassment is a prohibited violation of human dignity (Civil Service Appeal 6713/96 The State of Israel v. Zohar Ben Asher).

Under the new Sexual Harassment law, the Supreme Court has prevented the promotion of an IDF officer to the rank of general, after he was found guilty of abusing his superior rank in order to become involved in a sexual relationship with one of his subordinates (H.C. 1284/99 Anonymous v. The IDF Chief of Staff). In another recent, precedent setting decision, the court has held that the reprimanding of a civil servant convicted of sexual harassment is an insufficient disciplinary method, and ordered his dismissal from the service (Civil Service Appeal 1298/00 The State of Israel v. Bruchin). The lower courts throughout the State of Israel are applying these precedents, set by the Supreme Court.

The IDF has committed itself to addressing issues related to sexual violence and harassment in the military, and all recruits, both men and women, participate in a program of empowerment and awareness to counteract harassment.

Treatment of Rape Victims

60. Israel's eight rape crisis centers receive over 10,000 referrals each year. These centers also maintain hotlines and provide educational services. Public support for the rape crisis centers is relatively low. Donations and contributions provide most of the support. The centers report that while police directives are meant to provide sensitive and effective care for the victim, the implementation of these directives is not uniform throughout the country. Moreover, in Israel, as in other countries, assaulted women are often reluctant to contact the police.

Trafficking in Women

61. In its comments on Israel's Initial Periodic Report, the HRC expressed concern in regard to Israel's treatment of the victims of trafficking in women. In July 2000, the Penal law was amended to include section 203A – Trafficking in Human Beings for Prostitution. The provisions of section 203A apply a maximum sentence of 16 years of imprisonment on any person who engages in trafficking in human beings for prostitution, and a maximum sentence of 10 years on any person who causes another person to leave the country in which he or she resides, in order to engage them in prostitution.

62. As the amendment is recent, there are no cases which have gone through the entire trial process thus far. However, the effect of the amendment has been felt in decisions relating to bail. In a decision given in a criminal case under section 203A, Judge Cheshin of the Supreme Court had expressed the severity in which Israeli courts regard the phenomenon of trafficking, saying, inter alia, that:

“The provisions of section 203A of the Penal Law are meant to combat the modern and ugly form of the slave trade of bygone days, and we, the courts, are charged with the task of raising our contribution in this war, a fight to the finish... [T]he war against the trade in human beings to engage in prostitution, is like the war between Israel and the Amalekites [In the Old Testament, a tribe that tried to destroy the Israelites]. ... a war in which there are no cease-fires and no compromises.”

Criminal Hearing Request 7542/00, Chanukow v. The State of Israel (Unpublished)

63. The effect of the amendment has also been felt in cases in which there was some measure of consent on the part of the victim. Supreme Court Justices have said several times that whether or not the victim consents, if the elements of trafficking are present, the offence has been completed and such an offence is viewed with gravity.

64. We should also note that currently victims of trafficking who choose to testify are housed in hotels or hostels, at the expense of the police, under police protection. In addition, as a matter of policy, the Israeli police does not prosecute these women for crimes relating to their illegal entry into Israel.

65. The suffering of women who were victims of such offences is a matter of concern to the Attorney General, and in November 2000 he appointed an inter-ministerial committee to recommend steps to combat this phenomena. Since then the committee has heard many witnesses and formulated a series of recommendation which will be publicized soon. Among these recommendations – the founding of a shelter for victims, financing legal representation for the victims, taking legal action against traffickers for income tax and money laundering crimes, extending the jurisdiction of the courts to order forfeiture of the profits of such crimes, running awareness campaigns in order to alert potential victims etc. A parliamentary committee is also carrying an investigation into trafficking in women. Its recommendations will be drafted soon.

66. Israeli women's and human rights organizations have established a coalition to combat trafficking in women and to assist its victims. At this time, they are attempting to raise funds to establish a shelter for such trafficking victims. In addition, a telephone hotline has begun to function. The coalition is also attempting to prevent trafficking through the preparation of a data sheet to be distributed, with the help of organizations in Eastern Europe, to women intending to work in Israel. They are also advocating for the enforcement of existing laws against traffickers and to improve the conditions of incarcerated women awaiting deportation.

Status of Arab Women

67. In its comments regarding the Initial Periodic Report, the HRC expressed a specific concern as to the status of women belonging to the Arab minority. Admittedly, Arab women are still among the most disadvantaged groups of women in Israel. However, Since the establishment of the AASW, certain targeted measures has been taken in order to expedite progress towards equality. Inter alia, the AASW is sponsoring a series of literacy projects for women in the Arab and Bedouin sectors. This program is the result of the express requests of the women themselves, and has established a new Arab-language hotline for personal status issues which now provides emergency information and referral services.

68. Several women's NGOs have established special projects to advance the status of Arab women pursuant to the law, through amendments of current family courts laws. Such amendments would enable Arab women to settle issues of maintenance and custody in civil courts, which are bound by principles of gender equality, rather than at the religious courts which are bound by religious law.

69. The Ministry of Religious Affairs has instituted a course that trains women to serve as "pleaders" (representatives) in the Muslim religious courts. The nineteen participants are studying topics such as Islamic religious law, Israeli civil law and feminist thought. Upon successful completion of their exams, the ministry will accredit the graduates. Similar courses are offered to Jewish women, who act as pleaders for women in the rabbinical courts.

Article 4 – States of Emergency

70. In its comments on the Initial Periodic Report, the HRC expressed concern with regard to the continuing state of emergency in Israel.

71. As explained in detail in the Initial Periodic Report, under Basic Law: The Government, the Knesset may declare a state of emergency for a period of up to one year. The State of Israel has remained in an officially proclaimed state of public emergency since May 19, 1948, four days after its founding, until the present day. Consequently, Israel has made a declaration regarding the existence of a state of emergency upon ratifying the Covenant.

72. In recent years, The Government of Israel has been inclined to refrain from extending the state of emergency any further. However, the actual termination of the state of emergency could not be executed immediately, as certain fundamental laws, orders and regulations legally depend upon the existence of a state of emergency. These acts of legislation must be revised, so as not to leave crucial matters of the state unregulated when the state of emergency expires. Since January 2000, the government has decided to ask the Knesset to extend the state of emergency to a reduced period of six months, and not for a year, the maximum period prescribed under section 49(b) of Basic Law: The Government, as was the former practice.

73. Following the present extension of the state of emergency, the Israeli government and the Knesset have embarked on a joint program to complete the needed legislative procedures required in order to end the state of emergency. As a result, measures toward a termination of the state of emergency were accelerated during the previous months, including concentration of orders considered to be canceled. In addition, the Military Service Law was amended. As a result, non of its articles are now linked to the state of emergency. Other laws are still in the process of revision, in collaboration with the relevant ministries.

74. In a recent petition to the High Court of Justice, there was a demand to pronounce the declaration regarding the existence of a state of emergency void, or alternatively, order that it is to be immediately terminated. The petitioners claim that the ongoing state of emergency poses a threat to democracy and to civil rights and that in the present circumstances it is no longer vital. At present, the matter is still pending before the High Court of Justice. The government has submitted to the Court, upon its request, a comprehensive estimated schedule regarding the measures required in order to replace the acts of legislation linked directly to the state of emergency.

Article 5 – Non-derogable Nature of Fundamental Rights

75. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous report and no change has occurred in this area since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

Article 6 – Right to Life

Reduction of Infant Mortality, Epidemics and Malnutrition

76. Recent statistics indicate that Israel's infant mortality rate continues to decrease. Among Jewish, Christian and Druze newborns, the infant mortality rate fell to 7.5 deaths for every 1,000 live births, as per the Ministry of Health's goal for the year 2000, set in 1989. Among the Muslim population, despite the continuing decrease in child mortality rate, the aforementioned objectives are yet to be achieved. The further decrease in infant mortality over the last quarter decade, and the causes for such deaths, are shown in the following tables:

Table 1: Infant Mortality, 1995-1998 – Per 1,000 Live Births

Environmental Policy

78. Air Quality. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, the State of Israel has completed a 24-station national monitoring network, composed of population and transportation stations, regional control centers and a national control center for data storage, analysis and display. The network, which monitors concentrations of sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, ozone, carbon monoxide, particles smaller than 10 p.p.m and hydrocarbons, provides real-time information about air quality throughout the country. The information facilitates enforcement of air quality standards, identifies major sources of air pollution, and informs the general public about air quality levels.

Sulfur dioxide emissions from the country's oil fired power plants dropped dramatically from 113 thousand tons in 1990 to 55 thousand tons in 1999, mostly through the use of low-sulfur fuel.

The Israeli Ministry of the Environment has issued some thirty personal decrees directed personally to those officials or top executives responsible for air pollution abatement under the Abatement of Nuisances Law. The Ministry of the Environment has also drafted new regulations for pollution prevention from power generating stations. These personal decrees and regulations will mandate use of fuel with low and very low sulfur concentrations, require old power units in Tel Aviv to switch to natural gas by 2003, phase out old oil-powered stations and replace them with combined cycle gas turbines by 2005, obligate the use of the best available technologies, demand continuous monitoring and reporting, and oblige the reduction of pollutants which are considered greenhouse gas emissions.

Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, new environmental impact assessments were prepared for power plants, oil refineries, cement plants and other industrial plants expected to adversely impact the environment.

79. Water Quality. The State of Israel has established the River Rehabilitation Authority and created river rehabilitation administrations for twelve rivers, which flow into the Mediterranean Sea and two rivers in the eastern basin of the country. Master plans have been drawn for these rivers, and landscape and park development have been initiated.

Water quality in rivers is monitored in 110 effluent reservoirs on a biannual basis.

The Ministry of the Environment has drafted recommendations on upgraded standards for wastewater and sludge treatment, and published a new Israeli standard on laundry powders. The standard reduces salt and boron content in detergents according to a graduated timetable. Implementation of the standard will enhance the possibility for wastewater reuse under conditions of water scarcity. The Ministry of the Environment has also promulgated regulations regarding the prevention of water pollution from gas stations and initiation of restoration projects for fuel-contaminated soils. Furthermore, new regulations have been published on effluent standards for industrial sewage.

Article 7 – Freedom from Torture or Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

80. In its comments on the Israel's Initial Periodic Report, the HRC expressed deep concern, that the guidelines for the conduct of interrogation of suspected terrorists, authorizing Israel's Security Agency (ISA) to apply moderate physical pressure, can give rise to abuse and the violation of article 7 of the Covenant.

81. From its foundation, the State of Israel has been engaged in an unceasing struggle for both its very existence and security. Terrorist organizations have established, as their goal, nothing less than Israel's annihilation. To prevent terrorism effectively while ensuring that the basic human rights of even the most dangerous of criminals are protected, Israeli authorities have adopted strict rules for the handling of interrogations.

82. The guidelines on interrogation were those laid down in 1987 by the Landau Commission of Inquiry, headed by former Supreme Court President, Justice Moshe Landau. As described in detail in articles 70-74 of the Initial Periodic Report, the commission determined that in dealing with dangerous terrorists who are shown to represent a grave threat to the State of Israel and its inhabitants, the use of a moderate degree of pressure, including physical pressure, to obtain information crucial for the protection of life is unavoidable in certain circumstances (H.C.J. 5100/94 The Public Committee Against Torture v. The Government of Israel).

83. These partly confidential guidelines were designed to enable investigators to obtain crucial information on terrorist activities from suspects who, for obvious reasons, would not volunteer such information, while at the same time ensuring that the suspects are not maltreated. However, On September 6, 1999, the High Court of Justice ruled that the ISA is no longer authorized, according to the present state of the law, to employ certain investigation methods that involve the use of physical pressure against such a suspect.

84. This decision is a result of several petitions, which were brought before the Supreme Court (sitting as the High Court of Justice), in which it was argued that certain methods used by the ISA (for instance, the shaking of a suspect, holding him in particular positions for a lengthy period and sleep deprivation) are unlawful. It was argued, among other reasons, that the illegality is due to the lack of authority permitting the use of these interrogation methods.

85. The Court, in an extended panel of nine judges, unanimously accepted the applications before it. Speaking for the court, Chief Justice Aharon Barak held that ISA investigators are endowed with the same interrogation powers given to police investigators. The authority which allows the investigator to conduct a fair investigation does not allow him to torture a person, or to treat him in a cruel, inhuman or degrading manner. The Court recognized that, inherently, even a fair interrogation is likely to cause the suspect discomfort. The law does not, however, authorize the use of interrogation methods, which infringe upon the suspect's dignity, for an inappropriate purpose, or beyond the necessary means.

86. Additionally, the Court held that the "necessity" defense, as it appears in article 34(11) of the Israeli Penal Law (which negates criminal liability in certain circumstances), cannot constitute a general basis for allowing ISA investigators to employ interrogation methods involving the use of physical pressure against the suspect. An ISA investigator applying such prohibited interrogation methods is acting without authority. He or she may, however, potentially avail himself or herself of the "necessity" defense, under the circumstances provided by the law, if facing criminal charges for the use of prohibited interrogation methods. The attorney general may so instruct with respect to the circumstances under which charges will not be brought against ISA investigators, in light of the materialization of the conditions of "necessity." At the same time, the "necessity" defense does not constitute a basis for authorizing the infringement of human rights in advance. The mere fact that a certain action does not constitute a criminal offence, under a given set of circumstances, does not in itself authorize the ISA to employ this method in the course of its interrogations.

87. The judgement relates to the unique security problems faced by the State of Israel since its founding and to the requirements for fighting terrorism. In light of the above, the court highlights the difficulty associated with deciding this matter. This having been said, the court did not rule out the possibility that the Knesset may decide, in conformity with Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, to amend the law so as to provide special authorization for the use of certain interrogation techniques. It is important to mention that the Knesset did not change the existing legislation relating to interrogations, and the ISA fully complies with the Supreme Court decision.

88. Treatment of Detainees. On April 1, 1998, section 9 of the Arrests Law was amended and special arrangements were prescribed regarding the right of detainees (who had been indicted) to send and receive letters, including modes of inspection of letters.

On November 25, 1999, the regulations under the Arrests (Conditions of Detention) Law were amended and the Inspector General of the Israel Police Force was empowered to order the denial of visits from a detainee person, as specified therein.

The Israel Police Force complies with the provisions of the Arrests Law and the Regulations thereunder, although at certain times and at certain places of detention, rights are not fully upheld (for example, accommodation without a proper bed, separation and daily exercise).

The police are currently renovating the places of detention for which it is responsible, expending scores of millions of New Israeli Shekels (“NIS”) on this project. The renovations should be completed within two years, and after completion the detention installations should be of a higher standard than that required under the Law.

Disciplinary and Criminal Proceedings and other Judicial Relief

89. A number of bodies are engaged in the investigation, examination and clarification of complaints against police officers: the Department of Investigation of Police Misconduct of the Ministry of Justice (the “DIPM”) investigates criminal offenses which are punishable by imprisonment of more than one year; police investigation units investigate criminal offenses punishable by imprisonment of up to one year; the Israel Police Public Complaints Unit at its various levels, as well as investigating officers and committees examine and clarify those complaints not investigated by the DIPM and police investigation units.

Depending on the results of the clarification of the complaints, criminal or disciplinary proceedings are taken against police officers found, prima facie, to have committed an offense.

The DIPM, which is responsible for the majority of criminal investigations against police officers, transfers files to the Disciplinary Department of the Police Personnel Department (the “Disciplinary Department”) in which disciplinary offenses are found to exist prima facie, in order to examine such cases from the disciplinary aspect, including making a decision on initiating disciplinary action.

Such files include files in which the offense ascribed to the police officer does not constitute a criminal offense, as well as files closed by the DIPM from the criminal aspect, on various grounds.

In this regard, we should note that in files in regard to offenses relating to the use of unlawful force, the Director of the DIPM is competent to decide that disciplinary proceedings be taken.

90. The Disciplinary Department examines files transmitted to it from various examining bodies, and decides whether disciplinary action should be taken. Such action includes bringing a person for a disciplinary hearing before a disciplinary tribunal, bringing a person for a disciplinary hearing before a sole adjudicator, or the giving of a warning.

From the beginning of the investigation until after the conclusion of the criminal or disciplinary proceedings, if taken, the police also consider taking administrative proceedings, including dismissal from the police, suspension, being put on enforced vacation, transfer to another function, lowering of rank, delay in any rise in rank and issue of a warning.

91. The following statistics were compiled by the Israel Police Force and the DIPM regarding the treatment of disciplinary and criminal complaints, respectively :

Training of Law Enforcement Officials

92. The Israel Police Force maintains comprehensive training programs for personnel at all levels, based on a profession level as well as on the position held by the person on the hierarchical scale. In all the courses, without exception, human rights and human dignity are dealt with, either by directly dealing with these topics or by dealing with professional issues in the spirit of human rights and dignity.

Special emphasis is placed on the issue at two junctures: first, in the police officers entry-level training course. This course has an important function, serving as a connecting factor to provide the civilian of yesterday with the rules of conduct and framework of reference required by him as a police officer.

The second juncture is the officers' course, which constitutes a change of status, where henceforth the police officer is not only responsible for his or her own values and norms of conduct but also for those personnel under his command.

The training which the police give to police personnel and officers includes, inter alia, workshops on "Human Rights and Democratic Values" led by presenters from the Association for Civil Rights in Israel and from the Council for the Rule of Law and Democracy. For example, 124 of these workshops were held in 1999, with the participation of thousands of police officers.

Similarly, about 90 professional ethics workshops are held each year for about 3,000 police officers, in which emphasis is placed on human dignity.

Other Institutional Reform Measures

93. Further to the recommendations of the Kremnitzer Committee on Police Violence, adopted by the inspector-general, the police have, for a number of years, conducted numerous activities in many aspects relating to handling the occurrence of violent behavior among police officers. In an effort to base appropriate norms among police officers regarding use of force while on duty, much has been done in recent years in terms of information and training, by means of courses and practical workshops.

In addition, administrative action has been taken against police officers involved in the commission of violent crimes, and action has been aimed at increasing the involvement of those entrusted in the field to deal with this issue, including their increased responsibility for any excessive acts committed by the police officers subject to their control. For further information on the Kremnitzer Committee, please see section 199 of the Initial Periodic Report.

94. The Goldberg Committee. As reported in detail in the Initial Periodic Report, a public committee headed by Supreme Court Justice Eliezer Goldberg was appointed in 1993 by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Police to examine the validity of convictions based solely or almost solely upon the defendant's confession, the availability of retrial, and other topics related to the rights of those investigated by the police. As part of the police preparations toward imposition of an obligation to record investigations, a trial model has been employed for about three years, in most police investigation units, of recording investigations in the most serious crimes. It should be noted that in view of these steps, the amount of voir dire hearings has significantly decreased.

One of the recommendations of the Goldberg Commission was to set up a school to learn investigative techniques. As a result of this, in September 1999 the police set up a center for training the Investigations Department designed to train the investigation and prosecution branches of the Israel Police Force.

By August 30, 2000, 1,268 trainees had completed studies of various kinds at the continuing education center, designed to broaden the professional knowledge of investigators in the specific areas which an investigator particularly requires increased knowledge, such as the study of fraud and deceit, sex offenses, juvenile crime, questioning, offenses involving death, crime rings, and others areas.

95. Commitment to Psychiatric Hospitals. The following table refers both to psychiatric hospitals and to psychiatric wards within the general hospitals:

Table 1 – Involuntary Psychiatric Commitments, 1995-1998

Year	Court ordered	District Psychiatrist's order
1995	1 235	1 589
1996	1 110	1 564
1997	1 128	2 039
1999	913	3 257

96. Since the submission of Initial Periodic Report, there has been an increase in the number of involuntary commitments to psychiatric hospitals, which now make up 14.6% of all commitments, as opposed to 9.7% in 1996. This rise can be attributed to the enactment of the Patient Rights Law 5756-1996. The law has brought about a notable increase in awareness to the necessity to obtain the patient's rational consent to the hospitalization, or an adequate legal substitute. Thus, statistics of cases when the patient had to be hospitalized involuntarily are now more accurate.

97. The number of beds assigned for psychiatric hospitalization has decreased. Instead, a growing number of patients are referred to geriatric hospitals, hostels, and other alternatives provided by the community. An amendment to the Welfare (Treatment of Mentally Handicapped Persons) Law, 5729-1969 regarding the rehabilitation of the mentally disabled in the community was recently enacted.

Experimentation on Human Beings

98. In 1999, the regulations pursuant to the National Health (Medical Experiments on Human Beings) Law were amended in order to decentralize the authority to approve "simple" experiments. Authority was delegated to the Helsinki Committee and to the directors of hospitals, thus allowing more resources to be allocated to supervision and enforcement by the Ministry of Health. In addition, efforts are being made to pass the aforementioned regulations as primary legislation.

Prohibition of Human Cloning

99. The Prohibition of Genetic Intervention (Human Cloning and Genetic Manipulation of Reproductive Cells) Law, 5759-1999 is an innovative statute. The law prohibits, for a period of five years, the performance of any act or intervention regarding human cells which is intended to clone a human being or create a human being by use of genetically altered cells.

The law prescribes that the five-year period should be used to examine the consequences of such acts. For that purpose, the legislator has established an Advisory Committee, to pursue developments in medicine, science and biotechnology in the area of genetic experiments on human beings. The Advisory Committee shall submit a yearly report to the Minister of Health, to advise the Minister on the matters set out in the law, and to make recommendations to the Minister regarding the force of the prohibitions set out in the Law.

To enable the law to advance at the same rate as scientific developments and not prevent them, the Minister of Health is authorized, after consulting with the advisory committee, to permit, by regulations, certain acts of genetic interference originally prohibited by the law. Those acts would be subject to attaining a permit in advance, and certain conditions may be imposed. Criminal penalties of two-years imprisonment have been set for breach of provisions of this law.

It should be emphasized that the main purpose of the law was declaratory. At present, there are no experiments taking place in Israel aimed at cloning human beings. However, the legislator thought it important to declare that at this stage, prior to the full examination of all moral, legal, social and scientific aspects, the cloning technique is not a proper and desirable method of bringing a child into the world.

Article 8 – Prohibition of Slavery

100. General. As described in detail in the Initial Periodic Report, Israeli law does not allow hard labor to be imposed as the punishment for a crime. Incarcerated convicts are required to work at tasks or jobs which do not involve hard labor (Section 48 of the Penal Law, 5737-1977) unless the Exemptions Committee of the Prisons Service releases them from the obligation for reasons of rehabilitation, health or other reasonable grounds.

101. Due to a lack of suitable employment, the prisoners' workforce is not being utilized to the fullest capacity.

Between November 1998 and the end of 1999, there was a 20 per cent increase in the number of employed prisoners. This increase derives, mostly, from the increase in the employment of prisoners in private entrepreneurs' factories.

102. The Prison Service work scheme operates in two major areas: On one hand it focuses on imparting the prisoners with professional skills. For that purpose, professional training courses are held within the prisons by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, granting the graduating prisoners professional diplomas from the ministry. On the other hand, it deals with the employment of prisoners within the prisons.

103. About 500 prisoners are employed in 17 branches of private entrepreneurs' factories within the prisons' industrial zones. The terms of the employment of prisoners are similar, and are set by agreement between the Prison Service and the private entrepreneur. Payment in these factories is determined by the worker's productivity. In addition, approximately 350 prisoners are employed within the prisons in assembling different products. This is easy work, and is performed by prisoners who are not skilled assembly workers, and are thus unable to work in the commercial factories.

104. When approaching the date of his release, the working prisoner joins an individual or a collective rehabilitative program. The prisoners in these programs are employed in factories outside the prison. At this time, about 300 prisoners are employed in such rehabilitative programs.

105. The prisoners employed in the private entrepreneurs' factories receive a fixed salary, slightly lower than the minimum wage. The Prison Service pays prisoners on a set date every month, even when the private entrepreneur has not yet provided the actual pay.

Foreign Workers

106. General. During the last six years, the number of foreign workers employed in Israel, with or without legal permit, has increased considerably. Thus, the employment of foreign workers has gained significance in the realm of labor, employment and welfare in Israel. The recent legislation regarding foreign workers reflects two major aims of the Israeli government: the reduction of the scope of foreign workers employment within the Israeli economy, and providing enforceable legal protection of the rights of foreign workers. While the past legislation used to deal only with the criminal aspect – punishment of those who employ foreign workers or act as agents without an appropriate license, the amendments the Foreign Workers (Unlawful Employment and the Securing of Suitable Conditions) Law, 5751-1991, have introduced three main additional aspects. They are dealing with securing the foreign worker's rights, the imposition of compulsory fees on employers of foreign workers, and the necessity of imposing more severe punishment for violation of the law.

107. Securing Foreign Workers Rights. Although the majority of the rights of foreign workers were already defined in various labor laws prior to the recent amendment, there was a growing necessity to combine them all under specific legislation. The reason was, inter alia, that there were objective difficulties experienced by foreign workers due to their lack of familiarity with the Hebrew language and the standard conditions of work in Israel.

Among the rights which were granted to foreign workers is the requirement for a labor contract detailed in writing in the foreign worker's language, with a translation into Hebrew. An additional improvement is the obligation to provide medical insurance for the worker at the employer's expense, since even though the Employment Service Law has required employers to insure their workers as part of the employment conditions, this was, until now, mainly an administrative arrangement. Finally, the new amendment contains an obligation to provide proper lodging and to ensure the welfare of foreign workers, both at the expense of the employer.

In addition to these rights, employers are obliged to submit, to the payment division of Employment Service, monthly reports regarding the payment of wages for every foreign worker employed. Along with the contract of employment, they are also obliged to keep, at their place of work, a copy of the medical insurance, wage slips and a register of each worker's hours of work and rest.

108. The Necessity to Impose Severe Punishment for Violation of the Law. Fines under the law were raised up to NIS 80,000 and nine new offenses were added, mainly for violation of foreign workers' rights. Another section provides foreign workers with protection against any attempt made by the employer to harm their wages and work conditions due to the workers' complaint regarding deprivation.

The range of liability for violations of the law was also broadened to cover contractors active in this field, those who arrange living conditions, medical insurance, wages, etc.

The supervision authority of the inspectors enforcing the law was also defined and expanded. Under the amended law, inspectors now have the right to seize documents, such as wage slips and registers of work and rest hours, at the place of work if they are needed in order to prove whether the law has been violated.

At the same time, the Employment Service Law, 5719-1959, was amended and the ban on private agencies to exact payment from workers was expanded. Now, a private agency may not receive, collect or charge any payment directly or indirectly from workers, or from anyone acting on their behalf in Israel or abroad.

109. According to data supplied by the Employment Services, the number of permits issued in 2000 to employ foreign workers amounts to 72,445. Estimates of the Central Bureau of Statistics indicate that around 150,000 workers are presently employed in Israel of whom many are illegally employed. Work permits are issued for a limited period of time and apply only to that particular worker. No family members are entitled to accompany him.

110. According to data supplied by the Ministry of Interior the following are the countries of origin of the majority of foreign workers:

Europe	Asia	Africa	South and Central America
Poland Bulgaria Romania Yugoslavia The former	Philippines Thailand India China USSR	Ghana Nigeria	Columbia Bolivia Ecuador Chile Brazil

111. No bilateral agreements regarding issues of foreign workers have been signed between Israel and these countries of origin.

112. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs distributes an informative leaflet in several languages for workers arriving at the airport. The leaflet lists employers' obligations, and informs workers about the existence of a "hot line" for complaints. Additional relevant information is being distributed to foreign workers by NGOs.

113. The law stipulates that employers are obligated to provide foreign workers, at their expense, with medical insurance according to a basket of services which is presently being prepared by the Ministry of Health.

114. A collective agreement was recently drawn up in the building sector between the contractors and the New General Federation of Labor (Histadrut), with a special appendix defining work conditions regarding foreign workers in the building sector.

115. Administrative fines for violation of the law were raised in 1998 from NIS 2,000 to NIS 5,000.

116. Trafficking in Women. See above, under Section 61.

Article 9 – Liberty and Security of Person

Arrest and Detention

117. Notification of Arrest. If a person is arrested, notice must be given promptly to a friend or relative, who can reasonably be located, unless the detainee asks that such notice not be sent. At the request of the arrested person, notice will also be sent to an attorney of his or her choosing, or to one of the defense attorneys appearing on a list drawn up by the Bar Association and presented to the suspect. Furthermore, an arrested person without means is entitled to representation by the Public Defender's Office. An application on his or her behalf shall be sent to the Public Defender's Office by the police as soon as possible. For further details, see section 235 of the Initial Periodic Report.

118. First Judicial Hearing. In nearly all cases, a person who is arrested, other than in the presence of a judge, and whom the officer-in-charge at the police station does not release, with or without bail, must be brought before a judge as soon as possible, and at most within 24 hours of the arrest. If that is not done, the arrested person must be released. The arrested person or his or her representative may immediately file a motion to release him on bail, in which case the judicial hearing may also take place before the 24-hour period has elapsed.

119. At the initial judicial hearing, which usually takes place before a single judge of the Magistrate's Court, the judge must first review the evidence brought by the police to see if there are indeed reasonable grounds to suspect that the detainee in fact committed a crime. The detainee or his counsel may cross-examine the police officer appearing on behalf of the state in this regard. In addition, the court must decide whether or not there exist legitimate grounds to keep the suspect in detention. Detention might be ordered for the following reasons:

120. To ensure the completion of the investigation or judicial proceedings or serving the sentence if there are reasonable grounds to believe that upon release the suspect may interfere with proceedings, flee, conceal property, influence witnesses or harm evidence;

- A. To ensure protection of the public if there are reasonable grounds to believe that the suspect will endanger human safety, public safety or state security;
- B. In exceptional cases, to allow for interrogation procedures which could not be conducted unless the suspect is held in detention".

121. Period of Arrest before Indictment. In the event the court does not release the suspect at the initial hearing, it may order continued detention for a period of up to 15 consecutive days. If at the end of this period, the police still wish to keep the suspect in detention for purposes of the criminal investigation, another hearing is held, and the court's decision is based on the standards noted above. However, the longer the detention, the more weighty the evidence that the suspect actually committed the crime must be, in order to justify extending the remand. The total period of detention based on police requests may not exceed 30 days. However, arrest for the purposes of investigation where only this ground exists may in no case exceed 15 days. Detention may be extended beyond the 30-day period only by a decision of the court upon a special motion signed by the attorney general.

122. Court-Appointed Counsel. Prior to the filing of a charge sheet, Israeli law requires court appointment of legal counsel for a person in detention in cases where he or she is mentally-ill within the purview of the Criminal Procedure [Consolidated Version] Law, 5742-1982, section 15 or the Mentally Ill Treatment Law, 5751-1991, section 18, or where he or she is under sixteen years of age, or when it is necessary to take testimony prior to filing the charge sheet and the detainee is either blind, deaf, dumb or mentally disabled, or when the detainee is suspected of murder or another offense bearing a penalty of ten years or more (Criminal Procedure Law, section 15(a).

In cases where there is no obligation to appoint legal counsel for a detainee, a court may decide at its discretion to appoint counsel if the detainee has insufficient financial means to do so, if the offense involved bears a penalty of at least ten years' imprisonment, if the detainee is blind, deaf, dumb or mentally incapacitated, or if for any other reason the court deems that the detainee is unable to manage his own defense adequately. A detainee without means is entitled to representation by the Public Defender's Office, even without being appointed by the court. For further details on this subject, see article 246 of the Initial Periodic Report.

Arrest and Detention of Armed Forces Personnel

123. Following the enactment of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, the arrest procedures under the Military Justice Law, 5715-1955 had to be amended to better suit the new legal circumstances. The first attempt to amend the Military Justice Law that an IDF soldier can be held in arrest for 96 hours before he is brought before a judge (as opposed to civilians, who, under sections 17 and 29 of the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers – Arrest) must be brought before a judge as soon as possible, and at most within 24 hours of the arrest, or be released). That amendment was struck down by the High Court of Justice, which accepted a petition claiming that the 96 hours arrest-without-trial period is disproportional, and thus inconsistent with Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (H.C 6055/95 Zemach v. Minister of Defense).

124. Consequently, the Military Justice Law 5715-1955 was re-amended, reducing the maximum period a soldier can be held in arrest before he is brought before a judge to 48 hours.

The Lebanese Detainees:

125. The HRC, in its comments on Initial Periodic Report, expressed concern over the administrative detention of persons who did not personally threaten state security, but were kept as “bargaining chips” in order to promote negotiations with other parties on releasing captured Israeli soldiers or the bodies of deceased soldiers.

126. Over the years 1984-1987, a number of Lebanese civilians were arrested and tried in Israeli courts of law. Each was found guilty of crimes against the state and sentenced to prison for a fixed number of years. After the Lebanese prisoners had served their sentences in Israeli prisons, they were not released. Rather, the Minister of Defense ordered that they be held in administrative detention.

127. The prisoners were detained for the purpose of being used as “bargaining chips” for negotiations with Islamic terrorist militia groups believed to be holding, or having information about IDF soldiers missing in action in Lebanon. In 1994, after the president of the district court extended their administrative detention for another six months, a number of Lebanese prisoners submitted an appeal to the Supreme Court, arguing against their use as “bargaining chips”. The Supreme Court, sitting in a panel of three judges, rejected the prisoners' appeal by a vote of 2-1.

Subsequently, the prisoners submitted an application for further hearing, which was accepted. It was decided that the case would be heard by an extended panel of nine judges. On April 12, 2000, the Supreme Court reversed its previous judgment (Criminal Further Hearing 7048/98 Anonymous v. The Minister of Defense). In a 6-3 vote, the court held that the Minister of Defense does not have the authority to place a person in administrative detention when the person does not pose a threat to national security and the sole purpose for his detention is to use him as a “bargaining chip”.

The majority held that due to the significance of protecting human dignity and freedom of the person, the proper balance between civil rights and national security is such that the law must be interpreted in a way that does not give the Minister of Defense the authority to place someone in administrative detention as a “bargaining chip”, and that such an interpretation is also required by International Law. Moreover, the Supreme Court held that the prisoners’ detention would have been unlawful even if the Minister of Defense had the aforementioned authority, since it was not based on sufficient evidence to prove that holding the prisoners in administrative detention would lead to the release of Israeli prisoners of war and soldiers missing in action.

128. Following the aforementioned decision, The High court of Justice dismissed a petition submitted by the family of Ron Arad, an Israeli airman missing in action which argued against the release of the Lebanese prisoners (H.C. 2967/00 Arad v. The Knesset et al.). The Minister of Defense ordered the immediate release and return to Lebanon of the eight Lebanese appellants in the aforementioned C.F.H 7048/98 Anonymous case, along with five other Lebanese prisoners. Prisoners who were found to pose a threat to the security of the State of Israel were not released. Accordingly, the Minister of Defense determined that prisoners Mustafa Dirani and Abed Al-Karim Ubeid, who were directly responsible for the launching of numerous terrorist attacks against the State of Israel and its citizens, pose a direct threat to the security of the state and should not be released. They were remanded to administrative detention, an action which was confirmed by the District Court, and lately reaffirmed in an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Article 10 - Treatment of Persons Deprived of their Liberty

129. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s previous report and no change has occurred in this area since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

Article 11 – Freedom from Imprisonment for Breach of Contractual Obligations

130. As described in detail under sections 308-314 of Israel’s Initial Periodic Report, Amendment no. 15 of the Execution Law (S.Ch. 1479 (5754), p. 284) introduced a new regime regarding investigation of a debtor’s means and, on the whole, severely narrowed the availability of imprisonment orders, in accordance with the supreme court judgement in H.C.J 5304/92 Perah Association v. Minister of Justice et al. (see section 309 of the Initial Periodic Report for further details). Under the amended section 70 of the Execution Law, Prior to issuing an imprisonment order, the Chief Execution Officer must hold a hearing in the presence of the debtor, in which the debtor is examined regarding all assets on the basis of an affidavit filed previously. If the debtor patently refuses to comply with the execution proceedings, for example by refusing to file an affidavit regarding his assets, then the Chief Execution Officer may order his imprisonment. During the investigation of the debtor’s assets, the Chief Execution Officer may order the debtor to pay monthly instalments based on his ability to pay, or, if the debtor requests a long-term schedule and waives secrecy of his financial records, the Officer may declare that the debtor is “limited in means”. Once this status is conferred on the debtor, his or her name is entered into a special register at the Execution Office, and he or she may be restricted from using credit cards or from serving as a manager or director of a limited liability company.

One result of the amendment to the Execution Law, discussed above, was a sharp decline in payments by recalcitrant debtors. Debtors usually chose not to attend the investigation of assets hearing, in order to avoid the risk that the investigation reveals their ability to pay the debt, thus exposing them to the risk of imprisonment.

On 19.4.1999, the Execution Law was amended (Amendment no.19), in order to promote collection of debts while ensuring that debtors are not imprisoned for the inability to pay them, but rather only in cases in which the debtor has the ability pay but refuses to do so. This amendment creates an incentive for the debtors to attend the investigation of means, by allowing the imprisonment of a debtor for refusal to attend the investigation. According to the amendment, within 20 days after receiving the notice of warning – a document opening the execution procedures – the debtors are to report to an execution office of their choice, at the time most convenient for them (within the office opening hours). To ensure that the warning is served to the debtor in a proper manner, the amendment prescribes a special procedure of “full service” – the warning must be served to the debtor or to a relative who resides with him, in an actual service or by registered mail. Only then, the execution officer can file for a warrant of arrest. In addition, the notice of warning was translated to Arabic and to Russian, to guarantee that most debtors are able to read it in their mother tongue.

A debtor who, after receiving the notice of warning, filed an order of payment, attaching the relevant documents, will be exempted from reporting to the execution office.

Article 12 – Freedom of Movement

131. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s previous report and no change has occurred in this area since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

Article 13 – Expulsion of Aliens

132. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s previous report and no change has occurred in this area since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

Article 14 – Right to Fair Trial, Judicial Independence

133. An amendment to the Criminal Procedure (The Right to a Hearing) Law 5742-1982, enacted in 2000, compels the State Attorney’s Office to inform a suspect regarding an intention to press charges against him in all criminal offences aside from misdemeanors.

The suspect has the right to a hearing conducted by a district attorney or any person authorized by the district attorney. In addition, the amended law provides that no formal charges will be pressed against a person suspected of committing a crime who requested to exercise his right to a hearing, before he has been given a reasonable opportunity to have a hearing.

134. The Civil Procedure (The State as a Litigant) (Amendment) (Granting an Injunction and Exercising a Judgement Against the State) Law, 5779-1998 has been amended, and unlike before now makes possible the granting of an injunction against the state. It is also possible for a court to grant such an injunction ex parte in cases where the plaintiff might suffer severe or irreparable damage. Thus, the law further reduces state immunity.

Preliminary Appellate Procedure (Kdam Bagatz)

135. The preliminary appellate procedure is an administrative practice, which enables the public to submit written complaints and demands regarding administrative actions of government agents and agencies. The practice takes place prior to submitting a petition to the High Court of Justice. In many cases the answers given by the government satisfies the person who sent the complaint, thereby making it unnecessary to go to court. This process is administrated by the High Court of Justice Department in the Ministry of Justice, which is responsible for representing the different State agencies in petitions to the court. This practice is intended to assist the public, and also to reduce the extremely large number of cases waiting to be dealt with by the Supreme Court and the Ministry of Justice. The department's attorneys attempt to resolve the public's requests by contacting the appropriate state agencies and conducting a preliminary inquiry. The process is beneficial for all sides involved by saving valuable time, energy and money. Hundreds of complaints are processed in this manner every year.

The Public Defender's Office

136. The Public Defender's Office (PDO), established by legislation in 1995 (for further details, please see section 388 to the Previous Report), has substantially expanded its reach in the course of the last 3 years. The first PDO office was opened in the Tel-Aviv/Central judicial district in June 1996. Gradually, PDO offices were opened in all the remaining four judicial districts – Jerusalem, Be'er-Sheva, Haifa and Nazareth, In addition to the establishment of a National PDO.

In 2000, the PDO has provided legal representation in approximately 25,000 cases, over the 5 judicial districts. The PDO employs about 50 public defenders ("Internal Counsels"). In addition, it employs about 750 private counsels, providing representation on its behalf. Private counsels included in the list of public defense counsels were carefully chosen, and are subject to supervision by the Internal Counsels.

The Defense Counsel Law 5756-1995 entitles minor defendants or detainees to representation by a public defender, without being subject to an inquiry regarding their financial means. In the past, the vast majority of minors defendants tried before the Youth Courts had appeared without counsel. In 1999, Following a thorough research conducted by the Consulting and Legislation Department at the Ministry of Justice, the Minister of Justice has enacted regulations, entitling minors to a public defender, under section 18(c) to the Defense Counsel Law. As a result, special youth departments were established in all districts of the PDO, and at present, most minors charged with criminal offences receive representation from specialized public defenders. The enactment of these regulations has brought about a fundamental change in the realization of minors' rights in criminal procedures.

In 2000, the Minister of Justice, in recognition of the importance of the right to proper legal representation, has expanded the scope of entitlement to representation by the PDO in regulations, endorsed by the Knesset Constitution, Law, and Justice Committee in August 2000. Under the regulations, already applied in the Tel-Aviv-Central, Jerusalem, Be'er Sheva and Nazereth judicial districts, minors and detainees facing criminal charges are entitled to representation by a public counsel. The Ministry of Justice intends to apply the regulations to the Haifa judicial district by 2001, thus completing the application of these regulations, which had started in 1999.

However, Data recently gathered by the PDO, from a sample of close to 2,000 cases litigated in the magistrates' courts of Tel-Aviv, Natania, Acre, Zefat, Ashdod and Hadera, shows the national average rate of defendants appearing without representation to exceed 50%. Many of these defendants are consequently sentenced to substantive periods of incarceration. Thus, it is clear that the efforts to prevent defendants from having to appear before a court without proper representation are not yet fully accomplished. The Ministry of Justice, in conjunction with the PDO, are working to further expand the right to a public counsel, in hope to accomplish more progress in this area during the course of 2001.

Alternative Dispute Resolution

137. The National Center for Mediation and Conflict Resolution was established as an independently functioning Unit of the Ministry of Justice in 1998. The decision to set up the center was taken by the Minister of Justice, with the approval and support of the chief justice of the Supreme Court, the Honorable Aharon Barak.

Mediation and Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), as an alternative methods to litigation and the resolution of disputes by a decision-making body, encourages the parties to a dispute to negotiate with one another and reach an acceptable solution while allowing them maximum control over the process and its results.

The establishment of a National Center for Mediation and Conflict Resolution within the Ministry of Justice is aimed at ensuring that the development of mediation and ADR in Israel is undertaken by a professional, impartial organization, on the basis of objective criteria, international experience and the particular needs of Israeli society. Court systems, public institutions, community organizations, the educational system and the business sector are some of the segments of society to which the center's work is directed.

Article 17 – Freedom from Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home

140. The Protection of Privacy Law, 5741-1981. According to information gathered by the Registration of Private Investigators and Guard Services Department of the Ministry of Justice, in the year 2000 the licenses of seven private investigators who had been convicted, inter alia, of offenses under the Protection of Privacy Law, 5741-1981 were not renewed.

Search and Seizure in Criminal Proceedings

141. Following the enactment of the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers – Physical Search of a Suspect) Law, 5756-1996, Central Command Orders, ensuring rights of the person, were published in 1998 to implement the law, on the following subjects:

- 14.05.01 Internal physical examination of suspect.
- 14.05.02 External physical examination of suspect.
- 14.05.03 Internal and external physical examination of a person who is not a suspect.

Search of a Person's Home

142. The Israel Police Force is authorized to perform a search of private property, including the person's house, by means of a court ordered search warrant when:

- (a) The search is necessary to secure the introduction of an object for the purposes of an investigation, trial or other proceedings;
- (b) There are grounds to believe that stolen property is being held at the particular premises or that an offense has been committed therein or that such place is being used or is planned to be used it for an unlawful purpose.
- (c) There are grounds to believe that an offense has been committed or that an offense is being planned against a person situated on such premises.

Applications for a search warrant are generally heard ex parte.

The police may perform such a search, even without a court order, in the following circumstances:

- (a) A police officer has grounds to believe that a serious crime is being committed on the premises or that a serious crime was recently committed therein;
- (b) Where the occupier of the premises calls for police assistance;

(c) Where the person found on the premises calls for police assistance and there are grounds to believe that an offense is being performed therein;

(d) Where a police officer chases a person evading arrest or escaping from lawful custody.

Electronic Surveillance: Wiretapping and Eavesdropping

143. Eavesdropping by the Israel Police Force. As described in detail in Israel's Initial Periodic Report, there is specific legislation which regulates the issue of Electronic Surveillance. The police submits to the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee of the Knesset an annual report on wiretapping performed by it, specifying the number of permits given to the police by the court, the number of permits given and not implemented, the number of applications for permits refused by the court and the number of telephone lines subject to wiretaps each year.

Furthermore, the police sends the attorney general a monthly report in which it specifies the names of persons subject to wiretapping, the telephone numbers being wiretapped, the duration of the wiretapping and the offenses attributed to the person being wiretapped for which reason the wiretapping was initiated.

144. Scope of Illegal Activity. The Israel Police Force investigated the following offenses against the Secret Monitoring Law 5739-1979 (the Wiretapping Law).

In 1998 – 55 files were opened, 43 of which were closed, two defendants were convicted and nine cases are still in judicial proceedings.

In 1999 – 50 files were opened, 34 of which were closed, and 11 are still in judicial proceedings.

In 2000 (until the end of August) – 31 files were opened, 16 of which were closed and five are still in judicial proceedings.

Protection of Personal Information in Databases

145. The Israel Police Force Districts (not including the Judea and Samaria District) opened the following investigative files on suspicion of offenses under section 8 of the Protection of Privacy Law 5741-1981:

In 1996 – two files were opened – one of these was closed and the other was a conviction.

In 1997 – one file was opened and then closed.

In 1998 – four files were opened – two of them were closed, one of them was a conviction and one is still in judicial proceedings.

In 1999 – three files were opened – two of them were closed and one is still open.

In 2000 (until the end of August) – no files were opened.

Information Regarding Criminal Record

146. The Israel Police Force maintains a database including two types of records – a “crime register” and “police records”. The crime register includes data as specified in section 2 of the Crime Register and Rehabilitation of Offenders Law, 5741-1981 (in this article “the Law”).

Police records include mainly information on pending and closed criminal files.

The police, the Israel Security Agency, the Military Police and the IDF Field Security Department (as a group, the “Agencies”) have direct access to the crime register and may transmit information found therein among themselves.

The police transmit crime information from its records to other Agencies entitled to receive such information under Law, for the purpose of carrying out their functions, at their request and to the extent prescribed by Law. Similarly, the other Agencies may transmit such information within the restrictions prescribed under Law.

The Agencies entitled to receive information from the crime register are also entitled to receive information about pending files.

A competent prosecutor, the Agencies, warrant officers and scientific investigators may also receive the records on closed files.

Records of files closed with a finding of no guilt are removed from the police records and no longer appear in the name of the person to whom the entry related.

A person against whom there is an entry of a file which was closed for lack of evidence or for lack of public interest may apply to the head of the Investigations Department at the National Police Headquarters to remove the record.

A decision of the head of the Investigations Department shall be reached by taking into account the following:

- The substance and circumstances of the offense;
- The time which has elapsed since the incident involved in the record,
- The number of and quality of the complaints recorded against the accused;
- The personal circumstances of the accused.

The Law prescribes statutory prescription periods at the end of which a criminal conviction lapses. Some of the Agencies entitled to receive criminal information may not be able to receive information about such conviction. The prescription (limitation) period varies according to the severity of the penalty.

The Law also prescribes provisions on “deletion” of convictions. When the conviction is erased, information about such conviction may be transmitted to a limited number of agencies, as specified in section 16 of the Law.

As a general rule, a conviction is regarded as a deleted conviction ten years after the termination of the prescription period.

In certain circumstances, such as on the conviction of a minor for a misdemeanor, the deletion periods are shorter.

As a general rule, a person whose conviction has been “deleted” shall be deemed, for the purposes of any law, to have not been convicted and he is not bound to respond to questions concerning the said conviction. Any evidence disclosing the fact of conviction which was deleted from the register, as stated, is not admissible in a court proceeding nor before a public employee or employee of a public entity, unless it was knowingly disclosed by the person whose conviction was deleted. Officials may receive information on a deleted conviction and they may, obviously, take it into account for the purpose of fulfilling their functions.

Unlawful Attacks on Honor or Reputation

147. On November 5, 1998, the Prevention of Defamation Law 5725-1965 was amended, providing that courts may, in certain circumstances, order the payment of compensation in the amounts fixed in the law for defamation, even without proof of damage.

149. Protection of Genetic Data. The Genetic Information Law 5760-2000 was recently enacted. This law was designed to protect the right to privacy of genetic information. It includes provisions as to the confidentiality of data gathered by means of genetic examinations, prohibits, under certain conditions, discrimination in employment and in insurance as a result of genetic data; and includes specific provisions as to the use of genetic data for crime solving and in the identification of corpses.

150. The Right to a Dignified Death. On May 1, 2000, The Minister of Health appointed a committee, headed by Prof. Avraham Steinberg of the Sha'arey Tzedek Medical Center in Jerusalem, to advise him on legislation which will provide an answer to the medical-ethical dilemma presented by the treatment of terminally-ill patients (the "Public Committee"). The Public Committee was appointed following an intensifying public debate on the issue of the right to die with dignity, together with several decisions given by the district courts and the Supreme Court, and legislation proposed by certain individuals. The general public in Israel has demonstrated great interest in this subject, which has medical, cultural, emotional, religious, moral and legal consequences, and is not within the Israeli consensus. The Public Committee consists of four sub-committees – Professional, Philosophical, Legal and Religious – and its recommendations to the Minister of Health are due within the year 2001.

Community Housing for People with Disabilities

151. One of the most severe wrongs against people with disabilities in Israel is the clear preference for institutional frameworks as opposed to the state providing them with special adequate housing within the community. This is the case particularly for developmentally disabled and mentally ill people. Thousands of people with disabilities in Israel live in crowded institutions, under relatively poor conditions. It has been argued that the present position is inconsistent with the principle of equality established by the case law of the High Court of Justice, and which is now incorporated in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

152. Leading professionals in this field have already determined that the quality of life and development of people with disabilities at all levels improves when they live in special housing within the community, in their natural environment. The situation in Israel stands in contrast to this:

- (1) Out of 7,400 developmentally disabled people living outside their homes, approximately 6,000 of them live in 53 institutions. New institutions are continually being constructed. Families and associations wishing to exercise the right of mentally retarded people to live in special community housing are curbed by the authorities for budgetary reasons. Institutional housing account for the lion's share of the budget allocated to housing for people with disabilities.

- (2) 6,700 mentally ill people live in psychiatric hospitals. It is estimated that many of these people remain in such institutions because of lack of adequate special community housing frameworks.
- (3) In March 1999, a Public Committee submitted a report on the condition of mentally ill holocaust survivors living in psychiatric hospitals in Israel. The findings were particularly grave.
- (4) The general phenomenon of institutionalization also includes scores of people with physical disabilities living in institutions and even in hospitals.

153. In the face of the present reality, recent legislation enshrines the right of people with disabilities to live in their natural community. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Bill, 5760-2000 includes a chapter in relation to housing. Of the central provisions of the Bill in this area are those establishing the right of people with disabilities to live in the community and the obligation of the state to make this right a practical reality by the provision of personal assistance services.

154. A recent amendment to the Welfare (Treatment of Persons with Mental Disabilities) Law, 5729-1969 regarding the obligation of the state to allocate resources for housing frameworks and day frameworks for persons with mental disabilities, provides that when determining the type of housing framework, the assessment committee will give priority to community housing.

155. On July 5, 2000, the Rehabilitation of Mentally Ill People in the Community Law, 5760-2000 was enacted, establishing the right of a mentally-ill persons to a basket of community rehabilitation services in a number of areas, including housing, employment, completion of education, leisure and recreation.

For further information regarding the rights of people with disabilities, see article 26 below.

Demolition of Illegal Dwellings in Jerusalem

156. In its comments on the Initial Periodic Report, the HRC expressed concern over the practice of demolition of illegally constructed houses in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem.

157. Historical Background. In the face of 3,000 years of history, it is noteworthy that the concept of East Jerusalem derives solely from the 19-year period between 1948 and 1967, when Jerusalem was a divided city.

From 1948 to 1967, under Jordanian occupation, the eastern part of Jerusalem was relatively underdeveloped. The western part of Jerusalem, on the other hand, was a modern capital city, whose neighborhoods had developed since 1914 according to urban plans based on the city's special topography. Thus, in 1967, on the reunification of Jerusalem, significant gaps existed between its eastern and western parts.

The villages in East Jerusalem did not develop through urban planning, but as expansion of family settlements. Furthermore, the tendency was for small parcels of land to be owned by a variety of private landlords. Since land registration of the area was not systematic or up-to-date, ownership rights in many cases are unclear, and there are many instances of more than one claim to ownership to the same piece of property. Urban planning is based on land ownership. This requires re-designing and updating of the registration system relevant to the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem, prior to the preparation of final urban plans, as well as resolution of some of the conflicting claims. This is a process that also involves extensive surveying, and it is as yet incomplete.

In 1967, residents of East Jerusalem used wells to obtain water. Reunification of the city has necessitated the unification of the infrastructure, and today effective water and sewage systems are in place. Jerusalem's own water supply is only sufficient for 15-20,000 people. Infrastructure has to be planned further prior to any construction, and cannot be developed in response to building by individuals.

158. Demographic Factors. Natural increase in the Arab population has always exceeded that of the Jewish population. In 1967, the city's population consisted of 197,000 Jews (74.2%) and 68,000 Arabs (25.8%). In 1999, 429,000 Jews made up 69% of the population, while 193,000 Arabs made up the remaining 31%. Current plans are for 15,000 new housing units in the Arab sector and 35,000 in the Jewish sector. Approximately proportional to the Arab percentage in the overall population.

159. Cultural Characteristics. The Arab tradition of building detached homes for the extended family on privately owned land is very land intensive in comparison to the apartment blocks which dominate the Jewish neighborhoods. In the Arab sector there are on average 11 people in 1.9 housing units per dunam (approximately 0.25 acre) while in the Jewish sector there are 19 people per dunam, in 5.9 units. Moreover, much of the public building in West Jerusalem is financed by donations from the Jewish Diaspora whereas public buildings in the eastern part of the city are financed only by the Municipality of Jerusalem and the Israeli government.

160. Development of Infrastructure and Services. City-center services, such as shopping centers and arterial roads, benefit residents from all parts of the city. Other services are locally based.

Recognizing that the future of Jerusalem as a united city depends to a large extent on the provision of municipal services on an equal basis for all sectors of the population, the Jerusalem Municipality has given priority to a development program for East Jerusalem, in conjunction with the Government of Israel. The total sum required in order to close the gap between the two parts of the city is estimated at NIS520 million (approximately 130 million $US).

In Jerusalem, the policy is to plan development in cooperation with residents of Arab neighborhoods. For example, in the Arab village of Tsur Baher, 400 units are to be built on government land and will be marketed by an Arab association. The area has been re-zoned in order to allow for more intensive construction.

At A-Sawaneh, a camp of homeless people was set up on land belonging to the Muslim Wakf, where a school for special education was planned. The Wakf allocated the land for the school, which was later built by the municipality, and is to be named after the late King Hussein of Jordan.

161. Applications for Building Permits. Informative leaflets, available both in Hebrew and in Arabic, give details as to the procedure required for applying for building permits. The same information is published on the municipality's Hebrew and Arabic web sites.

162. All building plans are equally subject to approval by the District Committee for Planning and Building, a governmental body.

163. The rate of application for building permits corresponds approximately to the proportions of the population. In the first half of 1999, 195 applications, which make 20% of the total number of applications, were received from residents of East Jerusalem. Of the 195 applications, 116 (60%) were granted. West Jerusalem residents submitted 791 applications, of which 553 (67%) were granted. Due to the application fee involved, many applications are not followed up – the applicants preferring to risk the fine, which might be imposed if the case is taken to court.

164. Illegal Construction. In West Jerusalem, building violations almost invariably consist of additions to a legal building, such as the addition of a room in courtyard or an attic within a roof space. In East Jerusalem, violations typically take the form of entire buildings constructed without a permit. Thus, demolitions in East Jerusalem are far more dramatic than in the western part of the city.

165. Demolitions. The policy of the Jerusalem Municipality is to issue demolition orders where buildings interfere with plans for public facilities such as schools or roads, where they pose a safety threat to their inhabitants, or where they interfere with the city's historical heritage. The Ministry of Interior also has the authority to demolish buildings, autonomous from the one given to the Municipality of Jerusalem, and a small number of demolitions initiated by the ministry take place every year. It should be noted that in both cases, demolition is never arbitrary. It takes place in accordance with due process and the rule of law, and allowing for the holding of a fair hearing, and the ability to appeal to the courts of law.

Article 18 – Freedom of Religion and Conscience

Religious Institutions

166. Jewish Religious Councils. As discussed in detail under sections 468-470 to the Previous Report, the state confers certain powers, at the local level, on Jewish Religious Councils, which are organized by law and funded in part by the State. Traditionally, the Religious Councils were comprised exclusively of Orthodox-Jewish representatives. On 1998, The High Court of Justice has ordered the appointment of non-Orthodox representatives on the religious councils of Jerusalem, Tel-Aviv, Haifa, Kiryat Tiv'on and Arad Municipalities (H.C.J.4727/97 Meretz Party in Jerusalem Municipality, et al. v. The Minister of Religious Affairs, P.D. 52(5) 241). However, the implementation of the court order is still pending.

Burial

167. Alternative Civil Burial. The access to alternative civil burial has been improved greatly since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report, following the enactment of the Right to Alternative Civil Burial Law, 5756-1996 (described under section 489 to Israel's Previous Report). On April 1999, the first alternative cemetery for Jews was opened in the city of Beer-Sheva (in the south of Israel), in accordance with the Right to Alternative Civil Burial Law. At the time of writing this report, other alternative cemeteries are not yet operational, but additional licenses for alternative burial services have been granted in Jerusalem and in Haifa.

168. Headstone Inscriptions. The right of engraving of Gregorian dates and Latin Letters, in addition to Hebrew ones, on headstones in Jewish cemeteries was established and then reinforced in various judicial decisions. Following the enactment of the Right to Alternative Civil Burial Law, The Orthodox Burial Society ("Chevra Kadisha") in Rishon L'zion refused to continue to allow the engraving of Latin letters and Gregorian dates on headstones, claiming that the existence of alternative civil burial cemeteries has alleviated the need to allow non-Hebrew headstone inscriptions in Jewish cemeteries. The Chevra Kadisha's decision was challenged in an appeal to the Supreme Court. In a 2-1 vote, the Court accepted the petition (C.A 6024/97 Shavit v. Chevra Kadisha Rishon L'Zion).

169. Equality in Funding. On April 2000, The High Court of Justice has accepted a petition against the Minister of Religious Affairs, regarding inequality in the allocation of funds for Jewish and Arab Cemeteries. The High Court of Justice, stressing the importance of the principle of equality in the allocation of state funds, has ordered the Ministry of Religious Affairs to rearrange its cemetery budget, so that the Arab sector receives its fair share (H.C.J. 1113/99 Adalah, et al. v. The Minister of Religious Affairs). At the time of writing this report, the Court's decision has not yet been carried out.

Article 19 – Freedom of Opinion and Expression

170. Political Expression. In H.C. 6396/96, Zakin v. The Mayor of Be'er Sheva, P.D. 53(3) 289, the High Court of Justice has held that freedom of political expression is entitled to the highest degree of protection, both because it is of major social importance, constituting the foundation of the democratic government, and because it is exposed, more than any other form of speech, to abuse by the government. Thus, it was held that a municipal regulation should be interpreted in accordance with the right to political expression, therefore permitting the hanging of political banners on private buildings without obtaining a special license from the mayor.

Broadcast Media

171. Whereas the Israel Broadcast Authority is funded by a license fee on all television owners and a tax on car owners in addition to sale of commercial broadcast-time, the new second television channel and local radio stations established under the Second Television and Radio Broadcast Authority Law, 5750-1990, are operated by private franchisees and funded through sale of commercial broadcast-time alone.

172. In 1994, the Second Authority for Television and Radio began to issue franchises for local radio stations around the country. By 1996, 14 privately-owned local radio stations were operating, under government supervision. In 2000, the Second Authority for Television and Radio published a tender in search of prospective franchisers for the operation of an additional commercial channel (the "Third Television Channel").

173. In recognition of the power given to the franchisees and the risks of concentrating ownership of the media in the hands of a small number of dominant economic enterprises with vested economic or political interests, the law places a series of restrictions on the franchisees of the second television channel, detailed under article 19 of the Initial Periodic Report. In a similar manner, no company may hold a franchise to broadcast on the forthcoming Third Television Channel if it also holds a franchise for cable or satellite broadcasts (section 40(B)(1) of the Second Television and Radio Broadcast Authority Law, 5750-1990).

174. Freedom of Information

The 1998 enactment of the Freedom of Information Law 5758-1998 has given a solid legislative basis to the public's right of access to information. The law prescribes a procedure for submitting requests and their handling and imposes several duties on the public authorities. These duties include, inter alia, the publication of periodic informative reports, and the appointment – from among the employees of each authority – of a Commissioner to be in charge of making information available to the public, of handling requests for information and of implementing the provisions of this law.

The main innovation of the law is in recognizing the right of an Israeli citizen or resident to receive information from public authorities, regardless of whether he or she has any personal interest in it, and without having to state a reason for the request. Moreover, section 12 applies the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law to persons who are not citizens or residents of the State of Israel, regarding information concerning their rights in Israel.

Similar to other such laws around the world, the right of access to information is not unlimited. Section 9 of the law lists several categories of information which must not or which does not have to be delivered. In addition, section 14 prescribes that the provisions of the law shall not apply to certain security agencies and the information produced, gathered, or held by them. In addition, there are several circumstances listed under section 8, in which a public authority may reject a request for information.

If a request for information under the law is rejected, the applicant or a third party may, under section 17, submit a petition to the District Court (or, in exceptional cases, to the Supreme Court). Notwithstanding the provisions of section 9, the Court may order that all or part of the requested information be given on conditions which it shall prescribe, if it is satisfied that the public interest in the information's disclosure is greater than the reasons for rejecting the request, on condition that disclosure of the information is not prohibited by an enactment.

Article 20 – Prohibition of Hate Propaganda

175. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous report and no change has occurred in this area since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

Article 21 – Freedom of Assembly

176. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous report and no change has occurred in this area since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

Article 22 – Freedom of Association

177. Forming Trade Unions and joining them. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, the legal protection of the right to organize trade unions has been boosted by some important judicial decisions.

In the case of Mifealey Tahanot v. Israel Yaniv (46/3-209 National Labor Court, November 1996) the court annulled the dismissal of two workers after finding that the real ground for dismissal was their initiative to organize a workers committee. In this case the company had no previous workers organization and the two employees had clear intentions of initiating collective bargaining with the employer. This landmark case was important in two respects. First, it laid down two alternative legal grounds for the recognition of the right to organize as a basic right: a) the right derives from the concept of human dignity entrenched in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty and b) the right derives from the general right to equality, namely the prohibition to discriminate against workers on irrelevant grounds, such as involvement in organizational activities. This issue was developed in the Delek case discussed below. Second, regarding which remedy is available in case of a breach of this right, the court recognized its competence to issue a reinstatement order. This was seen as an important initiative. In Israeli case law, reinstatement at work is generally limited to dismissals in contradiction with a collective agreement, where a specific legal provision exists, and within the public service where norms of administrative law apply in addition to private contract law. This remedy had previously been ruled out by the High Court of Justice in private labor contract relations, in light of a provision in a contract law according to which a court should not order the enforcement of a personal contract. The novelty of the Mifealey Tahanot case lies in considering a breach of a basic right as a legal ground allowing the enforcement of a private labor contract.

This ruling was recently clearly reinforced in the Horn & Leibivitz Transport Co. v. The Histadrut case (99/323 National Labor Court, July 2000). A bus transport company dismissed a group of drivers who tried to organize themselves in a union, just after the New General Federation of Labor (Histadrut) had expressed its willingness to recognize it under its federation. (For further information regarding the Histadrut, see paragraph 566 to the Initial Periodic Report.) The regional labor court issued a temporary reinstatement order, until end of proceedings. The company appealed to the National Labor Court, which upheld the decision. The courts' rulings at both instances relied on prior decisions, which had recognized the right to organize in labor unions as a basic human right. Here again, the remedy of reinstatement was declared the most effective one in order to protect this right, since an employer might not be deterred by the threat of compensation alone when deciding how to respond to his employees' organizational activities.

Interestingly, the company then reacted by firing about a hundred more drivers, arguing that it had to close a whole department. The Histadrut then threatened to appeal to the court in a contempt of court proceeding. The conflict ended by the parties signing a collective agreement.

In the case of Delek The Israeli Petrol Company v. The Histadrut (98/4-10 National Labor Court), the court extended the consideration of the legal basis for the recognition of the right to organize, introduced in the Mifealey Tahanot case mentioned above. The court ruled in favor of protection of the workers' right to organize. It stated that –

“... the right to organize protects the worker's dignity at the place of work, where he usually spends a third of his day. The individual worker has less power than the employer, and in most cases he is unable to conduct fair negotiations. Joining a workers' union bolsters the worker's strength and provides a balance in his negotiations with the employer... in many cases the individual worker's dignity will only be secured by joining a group of workers, i.e., a workers union”

The court also analyzed the right to organize as “a two-dimensional right, realized in the actions of both the group and the individual”.

Finally, the court further developed the legal construction of the right to organize on the basis of the non-discrimination principle. The question arose in this case in light of the fact that the Delek company chose to dismiss, in the context of legitimate economic dismissal and in accordance with the collective agreement in force, mostly members of the representative labor organization at the place of work. Only a few employees who were not members of the said organization were dismissed. The court ruled that consideration by the employer of union membership, when deciding upon economic dismissals, equated to unjustified discrimination between workers.

178. The Right to Form of a Trade Union. Since submission of Israel's Initial and Initial Periodic Report, the right to form a trade union was further qualified in the landmark decision of Tadiran Keshet Inc. et al. v. The Histadrut (97/41-96 National Labor Court, February 1998). During the life of a collective agreement Tadiran, an Israeli company, underwent a structural change, dividing itself into three sub-companies. The question arose what should the bargaining unit be. The workers wanted it to be a single one while Tadiran wanted to conduct three distinct bargaining units. A strike broke on this ground, and the Tadiran filed a motion for a temporary injunction ordering the workers back to work.

The court denied the motion. Labor Court President Adler looked for a proper balance between the basic right of employees to organize and to chose their organization, and the employer's basic right to property entrenched in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The employer's prerogative to manage his business was, in this case, countered by the workers' basic rights. The court said:

“When balancing between the workers’ right to organize and the employer’s right to manage his business, a special weight should be given to the workers’ right because their fate is embedded in the rights that are to be entrenched in the collective agreements applying to them. The employer’s right to be part of a change in the bargaining unit is a relative one and is subordinate to the condition that it is not intended to impair organizational rights of workers.... The employer and the labor union have therefore to agree on the structure of bargaining appropriate for them. In a democratic society there is great importance in granting dignity and liberty to each worker. An expression of this is a worker’s power to participate in the determination of the bargaining unit to which they belong This includes the power to influence changes in the bargaining unit, by way of negotiations between the labor organization who represents the workers and the employer who provides them with work.”

The court decided that until an agreement was reached on the determination of the bargaining unit, the regular rules regarding industrial conflicts would apply, and the workers’ right to strike was upheld.

179. Number and Structure of Trade Unions in Israel. No notable change in the structure of labor movements in Israel has occurred since the submission of Israel’s previous report. The Histadrut remains the largest and most representative workers’ organization in Israel, and still refrains from disclosing exact numbers on membership.

180. For further information regarding the status of trade unions in Israel, please see this report regarding the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

181. The Right to Strike. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report a significant decision was handed down in the case of Mekorot Inc. v. The Histadrut (99/19 National Labor Court, August 1999). Mekorot Inc. is a government corporation, responsible for the supply of water to most Israelis. The right of its workers to strike was contested in this case by the public employer on the ground that such strike would impair its ability to provide vital services. The court granted only a limited injunction against the strikers. It held that the right to strike is a relative one, which must be balanced against conflicting rights. Therefore the injunction was construed in a way that left some room for a strike but not at the price of leaving people with no water. It did permit the workers to work only within the limited scope normally in usage during the Sabbath and holidays. It also urged the parties to get back to negotiations and instructed them to report to the court within four days.

182. Restrictions Placed on the Right to Strike. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report an important decision was handed down, qualifying the implication of the classification a strike as “unprotected”. An unprotected strike will usually result in a court injunction ordering returning to work. Nevertheless, this was not so in the case of The Tel Aviv-Jaffa Workers’ Organization v. The Tel Aviv-Jaffa Municipality (97/41-92 National Labor Court, February 1998). Even though the strike in this case was held without respecting the normal “cooling-off” period requirement, the court “protected” it. In the midst of collective negotiations the municipality had tried to bypass the workers’ union by hiring a private contractor to provide services normally provided by the municipality’s employees. The court considered this kind of privatization as a unilateral act by the employer, especially threatening both the individual workers and the workers’ organization at the place of work. The court therefore used its discretion not to grant the injunction. It should be mentioned that one of the judges in the panel issued a dissenting opinion, not refuting the court’s power to use discretion but arguing that the circumstances did not justify such an exceptional step.

183. Statistics on Strikes in Israel

Article 23 – Protection of the Family

Measures of Protection

184. Social Insurance and Entitlements. As reported in the Initial Periodic Report, all families residing legally in Israel, regardless of income, are entitled to a “child allowance”, a monthly grant which increases with the number of children in the family. In January 2001, a family with one child received NIS171 a month (approximately $US43); a family with two children received NIS343; with three children - NIS 685; four children - NIS1,379; and five children - NIS2,235 per month. In 1999, 891,500 families received child allowances, amounting to 19% of the total benefits paid by the National Insurance Institution (NII). In 2000, 912,481 families received child allowances, amounting to 17.6% of the total benefits paid by the NII.

185. Until 1997, the NII followed a policy of setting off child allowances against any income tax debts of the parents. This policy had a disproportionate effect on poorer families. In 1997, the NII Regulations in this regard were amended and the provision under which the set-of policy was operated was nullified.

186. The NII is also responsible for the payment of income support benefits. In May 2000, the NII paid income support benefits to approximately 127,131 families which did not earn the minimum level of income as determined by the Income Support Law, 5740-1980, and which were not covered by other income maintenance programs. In November 2000, the NII paid income support benefits to approximately 132,448 such families.

Maternity and Paternity Assistance

187. As of April 2000, women who are unable to work due to a high-risk pregnancy receive the equivalent of their salary from the NII, up to 100 % of the average wage.

188. The “maternity grant” given to the mother immediately upon birth of her baby or to the adoptive parents, to help cover some of the initial costs of preparing their home for the baby, is currently equivalent to NIS1,269 (slightly over US$300) .

189. From the third child on, families receive an additional “birth allowance” for twenty months. The allowance is equal to a certain percentage of the average monthly wage, and decreases with time.

190. Presently, maternity grant is given only to women who give birth in a recognized medical facility. This legal situation is problematic especially to Bedouin women, who occasionally give birth outside these medical institutions. Several draft laws seek to extend the range of maternity grant receivers to include women who give birth not in an official medical institution. These draft laws are still in the primary stages of enactment. Another draft law in its primary stages seeks to prohibit the dismissal of a worker undergoing in-vitro fertility treatments (IVF).

New Reproductive Technologies

191. In 1996, the birth rate in Israel was 2.9 (2.6 among the Jewish population, 4.6 among Muslims population, 2.6 among Christians, and 3.4 among the Druze). There has been a decrease in birth rate, most notably among Muslim women.

192. Between the years 1985-1995, there was almost a hundred per cent increase in the amount of births by single women. It is also noted that there has hardly been any change in the total amount of births by women under the age of 24.

193. Fertility Treatments. In 1996, 12,345 cycles of IVF treatment were performed, resulting in 1,950 live births (15.8 per cent). Births resulting from IVF treatments constitute 2.1 per cent of all live births in Israel.

194. The Halperin Committee. At this time, ovule donation is only permitted under Israeli law in the case of a self-donation from a woman undergoing IVF treatment. Following an ongoing public debate on the subject, the Minister of Health decided, on February 29, 2000, to establish a public committee, headed by Dr. Michael Halperin, to examine the social, ethical, religious and legal aspects of ovules donation. The committee is looking, inter alia, at the legitimacy of ovule donation by a woman other than the one undergoing the IVF treatment, and the appropriate supervision and registration procedures of such process. The committee shall look into the need for legislation to regulate the rights and duties of all parties involved in such IVF process, including the resulting children, and will submit its recommendations as to any related subject it finds relevant. (More information about the actions of the committee can be attained from the Israeli Ministry of Health web site – www.health.gov.il).

195. Surrogate Motherhood. As of October 2000, 78 surrogacy agreements were approved, resulting with the birth of 26 children in 19 child births (due to the prevalence of twins). Two other surrogate mothers are currently pregnant. Twenty-five couples whose agreements had been approved terminated the process midway, or completed the surrogacy process but without getting pregnant. Two of the prospective parents gave birth to children unaided by a surrogate after the approval of their surrogacy agreements.

Family Violence

196. In recent years there have been significant changes in dealing with family violence, particularly with respect to the deployment of the Israel Police Force. There has been an emphasis regarding victims of the crime. In view of recognition of the basic characteristics of these offenses, such as the need for an immediate response in order to prevent the danger, the need to evaluate the risks at each stage of police handling, the need to exhaust police procedures, including preventing access to weapons, the basic need for cooperation with treatment agencies in the community, and more, it was decided to set up a separate investigation system within the police force, for the area of violence offenses between spouses. The objectives of setting up the system are the following: focusing responsibility, professionalism in the police response, and a link with community treatment agencies.

The family violence system began to operate at the beginning of 1999. 170 special investigators were allocated to this special system. These investigators underwent a special five-day training program which included the legal, investigative, social and emotional aspects of the issue.

We should note that out of the 170 special investigators, 120 investigators are engaged in this task (including nine in the Arab sector) and 50 more investigators are engaged in such investigations, in addition to their regular duties, so as to ensure that at each police station there are at least two investigators in this function.

Marriage

197. In its comments on Israel's Initial Periodic Report, the HRC recommended that international standards for the age of majority in its current review of the minimum marriageable age for men and women.

By the time of the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, women were able to consent to marry without their parent's or guardian's permission from the age of seventeen, whereas there was no minimum age for males to consent to marry. The Marriage Age Law, 1950, was amended in 1998, and in accordance with the amendment, the rules applying to female youngsters now apply equally to males. However, the minimum marriageable age for both men and women remain 17.

Section 5 of the Marriage Age Law, 1950, provided for two alternative grounds for judicial permission of under-age marriage. The amendment in 1998 added a third ground which permits a young male to marry, if the woman he wants to marry became pregnant or gave birth to his child.

Article 24 - Protection of Children

198. General. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, Israeli State agencies and society have remained constant in their efforts in the protection of children. The State of Israel recently submitted its initial report under the International Covenant on the Rights of the Child. This comprehensive survey of the rights of children in Israel is provided as an appendix to this report.

Welfare Services maintain

199. The recently enacted the Rights of Children at Risk to Services Law seeks to establish the entitlement of children, classified as children at risk, to receive certain services, and the government's duty to provide those services. The scope of services the child and his family shall be entitled to will be determined according to the degree of risk the child faces. According to this law, committees in the local authorities will be responsible to ascertaining the child's risk level (i.e., the degree of services the child is entitled to) and to the forming of the treatment plan for the child and the family. This innovating law is establishing, for the first time, the child's right to receive the services rather than the state's duty to supply them to him. On one hand, it provides a definition of the risk levels. On the other hand, it imposes a duty on the local authorities to provide services according to risk level, regardless of the budget concerns of the local authority, or of the Ministry of Labor and Social affairs. However, the law limits the period during which the child is entitled to the benefits to one year in order to ensure a close watch over the status of the child and his family, and of the success of the intervention program prepared for them. The law also requires that the child be given a right of hearing during the discussions and that the child and his family will be able to participate in the preparing of the treatment plan. In addition, it gives precedence to services which allow the child to remain with his family.

200. Welfare Services in the Criminal Process. The Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs also bears primary responsibility for handling cases of juvenile delinquency, investigating allegations of child abuse and neglect not involving the family, and investigating minors under 14 years of age who are suspected, by the children's investigators of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, of being victims and witnesses of offenses of prostitution and indecency, sex-related crimes and offenses of endangering life and health, or violence by a parent against his child. The law was recently expanded to additionally include offenses against the person under Chapter 10 of the Penal Law, 5737-1977, and offenses of endangering life and health and violence of any responsible person as defined in section 368A of the Penal Law against a minor for whom he is responsible. This expansion to the law came into force on January 1, 2001, although bills have been introduced into the legislative process to reduce the effect of this expansion.

201. In each case involving a juvenile criminal defendant, a case officer at the Juvenile Probation Service within the Ministry prepares a pre-trial report on the defendant's behavior, physical and mental health, and potential for rehabilitation, as well as post-trial sentencing and treatment recommendations.

202. In the past year, the police defined the function of an officer/prevention worker at each police station, whose function is to be employed in the area of prevention of offenses among minors. In the large part, these workers have an academic background in social sciences and/or behavioral sciences and some of them are longstanding juvenile workers. Furthermore, many additional positions have been allocated to the juvenile units, most of which are already manned, so that by the end of the year 2000 the juvenile system would have doubled in size compared to 1997.

Child Abuse

203. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, several laws relevant to the issue of child abuse have been enacted: The Law of Evidence Revision (Protection of Children) (Amendment No. 6) Law, 5760-1999, which came into force on June 9, 2000, and provided, inter alia, that investigations regarding children under this law by child investigators of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, would be recorded on video. An additional law recently enacted is the Law of Evidence Revision (Protection of Children) (Amendment No. 7) (Definition of Parent) Law, 5760-2000, which expanded on the definition of parent to allow the court to order that the testimony of a witness against his parent, in a sex-related crime, shall be heard not in the presence of the accused parent, so that it will also include a partner of a parent, a common law spouse of the parent, an adoptive parent and a guardian.

204. Sexual Abuse. A 1998 amendment to the Penal Law abolished the distinction between male and female minors as for the age of consent regarding the offences of sodomy and consensual illegal intercourse, setting it at the age of 14-16 for both genders. In addition, the amended law set a minimum penalty for severe sex offences – at least one-fourth of the maximum penalty for the offence, except in the rare cases where the court uses its discretion to reduce the sentence.

205. Child Prostitution. Amendments to the Penal Law from 1998 made the advertisement of prostitution services given by minors (section 205a) a criminal offence, even if the provider of the service was not actually a minor (section 205b). It was additionally made illegal to use minors in pornographic advertisements (sections 214b-214b(3)).

206. A proposed amendment to the Penal Law seeks to curb the possibility of sexual abuse of children and broaden the scope of the legal protection of children. The proposal suggests to apply the extraterritorial principal on prostitution offences against minors. It also suggests to add restrictions to the double-jeopardy principal as to prostitution and pornography offences against minors so as to make it possible to try offenders in Israel even though the act is not a criminal offence in the country in which it was performed.

Protection of Children in Legal Proceedings

207. In the Law of Evidence Revision (Protection of Children) (Amendment No. 6) Law, 5760-1999 the title “youth investigator” was amended to “child investigator”. In the same amendment, the prohibitions on publication were expanded and the penalty for publication of a prohibited publication was made more severe, up to three years imprisonment and a fine currently standing at 150,000 NIS. Furthermore, it was expressly provided that the hearing would be held in camera, unless the court orders otherwise.

208. The recently established inter-ministerial Committee on the Status of Criminal Offences Victims has established a sub-committee, tasked with proposing a plan of action for the treatment of minors who were victims of sex offences.

209. The National Council for the Rights of the Child is setting up a project for the accompaniment and support of minor victims and witnesses during the criminal procedures of sex offences. The projects provide the minor and his or her family with the assistance of a lawyer or counselor, whose main part is providing information to the minor and preparing him or her to the forthcoming legal proceedings. The council also strives to promote changes in legislation and policy to further strengthen the status of the victim within the criminal proceedings.

Other Measures of Protection

210. The Penal Law (Amendment No. 52), 5758-1998. This law, inter alia, expands and tightens the penalty for use of an image and body of a minor for the purpose of advertising and presentation of indecent material, so that one publishing indecent material with an image of a child, including imaging and drawing, is liable to a penalty of five years imprisonment. The use of a minor for indecent publication or indecent presentation is punishable by seven years imprisonment, and if it was done by a person responsible for the minor or with his consent, ten years imprisonment. Anyone a person possessing such publication, not incidentally and in good faith, is liable to one-year imprisonment.

Education

211. In 1999, The Knesset passed legislation which lowers the age for free, compulsory education to ages 3-4 (instead of age 5, as was previously mandated). This law is being gradually implemented throughout the country. For younger children, an extensive system of early childhood and day care centers, with means-tested discounts, is available, and the cost is subsidized by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs.

Pupils Rights Law, 5761-2000

212. The newly enacted Pupils Rights Law 5761-2000 (hereinafter: "the Pupils Rights Law") is intended to establish principles for the rights of pupils in the spirit of human dignity and the principles of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, while preserving the uniqueness of the various educational institutions as defined in the Compulsory Education Law, 5709-1949, the State Education Law, 5713-1953, the Special Education Law, 5748-1988, and any other law.

Under section 3 of the Pupils Rights Law, every child and adolescent in the State of Israel is entitled to an education in accordance with the provisions of every law.

213. Prohibition of Discrimination. Under section 5(a) of the Pupils Rights Law, a district education authority, educational institution, or a person acting on their behalf, shall not discriminate against a pupil for sectarian reasons, for socio-economic reasons, or by reason of political orientation, whether of the child or of his parents, in any of the following:

- (1) Registration of a pupil, or his admission to or expulsion from an educational institution;
- (2) The establishing of separate educational curricula or advancement tracks in the same educational institution;
- (3) The establishing of separate classes in the same educational institution;
- (4) Rights and obligations of pupils, including disciplinary rules and their application.

Under section 5(b) of the Pupils Rights Law, any person who infringes the provisions of this section shall be liable to imprisonment for one year, or a fine, as provided under section 61(a)(3) of the Penal Law, 5737-1977.

214. Disciplinary Measures. Under section 10 of the Pupils Rights Law, It is the right of every pupil that discipline be maintained in the educational institution in conformance with human dignity and, in that regard, he is entitled that he not be subjected to corporal or degrading disciplinary measures. In addition, section 11 of the Pupils Rights Law prescribes that an educational institution shall not subject a pupil to punitive measures for an act or omission of his parents.

215. Educational Disparities. The following tables provide data concerning the diminishing, yet still existing, educational disparities between the different sectors within Israeli society. This data regards the number of persons with 4 or less years of education, and the number of matriculation certificate candidates and receivers.

In 1999, the average number of students per class was 26 in the Jewish sector and 30 in the Arab sector. During the period from 1995 to 1999, the average number of students per class declined in both the Arab sector (30.9 in 1995) and the Jewish sector (27.4 in 1995).

216. The Extended School Day and Supplementary Education Law, 5757-1997. This law is aimed to further advance equal opportunity in education, and contribute to helping the children make the most of their natural abilities. It provides that four school days per week shall last for no fewer than eight academic hours each. The law is being gradually implemented, with a preference to municipalities and neighborhoods in need of additional assistance in education. The full implementation of the law is to be completed during the year of 2001.

Education in the Arab Sector

217. The Education and Welfare Services Department in the Ministry of Education (EWS) is responsible, since its establishment in the 1970s, for the advancement of weaker populations by applying special programs and projects in the educational system. For the first ten years of its existence, the EWS did not handle the Arab and Druze sectors, which were dealt with by a special unit in the Ministry of Education.

218. In 1997, The Legal Center for the Rights of Arabs in Israel petitioned the High Court of Justice, demanding that the Ministry of Education apply the EWS special reinforcement programs in the Arab municipalities, as well as the Jewish ones (HCI 2814/97 The High Follow-up Committee on Matters of Arab Education in Israel et al. v. The Ministry of education, Culture and Sports).

219. The Ben-Peretz Committee. Following the petition, the Ministry of Education set up a special committee, headed by Professor Miriam Ben-Peretz, to develop a five year plan for education in the Arab sector - the years 1999-2003. In 1998, the Ben-Peretz Committee presented its comprehensive report, with recommendations ranging across several policy areas.

The recommendations made by the Ben-Peretz Committee include:

The building of approximately 1,600 classes (including kindergartens and special education) within five years;

Significantly expanding the programs applied by the Education and Welfare Services Department (EWS);

Significantly expanding the Tutorial Project (Perach), in which university students give tutorials to school children in need of additional help;

The establishment of an experimental program for the prevention of school drop-out in five municipalities as a groundwork for a wider model;

Expanding the scope of teachers' training, and the establishment of regional centers for teachers' training;

Granting 50 teachers with scholarships in the field of science and technology;

The founding of prestigious study courses in order to attract competent students, as well as technologic alternatives which will answer to the needs of weaker students;

Expanding the budget for construction and equipping of science labs;

Improving the efforts to identify students for the special education, and adding approximately 13,000 academic hours and 120 positions for educational psychologists;

Decreasing the number of children in every class;

Establishing regional education centers.

220. In July 1999, the government had decided to start the implementation of the committee's recommendations. The Ministry of Education will allocate NIS50 million a year for five years. In addition, the Ministry of Education decided on the implementation of an affirmative action policy, favoring education in the Arab sector to the education in the Jewish sector. The five-year plan includes, inter alia, the allocation of 37% of the pre-school education budget to the Arab municipalities, the allocation of 29.5% of the Ministry's construction budget to building classes in the Arab schools and the doubling of funding assigned to the Arab education for special guidance, making it 18% of the total budget. In addition, the growth rate of teaching positions in the Arab sector was 25%, while in Jewish sector, it was only 10%.

221. The efforts made by the Ministry of Education have led to the reduction of gaps between the sectors, but not to their complete elimination. The Follow-up Committee on Matters of the Arab Education in Israel asserted that the plan lacks sufficient reference to some of the committee's recommendations, such as the additional positions for psychologists and visiting officers, the establishment of regional administrations for the special education, the reduction of crowding in the special education classes, funding the establishment of special programs for gifted Arab students, the opening of teacher training centers, and the allocation of funds for the adaptation of exams and diagnostic tools for the needs of the Arab population.

Genetic Information

222. Under the Genetic Information Law, 5760-2000, the ability to acquire and/or use a DNA sample from a minor is subject to the written consent of the child's legal guardian. In the case of a minor over the age of 16, the child's own written consent is also required. The law limits the objectives for which a genetic sample can be attained and provides that the taking of a genetic sample is only possible if the act is certain to not cause the child any physical or mental damage. The conducting of genetic testing on a minor, for the benefit of someone other than a minor's family member, requires the written consent of the legal guardian as well. The findings of a test given to a minor may not be given to his legal guardian unless the existence, or non-existence, of a disease or a disease carrying gene is discovered, and a reasonable medical assessment shows that intervention or treatment at the early stage might prevent or postpone the eruption of the disease or improve the minor's medical condition, prevent the eruption of a disease in other members of the minors family, or be of fundamental value to somebody else, without causing any physical or mental damage to the minor.

In addition, the law prescribes that a minor over the age of 16 taking part in a research involving genetic testing shall be able to instruct the researchers as to the protection of his personal data. When the minor turns 18 years old, he will be able to revoke, limit or change any consent regarding his participation in the study.

Physical Disciplining of Children

223. Until recently, section 24(7) of the Tort Ordinance, enacted in 1944, granted a defense to a charge under the tort of battery to a parent, a legal guardian or a teacher in cases where the plaintiff was a minor, and the assault was reasonably necessary for educational purposes. A 1999 draft law is proposing the amendment of the Tort Ordinance, and the abolishment of above mentioned article 24(7).

224. The legitimacy of "reasonable physical disciplining" was rejected by the Supreme Court in C.A. 5224/97 The State of Israel v. Rachel Sde-Or. The court overturned the acquittal of a nursery school teacher charged with hitting infants that were left under her care, stating that:

"An educational philosophy which stands for the use of force for educational purposes, does not correspond with the predominant norms in our society, especially when young children are concerned... For that matter, the severity of the physical punishment used against a child is insignificant. As a rule, physical punishment cannot be a legitimate method for school teachers, nursery teachers or any other educator. The wrong standpoint on this context puts the wellbeing of children in jeopardy, and might harm the fundamental values of our nation – human dignity and the integrity of one's body".

Furthermore, the Supreme Court has held that the use of physical punishment against preschool children does not fulfil the demand of "reasonably necessary for educational purposes", and thus does not entitle the aggressor to the defense in of article 24(7) of the Tort Ordinance.

225. In a recent decision (C.A.4596/98 Anonymous v. The State of Israel), the Supreme Court has held that the criminal prohibition of physical punishment applies to parents as well, stating, inter alia, that:

“Physical punishment is not only painful or degrading as an educational method, but also unable to truly accomplish its goals, causes physical and psychological damages to the child, and violates the fundamental right of children in our society to dignity and the integrity of the mind and body. A court examining the normative aspect of a parent’s behavior towards his child shall weigh the contemporary judicial approach to the status and the rights of the child. Thus in many other states in the world, and thus in Israel, in the era following the enactment of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom, and Israel’s ratification of the International Convention on the Rights of the Child. Today, one can ascertain that in a society such as ours, the child is an autonomous person, with independent interests and rights. Society is obligated to protect him and his rights.”

226. Ministry of Education guidelines strictly forbid the use of all sorts of physical punishment as a disciplinary method. The use of verbal violence, such as offensive or degrading remarks, is also forbidden. Remedies for a breach of the guidelines are being enforced by both the penal system and by disciplinary means. In addition, as mentioned under section 196 to the Present Report, section 10 of the newly enacted Pupils Rights Law 5761-2000 prescribes that no pupil shall be subjected to corporal or degrading disciplinary measures.

Family Violence

227. The Penal Law was recently amended (amendment 56 - the application of a minimum punishment for offences of violence against women and children). The amended law sets the minimal sentence for those convicted of offences involving severe violence against a family member at no less than one fifth of the maximum possible sentence. However, the court may, on special cases, use its discretion and reduce the sentence.

Children with Disabilities

228. The Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities Bill, 5760-2000 creates a comprehensive statutory framework concerning the rights of people with disabilities, including the rights of children with disabilities. For further information on this subject, see article 26 below.

229. The Rehabilitative Day Care Facilities Law, 5760-2000. This law aims to ensure suitable rehabilitative, therapeutic and educational treatment for mentally retarded or otherwise disabled infants, between the ages of 1-3 years. The funding of the rehabilitative day care is to be divided between from the state, the health funds and the parents.

Foreign Workers’ Children

230. During the last decade, many foreign workers arrived in Israel from all over the world (For further information regarding the status of foreign workers, see article 8 above). The National Health Insurance Law does not apply to foreign workers and their children, even if they are legally present in Israel. Subsequently, the foreign worker is required to ensure himself, and not all-Israeli employers provide health insurance to their employees. At present, there are approximately 2,500-3,000 children of foreign workers living in Israel. Some of their parents have stay and work permits, and some have remained in Israel illegally. Many of these children don't have any kind of health insurance, and their parents cannot afford medical treatment. It should be noted that emergency services are granted without distinction to anyone arriving at outpatients' emergency wards of hospitals. In addition, "Physicians for Human Rights", An NGO, established a clinic for foreign workers in Tel Aviv, where most of the foreign workers reside, which provides for additional medical treatment. The clinic employs, on a voluntary basis, family physicians, pediatrics, and general physicians, along with hospital and health-fund clinic (Kupat Holim) nurses. The clinic operates three times a week, and offers basic medical services to both legal and illegal workers, at modest prices.

231. In July 2000, The Foreign Workers law, 5760-2000 came into force. Under this law, the Minister of Health is to make regulations defining an assortment of services the insurance companies are required to supply the foreign workers with. The regulations have been published recently. As for the foreign workers' children, the Ministry of Health had published a tender to supply them with health care services. One of the health funds was chosen as a supplier, and the arrangement, which took effect on 1.2.2001, applies the following rules:

Children born in Israel can be enrolled, if at least six months have passed since the mother's arrival in Israel, to the health fund chosen in the tender, within six months from the child's birth. Then, the child will be immediately insured. Failing to enroll the child within a period of six months shall result in a delay of six months in the child's entitlement to the health fund's services. However, every child is immediately entitled to emergency services without any waiting period.

Children not born in Israel can be enrolled in the health fund chosen in the tender no earlier than six months from the child's arrival in Israel. The child's entitlement to the health fund's services shall begin 6 months from the date of enrolling. Again, emergency services will be provided without any waiting period.

The arrangement is to apply to all children of foreign workers, regardless of the legality of their parents' stay in Israel.

232. In C.A. 3275/98, Welfare Officer, the City of Holon v. Anonymous, the Tel Aviv District Court reviewed a request of the social services to order the performance of an operation on a two-year-old girl deserted by her mother, a Moldavian citizen, who left Israel shortly after giving birth to her. The court held that by accepting the International Convention on the Rights of the Child, the state took upon itself to provide children with the highest attainable level of health, and ordered that a medical procedure necessary to improve the girl's quality of life be performed regardless of her nationality.

Homeless Children

233. During the last few years, there had been growing awareness to the problem of homeless people in Israel. According to recent evaluations, there are approximately 3,000 homeless people living in Israel, nearly all of them adults with no children. Still, there are some adolescents or runaway children among the homeless. The Society for Youth in Distress and the Authority for Youth Protection operate, in conjunction with other organizations, a support network for these youths, including two shelters for homeless youths located in Tel Aviv and in Jerusalem; a treatment “cafe” located at the Tel Aviv Central Bus Station, and special vehicles which patrol areas in the major cities where homeless youth gather.

Article 25 - Access to the Political System

234. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s previous report and no change has occurred in this area since the 1998 submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

Article 26 – Equality Before the Law

235. Elimination of Discrimination in the Private Sphere. Discrimination by private parties is prohibited in Israeli law only to the extent that legislation explicitly so provides. The legal position in this area has changed dramatically due to the recent enactment of the Law for the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places, 5761-2000. Under section 3(a) of this law, a provider of products or a services to the public, or anyone engaged in the operation of a public place, is prohibited from discriminating on the grounds of race, religion or religious group, nationality, country of origin, sex, sexual orientation, views, political affiliation, personal status, parenthood or disability. Such discrimination constitutes, under section 5, a civil wrong ,enforceable under the provisions of the Tort Ordinance. In addition, such discrimination constitutes, under section 9, a criminal offence, punishable by fine. Under section 11, this law applies to the state as well. It also establishes a series of legal presumptions, passing the burden of proof to the defendant in cases of prima facie discrimination.

Rights of People with Disabilities

236. Legislation. On February 23, 1998, the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 was passed by the Knesset, establishing, for the first time, the statutory right to equality and human dignity of people with disabilities and creating a new system of obligations for the State of Israel vis-a-vis its disabled citizens. The principal impetus for the enactment of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 was The Report of the Public Commission on Comprehensive Legislation Concerning the Rights of People with Disabilities (the “Public Commission”) which was submitted to the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs in July 1997.

The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 came into effect on January 1, 1999, and was only part of the complete Bill. It includes provisions concerning basic principles, general principles, equality of employment, accessibility of public transportation and establishment of a Commission on Equal Rights for People with Disabilities. The remaining chapters of the Bill were re-tabled before the Fifteenth Knesset in the form of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999.

On August 1, 2000, the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Commission was formally established and is presently in its formative stages. Although two years have elapsed since the entry into force of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998, many of its provisions have not yet been implemented, mostly for budgetary reasons. However, efforts are being strongly made in regard.

The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999 passed its first reading on December 22, 1999, and is currently being debated in the Labor, Social Affairs and Health Committee of the Knesset.

At the same time, laws and legislative amendments are being enacted in specific areas promoting the rights of particular groups of people with disabilities (the mentally-ill, disabled infants, mentally-retarded persons, etc.)

237. Starting on October 5, 1999, the disabled persons community in Israel declared a strike. The strikers demanded that the government grant basic living conditions to them, specifically, the correction of flaws in the area of social security sphere. After 37 days of a sit in strike in the lobby and forecourt of the Ministry of Finance's main offices, the government decided to give in to the demands and improvements were made to the entitlements of those persons with severe disabilities to mobility allowance and special services benefits.

238. Most public buildings and places in Israel are inaccessible to people with disabilities who are wheelchair users (examples are government offices, local authority offices, schools, universities, coffee houses, theaters, restaurants, courts, etc.).

239. An amendment to the Planning and Building Law, 5728-1968 and accompanying regulations enacted at the beginning of the 1980s provided that a building permit would not be granted for a public building if lacking the provision of special arrangements for people with disabilities. However, this legislation only applies to public buildings. Moreover, the legislation distinguishes between Type A public buildings and Type B public buildings, where the latter, which include, for example, schools, government ministries and local authorities, are only obliged to make special arrangements on one floor in order to obtain a building permit. The Local Authorities (Provisions for People with Disabilities) Law, 5748-1988 obliges local authorities to lower sidewalks on pedestrian crossings and junctions.

240. As a general rule, public transportation in Israel is inaccessible to persons with disabilities, i.e., there are few buses which are equipped for travel by wheelchair users.

241. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 provides people with disabilities with a right of access to public transportation (city buses, trains, boats, air transport) and charges the Minister of Transport with the enactment of regulations in relation to the ways in which, and the time frame within which, public transportation is to be made accessible. These regulations have yet to be enacted. Recently a petition was submitted to the High Court of Justice by 20 organizations engaged in promoting the rights of people with disabilities. In the interim order the Minister of Transport was ordered to submit draft regulations to the Knesset by the commencement of the winter session.

242. Recently, the importation of a new type of taxi-cab, suitable for wheelchair users, has begun.

243. The Knesset and Prime Minister Elections Law [Consolidated Version] 5729-1969 contains provisions concerning the accessibility of polling stations for people with disabilities, primarily aimed at providing at least one accessible polling station for every 20,000 residents. These and similar provisions in the Local Authorities (Elections) Law, 5725-1965, are seriously inadequate at this time.

244. The elections law was amended to include a provision whereby every person whose mobility is impaired may vote at any polling station for handicapped persons, by means of the so-called "double envelopes" method.

245. Several public information services are not accessible to people with sensory disabilities (the partially sighted, blind persons, people who are hard of hearing or deaf).

246. Television programs were, until recently, rarely accessible to people who are hard of hearing or deaf. The Deaf Persons Relief Law, 5752-1992 includes provisions requiring the Broadcasting Authority: (A) to translate at least one news program a week into sign language; (B) to add subtitles to a quarter of these non-live broadcasts - Hebrew broadcasts with Hebrew subtitles, and Arabic broadcasts with subtitles in Arabic. As a result of two petitions to the High Court of Justice (1994), the Broadcasting Authority now translates the current affairs program "From Today to Tomorrow", which is broadcast at 23:30, into sign language, once a week on Thursdays.

A petition was recently filed in the High Court of Justice by "Bekol", an organization for the hard of hearing and hearing impaired, demanding that the Broadcasting Authority fulfill its obligations under the Deaf Persons Relief Law and add subtitles to one-quarter of its non-live broadcasts. After an interim order was granted, the Broadcasting Authority has agreed that from now on it shall add Hebrew subtitles to at least one-quarter of its non-live Hebrew broadcasts, and Arabic subtitles to at least one quarter of its non-live Arabic broadcasts. In addition, the Broadcasting Authority shall see to it that shows accompanied by subtitles will be noted in the programming schedules published in the media. (H.C.J 5959/00 Bakol v. The Broadcasting Authority).

247. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999 institutes an innovative and comprehensive scheme covering physical, sensory and social accessibility.

Employment of People with Disabilities

248. Unemployment rates among people with disabilities are high. In a survey conducted by the Service for the Blind of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs it was found that 72 per cent of the blind persons are unemployed (March 1997). The Rehabilitation Department of the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs estimates the rate of unemployment among people with severe disabilities, physical illness, mental illnesses and retardation is 70%-75%. In a survey conducted in 1992, unemployment levels among deaf people aged 30-64 were found to be at 18%-22%. Moreover, experts testifying before the Public Commission pointed to professional flaws in the area of employment rehabilitation of people with disabilities in Israel. One specific criticism of the experts was that insufficient attention is devoted to free market employment alternatives, as opposed to segregated employment frameworks, given that the latter make insufficient use of the qualifications of the employee, and fail to realize his/her personal employment potential.

249. People with disabilities in Israel suffer from wage discrimination. The Minimum Wage Law, 5747-1987 does not apply to people with physical, mental or intellectual disabilities employed in state-supported "protected enterprises", and these employees generally earn only several hundred NIS per month, regardless of their output. Section 17(a) of the law authorizes the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs to enact regulations to the effect that the provisions of the law shall apply to such employees. The Minister of Labor and Social Affairs has yet to enact such regulations. The Minimum Wage Law was amended in 1997, adding Section 17(b), and the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs was authorized to prescribe, by way of regulations, a reduced minimum wage for people with disabilities who are not covered by section 17(a) of the law, effectively people with disabilities. The regulations have yet to be enacted. (Draft regulations were recently circulated for the comments of the pertinent government ministries and public organizations.)

250. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 devotes one of its principal chapters to a series of provisions establishing the right of people with disabilities to employment equality. Section 8 of this law prohibits discrimination in employment on the grounds of disability, and defines discrimination as, inter alia, the failure to make reasonable adjustments to the position. The Minister of Labor and Social Affairs and the Minister of Finance are charged with the enactment of regulations providing for state aid in the financing of adjustments. Such regulations have not yet been enacted. A transitory provision of seven years' duration under section 9 of this law requires a person who employs in excess of 25 employees to ensure fair representation of people with disabilities in his or her workforce; In addition, section 28 of this law contains an indirect amendment to the State Service (Appointments) Law, 5719-1959 with respect to the duty of fair representation of people with disabilities in the civil service. Fair representation is still inadequate.

Section 16 of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998 prescribes that the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs shall initiate and develop programs for employment rehabilitation of people with disabilities and that he shall submit a report each year on this matter to the Labor, Social Affairs and Health Committee of the Knesset. To date, no such report has been submitted to the Knesset. Draft regulations regarding the granting of priority to people with disabilities in the allocation of parking spaces at workplaces were recently submitted by the Minister of Labor and Social Affairs to the Labor, Social Affairs and Health Committee of the Knesset, and a meeting has since been convened for the approval of the regulations.

251. Last year, the Bar Association (Arrangements for Examination in the Laws of the State of Israel and Practical Matters) Rules, 5723-1962 were amended, so as to include the following provisions:

“(a) With respect to a written examination under rule 18B, the examining committee, at the request of an examinee who is a person with a disability, within the meaning of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, 5758-1998, may prescribe the modifications required for such person, on account of his or her disability, which shall ensure that he will be examined under conditions which are equal, as far as possible, to those of the other examinees.

(b) Modifications determined by the examining committee, as stated in sub-rule (a), may be by way of prescribing a form of examination not included within rule 18B(a)”.

252. Pupils, parents and teachers who are wheelchair users are physically unable to enter many of the school buildings in Israel, as well as classrooms and various study and social facilities. As stated above (see the chapter on accessibility above), the law requires no more than one floor in a school to be accessible, even where the school is housed in a modern building, with many floors and levels. Enforcement of this legislation is inadequate. In the case of Botzer et al v. Maccabim-Reut Local Council et al, 50(1) P.D. 19 the High Court of Justice established (in March 1996) the right of pupil in a wheelchair to independent, safe and dignified accessibility at school. However, this precedent did not bring about any real change beyond the individual Botzer case, and the Ministry of Education has still not prepared a multi-year plan on accessibility in schools in Israel.

253. The objective of the Ministry of Education is to integrate pupils with disabilities into the ordinary education system. However, for many years the view has prevailed in the Ministry of Education, that pupils with disabilities who are integrated in regular schools lose their basket of services under the law. The numerous complaints reaching the Ministry of Education on this matter, and regarding the state of special education in Israel in general, led former minister of education, Mr. Yossef Sarid, to appoint the Committee to Examine the Implementation of the Special Education Law. On July 20, 2000, the committee submitted its report and recommendations, being, in essence, the recognition of the right of pupils with special needs to study together with children of their own age, and to achieve results according to their ability by being allowed to realize their potential, and the duty of society to prevent this right from being denied, other than in exceptional cases, and taking into consideration the wishes of the family.

254. A wide gap exists in the area of special education between the Jewish sectors and minority sectors. Most children with disabilities in the Arab and Bedouin sectors do not study in educational frameworks which meet their needs and minority schools for special education existing in these sectors do not comply with the minimum level of conditions required in an educational framework. Children of various ages and with various disabilities study in the same classes, and there is a severe lack of professional personnel to deal with those children having special needs, i.e., speech therapists, occupational therapists, physiotherapists, and the like. The Ministry of Education has recently issued a new policy statement of closing gaps in this area.

255. The Rehabilitative Day-Care Centers Law, 5760-2000 was recently enacted as a result of a private Knesset Member initiative, and establishes the right of an infant with severe disabilities to treatment in a rehabilitative day care center in accordance with a basket of services (the law shall come into effect on April 9, 2001).

256. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999 includes a chapter establishing the right of a person with disabilities to a education and to schooling according to his needs.

257. Recreation and leisure, which take up increasingly more time in modern life are no less important to people with disabilities. However, people with disabilities, both adults and children, often find themselves outside the diverse cultural life which Israeli society offers. First, much of the cultural and leisure sites are inaccessible to persons with physical or sensory disabilities (see above), and many cultural activities are not relevant to people with who are mentally retarded. Second, local government in charge of these areas has no planning in this area: there is no special department and no exclusive budget for activity for people with disabilities. As a result of this lack of appropriate attention to the special needs of adults and children with disabilities, the social isolation from which these people suffer increases.

258. The Equal Rights for People with Disabilities (Amendment - Accessibility, Health, Community Housing and Personal Assistance, Culture, Leisure and Sport, Schooling and Education, the Legal System, Special Needs) Bill, 5760-1999 includes a provision imposing an obligation on the State to initiate and develop programs in the areas of culture, leisure and sport for people with disabilities, giving priority to their integration in regular programs.

259. Sexual Abuse of People with Disabilities. People with disabilities, and especially with mental or psychiatric disabilities, are found to be exposed to sexual abuse or assault more than anyone else. The police and the judicial system are not adequately prepared to deal with this phenomenon. Procedures of investigation and giving testimony have not yet been adapted to the special needs of people with disabilities who are victims of sexual or violent offences.

In order to solve this problem, a committee headed by Deputy Attorney General Ms. Yehudit Karp was established in the Ministry of Justice. The objective of the committee is to adapt methods of interrogation and testifying which will suit the special needs of people with disabilities. The committee is currently preparing draft legislation dealing with these issues.

Multi-Year Plan for Development of Arab-Sector Communities

260. A comprehensive government resolution was put forward in October 2000, regarding all aspects of the development of Arab-Sector communities. It follows thorough preparatory work, involving most government agencies. The decision, translated in full from the original Hebrew version, is as follows:

“In General

- (b) The government regards the socio-economic development of the Arab-sector communities of Israel as contributing toward the growth and development of all of Israel’s society and economy.
- (c) The government shall act for the socio-economic development and advancement of the Arab-sector communities and to reduce the gaps between the Arab and Jewish sectors, pursuant to the following plan, as set forth by the Prime Minister’s Office and the Ministerial Committee on Arab-Sector Affairs in cooperation with the directors-general of the Prime Minister’s Office and the representatives of the Arab authorities.
- (d) The development plan is based on joint-working with the Arab authorities. 261. The Electricity Supply Law (Temporary Order) 5756-1996. This law was enacted to solve the problem of Arab and Druze citizens whose houses were built without building permits, and were consequently not connected to the central electricity grid. Under the temporary order, the electricity administration in the Ministry of National Infrastructure has approved, in the course of the last three years, the connection of close to 6,000 households to the electric grid.

Recently, a law prolonging the validity of the temporary law for two years was passed in the Knesset. The aim of the extension is to enable the Ministry of National Infrastructure to examine close to 5,000 additional buildings, and connect them to the national electric grid.

Land Allocation

262. In H.C. 6698/95 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (ILA), The High Court of Justice has held that the State of Israel was not permitted, by law, to allocate State land to the Jewish Agency for Israel for the purpose of establishing a community which would discriminate between Jews and non-Jews. The petitioners, an Arab couple, wished to build a home in Katzir, a communal village in the Eron River region at the north of Israel. Katzir was established in 1982 by the Jewish Agency in collaboration with the Katzir Cooperative Society, on state land that was allocated to the Jewish Agency (via the Israel Lands Administration) for such a purpose.

The Katzir Cooperative Society only accepted Jewish members. As such, it refused to accept the petitioners and allow them to build their home in the communal village of Katzir. The petitioners claimed that the policy constituted discrimination on the basis of religion or nationality and that such discrimination with regard to state land is prohibited by law.

The court held in the Ka'adan case that the state may not allocate land directly to its citizens on the basis of religion or nationality. This conclusion is derived both from the values of Israel as a democratic state and from the values of Israel as a Jewish State. The Jewish character of the state does not permit Israel to discriminate between its citizens. In Israel, Jews and non-Jews are citizens with equal rights and responsibilities. The court emphasized that the state engages in impermissible discrimination even if it is also willing to allocate state land for the purpose of establishing an exclusively Arab settlement, as long as it permits a group of Jews, without distinguishing characteristics, to establish an exclusively Jewish settlement on state land ("separate is inherently unequal").

Moreover, the court held that the state may not allocate land to the Jewish Agency knowing that the Agency will only permit Jews to use the land, saying that where one may not discriminate directly, one may not discriminate indirectly. If the state, through its own actions, may not discriminate on the basis of religion or nationality, it may not facilitate such discrimination by a third party. It does not change matters that the third party is the Jewish Agency. Even if the Jewish Agency may distinguish between Jews and non-Jews, it may not do so in the allocation of state land.

It should be noted that the court limited its decision in the Ka'adan case to the particular facts of this case. The general issue of use of state lands for the purposes of settlement raises a wide-range of questions, which are still not resolved. First, Ka'adan is not directed at past allocations of state land. Second, it focuses on the particular circumstances of the communal village of Katzir. In discussing this issue, the court did not take a position with regard to other types of settlements (such as the commune-based Kibbutz or Moshav) or to the possibility that special circumstances, beyond the type of settlement, may be relevant, stating that:

“ [I]t is important to understand and remember that today we are taking the first step in a sensitive and difficult journey. It is wise to proceed slowly, so that we do not stumble and fall, and instead we will proceed cautiously at every stage, according to the circumstances of each case”.

263. With regard to the relief requested by the petitioners, the court noted various social and legal difficulties. In light of these difficulties, the court rendered the decision that the State of Israel must consider the petitioners' request to acquire land for themselves in the town of Katzir for the purpose of building their home. The state must make this consideration based on the principle of equality, and considering various relevant factors - including those factors affecting the Jewish Agency and the current residents of Katzir. The State of Israel must also consider the numerous legal issues. Based on these considerations, the state must determine with deliberate speed whether to allow the petitioners to make a home within the communal town of Katzir.

Appropriate Representation

264. The Civil Service. Under the Newly enacted Civil Service (Appointments) (Amendment No. 11) (Proper Representation) Law, 5760-2000, the civil service must maintain appropriate representation regarding appointments as well as in the distribution of professional ranks with regard to specific circumstances. Minorities and under-represented populations such as women, the disabled, and the Arab, Druze and Circassian population shall be represented according to their proportion in the eligible work force population. Under the Law, the government is entitled to apply an affirmative action policy when necessary and allocate certain positions to an under-represented group, so as to achieve proper representation.

265. Government Corporations. According to data gathered in September 2000, ten out of 599 directors were of Arab origin (about 1.7 per cent). Under an amendment to the Government Corporations (Amendment 11) Law 5735-1975 made June 11, 2000, the Arab population (namely, Israeli citizens of Arab, Druze and Circassian origin) must be appropriately represented on the board of directors of every government corporation.

In addition, the law prescribes that until appropriate representation is achieved, ministers must appoint as many Arab directors as possible. Section 60(a) of the Government Corporations Law extends the application of amendment 11 to appointments to the board of directors of statutory corporations and other statutory organizations.

Sexual Orientation

266. On February 21, 2000, the High Court of Justice ordered the Minister of Interior to register the adoption of a child by his mother's lesbian partner in the Population Registration. The court held that the adoption order, granted by a court in the child's native state of California, is valid, and rejected the registration clerk's claim that the registration of two mothers of one child is "biologically impossible" (H.C. 1779/99 Brener-Kadish v. the Minister of Interior). It should be noted that a request for a Further Hearing by an extended panel of the High Court of Justice has been filed on this matter.

Religion

267. Following a petition filed by a secular NGO against the unusual benefits given to prospective occupants of the centrally-located orthodox-Jewish city of El'ad. The High Court of Justice directed the Ministry of Construction and Housing to refrain from discriminating on a religious basis by granting El'ad prospective residents excess benefits which are withheld from other house buyers in central Israel (H.C. 4906/98 Am Hofshi v. The Ministry of Construction and Housing).

269. Equality in Social Security. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report there have been a few notable positive changes enhancing equality in social security, which are already presented in this report:

- The gradual erosion in the historical distinctions existing between “housewives” and other women in old-age benefits, survivors’ benefits and disability insurance;
- The improvements in the benefits of severely disabled persons.

In order to further promote the welfare of women in Israel, a steering committee, headed by the director general of the National Insurance Institute, has been set up.

In addition, mention should be made of a number of examples of recent legislation bearing on the subject of gender equality in social security:

- The definition of “self-employed” has been changed, allowing women who work part-time to be insured for work injuries and to be eligible for maternity allowance;
- The payment of maternity allowance to fathers, allowing women to return to work before the end of the three-month maternity leave, leaving the infant with his father;

- The period during which a woman must rest, due to pregnancy risks, is now considered part of the qualifying period for purposes of maternity allowance;
- The expansion of the definition of single-parent family to include women who have just begun the divorce process, in civil or religious courts.

The Bedouin Population

270. General. There are now, according to recent estimates, more than 120,000 Bedouin living in the Negev desert area, in the south of Israel. Their annual population growth rate is about 5.8%. At this time, approximately 50% of the Bedouin population (60,000 out of 120,000) reside in the seven planned settlements in the Negev, known as the “Bedouin towns”. Most residents of these towns are Bedouins of Fallah (Farmer) origin.

271. The rest of the Bedouin population in the Negev still lives in unplanned settlements. About 80% of these Bedouin are of nomadic origin. As they wish to continue and keep “their” lands, they are unwilling to move to the towns, and demand, instead, the establishment of their own rural settlements, within the lands they currently occupy. Close to 20% of these Bedouin are of Fallah origin and would be willing to move to the existing settlements if offered better conditions.

272. The unplanned Bedouin settlements are not recognized by the government. As a result, those settlements, commonly known as “the unrecognized settlements”, are not entitled to many public services, and are not given any building permits, since they are at odds with the existing plans for the development of the Negev. The government feels that giving recognition to these settlements would bring to an end all attempts to establish new settlements in an orderly manner, and would leave the disputes over the land unresolved.

273. In 1999, the government decided to establish up to five new Bedouin towns. Under the special new arrangement made for the compensation of Bedouins moving these town, the government would provide the land at no charge. Moreover, the Bedouin would receive significant compensation for any property they had to abandon at the unrecognized settlement.

274. The above decision gained the support of the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Education and the General Health Fund. Each of these departments will see to the establishment of its institutions in the new towns, namely, the establishment of schools, health clinics, and more.

275. On August 21, 2000, The Ministerial Committee on Arab Affairs decided to place its recommendation before the government regarding the adoption of a new plan for dealing with the Bedouin residing in the Negev. The aims of the plan are to generate of a significant change, within a fixed period of time, in the status of the Bedouin population, thus closing the large gap between them and the rest of the citizens of the State of Israel.

276. The ministerial committee further recommends to integrate the Bedouins as citizens with equal rights, as well as equal duties. The above plan is composed of three major elements:

(a) A comprehensive long term plan for the establishment of Bedouin settlements in the Negev, in cooperation with Bedouin representation, and in accordance to the needs of the different tribes.

(b) Continuation of the land settlement claims process. However, this shall not be a prerequisite for the establishment of new settlements or the granting of services.

(c) Improving the image of the seven existing towns by improving infrastructure, mainly educational and sewage infrastructure, and building additional public facilities.

277. There has been no expropriation of Bedouin land since 1989, aside from expropriation for the purpose of roads or railroad construction. The last expropriation, which took place in 1989, was done for the purpose of building a new Bedouin town.

278. Hardly any of the illegal Bedouin houses in the Negev have been demolished within the last two years. According to recent estimates, there are now over 60,000 illegal houses in the Negev.

279. Five new Mother and Child Health Clinics (Tipat Halav) have recently been built in Bedouin towns.

280. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, five additional Health Fund medical clinics (Kupat Holim) have been built to provide for the needs of Bedouin living in unrecognized settlements, raising the total there to seven.

281. Educational Facilities: Since 1998, three new schools have been built, in addition to the establishment of kindergartens, located within the premises of elementary schools. All of the schools have electricity, provided by generators, and are directly connected to water pipes. Almost all of the Bedouin pupils enjoy the same standards of transportation to and from their schools as do the Jewish pupils.

282. Water Allocation: Water is allocated to the Bedouin community living in unrecognized settlements through the Water Connections Allocation Committee. Within the last three years, the total number of connections to the water main lines has increased from 60 connections to 260.

283. Sewage Treatment. Since the submission of the Initial Periodic Report, there has been a great advancement in the field of sewage disposal. Sewage treatment facilities have been installed and now operated in almost every Bedouin town.

284. A recent budget proposal for the years 2001-2004, based on a four years plan for the completion of development and infrastructure in the existing Bedouin towns, requests the allocation of NIS1,195,050,000. This significant sum is to be used to complete the infrastructure in existing settlements, to construct water and sewage infrastructure where it is incomplete and for the establishment of public facilities such as schools, clinics, etc.

285. The total funds allocated to the Bedouin sector within Israel's budget for the year 2000 have increased threefold in comparison to the time of the submission of the Initial Periodic Report.

286. Public Services. The Israeli government seeks to establish six new "Service Centers" for the Bedouins in the Negev. When built, these centers shall contain facilities for various service providers, ranging from educational facilities, religious centers and health centers to shopping and industrial facilities. These centers are planned to be built outside of the existing towns, with the purpose of serving as a basis for new Bedouin towns.

287. Since the submission of Israel's Initial Periodic Report, New Industry and trade centers have been built in Hura, Segev Shalom and Aroer.

288. Education. The education system in the Bedouin sector faces many difficulties, deriving from the unique Bedouin lifestyle and culture. The school drop-out rate is relatively high for both genders. Girls drop out of school at an early age due to marriage or tradition, while boys mainly drop out to join the work circle. In addition, Many of the Bedouin pupils who do finish high school choose not to take the matriculation exams, a necessary requirement for higher education, and settle for a high school diploma.

289. Nevertheless, the Bedouin education system has improved greatly in the past few years:

A computerized center has been established in order to reduce the school drop-out rate. A computerized follow up of pupils at risk is being conducted, and much effort is put to bringing them back to school. As a result, the number of pupils in general, and of the female pupils in particular, is constantly increasing.

The educational achievements in primary education had improved during the last two years, due to an intensive program of pedagogical intervention.

A retired Jewish school principal has been assigned to every Bedouin school principle as a "coach", to advise him on educational subjects, as well as management ones.

Ben-Gurion University and the Kaye College in Be'er Sheva have assisted high school teachers in Bedouin schools, in order to promote an increase the number of students who receive matriculation certificates. Over the last three years, the number of pupils receiving matriculation certificates has grown from 10% to 32%.

The number of Bedouin teachers in the Bedouin education system continues to rise. At this time 60% of all teachers in the Bedouin schools are of Bedouin origin, a notable increase from 1996, when only 40% of the teachers were of Bedouin origin.

The Druze and Circassian Sectors

290. A five-year plan for the advancement of the Druze and Circassian sectors was adopted in October 2000. The government resolution is as follows:

291. The government takes note of the report of the director general of the Prime Minister's Office on the agreement reached on the five-year plan for the Druze and Circassian sector, as follows:

- (a) Development budget in all the government ministries for the years 2000-2003 shall be as set forth hereunder (in 2000 prices):

- 2000	-	NIS180 million
- 2001	-	NIS190 million
- 2002	-	NIS190 million
- 2003	-	NIS190 million

These budgets are derived from the all the budgets which were in existence within the scope of the five-year plan and include, inter alia, sewage loans in the scope of NIS16 million per annum and do not include financing to be given for the purpose of construction of neighborhoods for discharged soldiers.

- (b) A special one-time grant for the year 2000 in the amount of NIS30 million shall be granted to meet an accumulated deficit in the regular budget. The grant derives from the shortages in the previous five-year plan (1995-1999), and shall be allocated between the councils according to the resources allocation percentage in the current five-year plan, the details of which are to be concluded with the Ministry of the Interior.
- (c) Furthermore, a grant shall be given to fill the gaps in the five-year plan which ended in 1999, in the amount of NIS15 million, regarding deficits in the extraordinary budgets and to complete the arrangement concluded on October 21, 1999 (section 2A).
- (d) A NIS5 million supplement to the grant shall be granted for the year 2000 in order to minimize the cut in this year. The allocation shall be made according to the proportionate share of the supplement from the grant amount.
- (e) The Prime Minister's Office (Coordination, Supervision and Control Branch) in cooperation with council representatives, shall supervise and oversee performance of the development plans and shall ensure their complete performance each year.
- (f) This summary concludes the total settling of accounts for the five-year plan for the Druze sector for the years 1995-1999 and suitably answers the future development needs of the sector.

- (g) The Committee of Directors General of the relevant government ministries shall consolidate the annual budget allocation according to the various ministries. The allocation to be determined shall be budgeted in separate plans designated for the Druze and Circassian sector.

Article 27 - Rights of Minorities to Culture, Religion and Language

292. Minority Populations. At the end of 1998, Israel's population stood at 6,041,400, of whom 4,785,100 (79.2 per cent) were Jews, 899,800 (14.9 per cent) were Muslims, 128,700 (2.1 per cent) were Christians, 99,000 (1.6 per cent) were Druze, and 128,700 unclassified. The following table shows the growth of the major population groups (Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Druze) between the years 1996-1998:

Status of the Arabic Language

293. General. As described in detail in the Initial Periodic Report, Arabic, like Hebrew, is an official language in Israel. In the larger sphere of Israeli civic life, the right of Arabic-speaking minorities to use their language is generally recognized and observed. As stated by justice Cheshin of the Supreme court in P.C.A 12/99 Jamal v. Saback :

“ ...The Arabic language is the language of approximately one-fifth of the population – the language of conversation, of culture and of religion – and this share of the population is a substantial minority, whom we ought to respect – the minority and their language. The State of Israel is a Jewish and democratic state, and being what it is, it has a duty to respect the minority within it: the person, the person's culture and the person's language.”

294. Official Documents. Under directive number 21.556A of the attorney general, regarding the translation of official documents from Arabic, a public authority should not demand that a citizen translate into Hebrew a document written in Arabic such as a marriage certificate, a divorce certificates, etc., which was issued by an authority formally acknowledged by the State of Israel.

295. Vehicle License Plates. Under a specific directive issued by the attorney general and directed at the Ministry of Transportation, new car license plates are to bear the name of the State of Israel in Arabic as well as in Hebrew.

296. Publication of Public Tenders in Arabic. The attorney general has directed all legal advisors of the civil service, that all public tenders are to be published in both an Arabic newspaper and a Hebrew one, as well as made available on the internet, as specified in regulations concerning public tenders. The directive has stressed that it is unauthorized to distinguish between public tenders according to their relevance to the Arab sector. Furthermore, the duty to translate the public tenders into Arabic rests on the government.

HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITTEE
Seventy-eighth session

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES
UNDER ARTICLE 40 OF THE COVENANT

Concluding observations of the Human Rights Committee

Israel

1. The Committee considered the second periodic report of Israel (CCPR/C/ISR/2001/2) at its 2116th, 2117th and 2118th meetings (see CCPR/C/SR.2116-2118), held on 24 and 25 July 2003, and adopted the following concluding observations at its 2128th - 2130th meetings (CCPR/C/SR.2128-2130), held on 4 and 5 August 2003.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the second periodic report submitted by Israel and expresses its appreciation for the frank and constructive dialogue with a competent delegation. It welcomes the detailed answers, both oral and written, that were provided to its written questions.

B. Factors and difficulties affecting the implementation of the Covenant

3. The Committee has noted and recognizes the serious security concerns of Israel in the context of the present conflict, as well as the difficult human rights issues relating to the resurgence of suicide bombings which have targeted Israel's civilian population since the beginning of the second intifada in September 2000.

C. Positive factors

4. The Committee welcomes the positive measures and legislation adopted by the State party to improve the status of women in Israeli society, with a view to promoting gender equality. In this context, it welcomes in particular the amendment to the Equal Rights for Women Law (2000), the Employment of Women Law (Amendment 19), the adoption of the Sexual Harassment Law (1998), the Prevention of Stalking Law (2001), the Rights of Victims of an Offence Law (2001), and other legislative measures designed to combat domestic violence. It also welcomes the establishment of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women but would appreciate further, up-to-date information on its responsibilities and functioning in practice.

5. The Committee welcomes the measures taken by the State party to combat trafficking in women for the purpose of prostitution, in particular the Prohibition on Trafficking Law enacted in July 2000 and the prosecution of traffickers since that date.

6. The Committee notes the efforts to increase the level of education for the Arab, Druze and Bedouin communities in Israel. In particular, it notes the implementation of the Special Education Law and the Compulsory Education Law Amendment (2000).

7. The Committee also notes the State party's information about the significant measures taken for the development of the Arab sector, in particular through the 2001-2004 Development Plan.

8. The Committee welcomes legislation adopted by the State party in respect of persons with disabilities, in particular the enactment of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law (1998). It expresses the hope that those areas where the rights of disabled people, acknowledged by the delegation as not being respected and requiring further improvements, will be addressed as soon as possible.

9. The Committee notes the efforts by the State party to provide better conditions for migrant workers. It welcomes the amendment to the Foreign Workers Law and the increase in penalties imposed on employers for non-compliance with the law. It also welcomes free access to labour courts for migrant workers and the provision of information to them about their rights in several foreign languages.

10. The Committee welcomes the Supreme Court's judgement of September 1999 which invalidated the former governmental guidelines governing the use of "moderate physical pressure" during interrogations and held that the Israeli Security Agency (ISA) has no authority under Israeli law to use physical force during interrogations.

D. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

11. The Committee has noted the State party's position that the Covenant does not apply beyond its own territory, notably in the West Bank and in Gaza, especially as long as there is a situation of armed conflict in these areas. The Committee reiterates the view, previously spelled out in paragraph 10 of its concluding observations on Israel's initial report (CCPR/C/79/Add.93 of 18 August 1998), that the applicability of the regime of international humanitarian law during an armed conflict does not preclude the application of the Covenant, including article 4 which covers situations of public emergency which threaten the life of the nation. Nor does the applicability of the regime of international humanitarian law preclude accountability of States parties under article 2, paragraph 1, of the Covenant for the actions of their authorities outside their own territories, including in occupied territories. The Committee therefore reiterates that, in the current circumstances, the provisions of the Covenant apply to the benefit of the population of the Occupied Territories, for all conduct by the State party's authorities or agents in those territories that affect the enjoyment of rights enshrined in the Covenant and fall within the ambit of State responsibility of Israel under the principles of public international law.

The State party should reconsider its position and to include in its third periodic report all relevant information regarding the application of the Covenant in the Occupied Territories resulting from its activities therein.

12. While welcoming the State party's decision to review the need to maintain the declared state of emergency and to prolong it on a yearly rather than an indefinite basis, the Committee remains concerned about the sweeping nature of measures during the state of emergency, that appear to derogate from Covenant provisions other than article 9, derogation from which was notified by the State party upon ratification. In the Committee's opinion, these derogations extend beyond what would be permissible under those provisions of the Covenant which allow for the limitation of rights (e.g. articles 12, paragraph 3; 19, paragraph 3 and; 21, paragraph 3). As to measures derogating from article 9 itself, the Committee is concerned about the frequent use of various forms of administrative detention, particularly for Palestinians from the Occupied Territories, entailing restrictions on access to counsel and to the disclose of full reasons of the detention. These features limit the effectiveness of judicial review, thus endangering the protection against torture and other inhuman treatment prohibited under article 7 and derogating from article 9 more extensively than what in the Committee's view is permissible pursuant to article 4. In this regard, the Committee refers to its earlier concluding observations on Israel and to its general comment No. 29.

The State party should complete as soon as possible the review initiated by the Ministry of Justice of legislation governing states of emergency. In this regard, and pending the adoption of appropriate legislation, the State party should review the modalities governing the renewal of the state of emergency and specify the provisions of the Covenant it seeks to derogate from, to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation (art. 4).

13 The Committee is concerned that the use of prolonged detention without any access to a lawyer or other persons of the outside world violates articles the Covenant (arts. 7, 9, 10 and 14, para. 3 (b)).

The State party should ensure that no one is held for more than 48 hours without access to a lawyer.

14. The Committee is concerned about the vagueness of definitions in Israeli counter-terrorism legislation and regulations which, although their application is subject to judicial review, appear to run counter to the principle of legality in several aspects owing to the ambiguous wording of the provisions and the use of several evidentiary presumptions to the detriment of the defendant. This has adverse consequences on the rights protected under article 15 of the Covenant, which is non-derogable under article 4, paragraph 2, of the Covenant.

The State party should ensure that measures designed to counter acts of terrorism, whether adopted in connection with Security Council resolution 1373 (2001) or in the context of the ongoing armed conflict, are in full conformity with the Covenant.

15. The Committee is concerned by what the State party calls “targeted killings” of those identified by the State party as suspected terrorists in the Occupied Territories. This practice would appear to be used at least in part as a deterrent or punishment, thus raising issues under article 6. While noting the delegation’s observations about respect for the principle of proportionality in any response to terrorist activities against civilians and its affirmation that only persons taking direct part in hostilities have been targeted, the Committee remains concerned about the nature and extent of the responses by the Israeli Defence Force (IDF) to Palestinian terrorist attacks.

The State party should not use “targeted killings” as a deterrent or punishment. The State party should ensure that the utmost consideration is given to the principle of proportionality in all its responses to terrorist threats and activities. State policy in this respect should be spelled out clearly in guidelines to regional military commanders, and complaints about disproportionate use of force should be investigated promptly by an independent body. Before resorting to the use of deadly force, all measures to arrest a person suspected of being in the process of committing acts of terror must be exhausted.

16. While fully acknowledging the threat posed by terrorist activities in the Occupied Territories, the Committee deplors what it considers to be the partly punitive nature of the demolition of property and homes in the Occupied Territories. In the Committee’s opinion the demolition of property and houses of families some of whose members were or are suspected of involvement in terrorist activities or suicide bombings contravenes the obligation of the State party to ensure without discrimination the right not to be subjected to arbitrary interference with one’s home (art. 17), freedom to choose one’s residence (art. 12), equality of all persons before the law and equal protection of the law (art. 26), and not to be subject to torture or cruel and inhuman treatment (art 7) .

17. The Committee is concerned about the IDF practice in the Occupied Territories of using local residents as “volunteers” or shields during military operations, especially in order to search houses and to help secure the surrender of those identified by the State party as terrorist suspects.

The State party should discontinue this practice, which often results in the arbitrary deprivation of life (art. 6).

18. The Committee is concerned that interrogation techniques incompatible with article 7 of the Covenant are still reported frequently to be resorted to and the “necessity defence” argument, which is not recognized under the Covenant, is often invoked and retained as a justification for ISA actions in the course of investigations.

The State party should review its recourse to the “necessity defence” argument and provide detailed information to the Committee in its next periodic report, including detailed statistics covering the period since the examination of the initial report. It should ensure that alleged instances of ill-treatment and torture are vigorously investigated by genuinely independent mechanisms, and that those responsible for such actions are prosecuted. The State party should provide statistics from 2000 to the present day on how many complaints have been made to the Attorney-General, how many have been turned down as unsubstantiated, how many have been turned down because the defence of necessity has been applied and how many have been upheld, and with what consequences for the perpetrators.

19. While again acknowledging the seriousness of the State party’s security concerns that have prompted recent restrictions on the right to freedom of movement, for example through imposition of curfews or establishment of an inordinate number of roadblocks, the Committee is concerned that the construction of the “Seam Zone”, by means of a fence and, in part, of a wall, beyond the Green Line, imposes additional and unjustifiably severe restrictions on the right to freedom of movement of, in particular, Palestinians within the Occupied Territories. The “Seam Zone” has adverse repercussions on nearly all walks of Palestinian life; in particular, the wide-ranging restrictions on freedom of movement disrupt access to health care, including emergency medical services, and access to water. The Committee considers that these restrictions are incompatible with article 12 of the Covenant.

The State party should respect the right to freedom of movement guaranteed under article 12. The construction of a “Seam Zone” within the Occupied Territories should be stopped

20. The Committee is concerned by public pronouncements made by several prominent Israeli personalities in relation to Arabs, which may constitute advocacy of racial and religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility and violence.

The State party should take necessary action to investigate, prosecute and punish such acts in order to ensure respect for article 20, paragraph 2, of the Covenant.

21. The Committee is concerned about Israel’s temporary suspension order of May 2002, enacted into law as the Nationality and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) on 31 July 2003, which suspends, for a renewable one-year period, the possibility of family reunification, subject to limited and subjective exceptions especially in the cases of marriages between an Israeli citizen and a person residing in the West Bank and in Gaza. The Committee notes with concern that the suspension order of May 2002 has already adversely affected thousands of families and marriages.

The State party should revoke the Nationality and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) of 31 July 2003, which raises serious issues under articles 17, 23 and 26 of the Covenant. The State party should reconsider its policy with a view to facilitating family reunification of all citizens and permanent residents. It should provide detailed statistics on this issue, covering the period since the examination of the initial report.

22. The Committee is concerned about the criteria in the 1952 Law on Citizenship enabling the revocation of Israeli citizenship, especially its application to Arab Israelis. The Committee is concerned about the compatibility with the Covenant, in particular article 24 of the Covenant, of the revocation of citizenship of Israeli citizens.

The State party should ensure that any changes to citizenship legislation are in conformity with article 24 of the Covenant.

23. Notwithstanding the observations in paragraphs 4 and 7 above, the Committee notes with concern that the percentage of Arab Israelis in the civil service and public sector remains very low and that progress towards improving their participation, especially of Arab Israeli women, has been slow (arts. 3, 25 and 26).

The State party should adopt targeted measures with a view to improving the participation of Arab Israeli women in the public sector and accelerating progress towards equality.

24. While noting the Supreme Court's judgement of 30 December 2002 in the case of eight IDF reservists (judgement HC 7622/02), the Committee remains concerned about the law and criteria applied and generally adverse determinations in practice by military judicial officers in individual cases of conscientious objection (art. 18).

The State party should review the law, criteria and practice governing the determination of conscientious objection, in order to ensure compliance with article 18 of the Covenant.

25. The State party is invited to disseminate widely the text of its second periodic report, the replies provided to the Committee's list of issues and the present concluding observations.

26. In accordance with article 70, paragraph 5, of the Committee's rules of procedure, the State party is invited to provide, within one year, relevant information on the implementation of the Committee's recommendations in paragraphs 13, 15, 16, 18 and 21 above. The State party's third periodic report should be submitted by 1 August 2007.

Comments by the Government of Israel on the concluding observations of the Human Rights Committee

I. Allegations of “prolonged detention without access to a lawyer” (paragraph 13)

Arraignment before a judge

Criminal Offences

1. In Israel, pursuant to Section 29 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, specifies that a person arrested without a warrant must be brought before a judge as soon as possible, and no later than 24 hours following the arrest, with a special provision regarding weekends and holidays.
2. Section 30 allows for an additional 24-hour extension based on the need to perform an urgent interrogation, which cannot be performed unless the detainee is in custody, and cannot be postponed following his arraignment; or if an urgent action must be taken regarding an investigation in a security-related offence. Following the completion of the above measures, the detainee shall be brought before a judge swiftly, or released from custody.
3. The Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) (Arrangements for Holding Court Hearings according to Section 29 to the Law) Regulations, 5757 – 1997 provide special arrangements concerning the arraignment of detainees on weekends and holidays in order to properly balance respect for the holidays with the individual rights of the detainee.

Security Related Offences

4. A person arrested in accordance with the Emergency Powers (Arrests) Law, 5739 – 1979 ("the Emergency Powers (Arrests) Law"), according to an order issued by the Minister of Defence, shall be arraigned before the president of a District Court no later than 48 hours following the arrest. If not brought before the president within 48 hours, he shall be released unless another ground for arrest is proven to the president of a District Court (section 4). The 48-hour period does not include holidays.
5. On June 26, 2006, the Knesset approved the Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) (Temporary Provision) Law, 2006, that constitutes a Temporary Provision set for a defined period of 18 months.
6. The law regulates the powers required for the enforcement authorities in order to investigate a detainee suspected of terrorism or security offences. Such investigations necessitate special enforcement powers due to the special characteristics of both the offences and the perpetrators. The main provisions of the law result from the exceptional circumstances of such a security offence.
7. Section 3 of the law stipulates that the appointed officer may delay the arraignment before a judge to a maximum of 48 hours from the arrest, if the officer is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would truly jeopardize the investigation. The officer may decide to delay the arraignment for another 24 hours if he is convinced that the cessation of the investigation would truly jeopardize the investigation or may harm the possibility to prevent harming human lives.
8. The officer may delay the arraignment for additional 24 hours for the same reason, provided that he explains his decision in writing and obtains the approval of the relevant approving authority. A delay of over 72 hours also requires the approval of the Head of Investigations Department of the ISA, or his deputy. In any case, the maximum delay would not exceed 96 hours from the time of the arrest.
9. It must be emphasized that the initial stage of the investigation of a detainee suspected of terrorism and security offence is critical for the investigation in many ways, such as the possibility to use the information obtained during the investigation to prevent additional imminent terror attacks. Therefore the legislator asserted that the provision concerning this delay in arraignment is properly balanced with the need to protect human lives.
10. Moreover, as a way of further assuring the rights of the detainee, and in light of the temporary nature of the law, during the duration of the law, the Minister of Justice would be obligated to report to the Committee of Constitution, Law and Justice of the Knesset on the implementation of the law every six months. The report would include, inter alia, detailed information concerning postponements in bringing a detainee before a judge (including the number of cases in which the postponement occurred and the duration of such postponements).

Soldiers - IDF

11. According to the Military Justice Law, following an amendment in 2000, the maximum period a soldier can be held under arrest before he is brought before a judge is 48 hours.

Access to Legal Counsel

12. In a recent decision by the Supreme Court, the Court held that "[t]here is no dispute as to the high standing and central position of the right to legal counsel in our legal system." (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4.5.06)) Here, the Court adopted a relative exclusion doctrine, according to which the court may rule on the inadmissibility of a confession due to the interrogator's failure to notify the soldier of his right to legal counsel.

Criminal Offences

Detainees

13. In Israel, pursuant to Section 11 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests)(Terms of Detention) Regulations, 5757 – 1997, stipulates that the date of a detainee's meeting with an attorney shall be predetermined, and that the commander of the detention facility shall enable the first meeting of a detainee with an attorney, at their request, even during extraordinary hours.
14. Section 34 of the Criminal Procedure (Powers of Enforcement - Arrests) Law, states that a detainee has the right to meet and consult with a lawyer. Following a detainee's request to meet with an attorney or the request of an attorney to meet a detainee, the person in charge of the investigation shall enable the meeting without a delay. This meeting can be delayed if, in the opinion of the police officer in charge, such a meeting necessitates terminating or suspending an investigation or other measures regarding the investigation, or substantially puts the investigation at risk. The officer in charge shall provide a written reasoned decision to postpone the meeting for the time needed to complete the investigation, provided this deferment does not exceed several hours.
15. The officer in charge can further delay this meeting if he issues a sufficiently reasoned decision that such a meeting may thwart or obstruct the arrest of additional suspects in the same matter, prevent the disclosure of evidence, or the capture of an object apprehended regarding the same offence. Such additional delay shall not exceed 24 hours from the time of arrest. An additional 24 hours deferment (to a total of 48 hours) can be granted, if the officer in charge provides an elaborated written decision that he is convinced that such postponement is necessary for safeguarding human life, thwarting a crime, or is in relation to a security offence under certain provisions. However, such a detainee shall be given a reasonable opportunity to meet or consult with a legal counsel prior to the arraignment before a court of law.

Prisoners

16. A recent amendment to the Prisons Ordinance, 1971 (amendment no. 30, dated July 2005) further stipulates the conditions for a prisoner meeting with an attorney for professional service. According to section 45, this meeting shall be held in private and in conditions allowing for the confidentiality of the matters and documents exchanged, and in such a manner that enables supervision of the prisoner's movements. Following the prisoner's request to meet with an attorney for professional service, or the request of an attorney to meet a prisoner, the director of the prison shall facilitate the meeting in the prison during regular hours and without delay.
17. Section 45A of the Prisons Ordinance relates to all prisoners, except for detainees who have yet to be indicted. This section authorizes the Israeli Prisons Service (IPS) Commissioner and the director of the prison to postpone or stop such a meeting for a set period of time if there is a substantial suspicion that meeting with a particular lawyer will enable the commission of an offence risking the security of a person, public security, state security or the prison security, or a prison offence substantially damaging to the prison discipline and that brings about a severe disruption of the prison procedures and administration. The director of the prison may delay such a meeting for no longer than 24 hours, and the IPS Commissioner may order an additional 5 days delay, with the agreement of the District Attorney. Such a reasoned order shall be given to the prisoner in writing, unless the IPS Commissioner specifically orders it shall be given orally. The reasoning may be withheld under certain limited provisions. Decisions rendered according to section 45A may be appealed to the relevant District Court.

18. The District Court may further extend the above time-periods up to 21 days, following an application of the representative of the Attorney General, based on one of the grounds specified above. The maximum delay shall not exceed 3 months. Such a decision can be appealed to the Supreme Court. A Supreme Court judge may further extend these periods based on one of the grounds specified above.

II. “Targeted killings” (paragraph 15)

1. As was stated by Israel to the Committee, in the context of its attempts to cope with the scourge of terrorism, Israel’s occasional resort to the targeting of terrorists, as a matter of military necessity, is carried out in compliance with international law of armed conflict. Clearly, Israel shares the Committee’s concern for the loss of all innocent life and makes every effort to ensure that even during active warfare and the conduct of military operations in response to terrorist threats and actual attacks, utmost consideration is given to the principles of necessity and proportionality.
2. Without prejudice to Israel's position regarding the non-applicability of the ICCPR to the present armed conflict against Palestinian terrorism, which is governed by the laws of armed conflict, Israel confirms that it does not use "targeted killings" as a means of deterrence or punishment.
3. This measure is carried out with respect to identified terrorists who are directly and substantially involved in serious terrorist activities (either in the carrying out of such attacks or in other ways, such as their planning or dispatch). All such operations are reviewed in advance to ensure full compliance with the laws of armed conflict, including the principles of military necessity, distinction, proportionality and humanity. Such a measure is only carried out as an extraordinary measure, where there is no feasible way to apprehend the identified terrorist, and only after all feasible precautions have been taken with a view to avoiding – and in any event minimizing - incidental damage to innocent individuals. Accordingly, targeting of terrorists is authorized only after carefully examining all available evidence and considering all operational alternatives.
4. Israel's legal position on this issue is a matter of public record, and was presented to the Israeli Supreme Court sitting as the High Court of Justice as part of the State's written and oral responses to a petition, still pending before the Court, concerning the legality of this measure (H CJ 769/02 - Public Committee Against Torture et al v. Government of Israel et al).
5. In this context, Israel has consistently maintained an absolute preference, where possible, to arrest terrorist operatives. However, in areas under the control and jurisdiction of the Palestinian Authority (the "PA"), arrest has not always been a realistic alternative. This is particularly true in the Gaza Strip, where Israel no longer exercises law-enforcement capacities, and in some areas in the West Bank under the security control of the PA. The difficulty of arresting senior and active terrorists is further compounded by the unwillingness of the PA to make such arrests and the operational difficulties, including the grave danger to the lives of soldiers and the local civilian population, that would be entailed in requiring the IDF to send forces to enter such areas, not to mention the time it would give those terrorists to escape.

6. Despite the fact that during active warfare, armed hostilities and terrorist attacks against its population, Israel is not obliged under international law of war to take all measures to arrest a suspected terrorist before considering resort to the use of deadly force, it nevertheless has, to the extent possible in such difficult conditions, applied such policy in its fight against terrorists, to the extent possible in these difficult conditions.
7. Furthermore, Israel attaches importance to the principle of proportionality in dealing with terrorist threats and activities. Accordingly, attacks are only carried out if the collateral damage anticipated is not excessive in relation to the military advantage to be obtained from the attack, in accordance with the rule of proportionality. Indeed, on this basis, operations have been aborted, delayed or modified, in order to avoid causing damage to innocent individuals.
8. The authority to take final decisions regarding "targeted killings" is reserved to the very highest levels of the IDF and the Government of Israel with the guidance of legal counsel. Such decisions are taken only after carefully reviewing their compliance with all of the relevant principles noted above. IDF commanders at all levels (including regional military commanders) are issued with clear and compulsory instructions governing all operational activity. These instructions are drafted in consultation with legal counsel to ensure that they embody, and are fully consistent with Israel's obligations under Israeli law and the laws of armed conflict.
9. IDF operational guidelines, instructions and activities are also subject to the regular scrutiny of the Israeli Supreme Court sitting as the High Court of Justice according to norms of Israeli and international law.
10. With respect to the investigation of complaints regarding disproportionate use of force, the IDF is constantly acting to accelerate and streamline investigation procedures, which are regularly reviewed and evaluated. All IDF operations and activities which result in civilian casualties are reported to the Chief of Staff and the Military Advocate General within 48 hours. In each case, the Military Advocate General can then instruct that an operational investigation, be conducted, in order to determine whether there is any evidence of criminal behavior. Where there is such evidence or suspicion, the Military Advocate General is authorized to order that criminal investigations be carried out by the Military Police and where there is sufficient evidence, prosecutions are undertaken by the Military Prosecutor's office. It should be noted that the Military Advocate General is the highest legal authority in the IDF who, by virtue of his role, is independent from the command hierarchy of the IDF and is subject only to the rule of law.

III. Allegations of "Partly punitive demolition of property and homes" (paragraph 16)

1. As mentioned above, since September 2000 Israelis have been the victims of a relentless and ongoing campaign by Palestinian terrorists to spread death and destruction, killing more than 1,100 Israelis and injuring nearly 8,000. In light of this unprecedented lethal threat, Israeli security forces have sought to find effective and lawful counter-measures that may minimize the occurrence of such terrorist attacks in general, and suicide terrorism in particular, and discourage potential suicide bombers. Faced with the failure of the Palestinian leadership to comply with its obligations to fight terrorism, Israel has been compelled to combat this ongoing threat to the inherent right to life. One such security measure is the demolition of structures that pose a real security risk to Israeli forces.
2. Palestinian terrorists often operate from within densely crowded civilian neighborhoods in grave breach of international law, whether firing from within these buildings or activating roadside charges from orchards and fields. In such instances, military necessity dictates the demolition of these locations. Under international law, such locations are considered legitimate targets for attack. Therefore, in the midst of combat, when dictated by operational necessity, Israeli security forces may lawfully destroy structures used by terrorists.
3. A further instance necessitating the possible demolition of buildings is the use made by terrorist groups of civilian buildings in order to conceal openings of tunnels used to smuggle arms, explosives and terrorists from Egypt into the Gaza Strip. Similarly, buildings in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are exploited for the manufacturing and concealment of weapons and explosive devices used against Israel, including the Kassam missiles fired on an almost daily basis against Israeli civilian population centers. The demolition of these structures is often the only way to combat these threats effectively.
4. Another method previously employed by Israel against terrorists was the demolition of homes of those who had carried out suicide attacks or other grave terrorist attacks, or those who are responsible for sending suicide bombers on their deadly murderous missions. The legality of this measure, used for deterrence and not as a punitive measure, was upheld by the Israeli High Court of Justice. The use of this measure has presently been discontinued by the IDF.
5. In this regard, Israel's security forces adhere to the rules of international law of armed conflict and are subject to the scrutiny of Israel's High Court of Justice in hundreds of petitions frequently brought by Palestinians and human rights organizations.
6. These counter-terrorism measures, by any reasonable standard, do not constitute a form of "collective punishment" as some have claimed. While the security measures do unfortunately cause hardships to sectors of the Palestinian population, this is categorically not their intent. Wherever possible, even in the midst of military operations, Israel's security forces go to great lengths to minimize the effects of security measures on the civilian population not involved in terrorism. In this context, Israel adopts measures in order to ensure that only terrorists and the structures they abuse are targeted.

7. Finally, another practice used when necessary, is the demolition of illegally constructed buildings, such as in cases where buildings interfere with plans for the construction of public facilities including schools or roads; pose a safety threat to their inhabitants; or interfere with historic landmarks. It should be stressed that all demolitions are conducted in accordance with due process guarantees, after a fair hearing opportunity is given and subject to judicial review with the right to appeal and without distinction on the basis of race or ethnic origin. Those affected by a demolition order are entitled by law to appeal to the Israeli Supreme Court

IV. “Certain interrogation techniques” (paragraph 18)

1. Following the High Court of Justice ruling in H CJ 5100/94, The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. The State of Israel, dealing with the use of "moderate physical pressure" in interrogations, the Attorney General is not authorized to grant an approval in advance permitting the use of such "exceptional measures".
2. The Israeli Security Agency (ISA) interrogators operate in accordance with standard operational procedures, detailing acceptable interrogation techniques, and receive extensive training on permissible investigation methods.
3. Every detainee undergoing an interrogation is allowed full access to a medical examination on a regular basis, as well as upon request.

Accountability issues:

4. Complaints against Israel Security Agency personnel alleging the use of prohibited investigation measures are dealt with in the following manner:
 - 4.1 Persons who are detained by the Israel Security Agency for purposes of investigation are entitled to file complaints concerning any alleged mistreatment during such investigations. All such complaints are thoroughly investigated by the Comptroller of interrogates complaints.
 - 4.2 According to ISA rules of operation, the Comptroller functions independently and no factor in the ISA, including its Head, has jurisdiction to interfere with the findings of the Comptroller.
 - 4.3 Furthermore, the Comptroller functions under the close supervision of a high ranking member in the State Attorney's Office. Additionally, following the termination of the examination of the complaints, the Comptroller's report is thoroughly reviewed by the aforementioned high ranking official in the State Attorney's Office and in cases when the issues at hand are sensitive or circumstances so necessitate – also by the Attorney General and the State Attorney.
 - 4.4 A decision regarding a complaint is made by the Attorney General, the State Attorney and the high ranking member of the State Attorney's Office who is in charge of dealing with this matter, only following a thorough examination of the Comptroller's findings. These decisions are administrative, subject to the judicial review of the High Court of justice, like any other administrative decision.

- 4.5 Since October 2000, thousands of investigations have been conducted, and a relatively low number of complaints have been filed – 65 complaints in 2001; 81 complaints in 2002; 127 complaints in 2003; 115 complaints in 2004; 64 complaints in 2005; 55 complaints in 2006; Most of these complaints were found to be unjustified. When complaints were found to be justified, measures were taken against the investigator involved.
- 4.6 Since the Supreme Court handed down its decision concerning the investigation methods of the ISA, virtually no petitions have been submitted to the High Court of Justice regarding investigation methods. In contrast, previous to the year 2000, hundreds of such petitions were filed. At present, there are no petitions pending from suspects interrogated, or Non-Governmental Organizations such as B'tselem, and Physicians for Human Rights. This is a strong indication of the fact that the investigations are just and lawful, and conducted in accordance with the Supreme Court's ruling. The change has indeed been dramatic.
- 4.7 To this date, no complaint has led to findings that a criminal offence has been committed. However, several disciplinary proceedings have been taken against several ISA personnel. Furthermore, several complaints resulted in reevaluation of interrogation techniques and conditions, and subsequent amendments were made.
- 4.8 The following list details incidents of complaints which led to the disciplinary measures detailed below:
- Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of F.T.A., it was found that an ISA interrogator behaved in an inappropriate manner and he was reprimanded. A general guidance in this matter was issued to all ISA interrogators.
 - Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of H.M.H.A., two general remarks were issued concerning reports during an interrogation to all ISA interrogators.
 - Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of M.A.R.B., certain general remarks concerning the methods of interrogation to all ISA interrogators were relayed.
 - Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of K.M.K.K., a general remark as to the documentation of methods of interrogation was issued.
 - Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of Z.A.K., certain general remarks concerning the methods of interrogation was issued.
 - Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of M.M.M., a general remark concerning the methods of interrogation to all ISA interrogators was issued.
 - Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of F.T.A.S., the ISA interrogators were issued a general remark concerning the methods of interrogation. It was found that there have been difficulties in providing inmates with change of clothing and the Prison Authority was notified accordingly. Additionally, it was concluded that the conditions of the food, both its quantity and quality, did not comply with the accepted standards during the period in question and that there was a necessity for immediate improvement. Accordingly, the Police and the Prison Authority have taken steps to rectify the situation.

- Following the complaint regarding the interrogation of M.A.Y., it was found appropriate to clarify the guidance pertaining to an immediate report regarding a change in a detainee's medical condition whilst undergoing an interrogation.

V. “Issues of family reunification in the context of the Nationality and Entry into Israel (Temporary Order) of 31 July 2003” (para. 21)

1. Since the outbreak of the armed conflict between Israel and the Palestinians towards the end of the year 2000, which led, inter alia, to the commission of dozens of suicide bombings inside Israel, there has been a growing involvement in assistance to terrorist organizations on the part of Palestinians originally from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Such individuals carry Israeli identity cards pursuant to procedures of family unification with Israeli citizens or residents, allowing their free movement between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and into Israel.
2. In order to prevent such potential danger posed by former residents of these areas during the current armed conflict, the Government decided in May 2002 to temporarily suspend granting them legal status in Israel, through the process of family unification. The decision was adopted following the horrendous wave of terror attacks in March of 2002, when 135 Israelis were killed and other 721 were injured.
3. It should be noted that a State has the right to control entry into its territory, and more so, during times of armed conflict, when persons requesting to enter may potentially be involved in acts of violence against its citizens.
4. On July 31, 2003, the Knesset enacted the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision), 5763-2003 which limits the possibility of granting residents of the territories Israeli citizenship pursuant to the Citizenship Law, including by means of family unification; and the possibility of granting such residents residence permits into Israel pursuant to the Entry into Israel Law.
5. The Law is the direct result of 23 murderous terrorist attacks, made possible by the involvement of persons who were granted legal status in Israel based on their marriage to an Israeli citizen, and took advantage of their Israeli ID to pass checkpoints and carry into Israel either suicide bombers or explosives. The Law enables entry to Israel for the purposes of medical treatment, employment, or other temporary grounds, for an overall period of up to six months, as well as the unification of a minor up to the age of 12, with a parent lawfully residing in Israel. Furthermore, the Law does not change the status of people who already received their status prior to the day the Law came into effect. However, those people's status shall not be advanced, yet left static.

6. The Law was enacted for a period of one year. At the end of that period in August, 2004, the Law was extended for another six months. It was re-extended in February 2005 for a period of four more months and has been further extended until August 31, 2005. Simultaneously, the Government had prepared an amended draft of the law, while extending the exceptional cases to which the law does not apply. The revised law was published on August 1, 2005 and was invoked until March 31, 2006. At the end of that period it was extended again and is set to expire in January 2007.
7. The Law, which is a temporary measure, does not change the status of persons who already received their status prior to the day the Law came into effect. However, the Law provides that those people's status shall not be advanced, but instead left static.
8. The amendment to the Law (entitled The Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) (Amendment), 2005) sets several new instructions:
 - The Minister of the Interior may authorize a request for family unification for those who are married to an Israeli spouse, and are residents of the area, for men over the age of 35 and women over the age of 25;
 - Furthermore, the law authorizes the Minister of the Interior to grant residence permits to children of such a couple that are minors under the age of 14;
 - Additionally, with regard to children of such a couple that are minors over the age of 14, the law stipulates that the Minister of the Interior has the authority to grant temporary permits under certain conditions;
 - A request can be denied in cases where the Minister of the Interior or certain security functionaries assert that the person, or a family member of first relation, poses a security threat.
 - In cases where a person or a family member has been known to act for the benefit of the State of Israel, the law enables the Minister of the Interior and certain security functionaries to grant permits to a resident of the area.
9. The Law's constitutionality was scrutinized and recently upheld by the Supreme Court in H.C.J. cases 7052/03, 7102/03 Adalah and others v. The Minister of the Interior (14.5.06). The High Court of Justice, residing in an extended panel of eleven judges, rejected the petitions against the legality of the Law, by a six to five vote. The dissenting opinion was given by the President of the Court, Chief Justice Aharon Barak, whose position was that the law infringes on the constitutional right to family life and equality, in a manner exceeding that required, and the law must therefore be annulled.
10. The majority opinion was given by the Deputy President (retired), Justice Cheshin, whose position was that the law does not harm constitutional rights, and that even if some such harm occurs, it is proportionate. He concluded that the law is constitutional. Judge Naor fully concurred; Judge Gronis held that the law may harm the constitutional right to family life, but the harm is nevertheless proportionate; Judge Adiel also held that the law harms the constitutional right to family life, but the harm is proportionate; similarly, Judge Rivlin held that the law harms the constitutional rights to family life and equality, but the harm is proportionate.

11. Judge Levi held that the law harms the constitutional rights to family life and equality, in a manner exceeding that required, but that the State should be given nine months duration to establish an alternate legislative arrangement.
12. The Court noted that the Government has decided to prepare an amendment to the Law adding exceptions to the general rule that would allow withholding application of the Law to groups of individuals who pose a lower security risk to the lives and security of Israeli citizens. The Supreme Court also pointed out the limited time frame of the Law and that the Government did not extend the Law for the full year. The Court thus did not issue any order concerning the Law, leaving open the possibility to request further information from the Government, if necessary, following the envisioned changes to the Law.

Following this judgment, a discussion was held by the Minister of Justice, which concluded with administrative work headed by the Attorney General, along with the Ministry of the Interior, for the preparation of a Law regulating the acquisition of status in Israel, as a result of a marriage. At present, comprehensive ongoing consultations are taking place as part of these governmental efforts to prepare a Bill that will reflect the Supreme Court's remarks.

Introduction

1. This is the Third Periodic Report of the Government of the State of Israel, submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Committee (HRC) in accordance with the requirements of article 40 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (hereinafter referred to as the “Covenant” or the “ICCPR”). This report has been compiled by the Human Rights and Foreign Relations Department at the Ministry of Justice, in cooperation with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and other Israeli Government bodies. Israeli Non-Governmental Organizations (“NGOs”) were also invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of the present report, both through direct application, and a general invitation to submit remarks posted on the Ministry of Justice Web site. Their contributions were given substantial consideration.
2. Since the submission of the Second Periodic Report (UN document - CCPR/C/ISR/2001/2), many legislative, administrative and judicial developments relevant to the implementation of the Covenant occurred. A short summary of the main changes is included below. This report provides a comprehensive account of these developments. It also addresses the comments made in the concluding observations by the HRC (CCPR/CO/78/ISR) dated August 21, 2003.
3. In terms of legislation, since the submission of Israel’s previous periodic report, noteworthy steps have been taken to promote human rights issues. Some of the more prominent new laws include the Terminally Ill Patient Law 5766-2005 (the “Terminally Ill Patient Law”) which provides an answer to the medical-ethical dilemma present in the treatment of terminally-ill patients. Later that year the Knesset enacted the Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Adaptation to Persons with Mental or Psychological Disability) 5765-2005 (the “Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Adaptation to Persons with Mental or Psychological Disability)”) concerning investigations of persons with intellectual and mental disabilities. In 2006, the Anti Trafficking Law (Legislative Amendments) 5766 - 2006, (the “Anti Trafficking Law”) entered into force, promulgating a broad trafficking crime for a number of illegal purposes. This has paved the way for Israel’s ratification of both the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, as well as the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. In 2007, the Knesset enacted the Criminal Procedure Law (Amendment 51) 5767-2007, accepting the legal doctrine regarding “Abuse of Process” into Israeli criminal law. Later that year, the Knesset enacted the Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments) 5768-2007 (the “Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments)”) which imposes a duty to systematically examine the gender implications of any primary and secondary legislation before it is enacted by the Knesset.
4. While Israel has not enacted any further basic laws (Israel’s constitutional law) on human rights since the submission of its previous Periodic Reports, the fundamental rights protected by the Covenant which are still not included in legislation, are effectively protected through judicial decisions and otherwise.
5. With respect to judicial decisions, the Supreme Court has continued to play a major role in the implementation of civil and political rights. Some of the more prominent cases include HCJ 4634/04 Physicians for human rights et. al. v. The Minister of Public Security, et. al. in which the Supreme Court held that the State must provide a bed to every prisoner held in an Israeli prisons. On May 2006, the Supreme Court delivered a landmark decision, laying down a court-made doctrine on the exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al.). On June, 2007, the Supreme Court rejected two petitions challenging the annual Pride Parade in Jerusalem (HCJ 5277/07 Baruch Marzel v. The Chief of Jerusalem Police, Ilan Franko, and HCJ 5380/07 “Kochav Ehad” Association v. The Chief of Jerusalem Police, Ilan Franko).

6. Lower Court instances also contributed to the protection of human right, as the National Labor Court concluded that a decision of the Minister of Transports to allow transport operatives other than those on strike to provide transportation in the midst of a cessation of services in the city of Beer-Sheva, caused severe, direct, and intentional damage to the workers’ right of association and their right to strike (L.C 57/05 The New Histadrut v. the Minister of Transport). The Tel-Aviv District Court determined that a prisoner held in the custody of the Israel Prisons Service (IPS), is entitled to the same medical treatment provided to all other citizens of the State by the public health services (Administrative Petition 002808/05 Ahmed Yossef Mahmud Altamimi v. Head of IPS’s Medicine Department et al.). The Haifa District Court annulled a decision of the Haifa Traffic Court due to its failure to appoint a defender for the appellant (Cr. A. 002646/07 Zrayek Nimer v. the State of Israel).

7. Some additional developments can be found in an opinion published by the Ombudsman’s Office of the Israeli Judiciary, determining that as a general rule, a detainee is not to be handcuffed during court hearings apart from exceptional cases. On January, 2008, the Jerusalem Planning and Construction Committee delivered for depositing the Jerusalem Mayor’s plan to establish a cemetery for civil burial in the area of the new planned cemetery in Givat Shaul in Jerusalem.

8. The following report addresses the main issues raised by the Covenant in the period between the submission of the Israel’s previous Periodic Report and April 2008, as well as concerns raised by the Human Rights Committee.

Article 1. Self-determination

9. This issue has been discussed in Israel’s previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Article 2. Implementation of the rights in the Covenant

10. General. As discussed in the previous report, international agreements are not, as such, directly applicable as part of Israeli law. Israeli legislation, however, in particular its Basic Laws and case law, have continued to offer wide ranging, effective protection and remedies for the basic rights protected by the Covenant.

11. Basic law: human dignity and liberty. This law continues to serve as a fundamental part of Israeli human rights legislation. This law has had a sustained and heavy influence on the enactment and amendment of new laws, as well as on judicial interpretation of those laws. It continues to influence a wide range of legal and social practices. The Anti Trafficking Law was, for example, enacted in accordance with the Basic Law, and broadly proscribes against trafficking for a number of purposes including prostitution, slavery or forced labor. The Courts have also ruled in accordance with the Basic Law on many occasions. Some notable such instances include the decision in HCJ 4634/04 Physicians for Human Rights et al. v. the Minister of Public Security et al., determining that the State must provide a bed for every prisoner; the landmark decision in C.A 5121/98 Prv. Yisascharov v. the Head Military Prosecutor et al. concerning the exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence; and the decision reached in HCJ 3045/05 Ben-Ari v. the Ministry of the Interior recognizing the right of same-sex couples holding wedding certificates from abroad to be registered as married by the Ministry of the Interior.

12. Case law. In addition, Israeli case law has referred to different provisions of the Covenant in a significant number of decisions. For example, the Supreme Court has referred to the Covenant in relation to article 14(1) concerning the right to a fair trial (Cr.A) 5121/98 Private (res.) Raphael Yisascharov v. The General Military Prosecutor). Other articles similarly referred to include article 14(5) concerning the right to appeal (C.R.A Imri Haim registered association v. Aharon Vigel), article 17 concerning the right to privacy (HCJ 6650/04 Anonymous v. The Netanya District Rabbinic Court), article 23 concerning the right to marry and form a family (HCJ 7052/03 Adalah v. The Ministry of the Interior) and also article 27 in relation to the right to freedom of culture and language (HCJ 4112/99 Adalah v. The Municipality of Tel-Aviv). District Courts have also referred to the rights granted by the ICCPR. The Jerusalem District Court, for example, referred to the Convention in relation to the prohibition of slave-trade and trafficking in persons (D.C.C 5049/02 The State of Israel v. Ofer Hasson).

13. Publicity and dissemination. The second report concerning the implementation of the ICCPR, and the HRC's comments, were widely distributed, thus fuelling public discourse and debate on human rights issues.

14. The newly-established Equal Employment Opportunities Commission in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (ITL), is headed by a National Commissioner, and divided into three district bureaus headed by district commissioners.

15. The Commission derives from a recent amendment to the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5748-1988 (the "Equal Employment Opportunities Law"). Under that amendment, a 21-member advisory committee to the Commission shall be appointed, including representatives of the Authority for the Promotion of the Status of Women, the Commission for Equal Rights of People with Disabilities, relevant Government Ministries, organizations engaged in the promotion of equal employment rights, trade unions and employers organizations, as well as experts in areas associated with the work of the Commission.

16. Under the recent amendment, the Commission is charged, inter alia, with fostering public awareness through education, training and information; encouraging programs and activities; cooperation with relevant persons and bodies; conducting research and gathering information; intervention, with the courts approval, in ongoing legal proceedings; handling complaints regarding the violation of equal employment legislation; submission of requests for general orders; and instructing employers to take general measures regarding all or part of their workforce or employment applicants, designed to ensure compliance with duties imposed by employment equality legislation or to prevent violations of such duties.

17. On November 11, 2007 the Government accepted Resolution Number 2578, concerning the appointment of an Equal Employment Opportunities Commissioner. This position is the first of its kind to be established in Israel. The Commissioner will be responsible for collecting information and hearing complaints from workers concerning instances of sexual harassment, and/or discrimination based on gender, sexual orientation, parenthood, religion and race. Where necessary, the Commissioner will also be responsible for initiating legal action on behalf of any adversely affected workers. The commissioner will also have the authority to request that Courts issue special orders prohibiting sexual harassment in places of work. Violation of these orders will be considered a criminal offence. In addition, the commissioner will be responsible for encouraging special programs relating to equality in employment as well as other educational and promotional activities in working places.

18. Human rights education. In 2008, the Ministry of Education had begun the implementation and assimilation of a fundamental change in teaching civic studies, including Human Rights issues. The goal is to increase the teaching hours given to the subject so far. In the extended program, there is an even greater emphasis on civil and political rights. The Ministry conducts visits to the Knesset and to Israeli Courts, where the pupils meet with members of governmental authorities - judges, police officers, etc. and learn about their performance.

19. Equality. The State of Israel has implemented the obligation to maintain equality in the enjoyment of the Covenant rights in a myriad of ways. Each is discussed in detail with reference to the relevant articles in this report, and in particular articles 3, 26 and 27.

20. Nationality. This issue has been discussed in our previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of our second periodic report.

Israel's Security Agency Law

21. As detailed in previous reports, Israel took it upon itself to legislate a specific law with regards to the Israel Security Agency (ISA). The enactment of the Israel Security Agency Law 5762-2000 (the "Israel Security Agency Law") is a very significant development in the implementation of the Covenant since the submission of our previous periodic report to this committee. This law addresses several major issues concerning the mandate, operation, and scope of power of the ISA, and will be further discussed below [A translation of the law is attached to this periodic report and is marked "A"].

22. The Law states that the head of the Agency shall be appointed by the Government and upon the proposal of the Prime Minister for a five-year term, unless the Government has prescribed a shorter term in its appointment resolution. The head of the Agency shall be in charge of the administration and operation of the ISA, as well as the development of its capabilities.

23. The law specifically provides that the Prime Minister shall be in charge of the ISA on the Government's behalf, and that no mission shall be imposed on the ISA for the promotion of party-political interests.
24. The law also establishes a Ministerial Committee for the ISA. The Committee shall operate on the ISA's behalf in the matters prescribed, and shall be composed of five members including: the Prime Minister, the Minister of Defence, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Public Security.
25. Section 7 of the law details the mission of the Agency, as follows:
- “The Agency shall be in charge of the protection of State security and the order and institutions of the democratic regime against threats of terrorism, sabotage, subversion, espionage and disclosure of State secrets; and the Agency shall also act to safeguard and promote other State interests vital for national State security, all as prescribed by the Government and subject to every law.”
26. Next, the law particulates the ISA's functions:
- “(1) Foiling and preventing illegal activities aimed at harming State security, or the order or institutions of the democratic regime;
- (2) Protecting persons, information and places as determined by the Government;
- (3) Determining directives on security classification for positions and offices in the public service and in other bodies, as determined by the Government, except for public appointees and judges; and determining the security suitability of a person for a position or office that holds a security classification, including by the use of polygraph tests, all as shall be prescribed by rules. In this paragraph, “judges” means any person holding judicial authority under the Basic Law: the Judiciary, except candidates for the judiciary and except a military judge under the Military Justice Law, 5715-1955;
- (4) Establishing protection practices for bodies as determined by the Government;
- (5) Conducting intelligence research and providing advice and position appraisals for the Government, and other bodies, as determined by the Government;
- (6) Conducting activities in any other area determined by the Government, with the approval of the Knesset Service Affairs Committee, which is designed to safeguard and promote State interests vital to the national security of the State;
- (7) Collection and receipt of information for safeguarding and promoting the interests set forth in this section.
27. Section 8 to this law also grants the ISA the following general powers for the purpose of fulfilling its functions in the receipt and collection of information: to pass on information to other bodies in accordance with rules to be prescribed and subject to the provisions of any law; to investigate suspects and suspicions in connection with the commission of offences or to conduct investigations for the purpose of preventing offences in certain prescribed areas; to enlist the assistance of any person who is not an ISA employee for the carrying out of tasks in accordance with rules to be prescribed; ISA officials shall have the powers of police officers to fulfill certain functions, following authorization from the head of the ISA to enter certain premises not being a closed private structure, in order to conduct inspections and to carry out protective and preventative actions for a limited period.

28. Section 12 compels routine reports of the head of the ISA to the Ministerial Committee and to the Knesset Service Affairs Committee, from time to time and no less than every three months, on the activity of the Agency. Special reports shall be submitted to these Committees, at their request, pursuant to rules prescribed.

29. Section 13 to the Law also affixes an Agency comptroller, to be appointed by the Prime Minister in consultation with the head of the ISA. The Comptroller shall conduct internal auditing of the ISA pursuant to the provisions of the Internal Auditing Law, 5752-1992, and shall assist the Government and the Ministerial Committee in fulfilling their functions. The Comptroller shall submit an annual report on his findings, and any periodic report made by him, to the head of the ISA, the Ministerial Committee and the Knesset Service Affairs Committee.

30. According to section 18, an ISA employee or a person acting on behalf of the agency shall not bear criminal or civil responsibility for any act or omission performed in good faith and reasonably by him within the scope and in performance of his function; yet the provisions of this section shall not derogate from disciplinary responsibility under the provisions of any law.

Article 3. Equal rights of men and women

31. Since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report, there has been significant progress enhancing the status of women in Israel. This progress is clearly apparent in the adoption of several new and notable acts of legislation; in precedent setting decisions handed down by the courts; and in actions and initiatives taken by the different government bodies. At the same time, however, in certain areas of Israeli society, women are still comparatively underprivileged, and more efforts need to be invested.

32. Complete equality between men and women before the law is entrenched in Israel, except in some of the matters governed by religious law. The Equal Rights for Women Law 5711-1951 (the "Equal Rights for Women Law") states in section 1, that the same laws shall apply to men and women regarding "any legal action", and that any law discriminating against women shall be null and void. The Law also equates the legal status of women to that of men.

33. On November 20, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments) which imposes a duty to systematically examine the gender implications of any primary and secondary legislation before it is enacted by the Knesset. The Law is aimed to expose any hidden inequalities between men and women that might be present in different bills, in order to advance the status of equality between both genders. According to the Law, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women will submit to the relevant Knesset committee an opinion concerning the gender implications of any bill or secondary legislation, when brought for its consideration or approval. This will allow Knesset members participating in committee hearings to become acquainted with any gender implications inherent in legislation, if such implications in fact exist. In addition, the submission of these opinions will be anchored in the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law 5758-1998 (the "Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law") as one of the official functions of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women.

34. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (the "AASW") has provided a detailed survey of its actions and programs, entitled "Beijing +10" which was published in March 2005.

35. The Equal Rights for Women Law was amended by the Knesset in 2000, and amended again in 2005. The 4th Amendment to the Law (July 20, 2005), determined that any task force appointed by the Government for the creation of foreign and/or interior national policies (including negotiation teams working towards a peace agreement) must include an appropriate number of women. In order to effectively implement and enforce the provision, the appointing body must report on its composition to the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, which will in turn examine the details, going towards the construction of an annual report to be submitted to the Committee on the Status of Women concerning the adequate representation of women in national policy task forces.

36. Women's representation in political parties and the Knesset. Women are still underrepresented in political positions, both in the national and municipal levels. However, there have been significant positive changes in the past few years. In national elections, several of the large parties included women's representation as a dominant factor in the establishment of party lists (through appointments, quotas, affirmative action etc.). Of the 120 members of the Knesset, 17 are women, and from among those women, one is of Arabic descent. The Speaker of the Knesset, MK Dalia Itzik, is a woman and three other women are chairpersons of different Knesset committees: MK Nadia Hilou, Chairperson of the Committee on the Rights of the Child, MK Sofa Landver, Chairperson of the Public Petitions Committee and MK Zahava Gal-on, Chairperson of the Subcommittee on Trafficking in Women.

Women in government, local authorities and the civil service

37. Women in local authorities. As of January 2007, out of 253 possible appointments, there were only 6 women actively employed as mayors, or heads of local councils/authorities. Local authorities employ 2,934 public-elected persons in total, of which only 13.2% are women.

38. In 2003-2004, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women sponsored two central conferences, in order to augment the number of women preparing to run for local council. The first conference was attended by more than 200 persons, including advisors to mayors, heads of local councils, and women responsible for the status of women in Government Ministries. The event was notably sponsored in conjunction with the Center for Local Government. The second conference, attended by more than 100 representatives from women's organizations, was sponsored in conjunction with the Council of Women's Organizations. In addition, in order to prepare these women for the upcoming council elections, the Authority is actively and deliberately encouraging the women involved to run for other elected positions; such as committee chairpersons, neighborhood council chairpersons, positions with parents' committees, etc.

39. In order to further enhance the status of women, the Authority has also engaged in activities aimed at deepening the knowledge and commitment of council women with regards to the status of women in their localities. These plans have long term benefits in addition to the short-term ones. They will assist in gradually preparing a cadre of women willing to run for local office in future elections (the next currently being scheduled for 2008), and in providing them with knowledge and skills, both personal and institutional empowerment, and the opportunity for widespread networking that they will need to run effective campaigns.

40. The Authority also sponsors ongoing courses and workshops for persons advising mayors and heads of local councils. In these courses, the Authority emphasizes personal skills, inculcates values relating to gender equality and provides the participants with further academic and practical skills. As part of this course, for example, the participants are required to analyze the municipal budgets from a gender point of view and they are provided with expert guidance and mentoring to enable them to do so. In cooperation with the Advisor on the Status of Women in the Civil Service, the Authority has actively promoted the interests of supervisors for the status of women in Governmental Ministries. This support has included workshops, conferences, preparation and distribution of informational materials and more.

41. Local councils. Legislation passed in the year 2000, detailed in the previous report, mandates that every local council must actively promote the status of women. To that end, each council must appoint an Advisor on the Status of Women who is to report directly to the mayor and/or head of the local council on pertinent matters. As a direct subordinate to the head of the local council, the Advisor is dedicated to ensuring ongoing communication between the head of council and the local women's council (where such a women's council exists) and to initiating policies for the advancement of the status of women within the local authority. As an additional safeguard, the Law further empowers the Minister of the Interior to order that local councils follow the law's directives, and in the event that local councils should fail to comply, to personally appoint an Advisor on the Status of Women on the councils' behalf. As of 2008, 219 of the 253 local authorities had appointed such an advisor.

42. The Authority disseminated personal communications to all 253 of the mayors and heads of municipalities in Israel, concerning appropriate representation of women in municipal corporations and companies. The Authority supervises appointments made to counsels, commissions, and state committees, and decisively warns the appointing bodies of the consequences, if provisions of the Law on appropriate representation of women are not implemented. In addition to this activity, and at the initiative of the Authority, the Attorney General and the Secretary of Government informed all government bodies of the unequivocal duty to include women within their ranks.

43. Arab women in local authorities. Whilst the representation of elected Jewish women in local authority councils equals 14.2%, Arab women comprise only 0.5% of those elected. This gap is usually explained as being the result of various sociocultural factors, such as the impact of religion and local tradition on certain minority communities which can restrict women from considering running for elections to these positions.

44. To assist in remedying this situation, 203 female Advisors on the Status of Women in local municipalities are currently employed, 40 of whom work in the Arab sector. These advisors ensure the advancement of policy for enhancing the status of women within the purview of the local authority, in addition to ensuring that the necessary resources are provided to this end.

45. The Department for the Advancement of Women within the Civil Service, continues to play a vital role in various areas including the implementation within the Civil Service of legislation oriented towards the improvement of women's status, the promotion of information and counseling for women within the civil service, as well as the formation and professional orientation of professionals working to promote the advancement of women in the Civil Service. The Department has also served as a vestibule for the receipt of complaints by female workers, and has worked at maintaining ongoing contact with organizations dealing with women's status in furtherance of common objectives. The Department also plays a significant role in engaging with the various Knesset committees to advance women's rights legislation.

46. The prevention of sexual harassment within the Civil Service. The Department has been involved on several levels with regards to the implementation of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law 5758-1998, and reinforcement of awareness on that subject. In illustration, dissemination of information, and explanations of the Law were made available to more than 50,000 workers in 2005, and Supervisors on the Status of Women were provided with tools so that they might better receive the workers' complaints. Indeed, since the passage of the Law in 1998, the number of complaints regarding sexual harassment received by the Department has dramatically increased, with 82 complaints received in 2005, and 64 complaints received in 2006. These Complaints are handled in cooperation with the Unit for Discipline and the Investigations Department within the Civil Service Administration. All women who submit complaints of sexual harassment to the Department are provided with legal advice, and are accompanied and supported throughout the investigative process up until completion of any ensuing trial. In certain cases administrative measures are also taken to separate the alleged assailant from the victim. In 2006, 11 disciplinary administrative measures resulted in court proceedings. Of those instances, 5 workers were fired, and 5 others retired from the civil service following the initiation of procedures against them.

47. The Department for the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service supervises the affirmative action policy asserted in section 15A of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law 5719-1959 (the "Civil Service (Appointments) Law (Appointments)"). According to data received from the Department in 2006, the representation of women has improved among the higher ranks of the civil service.

48. Ranks of women in the Civil Service. The civil service has four main classifications which comprise the main sources in which administration managers may be ranked. The number of women featured among the top three ranking senior staff positions is slowly improving. In 1997, women comprised 61% of all civil servants, yet high ranking female civil servants numbered less than 15%. In October 1999, women still comprised 61% of all civil servants, only the number of high ranking women had increased to 16.4%. As of December 31, 2006, 45% of the top four ranking positions, and 43% of the top three ranking positions were held by women. It should be noted that these figures do not include women in the security forces, but does include all other ranks such as nurses and advocates, in which the representation of women is very high.

49. Tenders in the Civil Service. The method of appointment to the civil service is through both internal and external tenders. While the increase of female participation in internal job-tenders within the civil service (both as candidates and as appointees) is quite constant, the situation in public tenders is less positive. In 2004, 45% of the candidates for public tenders were women. Of these tenders women constituted 58% of the appointees.

50. On September 23, 2007, the Tel-Aviv District Labor Court annulled a tender for employment with the Investigations Department of the Tel-Aviv Customs Division, as the Examiners Committee had not paid sufficient attention to the requirement for proper representation by women, and had not taken affirmative action, as required by law, in giving preference to women possessing the same qualifications as men: (L.C 3888/03 Ruth Zuretz v. the State of Israel - the Civil Service Commissioner et al.). There were 26 candidates vying for only a few positions, and the claimant was the only woman.

51. The Court held that the duty to take action for proper representation of women in public entities is anchored in legislation; such as The Equal Rights for Women Law: (section 6(c)), the Civil Service Law (Appointments): (section 15(a)); and also in Case-Law, especially that handed down in the case of HCJ 2671/98 Israel Women's Network v. the Minister of Labor and Welfare and in HCJ 453/454/94 Israel Women's Network v. the Government of Israel et al. The Court indicated there that in 2003, the Attorney General had issued special guidelines obligating the implementation of the proper representation principle when making appointments in the civil service.

52. The Court held that the Examiners Committee failed to consider, or did not give proper weight to, the issue of affirmative action when choosing between the claimant (the only female candidate) and the successful male candidate whose qualifications were evidentially inferior to those of the claimant. The Court held that the extreme lack of reasonableness displayed in making the decision justified the Court's intervention in the Examiners Committee's decision, which had been approved by the Civil Service Commissioner. Of the 27 applicants, the claimant was the only woman. As that fact had not been properly considered by the Committee, the Court decided to annul the decision to appoint a different candidate.

53. The judiciary and lawyers in the public sector. Since the submission of our previous periodic report, the percentage of women in the Judiciary has substantially increased. There has been a growth of 72% in the National Labor Court, 42 % in the District Courts, and 28% in the Supreme Court. In all of the different civil courts combined, there are 317 female judges, and 304 male judges, so that 51 per cent of the civil judiciary in Israel is now composed of women (compared to a total of 40 per cent in 1998). In 2007 alone, 49 new judges were appointed, 27 of whom were females.

54. Internship directory. In 2008, the Ministry of Justice announced, for the second year, the creation of a directory of candidates for internship positions that are intended for the Arab population, new immigrants from Ethiopia and people with severe disabilities, in order to achieve suitable representation. The announcement:

“Civil Service Commission - Ministry of Justice

Looking for an Internship in a Challenging and Interesting Place? The Ministry of Justice announces the creation of a directory of candidates for internship positions for September 2008 and March 2009. These positions are intended for certain population groups to achieve suitable representation, as described below.

The Ministry of Justice invites candidates who meet the requirements for internship as specified in the Israeli Bar Association Law, 5731 - 1971, and the criteria set forth in the Government's Resolution of March 12, 2006 with respect to suitable representation among interns in the Ministry of Justice, as described below, to submit their candidacy for inclusion in the directory.

The list of the divisions in the Ministry of Justice in which the internship may be done is specified on the Website of the Ministry of Justice, the address of which appears at the end of this notice.

On March 12, 2006, the Government of Israel made a resolution, at the request of the Ministry of Justice, in the matter of suitable representation among interns in the Ministry of Justice. The Government decided, inter alia, as follows:

“A. In accordance with the provisions of section 15A(b)(2) of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law to designate, insofar as possible, some ten percent of the annual class of interns in the Ministry of Justice solely for the employment of candidates who qualify for an internship in the Ministry of Justice and fulfill one of these:

- (1) The candidate is a member of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassian;
- (2) The candidate or one of his/her parents was born in Ethiopia;
- (3) The candidate is a “person with a severe disability” within its meaning in section 35.252 of the Civil Service Regulations ...”

In accordance with the aforesaid resolution, it was decided to compile a directory of candidates that will effectuate the aforesaid Government Resolution with respect to “suitable representation” and will include candidates who meet the criteria set forth in the Government's Resolution and whose particulars and qualifications make them extremely suitable for internship. Selection will take place in two stages. The first stage is a selection process for inclusion in the directory. After that the various divisions in the Ministry will interview candidates for internship from among the candidates accepted for inclusion in the directory.

A directory of “suitable representation” candidates will be maintained alongside the general directory of candidates for internship positions in the Ministry of Justice, for which a separate selection process is held, open to all. A person who meets the criteria of the aforesaid Government Resolution may submit his/her candidacy for the general directory, like everyone else.

Procedure for Submitting Candidacy

1. The candidate must complete the “candidacy for tender form” (Form 2115 - which may be downloaded from the Website of the Civil Service Commission, whose address appears below).

2. If the candidate has a preference for specific divisions, the candidate should mention the order of priority on his/her application.
3. The candidate must attach to the candidacy form his/her resume (which shall include explanations and reference to fulfillment of the criteria specified in the Government's Resolution), a photocopy of his/her identity card, documents testifying to the candidate's education, record of grades for the first two years of college or university, confirmation of present and previous employment and recommendations.

Selection Procedure

- Candidates who meet the candidacy acceptance requirements will be invited, at the discretion of the Ministry of Justice, to appear before committees of examiners. These committees will examine the suitability of the candidates for internship based on their impression of the candidate, the candidate's contribution to society and community, test results and academic achievements. Candidates whom the committees find suitable for internship will be listed in the directory of "suitable representation" candidates for internship.
- Listing in the directory will enable the candidate in the tender to be a potential candidate for internship. Inclusion does not entail any obligation to accept the candidate for internship.
- The division heads may refer to lists in the directory according to their needs and according to the preferences of the candidates that were recorded at the time of registration, and invite them to appear before the ministerial selection committee, which will examine their suitability for internship.
- A candidate who is selected will be assigned to internship based on the Ministry's needs and, to the extent possible, taking into account his/her place of residence.
- A candidate who is selected and commits to do his/hers internship in a certain division of the Ministry is not allowed to switch the commitment to another division.

55. Government corporations. As mentioned in our previous Periodic Report, the 1993 amendment to the Government Corporations Law, 5735-1975 (section 18a) set a requirement for appropriate representation of both genders on the board of directors of every government corporation. According to recent data, 182 of a total of 550 directors (33.09% per cent) are women, a decline of 3.91% in comparison to the last report.

56. On March 11, 2007, the Government resolved to obligate Ministers to appoint women to directorates of Government Corporations until they achieve a 50% representation of women within two years from the date of the Government Resolution. The Governmental Corporations Authority supervises closely and effectively any appointments made to directorates of Government Corporations. If the appointments do not adhere to the obligating standards, the Authority holds them until the appointing Minister proposes an alternative female nominee or can justify why he/she can not propose any alternative nominee under these circumstances.

Women in the military and police

57. As mentioned in our previous reports, military professions in Israel, including combat positions are open to both men and women. The military headship is committed to placing women in higher ranks and positions. The following details indicate the integration of women in compulsory service in combat positions: 2.5 % of all the women serving in the military are in combat units (updated October 2006); women account for 4% of all combat soldiers (updated July 2006); the percentage of women in comparison to men in joint units is 19%. Note that in 2007, the percent of women in compulsory service out of all soldiers is 33%. Most combat female soldiers serve in field units: the percent of women in the light infantry is 68%; Border Police 9%; artillery 12%; atomic, biological and chemical units of the engineering corps 33%; anti-aircraft 30%. In addition, there are 16 women serving today as air crew personnel.

58. The Chief of Staff's Advisor on Women's Issues has recently promoted three major projects:

58.1. The establishment of the Women Military Service Committee aimed to outline the vision and make recommendations concerning structural aspects of military service of women. The Committee is headed by a former General and consists of several senior officers and academic specialists.

58.2. Consolidation of a military behavioral code on gender issues which will constitute obligating norms and standards for soldiers and officers and influence the cultural environment and army daily life concerning gender issues.

58.3. Setting goals for a progressive improvement of women representation in the army and promotion of a plan for increasing the representation of women in senior leadership positions which includes specific targets for each of the corps and based on the percent of women entitled for promotion within each rank.

59. The IDF is obligated to advance women who serve in the army beyond their compulsory military service. In 2007, women consisted 19% of the standing army (officers and non-commissioned officers): First Lieutenant - the percent of women is 26.3%; Captain - 22.8%; Major - 21.8%; Lieutenant Colonel - 11.8%; Colonel - 4.6%; Brigadier General - 3.8%.

60. According to section 16A(c) to Defence Service Law (Consolidated Version) 5746-1986, the same law shall apply to men and women who completed their compulsory service and volunteer to serve in one of the IDF positions determined by the Minister of Defense, despite the difference in duration in women compulsory service in comparison to men's. The Defence Service Regulations (Determination of Positions for Voluntary Service of Women) 5761-2001, following amendments in 2002 and 2005, lists 26 military professions in which women are entitled to the same rights as men.

61. Since the submission of our previous report, the Supreme Court held a hearing concerning a petition of a female soldier that demanded to allow women to hold positions in a Vulcan launcher unit which is one of the IDF anti-aircraft units (HCJ 6757/03 Ya'ara Stulberg v. the Minister of Defence et al). The State argued that statistically only one percent of all women can meet the physiologically pre-conditions required for serving in the unit operating the Vulcan launcher. The petition is still pending before the Supreme Court due to the fundamental aspects of the issue, even though the petitioner completed her military service.

62. In 2006 and 2007, a number of significant amendments were made to the Women's Employment Law, 5714-1954. Inter alia, these changes prohibit the employment of women during their maternity leave; prolong the period of leave permitted after hospitalization; prolong the period during which an employer is prohibited from dismissing an employee returning from maternity leave to 60 days; prolong the period during which dismissal of a female employee staying in a battered women's shelter is not permitted, to 90 days (also requiring the consent of the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services); extends maternity leave from 12 to 14 weeks; and notably alters the pre-existing conditions so that after 6 weeks maternity leave should a new mother decide to return to work, or otherwise waive her remaining leave, the father will be permitted permanent, (previously temporary), leave in her stead, for the duration of the maternity leave.

63. On July 26, 2007, the National Labor Court rejected an appeal from a former female employee in the Knesset, who claimed that she was discriminated against in salary and retirement benefits in comparison to her male counterparts (La. A. 000222/06 Shoshana Kerem v. the State of Israel). The Court found that the appellant failed to prove that she experienced discrimination in comparison to her male colleagues, neither on the basis of the Equal Salary to Male and Female Workers Law 5714-1954 nor on the basis of Equal Employment Opportunities Law.

64. In its decision, the Court held that "the principle of equality is one of the basic principles of every democratic state. The principle of equality is a cornerstone in our legal regime. The principle of equality derives from the basic rights of every person and the natural desire of human beings to live side by side in harmony, fraternity and peace". The Court concluded that the prohibition of discrimination derives from the principle of equality and is anchored in the Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law 5756-1996 (the "Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law") and the Equal Employment Opportunities Law. In this case, however, the Court held that the Knesset former employee did not prove any connection between the claimed discrimination and her being a woman.

65. On August 24, 2006, the Jerusalem District Labor Court ordered compensation to be paid by the ISS Ashmoret Company Ltd. to their employee, who was illegally dismissed from her job when 7 months pregnant, without the approval of the Women Labor Supervisor, in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Employment: (LC. 001452/04 Ayenalem Ababito v. the ISS Ashmoret Company Ltd). The Court accepted all the plaintiff's claims, and determined that the respondents had illegally dismissed her from her job when they discovered she was pregnant. In accordance with the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Court imposed personal responsibility on both the branch director, and the regional director of the employee. The Court also ordered that the ISS Company pay the employee approximately 300,000 NIS, in compensation for dismissal, mental anguish, loss of earnings and loss of maternity allowance.

66. On November 20, 2007, the State Labor Court ruled that “freedom of contract” does not justify discrimination such as that evidenced by paying different salaries to men and women performing the same tasks. The court stated that in these circumstances, the principle of equality prevails over freedom of contract: (L.A 1156/04 Orit Goren v. Home Center (Do It Yourself) Ltd.). The plaintiff resigned after 4 months of work, after her employer denied her claim that she was being discriminated against in salary. She had compared her salary to that of another male worker who received 1,500 NIS more than she did, even though they both performed the same duties. In response, the respondent claimed that the difference in salary was the end result of negotiations held with all workers before they were hired to work, and during which the plaintiff had demanded less money than the other worker. The Lower Court ruled that there was no justification for the difference in salaries paid to the plaintiff and her colleague, and stated that the plaintiff was being discriminated against based solely on her gender.

67. The State Labor Court rejected the position that “freedom of contract” justified discrimination between salaries, and unanimously approved the Lower Court’s decision, granting 7,000 NIS compensation to the plaintiff for her 4 months of work, based on the Equal Pay (Male and Female Employees) Law. However, the majority opinion ruled that as the difference in salary was the result of negotiations made prior to employment, the plaintiff had not been discriminated against based on the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, and therefore had no right to compensation for non-pecuniary damage in contrast to the Lower Court’s ruling. Nevertheless, the dissenting opinion of the State Labor Court’s President, argued that there was no difference in the level of proof required for granting compensation for violations of both laws, and accepted the Lower Court’s ruling, granting additional compensation to the plaintiff based on the Equal Employment Opportunities Law.

68. In La. A. 8704/06 Nadav Fitusi v. N&B Bogin Sports Center Ltd - the plaintiff was employed by the respondent as a gym instructor and was dismissed from work following the respondent’s desire to replace him with a female instructor. There was no disagreement among parties that the dismissal was due solely to the plaintiff’s gender.

69. In its decision, the Tel-Aviv Labor Court held that “any discrimination based on gender is a negative social phenomenon that is to be uprooted completely. The prohibition on discrimination derives not only from the provisions of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5758-1988, but also from the general principle of equality which is part of our legal system and anchored in Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity”.

70. The Court held that in order to prove discrimination, the worker needs only to convince the court that such prohibited consideration was actually a factor for the employer’s decision, even if it was not the main reason. Based on section 10 of the Equal Employment Opportunities Law, the Court ordered the respondent to pay 30,000 NIS compensation to the plaintiff, considering the specific circumstances of the case.

71. Opportunities in the workforce have increased for women since the submission of our previous periodic report. In response to that growth, women’s participation in the workforce has also increased from 37.5% in 1980, to 50.0% in 2005. The employment rate for women aged 15-64 is similar to that for women in equivalent age groups in other developed countries, and stands at 58.1%, in comparison to 58.3% in the European countries of the OECD, and 60.4% in all of the OECD states.

72. As of 2005, approximately 54% of working Israeli women were still concentrated in a small number of widespread, female-dominated, labor-intensive and low-paying occupations, such as teachers, clerks, secretaries, nurses and nannies. In each of these sectors the percentage of female employees is at least 75%. In comparison, the percentage of women working in high-tech positions was only 2.4% of the total working women in 2005, constituting 34% of hired workers in the high-tech industry. In addition, women are the first to be hit by unemployment. In 2003, the annual national unemployment rate was 10.7%. Women's unemployment reached nearly 11.3% in that year, whilst men's unemployment hovered around 10.2%. According to data provided by the Bank of Israel, in 2006, when the annual national unemployment rate was 8.4%, women's unemployment reached nearly 9%, whilst the male unemployment rate remained at 7.9%. Several legislative changes seeking to narrow the gender gap (which is still apparent in some areas) are detailed below.

Education

73. The Ministry of Education has established a special department dedicated to the promotion of gender equality within the School System. The Ministry maintains an active, useful, and user-friendly website which not only provides information about the Ministry's programs and projects, but additionally provides visitors with perspectives on the meaning of gender equality and women's empowerment. The language of the website, and of directives issued by the Ministry of Education, reveal a clear commitment to gender equality and provide definitive guidelines for teachers and all school officials.

74. The current Minister of Education and her Director General are both women, and feminists themselves. The Minister of Education has repeatedly and explicitly declared that gender equality is not merely a "program" or a "project"; but a life-style. To that end, all schools are instructed the creation and maintenance of an educational climate conducive to equality and mutual respect.

75. In 2003, the Director General of the Ministry of Education issued a circular dealing with various aspects of gender equality, such as the development of new educational materials conducive to gender equality, the advancement of equal opportunities, the abandonment of dated stereotypes, the empowerment of educational leadership among teachers and principles, and more.

76. The Ministry of Education offers numerous In-Service Training Programs for teachers in order to increase their awareness of, and skills in promotion of, gender equality. Nation-wide programs such as "Girls Leading a Change" empower high school pupils, while the school curriculum formally addresses issues such as gender, government, and politics. Most recently, the Ministry has instituted a matriculation program in gender studies.

77. In 2005, the Ministry of Education instituted several educational programs designed to further enhance equal opportunity between the genders within the education system. The abovementioned program “Girls Leading a Change” was initiated by the Women’s Association in Israel to encourage empowerment and leadership amongst young women in high schools. The program was later broadened to include young men, and is now called “Girls and Boys Leading a Change”. In 2007, the program was found to be operating in more than 60 high schools in Israel, including schools in the Arab sector, and involved more than 2,500 young women and men. Also in 2005, the Ministry of Education together with the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women held 10 one-day seminars (in which more than 1,500 school principals participated) on the subject of encouraging girls in the fields of mathematics and exact sciences. The seminars dealt with the following issues: raising awareness of professional and management teams for this matter, illustrating the perceived barriers to female participation in this field, illustrating the actual ability of female students and methods of deconstructing these barriers, development of an intervention program encouraging female participation in these fields from an early age, and other relevant issues.

78. Furthermore, the Minister of Education appointed a special committee to examine the extent to which gender stereotypes were to be found in educational textbooks. After receiving the findings, the Minister decided not to incorporate books imbued with gender stereotypes into the education system, and those books already in use in the school system which promoted gender stereotypes would be gradually replaced.

79. The Ministry has made a particular commitment to promoting the talents of young girls and women who display exceptional aptitudes in math and science. These programs are based on the concept of enhancing gender equality, and allow each child to pursue his or her innate talents and inclinations without deference to social pressures and inflexible gender expectations.

80. Additional activities targeting gender issues include:

80.1. Promotion of a pluralistic view, enabling pupils to learn to deal with and criticize gender based dilemmas, emerging in society as a whole and in school life in particular.

80.2. Facilitating the equal acknowledgement of the role of both genders in all the cultural aspects - literature, science, history, arts, etc, whilst emphasizing the equal role of female figures.

80.3. The teaching material includes gender stereotypes, implied or apparent, emanating from the time and context in which the text was written. The objective is raising awareness to the stereotypes and challenging them.

81. “Bnot Mitzvah”- the Jewish ritual when a girl reaches 12 years, is used as a school event for the 6th graders and as a tool to highlight the female strength, and different substances regarding women leaders, influential women that changed society, women combatants, pioneers and others. This includes outer activities as well as in-school ones. The pupils examine the status of women in Israel and in other countries, and search for disciplines promoting women and allowing them to progress.

82. Empowering female pupils in the general school system aimed at promoting leadership and empowerment of pupils in the 7th-9th grades, which include themes promoting awareness to gender equality and its influence on all aspects of life. The program includes raising awareness to the possibilities facing the pupils in fulfillment of their personal potential, skills advancement, and social and personal awareness to changes needed in the social and personal aspects of the family, the society, and the education system. It also includes raising appreciation to the ability and potential of women to integrate in the economic, political, technological and military sectors and the importance of such integration. The program also includes activities with the male pupils aimed at changing their gender perceptions.

83. Empowering female pupils in the Arab sector program aimed at promoting and changing personal and social perspectives while emphasizing the role of women in the family, the society and in the workplace. The program targets 7th-9th graders and includes themes promoting awareness for stereotypes regarding both genders in the Arab society, their perception of their abilities and dreams etc. The program includes corresponding activities with the male pupils aimed at changing their gender-based perceptions.

84. Empowering female pupils in the religious schools while considering the changes in society in general and the religious society in particular. Coping with these developments requires from the religious women a re-evaluation of the fulfillment of the roles that fashion the home, family and society. This program includes 10 meetings and is targeted at pupils in the 7th-9th grade.

85. Promotion of equality in human dignity. The basis of the program is that gender equality also means equality in human dignity between the genders. Among the goals of the program is raising the personal capability of teenagers to deal with changing social circumstances with the peer group (peer pressure, social struggles, friendship relations etc.), and with the relationship with the adult world (authority, requesting help etc). During the program the pupils study social perceptions and equality on the basis of human dignity of men and women. The program is introduced to pupils in the 7th-10th grades.

86. Another important track for promoting human rights issues is the Civic Studies Programs:

86.1. The program for the 7th-9th grades includes diverse aspects of human rights, theoretical teaching as well as application on every-day events in the society and state. The main focus is on different rights implemented in the covenant such as the right to life, the right for equal treatment, the right to due process, the right for liberty, etc.

86.2. The program for the 10th-12th grades includes specific reference to the rights implemented in the covenant and the matriculation exam includes theoretical and practical questions aimed at enabling the pupils to express the knowledge they acquired on human rights.

86.3. In 2008, the Ministry of Education had begun the implementation and assimilation of a fundamental change in teaching civic studies. During the following three years, the goal is to increase the teaching hours given to the subject so far. In the extended program, there is an even greater emphasis on civil and political rights. In the framework of the program, the pupils will commence a practical research assignment in which they will be required to research and propose solutions to a social or political problem existing in the State. Some of the issues addressed will be human rights issues.

86.4. Furthermore, in recent years the civic studies subject can be also taken in an extended version, thus these areas are explored even further.

87. Women in higher education. In 2004, 13.7% of women over the age of 18 were graduates of a B.A degree, in comparison to 11.5% of men over the age of 18. Additionally 7.4% of women had M.A degrees in comparison to 7.1% of men, and 0.7% of women had PhD degrees whilst the percentile for the male population was 1.4%.

88. 90,500 male students and 113,600 female students attended university or academic colleges in Israel. The amount of women studying towards B.A. degrees in all the universities and academic colleges (out of the total number of students) was 55% in 2005, compared to 54% in 1990. The rate of women studying for an M.A. degree in all universities and academic colleges (out of the total number of students) stood at 57% in 2005, compared to 50% in 1990, and the amount of women studying towards PhD's equaled 52% in 2005 in comparison to 41% in 1990.

89. Women in science and technology. The National Council for the Promotion of Women in Science and Technology was established in the year 2000. The council's goals are to serve as a network facilitator linking adult and adolescent women in the field of science and technology, to serve as a contact point for voicing problems related to women's roles in science, to collect information regarding programs promoting women's role in science, to propose and implement programs which will promote women in science, to raise public awareness regarding the state of women in science and to coordinate between public and private initiatives for the advancement of women's involvement in science.

90. Women in sports. In Israel, sports come under the province of the Ministry of Science, Culture and Sports. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, together with the Minister, has designed a unique training course for women, educating them on ways to become active and committed members of local and national Councils for the Advancement and Administration of Sports in Israel. In the years 2003-2004, several women's sports NGOs, encouraged by the Ministry of Education and the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in Israel, initiated legislative changes that have profoundly impacted women's and girls' sports. In response to an appeal, Israel's High Court of Justice ruled that in order to redress long-standing inequality issues, local councils should allocate funds for women's sports at 150% of that allocated to men's sports: (HCJ 5325/01 L.C.N Association for the Advancement of Women Basketball v. Ramat-Hasharon Local Council). Similarly, the public committee that determines criteria for the allocation of public funding for sports has recommended the application of affirmative action plans to boost allocation towards women's sports, and has instituted programs to implement them.

91. Women in the media. Freedom of the press is both legislatively guaranteed and protected. In recent years, a corps of motivated, committed, female journalists has developed. Avowedly feminist, they present women's issues on the news, discuss non-traditional topics such as national security and the military, and bring a gender perspective to their analysis of events and issues. Several women host prime time programs, both on radio and television. Similarly, in the print media, several feminist columnists and reporters from all political and religious affiliations have attained prominence. These women bring women's issues to the fore and engage in feminist campaigns; for example, a group of prominent female journalists in print and electronic media have taken it upon themselves to campaign and fundraise for the Rape Crisis Centers. In order to increase the visibility of women in the media, and to promote their authoritative position, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women, together with the Council for the Advancement of Women in Science and Technology have produced an extensive and comprehensive list of female experts who can be called upon by the media. This list includes not only women who can speak about women's issues, but all women who are experts in their particular fields, and, especially features women working in non-traditional areas, such as nuclear science, defense and security, economics etc. Several female orientated NGOs have established media watchdog groups to react to offensive advertising. The women receive training in media monitoring and analysis, and are then encouraged to respond to offensive material.

92. Equal rights in the domestic sphere. With regards to equality between spouses and between spouses and their children, Israeli law and its effects in practice are discussed under articles 23 and 24 below

93. Non-governmental organizations. Women are deeply involved in myriad NGOs which aim to influence the governmental decision-making process, both on issues relating especially to women and to the full gamut of social concerns. Some groups, such as the Israel Women's Network, Itach - Women Lawyers for Social Justice and the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, have played a highly significant role in the legislative process and in legal advocacy on issues related to women. Other influential organizations include Naamat - Working and Volunteering Women, WIZO - Women's International Zionist Organization for an Improved Israeli Society, Emunah-National Religious Women's Organization and Kol Ha-Isha (The Women's Voice). Aid organizations such as the Association of Rape Crisis Centers in Israel and L.O. - Combat Violence against Women, support women who were sexually abused. Other women's groups, such as Women for Women, the Women's Organization for Political Prisoners and the Coalition of Women for Peace, have focused their activities on promoting Israeli-Palestinian dialogue and influencing public opinion on Palestinian-Israeli issues. There are also several NGOs that are very active in the issue of combating trafficking in persons, among the most prominent women's NGOs in this field are "Isha Leisha" (Women for Women), the "Organization for Assistance to Sexually Assaulted Persons", "Machon Todaa" (part of the International Abolitionist Federation) and "We are Equal".

Violence against women - domestic violence

94. Shelters. Protection from violence is provided by 14 shelters for battered women, established in different locations throughout the country. Due to their distinct cultural and religious needs, two shelters have been specially designated for Arab women, and one for ultra-Orthodox Jewish women. Furthermore, two shelters are accessible to the physically disabled, one of those also serving the Arabic population. Together, these shelters provide emergency intervention for nearly 1,600 women and children annually.

95. The shelters provide professional counseling and legal advice and assistance, as well as childcare and rehabilitation. Several shelters also have multi-lingual staff and volunteers in order to better assist immigrant women. Children continue in community-based day care or elementary school frameworks, whilst residing in the shelter. In addition, thirty transitional housing apartments have been established, which provide women with additional support and options when they are deemed ready to leave the shelters.

96. Regional centers for the treatment and prevention of violence against women. There are 53 centers dispersed throughout the country for the treatment of violence against women and domestic violence. The centers operate within the framework of the local authorities' social services departments. Collected data indicates that there has been an increased number of inquiries about the centers from women, men and their families. The number of inquiries steadily increased from 12,467 in 2002, to 12,922 in 2003.

97. Half Way Housing Apartments are also utilized as another means of assisting battered women and their children. The housing is considered an integral part of the rehabilitation process, providing an important transition stage from the protection, support and treatment of the shelter to effective, independent life in the community. The transition is accompanied by continued assistance from social workers and includes occupational training. Forty-eight half way housing apartments were offered in 1998, with a declining trend in productivity from that point up until 2003 when only 18 housing apartments were obtainable. Despite the drop in the number of available apartments, a comparison between 2001 and 2003 indicates a rise in the number of individuals utilizing this service.

98. In 2005, 64 centers and units for the prevention of domestic violence and treatment of domestic violence victims were operating in Israel. 16 of those centers were designated for the Arab population, 1 for the Bedouin population and 2 for the Jewish ultra-orthodox population. The centers treat victims of domestic violence with both group therapy, and personal empowerment within the community.

99. Police treatment of domestic violence. Domestic violence is a social phenomenon which requires special treatment by the Police Victims of Crime Section, from both a societal and criminal point of view. Police recognition that attention to the status of victims of crime was required in police procedures, especially with regards to victims of domestic violence, led to a new Victims of Crime Section being established in 1996 within the Investigations Division of the Israel Police. New procedures were subsequently issued for the treatment of domestic violence offences, violations of protection and prevention orders and stalking and sex offences. These procedures are occasionally updated. In addition, special training has been introduced focusing specifically on the issue of domestic violence. Collaboration between police, welfare and community bodies is also being developed in accordance with legislative amendments and other developments. In fact, the Victims of Crime Section is intimately involved in manifesting societal change in this area, and takes part in all the relevant social processes, including that of creating legislation, steering committees, and inter-ministries committees, etc.

100. Owing to their special characteristics, domestic violence offences require special treatment. For example, an effective response to offences of this kind may require an immediate reaction to prevent possible abuse, risk assessments throughout the treatment, full utilization of police procedures including prevention of access to weapons, collaboration between all treatment bodies, and awareness of the difficulty in collecting evidence. Due to these unique characteristics, a special task force of 200 investigators specializing in the treatment of domestic violence and sex offences was implemented, and has been operating since the beginning of 1999. Additionally, nine female Arab investigators were appointed for treatment of the Arab sector. In every police station at least two investigators are trained especially for treatment of domestic violence offences and in police stations where the extent of such complaints is insignificant, investigators are trained for this function in addition to their ordinary functions.

101. Police investigators must be specially trained in order to treat cases of domestic violence. The training introduces police guidelines on the issue and includes focused studies on the specific aspects of domestic violence, providing theoretical and practical information as to the social, legislative and judicial aspects of the phenomenon. For example, the participants are to take part in lectures and discussions regarding risk assessment, prevention of access to weapons, certain aspects of legislation, treatment of battering men, special characteristics of children who witness domestic violence, models for collaboration with different welfare bodies, protection orders and their violations. In addition, the participants take part in a workshop aimed at encouraging victims of violence to come forward, during which they visit a shelter for battered women and watch a special film/theatre play on this issue. All persons who currently work as domestic violence investigators took part in this training, and were subsequently approved to treat cases of domestic violence.

102. During 2002, six Offence Victims' District officers were appointed to treat cases of domestic violence and victims of other offences. Their functions include: providing professional supervision and support to domestic violence teams in police units, supervising police policy implementation, providing training to other police sectors, strengthening relations and creating models of collaboration with other treatment bodies not related to the police force.

103. According to statistical data provided by the Israeli police, there has been a slight drop in reported cases of domestic violence since the year 2000. In 2004 there was an increase of 1.76 percent, but in 2006 there was a further decrease of 1.9 percent.

104. In recent years the Israeli Police have been operating a computerized assessment system which assists in evaluating and assessing the danger posed by suspects in domestic violence cases. The system receives information from various sources, and by combining these sources and evaluating certain parameters, the system performs a risk assessment and assembles a profile of each suspect. The Israeli Police has also created specialized risk assessment squads in several police stations. These teams include a social worker, a clinical criminologist, and a police officer. The squads help to assess the threat posed by suspects, and initiate enforcement and treatment procedures. Additionally, in several police stations social workers are employed so as to provide instant assistance when a domestic violence complaint is being filed. The social workers make an initial assessment of the problem at hand, and also ascertain the willingness of the victim and/or the suspect, to receive treatment in help centers. The project is in operation at 11 police stations around the country.

105. Distress buttons are issued to women at high risk, once they have received a court order for their protection.

106. In addition to all of the above, the Ministerial Committee to Combat Domestic Violence operates an internet portal for women, children, and male victims of domestic violence. The portal provides information about domestic violence, projects for the prevention of domestic violence, help centers and other useful assistance sites.

Sexual harassment

107. The Supreme Court has issued several decisions in accordance with the 2002 Sexual Harassment Law. In a decision concerning sexual harassment in the work place, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal from the nursing deputy director in the Mental Health Center in Beer-Sheva, who had been convicted of harassing nurses during a training course: (Civil Service Appeal 11976/05 Ruchi Halil v. Civil Service Commission). The Court found that the appellant had repeatedly spoken to his subordinates in a manner that contained sexual content, which is considered to constitute sexual harassment under the Law. The Disciplinary Court sentenced the appellant to severe reprimand, a rank reduction of one level for a period of two years, removal to a different governmental hospital and disqualification from service in the training of nurses for a period of three years.

108. In another decision, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal from an employee of the Ministry of Finance. He was found to have sexually harassed (verbally) an 18.5 year old worker, was convicted and sentenced to dismissal and disqualification from working in the civil service for a period of 5 years (Civil Service Appeal 292/06 Moshe Rahmani v. Civil Service Commission). The Court held that the appellant's repeated offers to the complainant, which were of a sexual character, and which she repeatedly and clearly rejected, could be considered sexual harassment under the terms of the Law.

109. The Supreme Court rejected another appeal from an inspector of the Ministry of Education who was convicted of sexually harassing teachers, and was sentenced to termination of his employment in the civil service (Civil Service Appeal 2868/04 Uri Shamian v. Civil Service Commission). In yet another case, the Supreme Court accepted the State's appeal requesting a more severe punishment for the director of the communications division in the Ministry of Defense, who was convicted of the sexual harassment of 3 workers from his division (Civil Service Appeal 7233/02 The State of Israel v. Shahar Levi). The Supreme Court President considered the circumstances of the case, in which the senior director had repeatedly harassed his subordinate, and had furthermore attempted to prevent her from complaining against him by abusing his authority and position of power over her and other subordinated workers, and held that he should not be employed in the civil service. The director was therefore sentenced to severe reprimand, immediate dismissal and disqualification from employment in the civil service until the age of 65.

The IDF

110. As mentioned in our previous reports, the IDF has committed itself to addressing issues related to sexual violence and harassment in the military. The following are examples of military court judgments relating to cases of sexual violence and harassment in the military:

110.1. A senior Colonel was convicted of offences of rape, indecent acts using force, attempted indecent act and two offences of inappropriate behavior. The Colonel was sentenced to 6 years imprisonment, 2 years of suspended imprisonment, rank reduction to Private and compensation to the victim. The Court held that sex offences committed by an officer taking advantage of his authority are even more severe as the rank of the officer is higher and the age gap between the officer and his subordinate is greater.

110.2. A soldier was convicted for taking photos of female soldiers, including officers, while showering, using a cellular phone and showing the photos to his friends (Military Appeal 55/06 the Military Prosecutor v. Corporal Gabay). The Military Court of Appeals held that the soldier broken the comradeship and the trust among the soldiers of the unit and that the female soldiers became at once sexual objects and subjects for peeping and sexual stimulus. The soldier was sentenced to 4 months imprisonment, 5 months of suspended imprisonment and his rank was reduced to a Private.

110.3. A soldier was convicted for watching female soldiers in the women showers' building on two different occasions, and spraying them using a fire extinguisher (Military Appeal 38/06 the Military Prosecutor v. Ladislav Agronov). The soldier was sentenced to 3 months of imprisonment, a fine and suspended imprisonment, following an indictment of harm to privacy.

Treatment of victims of sexual violence

111. There are 11 rape crisis centers throughout the country working to provide emotional support, practical advice, and other support for victims including the maintenance of hotlines, and the provision of educational services. All centers are staffed by volunteers, and were contacted by 7,174 individuals in 2003. Israel has also developed a unique model of multi-disciplinary centers which provides interrelated services to women who have suffered abuse and violence. These centers combine psycho-social and psychological treatment with medical and legal services. Two such centers exist in Israel today.

112. Police treatment of rape victims. As detailed above, the Police special task force for treatment of domestic violence offences is specifically trained to better treat sex offences. Task force training educates those involved with an overview of the following: legal and judicial aspects, rape trauma, theoretical aspects of the rape offence, sexual harassment, events analysis, collaboration techniques with treatment bodies within the community, and a special seminar discussing techniques for encouraging victims to come forward and for making preliminary inquiries of suspects.

113. In addition, so that an appropriate number of investigators will be available to provide a suitable response to sex offences from all police units, special seminars for sex offence investigators (12 per annum) are to take place, and have taken place every year since 2004 in all six police Districts. These seminars are guided by the rape crisis centers in Israel, and are conducted with the participation of professionals from different fields, such as the legislative, post-trauma, incest, re-victimization, male victims of sexual assault, exceptional sectors etc. The seminars are designed to train investigators specializing in the treatment of sex offences, and also to provide them with emotional support and different ways of coping with this sensitive issue.

114. The following principles constitute the basis of police procedure in the treatment of sex offences:

- Only a trained investigator is authorized to investigate sex offences.
- Every complaint concerning a sex offence is investigated to the full extent possible, by an investigator of the same sex of the victim. Furthermore, as far as possible, the victim will be in contact with only one investigator during the entire course of the investigation.

- Only relevant and essential questions are to be introduced in consideration of the victim and his or her privacy.
- Excluding persons directly related to the investigation, the collection of proclamation is done, as far as possible, in a separate room without the presence of other investigators or investigatees.
- As the collection of the proclamation ends, the investigator shall deliver to the victim his/her name, details as to the registration of the complaint and the ways in which the victim can receive information concerning the progress of the case, or alternatively, can himself deliver any further information.
- Notifying the complainant as to the possibility of receiving support from a volunteer working with one of the sexual support assault centers, and providing assistance in contacting these centers.
- If the victim specifically requests to be accompanied by a relative or friend, it shall be permitted, having consideration of the needs of the investigation.
- Also, a representative from one of the sexual support assault centers is to be made available at the explicit request of the victim.
- At the victim's request, and where reasonable to do so having considered the needs of the specific investigation, the investigation is to be delayed until the arrival of the above-mentioned persons.
- Minors under the age of 14 will be questioned by a children's investigator authorized to treat sex offences. Similarly, minors over the age of 14 are to be questioned by a youth investigator authorized to treat sex offences.
- The Procedure provides advice on conducting victim/suspect confrontations, where they are deemed necessary and the victim's explicit consent is attained.
- The Procedure also provides information and details as to the referral of victims to medical care, including the collection of related evidence.

115. The Social Affairs and Social Services Ministry's treatment of victims of sexual violence. On January 1, 2007, the Israeli Prime Minister informed the Knesset's Committee on the Status of Women that a program submitted by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services as to appropriate treatment of young women and teen victims of sexual assault had been approved. The special program included the implementation of: 25 social workers for identifying and treating young women, teenagers, and victims of sexual assault; 6 regional multidisciplinary centers for treatment of sexual assault victims, 6 places of residence for sexual assault victims, a special hostel for treatment of sexual assault victims (as an alternative to hospitalization), and seminars and training for identification and treatment of sexual assault victims.

116. An inter-ministerial committee, headed by the director of the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women was established to examine the implementation of the program. The committee appointed a special task force which prepared a list of high priority initiatives to be implemented during 2008, in accordance with the approved budget. Implementation of other, less urgent initiatives has begun gradually in 2008 and will continue in 2009.

117. The Government's program for treatment of sexual assault victims includes the following features:

117.1. Training and Seminars for Identification and Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims: As public servants work in many different environments, such as clinics, hospitals, social services departments and the education system, they are often in a position to encounter sexual assault victims. Nevertheless, many have difficulty in identifying such victims. In order to better enable them to do so, special training for social workers and psychologists within the health and welfare systems, physicians, nurses, educational advisors and psychologists within the education system began in 2008. The trainings will vary, highlighting relevant issues in accordance with the profession of the participants, in order to achieve maximum expertise. In addition, social workers and psychologists within the health and welfare systems, as well as professional workers of the regional centers, commenced taking part in special training for treatment of sexual assault victims during 2008.

117.2. Regional Multidisciplinary Centers for Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims: Following up on the focused treatment given in acute centers in hospitals, regional multidisciplinary treatment centers provide the physical necessities of life, in conjunction with psychological treatment for sexual assault victims. In addition, the centers identify and rehabilitate women and girls who have been sexually abused at different stages of their lives, and have not yet received any treatment. The centers conduct professional schooling in the treatment of sexual assault victims, and serve as teaching and training centers for different professions in the community who deal directly with sexual assault victims.

117.3. Currently, there are two regional multidisciplinary treatment centers operated by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services based in Rishon-Lezion and Haifa respectively. There is also one other center, operated by the Ministry of Health in the Tel-Aviv Soraski Medical Center, which provides psycho-therapeutic and psychiatric treatments for victims of incest. Government programs for treatment of sexual assault victims include upgrading the capacity of these centers for simultaneous treatment of 100 victims. In addition, the establishment of another three centers in Nazareth, Jerusalem, and Beer-Sheva that will also be equipped to effectively treat the Arab, Bedouin and Jewish Ultra-Orthodox populations, is in advanced stages. Communities of a unique culture will receive treatment by members of the same community, who speak the same language.

117.4. Hostel for Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims (Alternative to Hospitalization): Currently, no 24 hour service for sexual assault victims is in operation, and the routine treatment of victims in existing hospitals might worsen their situation or even revive their trauma. The Government program includes the establishment of a hostel geared towards meeting their special needs. The hostel is designed for 12 women, for a stay period of 3 months. The victims are to be referred to the hostel by therapists in the community, and are to return to these therapists at the end of their stay in the hostel. The hostel's staff will include a psychiatrist and a nurse, in addition to therapists specializing in treatment of sexual assault victims. A tender for this hostel was issued and the offers will be reviewed in June 2008.

117.5. Treatment of Children and Victims of Sexual Assault, in the Education System: In 2008, a budget was allocated for treatment of child victims of sexual assault that was initiated in the education system.

117.6. Establishment of Places of Residence for Sexual Assault Victims: A vast amount of the sexual assault victims treated in the regional multidisciplinary treatment centers suffer from severe economic distress. Many are attempting to find places of residence, and suitable employment, whilst lacking basic life skills. Another different group of victims, return to their homes following treatment in the centers, and continue to suffer from physical and mental abuse. Since both groups need a secure home, the Government program includes the establishment of 6 apartments of residence for sexual assault victims to be constructed next to each of the present, and future, regional multidisciplinary treatment centers. The residence apartments will serve as a secure home for the victims for a period of 6 months to one year, and will assist them in acquiring the life skills needed before returning to independent life.

117.7. Additional Social Workers Specializing in Treatment of Sexual Assault Victims: The Government program includes the addition of a further 25 social workers into welfare services provided by local municipalities. These social workers will specialize in the identification and treatment of sexual assault victims.

Trafficking in women

118. Since the submission of our previous periodic report, the State of Israel has taken several dramatic steps in combating trafficking in persons for all purposes, as will be detailed below. This issue has been given great attention, and was promoted in all levels - legislative, judiciary and administrative. This resulted in a sharp decline in the number of victims of trafficking for prostitution.

119. Legislation. The Anti Trafficking Law entered into force on October 29, 2006. The law promulgates a broad trafficking crime for a number of illegal purposes: prostitution, sexual crimes, slavery or forced labor, removal of organs, pornography, and using the body of a person to give birth to a baby who is then taken from her. The crime is attended with a punishment of 16 years of imprisonment and 20 years of imprisonment if the offence is committed against a minor. The law includes a full panoply of crimes to address gradations of exploitation: Slavery - 16 years of incarceration, trafficking for the purpose of slavery or forced labor - 16 years of incarceration, forced labor - 7 years of incarceration, exploitation of vulnerable populations - 3 years of incarceration. For the first time, Israel has a slavery offense, a broad forced labor offence with heightened sentencing and heightened punishment for exploitation of vulnerable populations.

120. The Limiting Use of Premises in order to Prevent the Commission of Crime Law 5765-2005, authorizes the Police and the Courts to limit the use of premises, or to close them completely, if those premises have served in the commission of prostitution offences or trafficking for the purpose of prostitution offences, in circumstances where the authorities involved are convinced that the premises will continue to be so used. Courts have the authority to issue such orders for a period of 90 days, with the possibility of extension. Police may issue such orders for a period of 30 days during which time they may request a further pronouncement from the court.

121. Criminal and Administrative Proceedings. Law enforcement agencies such as the Police, the Immigration Administration and the Enforcement Department in the Ministry of ITL, have greatly intensified their efforts to combat trafficking. Prosecution initiatives are undertaken on three planes. Firstly, police prosecutions are instated against traffickers and their accomplices in trafficking and trafficking related offences. Secondly, prosecutions and revocation of licenses may be initiated according to the provisions of various regulations and supplementary laws. Thirdly, prosecutions according to criminal laws other than trafficking such as pandering, causing a person to engage in prostitution, soliciting prostitution, kidnapping etc., may be instated, as well as prosecutions for fraudulent activity, forgery, or exploitation of vulnerable populations.

122. Shelter. The “Maagan” shelter for victims of trafficking for prostitution began operating on February 15, 2004. The shelter’s capacity is up to 50 victims and it has succeeded in creating a supportive climate for victims and provides access to psychological, social, medical and legal assistance. In addition, procedures have been developed in the framework of the shelter to allow for the return of victims of trafficking to their countries of origin in safety aimed towards promoting their rehabilitation. It should be noted that the shelter also finds jobs for women who are deemed ready to work while they await testimony.

123. Visas. All victims in the “Maagan” shelter receive temporary visas plus work visas if requested, whether they choose to testify or not. Women who choose to testify receive a visa for the duration of the court procedures (on average this takes a year). After they finish the procedures they are entitled to request a temporary visa for another year like all the other victims who chose not to testify. The set period for these visas is for a year, though in rare cases it may be longer or shorter. In addition, victims who do not stay in the shelter receive temporary visas.

124. Director Generals Committee. A Government Resolution of May 21, 2006 established a Directors Generals Committee that convened on July 10, 2006 and decided on the creation of two subcommittees, to recommend operative steps to combat trafficking for the purpose of prostitution and labor.

125. National plans for combating trafficking. National Plans have been approved to combat slavery and trafficking for slavery, forced labor and trafficking for the purpose of prostitution. These National plans were approved by the Directors Generals Committee on January 10, 2007 and July 11, 2007 and by Government Resolution No. 2670 dated December 2, 2007.

126. The appointment of a National Coordinator who assists policy making in this area and in particular with regard to protection of victims, tries to identify trouble spots and bring about solutions before they burgeon, maintains communication with international actors and learns from comparative materials, promotes education and training, encourages research, develops established channels of communications between government and NGO actors in an effort to strengthen cooperation.

127. Integrated Intelligence Center. An “Integrated Intelligence Center” was established on March, 5, 2007, in order to combat severe crime and organized crime and their outcomes, in accordance with Government Resolution on: “The Battle against Severe Crime and Organized Crime and their Outcomes” dated January 2006. The Intelligence Center integrates different intelligence bodies, including the Police, the Tax Authority and the Money Laundering Prohibition Authority. The establishment of the Intelligence Center is a unique and innovative step in which members of the different intelligence bodies will sit together and collaborate in order to produce integrated quality intelligence products at a real time.

128. Legal assistance. Victims of trafficking for prostitution have the right by law to receive free legal aid in order to institute civil suits arising from the trafficking offences committed against them or administrative procedures relating to the Entry to Israel Law, 5712-1952 (the “Entry to Israel Law”). The new Anti-Trafficking Law mandates legal aid for all victims of trafficking and slavery for a pilot period ending in 15 September, 2008, regarding civil suits arising from the crimes committed against them or suits arising from the Entry to Israel Law.

129. Information and education campaigns. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in the Prime Minister’s Office has been increasingly active in the area of promoting awareness to the issue of combating trafficking in women. The Authority’s activities are aimed at the following target audiences - the Civil Service, the Local Authorities, the Education System, the Kibbutzim Movement and the IDF. Annual activities conducted towards achievement of those goals include the following:

129.1. Establishing a public awareness project, in collaboration with government bodies and NGOs, to highlight the phenomenon of trafficking in persons.

129.2. Conducting promotional activities within the education system in co-operation with the Department for Gender Equality in the Ministry of Education, These activities take the form of conferences with senior education workers, inspectors and school headmasters, and also special lectures and presentations for teachers.

129.3. Conferences are held and information published, concerning the International Day for the Abolishment of Slavery. Taking place on December 2, the events of that day will be run with the Tel-Aviv Municipality and its special advisor for the status of women, Government Ministries in cooperation with the Civil Service Commission, Local Municipalities in collaboration with the Union of Local Authorities in Israel, the IDF in cooperation with the Chief of Staff’s Advisor on Women’s Issues, and the education system in collaboration with the Department for Gender Equality in the Ministry of Education.

129.4. In the course of Government Resolution (No. 2670) dated December 2, 2007, the Government approved a yearly national award for individuals and bodies who have made outstanding contributions to the battle against human trafficking. This kind of award is calculated to provide support to those who do this thankless work and arouse others to increase efforts to wage the battle.

130. Mutual cooperation between Israel and other countries was fostered during the past year by two visits of delegations from Moldova and the Ukraine. These delegations met with their Israeli counterparts, both in government bodies and NGOs and exchanged perspectives while discussing common problems. In addition, representatives of the International Organization of Migration (IOM) visited Israel and conducted conferences and round table meetings with government representatives and NGOs.

131. Courts. The courts also remained faithful to their policy of interpreting the relevant legislation in a broad manner, thus facilitating the conviction of a maximal number of traffickers, resulting in dozens of verdicts annually. In two of the most noteworthy cases, the Court sentenced one of the defendants to 18 years of imprisonment and another to 10 years of imprisonment, following their indictment on charges of TIP for the purpose of prostitution, false imprisonment, pandering, rape and abduction in order to cause harm or for sexual abuse.¹ In another case, the Court sentenced one of the defendants to 14 years of imprisonment and another to a 10.5 years of imprisonment, following their indictment on charges of organized crime, money laundering, causing a person to leave his country for the purpose of engaging in prostitution; 10 TIP for the purpose of prostitution charges inducement to prostitution under aggravated circumstances - through a plea bargain.²

132. Risk assessments. The police also aid in the protection of victims by performing risk assessments in cases where the victim claims she or her family will be endangered if she is returned to her country of origin. Police Intelligence, with the assistance of Interpol and the Israeli Police delegate abroad, prepare a risk assessment which relates to the victim's risk status in Israel and in her country of origin. In three cases in 2005, the police reached the conclusion that women would be endangered if returned to their countries of origin and the women were consequently not returned to their countries of origin. In 2007 the Police held 7 risk assessments and reached the conclusion that 2 of the women can not be returned to their countries of origin at this time.

133. Local authorities. Whilst the representation of elected Jewish women in local authority councils equals 14.2%, Arab women comprise only 0.5% of those elected. This gap is usually explained as being the result of various sociocultural factors, such as the impact of religion and local tradition on certain minority communities which can restrict women from considering running into or being elected to these positions.

² G.Cr.C. 774/04 The State of Israel v. Genadi Boslovitz and Others (20.3.05).

134. To assist in remedying this situation, 219 female Advisors on the Status of Women in local municipalities are currently employed, 40 of whom work in the Arab sector. These advisors ensure the advancement of policy for enhancing the status of women within the purview of the local authority, in addition to ensuring that the necessary resources are provided to this end.

135. Additionally, the Knesset Committee for the Advancement of the Status of Women discusses this issue frequently in the course of its sessions. The Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women has also taken upon itself to seek new ways of improving the current situation and allocates funds in order to assist in this task. The Authority further encourages groups of local volunteers to assist the advisors for the advancement of the status of women by offering leadership courses for women.

136. A Government Resolution was passed initiating actions aimed towards the advancement of Druze, Circassian and Bedouin women. In accordance with the resolution, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women will distribute scholarships to women from minority sectors meeting the specified criteria. Furthermore, surveys were conducted in order to determine the specific needs of women from these sectors. The information gleaned will be used for the purpose of enhancing the advancement of their status and in establishing culturally sensitive professional courses, and assistance in work integration.

137. The Authority for the Advancement of Women. This Authority, working under the auspices of the Prime Minister's Office, operates with the goal of actively integrating Arab women into the country's social life, whilst simultaneously addressing the problems and dilemmas facing this population. Since its establishment, the Authority has been active in promoting the status of Arab women in all aspects of life.

138. One of the major steps taken towards meeting this goal was the assignment of a special project manager for the Arab sector. That person's main role is to head and coordinate unique projects for the Arab sector, as well as to initiate and promote additional activities in this sphere. Examples of such activities are as follows:

138.1. Imbuing tools for the operation of community projects: in 2006 the Authority initiated advanced courses for the empowerment of women. Such courses were carried out in 3 Arab villages and provided training for the organization of community projects for the advancement of women. The Authority is currently preparing for an additional 20 courses to be opened in the north, 10 of which will be in the Arab sector.

138.2. Activities concerning the Bedouin sector in the Negev: in accordance with Government Resolution No. 881 dated September 2003, the Authority, along with the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, is operating unique programs for the advancement of the status of Bedouin women in the Negev. The steering committee of these programs is composed of representatives of the Authority, as well as representatives of the academy, the health system, and the employment system etc. The budget for the programs started at 400,000 NIS in 2006, increased to 600,000 NIS in 2007, and will reach a sum of 1 million NIS in 2008.

138.3. Activities concerning the Bedouin, the Druze and the Circassian sectors in the North: according to a Government Resolution, dated August 15, 2006, the Prime Minister's Office will allocate to the Authority, between the years 2006-2009, 2 million NIS for the advancement of the status of women in the Druze and the Circassian sectors, and another 2 million NIS for the advancement of the status of Bedouin women in the North. The Authority is in the process of examining the needs of women from these sectors covering a wide range of fields such as health, education, and employment, in order to consolidate a working program to be implemented over several years. The Authority will further act to encourage education and vocational training through scholarships and other funds.

139. The Authority, which deems it highly important to familiarize itself closely with the special needs of women from different sectors, established a steering committee composed of representatives from the relevant governmental and non-governmental organizations, in order to identify the existing services and programs in the various ministries, and to formulate consolidated assistance programs. To that end, the Authority initiates visits to Arab villages and meetings with representatives of the Arab municipalities etc., to discuss the needs of the women, proposals for future plans and the estimated costs of such plans.

140. Additionally, due to the great significance of the subject, the Authority advocated the appointment of Advisors on the Status of Women to each of the municipal authorities which did not yet have one. In 2006, 50 such advisors were appointed, culminating in 219 total advisors for municipal authorities in Israel, approximately 40 of whom are located in Arab municipal authorities.

141. In 2006 the Authority launched a campaign with the slogan "violence is not only black and blue marks on your body", which include radio and television spots in Hebrew, Arabic, Russian, and Amharic. The campaign followed a survey conducted by the Authority, which revealed that the majority of the public in Israel believes that violence against women is carried out only physically, and was meant to raise public awareness regarding non-physical violence. In that regard, the Authority also produced explanatory material in Arabic, and sponsored shows and lectures in Arab municipalities on the issue of violence against women.

142. Additionally, according to the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women Law, the Prime Minister is required to appoint, in consultation with the head of the Authority, an Advisory Committee of 35 members, whose function is to advise the Authority with regards to political and policy matters. So far 2 Arab women have been appointed to the Advisory Committee, and the Authority is currently recommending to the Prime Minister's Office that that number be increased.

143. Employment. According to 2005 figures of the Central Bureau of Statistics, the number of Arab women between the ages of 25 and 54 (considered to be the ages during which women constitute part of the labor force), amounts to 228,400.

144. Among these women, 18,200 are part of the civil labor force, whilst 26,800 serve in part-time positions. The number of Arab women employed constitutes 24.9% of the total number of Arab women in the relevant age group.

145. According to data provided by the Central Bureau of Statistics, 11.5% of the 45,000 working Arab women are employed in academia and academic-related fields, 29.4% work as associate professionals and technicians, 19.4% as clerical workers, 20.6% as agents, sales workers and service workers, 6.5% work in manufacturing, construction and other skilled jobs, and 11.3% are unskilled workers.

146. In addition to the current centers, the Authority for Small Business is currently working to establish a designated Center for Nurturing Entrepreneurship in the Arab and Bedouin sector, which is expected to be better equipped to serve this sector's needs.

147. Following Government Resolution No. 1832, (April 29, 2004), where it was determined that mechanisms will be put in place in order to encourage employment, another Government Resolution (No. 3716) that established criteria to partially subsidize employers was adopted, thus establishing major centers of employment aimed at granting new opportunities for employment in peripheral areas.

148. According to this Resolution, and over a span of five years, Government support will be granted in order to create new job opportunities by establishing, expanding, or relocating existing companies. The support will be granted in accordance with a competitive procedure. The minority sector will compete only amongst itself.

149. Over the course of the past few years, there has been an increase in the rate of employment among Arab women, yet these rates remain relatively low. Academic education and vocational training are the key components for the integration of Arab women into the work force, yet various barriers remain inhibiting their integration in these educational and training systems, among those are educational and social/cultural barriers.

150. Many Arab women thus attend "traditional" courses because they are available locally, and are likely to enable them to meet the requirements of local job opportunities, whether they be full or part time. This is not the case with regards to education and work undertaken in the fields of computers, graphics or technical assistant/engineering. Work opportunities in these fields, in some of the residential towns, are very limited.

151. In that regard, during 2006, an education program was held for coordinators of the Project for the Advancement of the Bedouin population in northern Israel, dealing with the issues of social/cultural barriers, motivation, recruitment of candidates, and persistence in vocational training.

152. Additionally, in order to rectify the current situation, joint efforts are being made by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, local authorities, social services, vocational training institutes and employers, in order to provide vocational training, and to create more feasible job opportunities for women.

153. The Department for Professional Training in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, conducts courses for women and men referred to them by the National Employment Services, through training institutions nation-wide, including in Arab towns. In addition to the general training system, there are special programs for Arab women, aimed at bridging gaps and increasing women's participation in training courses.

154. In addition to the current centers, the Authority for Small Business is currently working to establish a designated Center for Nurturing Entrepreneurship in the Arab and Bedouin sector, which is expected to be better equipped to serve this sector's special needs.

155. In 2005, 1,406 out of 2,506 (or 56%), of the Arab participants in the vocational training courses were women, and in 2006, 1,697 out of 3,164 (or 53.6%), were women. The average cost for professional training per student is 7,000 NIS.

156. Furthermore, during 2006, 94 workshops for growth and working skills' development were conducted in 31 towns and villages, all designated for the advancement of unemployed women from amongst the Arab and Bedouin population, as well as from amongst other sectors, such as Ethiopian women, and Ultra-Orthodox women. Another 300 similar workshops were similarly conducted assisting women with skills for seeking employment.

Article 4. State of emergency

157. Under Basic Law: the Government, the Knesset may declare a state of emergency for a period of up to one year. The State of Israel was officially proclaimed to be in a state of public emergency on May 19, 1948, four days after it's founding, a state which has been annually renewed since 1997, until the present day. Consequently, Israel made a declaration regarding the existence of a state of emergency upon ratifying the Covenant.

158. In recent years, Israel has been considering refraining from extending the state of emergency any further. However, the actual termination of the state of emergency could not be executed immediately, as certain fundamental laws, orders and regulations legally depend upon the existence of a state of emergency. These acts of legislation must be revised, so as not to leave crucial matters of the state unregulated when the state of emergency expires.

159. Following the present extension of the state of emergency, the Israeli Government and the Knesset have embarked on a joint program to complete the needed legislative procedures required in order to end the state of emergency. As a result, measures toward removing the linkage to the state of emergency have been taken. Over the past few years, several laws were amended, and they are no longer linked to the state of emergency, and a number of other bills are now before the Knesset.

160. In addition, as detailed in the previous report, a petition was filed by the Association of Civil Rights in Israel to the Supreme Court demanding that the state of emergency declared by the Knesset on February 2, 1999 be annulled. (HCJ 3091/99 the Association of Civil Rights in Israel v. the Knesset). The Ministry of Justice continued to concentrate efforts towards promotion of the legislative alterations necessary for its annulment. Following several court hearings, the Supreme Court decided to postpone its decision with regards to the petition and allowed the State more extensions for the purpose of completing all the necessary legislative amendments. The Knesset extended the state of emergency on December 12, 2000; July 10, 2001; and June 26, 2002.

161. Since September 2000, Israel has been subjected to an unprecedented wave of terrorist activity. Its citizens have been the victims of countless attacks which have been perpetrated with the goal of causing mass havoc, destruction, and loss of life and limb. Due to the current state of affairs, and the actual state of emergency that Israel is experiencing, the Supreme Court determined on March 25, 2003, that the petitioner should submit a revised petition to the Court. Meanwhile, the Knesset extended the state of emergency for another year on June 11, 2003.

162. Following submission of a revised petition, the Supreme Court held several hearings and ordered the respondent to report on the progression of any legislative amendments being made with regards to the annulment of State of Emergency status. The Court decided to postpone its decision in that petition and allow the State more extensions in order to conclude all the legislative amendments necessary for annulment. Accordingly, the Knesset extended the State of Emergency on May 24, 2004; November 29, 2004; June 14, 2005; May 31, 2006; and May 30, 2007.

Article 5. Non-derogable nature of fundamental rights

163. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of its Initial Periodic Report.

Article 6. Right to life

Reduction of infant mortality, epidemics and malnutrition

164. Recent statistics indicate that Israel's infant mortality rate continues to decrease from 6.1 between 1996-1999 to 4.5 in 2005. Among Jewish and Christian newborns, the infant mortality rate fell even furthermore to 3.2 and 3.4 deaths for every 1,000 live births, respectively. Among the Muslim population, despite the continuing decrease, the child mortality rate is still relatively high to these populations and stands at a rate of 8.4 deaths per every 1,000 live births. The gap between the sectors stems from a number of factors, among them the high rate of consanguineous marriage - approx. 35% in the Arab sector and approx. 60% in the Bedouin sector (these kinds of marriages lead to a high rate of birth defects), religious prohibition against abortion even in medically recommended cases, as well as socio economic differences. The further decrease in infant mortality over the last half decade, and the causes for such deaths, are shown in the following tables.

165. On December 2005 the Population Registry Law 5725-1965, was amended for the regulation of births occurring outside a medical institution. The purpose of the amendment was to ensure that illegal adoptions, exploitation of women and babies' trafficking would be reduced as far as possible.

166. Women who give birth at home or on the way to the hospital are entitled to comprehensive post-natal care in the hospital for themselves and their infants. All infants in Israel are entitled to well-baby care in government-run Maternal and Child Health Clinics, whether or not they are registered in the Population Registry. Furthermore, most women who give birth at home arrive anyway, shortly after birth, to a hospital in order to enjoy their right for a birth grant, therefore enabling the registration of their children in the population registry.

Environmental policy

168. Air quality. In order to provide a current picture of air quality throughout Israel, the Ministry of Environmental Protection collects information processed from over one hundred air quality monitoring stations, including a-25 station national monitoring network as well as stations operated by the Association of Towns for the Environment and the Israel Electric Corporation. The information is transferred to a national control center which provides real-time information on air quality throughout the country. In addition, a new and comprehensive air resources management system, based on a European model, is currently being established. The system will provide a variety of tools to forecast the country's state of air quality, analyze pollution events and facilitate policy making and planning.

169. Since the submission of Israel's previous reports, numerous measures have been initiated in order to solve the serious problem of vehicular pollution. A Government resolution is currently being promoted calling for the preparation of a national action plan on the reduction of pollution from vehicles. In addition, as of January 2004, only diesel and gasoline containing 50 ppm sulfur is available at gas stations, following a legislative order prohibiting the import or the production of fuel with a higher sulfur content.

170. Since March 2006, all gasoline powered vehicles in Israel (beginning with 1995 models) are required to undergo stringent air pollution checks within the framework of the annual car registration test. New regulations on smoke emissions from diesel vehicles entered into force that year. According to the regulations, diesel vehicles beginning with 2001 models must comply with lower emission standards. Today, all new imported vehicles must comply with Euro 4 standards, which require a combination of advanced engine technologies and effective systems for the treatment of exhaust gas.

171. One of the major changes in recent years in the area of energy and air pollution is the market shift from heavy fuel oil to the use of natural gas. It is expected that almost 50% of total electricity generation will be based on natural gas within a decade, which will result in much lower emissions to the air.

172. Israel is a party to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (1771 UNTS 107; S. Treaty Doc No. 102-38; U.N. Doc. A/AC.237/18 (Part II)/Add.1; 31 ILM 849 (1992)) since 1996 and to the Kyoto Protocol (UN Doc FCCC/CP/1997/7/Add.1, Dec. 10, 1997; 37 ILM 22 (1998)) since 2004, and is committed to fulfill its obligations in accordance with these instruments. Following ratification of the Kyoto Protocol, a Designated National Authority (DNA) was established for the Clean Development Mechanism (CDM) under the responsibility of the Ministry of Environmental Protection. So far 35 emissions reduction projects have been submitted to Israel's DNA for approval, twelve of which have been registered in the UN. The projects have the potential to deliver reductions of about 2 million tons to carbon dioxide equivalent (CERs) per year.

Article 7. Freedom from torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

173. According to the Israeli legislation, acts of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment are designated as criminal offences and perpetrators of such offences are tried and severely punished by the courts.

Legislation

174. In 2000, Israel enacted the Israel Security Agency Law which addresses the major relevant issues concerning the mandate, operation, and scope of functioning of the ISA.

175. Section 16 of the Penal Law 5377 - 1977 (the "Penal Law"), was enacted in order to enable the prosecution of offenders accused of crimes against the law of the nations, to which Israel is committed by international treaties to prosecute, regardless of whether the offender is an Israeli citizen or resident, and regardless of the place where the offence has been committed. Under this provision, and subject to a decision of the Attorney General Israel would have the jurisdiction to prosecute torture cases, in any case where it did not extradite the accused person.

176. In 2004, section 49I1 of the Police Ordinance was amended, expanding the Department for Investigation of Police Officers' scope of authority over ISA interrogators. Their expanded authority of review now applies to every criminal offence committed in the course of fulfilling the ISA interrogators' undertaking, or in relation with their undertaking. This scope was previously limited to criminal offences committed in the course of an interrogation, or as regards to a detainee in custody for interrogation.

177. Section 77 of the Penal Law, enabling the courts to order compensatory damages to a victim of a crime for damages or suffering, was amended in 2004 in order to raise the amount awarded to the victim. Presently, the maximum amount payable to a particular victim is fixed at 228,000 NIS (app. 67,000 US$).

Court judgments

178. On May 2006, the Supreme Court gave a landmark decision, laying down a court-made doctrine on the exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yissacharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al.), relating to a soldier who was not advised of his right to legal counsel prior to his interrogation, and its effect on the admissibility of his confession while under interrogation.

179. The Court held that “[a]chieving justice is also based on the manner by which the court reaches a decision under the circumstances of the case before it. Basing an indictment on evidence obtained unlawfully or through the substantial violation of a protected human right, allows the investigation bodies to enjoy the fruit of their sin and may create an incentive for improper investigation methods in the future...under appropriate circumstances, substantial illegality in obtaining the evidence, shall lead to its exclusion, even if there is no suspicion as to the veracity of its content”.

180. In this case, the Court adopted a relative exclusion doctrine, according to which the court may rule on the inadmissibility of evidence on the basis of the manner by which it was obtained, if two conditions are fulfilled: (1) the evidence was obtained unlawfully; and (2) admission of the evidence will harm the defendant significantly in regard to his right to fair proceedings, in a way and to an extent which is not in accordance with the limitation paragraph of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty.

181. The Court held that “... the exclusion of evidence according to the said doctrine requires a causal connection between the administration of the improper methods of investigation and the collection of the evidence”. The Court also held that exclusion of evidence can be exercised even when the right violated is not of a constitutional nature.

182. The Court enumerated a list of non-exhaustive circumstances which should be considered by courts deliberating upon the possibility of excluding evidence: (1) The nature and severity of the illegality involved in obtaining the evidence; (2) The influence of the improper method of investigation upon the evidence obtained; and (3) The social harm versus benefit involved in exclusion of the evidence.

183. This judgment also analyzed section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance (new Version) 5731 - 1971 (“the Evidence Ordinance”). While the Court did not rule on exclusion of the defendant’s confession on these grounds, it held that the said section should be interpreted more widely on the basis of the new Basic Laws. According to this decision, a wider array of circumstances may now justify excluding confessions on the basis of section 12.

184. On August 5th, 2004, the Military Court of Appeals accepted an appeal by the Military Prosecution against the ruling of the Special Court which convicted lieutenant colonel Geva Sagi, upon his confession, of “inappropriate behavior” under section 130 of the Military Justice Law, 5715-1955 (the “Military Justice Law”) (A. 153/03 Geva Sagi v. Chief Military Prosecutor). Lieutenant colonel Geva had been sentenced to 60 days imprisonment, and his rank was demoted from Lieutenant Colonel to a Major. In the appeal, the prosecution requested the Court of Appeals to further demote his rank. The Court convicted lieutenant colonel Geva after he admitted to threatening Tarek, a 28 year-old resident of the Duha village, whose father was requested for questioning by the security forces.

185. The Court held that lieutenant colonel Geva, while searching for a person requested for questioning, threatened that person's son, Tarek, telling him that he would kill him if he did not indicate his father's whereabouts. The Court's judgement also described a series of humiliating and sexually degrading acts made by the defendant, including a threat to burn Tarek if he did not indicate where certain weapons were hidden.

186. The Court of Appeals ruled that the described abuse was performed during an investigation, which in itself, was for a worthy purpose. On the other hand, the Court stressed that acts of abuse against the local population are harmful both to the victim and to the IDF. "A commander who does not understand and assimilate the limits of the military use of force established by the principle of human dignity, and substantially deviates from these limits, is not worthy of command. No difference exists between an abuse of a subordinate, a soldier, an enemy or a simple person. The same rule applies for a commander who deviates from the orders concerning his subordinates and the commander who abuses a Palestinian, a suspect or an innocent, in order to force him to disclose information. Both commanders are unworthy of the command."

187. Regarding the case at hand, the Court of Appeals ruled that "it is possible that details could have been taken from Tarek concerning his father and concerning the place the gun was hidden. However, even if in that situation it was appropriate to interrogate him, there exist legal and moral rules which dictate the proper method of interrogation. The same applies even if Tarek himself had been the primary suspect".

188. The Court described lieutenant colonel Geva's threats towards Tarek as "shameful and extremely ugly", and stated that: "[n]o words can describe our shock". "Although it is only one incident, yet its escalation into a series of continuous actions, is inappropriate and ugly from its very beginning to its end."

189. Citing the Convention against Torture and previous High Court of Justice rulings, the Court held that "even if we accept the claim that the aggressive dimension in the defendant's behavior had been relatively limited, for there had been no physical contact between him and Tarek, it appears that the defendant's actions fall within the absolute prohibitions referred to by the High Court of Justice. This is so both because of the severe humiliation entailed in the undressing of a person in front of other people, as well as because of the harsh violence towards the man's spirit".

190. The Court accepted the appeal and, as noted above, demoted lieutenant colonel Geva to the rank of a First Lieutenant.

191. In accordance with Article 3 of the Convention against Torture, prohibiting the extradition of a person to another state where there are grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture, the court in Cr.A. 7569/00 Genadi Yegudayev v. State of Israel (23.5.02), ruled that Mr. Yegudayev is extraditable only after receiving the following assurances from the Government of Russia: (1) It was assured that Mr. Yegudayev will not be subject to any kind of torture or inhuman treatment; (2) he would be entitled to visits by an Israeli representative; and (3) he would be entitled to due process of law and all the rights provided to him in the European Extradition Treaty.

192. Section 2B(a)(8) of Israel's Extradition Law 5714-1954 states that a person shall not be extradited to the requesting state where the extradition is likely to harm public order. The term "public order" has been interpreted by the Israeli Supreme Court to mean "the basic values of the State and the society, those values which express the moral and justice sense of the public in Israel". Specifically, in Cr.A. 7569/00 Yegudayev v. the State of Israel, Deputy President M. Cheshin declared that "a substantial concern as to physical injury or abuse of someone extradited to another country would clearly contradict the public order of Israel, and where the Court is convinced that such is the danger to a person, the Court shall deny the request of the [requesting] state and shall not declare the person extraditable".

Control measures and conduct of law enforcement agencies

193. As detailed in Israel's previous reports, the actions and conduct of law enforcement officials are subject to several legal institutions for review and oversight. Overall, each branch of the law enforcement authorities has disciplinary procedures, which may be initiated by the person claiming a violation, by other entities, or by the authorities themselves. All civil servants are subject to the provisions of the Penal Law and most of them to the regulations pertaining to governmental employees. Detainees, prisoners or any other relevant person may apply directly to the courts or administrative proceedings for relief against the action or decision in question.

Israel Police

194. The Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice is responsible for most criminal investigations against police officers. Disciplinary proceedings are initiated by submitting a complaint to the Disciplinary Department of the Personnel Division at the Police Central Headquarters, or to any of its branches. Also, administrative sanctions may be imposed at any time during the proceedings, as well as after the proceedings are completed.

195. The Department for Investigation of Police Officers (DIPO) conducts investigations concerning police misconduct on a routine basis. The following are some of the more noteworthy cases in the period since the submission of Israel's previous report:

196. In October 2006, during a border police raid, policemen detained three Palestinians suspected of illegal stay in Israel. While examining their documentation, one of the policemen in charge of watching the detainees fired a shot that resulted in the death of Iyad Abu Aya and the injury of another. Following a DIPO investigation, the Department filed an indictment against two of the police officers involved in the incident. On January 16, 2008, one of the defendants was convicted of manslaughter and assault under aggravating circumstances that causes actual bodily harm. The charges against the other policeman involved were altered and the case is still pending. (Cr. R 40182/07 The State of Israel v. Tomer Abraham, et. al. (16.1.08)).

197. In September 2004, five border policemen apprehended two Palestinians suspected of illegal stay in Israel in the Jerusalem neighborhood of Abu-Dis. The two were taken to a border police station for questioning, during which, they were subjected to different forms of abuse. The DIPO filed indictments and the five policemen were convicted and given different sentences. The first defendant received 14.5 months of imprisonment and suspended prison sentence following a plea bargain. The second defendant received 7.5 months of imprisonment and suspended prison sentence according to a plea bargain. The third defendant was convicted but his verdict is still pending. The fourth defendant pled guilty to the charges of assault under aggravating circumstances that causes actual bodily harm and to abusing a helpless person and was sentenced to 8 months of imprisonment as well as 12 months of suspended prison sentence, conditioned on refrainment from committing assault three years after his release, and one year probation according to the conditions of the probation service.

198. The fifth defendant pled guilty to the offences of aiding assault under aggravating circumstances that causes actual bodily harm and to aiding in the abuse of a helpless person, and was subject to 4 months of imprisonment to be served as community work, 8 months of suspended prison sentence conditioned on refrainment from committing assault for three years after his release, and one year probation according to the conditions of the probation service. (Cr. R. 436/04 The State of Israel v. Nir Levy et. al (19.5.05)).

199. In another case, border police officers robbing stores in the city of Hebron threatening to use force while enforcing a curfew in the city. The case involved multiple offences and led to an indictment filed by DIPO against 10 policemen. They were charged with robbery while abuse of office, obstruction of justice, assault under aggravating circumstances, assault, and malicious damage to vehicles. (Cr. C. (Jerusalem) 183/03 The State of Israel v. Sisaiy Noga, et. al. (02.07.07)).

200. Following are statistics compiled by the Department for Investigation of Police Officers regarding unlawful use of force by police officers:

Israel Security Agency (ISA)

202. Complaints against ISA personnel alleging the use of unlawful investigation techniques are dealt with by the Inspector for the Complaints within ISA (hereinafter: “the Inspector”).

203. The head of this unit is appointed directly by the Minister of Justice and is granted the authority of a disciplinary investigator. Moreover, according to ISA rules of operation, the Inspector functions independently. No member in the ISA has the authority to interfere with its findings.

204. The Inspector functions under the close supervision of a high-ranking prosecutor from the State Attorney’s Office. Additionally, following a full examination of the complaints, the Inspector’s report is thoroughly reviewed by the above-mentioned prosecutor and in cases in which the issues at hand are sensitive or circumstances so necessitate, also by the Attorney General and the State Attorney.

205. A decision is made regarding the complaint, by the Attorney General, the State Attorney and the prosecutor only following a thorough examination of the Inspector’s findings. The decision is an administrative decision, subject to the judicial review of the Supreme Court sitting as High Court of Justice, like any other administrative decision.

206. Statistics indicate that the Inspector has initiated 35 examinations in 2000, 65 examinations in the year 2001, 81 examinations in the year 2002, 129 examinations in 2003, 115 examinations in 2004, 61 examinations in 2005, 67 examinations in 2006 and 30 examinations in 2007 (up to October 2007). These examinations were the result of external complaints, as well as incidents alleged in internal ISA reports. Four cases resulted in disciplinary measures and several cases resulted in general remarks to ISA interrogators.

Israel Defence Forces (IDF)

207. As detailed in Israel's previous reports, the IDF maintains a strict policy of investigating every claim of maltreatment by IDF soldiers. The IDF instructions specifically prohibit any improper attitudes towards detainees, and instruct as to the denunciation of any instance of an inappropriate behavior of a soldier in relation to detainees. In cases of soldiers' misbehavior of detainees and interogatees, soldiers are either court-martialled or face other disciplinary proceedings, depending on the severity of the charges and policy of the Military Attorney's Office.

208. The interrogation of soldiers suspected of the above violations is performed by the Investigative Military Police. This unit is subordinate to the IDF Head of the General Staff, independent from the IDF regional commands, and therefore autonomous to handle the investigations within the auspices of the Military Attorney's Office.

209. The Military Attorney's Office and the military courts vigorously assist in upholding the above stipulated norms. Below are some noteworthy examples of such enforcement against soldiers deviating from the above norms: two soldiers charged with beating cuffed detainees while transporting them from the Beit El military court to a detention facility were sentenced to seven to ten months of imprisonment by the Military Court of Appeals; In another case several soldiers charged with assault, aggravated assault, and abuse of Palestinian residents at the Kalandia checkpoint were sentenced to four to nine months of imprisonment.

Commitment to psychiatric hospitals

210. The following table refers to both psychiatric hospitals, and to psychiatric wards within general hospitals.

Table 12

Involuntary psychiatric commitments, 2001-2006

%	Totals numbers	%	Totals numbers

18.3	4 063	5.7	1 271	2005

Source: Ministry of Health, Information and Assessment Department, 2006.

211. Since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report, there has been an increase in the number of involuntary commitments to psychiatric hospitals. Involuntary commitments currently constitute 24% of all commitments, as opposed to 17.6% in 1996. This rise can be attributed to the enactment of the Patient Rights Law 5756-1996. The law notably increased awareness of the necessity to obtain a patient's rational consent to hospitalization, or an adequate legal substitute. Thus, statistics relating instances where the patient was hospitalized involuntarily are now more accurate.

212. The number of beds assigned for psychiatric hospitalization has decreased from 6,713 beds in 1996 to 5,352 in 2005. This may be attributed to the fact that a growing number of patients are referred to geriatric hospitals, hostels, and other alternatives provided by the community.

213. On July 26, 2007, the Haifa District Court accepted an appeal to the decision of the District Psychiatric Committee in the "Tirat Hakarmel" Mental Health Center which issued a hospitalization order based on the Mentally Ill Patients Treatment Law 5751-1991, (the "Mentally Ill Patients Treatment Law") without granting the Petitioner the right to a legal hearing (Haifa D.C. Appeal 001036/07 Anonymous v. the District Psychiatric Committee in the "Tirat Hakarmel" Mental Health Center).

214. The Court held that the petitioner has the right to a legal hearing before any decision is made regarding his case. It concluded that the right of the petitioner was violated and that the District Psychiatric Committee operated contrary to the law. The Court held that the hospitalization order remain valid for another seven days to allow the District Psychiatrist to operate according to the powers provided to him by the Mentally Ill Patients Treatment Law. Because the petitioner did not request his immediate release, and in order to avoid causing further damage, the Court held that the immediate release of the petitioner would not be beneficial.

Experimentation on human beings

215. In January 2006, the Pharmaceutical Administration of the Ministry of Health published procedure No. 14, titled "Guidelines for Clinical Trials in Human Subjects". These guidelines govern the method of submission, approval and inspection of clinical trials and clinical research in human subjects and define the procedure for handling application for clinical trials and the requirements for the conduct and the supervision thereof. Compliance with the requirements of the guidelines is designed to protect the trial participants and ensure that their rights, safety and wellbeing are maintained, and that the information obtained from the study is reliable.

216. According to the guidelines, any clinical trial, including the planning, approval, conduct, recording, and reporting thereof shall be carried out in due compliance with the principles of the Helsinki Declaration, the Public Health Regulations (Clinical Trials in Human Subjects) 5741-1980 - including all subsequent additions and amendments thereto, the Genetic Information Law 5761-2000, the provisions of these guidelines, the provisions of the current Harmonized Tripartite Guideline for Good Clinical Practice (ICH-GCP E6) (CPMP/ICH/135/95) and the provisions of the current ISO 14155-1, 14155-2 (2003): Clinical Investigation of Medical Devices for Human Subjects (<http://www.iso.ch>), as well as regulations and guidelines published periodically by the Ministry of Health. In the event of an inconsistency between the aforesaid guidelines, the guidelines of the Ministry of Health shall prevail. In matters not covered by binding provisions in the guidelines of the Ministry of Health, the international guidelines are to be followed.

Prohibition of human cloning

217. The Prohibition of Genetic Intervention (Human Cloning and Genetic Manipulation of Reproductive Cells) Law, 5759-1999, which prohibits the performance of any act or intervention regarding human cells intended to clone a human being or create a human being by use of genetically altered cells, was enacted in 1999 for a period of five years, the Law was extended and revised in 2004 for a period of another five years, until March 2009.

218. The amended law now includes the following changes:

218.1. The examination of the moral, legal, social and scientific aspects of genetic intervention will be performed through “consideration of freedom of scientific research for the advancement of medicine”.

218.2. The definition of “Human Cloning” was amended in order to make it clear that the prohibition stated in the Law applies commencing at the beginning of the procedure of human cloning for the purpose of reproduction, that is to say - from the moment of inserting the fetus into the uterus.

218.3. In order to clarify the distinction between reproductive cloning and therapeutic cloning, it was determined that the prohibited actions will include both human reproductive cloning and Germ Line Gene Therapy for the purpose of creating a human being.

218.4. The functions and powers of the Advisory Committee were redefined:

218.4.1. Pursue developments in medicine, science, biotechnology, bioethics and law in the area of genetic experiments on human beings in Israel and abroad.

218.4.2. Submit a yearly report to the Minister of Health and the Science and Technology Committee of the Knesset concerning the fulfillment of its functions and the exercise of its powers and report on the recent developments in the area of human cloning.

218.4.3. Advise the Minister of Health on the matters set out in the Law and make recommendations to the Minister regarding the extent of the prohibitions set out in the Law.

218.5. The Minister of Health is to determine by regulations provisions concerning the exercise of powers of the Advisory Committee, including supervision and monitoring powers. Such regulations entered into force in January 2006 (The Prohibition of Genetic Intervention Regulations (Human Cloning and Genetic Manipulation of Reproductive Cells) (Advisory Committee Powers) 5766-2006).

218.6. The Criminal penalties were amended in order to increase deterrence: a more severe penalty of four-year imprisonment or a one million NIS fine have been set for violation of the provisions of this law.

219. The five-year period of the Law is to be used to examine the consequences of the provisions of the law in order to reconsider its prohibitions in the light of the developments in the scientific community. At present, there are no experiments taking place in Israel aimed at cloning human beings.

Article 8. Prohibition of slavery

Legislation amendments

220. On October 29, 2006 the Anti Trafficking Law, 5766 - 2006 came into force. The new legislation reflects an attitude whereby combating trafficking in persons requires the integration of a series of tools and actors. It also places emphasis on the prohibition of all forms of slavery, as well as forced labor.

221. As regards trafficking for the purpose of slavery or forced labor, the following series of crimes had been established: trafficking in human beings for the purpose of slavery or forced labor (section 377A(a) of the Penal Law), holding a person under conditions of slavery (section 375A of the Penal Law), forced labor (section 376 of the Penal Law), and exploitation of vulnerable populations (section 431 of the Penal Law). In addition, the abduction offence has been broadened to include two new offences: abduction for the purpose of slavery or forced labor and conveying a person beyond the boundaries of a state (sections 374A and 370 of the Penal Law) and a new offence created of causing a person to leave a state for the purposes of prostitution or slavery (section 376A of the Penal Law).

222. These criminal offences exist alongside various regulatory offences intended to protect foreign workers, for example, the Foreign Workers Law, 5751 - 1991 (the "Foreign Workers Law") and the Employment Service Law, 5719 - 1959 (the "Employment Service Law"). However, their inclusion in the Penal Law accords them a higher level of criminality and better expresses society's moral condemnation.

223. Before the new law, Israel did not have a slavery offence. Now, it is a crime with a maximal punishment of 16 years of imprisonment and 20 years if committed against a minor. The elements of the offence require that a person be held under conditions of slavery for the purposes of work or services, including sex services. Slavery is defined as follows.

224. "Slavery" means a situation under which powers generally exercised towards property are exercised over a person; in this matter, substantive control over the life of a person or denial of his liberty shall be deemed use of powers as stated. This definition attempts to focus upon the hard kernel of slavery, which is acting towards a person as if towards property, thus destroying his separate legal personality and his basic autonomy.

225. The Law also created two new abduction offences which serve to cover behavior which is close to trafficking and slavery, but may not fall squarely into the elements of those crimes:

225.1. Aggravated abduction offence - (section 374A) which requires that the abduction be perpetrated in order to achieve the aims enumerated in the trafficking crime (including slavery and forced labor). The maximal sentence is 20 years imprisonment. This section was added in order to tailor abduction to a world rife with trafficking.

225.2. In addition, the law creates a new offence of “Conveying a Person Beyond the Boundaries of a State” (section 370) - which prohibits conveying a person beyond the boundaries of the state in which he resides. This provision reflects a reality by which people are abducted beyond national boundaries in order to “feed” the international “trafficking industry”. The maximal sentence is 10 years imprisonment.

226. The Law also adds the offense of Causing a Person to Leave a State for Purposes of Prostitution or Slavery (section 376B of the Penal Law). Like the new abduction offence, this new offence fills the gaps left by the trafficking offence. It penalizes “Anyone who causes another person to leave the State in which he lives for purposes of engaging the person in prostitution or holding that person under conditions of slavery”. The maximal sentence is 10 years imprisonment.

227. Forced Labor (section 376 of the Penal Law) - this offense is now punishable by a 7 years imprisonment. The section penalizes “Anyone who unlawfully forces a person to work, by using force or other means of pressure or by threat of one of these, or by consent elicited by fraud, whether or not for consideration ...”. This section deals with less severe situations which can still be considered as labor, rather than slavery.

228. This recent legislation has paved the way for Israel to ratify both the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, as well as the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. Hence, Israel is currently in the final stages of these proceedings.

Hard labor in the penal system

229. General. As described in detail in our Initial Report, Israeli law does not allow hard labor to be imposed as the punishment for a crime. Incarcerated convicts are required to work at tasks or jobs which do not involve hard labor (Section 48 of the Penal Law) unless the Exemptions Committee of the Prisons Service releases them from the obligation for reasons of rehabilitation, health or other reasonable grounds.

230. Between 1997 and 2007, there was a 264% increase in the number of employed prisoners. This increase derives, mostly, from the increase in the employment of prisoners in private entrepreneurs’ factories.

231. The Israel Prisons Service (IPS) work scheme operates in two major areas: On the one hand it focuses on imparting the prisoners with professional skills. For that purpose, professional training courses are held within the prisons by the Ministry of ITL, granting the graduating prisoners professional diplomas from the Ministry. On the other hand, it deals with the employment of prisoners within the prisons. Due to a lack of suitable employment, the prisoners’ workforce is not being utilized to the fullest capacity.

232. About 5,300 prisoners are employed in 53 branches of private entrepreneurs’ factories. The terms of the employment of prisoners are similar, and are set by agreement between the IPS and the private entrepreneur or determined by the worker’s productivity.

233. When approaching the date of release, the working prisoner joins an individual or a collective rehabilitative program. The prisoners in these programs are employed in factories outside the prison. At this time, about 300 prisoners are employed in such rehabilitative programs.

234. The prisoners employed in the private entrepreneurs' factories receive a fixed salary, slightly lower than the minimum wage. The Prisons Service pays prisoners on a set date every month, even when the private entrepreneur has not yet provided the actual pay.

Foreign workers

235. General. Israel is a country of destination for migrant workers from Asia, Eastern Europe and Africa. The main countries of origin of foreign workers in Israel are: China, the Philippines, Turkey, Thailand and Bulgaria. In 2006, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (ITL) issued 87,692 permits for employment of foreign workers in various permitted fields.³

236. Migrant workers coming to Israel in search of employment, are motivated mostly by harsh economic conditions and low wages in their countries of origin. Some enter Israel by illegally crossing the southern border of Israel or illegally at its airports, using either a forged tourist visa, or a false Jewish identity. The vulnerability of these persons exposes them to the risk of being exploited for easy financial gain. This vulnerability may be heightened by requirements to pay high middleman fees in their countries of origin.

237. Foreign Workers Law. Employers may be prosecuted for violations of the labor laws in Israel, including the Foreign Workers Law. Criminal offences under this law include the following:

237.1. Employment of a foreign worker without providing him with a detailed contract.

237.2. Employment of a foreign worker without provision of medical insurance.

237.3. Employment of a foreign worker without providing proper lodging.

237.4. Employment of a foreign worker without providing a detailed pay-slip, or unlawfully deducting sums from his wages.

237.5. Employment of a foreign worker without holding the documentation pertaining to the above obligations, as well as a listing of hours of work, at the workplace or the offices of the employer.

237.6. Illegal employment of a foreign worker, i.e. - employment of a foreign worker by an employer who does not have a permit to do so, or employment of a foreign worker in violation of the conditions of his visa.

³ Nursing care - 44,178; Agriculture - 25,942; Construction - 14,522; Industry - 1,487; Restaurants - 1,087; Hotels - 476.

Under the provisions of this law, the administrative fine for its violation is now 5,000 NIS for each original offence, and 10,000 NIS for each repeated offence. A maximum criminal penalty of 52,200 NIS per employee, per offence, can be imposed upon the employer by a court of law, and when the violation occurs in a business framework, the maximum criminal penalty for each offence will be 104,400 NIS, or six months imprisonment. An additional penalty of 5,200 NIS for each day the violation continues can also be imposed.

238. Additional relevant laws. The Employment Service Law (Amendment No. 14) - criminalizes the collection of illegal excessive recruitment fees from foreign workers, and makes this crime punishable by up to 6 months imprisonment, and/or attended by a fine of up to 200,000 NIS (59,500$). According to the Prohibition on Money Laundering Law the amendment also makes the collection of exorbitant fees an origin offence.

239. The Employment Service (Recruitment Fees) Regulations 5766-2006 - cap the possible recruitment fees to be demanded by an Israel recruitment agency at 3,050 NIS, (approximately 907$, or 88% of the monthly minimum wage), minus any sum already paid by the worker to a foreign recruitment agency. The agency may, however, be legitimately reimbursed from the foreign worker for the cost of airfare from the source country to Israel. The Regulations also state the terms under which it is permitted to collect the fee, for example, a detailed contract must have effect between the agency and the worker. Additionally, the Regulations outline the circumstances under which a recruitment agency shall reimburse payments collected from a foreign worker.

240. The Employment Service (Provision of Information) Regulations, 5766-2006 - These regulations require a recruitment agency to provide foreign workers with all relevant information relating to their rights and obligations as foreign workers in Israel, for example, information as to the permitted recruitment fees, etc.

241. Bilateral agreements. An agreement was recently signed between the International Organization of Migration (IOM) and Thailand, a key country of origin to Israel. The agreement pledges to supervise the recruitment of Thai workers coming to Israel, so as to prevent the collection of high middleman fees in the country of origin. This is calculated to prevent a breeding ground for exploitation in general, and trafficking in particular, as workers who have incurred high debts will tend to accept any conditions of employment in an effort to eliminate those debts.

242. The agreement intends to decrease exploitative incentives for agencies to bring workers to Israel. Its implementation will begin in a few months. The agreement stipulates that a Thai citizen wishing to work in Israel will pay a maximum of US$1,800: that is US$ 1,200 for flights and US$ 600 for expenses- including permits, medical examinations and vaccinations. Whilst Israel has not signed the document, the Government decided more than two years ago to endorse it. High-ranking government officials have followed the process closely from the outset, including the Prime Minister's Office Director. According to the agreement, the Thai labor ministry will be responsible for recruiting and funding the migrant workers, and IOM will oversee the process.

243. Dissemination of information regarding rights among foreign workers - A special workers' rights brochure ("Zchuton") regarding the rights of foreign workers in the construction field, was issued by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor in English, Russian, Romanian, Turkish, Thai and Chinese. The “Zchuton” is also distributed by the Ministry of the Interior to each foreign worker who arrives at the Ben Gurion airport. The “Zchuton” instructs workers to contact the Ombudswoman (detailed below) in any case of breach of the rights discussed therein.

244. In addition, a brochure discussing the general labor rights of foreign workers in Israel is published on the website of the Ministry of ITL in English, Hebrew, Chinese, Thai, Russian, Romanian and Turkish.

245. An additional method of disseminating information has been implemented by the Israeli Embassy in Thailand. In cooperation with the Ministry of ITL, and the Thai Labor Ministry, a brochure has been launched discussing the rights of foreign workers in Israel. The booklet, in Thai, provides information about the labor and social security rights of workers and includes other information, such as relevant phone numbers, places that accord medical treatment and basic Hebrew. The booklet is to be attached to the passport of each worker that receives a visa.

246. Medical insurance. The Foreign Workers Law requires employers to arrange broad medical insurance for employees who are foreign workers. Employers who violate this obligation may face criminal prosecution.

247. An Ombudswoman for the Complaints of Foreign Workers was appointed in the Ministry of ITL. Her mandate is to safeguard the rights of foreign workers employed in the construction industry, agriculture and nursing care fields in Israel, and to handle complaints from foreign workers, employers, citizens, NGOs, associations and newspapers. The Ombudswoman has the authority to recommend that a criminal investigation be carried out by the Enforcement Division, as well as to initiate administrative proceedings. In addition, she may allow foreign workers in the construction industry to change employers after less than the three requisite months. The Ombudswoman follows-up on complaints she has handled to ensure that workers are indeed paid the sums found due. The Ombudswoman works in cooperation with the Enforcement Department in the Foreign Workers Department, the Ministry of the Interior and the Payments Department in the Ministry of ITL, to review the complaints and oversee adherence to her decisions.

248. Government assistance in detention facilities. - At the detention facility, detainees are interviewed by detention facility officers to ensure that they have valid travel documents, as well as by inspectors of the Ministry of ITL to ensure that they are not owed monies by their employers, and to aid in the collection of any such back wages for the worker before removal. In 2006, Inspectors of the Enforcement Division collected wages owed to foreign workers from employers amounting 2,290,067 NIS (681,000 $).

249. Trafficking in women. See above, under paragraphs 118-132 above.

Article 9. Liberty and security of person

250. Meeting with legal counsel. A recent amendment to the Prisons Ordinance, 1971 (amendment No. 30, dated July 2005), stipulates the conditions under which a prisoner may meet with an attorney. According to section 45, such meetings shall be held in private and in conditions suitable for maintaining both the confidentiality of the matters and/or documents to be exchanged, and adequate supervision of the prisoner's movements. Following a prisoner's request to meet with an attorney for professional service, or the request of an attorney to meet with a prisoner, the director of the prison shall, without delay, facilitate a meeting to take place, during regular working hours, within the prison confines.

251. Section 45A of the Prisons Ordinance operates with regard to all prisoners, except detainees who are yet to be indicted. The section authorizes the IPS Commissioner and the director of the prison, to postpone or refuse any meeting between a particular lawyer and detainee, for a limited period of time, where there are substantial reasons to suspect that the meeting will facilitate either the commission of an offence risking the security of a person, the public, the State or the prison; or a substantial breach of prison regulations in implementation of prison discipline, procedures, and administration. The prison director is authorized to delay such meetings for 24 hours, whilst the IPS Commissioner may order an additional postponement of 5 days, with the agreement of a District Attorney. Notification of the order shall be given to the prisoner in writing, unless the IPS Commissioner specifically orders that it should be given orally. The reasons for the order may be withheld under certain limited provisions. Review of decisions rendered under section 45A may be done by the relevant District Court.

252. Following application by a representative of the Attorney General, and based on the grounds specified above, a District Court may further postpone such a meeting for up to 21 days. The maximum delay shall not exceed 3 months. Decisions of the District Court may be appealed to the Supreme Court, where a Supreme Court judge may further postpone a meeting, again based on one of the grounds specified above.

253. In Cr.C. 10879/05, Al Abid v. State of Israel (18.12.05), the Supreme Court recently addressed the issue of a detainee's right to meet with an attorney whilst in custody. During Al Abid's detention, a court order had been issued postponing his meeting with an attorney. When that period concluded, he was not informed of his right to meet with an attorney. The Court stipulated that "the postponement of a meeting between a detainee and his lawyer on the basis of security reasons compels the authorities to inform the detainee of the postponement. Moreover, when the security impediment no longer exists, it is the duty of the authorities to inform the detainee that he is entitled to meet a lawyer. This is a fundamental right; the parties concerned must, through appropriate instructions, ensure the fulfillment of this right frequently". The court added that even during a regular police interrogation, where the detainee relinquishes the right to meet with an attorney and in cases where the interrogation is prolonged, "it is appropriate to remind the detainee of his right to meet an attorney". By interpreting the Criminal Procedure Law, (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) 1996- 5756 (the "Criminal Procedure Law, (Enforcement Powers - Arrests)"), the Court explained that impediments (prescribed by the Law) to meetings between a detainee and an attorney exist, however whenever such an impediment is removed, the detainee must be immediately informed of the removal, and must be allowed to meet with an attorney.

254. Postponing/preventing a meeting with legal counsel. The legal tests for determining what constitutes a "substantial risk" are anchored in section 45a(b) of the 2005 amendment to the Prisons Ordinance 5732-1971. One of these tests is, for example, evidence of a "substantial risk" that “a prison offence which damages substantially the discipline in prison and might cause a severe disruption to prison order and its administration” will occur. It should also be noted that recourse to an additional extension of this kind has not yet been used in order to prevent access to legal counsel.

255. If such an extension were to be granted, the detainee or his representative is able to submit a petition to the District Court, in accordance with section 45a(f) of the Prisons Ordinance.

256. In a recent decision by the High Court of Justice of 2005, (HCJ 3168/02, The Israeli Bar Association v. the Minister of Public Security), the court annulled section 29(b) of the Prisons Regulations 5739 - 1978, which also authorized the IPS Commissioner or a prison director to postpone/prevent access to counsel if there was a substantial risk that meeting with a particular lawyer would enable the commission of an offence.

Arrest and detention

257. First judicial hearing. Section 17 of the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) Law, was amended in 2006, so that for the period between June 29, 2006 - December 29, 2010, the following provisions would apply: if the officer-in-charge is convinced that breaking off an interrogation of a detainee arrested for security offences in order to bring that person before a judge will seriously harm the investigation, he may prolong the period of arrest to 48 hours. Additionally, if the officer-in-charge is convinced that breaking off interrogation of a detainee arrested for security offences, for the purpose of bringing that person before a judge would seriously harm the investigation in a manner that might thwart the prevention of harm to human life, he may, with consent of the authorizing authority, and by a written decision, prolong the period until arraignment before a judge for additional 24 hour periods, provided the overall period does not exceed 96 hours. Any decision to prolong the arraignment date for over 72 hours requires the authorization of a Head of the Investigation Department in the Israeli Security Agency, or his deputy.

The use of video conference

258. In 2002, the Criminal Procedure (Investigation of Suspects) Law 5762-2002, was issued. Section 2 of the Law states that a suspect must be investigated in his own language or a language he understands, including sign-language. In addition, section 3 asserts that the investigation must take place in a police station unless a police officer presumes it cannot be held in the station, or there is a reasonable ground to conduct it promptly outside the station, or if the officer in charge found that there is a reasonable ground to investigate the suspect outside the station. Furthermore, a decision to investigate a suspect outside the premises of the station must be documented in writing shortly after reaching the decision.

259. In addition, according to section 4, the entire investigation must be documented via visual or auditory media, including verbal exchanges between the suspect and the investigator or those made in the presence of the suspect. A visual documentation shall also include all bodily movements and responses. A written documentation shall include the major verbal exchanges as well as bodily movements or responses that replace verbal exchanges, which took place between the suspect and the investigator or while the suspect was present, in a way that will reflect what occurred during the investigation. The documentation shall be written simultaneously during the investigation or closely afterwards.

260. According to section 8, if the investigation is documented in writing, it shall be documented in the language of the investigation. However, if the language of the investigation cannot be used to write the documentation, the investigation shall be documented visually or through audio techniques. If sign language was used during the investigation, the documentation shall be via audio or visual techniques. If the investigator has ground to believe that the suspect cannot read or write or that he is a person with physical, mental or cognitive disability which prevents him from affirming the correctness of the written documentation of the investigation, the investigation shall be documented visually or through audio techniques.

261. The Law is to be implemented gradually and the implementation shall be completed until the beginning of 2010.

262. Section 65A of the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Arrests), Law was amended on 2007 to allow the use of Video Conferences for the purpose of keeping a suspect in detention, or releasing him on bail. Video conference may be used only in cases when the defendant in an adult, has not been indicted yet, is represented by an attorney and has agreed to the use of video conference after he was allowed to meet his attorney in person. Video conferencing must be conducted so that the defendant can see the procedures taking place in the court, and so that the judge, the opposing counsel and the arresting officer will be able to see the defendant and his surroundings. Confidentiality between the defendant and his attorney must also be maintained.

263. Period of arrest before indictment. In the event that the court does not release the suspect at the initial hearing, it may order continued detention for a period of up to 15 consecutive days. If at the end of this period, the police still wish to keep the suspect in detention for the purpose of criminal investigation, another hearing will be held, and the court's decision will be based on the standards noted above. The longer the detention however, the more substantial the evidence against the suspect must be, in order to justify extending the remand. The total period of detention based on police requests may not exceed 30 days. Detention may be extended beyond the 30-day period only by a decision of the court, and upon a special motion signed by the Attorney General.

264. Detention pending court hearing. On February 7, 2006, The Supreme Court accepted an appeal of a detainee kept in detention by the Jerusalem Police pending court hearings, despite the Magistrate Court's early decision not to stay his release (C.A 1145/06 Mizrahi v. The State of Israel). The Supreme Court stated that the police had to respect the Court's decision and pointed out that a request for his re-arrest could be brought before the Court even after his release. The court thus decided to release the detainee until an indictment against him or a request for his re-arrest was brought before the court.

265. According to the Supreme Court's decision - suspects, defendants, detainees and prisoners are all eligible to constitutional and procedural protections, stemming from the principles of human dignity and the rule of law in the Israeli justice system. Basic Law: Human Liberty and Dignity and the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) Law, both provide protection and ensure the rights of detainees. In this case, the Court stated that the continuing detention was contrary to earlier judicial decisions and ordered the detainee's immediate release under restricting conditions.

266. Detention following serving of sentence. On June 10, 2007, the Supreme Court rejected the State's request for the continued detention of a man who had already been convicted of assaulting his wife and served his sentence, while appeal proceedings for a more severe punishment were carried out to completion (Cr. R. 5024/07 The State of Israel v. Salah Diab). The Court stated that the risk from a person who has already been convicted and subsequently served his sentence, shall not be examined using the same criteria and standards applied to a person who has not yet served his sentenced. Thus, infringing upon the liberty of such a person, even if he or she are still considered a risk and face an appeal, shall be avoided in general.

267. The Court held that it has the authority to order the detention of the defendant until the completion of the appeal's procedures according to section 22 (B) of the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) Law but it stated that such authority is to be exercised only in rare and exceptional cases, when the danger to public security from the defendant if he/she is released or the fear that they will escape from legal procedures is decisively stronger than their right to personal liberty. Despite the severe offences, the Court concluded that this case was not exceptional - it was the first offence of the defendant who had no criminal record. The Court decided that in this case the alternative of house arrest was acceptable, whilst strengthening the conditions for the release of the defendant.

Arrest and detention of armed forces personnel

268. The right to legal counsel. In a recent decision by the Supreme Court, the Court held that "[t]here is no dispute as to the high standing and central position of the right to legal counsel in our legal system." (C.A. 5121/98, Prv. Yisascharov v. The Head Military Prosecutor et. al. (4.5.06)). Here, the Court adopted a relative exclusion doctrine, according to which the court may rule on the inadmissibility of a confession due to the interrogator's failure to notify the soldier of his right to legal counsel. For further details see above, under Article 7.

269. In 2005, the High Court of Justice determined that military courts must give reasons in writing for their verdicts and punishments. Deviation from doing so will lead to an annulment of the judgment. Judges Levy and Rubinstein ruled in one particular case that among the procedural flaws was the fact that "the complaint sheet was completely blank" (HCJ 266/05 Pilant v. the Deputy Military Advocate General).

270. Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law, 5762-2002. The Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law, 5762-2002 (the "the Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law"), was adopted in order to regulate in domestic legislation, the arrest of persons not entitled to a prison of war status, who nevertheless take an active part in combat and hostilities. Such persons are not entitled to prisoner of war status as accorded in the Third Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (1949), as they do not adhere to the provisions of section 4 of the Convention. This authority has long been recognized by many authors in the field of international law, and has become a vital tool in combating terrorism, where terrorists operate in grave breach of the most basic principles of the law of armed conflict, most notably of the duty to distinguish themselves from the civilian population.

271. Accordingly, section 2 of the Law defines an “unlawful combatant” as a person who had participated either directly or indirectly in hostile acts against the State of Israel, or is a member of a force perpetrating hostile acts against the State of Israel, where the conditions prescribed for lawful combatants in section 4 of the Third Geneva Convention (1949) with respect to prisoners-of-war, and granting prisoner-of-war status in international humanitarian law, do not apply.

272. Section 3(c) of the Law states that an incarceration order shall be brought to the attention of the prisoner at the earliest possible date, and that he shall be given the opportunity to put his submissions before the Chief of General Staff. Where the Chief of General Staff finds that the prisoner is not an unlawful combatant and that his release shall not adversely affect State security, the order shall be revoked.

273. With regards to “unlawful combatants”, the Chief of General Staff may issue an incarceration order in accordance with the Law. According to section 5, a person arrested under the provisions of this Law shall be brought before a District Court judge within 14 days of the date the order was issued. Unless another ground for detention exists under the provisions of an existing law, such a prisoner shall be summarily released if he is brought before the District Court, and a hearing has not been commenced within 14 days of the date of granting the order.

274. After the initial hearing, and in accordance with section 3(c) of the Law, an incarceration order will be subject to periodic (6 monthly) judicial review before a judge of the District Court. Where the Court finds that a detainee’s release will not harm State security, or that there are special grounds otherwise justifying his release, the order shall be revoked. The District Court’s decision can, within 30 days, be appealed before the Supreme Court.

275. According to section 6 of the Law, a prisoner is entitled to meet with a lawyer at the earliest possible date on which such a meeting may be conducted without harming State security requirements, but no later than 7 days prior to him being brought before a judge.

276. Section 10 of the Law stipulates that the prisoner shall be held under proper conditions which shall not impair his health or dignity. Maintaining adequate conditions of detention was an issue addressed by Chief Justice Barak in H CJ 769/02, The Public Committee against Torture in Israel et. al. v. The Government of Israel, et.al.: “Needless to say, unlawful combatants are not beyond the law. They are not ‘outlaws’. God created them as well in his image; their human dignity as well is to be honored; they as well enjoy and are entitled to protection, even if most minimal, by customary international law ... That is certainly the case when they are in detention or brought to justice ...”

277. The Law’s constitutionality was recently reviewed and upheld by the Supreme Court sitting as the Court of Criminal Appeals in Cr. A. 6659/06, Anonymous v. The State of Israel (11.6.08).

278. A bed to every prisoner. On February 12, 2007, the Supreme Court declared that the State must provide a bed to every prisoner held in an Israeli prison with full implementation of this obligation to begin on July 1 of that year (HCJ 4634/04 Physicians for human rights et.al. v. The Minister of Public Security, et.al.). In its decision, the Court stated that the right to sleep on a bed is a basic condition for living in dignity, based on the right to dignity anchored in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (1992).

279. The State claimed that the deterioration of the security situation in Israel since October 2000, caused an increased number of detainees and prisoners held in Israeli prisons, thus Israel Prisons Service (IPS) failed to provide a bed to every prisoner. Instead only a mattress on the floor was provided due to a serious lack of incarceration facilities. Nevertheless, the State did not object to the petitioners' claim that a prisoner's right to sleep on a bed is an integral part of his basic right to dignity, but requested that the Court recognize possible limitations which might prevent full implementation of the principle of "bed to every prisoner", especially in unforeseen times of emergency. The Court stated that "when on the one side of the balance equation rests the right of a person to minimal life standards when held in prison, a contradictory value with a special significance is necessary in order to justify damage to this basic right".

280. In its decision, the Court also related to Article 7 of the ICCPR, stating that "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" and to Article 10(1) stating that "All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person". The Court pointed out that the UN Human Rights Committee determined, considering Article 10(1) of the ICCPR, that the dignity of persons deprived of their liberty should be ensured "subject to the restrictions that are unavoidable in a closed environment".

281. Handcuffing detainees. On March 13, 2007, The Ombudsman's Office of the Israeli Judiciary published an opinion concerning handcuffing of detainees in court hearings, following a complaint made by a journalist, accused of prohibited publication, who was handcuffed during his court hearing. The Ombudsman determined that as a general rule, a detainee is not to be handcuffed during court hearings apart from exceptional cases in which the police officer who accompanies the detainee requests the court's permission to keep him handcuffed. The Ombudsman also held that the judge has the authority to order to release detainees from handcuffs, even in exceptional cases, where the detainee is suspected of committing a severe crime or when there is a fear that he will escape or act violently. A judge's order to release the handcuffs will be adhered to immediately, using cautious measures as required in such cases.

282. In its opinion, the Ombudsman stated that the issue of handcuffing of detainees during court hearings is of great importance, since the handcuffing of a person damages his dignity severely. Therefore, the Court has to balance between the detainees' right to dignity on one hand, and ensuring security and public order on the other hand.

283. Following the Ombudsman's decision in the above journalist's case, the police published a new procedure (Patrol Department Procedure No. 02.220.044) on February 2, 2007, containing provisions concerning the handcuffing of detainees during court hearing. Section 5d(1)e of the new procedure states that as a general rule, a detainee is not to be handcuffed during court hearing, save for in exceptional cases, the police officer who accompanies the detainee can request the court's permission to keep the detainee handcuffed and only the judge has the authority to approve it.

284. Right to family and parenthood. On June 13, 2006, the Supreme Court rejected a petition against the IPS which allowed the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassin, to take out from prison a sperm sample in order to allow artificial insemination in his spouse (HCJ 2245/06 MP Netta Dovrin v. Israel Prisons Service). In its decision, the Court stated that the right to family and parenthood is one of the main elements of human existence and is derived from the rights to dignity, privacy and autonomy of the individual's will. The Court asserted that prisoner's human rights are ensured during their imprisonment period, including their right to parenthood and procreation.

285. The Court based its decision on the principle of human dignity as in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (1992) and also on international law and several articles of the ICCPR: the right to marry and found a family (Article 23), the right to privacy and protection from arbitrary interference with family life (Article 17(1)), the right not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment (Article 7) and the right of persons deprived of their liberty to be treated with respect to the inherent dignity of the human person (Article 10(1)). The Court also mentioned that the UN Human Rights Committee determined in General Comment No. 16 (1988), that in relation to Article 17(1), interference with family life can only take place on the basis of law, which itself must comply with the provisions, aims and objectives of the Covenant. In relation to Article 10(1), the Court cited General Comment No. 16, stating that persons deprived of their liberty are not to be subjected to any hardship or constraint other than that resulting from the deprivation of liberty.

286. Medical treatment. On October 28, 2007, the Tel-Aviv District Court determined that a prisoner held in the custody of the Israel Prisons Service (IPS), is entitled to the same medical treatment provided to all other citizens of the State by the public health services (Administrative Petition 002808/05 Ahmed Yossef Mahmud Altamimi v. Head of IPS's Medicine Department et. al.). The petitioner, a Palestinian security prisoner, was handed down a life sentence, and has been held in an Israeli prison since 1993. In the last 5 years he has received hemodialysis treatments due to a terminal renal failure disease. Whilst the prisoner was permitted to undergo a kidney transplant operation, the IPS refused to finance such a high cost operation.

287. In its decision, the Court held that since the petitioner was in the custody of the State, the State was obligated to grant him the same medical treatment granted to all other citizens of the State by the public health service. The petitioner was entitled to the best medical treatment that the IPS could provide him, even if the cost of this treatment was exorbitant. The Court added that according to every existing medical assessment, any delay in the performance of the transplant might shorten the petitioner's life expectancy. The Court additionally rejected an argument that the transplant be financed by the Palestinian Authority.

Article 11. Freedom from imprisonment for breach of a contractual obligation

288. This issue has been discussed in our previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of our second periodic report.

Article 12. Freedom of movement

289. On August 1, 2007, the Tel-Aviv Magistrate Court determined that the general public has the right to enter and cross “Andromeda Hill”, a residential area in Jaffa bordered by a fence, where the access to public areas inside the neighborhood was denied (Opening Motion 200681/04 Jaffa Association for Human Rights v. Andromeda Hill Administration Ltd). The Court held that according to the approved construction plan of the project, there is a public easement binding the land owners of the project to grant the general public the right to pass through the neighborhood along its walkways, and have access to public land designed for view points.

290. According to the Court’s decision, the right of the general public to enter Andromeda Hill and cross it through the western gate and the main entrance is not in doubt. This right is anchored in the approved construction plan of the project and based on an easement which was registered in the Land Registration Office. Moreover, the plan’s approval was stipulated by granting this right, and otherwise would not have been approved by the authorized committees. Under these circumstances, and since the respondents deny a free passage from the general public to the project despite its explicit right according to the law, the Court ordered that the entry to the neighborhood through the gates will be permitted freely between 8:00-22:00, subjected to security check as required, providing that it is done equally to all persons.

Exit from Israel

291. Restrictions due to Exemption from Military Service. On June 12, 2007, the Supreme Court rejected a petition against the Regulations which limit the exit from Israel of yeshiva students under the age of 29 (HCJ 5803/06 Dubi Gutman v. The Minister of Defense). Regulation 7 of the Service Postponement to Yeshiva Students whose Torah - their Craft, Regulations, 5762-2002 dealing with yeshiva students who decide to continue their studies and not attend military service, requires approval of the military authorities to exit Israel and determines maximum periods for exit. The Court held that regulation 7 is not to be tarnished legally or morally, but expressed its view that limiting the exit from Israel for those yeshiva students over the age of 22 shall be reevaluated by the legislator since it creates discrimination against them.

292. Restrictions due to Refusal to Pay a Fee. On February 12, 2006, the Tel Aviv Magistrate Court accepted a claim for damages of a citizen, who was prevented from crossing the border into Egypt at the Taba border crossing because of his refusal to pay the required fee (C.A 058252/04 Hidud v. Israel Airports Authority). The Court determined that the freedom of movement can not be deprived solely due to the arbitrary judgment of the manager of the terminal and ordered 10,000 NIS compensation to the claimant.

293. According to the Court’s Judgment, section 6 of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty states that every person has the liberty to leave Israel and that every Israeli citizen has the right to enter the country. According to the Basic Law, restrictions on the freedom of movement must be provided by a law fitting the values of the State of Israel and, designed for a proper purpose, and to an extent no greater than required. Provided that there is no such law which restricts the freedom of movement, the manager of the terminal is not authorized to prevent crossing into Taba. Considering this lack of regulations and clear criteria, entry or exist of people from Israel can not be prevented because of refusal to pay a fee.

Article 13. Expulsion of aliens

294. The Detention Review Tribunal. On March 3, 2004, the Attorney General decided that the Administrative Tribunal for Detention Review would be administered by the Ministry of Justice. He also instructed the Immigration Administration that any person detained should be brought before the tribunal within four days, unless exceptional circumstances justify a delay. This is based on the language of the Entry to Israel Law, which requires that a person detained be brought before a tribunal “as soon as possible”. In order to allow due process, the Attorney General instructed that the number of cases heard by each judge should be limited to a reasonable amount, and no more than 30 cases a day; that appropriate secretarial services should be provided; and an appropriate location within the detention facility should be allocated for the hearings. He also instructed that detainees receive a copy of the decisions pertaining to them.

295. On July 13, 2007, the Tel-Aviv District Court rejected the State appeal against the decision of the Detention Review Tribunal to release 38 African detainees from custody (A.A 000162/06 The Ministry of the Interior v. Tigan and 37 others). The Detention Review Tribunal decided in May to release the detainees because they were held for two months without “...any legal basis or based on invalid basis or of dubious validity (by force of the security legislation)”. During this period, the detainees were held in “Ktziot” facility, without any judicial review, access to legal proceedings, contact with human right organizations or with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

296. Despite an appeal submitted by The Ministry of the Interior, the District Court issued a decision calling for the immediate release of the detainees. The Court rejected the State’s position that the Detention Review Tribunal can not order release based on illegal custody. In addition, the Court criticized the State and pointed out that the detainees should not have been held according to the Prevention of Infiltration Law, 5714-1954, which does not contain a permanent mechanism of judicial review and evaluation of the custody.

297. Legal representation. On January 24, 2007 (A.A 000379/06 Anonymous v. The Ministry of the Interior), the Haifa District Court accepted the appeal of a 15 year old foreign minor who had been a victim of trafficking in persons. The Court decided to release the minor after 8.5 months in custody, constituting the first decision of an Israeli court recognizing a person to be a TIP victim for purposes other than prostitution.

298. The District Court held that in cases where an illegal resident is a minor and can not speak Hebrew, the Detention Review Tribunal must appoint a Public Defender to provide him with legal assistance. As the minor in question had not been provided with legal representation, the Court held that he had been deprived of his procedural and fundamental rights, to such a degree as to amount to a distortion of justice in this case.

299. The Court stated that “custody” as it is referred to in the Entry into Israel Law can be defined as “custody until the completion of the proceedings”. Subsequently, if proceedings can not be completed, then custody based only on this law is illegal. In this particular case, the proceedings could not be completed because they required the minor's removal from the country. That much was prevented by a lack of diplomatic relations between Israel and his country of origin, and constituted a situation which was not to be presently resolved. Indefinite detention of the minor under these circumstances, and based only on the Entry into Israel Law, was thus considered to be illegal.

300. On December 5, 2007, the Haifa District Court annulled a decision of the Haifa Traffic Court due to its failure to appoint a defender for the appellant despite the explicit provision of section 15a(c) of the Criminal Procedure Law 5742-1982 (the "Criminal Procedure Law") (Cr. A. 002646/07 Zrayek Nimer v. the State of Israel). The Haifa Traffic Court convicted the appellant according to his admission of guilt in several traffic offences and sentenced him to suspended imprisonment, a fine, disqualification from driving, suspended disqualification and an obligation to avoid similar offences. The appellant claimed that the Traffic Court did not appoint a defender for him despite the prosecutor's late announcement that he would demand actual imprisonment.

301. The Haifa District Court held that it was the Traffic Court's duty to appoint a defender for the appellant according to section 15a(c) of the Criminal Procedure Law, even though it did not intend to sentence him to actual imprisonment. Secondly, the Court stressed that the defender's role is not limited to arguing against actual imprisonment, but is also one of advising and influencing the entire sentence of the defendant. Thirdly, the Court stated that the right for legal representation is a fundamental right. Consequently, the District Court decided to annul the Traffic Court's ruling and return the case to the lower instance for reconsideration.

302. Extraditions. On August 5, 2004, the Supreme Court rejected a petition filed against the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Attorney General and the State Attorney, by an Israeli citizen accused of the murder of his ex-wife in Thailand. The petition demanded his extradition from Thailand to Israel because of the foreseeable sentence of capital punishment if convicted in Thailand (HCJ 3992/04 Eli Mimon-Cohen v. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, et. al.). The Court stated that the specific objectives of the extradition institution, and the general objectives of the enforcement of the criminal law, (which are under the authority of the Attorney General), did not require Israel to request that the petitioner be extradited. Nevertheless, the court acknowledged that bringing the petitioner to trial in Israel might ensure two important purposes: that he would not be handed a death sentence and that he would be granted a fair trial. The court however, finally concluded that the prospect of imposing capital punishment on the petitioner was not to be considered a violation of human rights in accordance with Article 6 of the ICCPR, since the murder offence attributed to him was one of the "most serious [of] crimes". In addition, the Court stated that the right to a fair trial is recognized in Article 14 of the ICCPR, a Convention to which Thailand is committed as a State Party. Considering all the different interests and concerns, the Court declared that the State was not obligated to request the extradition of the petitioner to Israel.

303. "Abuse of process". On May 15, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Criminal Procedure Law Amendment 51), accepting the legal doctrine regarding "Abuse of Process" into Israeli criminal law. According to the doctrine which had been previously recognized by the Supreme Court in a number of cases, the court is permitted to strike off an indictment, or halt criminal procedures against a defendant where there is a deficiency in those procedures caused by some fault of the executive authority, and the use of the deficient procedure would damage the right to fair trial of the defendant. According to the Supreme Court's decision in Cr. Appeal 4855/02 The State of Israel v. Itamar Borovich et. al., the Court is to examine the severity of the deficiency, to determine whether the deficiency can be restored in other way, and to balance the damage caused to the defendant by the deficiency against the damage caused to the public by the defendants crime. The Amendment to the Criminal Procedure Law anchored the doctrine of "Abuse of Process" in the context of preliminary claims. Section 149 of the amended law states that "10. Following the beginning of the trial, the defendant is allowed to claim abuse of process in preliminary claims, including the possibility to argue that...the submission of an indictment, or [conduction] of a criminal procedure, fundamentally contradicts the principles of justice and legal equity".

304. Video conference. On January 15, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) (Video Conference - Temporary Order) 5767-2007, which allows the Court to hold hearings concerning a suspect's arrest, subject to his consent, using video conference. Previously, this procedure required the physical presence of the suspect in the courts' hall, which caused excessive discomfort, due to the need to transfer him from one detention facility to another, and from the court and back when compared to the short duration of the procedure. According to the Temporary Order, the suspect will take part in the hearing from a special room connected to the court's hall using video conference technology, which will allow communication and viewing by all parties involved in the procedure, including the public.

305. Electronic handcuffing. Since 2006, a new measure of electronic handcuffing has been exercised as an alternative to physical detention. The option of electronic handcuffing is available up until the completion of procedures for indictment of a detainee.

306. Investigation and Testimony Procedures (Adaptation to Persons with Mental or Psychological Disability) Law. In 2005, the Knesset enacted a new law, similar in certain aspects to the law related to investigations of children, concerning investigations of persons with intellectual disabilities (retardation, autism, etc.) and persons who suffer from mental disabilities which damages their ability to testify or be investigated. According to the Law, the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services is to appoint special investigators qualified in the therapeutic field for investigating persons with intellectual or mental disabilities whether they are complainants, witnesses or suspects of committing the offences indicated in the Law. In addition, the Law states that persons with intellectual or mental disabilities are eligible to have a person of their choice, who is not their lawyer, as their accompanier during the investigation.

307. According to the Law, when a person with an intellectual disability testifies in court, the court is allowed to order that the witness will not be cross examined by the defendant himself. A person with a mental disability will not be investigated by the defendant. In such cases, the court will appoint a public defender. In addition, the court is allowed to exempt a person with an intellectual or mental disability from testifying if it is concerned that the testimony might damage the person or if the person is not capable to testify due to his disability. The court is allowed to determine different ways for protection of witnesses who are intellectually or mentally disabled, including: the defendant will not be present in the hearing, but only his lawyer; the witness will deliver his testimony behind a curtain; the judge and lawyers will not wear judicial uniforms; the testimony will take place in the judge's chamber or in another place outside the court hall; the testimony will be delivered using means of alternative or supportive communication, including the assistance of persons, electronic devices, etc.

308. The Crime Victims' Rights Law 5761-2001 (the "Crime Victims' Rights Law").

On March 6, 2001, the Knesset enacted the Crime Victims' Rights Law which was designed to prescribe the rights of victims of crime and to protect their personal dignity, without prejudicing the rights of suspected, accused or sentenced persons under the provisions of any law. According to the Law, the fulfillment of rights owed to a victim of crime shall be performed with consideration for the victim and his/her needs, respect for his/her dignity, protection of his/her privacy and within a reasonable time. Under this Law, the courts and authorities, each within their own spheres, are to take all necessary measures to safeguard the rights of the crime victim.

309. According to the Crime Victims' Rights Law, a crime victim is entitled to the following rights:

309.1. Protection - protection from the suspected, accused or sentenced person, or his/her agents and associates, including protection in court from any contact or unnecessary communication between him/her and the victim.

309.2. Restriction on furnishing particulars - The authorities shall not submit to any person and shall not include within the documents forming part of the investigation material or the indictment, the home address, work address or telephone numbers of the crime victim.

309.3. Right to receive information on criminal proceedings - a crime victim is entitled to receive information on his/her rights as a crime victim, and on the manner in which the criminal proceedings are to be conducted, and to be updated on the stage which any criminal proceedings in connection with the crime from which he was injured, have reached.

309.4. Right to inspect indictment - Except in certain cases, a crime victim is entitled, at his/her request, or at the request of his/her legal counsel, to inspect and receive a copy of the indictment against the accused.

309.5. Right to receive information on imprisonment or other custody - a victim of a sexual or violent crime, is entitled upon request, to be informed of the state of imprisonment of a sentenced person, or the state of any detention of an accused or sentenced person remanded in other lawful custody as a consequence of their crime.

309.6. Right to receive information on support services - a crime victim is entitled to receive information on support services available to crime victims, whether those services are provided by the State or by non-governmental bodies.

309.7. Conduct of proceedings within reasonable time - proceedings in connection with sexual or violent crimes shall be held within a reasonable time to prevent any perversion of justice.

309.8. Examination of investigating body into sexual history - during the investigation of a complaint by an investigative body into sexual or violent crimes, the crime victim shall not be investigated as to his/her sexual history, except as far as those queries may relate to the investigation at hand.

309.9. Right of accompanying person at examination - a victim of a sexual or violent crime is entitled to be accompanied by a person of his/her choice, who shall be present at the time of his/her examination at the investigating body, unless the responsible officer is of the view that this is likely to impede the examination.

309.10. Right to presence at in camera hearing - a crime victim is entitled to be present at a court hearing in the matter of the crime in which he/she was injured and to view the proceedings being conducted in camera, as well as being entitled to accompaniment by a person of his/her choice at the aforesaid hearing.

309.11. Right to express opinion on stay of proceedings - a victim of a sexual or violent crime who receives notice of an intent to stay criminal proceedings against the accused, is entitled to be given an opportunity to express his/her opinion on the matter, in writing, before the Attorney-General.

309.12. Right to express opinion on plea bargain - a victim of a sexual or violent crime who receives notice as to the possibility of the prosecution having reached a plea bargain with the accused, is entitled to be given an opportunity to express his/her opinion on this matter before the prosecutor prior to their reaching a decision in the matter.

309.13. Declaration of victim - a crime victim is entitled to submit a written declaration to the investigating body as to any injury or damage incurred by him/her on account of the crime, including bodily or mental harm, or damage to property. Where the victim has submitted such a declaration, he/she is entitled to have the prosecutor bring the declaration before the court during the hearing in respect of the sentence of the accused.

309.14. Right to state position before parole board - a victim of a sexual or violent crime who has received notice as to the date a sentenced person is to be brought before the parole board, is entitled to state his/her position in writing, and have the position presented to the parole board illustrating the expected risk they foresee from release of the sentenced person.

309.15. Right to state position in respect of pardon - a victim of a sexual or violent crime who has received notice as to the application of the sentenced person for a pardon or mitigation of punishment from the President of the State, is entitled to be given an opportunity to state his/her position in writing prior to a decision being reached by the President.

309.16. Protection from a criminal or civil action - infringement of any of the rights prescribed in this Law is not sufficient in itself to nullify criminal proceedings, or to constitute a cause of action for criminal proceedings, or to justify a civil action against a public authority or public employee; however, the provisions of this section shall not prevent the initiation of disciplinary proceedings under the provisions of any law.

309.17. Entitlement of family members - where a crime caused the death of a person, the rights of the victim under this Law shall be granted instead to his family members.

310. In order to ensure the proper exercise of rights made available to victims of crime under the provisions of the Crime Victims' Rights Law, the State and District Attorneys' offices have established support departments whose functions include: ensuring the transfer of information from the State and District Attorneys' offices to crime victims and from crime victims to the State and District Attorneys' Offices; directing and assisting the employees of the State and District Attorneys' Offices in implementing the provisions under the Law; and collecting and distributing updated information on support services for crime victims to employees of the State and District Attorneys' Offices. In addition, the Israel Police have appointed responsible police officers whose function is to safeguard the exercise of the rights of the crime victim under the provisions of the Law.

311. In a recent case, the Supreme Court had to determine whether to accept a plea bargain where the accused pleaded guilty to a criminal charge or to cancel the bargain, given that that it was concluded without the consent of the victim, in contradiction of the Crime Victims' Rights. The Court held that in balancing between the right of the victim to participate in the criminal process and the right of the accused to a fair trial, consideration should be given to the progress of the legal proceedings. That is, as the legal proceedings progresses, such as in this case where a plea bargain was already reached, the rights of the accused exceed the rights of the victim. (H.C.J 2477/07 Anonymous v. the State Attorney at al. (27.5.07)).

The Public Defender's Office

312. In 2006, the Public Defender's Office (PDO) marked the first decade since its establishment. From 2003 up until 2006, the percentage of representation by public defenders in magistrate court cases (including in youth magistrate courts) increased from approximately 35% to 54%. This increase is, on the one hand, the result of a gradual decrease in the number of indictments submitted to magistrate courts, and a gradual increase in criminal cases represented by the PDO on the other. In 2006, 1,329 defendants pleading financial difficulties applied independently to the PDO requesting representation. Of that number only 319 were found financially or otherwise eligible and 1,010 were rejected.

313. During 2006, the Knesset enacted the Criminal Procedure Law (Amendment 49), prohibiting the imposition of imprisonment on unrepresented defendants. Until the enactment of the Law hundreds of defendants were sentenced to imprisonment every year without having had legal representation. From the time the Law came into force and up until July 11, 2007, the PDO has represented 1,260 cases based on this issue.

314. During 2006, the Knesset enacted the Criminal Procedure Law (Amendment 48), stating that preliminary hearings may only take place subject to legal representation of the defendant. Despite of the Law, there are still magistrate courts which hold preliminary hearings without the participation of the PDO and in which many defendants are not represented by a defender ensuring their rights. In 2006, the PDO represented 6,000 criminal cases in this framework, using 40 public defenders.

315. According to the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers - Arrests), every detainee is entitled to meet and consult with a lawyer. The supervising officer arresting the detainee must immediately notify him/her of their right to request legal representation by a public defender. The detainee is also eligible to have his/her request transferred without delay to the PDO. In order to fulfill the provisions of the Law the PDO has lawyers on duty and/or on call all over the country, from 7:30 am until late at night including weekends. Their function is to arrive at the relevant police stations or detention facilities in order to meet the suspects as soon as possible.

316. On January 1, 2005, section 60a of the Criminal Procedure Law entered into force. It concerns the conduction of hearings for suspects of criminal offences prior to the submission of an indictment. Only a represented suspect can request and view the investigation material and give directions on that material when meeting with the attorney treating the case.

317. Representing minor defendants and suspects constitutes a significant part of the work of the PDO, which represents 75% of detained or tried teenagers. About 12,000 procedures, which constitute 15.6% of all procedures represented by the PDO during 2006, were held in Youth Magistrate Courts.

318. In 2004, the Mentally Ill Treatment Law was amended to include a provision concerning the right of coercively hospitalized patients to be legally represented in psychiatric committee hearings, when re-evaluating their hospitalization period. The PDO is now responsible for the legal representation of patients hospitalized according to a court order following a criminal procedure opened against them. During 2006, the PDO completed the extension of its legal representation to cover all mental health hospitals and clinics throughout the country, offering representation to 550 patients, of whom 450 were registered during 2006 alone.

319. After serving two thirds of their imprisonment, every prisoner faces a release committee authorized to grant early release. During 2002, the Knesset enacted the Release under Conditions of Imprisonment Law 5761-2001, which states that release committees are authorized to consider the appointment of a defender for prisoners who face their decision. In the last five years following the entry into force of the Law, the extent of public representation during release committee hearings is still limited, but is gradually increasing. In 2006, the PDO represented 242 cases in comparison to 117 in 2005.

320. The PDO has a special department which conducts proceedings in the Supreme Court, including: criminal appeals, applications of requests to appeal, petitions for additional hearing, and petitions to the Supreme Court concerning High Court of Justice decisions. In 2006, more than 1,000 applications were registered in the department, and 418 Supreme Court procedures were opened. During 2006, the PDO had some major successes with regards to Supreme Court decisions, including in some fundamental cases with significant implications.

321. In October 2006, the first phase of the Protection of the Public from Sex Offenders Law 5766-2006 entered into force. The Law allows the imposition of significant restrictions, including supervision, on those who have been convicted of sex offences, after they have completed serving their sentence. This is done in order to prevent them from returning to the commission of sex offences. The PDO takes action in order to ensure substantial judicial review of requests for supervision orders when submitted by the authorities. In the framework of preparing for legal representation of clients, a new supervision system was established for specializing in representation according to the Law. In addition, the PDO uses a list of experts qualified to perform risk assessment of sex offenders.

322. Legal representation before military procedures. On October 21, 2007, the Military Court of Appeals held that the military judicial system should adopt the provision of the Criminal Procedure ((Enforcement Powers - Arrests)) Law, so that a military court would not be able to detain a defendant until the completion of proceedings if he did not have adequate legal representation. The provision, which is not addressed in the Military Jurisdiction Law, is thus applied to military courts. The Court held that a defendant not adequately represented, could only be detained for such short period of time as it took to appoint him with a defense attorney, (Military Appeal 58/07 Private Kasania Segrashvili v. The Military Prosecutor).

323. In this instance, the appellant was accused of unauthorized absence from military service according to section 94 of the Military Jurisdiction Law. The Military District Court's President ordered detention of the appellant until the completion of her proceedings, even though she was not represented by a defense attorney at the hearing.

324. The Military Court of Appeals held that sections 243(b), and 243B(b) of the Military Jurisdiction Law recognize the right of the defendants attorney to be present during court hearings concerning the defendants detention, despite the fact that cases concerning section 94 of the Law may be heard in the detainee's absence (section 243B(b)). The Court held that, excluding truly exceptional circumstances, the military courts were to strictly uphold the right of a defendant's attorney to be present in court. Where the defendant has not appointed a defense attorney, or the attorney is not present in Court, the court must postpone the hearing until one or the other failing may be achieved. In similar fashion to the provision contained in the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Arrests) Law, in the exceptional circumstances where a court hearing is to be held without the participation of a defense attorney, the Court will only be able to order the detention of the defendant for such a short period of time as it takes to appoint a defense attorney.

Alternative dispute resolution

325. The National Center for Mediation and Conflict Resolution, reported in our previous periodic report, continues to work towards advancing the use of alternative dispute resolution strategies in Israel.

326. Mediation techniques advanced by the National Center have been particularly successful in the resolution of family disputes and disputes between local communities. Some criminal matters are also now amenable to non-adversarial resolution. By establishing effective alternative resolution procedures in such areas as these, the National Center both eases the burden on the adversarial system and empowers the community.

Article 15. Prohibition of ex-post facto laws

327. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Article 16. Recognition as a person before the law

328. This issue has been discussed in Israel's previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of the second periodic report.

Article 17. Freedom from arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home

329. The Protection of Privacy Law, 5741-1981 ("The Protection of Privacy Law") stipulates that in order to consider an act as offensive to the privacy of a person, it is to be established that the person did not consent to the act. Amendment No. 9 of the Law (dated June 19, 2007) further stipulated that the consent required must be an informed consent.

330. Furthermore, according to the amendment (Section 29a(a)), upon conviction in a felony according to section 5 to the Law - which requires the intent to harm the privacy of a person, the court is authorized to award the victim with damages of up to 50,000 NIS, without the need to prove actual damage. Section 29a(b) states that in a civil wrong action according to section 4 to the Law, the court is also authorized to award damages of up to 50,000 NIS, without the requirement to prove actual damage. If in such an action it is proven that the perpetrator had intent to harm, the court is authorized to award the plaintiff with up to 100,000 NIS, without the requirement to prove actual damage.

331. On May 10, 2004 the Supreme Court held that a permanent link between the computers of the Ministry of the Interior and the computers of the Income Tax Commission, the National Insurance Institute, the Israel Broadcasting Authority, the Bank of Israel and commercial banks is unlawful as it violates the privacy of the public. (H.C.J 8070/98 The Association for Civil Rights in Israel v. the Ministry of the Interior et al. (10.5.04)).

332. According to section 23b(a) of the Protection of Privacy Law, 5741-1981, a public institution is prohibited from providing information regarding an individual, unless the publication was made in accordance with the law, or after receiving the individual's consent. Section 23c to the Law states that the exchange of information between public institutions is permitted if it is within the authorities or duties of the informant body, and is required in order to execute legislation or to perform a duty either by the informant or the receiver, unless such transfer is forbidden according to legislation or according to the principles of professional ethics. Furthermore, such transfer of information between public institutions is permitted if the receiver of the information is entitled to demand it according to law, from any other source.

333. The Court accepted the arguments presented by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, claiming that such a permanent link violates the right to privacy as it allows access to personal records to more governmental officials than necessary, thus does not fall within the scope of duties of the informant or the receivers. Therefore, the Court issued a permanent injunction annulling the relevant arrangement until the limitations on the transfer of information are set in appropriate regulations or administrative guidelines, The Court added that the issue of transferring information to commercial banks should be anchored in legislation. The Court stated that due to the adjustments required, the injunction will come into force six months after its issuance.

334. On April 11, 2007, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal of “Clalit Medical Services” and determined that it is not a public authority as defined in the Protection of Privacy Law. Therefore, The Ministry of Defense is not authorized to provide “Clalit” with personal information regarding IDF disabled veterans which was requested for insurance purposes (C.A 8825/03 Clalit Medical Services v. The Ministry of Defense).

335. In its decision, the Court stated that the right to privacy is among the most important human rights and that it was recognized as a constitutional right in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The Court also mentioned that the right to privacy had been protected prior to the enactment of the Basic Law, through the Protection of Privacy Law. As such, this law reflects the legislator’s will to balance between the right to privacy with other interests.

336. The Court held that the constitutional status of the right to privacy influences the interpretation of the Protection of Privacy Law. Therefore, the term “public authority” and the provisions of section 23c of the Protection of Privacy Law, which allows exchanging information between public authorities, shall be narrowly interpreted and “Clalit Medical Services” shall not be recognized as a public authority.

337. The Prevention of Stalking Law, 5762-2001 (the “Prevention of Stalking Law”). On October 16, 2001, the Knesset enacted the Prevention of Stalking Law designed to protect people from having their lives, privacy, or personal choices disrupted; or from suffering physical injury at the hands of another person who has stalked or has caused them physical harm. The Law defines stalking as “harassment of an individual by any other individual, or by making threats against an individual under circumstances that provide a reasonable basis for assuming that the stalker or person posing a threat might continue to harm and disrupt the victim’s life, privacy or choice, or could potentially cause physical harm”. Stalking may include the following acts: spying, ambush, or any other activity tracking the actions of an individual or infringing upon an individual’s privacy; inflicting actual harm or even the threat of it; establishing verbal, written or any other form of contact with the individual; damaging an individual’s property, tarnishing an individual’s reputation, or limiting an individual’s freedom of movement.

338. According to the Law, if the Court finds an individual guilty of stalking it is entitled to impose a restraining order prohibiting that individual from committing any of the following acts: harassing the victim in any form or in any location; threatening the victim; spying, ambushing, tracking the movements or actions of the victim or infringing upon the victim’s privacy in any other manner and establishing any verbal, written or other form of communication with the victim. If the circumstances of the stalking provide a reasonable basis to fear continued disruption or actual harm to another individual’s life, the court is entitled to include in the restraining order a ban on committing the following acts: being present within a delimited distance of the victim’s residence, car, workplace, school or any other location the victim regularly attends; bearing or possessing firearms, including weapons issued by a security authority or any other government authorities, all against the victim or a relative of the victim, either explicitly or implicitly, directly or indirectly.

339. The right to disseminate public information. - On March 26, 2006, the Tel-Aviv District Court dismissed the appeal of a former prisoner whose picture dining with a famous prisoner while serving his sentence in the Maasiyahu Prison was published on the cover of the “Yedioth Ahronoth” daily newspaper without his consent (R.A 001376/02 Yefet v. Yedioth Ahronoth). The Magistrate Court decided that the prisoner’s name and personal details can be published, as well as his photograph.

340. In its decision the District Court held that when the right to privacy conflicts with the principle of publicity, the latter should prevail. Criminal conviction of a person can not be considered his private issue and the information published is in the public’s interest to know. The Court held that the right to privacy is a relative right and not a definite one. Therefore, in balancing between these rights, the protection granted to the prisoner’s right to privacy should be lesser in comparison to that of a reasonable man. The prisoner’s photograph was taken on public property and therefore, there is no cause for a claim according to the Protection of Privacy Law.

Search and seizure in criminal proceedings

341. On September 19, 2005 the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Physical Search of a Suspect) Law, 5756-1996 was amended and replaced by the Criminal Procedure (Enforcement Powers - Bodily Search and the Taking of Identification Measures) Law 5756-1996. The law regulates the following subjects: the principles of conducting a physical examination of a suspect, the persons allowed to perform an examination of a suspect, internal physical examination of suspect, external physical examination of suspect, internal and external physical examination of a person who is not a suspect, internal examination for a blood sample and proper reporting on the physical examination of a suspect and the possession of items found.

342. In addition, the Law sets the conditions and terms for the taking of identification measures for the police database. The Law also determines that a police officer or a lawyer authorized by a police officer may, if he finds that there was no reason to interrogate that person, delete those biological identification measures from the database.

343. The amended law also sets the rules for the use of identification measures and data, and stipulates that identification measures are only to be used for the identification of a person, and that the data will only be used for its inclusion in the database, for comparison with other data that is already in the database, and for authentication or updating of the database.

344. The Law also regulates that management of the database will be done by the Israeli Police and by police officers of the Criminal Forensic Department. The database will be confidential and no information will be extracted from it unless it is done so according to the law.

345. The Law also determines the level of comprehension and consent needed from minors and people with mental and intellectual disabilities in order to conduct a physical search. An officer will not conduct a physical search or examination of minors and people with mental and intellectual disabilities, unless in addition to the written consent of that person, he receives a further consent from that person’s guardian. If the person does not have a guardian, he may request the courts to appoint him one.

Search of a person's home

346. This issue has been discussed in the previous reports. No change has occurred in this area since the submission of Israel's second periodic report.

347. Electronic surveillance: wiretapping and eavesdropping. The Israel Police Force investigated the following offenses relating to the Secret Monitoring Law 5739-1979 (the Wiretapping Law):

In 2005 - 40 files were opened.

In 2006 - 63 files were opened.

In 2007 - 58 files were opened.

Protection of personal information in databases

348. In January of 2006, the Israeli Government decided to establish a new authority within the Ministry of Justice - the Legal Authority for Information Technologies and Data Protection, hereon referred to as- ILITA. ILITA gathers together several law and technology regulatory functions, such as the Database Registrar, the Credit Information Registrar and the Certification Authorities Registrar.

349. The Database Registrar is the regulator supervising data protection under the relevant chapters of the Israeli Protection of Privacy law. Similarly, the Credit Information Registrar is the regulator supervising credit information services approved under the Israeli Credit Information law, 5762-2002, and the Certification Authority Registrar is the regulator supervising Certification Authorities for electronic signatures approved under the Israeli Electronic Signature law, 5761-2001.

350. ILITA is to be further involved in all of the future IT-related legislative initiatives in Israel, such as the Digital copyright issues (DRM etc.), the Electronic ID and Biometrics initiatives, electronic archiving, and Cybercrime initiatives, ILITA's role is also to consult to other Government Ministries engaging in major government IT projects.

351. By the end of 2006, the head of ILITA was appointed as both the database registrar and the credit reporting services registrar.

352. According to the Protection of Privacy Law, the right to privacy in Israel includes the right of a person to control personal information concerning themselves as a data subject. According to section 9 of the Law, the application to register a database must include the purpose of the database and the purposes for which the information is intended. According to section 2(9) of the Law, use of the data for a purpose other than that stated shall be considered an infringement on privacy.

353. Section 11 of the Law ensures that certain information will be provided to a data subject where data is collected personally from them. Information as to the purpose of the data processing, the recipients of the data and the purposes of its transfer must be provided to the subject whether the subject is required by law to provide the data or whether the data has been collected with the subjects free consent. Section 13 of the Law grants data subjects the right of access to all processed data concerning themselves, and section 14 allows them to rectify that data where incorrectly processed.

354. The Privacy Protection Regulations (Transfer of Information to Databases Outside the Borders of the State) 5761-2001 (henceforth: “the Regulations”), regulate the transfer of information from databases in Israel to abroad, and outline strict conditions under which such transfers may be effected. According to the Regulations, information may only be transferred to another country if that country also provides an adequate level of protection for the data. Thus, the Israeli law guarantees that the provisions in that Law cannot be circumvented by transferring the data to third parties/countries.

Prohibition of money laundering

355. The Prohibition of Money Laundering Law 5760-2000 was enacted in order to combat the phenomenon of money laundering within the framework of the international struggle against severe and organized crime. Given that offenders make use of financial institutions in order to perform money laundering activity, the legislators decided to impose duties on these institutions to identify and report on irregular or suspicious financial activity as defined in the orders. In accordance with section 29(a) of the Law, such reports are to be transmitted to a special database managed, processed, and secured by the Israel Money Laundering Prohibition Authority (IMPA).

356. According to section 29(d) of the Law, access to the database shall be had only by persons holding positions at IMPA, as determined by the head of IMPA, and with the consent of the Commissioner of the Israel Police. Section 30(a) states that notwithstanding the provisions of the Protection of Privacy Law, IMPA shall not transmit information from the database, except in accordance with the provisions of the Law, and to the relevant authorities as specified. IMPA may transmit information from the database to the Israeli Police, the Israel Security Agency (ISA) or to authorities of the same category in other States as provided for under the provisions of the International Legal Assistance Law, 5758-1998.

357. According to section 30(g) of the Law, information transmitted to the Israeli Police, or to the ISA shall only be used for the implementation of this Law, or in order to investigate and prevent further offences not included under this Law. For example the information may be used in order to detect fugitive persons in order to bring them to trial, or to prevent and investigate the activities of terrorist organizations, or in other circumstances threatening to the security of the State. According to the Prohibition on Money Laundering Regulations (Rules on Use of Information Transmitted to Israel Police and Israel Security Agency for Investigation of Further Offences and Its Transmission to Another Authority) 5766-2006, transmission of information received from IMPA for investigation of further offences must be performed by persons authorized for that purpose within the Police and the ISA. The Regulations also impose a duty to document and register transmissions of information and to report to the Knesset’s Constitution, Law and Justice Committee on the number of decisions, and the kinds of offences for which such information was used.

358. According to Section 31(a), a person who received information during the performance of his duty or in the course of his employment, shall maintain its confidentiality and shall not disclose it to any other person, nor make any other use thereof, except in accordance with the provisions of the Law, or pursuant to a court order. Under section 61(a)(3) of the Penal Law, a person who infringes the provisions of this subsection shall be liable to imprisonment for three years, or the imposition of a fine.

359. An additional protection for sources of information is to be found in Section 25(b), which states that a report received by the police, or at the database, shall not be regarded as investigation material under section 74 of the Criminal Procedure Law (Consolidated Version), and as such, shall not be admissible as evidence in any legal proceedings, excepting: (1) legal proceedings for breach of the obligation to report, or false or deceptive reporting, and (2) intelligence material presented for inspection by the judge only, during the course of an application for a judicial order.

Information regarding criminal records

360. Amendment No. 8 to the Criminal Registry and the Rehabilitation Law 5741-1981 (the "Criminal Registry and the Rehabilitation Law"), was enacted on March 25, 2008, stating that the Head of the Investigation Department in the Police, or a police officer whose rank is deputy-commissioner or a higher rank, can obliterate from the police records, a record of a decision not to investigate or a decision not to press charges, in accordance with standards set by the Minister of Public Security, and approved by the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee of the Knesset. Furthermore, investigation records regarding a decision not to press charges in criminal offences considered a minor infraction, or a misdemeanor will be removed automatically 7 years following the date of the incident, unless determined otherwise by an authorized personal. The decision to prevent removal should be in writing and in accordance with the above mentioned standards. The above provisions regarding a decision not to investigate or not to press charges that was reached before the publication of this amendment, the amendment will come into effect on March 2010.

361. The amendment also clarifies and intensifies the criminal prohibition on obtaining information from the criminal record. The amendment sets a penalty of one year imprisonment for obtaining or trying to obtain information from a criminal record, by a person not entitled to receive it. In addition, the amendment sets two years of imprisonment for obtaining or trying to obtain information from the record, for the purpose of decision making regarding employment, of the person to whom the information is concerned, or reaching further decisions regarding matters concerning him/her. Moreover, the amendment states that consent of the person concerned, does not create a right to obtain the information from the record regarding that person, whether towards deciding on his employment or other decision on his regard.

362. According to section 20(a) of the Criminal Registry and the Rehabilitation Law, a person whose criminal record is removed will be considered as a person who was not convicted for all purposes of the Law, and all disqualification resulting from the conviction, will be removed upon the erasure. However, measures taken upon the conviction, such as dismissal from work, will not be affected by the removal. Section 20(b) provides that evidence revealing a conviction that was obliterated will be considered as inadmissible evidence in legal proceedings, unless the convicted person gave it knowingly.

363. In a recent preliminary decision, the District Court of Tel-Aviv ruled that the court can not disqualify evidence on the sole ground that it raises the obliterated criminal record, for the purpose of a libel suit according to section 20(a). The Court held that evidence according to which the libellant knowingly gave interviews to the media, revealing his expunged criminal record, may be sufficient enough to be considered as corresponding to section 20(b).

364. A printout of one's criminal record issued by the police to a citizen includes information designated only for the citizen's own review, according to the Criminal Registry and the Rehabilitation Law. The printout allows each person to know what his criminal record includes and take action in order to correct any mistakes. Any body, including governmental bodies, governmental corporations and private employers, is forbidden from requesting one's criminal records for any purpose, including employment. According to the Law, certain governmental bodies are eligible to receive information of a person's criminal record directly from the Israel Police, in special circumstances under specified restrictions. The Law states that information concerning one's criminal record is confidential and accessing such information from the Criminal Registry directly or indirectly through non-eligible bodies or persons is considered a criminal offence. It shall be stressed that obtaining a person's consent to access information concerning his criminal record does not exempt criminal liability.

365. Recently, the Ministry of Justice and the Israeli Police examined the whole subject of publishing criminal records via printout and decided to change the structure of the printout to prevent the transmission of criminal information by non-authorized bodies through the person to whom the information is related. The new structure of the printout allows a person who has a criminal record to distribute employers or any other body the first page of the printout in which record of criminal activity is not written. The body or person receiving the printout will be unable to determine whether the person has no criminal record at all or whether having a criminal record, decided to deliver only the opening page.

366. On December 17, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Criminal Procedure Law (Powers of Enforcement - Communication Data), 5768-2007, which enables the Police or any other investigating authority to access necessary communication data and files from databases of authorized communication bodies under restricted conditions and special circumstances. This data includes receiving, following a court order, of dialing and location data, and information on the identity of the subscribers and location of antennas, without a court order. The Law balances between the Police's need to receive data in order to fulfill its function and the need to avoid infringing one's privacy.

367. According to the Law, following the request of an authorized police officer, the Court will be allowed to issue an order permitting the Police or any other investigating authority to access and transfer data from databases of communication bodies if convinced that the data is necessary for one of the following purposes: saving or protecting human life; exposure of offenses, investigation or prevention of offenses; exposure and prosecution of offenders; confiscation of property. The order will be issued on the condition that the transfer of data will not severely damage one's privacy. In urgent cases, an authorized police officer will be allowed to transfer data without a court order for 24 hours only. The Law states that the transfer of data will remain confidential and that all data will be protected by the Police in a special, confidential database. Note that these certain provisions of this Law encountered strong opposition, including a petition filed on 28.4.08, currently pending before the High Court of Justice.

Unlawful attacks on honor or reputation

368. On April 22, 2007, the Haifa District Court decided to disallow disclosure of the identity of internet users in order to ensure the advantages of anonymity and its contribution to the freedom of speech on the internet (R.D.A 850/06 Rami Mor v. Yedioth Internet Systems (YNET site) and R.D.A 1632/06 Rami Mor v. BARACK A.T.C). In its decision, the Court rejected the plaintiff's request to appeal a previous decision of the Court concerning publications posted in an internet forum regarding his professional achievements as an alternative therapist. The plaintiff considered these publications to be defamatory and demanded the identity of the web-users responsible from the internet sites operators. The site operators refused this demand, but agreed to remove the insulting publications from the forum.

369. In its decision the court held that "the power of anonymity can not give 'immunity' from the act of defamation or any publication which is considered a tort according to the law". Nevertheless, the Court considered that disclosure of an internet user's identity where publications are considered defamatory might damage the advantages of anonymity. Therefore, "something additional" is required before exposure of an internet user's identity will be allowed. In this instance the Court decided to follow the existing precedent, stating that a user's identity will only be exposed in cases where a criminal offence has been committed in addition to the tort. The Court has also suggested that in future cases disclosure of a user's identity will only be allowed, where the user has received a prior warning.

370. The right to a dignified death. On December 6, 2005, the Knesset enacted the Terminally Ill Patient Law, which provides an answer to the medical-ethical dilemma present in the treatment of terminally-ill patients. The Law is based on the recommendations of a public committee appointed by the Minister of Health in 2000. The Committee consisted of 59 members representing different related areas relevant to the issue, such as: medicine, nursing, social work, religion, philosophy, law and ethics. The Law is based on the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, and attempts to create a balance between the values of sanctity of life, quality of life and respect for a person's autonomous will.

371. The Law presumes that every person has the will to carry on living, unless it is proven otherwise. Furthermore, in case of any doubt, the will to live shall be preferred (section 4a). One shall not avoid granting medical treatment to a terminally ill patient unless it is clear, according to specific conditions, that the patient has no will to continue living (section 4b). If the terminally ill patient has "capacity", meaning that he is more than 17 years old, can express his will, was not declared incapacitated, or excluded from this status due to a documented and justified medical decision, then any decision concerning his medical treatment shall be subject to his implicit will. If the terminally ill patient does not have "capacity", any decision concerning his medical treatment shall follow his preliminary instructions, the instructions of an empowered person or a decision of an "institutional committee" as defined below. If there are no such instructions or decisions, a decision whether to avoid granting medical treatment to the terminally ill patient will be made by the responsible physician, having had consideration of an implicit testimony from the patient's relative, and in the absence of such relative, considering the position of the patient's guardian (section 4b(1) and (2)).

372. The Law states that a terminally ill patient's will to not have his life extended shall be respected, and that providing him with medical treatment is to be avoided (section 8). Nevertheless, it shall be clarified that the Law does not allow committing an act, including a medical act, which is intentionally directed to cause the terminally ill patient's death, or which will certainly result in death, even if committed from means of grace and compassion (section 12). In addition, assisting the patient to commit suicide or stopping a consecutive medical treatment are both prohibited (sections 13 and 14a accordingly). However, it is permitted to avoid the innovation of a consecutive medical treatment which has been terminated only due to medical reasons, or the innovation of a cyclic medical treatment (section 14b).

373. The Terminally Ill Patient Law contains different provisions constituting the manner and procedure in which a person can express, in advance, his will concerning his medical treatment in the event that he becomes terminally ill. In addition, the Law states that every medical institution will appoint, in consultation with a state committee, institutional committees which are to determine in cases of conflict or if there is any doubt as to how to treat the terminally ill patient. These committees will consist of four physicians, a nurse, a social worker or a clinical psychologist, an academic specializing in philosophy or ethics, a jurist qualified to be appointed as a district judge and a public representative or religious personality.

Community housing for people with disabilities

374. Community housing for people with intellectual disabilities. To date, an estimated 33,000 people with intellectual disabilities live in Israel, from which 25,000 are treated by the social services. Some reside at home while others reside in different residential services.

375. Currently, 63 Residential Facilities provide housing for people with Intellectual Disabilities: 9 Governmental Facilities accommodating 1,816 residents, 40 Private Facilities accommodating 3,740 residents and 14 Public Facilities run by non-profit organizations, accommodating 1,175 residents.

376. In addition there are several Community Housing options: 140 foster families, 48 hostels (up to 24 residents in each), 21 communal houses (up to 15 residents in each) and 166 apartments in the community (up to 6 residents per apartment).

377. As mentioned in our previous periodic report, the Welfare (Treatment of Persons with Mental Disabilities) Law, 5729-1969, provides that when determining the type of housing framework, priority should be given to Community Housing. The Department for the Treatment of the Intellectual Disabled in the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services is operating to ensure that such a priority is given and implemented. Furthermore, there is a tendency to remove people from the Residential Facilities and place them in Community Housing in the form of hostels.

378. Community housing for people with physical disabilities. The Department for Rehabilitation in the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, that is responsible for the treatment of people with physical or sensory disabilities, allocates 85% of the budget towards Community Housing (mainly hostels and apartments). The remaining budget is used to maintain existing Residential Facilities. Since 2001 new residential facilities were not established as most of the budget is invested in Community Housing. Recently, the Department published tenders for the establishment of new hostels for people with severe disabilities. Moreover, the existing facilities will be obligated to reassign appropriate persons from Residential Facilities to Community Housing.

379. When enacted, the Equal Rights for People with Disability Law, 5758- 1998 (“Equal Rights for People with Disability Law”) did not include a chapter referring to the issue of accommodation. Recently, several non-governmental organizations joined efforts, together with the Commission for Equal Rights of People with Disabilities, in order to inquire into ways to advance legislation of a chapter regulating the right to accommodation in the community within the Law.

380. In 2007, 283 applications, which make 12% of the total number of applications, were received from residents of the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. Of the 283 applications, 135 (47%) were granted. Residents in the western parts of Jerusalem submitted 2,095 applications, of which 1,505 (71%) were granted.

381. Illegal construction. In the western parts of Jerusalem, building violations almost invariably consist of additions to a legal building, such as the addition of a room in courtyard or an attic within a roof space. In the eastern part of Jerusalem, violations typically take the form of entire buildings constructed without a permit. Thus, demolitions in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem are far more dramatic than in the western part of the city.

Article 18. Freedom of religion and conscience

Religious institutions

382. In December 2007, following the submission of a petition to the Supreme Court by the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism (HCJ 10651/06 Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism et. al. v. The Authority of Religious Services), it was decided to amend the “Criteria for Building of ‘Transportable Synagogues’ in Regional Councils for 2006”. According to section 3.2 of the amended Criteria, the existence of neighboring orthodox synagogues will not prevent the allocation of buildings for non-orthodox synagogues. In addition, section 3.4 states that non-Orthodox communities should receive priority in funding for the establishment of new synagogues in ratio of 1:1.25, if they include at least 30 families.

Burial

383. Alternative civil burial. On January 29, 2008, the Jerusalem Planning and Construction Committee deposited the Jerusalem Mayor’s plan to establish a cemetery for civil burial in the area of the new planned cemetery in Givat Shaul in Jerusalem. The new cemetery is to cover an area of 350 dunam, in which a special section will be allocated for civil burial of persons that Jewish Law (Halacha) does not allow to bury in religious cemeteries, or those who do not desire religious burial. According to the Municipality of Jerusalem, the plan is designated to allow every person to choose his way of life and the way of his burial without any kind of coercion.

384. Dignity of the deceased. On August 5, 2007, the Supreme Court rejected a petition demanding a permanent injunction against the construction of a central gas pipeline in the vicinity of a Muslim cemetery, subject to the construction placing the pipeline deep enough underneath the graves so that they would not be damaged in any way (HCJ 4638/07 Al-Aktza Almobarak Company Ltd et. al. v. Israel Electricity Company et al.). In its decision, the Court held that this petition raises a conflict between the public interest to carry out infrastructure and development works, and the protection of the dignity of the deceased, given that the works might foreseeably cause damage to the cemetery.

385. The Court stated that the interest of preserving the dignity of the deceased enjoys a constitutional protection based on interpretations of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. However, it is not an absolute or definite interest but a qualified or relative one, and therefore shall be balanced with the public interest inherent in carrying out construction works. The Court additionally considered that protection of religious feelings was a public interest, but again, that it is not absolute and must be balanced with competing public interests.

386. The Court concluded that an alternative solution of placing the pipeline deep enough under the graves so as not to cause damage to the cemetery, both minimized the risk of any damage caused to the dignity of the deceased or the sentiments of the Muslim population, and fulfilled the principle of proportionality, having had consideration of the public interest inherent in carrying out construction works. The court therefore approved the alternative method of construction.

Article 19. Freedom of opinion and expression

Broadcast media

387. The Israel Broadcast Authority is publicly funded by license fees payable by all television owners, a tax on vehicle owners and the sale of commercial broadcast-time. The second television channel (Channel 2), on the other hand, as well as Channel 10 and local radio stations established under the Second Television and Radio Broadcast Authority Law, 5750-1990 (the "Second Television and Radio Broadcast Authority Law"), is operated by private franchisees, and are subsequently funded through the sale of commercial broadcast-time alone.

388. Today there are 14 local radio stations operating under the Second Television and Radio Broadcast Authority Law. Two of those radio stations are designated for distinct sectors of the Israeli society, such as A-Shams Radio which broadcasts to the Arabic speaking sector, and Kol-Hai Radio which broadcasts to the Haredi (Ultra-Orthodox) sector. In addition, a new tender for the operation of a radio station designated towards the Sephardic-religious sector is to be published soon. It should be pointed out that in 2001, the Lev-Hamedina radio station received authorization by the Second Television and Radio Broadcast Authority to split its broadcasts and broadcast in Russian for several hours of the day for the benefit of the Russian Speaking population in the franchise area of the station.

389. The Second Television and Radio Broadcast Authority Rules (Ethics in Television and Radio Broadcasts) 5754-1994, determine several provisions for the purpose of protecting the freedom of expression. Section 2 states: "A franchisee will serve in all its broadcasts, in loyalty and responsibility, the principles of the freedom of speech and the right of the public to know, including the right to express exceptional and uncherished opinions." Section 3 determines: "A franchisee will not avoid broadcasting information of which there is a public interest to broadcast." In addition, section 7 of the rules holds that "In an issue of public significance, the franchisee will give a proper and balanced expression to the different opinions widespread throughout the public and will not prefer one opinion over another."

390. In 2005, the Second Authority for Television and Radio published a tender for broadcasting on Channel 2. According to the tender's conditions, and in the framework of the Second Authority for Television and Radio (Television and Radio Broadcasting by a Franchisee) Rules, the franchisees are obligated to a number of provisions designated towards promoting specific sectors in Israeli society that have not been sufficiently expressed on screen. These include:

390.1. An obligation, according to section 7, to broadcast a specific number of hours of "preferred programmes" of the following categories: Jewish heritage and culture programmes, science and culture programmes, periphery programmes and public discourse programmes.

390.2. According to section 10(d), 10% of local productions which are to be purchased from external production sources must be produced in the periphery.

390.3. According to section 8, the franchisees are obligated to broadcast programmes in Arabic and Russian, or programmes translated to these languages, amounting to at least 5% of the broadcasts.

391. On January 1 2006, the Television Broadcast Law (Subtitles and Sign Language) 5765-2005 (the "Subtitles Law"), which applies to all broadcasting bodies in Israel, entered into force. The Law imposes different quotas on programmes in Hebrew and Arabic concerning subtitles and translation to sign language which are set to gradually increase until 2015.

392. Freedom of information. Since the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law 5758-1998 (the "Freedom of Information Law"), which is the legislative basis to the public's right of access to information (that what previously acknowledge by Israeli courts) there have been two important amendments of the Law. The 2005 Amendment imposes a duty on any public authority to make information it holds concerning environmental issues available to the public through the authority's internet website and via alternative methods to be determined by the Minister of Environmental Protection. The Environmental information includes: information on substances which have been emitted, spilled, removed or thrown, and results of noise, smell and radiation measurements, not on private property. The 2007 Amendment imposes the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law on all Governmental Corporations, excluding corporations determined by the Minister of Justice, and approved by the Knesset's Constitution, Law and Justice Committee. Previously, the Freedom of Information Law applied only to Governmental Corporations as determined by the Minister of Justice, and approved by the Minister of Finance and the relevant Minister.

393. Israeli case law has referred to different provisions of the Freedom of Information Law in a significant number of decisions. For example:

393.1. Ad. A. 7024/03 Arye Geva, Adv. v. Yael German, Mayor of Herzliya et. al. - The appellant requested information held by an Examination Committee appointed by the Mayor of Herzliya, in addition to the protocols of its hearings concerning the differences between municipal rates for different city residents. The respondents refused to grant the appellant's request, and his initial administrative petition was rejected by the Tel-Aviv Court for Administrative Issues. The Supreme Court held that the right of access to information is based on several main rationales: first, it is essential for realization of the basic right for freedom of speech. Another rational is the authority's conception as a public trustee which should be committed first and foremost to the public interest, and not to the authority's interest. In addition, the right of access to information is an important and fundamental way for the public to foster transparency, and to impose supervision and control on public authorities. Nevertheless, the Court clarified that the right of access to information is not unlimited. Section 9 of the Law lists several categories of information which must not, or which does not, have to be delivered. Subsection 9(b)(2) allows public authorities not to deliver information on a certain policy while it is still under process of planning. In addition, subsection 9(b)(4) allows that information of an internal character need not be delivered. The Court held that generally, the provision of subsection 9(b)(2) should not apply to information collected by the authority for the purpose of planning a policy. As soon as the planning process is completed, the authorities must expose the information to the public. The Court determined that in this case, the Examination Committee had not accepted any recommendations, and that since six years have passed already, any new appointed committee would have had to use different information. The Court therefore ordered the Herzliya Municipality to deliver the information requested by the appellant.

393.2. Ad. A. 6013/04 the State of Israel - The Ministry of Transport and Road Safety v. Israel News Company Ltd. - The respondent requested the appellant to provide him with two internal control reports on the Department for Investigation of Air Accidents in the Ministry of Transport, and the International Relations Division in the Civil Aviation Administration, for the purpose of making a T.V. program on aviation accidents in Israel. The appellant refused to deliver these reports and the respondent petitioned to the Jerusalem District Court which ordered the delivery of the reports. The Supreme Court rejected an appeal from the District court and held that the Freedom of Information Law is based on the assumption that any information held by the authority must be exposed to the public. Exposure of control reports on governmental authorities realizes the public's right to know, and the freedom of speech; it realizes the interests of exposing the truth and the self-realization of the individual; it implements the principle of transparency of acts of government and advances the culture of government; it improves the public's confidence in public authorities; and it supports the principle that all the information held by public authorities belongs to the public. The Court added that the exposure of internal control reports does not damage the proper function of public authorities or the process of internal control. However, the Court did not impose a general obligation of non-controlled exposure. The State must always consider disclosing fully or partly the information that it holds, and has the burden of proof in every single case, that prevention of such disclosure can be justified. As the public interest in the information is more prominent, the State must introduce a more convincing justification.

393.3. Ad. A. 9135/03 Council for Higher Education and Yael Atiya v. Ha'aretz Publishing et. al. and Ad. A. 9738/04 Council for Higher Education v. Shahar - Association for Advancement of Education in Israel: On January 19, 2006, the Supreme Court rejected two appeals concerning the Council for Higher Education's refusal to expose internal documents and protocols of its hearings. The Council for Higher Education based its refusal on section 9(b)(4) of the Freedom of Information Law, which states that a public authority does not have to deliver information concerning internal discussions. In its decision, the Supreme Court held that "the right to receive information concerning the activity of a public authority is one of the cornerstones of a free society. It is related to the existence of a democratic regime; it feeds the freedom of expression and is fed by it; it reflects the legal concept that a public authority is a trustee obligated to care for the public and not for itself while fulfilling its duty". The Court held that a public authority is allowed to refuse to deliver information concerning internal discussions based on section 9(b)(4) of the Law, but it must examine all the relevant considerations and find, according to the circumstances of each case, the balance point between the public interest not to expose information, and the private and public interest, where it exists, to deliver information. In addition, the court held that a public authority must justify its refusal to deliver information according to administrative provisions - a laconic refusal is not sufficient, and the authority must detail the reasons for it. The Court approved the District Court's decision, and ordered the authority to reveal the relevant documents in accordance with certain conditions.

Article 20. Prohibition of hate propaganda

394. Incitement to violence and terrorism. The 2002 Amendment to the Penal Law prohibits incitement to an act of violence or terrorism. Section 144D.2 states that "publication of a call for the execution of, as well as the publication of praise, sympathy with, or encouragement to acts of violence or terrorism, or support or empathy with such act (in this section - seditious publication), and according to the content of the seditious publication and the circumstances of its publication, if there's an actual possibility that the publication will result in an act of violence or terrorism, is punishable by a maximum prison sentence of five years". In addition, Section 144D.3 prohibits possession of publications inciting to violence or terror.

395. Protecting ethnic minority communities from hate speech is the foundation of debate and dialogue in intercultural societies. Hate crimes can not be excused on the basis of freedom of expression. The issue of incitement involves a constant delicate balance between the preservation of public wellbeing and the fundamental right to freedom of expression. Freedom of expression however, does not extend to incitement to racial hatred or discrimination.

396. The State Attorney Guideline No. 14.12 requires approval by the Deputy State Attorney (Special Functions), to initiate investigations into matters of great public sensitivity; i.e. offences of incitement to racism, incitement to violence, hate offences and other incitement related offences that clash with freedom of expression offences. The Law also requires the Attorney General's approval to file an indictment for these offences. The Attorney General's Office operates in pursuit of the elimination of racial incitement in accordance with the guidelines set by the law and the Supreme Court.

397. The State Attorney's Office regards racial remarks made against the Arab population as incitement to racism and may initiate criminal proceedings on their behalf. In fact, criminal investigations have been conducted into a number of cases of incitement to racism against the Arab population, and indictments have been filed. Some of the cases were concluded with the defendants being convicted as a consequence. The following recent cases concerning incitement to racism are examples of the State Attorney's Office's determination to eliminate racially motivated remarks made against the Arab population:

397.1. In the case of Cr.C. 5120/05 (Jerusalem Magistrates Court), The State of Israel v. Abadi, Cohen and Ben Yaacov, the defendants were charged with both supporting a terrorist organization and incitement to racism after wearing a shirt displaying the symbol of the "Kach" movement, defendant 3 prepared and disseminated brochures calling for a referendum to disengage from the Arab-Israelis refusing to pledge allegiance to the State of Israel. They were also charged with publishing posters which incite to racism. Defendant 3, Ben Yaacov, was convicted of publication of racist incitement and 6 months of suspended prison sentence. Defendant 1, Cohen, was convicted in the framework of a plea bargain. Defendant 2 fled justice. An appeal is currently pending before the District Court.

397.2. In the case of Cr.C. 1232/06 (Haifa Magistrate Court) The State of Israel v. Fauchi, HersHKovitz and Ben Naftalie, the defendants were charged with incitement after publishing posters praising Eden Natan Zada, who committed the massacre in Shfaram. The court case is still pending.

397.3. In the case of Cr.C 3907/06 (Jerusalem Magistrate Court) The State of Israel v. Raffi Chova et al.: on July 20, 2006, an indictment was filed against the defendants for yelling derogatory, racially motivated comments against Arabs during a soccer match. The court case is still pending. A delay of proceedings was recently granted by the Attorney General to one of the defendants.

398. Hate crimes. Racist crime is more seriously expressed in the infliction of hate motivated mainstream criminal offences such as assault, murder or damage to property. Racial motivation is recognized as an aggravating circumstance in the Israeli Penal Law. Section 144F contains legal provisions according to which racist and xenophobic motivation, as well as hostility based on sexual orientation or a disability, is to be taken into account as an aggravating factor by the courts. Paragraph a) of this section states that "any person committing an offence motivated by racism as defined in section 144A, or who poses hostility towards a public owing to their religion, religious group, ethnic origin, sexual orientation or their status as a foreign worker, is liable to a sentence of double the punishment set for the same offence, or 10 years imprisonment, according to the lighter punishment". Paragraph (b) lists the types of offences included under the section.

399. In numerous instances of criminal offences motivated by hatred, investigations have been opened and indictments filed. An example of such a case is Cr. A. 9040/05, Yitzhak Orion and Yehuda Ovadia v. The State of Israel, in which the Supreme Court, on December 7, 2006, rejected an appeal filed against a judgment given by the Jerusalem District Court, which had convicted the two appellants of various charges of violence and assault of Arabs, and sentenced each of them to 3 years imprisonment, 6 months suspended imprisonment, and compensatory payments to their victim, in the amount of 7,500 NIS.

400. Here, the District Court attributed great weight to the fact that the offences were racially motivated and the Court asserted that this kind of racial element to offences must be reflected in the punishment as well. The Supreme Court reaffirmed this approach, and emphasized that in a society which espouses values of equality and the protection of human rights, there is no room for racially motivated crime, and any such behavior is to be thoroughly condemned and denounced.

401. In light of the above, the Supreme Court asserted that no intervention in the judgment of the District Court was required, and the appeal was rejected.

402. The Safety in Public Places Law 5722-1962 was amended (Amendment No. 3) on July 2005, to specifically prohibit racially motivated expression at sporting events. Consequently, indictments were filed against defendants who shouted “Death to the Arabs” during soccer matches.

403. Education against hate propaganda. The education system approaches the concept of preventing hate crime and propaganda from a wider point of view, which emphasizes the concepts of tolerance, pluralism, prevention of racism, and one’s attitude toward foreigners and “others”. These concepts are part of special educational programs designated for school students of all ages and aimed at exposing them to different groups within Israeli society. In addition, the students learn about the principles of democracy, the rule of law, human rights, rights of minorities and pluralism in the framework of civic lessons.

404. The education system has also taken action implementing the 1996 Shenhar-Kremnitzer Report, and has initiated other varied activities aimed at advancing the concepts of tolerance, acceptance of the “other” and prevention of racism and prejudice within the education system. The activities include: training for teachers on democratic values and principles, a special program on anti-semitism and racism for the 2004 International Day against Fascism and anti-semitism and different activities on tolerance and democracy on the Memorial Day for the late Prime Minister, Yitzhak Rabin.

405. Police’s combat against hate propaganda. The Israeli Police also perform educational activities for police officers in order to raise awareness of the social complicity in Israel and its effects on police work. The activities accord knowledge and understanding of the characteristics of minority groups in Israel, including Arabs, immigrants, the homosexual community and persons with disabilities, and provide tools for the provision of professional, sensitive police work among these groups. The concept of “equal and suitable service in a multi-cultural society” was set as the annual education target for 2007.

406. As an example, police activities include special training days and educational seminars in each police station, an academic course on the Arabic language and the Arab culture in collaboration with Haifa University, a special seminar on the homosexual community delivered together with gay representatives, and distribution of information cards concerning police service to persons with disabilities. In addition, the Police performs educational activities on the legacy of the holocaust and the importance of combating racism and securing democratic values. As a result of these activities, the commitment of Police officers to protecting minority groups from discrimination and hate propaganda and crime has increased significantly.

Article 21. Freedom of assembly

The Pride Parade

407. On June 20, 2007, the Supreme Court rejected two petitions challenging the annual Pride Parade in Jerusalem (HCJ 5277/07 Baruch Marzel v. The Chief of Jerusalem Police, Ilan Franko, and HCJ 5380/07 "Kochav Ehad" Association v. The Chief of Jerusalem Police, Ilan Franko).

408. The Court concluded that the decision of the Jerusalem Chief of Police to approve the event was reasonable, and maintained an appropriate balance between all the rights and interests concerned, according to the standards already determined by the High Court of Justice (HCJ 8988/06) concerning the Pride Parade in Jerusalem in November 2006. The Supreme Court's president held that "harm of emotions does not justify damaging the freedom of speech and protest in a democracy which is based on social pluralism, so that the freedom of speech will not lose its content. The freedom of speech is not only the freedom to express consensual pleasant things, but also to give a stage to opinions which cause disagreements, and allow an opportunity for minority groups to raise their issues on the public agenda even if the majority opposes their views. The protection of the freedom of speech protects first and foremost the minority from the majority". Referring to the balance between the freedom of speech and the protection of religiously inspired emotions, the Court held that even if the Pride Parade in Jerusalem offends religious emotions, it was not a sufficient reason for denial of the right to protest.

409. The Court considered that the 2007 Pride Parade in Jerusalem was to take place over a shortened route of only 500 meters, and in streets which were not part of a clear residential area and were far removed from the ultra-orthodox neighborhoods of the city. The Court further noted the commitment of the parade organizers to creating an appropriate character for the event, and concluded that under the circumstances, the harm inflicted on religious sensibilities did not surpass the high tolerance threshold required to allow infringement on the right to freedom of speech and protest. The Court therefore decided not to intervene, and rejected the two petitions.

Demonstrations

410. On May 16, 2005, during the period of Israel's Disengagement from Gaza, a prohibited assembly took place in Jerusalem in which Mr. Moshe Batat took part. He was subsequently indicted for several offences; riot, enticement to riot, interference with a policeman in the performance of his duty, and obstructing a public servant (Cr.C. 002717/05 The State of Israel v. Moshe Batat). The Magistrate Court in Jerusalem determined that the defendant was officially present at the place of the demonstration as a press photographer for the purpose of taking photos of the event. He could not, therefore, be considered as one of the demonstrators. According to the Court, there was no further evidence that the defendant was warned to leave the place of the demonstration, and he was subsequently acquitted of the charges filed against him. The Court admonished the State for bringing journalists to trial when they are engaging in legitimate documentation of an event or demonstration. The public has a right to be informed and this meant freedom of the press needed to be preserved.

411. On August 30, 2007, the Tel-Aviv District Court partially accepted a claim from the Tel-Aviv-Jaffa Academic College heads' and issued a permanent injunction banning protests and demonstrations against the establishment of a laboratory for experiments on animals, from taking place in front of the college heads' private homes (TA.Civil. C. 1558/06 The Tel-Aviv-Jaffa Academic College v. Mackiton). The Court rejected the plaintiffs' claims that the protests constituted defamation or incitement to violence, and held that demonstrations in front of private houses were not to be prohibited. The Court nevertheless determined that in the specific circumstances of the case, the protest demonstrations constituted violation of privacy and harassment.

412. In its decision, the Court held that there was no "public justification" for continued protest activity in front of the plaintiff's homes, and that the demand to stop it was justified. The Court held that "... the freedom of speech should not be lessened, but the test for the realization of the freedom of speech is not the 'personal feeling' of the person who seeks to realize this freedom, but an objective examination of the options that society provides to the individual in order to realize the freedom of speech". The Court added that the respondents "did not seek for the freedom of speech itself. They sought for freedom of harassment, the right to cause the plaintiffs non-pleasure and distress" ... "The freedom to harass is not part of the freedom of speech" ... "It is to be condemned in a situation where the freedom of speech can be realized without it."

Article 22. Freedom of association

413. Forming trade unions and joining them. Since the submission of our previous periodic reports, the legal protection of the right to organize trade unions has been boosted by some important judicial decisions. One of the more prominent such decision was handed down on March 3, 2005. Here, the National Labor Court accepted an appeal of "the New Histadrut" (the General Federation of Labor) against the Minister of Transport, stating that the decision of the Minister of Transport to allow other concessionaires to provide transportation services on closed transportation lines in the city of Beer-Sheva, instead of the concessionaires on strike, constituted a severe, direct and intentional damage to the workers' right of association and their right to strike (L.C 57/05 The New Histadrut v. The Minister of Transport). The Court stated that the right to freedom of association is recognized as a universal human right, and that it is cited in several conventions including the ICCPR in Article 22. The Court revoked the decision of the Minister of Transport and stressed that the strike may cause suffering to the residents of the city, but noted that this suffering is relatively "sufferable", and that it is not comparable to the direct or indirect damage inflicted on the workers' right of association and their right to strike by allowing other concessionaires to provide the inactive services.

414. The right to form a trade union. On January 1, 2001, the Knesset enacted the Collective Agreement Law (Amendment 6) 5761-2001, explicitly stating that every worker has the right to form trade unions, to be a member of a trade union and to operate within their framework (section 33h). The Law prohibits preventing the entry of a trade union's representative to a working place to promote stated rights (section 33i). In addition, the Law states that an employer will not dismiss a worker, damage the employment conditions of a worker, or avoid hiring a person to work owing to their membership, or activities within a trade union, activities for the purpose of forming a trade union, or avoiding membership or ending membership in a trade union (section 33j). According to the Law, Labor Courts will have sole jurisdiction over civil proceedings concerning violations of the said provisions and will be authorized to grant injunctions, mandatory injunctions and compensation (section 33 k). The amended Law imposes a fine (based on section 61(a)(2) of the Penal Law), on an employer who avoids hiring a person to work, harms the employment conditions of a worker, or dismisses a worker due to one of the following reasons: membership in a trade union, avoiding membership in a trade union, or ending membership in a trade union (section 33n).

415. Since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report, the right to form a trade union has been further strengthened in a number of important judicial decisions.

416. Collective agreement appeal 1003/01. The New General Federation of Labor et. al. v. E.C.I Telecom Ltd - E.C.I Telecom, a company employing 4,900 workers, was determined to dismiss 142 workers, all members in a trade union, because of economic difficulties. In his decision, the National Labor Court's President, held that "the rule is that the employer holds the burden of proving that selecting which of the workers will be dismissed is based on justifiable reasons, and is not due to membership in a trade union". The Court decided to grant a temporary injunction preventing the immediate dismissal of the workers, in order to allow both parties to settle their dispute via negotiations based on the original collective agreement between them.

417. In the case of Civil Request 6726/07 Alon Lee Green v. Excellence Coffee Ltd, the petitioner requested an annulment of his dismissal which was, according to his claim, made in response to his activities in formation of a workers union. The Tel-Aviv District Labor Court held that it must protect the right of workers to form unions, and ordered the petitioner's return to work. According to the Court's decision, "a private employer shall not be forced to employ a worker against his will, and the solution then is usually to grant compensation to the worker. But this is an exceptional case since the respondent's behavior damaged the basic rights of the petitioner, and financial compensation can not heal the deficiency of its behavior. Damage to a constitutional right which is a 'privilege' and goes beyond the worker's economical rights brings about an exceptional result".

418. Number and structure of trade unions in Israel. No notable change in the structure of labor movements in Israel has occurred since the submission of Israel's previous report. "The Histadrut" remains the largest and most representative workers' organization in Israel.

419. For further information with regards to the status of trade unions in Israel, please see the report regarding the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

420. The right to strike. Since the submission of our previous periodic report, a significant decision has been handed down as mentioned below, as the Court concluded that a decision of the Minister of Transports' to allow transport operatives other than those on strike to provide transportation in the midst of a cessation of services in the city of Beer-Sheva, caused severe, direct, and intentional damage to the workers' right of association and their right to strike (L.C 57/05 The New Histadrut v. The Minister of Transport).

Article 23. Protection of the family

Measures of protection

421. Social insurance and entitlements. As reported in our periodic report, all families residing legally in Israel, regardless of income, are entitled to a “child allowance”, a monthly grant which increases with the number of children in the family. The Government policy of drastic cuts in child allowances - the first stage of which was carried out in 2002-2004 - will continue in subsequent years up to 2009. The policy is being partially implemented by means of temporary orders and partially as permanent legislation. By the end of the legislative process in 2009, the allowance will be a set amount for every child in all families, regardless of the child’s place in the family. Starting from January 2006, a family with one child receives 148 NIS a month (approximately 44$); a family with two children receives 296 NIS; with three children - 474 NIS; four children - 803 NIS; and five children -1,132 NIS per month. The amount per every child born after June 1, 2003, is 148 NIS constantly. In 2005, 956,294 families received child allowances, amounting to 19% of the total benefits paid by the National Insurance Institution (NII). In 2006, 968,282 families received child allowances, amounting to 17.6% of the total benefits paid by the NII.

422. The NII is also responsible for the payment of income support benefits. In 2006, the NII paid income support benefits to approximately 130,341 families which did not earn the minimum level of income as determined by the Income Support Law, 5740-1980, and which were not covered by other income maintenance programs.

Maternity and paternity assistance

423. From January 1, 2006, women who are unable to work owing to their high-risk pregnancy are to receive a “maternity allowance” for a period of at least 30 days. The amount per day is the lower of the following two amounts: the basic amount divided by 30 - 232 NIS, (slightly under 70$); or the woman's salary divided by 90. Following the Emergency Economic Plan and the Recovery Plan for the years 2002-2006, the sum of maternity allowance was reduced by 4%.

424. As of January 1, 2005, the National Insurance Institute of Israel pays a maternity grant, which is provided to post-natal new mothers in order to help cover the cost of a layette for the newborn child, directly into the mother's bank account and delivered approximately one month after the date on which she gave birth. The maternity grant was previously paid by means of a check given to the mothers in the hospital in which the birth took place.

425. As of January 1, 2006, a "maternity grant" given to a new mother upon the birth of her first baby, or to the adoptive parents upon adoption, will equal 1,390 NIS, (slightly more than 410$). The maternity grant for a second child will be equivalent to 626 NIS, (slightly over 186$), and for every third and additional child to the family it will be the equivalent of 417 NIS, (slightly over 120$).

426. The National Insurance Institute pays a benefit to a mother who has given birth to three or more children in one birth, and again at the end of a 30-day period after the date of birth, if at least three of these children have survived, the childbirth allowance is paid, in addition to the maternity grant, for the period from the first day of the month following the birth, up until 20 months from this date.

New reproductive technologies

427. In 2006, the birth rate in Israel was 2.9%, (2.8 among the Jewish population, 4.0 among Muslims population, 2.2 among Christians, 2.6 among the Druze and 1.6 among population with no religious classification). During the last decade, the general birth rate remained stable due to a slight increase in the birth rate among Jewish women, and a significant decrease in the birth rate of Muslim, Christian and Druze women.

428. During the last decade, the amount of births by single women continued to increase. In 2005, 3.3 births from 100 were by never-married women, in comparison to an average of 2.3 between the years 1995-1999. It is also notable that the increase was mainly among women above the age of 30.

429. Fertility Treatments. There are 24 fertility departments in Israel, 9 in governmental hospitals, 11 in public hospitals and 4 in private hospitals. In 2005, 24,995 cycles of IVF treatment were performed (in comparison to 16,396 cycles in 1998). The ratio of live births in Israel is relatively steady since 1996 (15.8 %), in 2005 it stood at 15.6 %.

430. The accumulative number of applications for surrogate motherhood, as of December 2007, is 450, resulting with 194 children in 160 successful child births (due to 32 labors of twins and one triplet). Out of the 450 applications some were made by couples for the second time after a success or a failure to conceive on the first application. Some of the applications never reached the stage of signing an agreement. At least two of the prospective parents gave birth to children unaided by a surrogate after approval of their surrogacy agreement.

Marriage

431. Family Matters Court Law, 5755-1995 (the “Family Matters Court Law”). Until 2001, section 51 of the Palestine Order in Council 1922 provided the Muslim courts with exclusive jurisdiction in matters of personal status including marriage, divorce, alimony, maintenance, guardianship and legitimating of minors. In addition, section 54 of this order endowed the Courts of several Christian communities with exclusive jurisdiction over matters of personal status (i.e., marriage, divorce, alimony, and any other matter of personal status) provided all parties consented to such jurisdiction. In November 2001, the Family Matters Court Law was amended in order to vest jurisdiction over issues of personal status amongst Muslims and Christians in the Family Matters Court. Marriage and divorce however, remain exclusively in the jurisdiction of Muslim and Christian courts and thus constitute the only exception to the amendment.

432. Minimum marriageable age for men and women. The phenomenon of underage marriage still takes place in certain sectors of Israeli society, including those of the ultra-orthodox Jews, Jews originating from Georgia and Arabs. According to the Central Bureau of Statistics, in 2004, 1,360 Arab-Israeli girls, younger than 17, were married. Additionally, 44% of Arab women were married before the age of 19. In 2005, the rate of marriage for Muslim girls was more than 2.5 times higher than that of Jewish girls. Also in 2005, 30 requests to allow the marriage of minors were submitted to family matters courts - 17 were approved. During the years 1997-2005, more than a half of the 251 requests for marriage of minors were approved. During the years 2000-2006, 41 complaints were submitted to the Police due to violations of the Marriage Age Law, 5710-1950. In half of these cases criminal files were opened. In all other cases it was decided not to prosecute.

433. Dissolving of Marriage Jurisdiction Law (Special Cases and International Jurisdiction), 5729-1969 - This Law, amended in July 2005, concerns the dissolution of marriages where the spouses have different religious affiliations or no religious affiliation at all. Prior to the amendment, spouses with different religious backgrounds wishing to dissolve their marriage had to first apply to the president of the Supreme Court for a determination of jurisdiction. The amendment allows for spouses with different religious backgrounds to apply directly to a Family Matters Court. In appropriate cases, the amendment mandates that the Family Matters Court seek the consul of the relevant religious court to determine whether it is necessary to dissolve the marriage according to the religious laws of either spouse for the purpose of remarriage. The amended Law also defines the international jurisdiction of Family Matters Courts in this matter.

434. Civil marriages. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court took a significant step of recognizing civil marriages which had taken place between Jewish Israeli residents and citizens outside of Israel (HJC 2232/03 Anonymous v. The Rabbinical Court of Appeals). A Jewish man, who wanted to divorce his wife after having been civilly married outside of the State, turned to the Rabbinical Court which stated that the marriage should not be recognized. The wife, who did not want to divorce her husband, petitioned the decision to the Supreme Court based on her fear of losing her right to alimony. The Supreme Court determined that the Rabbinical Court could not dissolve the marriage based on the fact that the marriage was not performed according to Jewish Law. It further noted that civil marriages are indeed valid in Israel and created a status which could not only be considered as for the purpose of registration. This recognition of civil marriages conforms with Israel's obligations according to Article 23 of the Convention.

435. The Supreme Court decided that the Rabbinical Court may dissolve such a marriage and grant a divorce verdict, if it is convinced that it is unfeasible to accomplish domestic peace between the spouses, but it can not do so based on the religious causes for divorce. This sort of divorce can be defined as "divorce with no blame" (not owing to religious causes of blame), and is considered to be rather like a civil divorce. The Supreme Court raised the concern that "divorce with no blame" may damage the right of women to receive alimony, but emphasized that the solution can not be found through retaining the institution of formal marriage. Instead the economic aspects of the relationship should be resolved in a Family Matters Court, rather than as part of a divorce procedure in the Rabbinical Court.

436. Spouses. On April 15, 2007, the Nazareth Family Matters Court rejected a lawsuit brought by the two children of a deceased man against his second wife. In the claim, the children requested the rights to a property of their father's which the 2nd widow had inherited (Nazareth F.C 001180/04 A.Z and P.Z v. V.Z and the Land Registry). The plaintiffs claimed that their father's widow had a new spouse, and that according to a condition in their father's testament, she lost the right to the property under those circumstances and the children were subsequently to inherit it.

437. The Court held that the meaning of the word "spouse" as it appeared in the testament should be interpreted as 'a relationship characterized by economic management of a family unit, stemming from a joint family life'. This meaning complied with the testimony's objective that the children would inherit the property only if the wife developed a serious and permanent relationship with her new partner, similar to the one she had with the deceased.

438. The Court decided that in this case, the relationship between the respondent and her partner was based on friendship and intimacy, but could not be characterized as incorporating the economic management of a joint family unit. Therefore, the new couple could not be considered as "spouses" according to the terms of the testament, and the lawsuit was rejected.

439. By the end of 2006, 2,365,800 children made up 33.2% of the total population of the State of Israel, in comparison to 33.8% in 2000. Despite the growing number of children in Israel, their percentage of the total population has continued to decrease since the 1970's (39.2% in 1970). This decrease is among all religious groups, including Muslims where the percentage of children decreased from 58.7% in 1970 to 48.7% in 2006. In 2006, 8.5% of all children in Israel lived in a single parent family, in comparison to 6.8% in 1995. The number of children who immigrated to Israel since 1990 and presently reside in Israel is 90,000.

440. Indication of information concerning the implications of legislation can be found in the Rights of the Child Law, 5762-2002. This Law requires the systematic inclusion of explanatory notes in every bill regarding its expected implications on the rights of children.

441. In January 2007, there were 418,527 children known to the social services departments, this consists of nearly 20% of all children in Israel. From January 2001 to January 2007, there was an increase of 44% in the number of children in the social services system. 326,588 children were defined by the social services departments as “children at direct risk or family risk” - indicating that the child’s development and his reasonable manner of life are at risk and he may require assistance.

442. Welfare Services in the Criminal Process. In 2006, the Police opened 35,397 files against minors: 21,433 were criminal files (59.6%) of which 14,504 were closed without prosecution (40.4%). During the years 2004-2006, there was a significant decrease of 11% in the number of cases in which minors were involved. Between 2003 and 2006, the percentage of criminal and non-prosecution files opened against minors due to violent offences increased from 42.6% to 50.2%, while the percentage of files opened against minors involving property offences diminished from 34.7% to 28.7%.

443. In 2006, minors were represented by the Public Defender’s Office in 11,956 proceedings in comparison to 6,708 in 2001. Between 2001 and 2006, the number of these proceedings nearly doubled - with the most significant increase in the Haifa District (+185%).

444. It shall be clarified, that the Rights of Children at Risk to Services Law, detailed in our previous periodic report, was approved in first reading, but eventually was not enacted by the Knesset in contrast to the information indicated in our previous periodic report.

445. Since the submission of our previous periodic report, there have been some legislative changes concerning investigations of minors under 14 years of age by children’s investigators of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. Currently, investigations of children are held in violence offences; sex, prostitution and indecency offences; offences related to violations of parental duties and offences of abuse.

446. In 2006, 8,222 children that had been victims of sexual and violent offences under the age of 14 were investigated by a children’s investigator, in comparison 8,328 victimized children underwent investigation in 2005 and 5,704 children in 2000. Despite the gradual increase in the number of children interrogated by a children’s investigator, the percentage of girls interrogated has declined from more than two thirds of the investigatees in 1990 to less than half in 2005. Out of all children interrogated, 55% were victims of abuse within the family, 30.3% were victims of sex offences, 9.4% were witnesses of sex offences, and 5% were suspects of committing sex offences.

447. A 2001 Amendment expanded the Evidence Procedure Revision (Protection of Children) Law 5715- 1955 (section 1a), and determined that a child could be investigated by a children’s investigator concerning related offences. The expansion was designed to prevent a situation in which a child might be investigated by a children’s investigator concerning an offence included in the Law (sex and severe violence offences), but could not be investigated concerning a related offence - a situation which invariably led to a splitting-up of the investigation.

448. A 2004 Amendment made several other changes, including:

448.1. The implementation of special procedures allowing children to testify in court, in relation to offences to which the law applies (section 2d). In this regard, the child's testimony will be permitted by the children's investigator subject to certain conditions being met. The investigator may require for example, that the child testifies via closed circuit television, on one specified date, not on the witness stand, in the judge's chamber, and so on.

448.2. Decisions of the children's investigator and the Court concerning testimony and testimonial measures, will be concluded only after hearing the opinion of the child, if he/she can express his/her own opinion. The child's opinion will be weighed according to his age and his maturity (section 2f).

448.3. Once the children's investigator reaches a decision as to the child's testimony, he must, without delay, re-evaluate his decision in respect of; admission of the child's testimony if he has allowed the child to testify, or the trial, if he has prohibited the child's testimony (section 2g).

448.4. A decision of a children's' investigator may be re-examined by a senior children's investigator (section 2h).

448.5. A children's investigator must provide substantial reasons for his decisions.

449. A 2004 Amendment constituted the rule that investigation of a child must be conducted with his/her parent's knowledge, except in certain circumstances. For example: if there is concern as to any damage to the child's physical and mental wellbeing, if the suspect is a family relative and there is a concern of possible damage to the child, and if there is substantial difficulty in informing the parent by reasonable effort and the delay might foil the investigation or any crime prevention (section 4a). In addition, the amended Law states that if an investigation without the parent's knowledge is required, the child may, under specific conditions, be taken out from the place where he is staying (school, kindergarten, etc.). The conditions include such requirements as having had consultation with education workers who know the child, supplied explanations to the child, provided identification details of the children's investigator to the administrator of the place, etc.

450. A 2005 amendment stated that a child with a mental disability is to be investigated by a special children's investigator in accordance with the Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Suitability to Persons with Mental or Physical Disability).

451. Section 361 of the Penal Law was amended in 2001 (Amendment 59), and now determines that leaving a child under the age of six years old without appropriate supervision is a criminal offence.

452. Sexual abuse. Since 2002, there have been several Amendments to section 354 of the Penal Law concerning restrictions on limitation in sex offenses against minors. Currently, the Law states that in the case of offenses committed against a minor by a person responsible for the minor, the limitation period shall begin when he reaches the age of twenty eight. If the offenses were committed by a person above the age of fifteen who is not a relative, or responsible for the minor, the limitation period shall begin when the minor reaches the age of eighteen. In addition, a 2001 Amendment (Amendment 61), to the Penal Law removed the element of 'use of force' from sex offenses, which has effectively moved the focus of the investigation to absence of consent. A 2003 Amendment (Amendment 77), also added an offence concerning the sexual exploitation of a patient by a mental therapist (Section 347a).

453. Child prostitution. Section 214 of the Penal Law was amended in 2007 (Amendment 93) and the short two-year limitation period for submission of indictments concerning pornographic advertisements of minors was annulled. It was additionally made illegal to use minors in pornographic advertisements (sections 214b-214b(3)).

454. The Penal Law was amended in 2006 so that section 15 now applies the principal of extraterritoriality to pornography and prostitution offences committed against minors. It is currently possible to try offenders in Israel for such offences, even though the act might not constitute a criminal offence in the country in which it was performed.

455. The Committee for Examination of the Conditions of Children at Risk. According to a Government Resolution from January 2004, Israel former Prime Minister and former Minister of Social Affairs, appointed a public committee for the examination of conditions of children and youth at risk or in distress. On September 12, 2006, following a report submitted by the committee in March 2006, the Government accepted Resolution Number 477 for the gradual implementation of a plan recommended by the committee. In 2007, the implementation of the plan began in several towns in Israel with a special annual budget of 200 million NIS.

Protection of children in legal proceedings

456. The Committee to Examine Fundamental Principles Concerning Children and the Law, and Their Implementation in Legislation. In June 1997, the former Minister of Justice appointed a "committee to examine fundamental principles concerning children and the law, and their implementation in legislation". The minister appointed this committee to thoroughly examine Israeli law as it pertains to the rights of the child and the child's legal and welfare status in light of the principles set down in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. The committee comprised of senior public and other officials from a variety of fields and was headed by Justice Saviona Rotlevi, Deputy President of the Tel-Aviv District Court. In 2003, six reports prepared by sub-committees were submitted to the Minister of Justice: representation of children in civil proceedings, out-of-home placement, the child and his family, education, the child in criminal proceedings and a general report. Since the submission of the reports, their implementation began gradually.

457. On June 1, 2007 a pilot program for the implementation of the recommendations regarding the participation of children in Family Court's proceedings commenced operation in the Haifa and Jerusalem Family Courts. The pilot program operates in cooperation with the Courts Administration within the Ministry of Justice, the Assistance Units to the Family Courts within the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services, and Ashalim (a non-profit organization).

458. The participation of children in decision-making regarding their future, is done according to the Committee's recommendations, with the assistance of the Department for Child Participation, which is composed of social workers and psychologists, and operates in the framework of the Assistance Units to the Family Courts.

459. In assembling the pilot, the unique characteristics of the participation of children were taken into consideration, and it was built in a way that allows follow-up and revision on each component of the program, while comparing the different alternatives, in order to reach conclusions regarding the optimal ways to exercise the participation rights of the child and to observe the child's other rights and best interest in the framework of the Family Court's proceedings.

460. On December 3, 2007, the Minister of Justice signed the Civil Procedure Regulations (Temporary Order) 5767-2007, which adds chapter K2 to the Civil Procedure Regulations 5744-1984 and regulates the procedures for children's participation in the chosen Family Courts for the duration of the pilot.

461. On June 5, 2006, the Supreme Court overturned a decision made by the Shari'a Court, which gave the custody of three young children to their father, without any factual basis concerning the children's condition (HCJ 1129/06 Anonymous v. The Shari'a Court of Appeals). The Court held that the "child's best interest" constitutes a basic principle of the Legal Capacity and Guardianship Law, 5722-1962 (the "Legal Capacity and Guardianship Law"), in cases of child custody, and the Supreme Court thus considered that any decision concerning children must be based upon a proper factual basis.

462. In this instance, the Shari'a Court gave a Muslim father who divorced his wife, custody of their three children, in accordance with a Muslim presumption that the best interests of a boy over 7 years of age and a girl over 9 years of age, are served by remaining with their father. The Supreme Court decided that this presumption contradicts the Legal Capacity and Guardianship Law, which states that the issue of child custody must be decided in accordance with their best interests as defined by that Law, and their best interests only. This decision is in alignment with the obligation to protect children in the case of dissolution of marriage, and as a result of their status as minors, as accorded by Articles 23 and 24 of the Convention.

Education

463. Removal of pupils. In 2004, the Minister of Education published Regulations regarding the removal of pupils from the educational system (Compulsory Education Regulations (Rules for the Permanent Removal of a Pupil Due to School Achievement)) 5765-2004.

464. These Regulations include a prohibition on removing a pupil in the 1st-6th grades from school due to lack of achievement in studies. Regarding pupils in the 7th-12th grades, removal from school shall not be made on the basis of lack of achievement unless the pupil fails at least 70% of the mandatory subjects for that school year, and if the failure did not occur due to illness, death of a family member, separation or divorce of the pupils parents or other exceptional event which, according to the educational personnel, led to the failure.

465. The principal of the school from which the pupil is removed, and the Head of the Local Council's Education Department, will make an effort to find an alternative educational system best fitted for the pupil upon removal. This shall be done in accordance with the Pupils Rights Regulation (Publishing Orders and Pupil Removal), 5762-2002.

466. The Pupils Rights Regulation (Publishing Orders and Pupil Removal), 5762-2002, establishes rules regarding the removal of pupils from school. Among them is the necessity of performing a hearing before finalizing the removal decision. The pupil or his parents can file an appeal with the Head of the Ministry of Education's District, according to section 6(a), and a hearing should be held within 14 days according to the provisions of section 6(b) before a hearings panel. The pupil and his parents may state their claims in person or by an appointed person.

467. Special education. In 2002, the Knesset approved an amendment to the Special Education Law, 5748-1988 (the "Special Education Law"), according to which a pupil with special needs integrated in the regular school system, is entitled to a supplement in tutoring and studies, as well as special services such as psychology services, aid services, medical services or any other service which the Minister of Education, after consulting with the Minister of Health and the Minister of Social Affairs and Social Services, sets in a directive (The Special Education Law (Amendment No. 7), 5763-2002).

468. The Free Education for Sick Children Law 5761-2001. This Law is aimed to advance equal opportunity in education for sick children and provide a suitable educational framework for children in hospitals or at home due to long term illness. According to the Law, the Minister of Education will introduce a special educational program for sick children to be implemented in their own homes or in hospitals with the consent of the parents.

Family violence

469. A 2002 Amendment to the Penal Law imposes a more severe punishment for violation of a judicial order when the order was made for the protection of a person's life or wellbeing. The punishment for violating a judicial order is currently set at two years imprisonment, and - the punishment for violation of an order made in protection of a persons' life or well being, is now four years imprisonment. The relevant orders are mostly protection orders based on the Prevention of Family Violence Law 5751-1991 (the "Prevention of Family Violence Law").

470. A 2000 Amendment to the Prevention of Family Violence Law, (Amendment 5), states that a restraining order will include a prohibition against carrying a weapon. Before the above amendment was enacted, the prohibition against carrying weapons was subject to judicial consideration (sections 2b to 2f of the Law).

471. A 2001 Amendment to the Prevention of Family Violence Law, (Amendment 7), states that a doctor, nurse, educator, social worker, police officer, psychologist, clinical criminologist, paramedic, lawyer, religious cleric or rabbinical pleader, who, pursuant to any treatment or advice provided to an individual within their professional capacity, has reason to believe that the individual has been the victim of a crime perpetrated by his or her spouse, or by a former spouse - the said professional will inform the patient that they may turn to the Police, department of social services, or family abuse prevention centers within the department of social services, and will provide him with the telephone numbers of the said parties that are located near his place of residence.

472. The Prevention of Stalking Law implements another civil procedure, in addition to that anchored in the Prevention of Family Violence Law that enables the Court to issue restraining orders against stalking. The Prevention of Stalking Law is not directed towards familial relationships only. According to the Law, if the Court finds an individual guilty of stalking, it is entitled to place a restraining order on that individual prohibiting them from committing any of the stalking acts specified by the Law.

Children with disabilities

473. General. In 2007, 293,000 disabled or chronically ill children resided in Israel, composing 12.8% of the total child population of the country. Approximately 176,000 children (out of the 293,000), were disabled or suffered from a chronic illness that affected their daily function that had persisted for more than one year. These children made up 7.7% of the total child population.

474. The percentage of children with special needs who have at least one disability, stand at 9.1% among Bedouin children (in the southern Negev area), 8.3% among the total population of Arab children and 7.6% among Jewish children.

475. Between the years 2001-2005 there was a drop in the rate of children with special needs who were sexually assaulted or were the victim of family violence (from 11.2% to 9%).

476. In comparison to western countries, in Israel there are relatively high rates of children born at a very low weight. The rate of children born with low birth weights grew from 15.8% (on average) in 1995-1998 to 18% in 2005.

477. About 25% of children with special needs live with two unemployed parents, in many cases the parents depend on income support pension.

478. Education. In Israel there are approximately 46,000 pupils in the special education system: special kindergartens, special schools and special classrooms in regular schools. Between the years 2002-2005 the rate of school pupils in special schools and special classrooms in regular schools grew by about 16%. The number of kindergarten aged children in special kindergartens in those years also grew by about 26%.

479. Among the special education children, the number of children with learning deficiencies makes up 38% of the total number of children with special needs. Most of the children in this group study in special classrooms in regular schools. Another significant group in the special education system is children with mental retardation who consist of roughly 20% of the system.

480. As mentioned, the Special Education Law was amended in 2002 and a chapter dealing with integration of children with special needs was added. The purpose of the amendment was to equalize the services given to children that are integrated in regular schools to those given to children in the special education facilities. Moreover, the amendment obligates the Placement Committee to prefer the placement of a child with disability in a regular educational facility. Among the purposes of the amendment is the integration of children with disabilities within the regular education system while enlarging the budget set for the purpose from year to year. So far, The amendment applies thus far to school age children and children from the age of 5 years.

481. The Dorner Committee, a public committee established to examine the special school system in Israel, which operates these days, was established in order to examine the Ministry of Education's policy towards the issue of children with special needs, examine the allocation of the Ministry's budget in treating these children, draw a plan for action, set a list of priorities to action in this regard, all while considering the restriction of the current budget of the Ministry.

482. Recently, the Rights of Pupils with Learning Disabilities in Secondary Education Facilities Law, 5768-2008 was enacted. This Law asserts the rights of pupils with learning disabilities to adjustments in the criteria for admission to secondary education facilities (academic, technological, rabbinical, or professional), in the exams and other assignments throughout the school years.

483. Special education in the minorities sectors. According to information from the Ministry of Education, a structural discrimination towards children from the Arab and Bedouin Sectors does not exist. All the relevant procedures within the framework of the circular of the Ministry of Education's General Manager, apply equally to all sectors of the populations.

484. Over the last several years, the achievements of school pupils with special needs (at the 5th and 8th grade levels) that were integrated in to regular schools were significantly lower than the achievements of children without special needs (10 to 20 points less in their tests results in mathematics, science and Hebrew/Arabic).

485. Children with special needs are absent from school for longer periods of time during the school year. About 25% of special needs children lost 4-7 days of schooling in the first three months, 19% lost 7 days of school and another 14% lost in between 14 days and 3 months of schooling.

486. Health care. About 18% of children admitted to general hospitals with a stay of 21 days or more, were hospitalized in psychiatric and rehabilitations wards. In 2004, 756 children were hospitalized for psychiatric reasons.

487. Sexual and family violence. The percentage of children with special needs who were sexually molested, assaulted or were the victim of family violence and were interrogated by a special children investigator (9%), is higher than their rate in the total children population in Israel (7.5%).

Foreign workers' children

488. In 2004, more than 2,000 children of foreign workers lived in Israel, 80% of them under 5 years old. In July 2007, 975 children of foreign workers under 5 years old were treated in family health care centers in the city of Tel-Aviv. In 2005, 1,300 children of foreign workers received health insurance from "Meuhedet" Health Maintenance Organization.

489. Since the submission of Israel's previous periodic report, there has been some progress in the legal status of foreign workers' children. Government Resolution 3807, dated June 26, 2005, was amended by Government Resolution 156, dated June 18, and states the following:

Upon request, the Minister of the Interior is entitled to grant permanent residency status to children of illegal immigrants who have been part of Israeli society and culture, if they fulfill the following conditions:

- (a) The child has lived in Israel for at least 6 years (as of the date of the Resolution), and have entered Israel prior to the age of 14. A short visit abroad will not be viewed as an interruption of this time period;
- (b) Prior to the child's entry or birth, the parents must have entered Israel legally, and with an entry permit in accordance with the Entry into Israel Law;
- (c) The child speaks the Hebrew language;
- (d) The child is in first grade or above, or has completed his studies;
- (e) Those filing the request will be required to submit documentation or participate in hearings, in order to prove that they fit the abovementioned criterion.

The Minister of the Interior can grant temporary residency status in Israel to the parents and the siblings of the child, as long as they have lived in the same household from the child's day of entry or birth in Israel, and are in Israel as of the date of this Resolution. If there is no reason for objection, the temporary residency status will be renewed until the child reaches the age of 21. At that point, the parents and the siblings will be entitled to file a request for permanent residency status.

490. As of August 9, 2007, approximately 826 requests have been filed of which 402 were accepted, 402 were rejected and 22 remain pending due to lack of adequate documentation. In the case of 324 rejected requests, appeals were filed to the committee of appeals which has to date reviewed 307 of the cases. On review 110 applications were accepted by the Ministry of the Interior, and 113 rejected. A further 24 appeals were referred to the committee which reviews humanitarian issues, and 60 appeals are currently under review.

Article 25. Access to the political system

491. On February 28, 2006, the Central Elections Committee rejected a petition against the participation of the "United Arab List-Arab Democratic Party" in the March 2007 elections. The petition was submitted by members of the right wing parties following a statement made by the chairman of the Arab party, Sheikh Ibrahim Sarsur, in which he expressed his support for Islam and an Islamic regime in Israel and called for respect of the Palestinian terrorist Hamas Government. The Chairperson of the Central Elections Committee, Justice Dorith Beinisch, held that Sheikh Sarsur spoke very severely and expressed a damaging view. Nevertheless, the standard for dismissal of the right to elect and be elected is very high, and so must be the degree of evidence required to dismiss that right. Therefore, the Committee approved the participation of the "United Arab List-Arab Democratic Party" in the elections.

492. In the framework of the television campaign for the 2006 general elections of the 17th Knesset, the Chairman of the Central Elections Committee, Justice Dorit Beinisch, decided to disqualify a broadcast of the "Shinui-the Center Party" in accordance with section 15(d) of the Elections Law (Propaganda) 5719-1959. The decision was approved by the Supreme Court on March 12, 2007, following a petition of the "Shinui - Liberal Party" against the disqualification of their television broadcast (HCJ 2194/06 The Shinui Party-the Centre Party v. the Chairman of the Central Elections Committee, Justice Dorit Beinisch). The contested broadcast showed ultra-orthodox Jews attached to the legs of, and crawling down the street behind, a secular Jew as he walked down the street on his way to vote. At the end of the segment, the ultra-orthodox Jews were seen evaporating as the secular Jew drops a ballot of Shinui into the ballot box.

493. On June 28, 2006, the Supreme Court delivered its reasons for rejecting the petition. It held that a broadcast in the framework of an election campaign is entitled to special protection since it is a political expression in a time of very important and significant exchanges of ideas and opinions. However, the Court went on to hold that this specific broadcast was an exceptional example, which caused damage to public emotions, humiliation, and degradation amounting to a severe infringement on the right to human dignity, and should therefore not be protected. The Court expressed its outrage at the broadcast which was reminiscent, in its view, of anti-semitic propaganda in which the ultra-orthodox Jew becomes a faceless person, a “non-human” who crawls on the floor and sticks to the secular person as if he was a leech.

Article 26. Equality before the law

494. Elimination of discrimination in the private sphere. Since the submission of Israel’s previous report, reference to the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places Law, 5761-2000 (the “Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places Law”) has grown. Some of the most noteworthy examples are as follows.

495. In the case of C.C 47045/05 Tokov Ariel v. Oltim Asakim Ltd. et. al. the petitioner and his friend had not been allowed to enter the “Partizan” night club on two separate occasions owing to subjective selection criteria for guests at the point of entry. The Court ruled that the “Partizan” night club should be considered as a public place, and that when balancing between the club owners’ liberty and right to property, and the value of equality, the latter should prevail despite private ownership of the business. The Court held that the respondents’ refusal to let the petitioner enter the club while others were allowed entry, effectively discriminated against him. The Court ruled that the respondent should pay 15,000 NIS in compensation to the petitioner based on the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry to Public Places Law.

496. In the case of C.C 12482/04 Mizrahi Yitzhak v. Kibbutz Ramot Menashe et. al. - the petitioner requested to enter the “Terminal” night club located in Kibbutz Ramot Menashe, but was denied entry even though concurrently others were allowed entry. The petitioner claimed that his entry was denied owing to the dark color of his skin, his race, and his ethnic origin. The Court held that the respondents’ behavior inflicted grave damage on the basic right of equality, and further damaged the moral standards that every enlightened society desires to institutionalize as part of its basic principles and the way of life of its citizens”. The Court held that the personal suffering of the petitioner and the damage to his dignity should not be overlooked and ruled that the respondent will pay 50,000 NIS in compensation in accordance with the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places Law. An appeal against the Magistrate Court’s ruling was completely denied by the Haifa District Court on January 7, 2008 (C. Appeal 003742/06 Kibbutz Ramot Menashe et al. v. Mizrahi Yitzhak).

497. In the case of Opening Motion 110/06 The Israel Watchtower Association Ltd. v. The International Convention Center-Haifa et al. it was noted that between the years 2000-2005, the respondent allowed the Jehovah’s Witness’s community in Israel to use the conference hall of the Haifa International Convention Centre for its conferences. As a result of opposition from certain religious Jewish groups in Haifa, and following an application of the city's Mayor, the respondent decided not to continue to allow the applicant to hold its conferences in the convention centre. The applicant requested the Court to grant an order prohibiting the respondent from discriminating against it based solely on religious considerations. In response, the respondent claimed that it was allowed to refuse the applicant's requests for use of its facilities since it was a "private body" and eligible to freedom of contract, based on business considerations.

498. In its decision, the Court held that the respondent was not a private body but a public one, and that its discrimination against the applicant was completely invalid and in contradiction of the principles of equality and equity. In addition, it contradicted the provisions of the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places Law. Therefore, the Court accepted the motion and granted an order prohibiting discrimination against the applicant.

499. In the case of C.C 5244/02 Bugle Natan et al. v. the Ministry of Education et al. it was found that on the relevant submission date of the petition, the education system applied an integration policy for pupils of Ethiopian origin, setting a maximal quota of 25 percent per school. The petitioners, a married couple whose son was born in Israel, wanted to register him at a specific school, but were denied and had to register him in a different school, as a consequence of the integration policy of that time. The petitioners claimed that the integration policy applied to pupils of Ethiopian origin only, regardless of the date of their arrival in Israel, lacked any relevant criteria and was based entirely on the Ethiopian origin of the pupil. Therefore, this discrimination harmed their right to equality and dignity, and contradicted the provisions of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, section 5 of the Pupil's Rights Law, and section 3 of the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places Law, 5761-2000.

500. In its decision, the Court held that the refusal to register the petitioners' son in school because of his ethnic origin when the registration was open to other ethnic groups living in the school's area did equal discrimination in the provision of a public service. The respondents violated the provisions of the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and in Entry to Public Places Law, and the petitioners were entitled to be remedied according to the Law. However, the Court held that in this case the petitioners' son had not suffered any personal damage, since his parents preferred not to share with him their pain and feelings concerning his discrimination. Therefore, no compensation was awarded.

Rights of people with disabilities

501. The Commission for Equal Rights of People with Disabilities. Since Israel's previous periodic report, the Commission for Equal Rights of People with Disabilities (hereinafter: "the Commission") was established, its powers were broadened and the number of its employees increased. The Commission, headed by a commissioner, includes three main units: Accessibility, Integration in Society and the Legal department. The Commission's work is aimed at promoting public policies regarding the rights of people with disabilities as well as providing assistance to individuals who encounter difficulties. Alongside the Commission operates a steering committee, composed mainly of people with different disabilities who represent the main organizations operating in the field.

502. Legislation. On February 23, 1998, the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law was enacted by the Knesset, establishing, for the first time, the statutory right to equality and human dignity of people with disabilities and creating a new system of obligations for the State of Israel vis-à-vis its disabled citizens. The Law was amended in 2004 so that the temporary provision of adequate representation of people with disabilities in the work force will apply for 12 years from the day that the Law entered in to force (7 years before the amendment).

503. In 2005 the Law was amended again, this time a new section was added - section E1 - Public Places and Public Services. This section incorporated many new and important elements into the main law, including: prohibition of discrimination in public services, in public places and products, accessibility of public places, accessibility to public services, restrictions on the statutory duty of accessibility and accessibility to education and higher education institutions and education services. This came in addition to the regulations regarding insurance contracts, road accessibility, accessibility to emergency services, accessibility to public transportation, state participation in financing adjustments, accessibility coordinators and authorized personal, authorities of the Commissioner, penalties, legal prosecution and other issues. The Law was amended again in 2007.

504. In 2005, the Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Suitability to Persons with Mental or Physical Disability) was issued. This is a precedential law which regulates methods adjusted to investigate people with mental or intellectual disabilities and also adjusted methods for their testimonies. The Law applies to all suspects, victims and witnesses, to specific offences enumerated in the Law (violence offences, sexual assaults and prostitution). The implementation of the Law on victims and witnesses will proceed gradually until the year 2010.

505. In December 2007, the Prohibition of Slander Law 5726 - 1965, was amended by the Israeli Knesset. According to the revised law, making a mockery of, or humiliating persons with disabilities because of said disability - whether it is a psychological, mental (including cognitive) or physical, permanent or temporary, shall be considered unlawful and prohibited slander.

506. In this context it should also be noted that as a signatory to the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, Israel is currently reviewing its legislation in this field, in order to assess which adjustment need to be made in its domestic law as part of the process of considering ratification.

Employment of people with disabilities

507. According to the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities, most adults with disabilities are of employment age, yet make up roughly one fifth of the total work force in the state of Israel. The rate of employment among persons with disabilities is lower than that of the rest of the population, especially among those with severe disabilities, contributing to increased levels of poverty and social exclusion. Furthermore, the rate of unemployment among the disabled population is very high, especially for persons with severe disabilities.

508. Recent data shows a moderate improvement in the rate of employment among persons with disabilities, especially among those with severe disabilities (36% in 2002, compared to 42% in 2005).

509. Employment of persons with disabilities by gender. Examination of the relative employment status of men and women with disabilities shows no significant difference between them. However, when comparing persons with disabilities to persons without disabilities there are differences among the genders. The rate of employment of women between the ages of 20-64 stands at about 80% of the rate of men.

510. The National Insurance Institute (NII) is in charge of payment of pensions to certain populations, as defined by law and regulation. The general disability pension is designed to act as minimum income to provide for daily existence for persons with disabilities.

511. The rate of unemployed persons with disabilities that do not receive any pension from the NII is substantial at 171,000 people. The majority of the people in this group do not live independently, instead they are residing with their family and not on their own, two-thirds are under the age of 50, and two-thirds are women. 40% of the people in this group are Arab and 60% are Jewish.

512. Assessments of income per capita show that the average income per capita in households where severely disabled persons live stands at 60% of that of households that do not contain disabled persons, and 70% of that of households in which moderately disabled persons live.

513. In two precedents given in 2006, the Tel Aviv and the Haifa Labor District Courts ruled that people with intellectual and/or mental disabilities, who work for private employers, are not to be regarded as “volunteers” but as “workers” entitled to employer-employee relationship and the applicability of all relevant labor laws. In both decisions, the employers were obligated to retroactively compensate the disabled and provide their inherent rights as employees. (L.C (Tel-Aviv) 10973/04 Goldstein v. Na’amat; L.C (Haifa) 3327/01 Roth v. Ram Buildings Ltd).

514. On July 10, 2005, the Nazareth District Labor Court ruled that the phrase “adjustment” as intended by section 8 to Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, is not limited to the physical adjustment of structures, equipment or accessories but could also mean “economical adjustment”, which the Court interpreted as adjusting the salary to the disability of the employee, according to the extent of his work. Thus, the employer is obligated to continue employing an employee who became disabled, while continuing to pay him the same salary, even if there is a decrease in the extent of this work due to the disability, unless the employer can prove that it imposes an unreasonable burden on his business (L.C (Nazareth) 1732/04 De Castro Dekel v. M.B.A Hazore’a).

515. In L.C 2968/01 Balilti v. Jerusalem Post Publications Ltd, the Jerusalem District Labor Court held that within the duty to ensure proper representation of people with disabilities according to section 9 of the Equal Rights for People with Disabilities Law, the employer should give priority to persons with disabilities when performing cutbacks (L.C 2968/01 Balilti v. Jerusalem Post Publications Ltd).

516. As discussed in Israel's previous periodic report, the Electricity Supply Law (Temporary Order) 5756-1996, was enacted to solve the problem of providing electricity to Arab and Druze citizens whose houses had been built without building permits, and were consequently not connected to the central electricity grid. This law was amended in 2001, extending the temporary supply for a period of 7 years. In 2004 the Law was amended again, so that the extension would cease as of May 31, 2007.

Land allocation

517. The Supreme Court ruling in H.C.J. 6698/95 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration (ILA) was discussed in Israel's previous periodic report. In response to that judgment, the ILA, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency for Israel, issued new admission criteria to be uniformly applied to all applicants seeking to move into small, communal settlements established on State-owned land. These criteria stipulate that the applicants must be over the age of 20, have applied as an individual or a couple (including families), maintain sufficient economic resources and maintain suitability for a small communal regime.

518. If the Committee rejects an application for admission, the reasons for rejection are to be based upon an objective, professional, and independent opinion. Any criterion for admission is to be assessed in advance by the Administration and publicized.

519. The decisions of the committee are subject to review by a Public Appeals Committee, which is to be chaired by a retired judge. Application forms, and rules of procedure of the Appeals Committee, are to be made available to the public.

520. Four years after the abovementioned ruling, ACRI submitted an additional petition on behalf of the Ka'adan family, claiming that state agencies had been preventing the family from purchasing land in contradiction to a previous Supreme Court ruling specifically prohibiting discrimination between Jews and Arabs in the distribution of land. As a result, the Director of the ILA informed the petitioners that the Ka'adan family could purchase a plot of land, and build their home in the Katzir communal settlement at the April 1995 market rate, being the date the family first requested to purchase land.

521. On April 26, 2006, the Supreme Court additionally made the ILA pay the petitioner's court expenses which amounted to 30,000 NIS (H.C.J 8060/03 Ka'adan v. The Israel Lands Administration, the Jewish Agency, Katzir Cooperative Society and Katzir Community).

Appropriate representation

522. The Civil Service. As mentioned in Israel's previous periodic report, minorities and underrepresented populations such as women, the disabled, and the Arab, Druze and Circassian population shall be represented according to their proportion in the eligible work force population under the Civil Service (Appointments) (Amendment No. 11) (Proper Representation) Law, 5760-2000. The civil service must maintain appropriate representation regarding appointments of minority groups, as well as in the distribution of professional ranks with regard to specific circumstances.

523. As of December 2007, 6.1% of employees in the civil service were Arabs, Druze and Circassians.

524. On August 1, 2005, section 15a of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law was amended and persons of Ethiopian origin were added to the list of groups entitled to appropriate representation in the eligible work force population. Following this amendment, the Government accepted Resolution 1665 concerning allocation of positions for persons of Ethiopian origin in the Civil Service and giving them priority in appointments and promotion.

525. On March 12, 2006, the Government decided, based on section 15a of the Civil Service (Appointments) Law, to designate 337 employment positions promoting the integration of the Arab population, including Druze and Circassian minorities, in the Civil Service between the years 2006-2008. In addition, the Government decided to establish an Inter-Ministry Team for Examination of other Ways for Advancing Appropriate Representation of Arabs in the Civil Service. On July 16, 2006, the Inter-Ministry Team submitted its recommendations.

526. On August 31, 2006, the Government adopted Resolution 414 adopting most of the Inter-Ministry Team's recommendations, including: determination of new objectives for advancing appropriate representation of Arabs in the Civil Service: Arabs shall constitute 8% of all Civil Service workers by the end of 2008, and 10% by the end of 2010. In addition, 20% of all new positions shall be allocated for Arabs until the end of 2008; consolidation of annual work plans on this issue shall take place in each ministry; more positions for the Arab population shall be designated; the duty to give priority to Arabs in appointments and promotion shall be extended by another 4 years; a supervisor on the advancement of Arab representation in each Government Ministry shall be appointed and an Inter-Ministry Team to follow-up on the implementation of the Resolution shall be established.

527. On November 11, 2007, the Government adopted Resolution 2579 amending the previous Resolution 414 concerning the proper representation of persons from the Arab sector within the Civil Service. According to the new Resolution, Arabs, including Druze and Circassians, are to consist of 12% of all Civil Service workers by the end of the year 2012. In addition, all Government Ministries must consolidate a five-year working plan for advancement of the object of the resolution, for example; until the end of 2012, 30% of all new positions shall be allocated for Arabs; there shall be a duty to prioritize to Arabs for appointments and promotions until the end of 2012; more positions in Government ministries shall be designated for Arabs subject to the implementation of the five-year work plans and an Inter-Ministry Team headed by the Director General of the Ministry of Justice shall be established to follow-up on the implementation of the provisions mentioned above by every Government ministry.

528. Government corporations. As mentioned in our previous periodic report, under an amendment to the Government Corporations (Amendment 11) Law 5735-1975 made on June 11, 2000, the Arab population (namely, Israeli citizens of Arab, Druze and Circassian origin), must be appropriately represented on the board of directors of every Government Corporation. According to data gathered in December 2007, 51 out of 528 directors, (9.66%), were of Arab origin, including Druze and Circassian. A new legislative process is currently taking place aimed at strengthening appropriate representation of workers from different sectors among the different Government Corporations', i.e.: women, persons with disabilities, Arabs, Druze, Circassian and Ethiopian origin.

529. On June 27, 2007, the Jerusalem District Court determined that an Arab citizen could not be disqualified from being appointed to the board of directors of Keren Kayemeth Le'Israel (KKL) - the Jewish National Fund, which is a dual entity committed to the principle of equality (OP 5299/06 Uri Bank v. Keren Kayemeth Le'Israel KKL). The petitioners requested the Court to annul the election of new directors to KKL which had taken place on July 13, 2006, due to fundamental deficiencies in the process, and the election of Mr. Radi Sfori, an Israeli Arab elected as a representative of the Meretz Party.

530. The Court discussed whether the procedure of appointing new directors to KKL was in line with the Companies Law 5759-1999, and whether an Israeli Arab could be appointed as director of a corporation defined as being "trustee of the Jewish people in the land of Israel". The Court stated that the appointment procedure was not deficient, and refused to annul the elections. It held that former court decisions acknowledged the duty of every authority in Israel to treat equally all different individuals in the State. Although KKL is a private company - it shall apply the principle of equality since it is a dual entity. Therefore, an Arab director shall not be disqualified, nor will be a party with an Arab candidate.

Equal treatment of Arab cooperative societies

531. All Israeli NGOs are treated equally without preference to NGOs in specific sectors. In 2007, The Registrar of Cooperative Societies published on its internet web site a document in Arabic entitled the "The Proper Administration of Cooperative Societies" which is a translation of a document in Hebrew first issued in October 2002. In addition, the Registrar of Cooperative Societies employs a lawyer from the Arab sector who treats applications in Arabic, a contractor lawyer who is fluent in Arabic and is involved particularly in registration, and another two accountants from the Arab sector who examine NGOs' files. The Registrar and its representatives took part in a number of conferences organized by representatives of the Arab sector in which the participants attended lectures concerning the different requirements of the Registrar of Cooperative Societies.

Sexual orientation

532. On November 21, 2006, the Supreme Court handed down a landmark decision concerning the rights of same sex couples. It held that a wedding certificate from a foreign country in which same-sex marriages are recognized, could allow the couple to be registered as married by the Ministry of the Interior. Five gay couples who held wedding ceremonies abroad petitioned to the Supreme Court following the Ministry of the Interior's refusal to register them as married: (HCJ 3045/05 Ben-Ari v. The Ministry of the Interior, HCJ 3046/05 Bar-Lev v. The Ministry of the Interior, HCJ 10218/05 Herland v. The Ministry of the Interior, HCJ 10468/05 Lord v. The Ministry of the Interior and HCJ 10597/05 Remez v. The Ministry of the Interior).

533. The Supreme Court based its decision on a previous Supreme Court ruling (HCJ 143/62 Fonk Shlezinger v. The Minister of the Interior) in which a distinction was made between the duty to register marriages, and the question of recognition of their status. The Supreme Court determined that the Ministry of the Interior must not discriminate against same-sex couples who hold a wedding certificate from a foreign country that permits same-sex marriages. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court notes that by doing so, it does not grant a new status to same-sex marriages, and reiterated that it is the role of the Knesset to endow as much.

534. On April 19, 2007, The Haifa Labor District Court accepted a claim against the “Mivtachim” pension fund, and determined that a surviving partner of a lesbian relationship was eligible to the legal rights of an “insured widow”, and not of an “insured widower” (D.L.C 1758/06 Moyal-Lefler v. Mivtachim). Following this decision, the plaintiff is to be paid a survivors’ pension of 40% as opposed to only 20%.

535. The Court concluded that in this instance, the plaintiff was the deceased’s spouse, and was publicly recognized as her cohabitor. Therefore, she was eligible to a survivors’ pension, according to the rules of the pension fund. The Court stated that “the distinction between men and women in the rules of the respondent and the Social Security Law derives from a similar rationale - a reflection of the economic situation in which we live, where women’s incomes are lower than men’s, and their promotion in the labor market is more difficult. Therefore there is a justification for the preference of female widows as it narrows the existing gap between men and women”.

536. The Court held that the plaintiff should be classified as a female widow, and not as a male widower. She was therefore eligible for the rights of an “insured widow”, and the pension as stated in the rules of the pension fund.

537. In a significant decision dated January 2005, the Supreme Court accepted the appeal of two women, a same-sex couple, to adopt each other’s children. The Court ruled that under the Children Adoption Law, 5741-1981, each case should be examined on its own merits and all the relevant circumstances need to be taken into consideration. The Court emphasized that the decision solely concerns this couple and is not a principled one, thus leaving the question of same-sex relationships for a later date. The Court recommended that the Knesset amend the law to provide a solution to a real problem, and attempt to bypass ideological controversial problems that the issue presents. (C.A. 10280/01 Yaros-Hakak v. The Attorney General (10.01.05)).

538. In a recent decision, dated January 23, 2005, the Attorney General established a new precedent in which the State is willing to grant legal status to same-sex adoptions of the birth-child or adopted child of the other spouse. Furthermore, it states that the State is willing to allow the adoption of a non-biological child by same-sex couples, while considering the best interest of the child. This position regards the legal aspects of same-sex adoptions, however the decision regarding a specific case shall remain in the hands of the relevant social service.

539. Equality in social security. Since the submission of our previous periodic report, the National Insurance Institute (NII) has implemented a number of positive changes in pursuit of greater equality of social security services for residents in need of them.

540. Over the years, amendments are also continually being made to correct distortions as they become evident in the system. A gradual erosion of traditional, historical perceptions distinguishing “housewives” from other women, has seen the former becoming increasingly eligible for old-age benefits, survivors’ benefits and disability insurance. In 2004, also in the area of disability insurance, the determining date for disabled housewives was equalized with that of a regular disabled person, and in the maternity branch, maternity allowances for fathers were equalized with that of mothers. Further 2005 amendments also saw kibbutz members included in the categories of persons eligible for survivors’ pensions when widowed.

541. In 2006, changes to legislation widened the definition of “new immigrant”, which has effectively further expanded on the list of persons eligible for benefits. Prior to these alterations persons were only eligible for some benefits if they had immigrated to Israel under the Law of Return. Now, other categories of persons, with visas for temporary or permanent residence, are also eligible to apply for benefits such as long term care insurance and disability insurance.

542. Amendments to the Integration of welfare Recipients to the Work Force (Temporary Provisions) Law, 5764-2004 have also relaxed the conditions entitling persons with special needs to income support benefits. The occupation center now has the discretion to pay benefits to persons they believe cannot participate fully in the program, even though they do not fall within a specified category of persons entitled to the benefit. Furthermore, more leniency with regards to the amount of hours one must work a week to retain the benefit has been given to persons approaching the age of retirement and disabled persons. In some areas, however, eligibility requirements were made more stringent. Persons suffering a temporary disability, for example, must now have a disability degree of 9% or over (previously 5%), to qualify for the benefit - however such individuals may still qualify at the discretion of the occupation centre.

543. In illustration of other attempts to make NII services more equally available, the NII may now initiate claims on behalf of certain persons who are entitled to benefits. Eligible widows, for example, will automatically begin to receive survivor's pensions without the need for application to the centre. Similarly, persons bereaved as a result of hostile actions, and self-employed women entitled to a maternity allowance, will be sent the appropriate claims forms without requiring them to initiate a dialogue with the NII themselves.

544. In addition, the NII website has been made available in English, as well as in Hebrew, to make information on rates of benefits and rules of entitlement etc. more widely available.

The Bedouin population

545. General. There are more than 170,000 Bedouins living in the Negev desert area. Most of those live in urban and suburban centers which have been legally planned and constructed. All existing towns have approved plans and include infrastructure such as schools, clinics, running water, electricity, etc.

546. There are 6 existing suburban Bedouin towns in the Negev: Laqiya, Hura, Kseife, Arara in the Negev, Tel-Sheva and Segev Shalom, in addition to the city of Rahat. Although the seven existing towns can effectively provide a proper solution to the Bedouin population's needs, subject to their expansion, the Government decided that from 1999 another 9 new towns for Bedouins should be established. The Government did so in an attempt to please the Bedouin population and in consideration of their special needs, including their desire to settle according to a tribal format.

547. As such there are nine planned new towns. Of those Tarabin is now being populated and 100 new houses have been built, Abu Krinat and Bir Hadaj are under construction, and Kasar A-Sir, Marit (Makhol), Darjat, Um Batin, Mulada and El Seid are all undergoing planning procedures. A further three towns are undergoing statutory approval procedures: Ovdad, Abu Tlul, and El-Foraa. A regional council was founded for five of the new towns. It is called "Abu Basma", and was officially declared on February 3, 2004.

548. Moreover, in two different resolutions decided in 2003 (April and September), the Government created a comprehensive plan for the Bedouin sector, including investments of 1.1 billion NIS in the improvement of infrastructure, and founding public institutions over the next 6 years.

549. Following lessons learned from past planning committees, the planning authorities performed this task in constant consultation with Bedouin representatives who provided input as to their vision of every towns' desired character depending on such characteristics as whether the town is built for an agrarian population with a special needs for designated flock areas; whether the town is planned for a group who require that strict separation is maintained between the various tribes or whether the town is designed for a population that has a more urban character.

550. On July 15, 2007, the Government adopted the following resolution concerning the establishment of a new Authority in the Ministry of Construction and Housing dealing entirely with development in the Bedouin Sector, including the expansion of towns, and provision of housing solutions for all Bedouins. Its text is as follows:

“D. The Government decided to establish, in the Ministry of Construction and Housing, the Authority for the Regulation of the Bedouin Residence in the Negev, whose purpose, functions and organizational structure are as follows:

- The care of Bedouin residence in the Negev, including:
 - Ascertaining claims of ownership over the land
 - Arranging permanent residences, including infrastructure and public services, both in existing towns and new towns
 - Aid in incorporation in employment
 - Coordination of education, welfare and community services
- The functions of the authority and its main powers:
 1. Accumulating information concerning the existing situation of the population, whether scattered or located in existing towns, including claims of ownership;
 2. Initiation and execution of land arrangements;
 3. Initiation of statutory planning, in coordination with the Planning Administration in the Ministry of the Interior, of suitable residence solutions, including solutions that address the characteristics of the group, social reciprocity, possible locations, etc.;
 4. Promoting the planning and development of local and regional infrastructures for permanent solutions;
 5. Accompanying the population through all the stages of residence;
 6. Giving recommendations on the issue of enforcement priorities;

7. Coordination and synchronization between the various authorities, while accompanying, tracking and supervising the execution of decisions made by authorities.
 8. The aforementioned functions of the Authority will not detract from the powers of the various Government Ministries, or the powers of the local authorities according to the law.
- The proposed organizational structure of the Authority is designed to enable the efficient execution of all its goals and functions, as follows:
 1. The Authority will act within the framework of the Ministry of Construction and Housing.
 2. Alongside the Authority, an Inter-Ministerial steering committee will be established; whose function will be to discuss the obstructions in the way of arranging the residence and implementing the goals of the Authority. At the head of the steering committee will be the General Director of the Ministry of Construction and Housing.
 3. A council will be appointed to the Authority, whose functions will be to lay out the Authority's line of action and advise the General Manager of the Authority in all that regards the execution of the Authority's policy. The council will be composed of 21 members, among them: 14 relevant Government representatives, (Construction and Housing - chairman, Finance, Justice, Education, the Interior, Industry, Trade and Labor, Health, Social Affairs and Social Services, Tourism, the Negev, the Galilee, Public Security, Agriculture and Rural Development, Environmental Protection and Transportation and Road Safety), and 7 public representatives who will be appointed by the Minister of Construction and Housing. Of the 7 public representatives, 4 will be from the Negev Bedouin and will have no ownership claims to the land.
 4. The operational responsibility of the Authority will be in the hands of the Authority's General Manager. Underneath him will operate various sections, whose areas of occupation will be, inter alia, land transactions; programs and residence; planning, development and construction; community; legal counseling; finances and logistics and research, propaganda and documentation. The land transaction section will be subject, statutorily, to the authority of the Israel Land Administration.
 5. A concessions and proceeds committee will act, alongside the General Manager of the Authority. The Committee will be headed by a retired judge, and its function will be to make recommendations concerning agreements brought before it, on the basis of the standards set out in the law. The recommendations of the committee will be submitted for approval by the Authority's general manager."

551. The Government has further decided:

(1) To request the General Director of the Ministry of Construction and Housing to make recommendations to the Government, within 30 days, and in coordination with the General Director of the Prime Minister's Office and the Supervisor of Budgets in the Ministry of Finance and the Civil Service Commissioner, on the kind of budgetary resources and personnel that are required to finance and otherwise execute this decision.

(2) To entrust the Minister of Construction and Housing with the appointment of a public committee headed by a retired Supreme Court Justice, and of whose members at least half will be representatives of the relevant Government Ministries, including representatives of the Ministries of Construction and Housing, Finance, the Prime Minister, Agriculture and Rural Development, the Negev and the Galilee, the Interior, Justice, the Transportation and Road Safety, and the Israel Land Administration. In addition to this the Minister will appoint public representatives, among them representatives of the Bedouin sector that have no ownership claims to land. The committee will submit its recommendations to the Minister in order to draft a bill concerning the regulation of the Bedouin sector in the Negev, including the sum of the reparations required, arrangements for allocating alternative land, civil enforcement and a schedule of the execution of arrangements. The committee will submit its recommendations within three months. The committee will act under the framework of a budget and land inventory which it will determine in coordination with the General Director of the Prime Minister's Office, the General Director of the Ministry of Construction and Housing and the Supervisor of Budgets in the Ministry of Finance, within 30 days.

552. Within the framework of Government policy regarding Bedouin residence and land in the Negev, and as an important step integrating other Government plans for the development of the Negev and the Galilee, the Government has promoted various resolutions enhancing the treatment of the Bedouin population in the Negev. Nonetheless, owing to the complexity of designing solutions for various issues, and the prolongation of the treatment in the availability of the land in the area of permanent towns, which are designed to receive the diaspora populations, there is a need to coordinate the totality of the plans within the organized framework of an authority, which will deal with the issues in a coordinated and expansive manner.

553. In spite of the establishment of a number of permanent towns for the Bedouins, about 70,000 Bedouins still choose to live in illegal clusters of buildings throughout the Negev, ignoring the planning procedure of the planning authorities in Israel. This illegal building is carried out without any preparation of plans as required by the Planning and Building Law, 5725-1965, and with no pre-approval by the planning authorities. In addition, it causes many difficulties in terms of providing services to the residents of these illegal villages.

554. Note that a solution to the housing problem of the greater part of the Bedouins living in the illegal villages will be solved subsequent to the completion of these new towns.

555. The Government is encouraging movement to permanent towns by providing unique financial benefits to all the residents of the Bedouin diaspora who seek to move to permanent towns, regardless of their economic condition or any entitlement test. These benefits include, inter alia, provision of land plots for free or for very low cost, and compensation for demolition of illegal structures.

556. The Advisory Committee on the Policy regarding Bedouin settlements has been established, in its present form, on October 24th, 2007 by force of Israeli Government Resolution No. 2491.

557. The Committee's task, as set forth by the Government in its aforementioned Resolution, is to present recommendations regarding a comprehensive, feasible and broad-spectrum plan which will establish the norms for regulating Bedouin settlement in the Negev, including rules for compensation, mechanisms for allotment of land, civil enforcement, a timetable for the plan's execution, and proposed legislation's amendments, where needed.

558. The Committee comprises seven members and one Chairperson, former Supreme Court Justice Mr. E. Goldberg. Note that two of the Committee members are representatives of the Bedouin sector.

559. The Committee began its sessions on January 2008, after having received over a hundred letters from the public, together with numerous other written material and documentation. The Committee's hearings are public and take place in Beer Sheva.

560. From the commencement of its activity, the Committee has held tens of sessions and has heard many depositions from various sources, including Bedouin representatives, various stakeholders, experts in the relevant fields (inter alia town planners, geographers, anthropologists, historians, sociologists and lawyers), and the general public. The Committee has also heard representatives of public bodies and institutions, including Municipal Authorities, public figures, Knesset members, and NGOs.

561. The Committee has, to date, held four field study trips in the Negev region in order to further deepen its knowledge on the subjects within its mandate.

562. The Committee is expected to give in its final recommendations to the Government within the next few months.

563. Infrastructure. All Bedouin towns have connections to running water. Five of the nine future Bedouin towns were connected to the water grid through the national water company (MEKOROT). The establishment of a sewage system is performed under the authority of the local government and the minority localities, who receive loans for this purpose.

564. Communities living in illegal villages can connect themselves to the water supply through the Water Connections Allocation Committee, which has been operating under the Administration for the Promotion of Bedouins since 1997.

565. Medical care and infrastructure. Clinics in illegal Bedouin villages located throughout the Negev are all computerized, air conditioned, and are all equipped according to the standards upheld by all the Health Funds in the country. Mother and Child stations are equipped in the same manner as any other Mother and Child station in the country.

566. The General Health Services Department operates a special health service for the Bedouin population which includes an ambulance service for Bedouin that is run by a Bedouin employee. The purpose of the ambulance is to ensure constant access between the hospital and community.

This enables a hospice with a talented professional staff to evaluate the living conditions of patients due prior to their release from hospitalization. Additionally, the ambulance transports patients' to the hospital and back when they are in need of emergency care. The cost of a visit to the clinic is identical throughout the country. That is, a visit will generally be cost free.

567. In addition to the existing station, the eighteen Mother and Child Health Clinics located in Bedouin towns, and a mobile family care unit, six new Mother and Child Health Clinics (Tipat Halav), have recently been constructed in the illegal villages. These Mother and Child Clinics are equipped like every other Mother and Child Clinic in the country.

568. Furthermore, in addition to the thirty-two Health Fund medical clinics already existing in the Bedouin towns, 9 Health Fund medical clinics (Kupat Holim), have been built to provide for the medical needs of Bedouin living in illegal villages. These clinics are all computerized, and air conditioned, and they are all equipped according to the standards that exist in all other Health Funds in the country.

569. There have been other major improvements in the past decade. Improved immunization coverage of Bedouin infants in the Negev, for example, resulted in a significant decrease in vaccine-preventable infectious diseases, recent 2006 figures indicate that 90%-95% of the Bedouin children have completed all necessary vaccinations by age three - a sizeable improvement compared to a rate of 27% in 1981. Two mobile immunization teams managed by the Ministry of Health also provide home immunizations to infants in Bedouin families living outside of permanent towns, whose families do not bring them to one of the Mother and Child Health Clinics for treatment. A computerized tracking system allows the Ministry of Health to identify infants who are behind on their immunization schedule and to send one of the mobile immunization teams to immunize them.

570. There has also been an important improvement in the growth of Bedouin infants and toddlers over the past two decades, indicating improved nutrition. Moreover, there has been increased compliance with recommendations for supplemental folic acid among Bedouin women in their fertile years, and a decrease in the incidence of open neural tube defects (NTD's) among Bedouin fetuses and infants. Unfortunately there are still high rates of congenital malformations and inherited diseases among Bedouin infants, due to multiple factors including the tradition of first-cousin marriages, as well as cultural-religious-social barriers to pre-marital and pre-natal screening for inherited diseases.

571. The infant mortality rate of Bedouin infants in 2005 was 15:1000, representing a decline from the rate in 2004. It should be noted that the infant mortality rate among Bedouin infants living in illegal villages was actually lower than that among Bedouin infants living in established towns. The Government is continuing to open Maternal and Child Health clinics in illegal villages and new MCH centers are being built to serve the population.

572. Furthermore, the Government has been funding several special projects to improve the health and expand the health-care services provided to Bedouin living in illegal villages. One of these programs is a special long-term intervention program to decrease infant mortality among the Bedouin. The program is community-based and boasts a wide-consortium of participants, including representatives from the Bedouin community leadership and the educational system, along with providers of curative and preventative health care services, the Department of Health in the Community and the Department of Epidemiology of the Faculty of Health Sciences of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

573. Free genetic testing is also funded by the Government, along with genetic counseling, for any member of a tribe in which the prevalence of a serious inherited disease for which an available genetic test is above 1:1000.

574. The Government also participates in an intervention program to decrease the rate of home accidents among Bedouin children, and has funded the building of additional MCH clinics for Bedouin currently living in illegal villages (additional clinics are being built by the main HMO serving the Bedouin - Kupat Holim Clalit).

575. There has been a decline in the incidence of infectious disease among Bedouin infants over the past decades. There is, however, generally a higher rate of infectious disease among Bedouin infants than among Jewish infants of the same age. Bedouin infants and children have lower rates of pertussis, tuberculosis and HIV infection. Furthermore, due to high immunization coverage among Bedouin infants, indicating good access and utilization of preventive health care services, there have been no cases of measles since 1994 and no cases of polimyelitis, diphtheria, congenital rubella, neonatal tetanus or tetanus in Bedouin children of the Negev since 1990. During the period of 2000-2003, no cases of mumps were reported. Additionally only one or two cases of Homophiles influenza invasive disease in 2000-2002, and none in 2003.

576. Specialty physician services are being provided to the Bedouin community in the Negev, including: Pediatrics, General Internal Medicine, Neurology, Family Medicine, Dermatology, Gynecology and Obstetrics, Ear, Nose and Throat, Ophthalmology, Orthopedics, Gastroenterology, Cardiology, Surgery and Trauma, Pediatric Surgery and Pediatric Pulmonary Medicine. In addition, every resident has equal access to all the specialty clinics at the Soroka University Medical Center, with no discrimination between Bedouin or Jewish patients.

577. The Government, as well as the main HMO serving the Bedouin population, undertakes major efforts to train and recruit Bedouin physicians and nurses. The Government provided all the funding required for three classes of Bedouin students to complete their training as registered nurses, including funding their transportation to the nursing school, a meal allowance during their studies, and special remedial lessons to assist those who needed it. The Government has similarly provided special funding to hire Arab physicians and nurses.

578. A course for qualified Bedouin nurses opened in 1994. Since then, 34 students have graduated from the nursing course, whilst 32 are currently undertaking studies. It should be noted that students participating in the third course are committed to serving their first three years of practice after graduation wherever the Ministry of Health decides their services are needed. This will guarantee that the trained nurses serve the target population, the Bedouins. In addition, the first female Bedouin physician in Israel, Rania al-Oqbi, has recently completed her degree. She was part of the special "Cultivating Medicine in the Desert" program aimed at incorporating more Bedouin into the health sector. Currently, six Bedouin women are studying medicine; 35 Bedouin women have completed degrees in various health professions; and 45 additional women are studying health sciences.

579. Education. In recent years increased participation of Arab and Bedouin women in the work force has created a need for daycare centers and nurseries. The Government has moved to meet those needs. As a matter of Policy, the Ministry of Construction and Housing works on the construction of daycare centers throughout the country on the basis of one daycare for every 1,600 house units. Two centers have been recently built by the Government in the Bedouin town of Rahat.

580. Public transportation. On July 19, 2007, the Ministry of Transport and Road Safety published a tender (14/2007) for the operation of 10 lines of public bus transportation to serve more than 60,000 residents in the region of the Bedouin town Rahat. The tender was published in the framework of the Ministry's plan to expand public transportation services in non-Jewish towns to equalize them with those in Jewish towns. Bedouin towns currently lack an organized system of public transportation.

581. According to the tender, 4 city lines will operate in Rahat, and another 4 inter-city lines will connect Rahat with the City of Beer-Sheva and the new train station recently opened in Lehavim. Another 2 lines will connect the towns of Hura and Laqiya with the Bedouin market in Rahat. The plans for the new lines were carried out following surveys conducted which determined the needs of local residents. Local residents also participated in special workshops on the issue.

582. The winning company will be obliged to sell reduced tickets to youths, the elderly and other eligible persons such as students, in a similar arrangement to that made in the Jewish sector. The company will also be obliged to issue a monthly ticket allowing unlimited travel on all bus lines in the Beer-Sheva Metropolis. In addition, the winning company will be obliged to use new buses, and keep high standards of service. The new bus lines are expected to begin operating in 2008.

583. Social services. In May 2004, the Center for the Welfare of the Bedouin Family was established in Beer Sheva by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. The Center has two main goals:

583.1. To provide assistance to the Bedouin community in matters related to conflict and tension resolution in the family, as well as to provide therapeutic interventions.

583.2. A center for the prevention of, and education on, domestic violence. The center is financed and supervised by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services and is operated by the Bedouin association of "Elwaha" which is manned by specialized social workers. The center provides many services unique to the needs of the population. For example assistance is given in locating Bedouin families willing to take in female Bedouin victims of violence, allowing those women to remain within the Bedouin community whilst protecting them from further violence. These women stay in the foster family is financed by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services. Following its establishment, the center has become an integral part of the community, and an essential tool at the disposal of the courts which may refer battering men to be treated in the center.

584. Social Services operate in the Bedouin towns, as well as in illegal Bedouin villages. There are around 30 monthly appeals to social services from Bedouin women. Each receives individual care. There are also several Bedouin couples undergoing couple therapy. Note that the operation of the abovementioned center has improved the treatment of domestic violence in the Bedouin sector, enabling matter-of-fact, focused and efficient care to be provided, free from community and family pressures.

585. The Service for Girls and Young Women handles about 250 Bedouin young women annually, providing both individual and group treatment.

585.1. Rahat - Approximately 40 young Bedouin women treated individually. The service runs an "Open House", attended by approximately 80 young Bedouin women, five days a week. The Service offers courses on home-economics, handicrafts, nutrition etc. Female students from the Bedouin "Al-jik" association run an intergenerational workshop on mother-daughter relations, as well as conducting tours and summer activities.

585.2. Segev Shalom - Approximately 75 young women treated individually. The service runs a young women's group, (currently consisting of 12 members), who discuss issues such as adolescence, empowerment, polygamy, women's rights, changes in the Bedouin society, and the resultant ramifications on women's status.

585.3. Kseife, Tel Sheva and Lakia - Approximately 50 young women treated individually.

586. Employment. In order to complement the revised Encouragement of Capital Investments Law) 5719-1959 the Government decided to establish an additional program to increase employment in the remote areas of Israel and other areas of high unemployment. Eligibility requires that the participating companies employ a minimum number of workers at a minimum wage. Among the areas affected are the "Furthest Periphery", and designated towns of minority populations, (such as Arab, Druze, Circassians), as well as the Ultra-Orthodox Jewish population.

587. The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labour is aware of the inherent difficulties faced by entrepreneurs from the Bedouin sector, such as limited financial capability, and is therefore taking affirmative action to bridge the gaps. In addition to the current centers, the Authority for Small Business is currently working to establish a designated Center for Nurturing Entrepreneurship in the Arab and Bedouin sectors, which will be better equipped to serve this sector's needs.

588. Furthermore, the Encouragement of Capital Investments Order (Development Areas) 2002, was amended in order to strengthen the Bedouins position by including several Bedouin towns in the updated list of industrial areas.

589. There are currently seventeen planned industrial areas in the Southern district, three (17%), of which are in the Bedouin towns - Rahat, Segev Shalom and Hura. Additionally, two new industrial areas currently in advanced stages of planning also service the Bedouin population -

Shoket (for Hura, Lokia, Meitar and Bney Shimon), and Lehavim, (for Rahat, Lehavim and Bney Shimon). Development of all these areas is uniform and subject to the same general criteria.

The Druze and Circassian sectors

590. On August 30, 2006, the Government of Israel adopted Resolution Number 412 for the development of the Druze and Circassian sectors in the amount of 447 million NIS for the years 2006-2009. Preparation of the plan took several months and involved participation from the relevant Government Ministries and the heads of the Druze and Circassian municipalities. This plan continues on from the two previous multi-year plans adopted by the Government, as detailed in the following table.

Table 32

591. The new development plan for the years 2006-2009 focuses on three main issues: Investment in human resources including a special focus on the empowerment of women (188 millions NIS), economic development (190 million NIS), and employment - including tourism development as a source of income (70 million NIS). The budget sources of the plan come from the relevant Government Ministries (237 million NIS) and a special budget of the Prime-Minister's Office directed to the non-Jewish sector (210.6 million NIS).

592. It should be pointed out that Government Resolution 412 is supplement to the development budgets that the Ministry of the Interior allocates to the local municipalities, nor the subsidies given to retired soldiers in order to purchase land plots. In addition, The Druze Sector enjoys segments of the budget set aside for the rehabilitation of northern Israel, adopted after the second Lebanon war.

593. The plan for development of the Druze-Circassian sector is intended to engage with specific topics considered capable of bringing a real and positive change to the quality of life of Druze and Circassian citizens. The desired change is eventually supposed to beneficially influence the atmosphere in the villages, and ease the burden imposed on municipalities. For example: promoting and developing tourism will create new jobs, and will increase the municipalities' income from taxes imposed on trade areas and businesses. In addition, the massive investment in education will result, according to the shared vision of the Prime Minister's Office and the heads of the municipalities, in a growing number of educated persons who will attend universities and acquire academic education, and will eventually become "the engine that will carry the others".

Article 27. Rights of minorities to culture, religion and language

594. Minority populations. As of 2007 the total population of Israel is numbered approximately 7,150,000, of which over 5.4 million are Jews (76% of the total population), and 1.4 million are Arabs (mostly Muslims, with some Christians and Druze, who comprise about 20% of the total population). There are 310,000 non-Jewish immigrants who comprise 4% of the total population. The following table shows the growth of the major population groups, (Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Druze) between the years 2003-2006.

Status of the Arabic language

595. In HCJ 4112/99, Adalah - The Legal Center for Rights of the Arab Minority v. The City of Tel-Aviv, Jaffa (25.7.02), retired chief Justice Barak stated that: “Indeed language plays a major role in human existence for both the individual, and for society. Using language we express ourselves, our individuality and our social identity. Take away a person’s language and you have taken away his essence. [...] it is therefore my conclusion for the matter at hand, that the proper balance between the two competing purposes leads to the conclusion that on intercity road signs in the respondent cities, there should also be added, alongside the Hebrew writing, directions in Arabic.”

596. In 2006, a tender for the establishment of an academy of the Arabic language was issued to the Knesset. In the first meeting held by the Knesset Education, Culture and Sports Committee on the matter, Dr. Mohammed Ganaim from the Tel-avid University acknowledged that in order to give proper expression to the Arabic language as a formal language of the State of Israel, an academy of the Arabic language was necessary. He added that academic institutions in Israel would benefit from the establishment of this academy, and that the new institution would improve Arabic education and the teaching of the Arabic language in Israel.

Human Rights Committee

Ninety-ninth session

Geneva, 12–30 July 2010

Consideration of reports submitted by States parties under article 40 of the Covenant

Concluding observations of the Human Rights Committee

Israel

1. The Human Rights Committee considered the third periodic report of Israel (CCPR/C/ISR/3) at its 2717th, 2718th and 2719th meetings, held on 13 and 14 July 2010 (CCPR/C/SR.2717, 2718 and 2719). At its 2740th meeting, held on 29 July 2010 (CCPR/C/SR.2740), it adopted the following concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee notes the submission of the State party's third periodic report, which provides detailed information on measures adopted by the State party to further the implementation of the Covenant. While also noting the written replies to the list of issues (CCPR/C/ISR/Q/3/Add.1), it regrets their late submission. It also regrets the absence of disaggregated data and of any substantive answer to questions 3, 11, 12, 16, 18, 19, 20, 24 and 28. The Committee appreciates the dialogue with the delegation, the answers provided orally during the consideration of the report and the additional written submissions.

3. The Committee notes and recognizes Israel's security concerns in the context of the present conflict. At the same time, it stresses the need to observe and guarantee human rights, in accordance with the provisions of the Covenant.

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the following legislative and other measures, as well as ratifications of international human rights treaties:

- (a) Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Adaptation to Persons with Mental or Psychological Disability) 5765-2005 (the "Investigation and Testimony Procedures Law (Adaptation to Persons with Mental or Psychological Disability)");

- (b) Anti Trafficking Law (Legislative Amendments) 5766-2006, (the “Anti Trafficking Law”);
- (c) Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments) 5768-2007, which imposes the duty to systematically examine the gender implications of any primary and secondary legislation before it is enacted by the Knesset;
- (d) The Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography (2008);
- (e) The Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict (2005).

C. Principal subjects of concern and recommendations

5. The Committee reiterates its view, previously noted in paragraph 11 of its concluding observations on the State party’s second periodic report (CCPR/CO/78/ISR) and paragraph 10 of its concluding observations on the State party’s initial report (CCPR/C/79/Add.93), that the applicability of the regime of international humanitarian law during an armed conflict, as well as in a situation of occupation, does not preclude the application of the Covenant, except by operation of article 4, whereby certain provisions may be derogated from in time of public emergency. The Committee’s position has been endorsed, unanimously, by the International Court of Justice in its Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 2004, p. 136), according to which the Covenant is applicable in respect of acts done by a State in exercise of its jurisdiction outside its own territory. Furthermore, the applicability of the regime of international humanitarian law does not preclude accountability of States parties under article 2, paragraph 1, of the Covenant for the actions of their authorities or agents outside their own territories, including in occupied territories. The Committee therefore reiterates and underscores that, contrary to the State party’s position, in the current circumstances, the provisions of the Covenant apply to the benefit of the population of the occupied territories, including in the Gaza Strip, with regard to all conduct by the State party’s authorities or agents in those territories affecting the enjoyment of rights enshrined in the Covenant (arts. 2 and 40).

The State party should ensure the full application of the Covenant in Israel as well as in the occupied territories, including the West Bank, East Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip and the occupied Syrian Golan Heights. In accordance with the Committee’s general comment No. 31, the State party should ensure that all persons under its jurisdiction and effective control are afforded the full enjoyment of the rights enshrined in the Covenant.

6. While noting that the principle of non-discrimination is incorporated in several pieces of domestic legislation and that it has been upheld by the State party’s Supreme Court, the Committee is concerned that the State party’s Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (1992), which serves as Israel’s bill of rights, does not contain a general provision on equality and non-discrimination. It is further concerned at long delays in deciding cases where the principle of non-discrimination is invoked, and their implementation (arts. 2, 14 and 26).

The State party should amend its Basic Laws and other legislation to include the principle of non-discrimination and ensure that allegations of discrimination brought before its domestic courts are promptly addressed and implemented.

7. With reference to paragraph 12 of its previous concluding observations (CCPR/CO/78/ISR) and to paragraph 11 of its concluding observations on the State party’s initial report (CCPR/C/79/Add.93), the Committee reiterates its concern at the State party's prolonged process of review regarding the need to maintain the state of emergency it declared in 1948. While noting the State party's declaration under article 4 with regard to derogations from article 9, the Committee nonetheless expresses concern at the frequent and extensive use of administrative detention, including for children, under Military Order No. 1591, as well as the Emergency Powers (Detention) Law. Administrative detention infringes detainees' rights to a fair trial, including their right to be informed promptly and in detail, in a language which they understand, of the nature and cause of the charge against them, to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of their defence and to communicate with counsel of their own choosing, to be tried in their presence, and to defend themselves in person or through legal assistance of their own choosing (arts. 4, 14 and 24).

Referring to its general comment No. 29, the Committee reiterates that measures derogating from the provisions of the Covenant must be of an exceptional and temporary nature and be limited to the extent strictly required. Therefore, the State party should:

- (a) Complete as soon as possible its review of legislation governing the state of emergency. Pending the completion of its review, the State party should carefully re-examine the modalities governing the renewal of the state of emergency;
- (b) Refrain from using administrative detention, in particular for children, and ensure that detainees' rights to fair trial are upheld at all times; and
- (c) Grant administrative detainees prompt access to counsel of their own choosing, inform them immediately, in a language which they understand, of the charges against them, provide them with information to prepare their defence, bring them promptly before a judge and try them in their own or their counsel's presence.

8. The Committee notes with concern the State party's military blockade of the Gaza Strip, in force since June 2007. While recognizing the State party's recent easing of the blockade with regard to the entry of civilian goods by land, the Committee is nevertheless concerned at the effects of the blockade on the civilian population in the Gaza Strip, including restrictions to their freedom of movement, some of which have led to deaths of patients in need of urgent medical care, and restrictions on the access to sufficient drinking water and adequate sanitation. The Committee also notes with concern the use of force when boarding vessels carrying humanitarian aid for the Gaza Strip, which resulted in the death of nine individuals and the wounding of several others. While noting the preliminary findings of the State party's investigation into the incident, the Committee is concerned at the lack of independence of the commission of inquiry and the fact that it is prohibited from questioning the officials of the State party's armed forces involved in the incident (arts. 1, 6 and 12).

The State party should lift its military blockade of the Gaza Strip, insofar as it adversely affects the civilian population. The State party should invite an independent, international fact-finding mission to establish the circumstances of the boarding of the flotilla, including its compatibility with the Covenant.

9. Referring to the conclusions and recommendations of the United Nations Fact Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict dated 25 September 2009, the Committee notes that the State party's armed forces have opened few investigations into incidents involving alleged violations of international humanitarian law and human rights law during its military offensive in the Gaza Strip (27 December 2008-18 January 2009, "Operation Cast Lead"), which have led to one conviction and two indictments. It notes with concern, however, that the majority of the investigations were carried out on the basis of confidential operational debriefings. While noting that the findings led to the preparation of new guidelines and orders concerning the protection of the civilian population and property and the assignment of humanitarian affairs officers to each military unit, the Committee nevertheless regrets that the State party has not yet conducted independent and credible investigations into serious violations of international human rights law, such as the direct targeting of civilians and civilian infrastructure, such as waste water plants and sewage facilities, the use of civilians as “human shields”, refusal to evacuate the wounded, firing live bullets during demonstrations against the military operation and detention in degrading conditions (arts. 6 and 7).

The State party should launch, in addition to the investigations already conducted, credible, independent investigations into the serious violations of international human rights law, such as violations of the right to life, prohibition of torture, the right to humane treatment of all persons in custody and the right to freedom of expression. All decision makers, be they military or civilian officials, should be investigated and where relevant prosecuted and sanctioned.

10. The Committee notes the State party’s affirmation that utmost consideration is given to the principles of necessity and proportionality during its conduct of military operations and in response to terrorist threats and attacks. Nevertheless, the Committee reiterates its concern, previously expressed in paragraph 15 of its concluding observations (CCPR/CO/78/ISR), that, since 2003, the State party’s armed forces have targeted and extrajudicially executed 184 individuals in the Gaza Strip, resulting in the collateral unintended death of 155 additional individuals, this despite the State party’s Supreme Court decision of 2006, according to which a stringent proportionality test must be applied and other safeguards respected when targeting individuals for their participation in terrorist activity (art. 6).

The State party should end its practice of extrajudicial executions of individuals suspected of involvement in terrorist activities. The State party should ensure that all its agents uphold the principle of proportionality in their responses to terrorist threats and activities. It should also ensure that the utmost care is taken to protect every civilian’s right to life, including civilians in the Gaza Strip. The State party should exhaust all measures for the arrest and detention of a person suspected of involvement in terrorist activities before resorting to the use of deadly force. The State party should also establish an independent body to promptly and thoroughly investigate complaints about disproportionate use of force.

11. The Committee notes with concern that the crime of torture, as defined in article 1 of the Convention against Torture and in conformity with article 7 of the Covenant, still has not been incorporated into the State party’s legislation. The Committee notes the Supreme Court decision on the exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence, but is nevertheless concerned at consistent allegations of the use of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, in particular against Palestinian detainees suspected of security-related offences. It is also concerned at allegations of complicity or acquiescence of medical personnel with the interrogators. The Committee also expresses its concern at information that all complaints of torture are either denied factually, or justified under the “defence of necessity” as “ticking time bomb” cases. The Committee observes that the prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in article 7 is absolute and according to article 4, paragraph 2 no derogations therefrom are permitted, even in time of public emergency (arts. 4 and 7).

The State party should incorporate into its legislation the crime of torture, as defined in article 1 of the Convention against Torture and in conformity with article 7 of the Covenant. It also reiterates its previous recommendation (CCPR/CO/78/ISR, para. 18), that the State party should completely remove the notion of “necessity” as a possible justification for the crime of torture. The State party should also examine all allegations of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment pursuant to the Manual on the effective investigation and documentation of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (Istanbul Protocol).

12. While noting that the conduct of law-enforcement officials is subject to review and oversight, the Committee expresses concern about the independence of these oversight mechanisms and about the fact that despite numerous allegations of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and excessive use of force, only a few cases result in criminal investigations and sentences. Regarding the independence of the Ministry of Justice Police Investigation Unit (“Mahash”), the Committee notes that investigators employed by the police but working on a temporary basis in the unit are being replaced by civilians, but is concerned that the former still outnumber their civilian colleagues. The Committee is further concerned that the Inspector for complaints against the Israel Security Agency (ISA) interrogators is a staff member of the ISA and that, despite supervision by the Ministry of Justice and examination of the Inspector’s decisions by the Attorney General and the State Attorney, no complaint has been criminally investigated during the reporting period. It is also concerned at the provision in the General Security Service Law which exempts ISA personnel from criminal or civil responsibility for any act or omission performed in good faith and reasonably by the official within the scope of his/her functions. Moreover, the Committee notes with concern that allegations against members of the Israel Defence Forces are being investigated by the Investigative Military Police, a unit subordinate to the Head of General Staff of the armed forces (arts. 6 and 7).

The State party should ensure that all alleged cases of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and disproportionate use of force by law-enforcement officials, including police, personnel of the security service and of the armed forces, are thoroughly and promptly investigated by an authority independent of any of these organs, that those found guilty are punished with sentences that are commensurate with the gravity of the offence, and that compensation is provided to the victims or their families.

13. The Committee notes that the State party is currently reviewing the definition of terrorism and other related issues. It regrets, however, the absence of information on whether the Committee’s recommendation in paragraph 14 of its previous concluding observations (CCPR/CO/78/ISR) has been taken into account. While welcoming the State party’s Supreme Court judgement according to which preventing a detainee suspected of security-related offences from meeting a lawyer constitutes a grave harm to his/her rights, the Committee is nevertheless particularly concerned at the State party’s intention to include, in its revised anti-terror legislation, provisions based on the Criminal Procedure (Detainee Suspected of Security Offence) (Temporary Provision) Law which allow for significant delays before trial, before providing access to a lawyer and for decisions on the extension of detention to be taken, in exceptional circumstances, in the absence of the suspect. Moreover, in certain circumstances, a judge can decide not to disclose evidence to the detainee owing to security concerns. Furthermore, it is concerned at the continued application and declaration of conformity with Basic Laws by the State party’s Supreme Court, of the Detention of Unlawful Combatants Law as amended in 2008. The Committee also regrets the lack of information on the possibility for a detainee to challenge any decision of postponement (arts. 2, 14).

The Committee reiterates its previous recommendation that measures designed to counter acts of terrorism, whether adopted in connection with Security Council resolution 1373 (2001) or in the context of the ongoing armed conflict, should be in full conformity with the Covenant. The State party should ensure that:

- (a) Definitions of terrorism and of security suspects are precise and limited to the countering of terrorism and the maintenance of national security and are in full conformity with the Covenant;
- (b) All legislation, regulations and military orders comply with the requirements of the principle of legality with regard to accessibility, equality, precision and non-retroactivity;
- (c) Any person arrested or detained on a criminal charge, including persons suspected of security-related offences, has immediate access to a lawyer, for example by introducing a regime of special advocates with access to all evidence, including classified evidence, and immediate access to a judge;
- (d) A decision on postponement of access to a lawyer or a judge can be challenged before a court; and
- (e) The Detention of Unlawful Combatants Law as amended in 2008 is repealed.

14. The Committee notes with concern the issuance by the General Officer Commander of the Israeli Occupation Force of military orders No. 1649 “Order regarding security provisions” and No. 1650 “Order regarding prevention of infiltration”, amending military order No. 329 of 1969 and widening the definition of “illegal infiltration” to persons who do not lawfully hold a permit issued by the military commander. While noting the assurances by the State party’s delegation that the amended military orders would not affect any residents of the West Bank or anybody holding a permit issued by the Palestinian National Authority, the Committee is concerned at information that, with the exception of 2007–2008, Israel has not processed any applications for renewal of West Bank visitor permits of foreign nationals, including spouses of West Bank residents, and applications for permanent residency status, which therefore leaves many long-term residents, including foreigners, without permits. It is further concerned at information that persons in the West Bank holding residency permits with addresses in the Gaza Strip are being forcibly returned, including those with entry permits into the West Bank. The Committee is also concerned that, under the amended military orders, deportations may occur without judicial review if a person is apprehended less than 72 hours after entry into the territory. While noting the creation of a committee for the examination of deportation orders, the Committee is concerned that it lacks independence and judicial authority, and that review of a deportation order is not mandatory (arts. 7, 12 and 23).

The State party should carry out a thorough review of the status of all long-term residents in the West Bank and ensure that they are issued with a valid permit and registered in the population register. The State party should refrain from expelling long-term residents of the West Bank to the Gaza Strip on the basis of their former addresses in the Gaza Strip. In light of the State party’s obligations under article 7, the Committee recommends that the State party review military orders No. 1649 and 1650 to ensure that any person subject to a deportation order is heard and may appeal the order to an independent, judicial authority.

15. Recalling its previous recommendation in paragraph 21 of the preceding concluding observations (CCPR/CO/78/ISR), the Committee reiterates its concern that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision), as amended in 2005 and 2007, remains in force and has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court. The Law suspends the possibility, with certain rare exceptions, of family reunification between an Israeli citizen and a person residing in the West Bank, East Jerusalem or the Gaza Strip, thus adversely affecting the lives of many families (arts. 17, 23 and 24).

The Committee reiterates that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary provision) should be revoked and that the State party should review its policy with a view to facilitating family reunifications for all citizens and permanent residents without discrimination.

16. Referring to paragraph 19 of the Committee's previous concluding observations (CCPR/CO/78/ISR), the Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice, and the State party's Supreme Court ruling of 2005, the Committee expresses concern at the restrictions to freedom of movement imposed on Palestinians, in particular persons residing in the "Seam Zone" between the wall and Israel, the frequent refusal to grant agricultural permits to access the land on the other side of the wall or to visit relatives, and the irregular opening hours of the agricultural gates. Moreover, the Committee is concerned that despite the State party's temporary freeze on the construction of settlements in the West Bank, East Jerusalem and the occupied Syrian Golan Heights, the settler population continues to increase (arts. 1, 12 and 23).

The State party should comply with the Committee's previous concluding observations and take into account the Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice and stop the construction of a "Seam Zone" by means of a wall, seriously impeding the right to freedom of movement, and to family life. It should cease all construction of settlements in the occupied territories.

17. The Committee is concerned that, despite its previous recommendation in paragraph 16 of its concluding observations (CCPR/CO/78/ISR), the State party continues its practice of demolishing property and homes of families whose members were or are suspected of involvement in terrorist activities, without considering other less intrusive measures. This practice was disproportionately exacerbated during the State party's military intervention in the Gaza Strip ("Operation Cast Lead"), leading to the destruction of housing and civilian infrastructure such as hospitals, schools, farms, water plants etc. Moreover, the Committee is concerned at frequent administrative demolition of property, homes and schools in the West Bank and East Jerusalem owing to the absence of construction permits, their issuance being frequently denied to Palestinians. Furthermore, it is concerned at discriminatory municipal planning systems, in particular in "area C" of the West Bank and in East Jerusalem, disproportionately favouring the Jewish population of these areas (arts. 7, 17, 23 and 26).

The Committee reiterates that the State party should cease its practice of collective punitive home and property demolitions. The State party should also review its housing policy and issuance of construction permits with a view to implementing the principle of non-discrimination regarding minorities, in particular Palestinians, and to increasing construction on a legal basis for minorities of the West Bank and East Jerusalem. It should also ensure that municipal planning systems are not discriminatory.

18. The Committee is concerned at water shortages disproportionately affecting the Palestinian population of the West Bank, due to prevention of construction and maintenance of water and sanitation infrastructure, as well as the prohibition of construction of wells. The Committee is further concerned at allegations of pollution by sewage water of Palestinian land, including from settlements (arts. 6 and 26).

The State party should ensure that all residents of the West Bank have equal access to water, in accordance with the World Health Organization quality and quantity standards. The State party should allow the construction of water and sanitation infrastructure, and wells. Furthermore, the State party should address the issue of sewage and waste water in the occupied territories emanating from Israel.

19. The Committee notes that certain exemptions from compulsory military service have been granted on the grounds of conscientious objection. It is concerned about the independence of the “Committee for Granting Exemptions from Defence Service for Reasons of Conscience”, which is composed entirely, with the exception of one civilian, of officials of the armed forces. It notes that persons whose conscientious objection is not accepted by the Committee may be repeatedly imprisoned for their refusal to serve in the armed forces (arts. 14 and 18).

The “Committee for Granting Exemptions from Defence Service for Reasons of Conscience” should be made fully independent, persons submitting applications on the grounds of conscientious objections should be heard and have the right to appeal the Committee’s decision. Repeated imprisonment for refusal to serve in the armed forces may constitute a violation of the principle of ne bis in idem, and should therefore be ceased.

20. While noting the State party’s argument regarding security concerns, the Committee is nevertheless concerned at frequent disproportionate restrictions on access to places of worship for non-Jews. It further notes with concern that the regulations containing a list of holy sites only include Jewish holy places (arts. 12, 18 and 26).

The State party should increase its efforts to protect the rights of religious minorities and ensure equal and non-discriminatory access to places of worship. Furthermore, the State party should pursue its plan also to include holy sites of religious minorities in its list.

21. The Committee notes with concern that the State party’s Supreme Court upheld the ban on family visits to Palestinian prisoners in Israel, including for children. The Committee is also concerned that detainees suspected of security-related offences are not allowed to maintain telephone contact with their families (arts. 23 and 24).

The State party should reinstate the family visit programme supported by the International Committee of the Red Cross for prisoners from the Gaza Strip. It should enhance the right of prisoners suspected of security-related offences to maintain contact with their families, including by telephone.

22. The Committee is concerned at a number of differences in the juvenile justice system between that operating under Israeli legislation and that under military orders in the West Bank. Under military orders, children of the age of 16 are tried as adults, even if the crime was committed when they were below the age of 16. Interrogations of children in the West Bank are conducted in the absence of parents, close relatives or a lawyer and are not audio-visually recorded. The Committee is further concerned at allegations that children detained under military orders are not promptly informed, in a language which they understand, of the charges against them and that they may be detained up to eight days before being brought before a military judge. It is also very concerned at allegations of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of juvenile offenders (arts. 7, 14 and 24).

The State party should:

- (a) Ensure that children are not tried as adults;
- (b) Refrain from holding criminal proceedings against children in military courts, ensure that children are only detained as a measure of last resort and for the shortest possible time, and guarantee that proceedings involving children are audio-visually recorded and that trials are conducted in a prompt and impartial manner, in accordance with fair trial standards;

(c) Inform parents or close relatives of where the child is detained and provide the child with prompt access to free and independent legal assistance of its own choosing;

(d) Ensure that reports of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of detained children are investigated promptly by an independent body.

23. While noting the State party's efforts to facilitate access to public administration services for its Arab minority, the Committee expresses concern at the continued limited use of the Arabic language by the State party's authorities, including the absence of translations of leading cases of its Supreme Court into Arabic. It is also concerned about the process of transliteration of road signs from Hebrew into Arabic, as well as the frequent lack of road signs in Arabic. Moreover, the Committee is concerned at severe limitations on the right to cultural contact with other Arab communities owing to the ban on travel to "enemy States", the majority of which are Arab States (arts. 26 and 27).

The State party should continue its efforts to make its public administration services fully accessible to all linguistic minorities and to ensure that full accessibility in all official languages, including Arabic, is provided. The State party should also consider translating cases of its Supreme Court into Arabic. It should in addition ensure that all road signs are available in Arabic and should reconsider its transliteration process from Hebrew into Arabic. Furthermore, the State party should increase its efforts to guarantee the right of minorities to enjoy their own culture, including by travelling abroad.

24. The Committee notes that school enrolment rates have increased and that infant mortality has declined among the Bedouin population. Nevertheless, the Committee is concerned at allegations of forced evictions of the Bedouin population on the basis of the Public Land Law (Expulsion of Invaders) of 1981 as amended in 2005, and of inadequate consideration of traditional needs of the population in the State party's planning efforts for the development of the Negev, in particular the fact that agriculture is part of the livelihood and tradition of the Bedouin population. The Committee is further concerned at difficulties of access to health structures, education, water and electricity for the Bedouin population living in towns which the State party has not recognized (arts. 26 and 27).

In its planning efforts in the Negev area, the State party should respect the Bedouin population's right to their ancestral land and their traditional livelihood based on agriculture. The State party should also guarantee the Bedouin population's access to health structures, education, water and electricity, irrespective of their whereabouts on the territory of the State party.

25. The Committee requests the State party to publish its third periodic report, the replies to the list of issues and these concluding observations, making them widely available to the general public and to the judicial, legislative and administrative authorities. The Committee also requests the State party to make the third periodic report, the replies to the list of issues and these concluding observations available to civil society and to the non-governmental organizations operating in the State party. In addition to Hebrew, the Committee recommends that the report, the replies to the list of issues and the concluding observations be translated into Arabic and other minority languages spoken in Israel.

26. In accordance with rule 71, paragraph 5, of the Committee's rules of procedure, the State party should provide, within one year, relevant information on its implementation of the recommendations in paragraphs 8, 11, 22 and 24 above.

27. The Committee requests the State party to include in its fourth periodic report, due to be submitted by 30 July 2013, specific, up-to-date information on follow-up action taken on all the recommendations made and on the implementation of the Covenant as a whole in the entirety of the State party's territory, including the occupied territories. The Committee also requests that the fourth periodic report be prepared in consultation with civil society organizations operating in the State party.

I. General information on the national human rights situation, including new measures and developments relating to the implementation of the Covenant

Question 1

Significant Developments in the Legal and Institutional Framework Within which Human Rights are Promoted

Ratification of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities

1. Israel is pleased to report that in September 2012, the Israeli Government ratified the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) (Hereinafter: “the Convention”).
2. Israel signed the Convention on March 30, 2007, and since then has been conducting extensive work in order to ratify this important Convention, which included among other things, examination of relevant legislation and required legislation amendments.
3. The ratification procedure was led by the Commission for Equal Rights of Persons with Disabilities in the Ministry of Justice, with the participation of other relevant Government Ministries, among them the Ministries of Social Affairs and Social Services, Foreign Affairs and Finance.
4. This ratification is an important step in enhancing the protection provided to human rights in Israel.

Legislation

5. On March 28, 2011, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 109 (Prohibition on Advertisement of Prostitution Services Ads) of the Penal Law 5737-1977 (Hereinafter the “Penal Law”). The aim of this amendment is to expand the prohibition on the publication of prostitution services. This amendment, combined with existing case law, makes it illegal to advertise sexual services using euphemisms such as “massage parlor” or an “escort service”. According to this amendment: Section 205A of the Penal Law prohibits the publication of information on prostitution of minors, which applies regardless of whether the prostitution service is provided in Israel or abroad, whether the information refers to a specific minor, or whether the publication states that the person who provides the service is a minor. Prior to the amendment, the maximum penalty for such publication was five years of imprisonment. The amendment added a maximum fine to the offender (226,000 NIS (61,000 USD) if the offender is a natural person, and 552,000 NIS (149,000 USD) if the offender is a corporation). In addition, Section 205C(a) prohibits the publication of the provision of prostitution services of adults. Prior to the amendment, the maximum penalty for such publication was six months. The amendment increased the penalty to a maximum term of three years and a maximum fine to the offender of 75,300 NIS (20,300 USD) if the offender is a natural person, and 150,600 NIS (40,700 USD) if the offender is a corporation). Moreover, the amendment repealed Section 205C(b), which listed exceptions to this offense (if the advertisement was solely for sexual services, if it was advertised separately from other ads; if it was given to a person upon request, if it was clearly marked as advertising prostitution services).
6. The Expansion of Adequate Representation for Persons of the Druze Community in the Civil Service (Legislative Amendments) Law 5772-2012, was enacted in January 2, 2012. This law expands the already existing affirmative action scheme applicable to persons of the Druze community, by requiring government corporations with more than 50 employees, as well as municipalities in which at least one tenth, but no more than 50% of the residents are Druze, to apply the Law's affirmative action requirements with respect to persons of the Druze community, for all the positions and ranks within these corporations. The amendment further mandates corporations and municipalities to actively promote the appropriate representation of their employees, for example by designating specific positions as vacancies for candidates of the Druze community and by guiding the corporations and municipalities when considering candidates with equal credentials, to give preference to the applicant belonging to this minority group. These requirements apply to all types of job openings as well as internal promotions within government corporations and municipalities.

7. The Expansion of Adequate Representation for Persons of the Ethiopian Community in the Civil Service (Legislative Amendments) Law 5771-2011, was enacted in March 28, 2011. This law drastically expands the already existing affirmative action scheme applicable to individuals who were born in Ethiopia or who have at least one parent born in Ethiopia, by requiring not only Government Ministries and agencies, but also government corporations with more than 50 employees, as well as municipalities, to apply the Law's affirmative action requirements with respect to persons of Ethiopian descent, for all the positions and ranks within these corporations. The amendment further mandates corporations and municipalities to actively promote the appropriate representation of their employees, for example by designating specific positions as vacancies for candidates of Ethiopian descent and by guiding the corporations and municipalities, when considering candidates with equal credentials, to give preference to the applicant belonging to the minority group. These requirements apply to all types of job openings as well as internal promotions within government corporations and municipalities.

8. The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law 5761-2000 (Hereinafter the "The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law"). This law prohibits discrimination by an individual operating a public place. Violation of the law is both a civil wrong and a criminal offence punishable by fine. The Law applies to the State and has been applied broadly to a host of public places, including schools, libraries, pools, stores, and other places serving the public. Court decisions have upheld this broad interpretation of the Law.

9. Section 3 of the Law prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, religion or religious affiliation, nationality, country of origin, gender, sexual orientation, views, political affiliation, personal status, or parenthood, in the provision of public products or services, and in the permission of entrance to a public place, by an individual who provides such products or services, or operates a public place. Amendment No. 2 of March 30, 2011, broadened the Law's definition for prohibited discrimination by including the act of setting irrelevant terms conditioning the enjoyment of public services or products. In addition, the Law is presumed to be violated, where it has been proved that a defendant delayed the provision of a public service or product or the entrance to a public place for persons related to a certain group indicated in Section 3, while providing without delay, in similar circumstances, for persons who are not related to that group.

10. In 2011, the National Health Insurance Law 5754-1994 (hereinafter: "the Law") was amended (Amendment No. 4). According to this amendment, Section 6 of the second addendum to the Law was amended to include fertility preservation treatments for girls and women who are intended to undergo chemotherapy or radiation treatments as part of the basic health service basket. The fertility preservation treatments include preservation of embryos, eggs or ovaries, and it is designated for childless couples for their first and second child in the current marriage, and for childless women and girls for the purpose of fertility preservation.

11. Additional amendments were enacted to promote women's rights, on this issue, please see additional legal developments in Israel's reply to Question no. 11, below.

Case Law

Discrimination

12. On November 10, 2011, the Tel-Aviv Magistrate Court accepted a suit filed by a man, claiming he was refused to enter a nightclub in Tel-Aviv due to his skin color. The Court stated that the club violated the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law, since no rational reason regarding the refusal of entrance was given. Moreover, the respondents have failed to prove that their business' policy does not constitute prohibited practice of customers' discrimination on the grounds of race and/or origin, as required by the Law. The Court stated that according to the Law, the club's owners are liable for the violation, since they did not prove they have taken reasonable steps to prevent discriminative behavior at their business. The Court awarded the plaintiff compensation of 17,000 NIS (4,500 USD) (C.M. 969-03-11, Jacob Horesh v. Tesha Bakikar LTD (10.11.11)).

13. On September 23, 2011, the Hadera Magistrate Court accepted a suit filed by two men, who claimed they were discriminated at the entry to a nightclub due to their dark skin color. The Court stated that the fact that the plaintiffs were prevented from entering the club, while their fair-skinned friend entered with no delay, establishes the presumption of discrimination as set by the Law. The Court further stated that the respondents did not succeed in rebutting this presumption, yet their general entry policy was not questioned within the statement of claims. Therefore, the Court ruled that the plaintiffs are entitled to a compensation of 15,000 NIS each (4,050 USD). (C.C 46945-05-10, Ziv Sayag et al. v. Key Entrepreneurship Art of Recreation and Leisure LTD et al (23.9.11)).

14. On September 6, 2009, the Tel-Aviv Labor Court ruled that the prerequisite of serving military service set by Israel Railways Company as part of its requirements for employment of new supervisors constituted discrimination against citizens who do not serve in the IDF. The Court emphasized the importance of the right to equality and the prohibition of discrimination, which form the basis of all other basic rights, as well as the values of democracy, and noted that the Law also prohibits indirect discrimination (C.M. 3863/09, Abdul-Karim Kadi et al. v. Israel Railways et al. (6.9.2009)).

Same-Sex Couples

15. The prohibition of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is an important part of the Israeli legislation and may be found in several laws, such as Patient's Rights Law 5756-1996, Equal Employment Opportunities Law 5748-1988 and Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law.

16. On September 7, 2012, the Tel Aviv District Labor Court acknowledged three children (twins and a boy), that were born to a homosexual couple in two different surrogacy procedures within two months from each other, as a triplet for the purpose of an enlarged birth grant payment from the National Insurance Institute (NII). The court decided to interpret the National Insurance law 5755-1995 in a substantive manner and stated that the intention of the legislator was to relieve the burden on parents and support them when having more than two babies. The Court emphasized that the law should suit the modern social reality in which there are different parental options, in accordance with the Agreements for Carrying Embryos (Approval of an Agreement and Status of an Infant) Law 5756-1996 (Hereinafter the "Agreements for Carrying Embryos Law"). (L.C. 12398-05-11, S.S.K et al. v. The National Insurance Institute (7.9.12)).

17. In another recent decision, the Jerusalem Magistrate Court ruled in favor of a lesbian couple, which sued the Yad HaShmona Guest House for its refusal to provide venue for the couple's nuptial party. The guest house stated the couple's sexual orientation as grounds for its refusal and claimed that Yad HaShmona, the owner of guest house, is a locality of Messianic Jews, which regard homosexual relationships as contradicting their religious beliefs. The Court held that the Guest House meets the definition of "public place" under the Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry to Public Places Law. Therefore, the owners are prohibited from refusing to hold an event on grounds of sexual orientation. The Court addressed the balance between religious freedom and the prohibition of discrimination and rejected the defendants claim that this instance may be construed as an exception under Section 3(d)1 to the Law, which states that religious discrimination is permissible "where it is required by the character or nature of the... public place". The Court ruled that this exception should be interpreted carefully so as to allow discrimination only in limited situations, such as in public places of worship. The Court ruled that the appellants will be compensated with 30,000 NIS each (7,500 USD) that will serve both for restitution and for education and awareness raising to human dignity and equality (C.C. 5901-09, Yaacobovitch et al. v. Yad Hashmona Guest House and Banquet Garden et al. (3.9.12)).

18. In a decision dated September 14, 2010, the Supreme Court stated that the Jerusalem municipality must allocate financial support towards the Jerusalem Open House for Pride and Tolerance activities, following an appeal submitted by the organization. The Court emphasized in its judgment that the Municipality is not providing any support to the gay community members' special needs as opposed to assistance provided to other social organizations, and as opposed to support provided to gay communities in other large cities. (Ad.P.A 343/09, The Jerusalem Open House for Pride and Tolerance v. The Jerusalem Municipality et al. (14.9.2010)).

19. On January 31, 2010, the Regional Labor Court stated that same-sex spouse is entitled to receive dependents pension, as the deceased widower. The Court further stated that it resolved this decision despite the fact that the couple did not disclose their relationship with their families and friends. The Court stated that in examining if the couple should be recognized as a common-law couple, it should consider the special circumstances of this type of relationship, and therefore it should facilitate the burden of proof concerning their relationship nature. In this case, the Court acknowledged the spouses as common-law couple on the basis of mutual residence and joint household. (La.C. 3075/08, Anonymous v. "Makefet" Pension and Compensation Center LTD (31.1.10)).

Dissemination of the Covenant among Judges, Lawyers and Prosecutors

20. Since the submission of Israel's third periodic report, the following measures have been taken to disseminate the Covenant and related human rights issues among judges, lawyers and prosecutors:

The Institute of Legal Training for Attorneys and Legal Advisers in the Ministry of Justice (the "Institute")

21. The Institute has conducted many seminars, courses, and vocational training attended by hundreds of practitioners, to raise the awareness of attorneys and legal advisors to human rights issues and in particular to civil and political rights. The training focused on the following issues: children's' rights (February 2008), enforcement of international law (February 2009), infiltrators, asylum seekers and refugees in Israel (June 2009), social rights (September 2009), equal rights for persons with disabilities (October 2010 and October 2012), crime victims' rights (October 2010), human rights in international law (December 2010, December 2011 and December 2012), social rights (February 2013) and seminars on freedom of speech versus incitement, workers' rights etc. The seminars and courses that will be held in 2013 include among other, the following issues: personal status (June 2013), equality (October 2013) and Human Rights in International Law (November 2013).

The Institute of Advanced Judicial Studies

22. The Institute holds lectures, seminars and courses on various human rights issues, including on civil and political rights, for judges of all instances. In December 2010 for example, the Institute held a course titled, "Equality and Discrimination," chaired by Professor Daphna Barak-Erez. In May 2009, the Institute held a four-day seminar titled: "Israeli Arabs – Culture and Customs." In February 2011, a three-day seminar was held on Labor Courts which dealt with labor laws, social security etc.; in March 2011, the Institute held a three-day seminar intended for youth judges; in September 2011, a three-day seminar on immigration and refugee law. In addition, various forms of discrimination and the need to eliminate it are also discussed in lectures presented by the Institute regarding other issues such as trafficking in persons etc.

Dissemination of Human Rights Conventions to the General Public

23. All of the Human Rights Conventions and Protocols that Israel is a party to can be found on the website of the Ministry of Justice in Hebrew, English, and Arabic. Also, the full body of work with the Human Rights Bodies – reports, list of issues, replies, concluding observations etc., can also be found on the website of the Ministry of Justice.

24. In 2012, the entire collection of concluding observations relating to Israel by all the human rights committees were translated to Hebrew and were also published on the Ministry of Justice website. Where available, links to the UN translation into Arabic of these concluding observations are also published.

25. In 2012, Israel began the translation to Hebrew of its periodic reports and these will also be presented on the Ministry of Justice website gradually.

Question 2

Administrative Measures

26. The procedure of transferring the Inspector for Complaints against the Israel Security Agency (ISA) Interrogators (hereinafter: the "Inspector") to the Ministry of Justice is in advanced stages of completion. In June 2013, Colonel (Ret.) Jana Modzgvishvily was chosen to serve as the Inspector. Following this nomination, the Ministry of Justice is creating the additional required positions (For additional information regarding this issue please see further details below, in Israel's reply to Question no. 15). Following the completion of the manning of these positions the unit in the ISA will be dispersed.

27. On January 5, 2012, a special Team was appointed by the Attorney General to Examine the Issue of Women Segregation in the Public Sphere (for additional information regarding this issue please see further details below, in Israel's reply to Question no. 11).

Attorney General Opinions and Guidelines

28. In addition, on May 9, 2013, in the frame of two petitions which are currently pending before the High Court of Justice, the Attorney General was requested by the Court to provide his opinion, in regard to the question whether, in cases of surrogacy conducted abroad, in which the State requires a procedure of adoption as a condition for the registration of the genetic parent's spouse as the second parent, it will be sufficient to issue a parenting order by a Family Matters Court in the same way that is conducted in regard to surrogacy conducted within Israel. The Attorney General was also requested by the Court to address the question of easing the procedures required for issuance of such an order (adoption or parenting) in cases of surrogacy conducted abroad.

29. In his opinion, the Attorney General stated, inter alia, that recognition of the genetic parent's partner as a parent can only be made by a decision of a judicial instance. The State noted that the Mor-Yosef Committee, which is a professional Inter-ministerial Committee, addressed this issue and recommended on several legislation amendments, including the assurance of supervision and prevention of exploitation of surrogate mothers, the assurance of the minors' rights in cases of surrogacy conducted abroad and others. The State noted that the term "parenting order" was chosen by the legislator exclusively for cases of surrogacy conducted in Israel which are supervised and that the Mor-Yosef Committee also recommended that this term will be used only in cases of supervised procedures in order to prevent exploitation of surrogate mother and trafficking in children. The State also noted that a supervised track for surrogacy conducted abroad should be established in order to prevent illegal occurrences mentioned above and recommended that only in the supervised track a court may issue a parenting order instead of an adoption order.

30. The Attorney General therefore stated, that up until the completion of the legislation regarding this issue, the State will agree to the issuance of a court parenting order instead of an adoption order in regard to surrogacy conducted abroad, by a Family Matters Court – and that only in regard to a spouse of the genetic parent. This agreement is given due to the unique circumstance of the situation, and only until the completion of the legislation on this matter, and not as an agreement to the establishment of a judicial parenting order in regard to surrogacy conducted abroad as an independent legal institution in Israel's legal system alongside the adoption institution and the parenting institution (according to the Israeli Surrogacy Law (Agreement for Carrying Embryos Law). All of the above are subject to the conditions that were recommended by the Mor-Yosef Committee to be included in the legislation. (H.C.J. 566/11, 6569/11, Anonymous et al. v. The Ministry of Interior et al. (notification on behalf of the respondents) (9.5.13)).

Civil Burial

31. Following a number of petitions on the subject, in August 2011, The Ministries of Finance and Religious Services announced a significant increase in the budget for alternative burial in Israel. The State notified that a budget of five Million NIS (1.350 Million USD) for each of the years 2011 and 2012 will be allocated instead of the original budget of 300,000 NIS (85,000 USD) for 2011.

32. In 2012 the Ministry for Religious Services has allocated four Million NIS (1.081 Million USD) for development of new civilian cemeteries.

33. As of November 2012, there are 11 cemeteries for alternative civilian burial which are contracted with the Israeli National Insurance Institution (NII), in accordance to the National Insurance (Burial Fees) Regulations 5736-1968. These cemeteries which are located throughout Israel (in Kiryat Tiv'on, Kfar Haro'eh, Kfar Saba, Petah Tiqwa, Hazor, Revadim, Giv'at Brenner, Be'er-Sheva and other localities) provide burial services for any person who desires to be buried in a civilian burial. In addition to these 11 civilian cemeteries, civilian burial in Israel may also be conducted in agricultural localities, in which residents may be buried without any payment. These alternatives provide solution for every Israeli resident who wants to be buried in a civilian burial.

Additional Measures

34. In May 2013, the Haifa University Senate decided to institute three additional days of vacation according to the most important holidays of the Christianity, Islam and the Druze religion – Christmas, Eid Al-Fitr (Feast of Breaking the Ramadan Fast), and Eid al-Adha (also called Feast of the Sacrifice). These holy days will not replace existing holidays of other religions and the decision will be implemented in the 2013-14 academic year. This decision was taken following the work of a special committee established by the University, with the participation of students' representatives. According to Haifa University's President, this decision reflects the University's vision, and the University's wish to promote academic excellence in research and teaching, whilst maintaining tolerance and acceptance.

Question 3Dissemination of the Committee's Concluding Observations

35. As mentioned above, all of the Human Rights Conventions and Protocols Israel is a party to can be found on the Ministry of Justice website in Hebrew, English, and Arabic. Also, the full body of work with the Human Rights Bodies – reports, list of issues, replies, concluding observations etc., can be found on the Ministry's website.

36. In 2012, the entire collection of concluding observations relating to Israel by all the human rights committees were translated to Hebrew and published on the Ministry of Justice website. Where available, links to the UN translation into Arabic of these concluding observations are also published.

37. Specifically, this Committee's previous recommendations regarding Israel (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3) were translated to Hebrew and disseminated, together with a summary of the Israeli delegation's appearance before the Committee, to high ranking officials within the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and other relevant Ministries.

Implementation of the Committee's Previous Concluding Observations

38. The seriousness which the State of Israel attaches to human rights matters can be demonstrated by the establishment in 2011, of a joint inter-ministerial team, headed by the Ministry of Justice's Deputy Attorney General (Legal Advice), for reviewing and implementing the concluding observations of the various human rights Committees, including those of the ICCPR Committee.

39. This inter-ministerial team meets to examine the U.N. human rights committees' concluding observations and following its work since its establishment has made several significant changes in regard to human rights legislations.

Cooperation with the Civil Society in Preparations of Periodic Reports

40. Israel is making genuine efforts to involve civil society in the process of articulating its periodic reports to this as well as other Human Rights Committees. Prior to commencing the actual drafting of the Report, the previous report, session, concluding observations and general comments issued by the Committee since the last report was submitted, are studied. In addition to letters that are sent out to all the relevant Ministries and Governmental bodies, letters are also sent out to the relevant and leading NGOs, inviting them to submit comments prior to the compilation of the report, both through direct application, and a general invitation to submit remarks posted on the Ministry of Justice web site. Civil Society contributions are given substantial consideration during the drafting of the Report. In addition, the Ministry of Justice actively seeks data and information on the relevant

NGOs' websites, such information may include legal action taken by these NGOs as well as opinions and reports on various issues.

41. In addition, since 2012, the Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs are participating in a project initiated by the Minerva Center for Human Rights at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Faculty of Law, with the aim of improving the cooperation between State's authorities and civil society organizations with regard to the reporting process to the UN human rights treaty bodies. Israel is a party to seven human rights conventions: CRC, ICCPR, CAT, CESC, CEDAW, CERD, and as stated above, recently ratified CRPD.

42. This innovative project is the first of its kind in Israel. The first stage of the project entailed creating a joint forum, attended by representatives of various state authorities, scholars and representatives of civil society organizations. The forum will conduct an ongoing symposium in order to improve the cooperation between the parties in composing the state reports that are submitted to these committees. The second stage includes inviting the civil society organizations participating in the project to comment on a draft report prior to its submission to the Committee.

43. The ultimate goal of this project is to enhance the cooperation between the parties in implementing the human rights conventions in Israel in the best possible manner.

44. The first periodic report that was chosen for this project is the present report – the 4th Periodic Report by the State of Israel to the Human Rights Committee.

II. Specific information on the implementation of articles 1 to 27 of the Covenant, including with regard to the Committee's previous recommendations

A. Constitutional and legal framework within which the Covenant is implemented (art. 2)

Question 4

Non-application of the Covenant in the Occupied Palestinian Territory

45. The International Convention on Civil and Political Rights (hereinafter: "ICCPR" or "the Convention") is implemented by the Government throughout the State of Israel. According to the Israeli legal system, international conventions, as opposed to customary international law, do not apply directly in Israel, unless they were formally legislated. Such is the case with the ICCPR which is implemented through a wide range of legal instruments, such as basic laws, laws, orders and regulations, municipal bylaws, and court rulings.

46. The applicability of the Convention to the West Bank has been the subject of considerable debate in recent years. In its Periodic Reports, Israel did not refer to the implementation of the Convention in these areas for several reasons, ranging from legal considerations to the practical reality.

47. The relationship between different legal spheres, primarily the Law of Armed Conflict and Human Rights Law remains a subject of serious academic and practical debate. For its part, Israel recognizes that there is a profound connection between human rights and the Law of Armed Conflict, and that there may well be a convergence between these two bodies-of-law in some respects. However, in the current state of international law and state-practice worldwide, it is Israel's view that these two systems-of-law, which are codified in separate instruments, remain distinct and apply in different circumstances.

48. Moreover, in line with basic principles of treaty interpretation, Israel believes that the Convention, which is territorially bound, does not apply, nor was it intended to apply, to areas beyond a state's national territory.

49. Jerusalem and the Golan Heights. In accordance with Section 1 to Basic Law: Jerusalem, Capital of Israel 1980-5740 and Section 1 to the Golan Heights Law 1981-5742, Israeli law applies to the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem and to the Golan Heights, accordingly.

Question 5

Equality

50. The principle of equality is a fundamental principle in the Israeli legal system as apparent both in legislation and adjudication.

51. The Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty 5752-1992 (Hereinafter the "Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty"), protects basic guarantees of personal liberty within the framework of Israel's Jewish and democratic character. This Basic Law stipulates, inter alia, the following: There shall be no violation of the life, body or dignity of any person as such; There shall be no violation of the property of a person; All persons are entitled to protection of their life, body and dignity; There shall be no deprivation or restriction of the liberty of a person by imprisonment, arrest, extradition or otherwise (unless as provided by law); There shall be no violation of rights under this Basic Law except by a law befitting the values of the State of Israel, enacted for a proper purpose, and to an extent no greater than is required.

52. In addition to the Basic Law, many domestic laws emphasize the principle of equality, as detailed extensively in Israel's Initial and Periodic Reports.

53. The Israeli judiciary, spearheaded by the Supreme Court, has a significant role in interpreting, guiding and promoting the principle of equality and the prohibition on discrimination, through the development of jurisprudence that deals with contentious and highly charged political and security-related issues, as detailed in the Periodic Reports. For examples of case law regarding discrimination, please see Israel's reply to Questions no. 1 and no. 4 above.

Consensual-Based Constitution

54. The process of preparing a consensual-based constitution is complex and extensive and currently there is no timeline for its completion or adoption. The current draft includes a section concerning Equality and Prohibited Discrimination (Chapter II, Section 6) that includes several options for deliberation.

Equality Before the Law

55. Equality before the law is a basic principle of Israel's legal system. The law applies not only to private people or legal entities but also to every public authority. The courts are open and accessible to every person who is interested in claiming his/her rights. Every person has the right to be represented in criminal procedures taking place against him/her (subject to certain conditions).

56. For examples of case law regarding discrimination, please see Israel's reply to Question 1 above. Please also see Israel's reply to Question no. 4 above.

B. Right to privacy, right to participate in public life, right to equality and non-discrimination and rights of persons belonging to minorities (arts. 2, 17, 25, 26 and 27)

Question 6 (a)

57. Demolition of illegal constructions is done in accordance with the relevant laws and regulations, and according to the specific circumstances, and not as collective punishment.

Demolition of Illegal Structures – Bedouin Population

58. Notwithstanding the establishment of seven permanent towns, including the city of Rahat and additional 11 villages in two regional councils, more than 80,000 Bedouins still live in unauthorized villages throughout the Negev. Six such villages are currently undergoing planning procedures, however the rest of this population still live in unauthorized villages while ignoring planning and construction procedures. The unauthorized building is carried out without any preparation of plans as required by the Planning and Building Law 5725-1965 (Hereinafter the “Planning and Building Law”), and with no pre-approval by the planning authorities. In addition, it causes many difficulties in terms of providing services to the residents of these unauthorized villages. Note that there are few cases in which Bedouins who wish to relocate to permanent localities may not do so immediately due to temporary shortage in developed lots. However the State is doing its best to accommodate such requests for relocation.

59. Israel cannot overlook such disregard to the planning and zoning rules and is therefore compelled to issue demolition warrants for these unauthorized structures. Initially, a warning is granted to the person who constructed the structure, so he/she will have the opportunity to argue against the demolition through judicial process. In a case that the person fails to prevent the demolition through judicial process, he/she will be required to demolish the unauthorized structure by themselves. Only in cases that the unauthorized structure is not demolished by the person who constructed the structure, the authorities will act to demolish it. Note that enforcement activities are conducted only against structures that were constructed after 2010 and are found in areas that do not belong to any local authority. All enforcement activities are conducted according to the law.

60. Since 2010 and until January 2013, 2,104 illegal constructions were located, 999 such illegal buildings were demolished by the buildings’ owners and 373 were demolished by the district supervision office. In addition, 1,253 demolition orders were issued and posted on illegal buildings. 46 demolition orders were cancelled and 254 orders were delayed or conditioned.

Demolition of Illegal Structures in the City of Jerusalem

61. In order to facilitate proper planning procedures, illegal construction is not tolerated. Such illegal construction harms the local population, given the fact that it does not take into consideration planning policies and parameters that will ensure a reasonable quality of life, and public needs.

62. All demolitions are conducted in accordance with due process guarantees and following a fair hearing, which is subject to judicial review and the right to appeal, and all demolitions are decided upon without distinction on the basis of race or ethnic origin. Those affected by a demolition order are entitled by law to appeal to the Supreme Court.

63. In 2013 (until August 15), 13 demolition orders against illegal construction were implemented in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. These illegal constructions include: temporary constructions, a car park, carpentry workshop, a garage, new building that were constructed without legal permits, illegal building extensions etc. In one case the demolition was carried out by the illegal structure's owner. For comparison, in 2013, 46 demolition orders were implemented in the western neighborhoods of Jerusalem. In 2012, 24 demolition orders against illegal construction were executed in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. These illegal constructions include fences, caravans, goat pen, a shed and a warehouse, illegal building extensions and new building that were constructed without legal permits. In six cases the demolition was carried out by the illegal structure's owner. For comparison, in 2012, 48 demolition orders were implemented in the western neighborhoods of Jerusalem. During 2011, only a few demolitions were carried out in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. These demolitions also included illegal building extensions, a goat pen, an illegal car wash station and abandoned trailers. In addition, during 2010, 23 structures were demolished (mainly small structures, fences, shacks and house additions constructed without municipal permits).

64. In addition, please see Israel's reply to Question no. 4 above.

Question 6 (b)

Planning in Arab Localities

Outline plans and basic planning for the Arab population

65. As of August 2013, 126 of 133 localities in the Arab population have approved outline plans. 56 of these localities have updated outline plans (from 2000 and onward), 28 of these localities have new outline plans undergoing statutory approval, 13 localities have new outline plan in preparations and the preparations of outline plans for four localities is at the tender stage.

66. Of the seven localities that do not have valid outline plans – the outline plans of three localities are under statutory approval stage, the outline plan of one locality is under preparation, and thus only three localities do not have any outline plan. However, one of these localities is covered by a detailed plan (Salame), one new Bedouin locality is undergoing regularization procedure (Al-Fura'a) and the third locality includes only 10 families (Hamdoun).

67. In regard to planning for the Bedouin population in the Bedouin population – there are 18 Bedouin localities with approved outline plans, including the city of Rahat, six towns and 11 additional localities that are under the jurisdiction of two local authorities. In addition, the planning procedures of six additional localities are ongoing. The planning for the rest of the housing clusters in the Bedouin Diaspora is about to begin in the upcoming weeks, during which ten leading planning companies will be deployed to the entire region, each will be assigned with a specific geographic region and will examine special planning solutions for the population in that region. The planning is to be conducted with the participation of the population in each region and with emphasis on land arrangement and a wide range of housing arrangements. These planning activities are meant to provide full and complete solution to the Bedouin housing situation in the Negev, taking into consideration the will of the population and according to accepted planning parameters. This course of planning is unprecedented in Israel with a special emphasis placed on the participation of the Bedouin population.

68. The Ministry of Interior has promoted updated outline plans to 75 Arab localities and it is expected that in the next two years all the outline plans that are under statutory approval procedures will be completed. The rest of the plans are promoted by the local authorities of local councils.

69. The outline plans that are promoted by the Ministry of Interior added 70% to the existing localities lands in average. Some of these expansions also include lands that were previously nature reserves and forests, due to considerations of natural growth demands of these localities. All this, in addition to vacant lots within the area already approved for development, which is kept by their owners for the benefit of their future generations, and thus are considered part of the land that can be used for future development of the locality.

70. As a result in the vast majority of the outline plans they allow for a larger capacity of population than the population prediction for the relevant planning period.

Infrastructure as a Basis for Development

71. The updated outline plans are aimed at giving answers and solutions for residential areas, public areas, public open spaces, employment areas commercial areas etc. according to the characteristics of each locality and for a period of at least 20 years.

72. Note that the allocation of parks and open spaces are sometimes not in a locality's highest priority and there are many cases of converting approved open spaces to residential areas or illegal construction, even if they were allocated in the outline plan as public areas.

73. Lack of infrastructure at the regional level (such as sewage system etc.) is one of the common reasons for delays in approving outline plans – both Jewish and Arab localities.

Implementation of the outline plans

74. The implementation of the outline plans are carried out by detailed plans, that are to be promoted by each and every locality. The position of the Ministry of Interior is that lack of an updated outline plan should not delay detailed plan where the outline plan is compatible with the national planning policy and thus, in the majority of these localities detailed plans were and are promoted in order to issue building permits in various localities regardless of an updated outline plan.

75. Note that there were no gaps between the resources that were allocated for planning in central areas and resources that were allocated for planning in peripheral areas.

Participation of Arab Councils and Local Authorities in industrial Areas

76. Currently there are five industrial areas to which Arab localities and local authorities have partnered in:

- Dalton industrial area – the localities Psota and Hurfeish were added to this industrial area. The rest of the partners in this industrial area are the municipality of Safed and Marom Galil, Gosh Halav and Mevo'ot Hemon local authorities.
- Kidmat Galil industrial area – the locality of Tura'an was added this industrial area. The other partners in this industrial area are the municipality of Tiberius and Lower Galil local authority.
- Lehavim (Idan Ha-Negev) industrial area – the locality of Rahat was added this industrial area. The other partners include Bnei-Shimon and Lehavim local authorities.
- Izrael industrial area – the locality of Iksal is scheduled to be added to this Industrial area.
- Mevoe Carmel industrial area – the localities of Daliyat al-Karmel and Osffiya were added this industrial area. The other partners include the localities of Megido and Yoqneam.

77. Note that all of these industrial areas received financial support from the Ministry of Economy pursuant to Director General's order no. 6.3 "Integration of minority localities in the cooperative administrations", which was intended to provide incentive for such cooperation.

78. It is also important to note Shoket Industrial area which is administered by Bnei-Shimon and Metar local authorities together with Hura and Lakiya. This industrial area is not under the responsibility of the Ministry of Economy. However, pursuant to Government Resolution No. 546 of July 14, 2013, a unique financial support in the amount of 40 Million NIS (10.8 Million USD) was provided by the State in order to expedite the planning and development activities of this area.

Eastern Neighborhoods of Jerusalem

79. The new outline plan for Jerusalem, which is currently in authorization process, determines the planning policy in the city's jurisdiction. In the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem, the plan targets two main issues which are meant to facilitate the construction of additional housing units:

- Substantial increase of construction rates in all of the authorized residential areas in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. The outline plan increases these rates from 37-70 to 180 percent, whereas in certain areas the increase reaches 240 percent.
- In addition, the plan, for the first time, sets 14 new residential areas. Hereinafter are several examples: a master plan for the Arab Al-Sawhara neighborhood which includes about 2,500 housing units, a detailed plan for the Dir Al-Amoud and Al Mountar neighborhoods which includes about 750 housing units, a detailed plan for the Ein Eilouza neighborhood which includes about 1,000 housing units, an outline plan for the Tel Adasa neighborhood which (includes about 2,500 housing units).

80. Every plan that is filed according to the policy regarding outline plans receives the support of the planning institutions.

Question 6 (c)

The Bedouin Population

General

82. There are more than 206,000 Bedouins living in the Negev desert area. More than half of them (approximately 120,000 – 58%) live in urban and suburban centers which have been legally planned and constructed. The remaining 86,000 Bedouins (42%) reside in hundreds of unauthorized and unregulated clusters, which are spread over an area of almost 500,000 dunams, thus obstructing urban expansion in the greater Negev area and the common good of the Bedouin population.

83. Currently there are Seven Bedouin local councils: Rahat,- the biggest Bedouin town in Israel, Lakiya, Hura, Kuseife, Tel-Sheva, Segev Shalom and Ar'ara (an appointed council). All of them have approved plans and include infrastructure such as schools, health clinics, running water, electricity, roads, pavements, etc. In addition, in 2012, following a decision of the Minister of Interior and according to the recommendations of the Inquiry Committee for the Examination of the Proper Organization of the Municipal Jurisdiction Boundaries and Local Planning Areas in the Bedouin Population in the Be'er Sheva Region (the: Razin Committee), the former Abu-Basma regional council was split into two regional councils. These two regional councils encompass 11 Bedouin localities: the regional council of Al-Kasum includes the localities of Tarabin, Um Batin, El Seid, Darijat, Kahla, Makhol (Merit) and Moleda; and the regional council of Neve Midbar includes the localities of Abu Krinat, Bir Hadaj, Abu Tlul, and Kasar A-Sir. Note that the two councils were appointed by the Minister of Interior, with the aim of conducting free democratic election within a few years.

84. Although the city of Rahat and the six local councils can effectively provide a proper solution to their population's needs, subject to their expansion, they cannot effectively absorb the entire population living in unauthorized villages, according to their tribal format. Therefore, the State had to plan and establish additional localities to that end. The Government's aforementioned decision to establish 11 new localities was designed to accommodate the Bedouin's special needs, including their desire to settle according to a tribal format and their agricultural lifestyle.

85. Additional development plans are in process in several other Bedouin towns; Rahat, for example, will be approximately tripled in size (from 8,797 dunams today to 22,767 dunams). The project is estimated to cost approximately 500 Million NIS (135.13 Million USD). The plan includes constructing 7,500 additional housing units (designated to populate 90,000 people by 2020), public and trade facilities, women employment centers and public areas. The Current project in Rahat (April 2013) includes the expansion of the city by adding 4,500 housing units on 2,991 lots.

86. Other localities are also in the process of expansion, development of infrastructures and construction of industrial and employment areas.

87. For detailed information regarding housing projects for the Bedouin community (as of March 2013), please see Annex no. 1 (Tables no. 1 and 2).

88. As aforementioned, in spite of the establishment of a number of permanent towns for the Bedouins, about 86,000 Bedouins still live in unauthorized and unregulated clusters of buildings throughout the Negev, while ignoring the planning procedure of the planning authorities in Israel. This unauthorized building is carried out without any preparation of plans as required by the Planning and Building Law, and with no pre-approval by the planning authorities. In addition, it causes many difficulties in terms of providing services to the residents of these unauthorized clusters.

89. The Government is encouraging movement to regulated localities (regardless of the localities' nature (city, town, village etc.)) by providing unique financial benefits to all residents of the Bedouin Diaspora who seek such movement, regardless of their economic condition or any entitlement test. These benefits include, inter alia, provision of land plots for free or for very low cost, and compensation for the demolition of unauthorized structures. It is important to note that a large majority of those currently residing in areas that are not regularized will be able to continue residing there in the future within regularized localities. The suitable planning solutions will be achieved by making compromises on claimed land and by participation of the local population in the planning. The planning companies were instructed to examine a number of residing solutions in order to allow a variety of possibilities to the local population.

Advisory Committee

90. For detailed information regarding the Advisory Committee, please see Israel's Reply to Question no. 7 in its Follow-up to the Oral Presentation by the State of Israel before the Committee on Civil and Political Rights regarding the Implementation of the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights (see CCPR/C/ISR/Q/3/Add.1. pp. 25-26) of October 2011.

91. Following the work of the Advisory Goldberg Committee, in May 2008, the implementation cadre completed the preparation of a Governmental plan for regulation of the Bedouin housing in the Negev and submitted it to the Government. The plan and the draft legislation that was attached to it were also available for the public review on the Prime Minister Office website.¹ The plan offers the Government a feasible outline to the fulfillment of Government Resolution No. 4411. The cadre aimed to enable the Government to operate an effective national plan, taking into account the resources required and the need for coordination and cooperation between the different authorities and bodies involved. The plan is based on the principles of the Goldberg Committee and on intensive staff work which included extensive consultations with representatives of various segments of the Bedouin community, as well as studying comments made by civil society organizations.

92. The cadre's final report mentioned six main principles for the operation of the national plan, among them:

1. Planning and Regulation of the Bedouin's housing in the Negev. In this context, the plan is to regulate the housing of the Bedouin population as much as possible in its current location, subject to acceptable planning parameters and economic efficiency. Note that the housing of the majority of the Bedouin population will be regulated in their current living areas and only a small minority will be relocated to a certain distance in order to allow housing in a locality that may be self-sufficient and provide proper public services.

2. Regulation of the compensation solutions geared towards settling the Bedouin's lawsuits in legislation.

3. Limited Schedule - According to the plan, the main issues will be settled and implemented within five years.

4. Enforcing the State's planning and construction laws in the Negev.

5. The establishment of a small operational headquarters to lead the national process and ensure its success.

6. An economic development plan.

93. An Economic Plan aimed at best facilitating the economic advancement and development of the Bedouin Population in the Negev.

94. On September 11, 2011, the Israeli Cabinet approved Government Resolution No. 3707, in which it approved the cadre's plan, as well as Resolution No. 3708, which specifies a plan for the economic development of the Bedouin population in the Negev.

The Bedouin Population in the Negev – Government Resolutions No. 3707 and 3708

95. On September 11, 2011, two Government Resolutions concerning the Bedouin population in the Negev were adopted, as part of the Israeli Government's ongoing comprehensive work-plan for the promotion of the Bedouin population rights. Government Resolution No. 3707 approved the Inter-Ministerial team's report (Praver Report) for the implementation of the recommendations of the Advisory Committee Recommendations on the Policy Regarding Bedouin regularization and reconciliation (The Goldberg Committee), and established an Implementation Headquarters. The Government further resolved to anchor the implementation framework in legislation. The Government decided that the draft legislation formation process will be carried out in consultation and cooperation with the Bedouin population, and appointed Minister Binyamin Ze'ev Begin to coordinate public and Bedouin population comments on the issue and to submit recommendations to the Ministerial Committee on Legislation prior to the tabling of a draft legislation in the Knesset. In January 2012, the Ministry of Justice published a preliminary draft legislation to be discussed in this process. The consultation process included dozens of meetings with individuals, groups and organizations as well as the collection of comments in writing and through a special website established for that purpose.

96. On January 23, 2013, Minister Begin submitted a report containing the main comments to the Ministerial Committee on Legislation, accompanied by an updated draft legislation based on the draft published by the Ministry of Justice and encompassing the required changes recommended in his report.

97. The conclusions reached indicate a need for certain amendments to the draft legislation, yet made it clear that the basic structure of the draft law should be preserved, including the finality of the arrangement and the mechanisms necessary for its implementation. Note that one major change in the current version of the draft legislation is the ability of land claimants who do not possess the land itself to receive land compensation and not only financial compensation. This unprecedented position by the State, which was reached following the cooperation with the Bedouin population process, will lead to a significant increase in the land that will be privately registered as private Bedouin land – if and when the law will be enacted and conditioned on the Bedouin acceptance of this compromise.

98. On January 27, 2013, the Government approved Government Resolution No. 5345 in which it adopted the report submitted by Minister Begin, and approved the draft bill. In June 2013, this bill was approved by the Knesset by first reading. The Knesset Committee transferred the bill to the Knesset's Interior and Environmental Protection Committee and this Committee is scheduled to conduct a hearing regarding the Law on October 14, 2013.

99. Note the above mentioned legislation and plans have encountered large scale controversies among the Bedouin population, which have also taken the form of protests and demonstrations throughout the Negev, as well as country-wide Arab localities, against the Government policy. This campaign is also taking place in the Israeli and international media, as well as in various international organizations. The process held takes into account the variety of opinions in this issue. It should also be noted the bill also raised criticism and protest and is considered controversial by other populations who claimed that it is discriminatory since it provides significantly subsidized lots and lands only to the Bedouin population.

100. The second resolution adopted on September 11, 2011, Government Resolution No. 3708, set a plan to promote the economic growth and development of the Bedouin population in the Negev.

Government Resolution No. 3708

101. In Resolution No. 3708, the Government approved the plan to promote the economic growth and development of the Bedouin population in the Negev (hereinafter: the Economic Development Plan). The Economic Development Plan is a detailed plan, budgeted at 1.2 Billion NIS (324.32 Million USD) over five years (2012-2016), which will be allocated to the following fields: employment (360 Million NIS (97.3 Million USD)), education (90 Million NIS (24.32 Million USD)), employment and education-supportive infrastructure, primarily transportation (450 Million NIS (121.62 Million USD)), personal security (215 Million NIS (58.1 Million USD)) and society and community (90 Million NIS (24.32 Million USD)). About two-thirds of the budget is a new budget allocated by the Ministry of Finance.

102. The Development Plan began operating in 2012 and is the result of cooperation between 14 different Government Ministries, in light of the broad aspects of life which it concerns. In addition, a designated division within the Prime Minister's Office has been established in order to assist in the implementation of both Government Resolutions mentioned above: The Headquarters for the Economic and Community Development of the Negev Bedouins (hereinafter: "the Implementation Headquarters"), which is headed by Major General. (Res.) Doron Almog.

103. The Implementation Headquarters operates in cooperation with the relevant Government Ministries and the Bedouin local municipalities in order to fully implement the Development Plan. According to the Government Resolution, a Steering Committee of Government Ministries' General Directors and a Regional Committee, attended by government officials and heads of local authorities and civil society representatives, has been established.

104. For detailed information regarding the implementation of the Development Plan in various fields, as reported by the Ministries (updated as of January 2013) Please see Annex No. 2 Below.

Legislation for the Benefit of the Bedouin Population

105. The bill was formulated following a lengthy debate and many layers of discussion with the public, The State does not intend to withdraw the bill at this time and continues to promote the legislation for the regulation of the Bedouin housing in the Negev. The final legislation is subject to the Knesset, the legislative branch.

Recent Developments

106. Government Resolution No. 3211, dated May 15, 2011, approved a multi-year plan (2011-2015) for the development of the Bedouin population in northern Israel, in the amount of 350 Million NIS (94.6 Million USD). According to the plan, 22 Million NIS (5.95 Million USD) will be allocated to the field of employment among which 13 Million NIS (3.5 Million USD) will be invested in the establishment and operation of employment training and guidance centers. Additional four Million NIS (1.082 Million USD) and five Million NIS (1.351 Million USD) will be invested in a plan to encourage small and medium businesses and in professional training, respectively. Emphasis will be placed on increasing participation in the labor market of the Bedouin population in general and among women in particular.

107. The goal of the 2011-2015 plan is to develop and strengthen the communities and the Bedouin population in northern Israel. The plan was formulated at the initiative of the Prime Minister's Office, in cooperation with the Ministry of Finance, Bedouin local council chairmen in the north and other Government Ministries.

108. The communities included in the plan are: Zarzir, Ka'abia-Tabash-Hajajra, Bir Al-Makhsur, Basmat Tivon, Bueina Nujeidat, Shabli-Um Al-Ainam, Tiba-Zangariya and the Bedouin communities in the Al Batuf, Zevulon, Ma'aleh Yosef and Jezreel Valley Regional Councils.

Question 7

Accessibility of Public Administration Services to Linguistic Minorities

Ministry of Health

112. In 2008, the Ministry has established a professional committee to examine the gaps between the health services provided in Israel's center and those provided in peripheral areas. This Committee handed its recommendations to the Ministry's Director General in December 2008. Since then, several publications were published by the Ministry regarding this issue and several plans have been compiled in order to deal with these gaps, the last one was introduced in 2010 and, inter alia, refers to the accessibility of the health system (including hospitals, health-funds etc.) to the entire population. This plan, for the years 2011-2014, has introduced the reduction of gaps and inequalities in health services as one of its main goals, while setting a clear action plan which involves all of the relevant wings and units. This plan, including its periodic updates, are the backbone of the Ministry of Health's activity in this field and refer to many aspects of accessibility, including cultural and linguistic accessibility. Note that due to the importance granted to this issue, this work plan is scheduled to continue and it is part of the Ministry's 2013-2016 work plan.

113. As part of this plan, the Ministry of Health introduced an internal procedure regarding linguistic accessibility of all health services. According to this procedure, by 2014, all national healthcare service providers will be obligated to provide service in Hebrew, Arabic, English and Russian. This procedure is in advanced stages of implementation. In addition, it was decided to produce explanatory materials regarding health issues, rights and medical forms in several languages, in addition to training employees who will be in charge of cultural adaptation of the healthcare system – the first course was held in 2012 and its graduates were designated to state-public hospitals. An additional course is scheduled to take place during 2013.

National Insurance Institute (NII)

114. The NII is investing great efforts to ensure full accessibility to its services by linguistic minorities who are not fluent in Hebrew. For this purpose, it has established an internet website to the benefit of the Arab population in which all relevant information and services are provided and translated into Arabic. In addition, in insurance policies that are sent to persons insured by the NII, there is a reference in Arabic to a phone number in which additional information and service in Arabic is provided. The NII employs in its branches interpreters that assist the Arab population who apply for service, in order to provide full service regardless of the language spoken by the applicants. Other measures include the installation of information stands in Arabic in the NII local offices etc.

Ministry of Culture and Sport

115. The Ministry employs persons of the Arab community and persons who are fluent in Arabic, inter alia, in order to process and provide replies to applications for financial support from culture institutions and others in the Arab population and for providing services in Arabic. In addition, the Ministry keeps constant translation of its website and operates a website in Arabic². This website contains all the main information about the Ministry, including services it provides, thus making consumption and enjoyment of culture and applying for support in this field more accessible for the Arab population.

Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services

116. In 2012, the Ministry increased the budget allocated to the Arab population and Arab local authorities. In the past five years, the total budget has increased by 31%, whereas the budget for the Arab population has increased by 46%. Note that the rate of the Arab population is only 20% of the general population.

117. Recently, the Ministry has published a Request for Proposals (RFP) for receiving translation services. A large budget was allocated to this project that will allow the Ministry to offer professional translation services in all of the Ministry's units. The new service will provide, among other things, simultaneous translation, translation of social reports and of official documents. The translation will be provided in many languages including: Russian, Arabic, English, Amharic, Romanian, Spanish, Turkish, Far Eastern languages and sign language.

118. The Ministry translates most of its circulars, pamphlets, guides, documents and forms, and is offering simultaneous translation. The Ministry strives to staff programs and centers with appropriate manpower from the target population. The latter is done in order to ensure culturally sensitive treatment and that the services are conducted in a language that is understood by the target population.

119. The Ministry's services and programs are provided partially in other languages in addition to Hebrew. The services are accessible to the linguistic minorities in order to guarantee equal lingual rights.

120. In recent years, the Ministry has operated several programs and services accessible to minority population. Below are several examples of these programs and services:

- The Ministry together with five other Ministries operates an exclusive National Program for Children and Youth at Risk. This program aims at reducing the extent of risk situations among children and youth, ages 0-18, and places special attention on the Arab, Ultra-Orthodox and new immigrant populations. Out of 166 local authorities that have implemented this program, 83 are Arab local authorities (50%).
- The Division of Correctional Services – this Division also operates many such programs including approximately 30 national programs operated by the Service for Juvenile Probation that are aimed for youth from minority populations that is involved in crime. Approximately 20 of the programs are exclusively offered to the Arab and Bedouin populations. In addition, the Youth Protection Authority provides six facilities for the Arab population. In addition, the Service for Male and Female Youth treats youth between the ages 14 and 25 that have severed ties with the society on different levels. The service offers approximately 60 programs and facilities for the Arab and Bedouin populations.
- The Youth Rehabilitation Service treats youth at the ages of 12 to 18 that are at risk, have asocial behavior, emotional difficulties and do not attend school settings. The service runs a total of 37 educational and training programs and rehabilitation centers that treat approximately 2,600 teenagers. Of the 37 programs, nine are designated for the minority populations.
- The Service for the Treatment of Persons with Autism provides among other services, specific services that have been developed for the Arab population. These services include: family centers, workshops and support groups for parents and assistance to utilize rights and legal aid. Several seminars have been organized for professionals among the Arab population where the goal is to raise awareness of the importance of diagnosis, early intervention and treatment of Autism.

- The Division of Rehabilitation Services for Physically and Mentally Disabled – this Division also operates services for the Arab population including the Service for Community Based Rehabilitation, that offers a total of 25 programs and day centers for children and young adults, ages 6 months to 21 years and their families for the Arab and Bedouin populations. In addition, The Service for the Blind caters to all segments in the Israeli society. There are five centers designated for the Arab population.

121. Note that many other services and programs are being provided to minority populations, including the Arab population by the Ministry's Divisions.

Municipality of Jerusalem

122. The municipality of Jerusalem has translated most of its forms into Arabic, and the process should be completed during 2013.

Courts' Administration

123. Translation services within the courts' system is provided by two companies who were chosen by a public tender. However, while the translation services to Arabic are satisfactory in both extent and quality, the level of the translation services to certain other languages, and specifically Tigrinya and Amharic, is unfortunately unsatisfactory and there is room for improvements. In order to improve the level of translation within the courts' system, the Courts' Administration is being assisted by an independent advisor and is conducting further assessments to translators, through both written and oral exams. The employment of translators who fail these examinations is terminated. In addition, the Bar-Ilan University is currently developing a program for training translators in several languages with an emphasis of the legal and health fields. Hopefully, this program will be able to assist the Courts Administrating in the near future.

The Legal Aid Branch in the Ministry of Justice

124. The Legal Aid Department has been providing legal aid in the sphere of civil law for more than 35 years, under the provisions of the Legal Aid Law 5732-1972. Its main function is providing Legal Aid to a specific person in a particular case, and in addition, the Branch operates inter alia in order to inform those who require its services of the options available with respect to legal aid.

125. The Legal Aid Branch operates in five regional offices – in Nazareth Illit, Haifa, Jerusalem, Tel-Aviv Jaffa and Be'er-Sheva, and a further office, in the mixed city of Lod, is in advanced stages of establishment. In addition to these main offices, lawyers from the Legal Aid Branch interview applicants in 70 bureaus country wide, mostly in municipal welfare offices. Over 15% of the employees of the Branch are from the Arab population – both lawyers and administrative staff. Additional languages available for applicants are Russian, English, Tigrinya and Amharic. Further translation services are offered through a translation company who was chosen by a public tender.

Promotion of Cultural Rights

126. The Ministry of Culture and Sport sees great importance in the promotion of cultural activities for every Israeli resident, including the Arab population, both as producers and consumers of cultural activities. For that purpose, the Ministry allocates support budgets, which are aimed at nurturing the culture of all Israeli residents and all populations in Israel according to the fields of culture or art, such as: museums, dance groups, theaters etc. These support budgets makes culture accessible in peripheral areas and strengthen the activities of culture organizations in poor financial state.

127. The Ministry allocated support funds to culture institutions in Israel in a variety of fields, including: dance, theater, cinema, museums, music, plastic art, public libraries, schools in various fields (acting, cinema, creative writing, dance etc.) literature, heritage, Arab culture (including Druze and Circassian cultures), festivals and more. The total budget for this support is about 418 Million NIS (113 Million USD) per year with a separate budget of 73 Million NIS (19.7 Million USD) intended solely for the field of cinema and a budget of 78,500 NIS (21,200 USD) intended for support of public libraries. In addition the Ministry allocates each year about 120 prizes for excellent creators with a total sum of four Million NIS (1.08 Million USD).

128. The allocation of these support funds are carried out according to eligibility tests set by Section 3A to the Budget Foundations Law 5745-1985. These tests reflect the professional policy of the Ministry to promote culture while preserving equality and transparency with the persons or bodies who receive the support funds. Prior to the determination of these tests, they are presented to the public in order to receive comments and proposals, and following their determination they are published on the websites of the Ministries of Culture and Sport and Justice.

Jewish Heritage

129. In April 2012, the Knesset enacted the Ethiopian Jewish Community Heritage Center Law 5772-2012, aimed at establishing a center for research and commemoration of the Ethiopian Jewish Community's Heritage and an archive. According to the Law the center will collect and map archive materials concerning the Ethiopian Jewish community and will centralize all research activities concerning this community. The Center will operate to deepen the knowledge regarding the aspects of history, religion, justice and culture of the Ethiopian Jewish community, including by establishing a library. In addition, the Law establishes the Center's Council, which will be composed of 13 members, one third of which are required to be of Ethiopian origin or their descendants. As of June 2013, the Council is in advanced stages of appointment.

130. On July 9, 2008, the Knesset enacted the Sigd National Holiday Law 5768-2008, which will be celebrated every year on the 29th of the Hebrew month of Cheshvan. The Sigd is a traditional Ethiopian fast day, dedicated to prayers for the rebuilding of the Temple and to the giving of thanks for the right to return to the Holy Land. The Ethiopian community in Israel celebrates the holiday by holding a mass ceremony on Mount Zion in Jerusalem, followed by a procession to the Western Wall.

131. In 2012, the Ministry has initiated an Ethiopian culture festival in 12 cities and localities with large Ethiopian communities. The festival included music and dance shows, exhibitions of Ethiopian artists, traditional Ethiopian food and clothing fairs and more.

132. In January 2007, the Knesset approved the creation of two national heritage authorities, for the heritage of the Jewish community of Bukhara and for the heritage of the Jewish community of Libya. Each of these authorities are mandated to preserve the cultural heritage of each community concerned, and to research and document it (The National Authority for the Cultural Heritage of the Bukhara Jewish Community Law 5767-2007, and the National Authority for the Cultural Heritage of the Libyan Jewish Community Law 5767-2007).

133. On December 6, 2005, the Knesset enacted the Diaspora Museum Law 5765-2005, which recognized the Diaspora Museum in Tel-Aviv as the national center for Israeli communities in Israel and abroad. According to the Law, the Diaspora Museum's functions are to present items relating to Israeli communities and to the history of the Jewish people, to conduct research and to accumulate knowledge on issues relating to the Jewish people. In addition, its roles include the creation of a repository of genealogical trees and family names of Jewish families around the world, and the creation of a database of Jewish communities in the world and their history.

134. The Council for Commemoration of the Jewish Sephardic and Eastern Heritage Law 5762-2002, was enacted on November 13, 2002. According to the Law, the Council's role will be to advise the Ministers regarding the heritage of Sephardic Jewry.

Arab Heritage and Culture

135. For information regarding the establishment of the Arabic Language Academy please see CCPR/C/ISR/Q/3/Add.1. (p. 11). The Academy regularly publishes books and a magazine. In recent years, the Academy has conducted many important activities for the advancement of the teaching of Arabic language, including: holding professional seminars, providing scholarships for students who excel at Arabic language studies, and training Arab and Jewish pupils delegations for Spain, in order to study the Arab culture in Andalucía and its effects on both Arab and Jewish Cultures.

136. Arab Culture Museum – In 2008, the Ministry of Culture and Sport initiated the establishment of a new museum dedicated entirely for the Arab culture in city of Um al-Fahm. The Ministry has allocated 600,000 NIS (162,000 USD) for the purpose of acquiring the museum's collection and for locating additional contributors for this museum.

137. The Department for Arab Culture in the Ministry of Culture and Sport – The object of the Department is to promote and develop Arab culture while preserving its cultural and ethnic uniqueness. The Department achieves its aims by encouraging and financing many activities, events and projects. The Department supports Arab writers, theaters, publications, colleges, research centers for the Arabic language etc.

138. The budget for cultural activities is allocated according to a policy which emphasizes the promotion of qualitative and professional cultural activities, and includes all Israeli citizens in the process of the formation of culture making. The budget is divided between all eligible cultural bodies in accordance with relevant eligibility tests.

139. The eligibility tests are open to all cultural institutions in Israel, without discrimination based on language, geographic location, the identity of the artists or the identity of the organs receiving the support. This fact is specifically mentioned in the eligibility tests conducted by the Ministry.

140. All of Israel's cultural institutions are open the public, regardless of their ethnicity or religion. Israelis are welcome to enjoy the activities conducted by these institutions and to take an active part in the activities. The list of cultural institutions and persons that receive governmental support includes numerous figures that operate within the Arab population, authors who write in Arabic and institutions that are identified with the Arab population. For examples and additional information, please see CCPR/C/ISR/Q/3/Add.1. (p. 13).

141. Furthermore, the aforementioned eligibility tests establish affirmative action mechanisms, including: preference which is afforded to works written in Arabic (under the theater and literature eligibility tests), and a preference which is afforded to artworks that address issues concerning the Arab population and which contribute to the multicultural dialogue (under the music and cinema eligibility tests) among others. Nearly all the eligibility tests (excluding two) are intended to promote cultural institutions belonging to the Arab population.

142. There are two eligibility tests for the receipt of financial support, which incorporate affirmative action mechanisms for the benefit of the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations: the eligibility test for the distribution of funds by the Ministry of Culture and Sport to public institutions that promote Arab culture, and the eligibility test for the allocation of funds to public institutions.

143. The eligibility tests for the receipt of financial support for the promotion of Arab culture were updated and published in 2008, after intensive consultations with the relevant personnel within the Administration and the Attorney General. The aims of these eligibility tests are: (1) to increase the awareness of the Arab population of all forms of artistic and cultural creations and to encourage their participation in the creative process; (2) to encourage the foundation, development and activities of cultural and artistic institutions among the Arab population, which strive to achieve quality, excellence and uniqueness; (3) to preserve, spread, develop and promote cultural and artistic traditions of the Arab population (Section 3 of the eligibility tests for the receipt of financial support of Arab culture).

144. Arab culture institutions may apply to the Ministry for financial support according to both the general tests and the specific tests regarding Arab culture. Such applications are handled, and such support is provided. Thus, the eligibility tests provide affirmative action for the Arab population, including the Druze and Circassian populations, by providing additional importance to culture institutions operating in peripheral areas or in localities with low socio-economic rating or with linguistic uniqueness or other.

145. In February 2013, ten Arab authors and poets received an award for their Arabic literature compositions in the fields of prose, poetry, literature research, children's literature and translation. Each of the winners received a prize of 20,000 to 50,000 NIS (5,400 to 13,500 USD).

146. In addition, in March 2013, the Ministry of Culture and Sport issued an invitation to submit requests for financial support by Arab culture and research institutions.

Druze and Circassian Heritage and Culture

147. As was mentioned in CCPR/C/ISR/Q/3/Add.1. (p. 14), on June 4, 2007, the Knesset enacted the Druze Cultural Heritage Center Law 5767-2007, and since the enactment of this Law, the Council responsible for its implementation was appointed and began its work.

Additional Information

148. In the frame of the project "Culture for Israel", aimed at promoting and making culture more accessible in peripheral areas, the Ministry of Culture and Sport has initiated a wide range of new culture events in the Arab and Druze population. The Ministry encouraged the Arab localities to invite a series of culture lectures to their localities (including theater shows, music and dance shows, literature lectures etc.) with the guarantee to subsidize the cost of these events in 29 localities.

149. The Ministry has also initiated and funded a number of unique projects, with the aim of exposing members of the Arab population to culture events. Thus, for example, the Ministry has funded a Druze festival in 15 localities; the mobilization of the "Masarahid" Festival to 30 peripheral localities (in this framework 80 shows were conducted); as part of the "classic nights" project, open concerts were held in three Arab localities. Furthermore, the Ministry held 138 children's shows in 70 localities, free of charge during the holidays season.

150. In May 29, 2013, "Adalah-the Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel" retracted a petition to the High Court of Justice, in which it demanded that the Ministry of Culture and Sport will operate a children's shows project in Arabic (similar to a project operated in Hebrew). In light of the Ministry's response to the Court that such a project was in fact being planned and already carried out at the time of the hearing of the case, the organization retracted its petition. (H.C.J. 4351/12, Adalah the Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel v. The Ministry of Culture and Sport).

Question 8 (a)Arab Population within the Civil Service

151. Since 1994, the Government has been taking affirmative action measures to enhance the integration of the Arab and Druze population into the Civil Service, inter alia, by issuing tenders for mid-level positions solely to members of those minorities. Data indicates a steady increase in the rates of Arab, Druze and Circassian employees in the Civil Service. In December 2012, 8.4% of all the Civil Service employees were Arabs, including Bedouins, Druze and Circassians (5,520 employees out of 65,950) (this in comparison to 6.17% in 2007, 6.67% in 2008, 6.97% in 2009, 7.52% in 2010 and 7.8% in January 2012 (4,982 employees out of 64,020 – an increase of 538 Arab employees (10.7% just within one year)).

152. As of June 2013, there are 1,730 positions in the Civil Service designated for persons of the Arab population, 309 of these positions are vacant and are in various stages of manning.

153. During 2012 several steps were taken in order to improve and accommodate the working conditions for persons of various populations, including through media campaign in cooperation with Authority for the Economic Development of the Arab, Druze and Circassian Populations in the Prime Minister's Office. In addition, a special website was established in which tenders, information as well as successes stories are published – all with the aim of making the Civil Service more accessible to the Arab population.

154. An increase is evident in the rates of Arab employees in many Government Ministries. Hereinafter are several examples for 2011: 38.5% of all employees in the Ministry of Interior were Arab employees – (compared with 22.7% in 2007); In the Ministry for Development of the Negev and Galilee, – 16.28% were Arab employees (compared with 12.1% in 2009). In addition, 10.09% of the employees in the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services were Arab employees (compared with 8.1% in 2007). 8.05% of the employees in the Ministry of Education were Arab employees (compared with 6.43% in 2007), In the Ministry of Justice – 6.94% were Arab employees (compared to 4.78% in 2007), in the Ministry of Tourism – 6.25% were Arab employees (compared with 4.37% in 2007) and in the Ministry of Transportation – 5.47% were Arab employees (compared with 2.50% in 2007).

155. Furthermore, in 2011, 12.77% of all new employees integrated into the Civil Service were Arabs, Druze and Circassians, in comparison to 6.9% in 2005, and 9.3% in 2009 and to 11.09% in 2010.

156. The number of Arab women employed in the Civil Service has also increased in recent years. In 2011, there has been an increase of 30.6% in the rate of Arab and Druze women employed in the Civil Service in comparison to 2008 (1,869 in 2011 compared to 1,431 in 2008). The rates of Arab, Druze and Circassian newly integrated female employees are also on the rise. In 2011, 35.9% of all recently accepted Arab, Druze and Circassian employees were women.

157. An increase is also evident in the employment of Arab, Druze and Circassian academics in the Civil Service. In 2011, 52.58% of Arab, Druze and Circassian Civil Service employees had an academic degree, in comparison to 43.7% in 2006, 48.6% in 2008 and 50.37 in 2009. This trend correlates with the general trend of allocating positions intended for the integration of Arab, Druze and Circassian academics.

158. Many of the Arab-Israeli employees within the Civil Service maintain senior level positions, with decision-making capacity. Civil Service employees from the minority population fulfill important roles such as investigative engineers, clinical psychologists, senior tax investigators, senior economists, senior electricians, geologists, department comptrollers, lawyers and educational supervisors, to name but a few. Data indicates an increase of 19.4% in the number of Arab employees holding senior positions – 509 employees in 2011, in comparison to 486 employees in 2010, 451 in 2009, 376 in 2007 and 347 in 2006. These employees serve the good of the Israeli community as a whole and are a driving force in the integration of the Arab minority into the Israeli society.

159. In addition to the aforementioned information, in 2012, the Civil Service had designated for the first time 90 positions for persons with disabilities. A circular regarding these positions were disseminated to all Government Ministries. This is done in order to better integrate persons with disabilities in the society.

160. In addition, the implementation of Government Resolution No. 2506 of November 2010, which resolved to designate in 2011, 30 positions (13 of which are new positions) in the Civil Service to persons of the Ethiopian population, was postponed and this resolution will be implemented during 2013. These designated positions are aimed at recruiting mainly academicians. Note that the Ethiopian population constituted 1.5% of the Israeli population which parallels to this population representation in the Civil Service – 1.4%.

Recent Updates

161. On September 14, 2011, the Civil Service Commissioner applied to all the Government Ministries' General Directors as well as to the National Hospitals' Directors, regarding the promotion of appropriate representation of the Arab, Druze and Circassian populations within the Civil Service. In its letter, the Commissioner referred to both Civil Service (Appointments) Law 5719-1959 and Government Resolution No. 2579 as legal duties obligating the General Directors to implement appropriate representation of the said population among their employees. The letter further mentioned that the Civil Service Commission is operating in accordance with these duties and cooperating with the Government Ministries towards the integration of the Arab population within the Civil Service.

162. In order to achieve the objective set by the Government, the Commissioner requested each Ministry to consolidate, in collaboration with the Civil Service Commission Planning and Supervision Department, a detailed plan regarding the advancement of appropriate representation for Arab, Druze and Circassian populations within the timetable set by the Government. According to the Commissioner's request, the Ministries shall designate positions toward the said populations and specify the measures that will be taken by them in order to encourage adequate candidates to present their candidacy for vacant positions at the Civil Service.

163. In January 2012, the Civil Service Commission issued a letter to all Government Ministries and State Hospitals' Director Generals, regarding a new procedure for hiring employees in order to conform with Government Resolution No. 2579, according to which at least 10% of the Civil Service employees should be of the Arab population. According to the new procedure, every Ministry or auxiliary unit shall refer to the Planning and Supervision Department any request for hiring new employees. The Department will then determine the minimum number of positions that will be manned by persons of the Arab population. Any Ministry or unit that will meet the required 10% will be exempt from this procedure. According to the procedure, the allocation of the new positions that will be manned by Arab candidates will be as follows: If there is a request for three or more new positions – at least 30% shall be designated for Arab employees. If there is a request for two new positions – at least one of them (50%) shall be manned by Arab employee and if there is a request for only one new position – it shall be manned by an Arab candidate.

164. In 2011, the Equal Employment opportunities Commission, in the Ministry of Economics, joined a Twinning Project with the European Union in order to promote various issues in the years 2012-2013. The main topics that were chosen were: the promotion of diversity and the integration of all Israeli populations in finding employment in the public sector; integration of the Arab population in the private sector and decreasing the salary gaps between men and women. The activities on these three topics include legal action, seminars, awareness raising activities, research activity etc.

Case Law

165. In 2011, the Equal Employment opportunities Commission represented 21 Arab employees that were fired by a super market chain store with the claim that their dismissal was prohibited since it was carried out due to the employees' nationality. The Court accepted the petition, annulled these dismissals and determined that the employers must conduct a hearing to each of the employees prior to his/her dismissal. (58041-03-11, Sawiti Anas et al. v. Almost Free Warehouse Chain Store R.A. Zim Direct Marketing L.T.D.).

166. An additional case examined by the Commission was a military service clause that in effect denied the employment of Arab taxi drivers in a taxi company that provides transport service to Ben Gurion Airport. In an examination conducted by the Commission, it was found that the tender between the Airports authority and the cab company included such clause which required army service as a preliminary condition for employment, thus automatically disqualifying Arab drivers for this position. Following the inquiry, the discriminatory clause was cancelled and the taxi company hired the Arab driver which submitted the case to the Commission. Other Arab drivers were invited to apply for additional similar positions.

Question 8 (b)

Equality in Education

167. The State of Israel invests great efforts in the promotion and advancement of equal opportunity and access to education among the various communities. In recent years the Ministry of Education implemented a number of programs designed to improve equality in education together with applying affirmative action where necessary.

168. The efforts devoted to the amelioration of education in Arab localities resulted, among others, in higher rates of matriculation certificate eligibility among Arab pupils (48.3% in 2010, compared to 46.6% in 2009). In 2010, 95.6% of the female pupils and 87.6% of the male pupils in the Arab education system took the Matriculation exam (compared to 94.9% and 87.2% in 2008). Also in 2010, 56.3% of the female pupils and 38.4% of the male pupils in the Arab education system were entitled to a matriculation certificate.

169. In 2011, 59.7% of the female pupils and 43.6% of the male pupils in the Arab education system were entitled to a matriculation certificate (an increase of 5.8% among the girls and 13.5% among the boys compared to 2010).

The Main Improvements in the Arab Educational Systems in Recent Years

170. Scholastic achievements – the scholastic achievements of Arab pupils continue to increase both in the international examination and in the matriculation exams. The rate of Arab pupils that are entitled to a high school diploma in the Arab population has increased by 6%. In addition, the results of the Arab pupils in the international "Pirls" exam (Progress in International Reading Literacy Study) for the 4th grade have improved by 58 points in the Arabic language. Additional improvements are evident in the international "Timss" exam (Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study exam), in which Arab pupils in the 8th grade have shown improvements of 57 points in mathematics and 59 points in science. These improvements are the result of allocation of additional resources by the Ministry of Education, including in some cases affirmative action, especially in the Arabic language field.

171. Arabic language – The Ministry of Education has implemented two educational programs to enhance knowledge of the Arabic language: “basic knowledge towards reading and writing in Arabic as a mother tongue in kindergartens” – for kindergartens in the Arab population, and “Education in Arabic – language, literature and culture” which is one of the leading programs for studying Arabic in the Arab world, for pupils in elementary schools. An additional program for high schools was developed and is being implemented since the 2011-12 school year. In addition, since 2010-11, the Ministry of Education is developing educational materials in Arabic which are being distributed free of charge to all the pupils in the 3rd to 10th grades.

172. Additional teaching hours – additional educational hours were added to 7th and 8th grades in Arab localities for the purpose of teaching the Arabic language, and to 4th and 5th grades in these localities for the improvement of reading skills in Arabic. The Ministry has also allocated additional weekly teaching hours for the 7th, 8th and 9th grades in Arab localities – one additional hour for teaching science (a total of about 1,700 teaching hours), and three additional hours for teaching mathematics (about 3,500 hours).

173. Level of teachers – Efforts are also made to improve the level of the teachers and future principals. These efforts include, inter alia, recruitment of teachers with scholastic excellence and examination in Arabic for teachers who will work and teach Arab pupils. In 2011 and 2012, 7,000 such teachers were examined. In 2012, 2,897 new teachers were appointed to teach in schools designated for the Arab population, most of them finished their studies with excellence.

174. Preparations for higher education – 50 career guidance centers were established in high schools in the Arab community, in order to assist pupils in choosing their educational path and their future career. In Addition, 50 centers for preparing Arab pupils for the psychometric exams (universities entry exams) were opened in Arab localities with the aim of assisting Arab pupils in passing these exams and raising the rate of Arab students in higher education institutes.

175. New classrooms – between 2007 and 2011, five Billion NIS (1.351 Billion USD) were invested in the construction of 7,930 new classrooms in schools, 3,025 of which (39%) were constructed for the Arab population with a total investment of 1.8 Billion NIS (486.5 Million USD). As a result of this affirmative action, 553 classrooms were built beyond the needs of the natural growth of the Arab population, and the need for new classrooms was reduced significantly.

176. Class sizes – The Ministry is implementing a program to reduce the maximum number of pupils in each class to 32. In 2012, the program focused on reducing the number of pupils per class in the 1st and 2nd grades in schools designated for the Arab population. For this purpose additional 10,500 teaching hours were added to the Arab education system with a total cost of 52.1 Million NIS (14.1 Million USD). In 2012, 66% of the 3rd to 5th grade classes and 52% of the 7th to 9th grade classes that were divided in to two classes in order to reduce the number of pupils were of the Arab population, whilst the Arab population is only 27% and 29% of these age groups, respectively. In total, between 2008 and 2011, the number of teaching hours in the national Arab education system increased by 6.5% (from 450,000 hours to 480,000 hours) whereas in the Jewish education system this figure increased only by 2.6%.

177. Long school day – Long school day (37 teaching hours) is already implemented in 1,239 kindergartens, 426 of which (34%) are of the Arab population; and in 659 elementary schools, of which 213 (32%) are of the Arab population. The long school day program encompasses 275,000 pupils, 117,000 of which are Arab pupils, which constitutes 23% of all Arab pupils. In addition, according to Government Resolution No. 4088 (January 2012), and in accordance with the Trajtenberg Committee's recommendations³, the subsidies that are allocated for additional educational frameworks that will operate in the afternoon hours (ages 3 to 9, Sunday to Thursday and until 16:00) will gradually be expanded over the five upcoming years, with a total investment of seven Billion NIS (1.892 Billion USD). These frameworks will provide homework assistance, formal and informal enrichment etc. The implementation of these additional subsidies has begun in the 2012-13 school year in localities that ranked in the lower socio-economic rating, including Arab localities. Beginning in the 2013-14 school year, the State has been providing free and compulsory education for these young children.

178. Hot meals – hot meals are provided in 1,248 of the kindergartens, 418 of which (34%) are of Arab population and in 388 schools, 97 of which (25%) are of the Arab population. A total of about 65,000 Arab children enjoy the hot meal program (about 13% of the Arab children).

179. Security in Arab education institutions – following a Government Resolution, as of January 2012, the Government is implementing a four-year program aimed at raising the level of security in Arab education institutions. For that purpose, in 2012, 134 security guards have been posted in Arab schools alongside 11 designated policemen. In the following three years, the plan will be extended to the rest of the education institutions in the Arab population (560 education institutions in total). The program is financed with a budget of 30 Million NIS (8.1 Million USD).

180. Adapting the education system to the 21st century – As of 2010-11 school year the Ministry of Education is operating a new program aimed at adapting the education system to the 21st century, which includes introducing new information technologies in classrooms etc. The program is focused on the north and south periphery areas in which large numbers of schools designated for the Arab population exist. The program is budgeted with 420 Million NIS (113.5 Million USD) for 2011-2012. In 2013 this program will be extended to all junior high schools in the southern and northern districts.

181. Technological education – following Government Resolution No. 4193 of January 2012, a new program to increase the number of Arab female pupils in the technological institution of the Ministry of Education and in the professional schools administered by the Ministry of Economics will be implemented. In the 2012-13 school year, 400 female pupils begun studying in the framework of this program. In the following years this number is expected to increase to 700 additional female pupils. In the next five years, 150 million NIS (40.5 Million USD) will be invested in this program.

182. The “New Horizon” (“Ofek Hadash”) program that has been gradually implemented in all Israeli schools since 2008, is currently implemented fully in 346 schools in the Arab population (67% of the schools in this population encompassing 172,600 pupils), 113 schools in the Bedouin population (82% of the schools in the Bedouin population encompassing 57,000 pupils) and 53 schools in the Druze population (76% of the schools serving the Druze population, encompassing 20,500 pupils). In addition, this program has been implemented in 1,147 kindergartens in the Arab population (64% of the kindergarten in this population, encompassing 30,600 children), 440 preschools in the Bedouin population (71% of the kindergarten in this population, encompassing 12,000 children) and in 166 kindergartens in the Druze population (52% of the kindergartens in this population, encompassing 4,600 children). For comparison, this program is implemented only in 56% of the schools in the Jewish education system and 64% of the kindergartens under the Ministry of Education’s supervision (including Ultra-orthodox schools and kindergartens).

183. The “Oz Letmura” program which is aimed at promoting the educational system’s achievements and strengthening the teachers position in high schools, was implemented in the first year in 27% of the Arab population’s junior high schools and high schools, in 32% of the junior high schools and high schools in the Bedouin population and in 55% of the junior high schools and high schools in the Druze population. That is compared to implementation of 33% of the junior high schools and high schools in the Jewish population (not including the Ultra-orthodox population) and 23% of the junior high schools and high schools in the Jewish population (including the Ultra-orthodox population).

184. Compulsory education until the age of 18 – Since 2009, the expansion of compulsory and free education from the age 16 to 18 is gradually being implemented with a preference to localities with higher dropout levels. The program includes additional positions for attendance officers, psychologists and additional resources. In the 2012-13 school year 28 localities were added to the program, 18 of which are Arab localities. This program is implemented in a total of 90 localities, 49 of which are Arab localities.

Measures to Reduce the Dropout Rates of Israeli Arab Girls

185. In 2011-2012, the total dropout rate in the Jewish population stood at 1.5% and in the Arab population at 2%. In addition, that year in the Jewish education system, the dropout rate of female minors in the 9th, 10th and 11th grades was 1.4%, 1.6% and 2.4% respectively (compared to 2.3% to 3.4% in 2009-2010), and in the 12th grade the rate of female pupils who dropped out was just 0.7% (0.8% in 2009-10). In the Arab education system, although the dropout rates of Arab female minors exceeded those of Jewish female minors, they were still relatively low – 2.9 in the 10th and 11th grades and 1.5% in the 12th grade. Arab male minors dropped out at a greater rate than did their female counterparts.

186. For further information on substantial reduction of the dropout rates, please see Annex No. 1 (Table no. 3).

187. As is evident from Table no. 3 in Annex No. 1, the actions taken in recent years have significantly reduced, in almost every grade, the dropout rate among all the populations in Israel. Note that the total reduction of the dropout rate since 2010 is 42.8%.

188. The Ministry of Education operates an internal unit of attendance officers who regularly visit schools in order to prevent pupils from dropping out of school. The Ministry of Education has a special department aimed at maintaining school attendance that works to prevent pupils from dropping out. This department works in accordance with the Section 4 to the Compulsory Education Law and as a part of the Ministry of Education's policy. As of July 2013, there are 555.7 attendance officers' positions and a total of 607 attendance officers. Of these attendance officers, 445 operate in Jewish localities (including 63 in the Ultra-Orthodox population); note that although many of these officers handle children of Ethiopian and Russian immigrants, there are eight attendance officers who are specifically assigned to handle children of Ethiopian immigrants and ten who are specifically assigned to handle children of Russian immigrants. In addition, 162 attendance officers operate in Arab localities, of which 19 in Bedouin localities and 19 in Druze localities.

Universities Psychometric Entry Test

189. The Psychometric Entrance Test (PET) is a standard test in Israel, generally taken as a higher education admission exam. The PET covers three areas: mathematics, verbal reasoning and English. It is administered by the Israeli National Institute for Testing and Evaluation (NITE).

190. The PET may be taken in Hebrew, Arabic, Russian, French, Spanish, or combined Hebrew/English. There are generally five dates the test may be taken a year; Arabic may be taken at four of these dates.

191. The Ministry of Education invests extensive efforts in improving the access of Arab pupils to higher education, and bridging the gaps between the Jewish and the Arab populations. Thus, during the 2010 academic year, the Ministry has, inter alia, trained 150 educational advisors and other professionals and posted them in learning centers for the PET that were established for 500 pupils of the Arab community.

192. In addition, the Ministry of Science and Technology also provides assistance in this regard, and allocates special scholarships to Arab pupils in order to take Psychometric Test preparatory course.

193. In the process of writing the exam, the National Institute takes into account the differences between population groups and conducts fairness examinations, particularly examining the test's sensitivity in regard to gender, religion, population and political correctness.

194. The Arabic version of the test is drafted by a professional academic team, comprised of native Arabic speakers. This team is responsible for supervising the test's wording in Arabic, in order to prevent differences between the Hebrew and Arabic versions in a way that may create unequal reference point for the different examinees.

Higher Education

195. The Arab population in Israel constitutes approximately 20% of Israel's population and about 26% of the age group relevant to higher education. In recent years, the rate of Arab students among the total students studying for their first degree is slowly increasing. According to figures of the Central Bureau of Statistics, in 2012, the rate of Arab students studying in universities stood at 12.1%, compared to 11% in 2010 and 7.6% in 2007. A further increase is also evident in second and third degrees. In 2011, Arab students constituted 8.2% of all the students for second degrees (compared to 6.6% in 2010 and 3.65% in the 1990's) and 4.4% of the students studying for third degrees (compared to 3.5% in 2007).

196. This increase is attributed, among other things, to the opening of higher education institutions in peripheral areas, which increased the accessibility of higher education to the Arab population.

197. Worthy of mention is the substantial increase in the rate of Arab women studying in universities. In 2011 this rate stood at 67% of the Arab students (compared to 62% in 2009/10 and 40% in the early 1990s). This important development is also linked to the opening of higher education institutions in peripheral areas, which allowed Arab women to study in places closer to their residential areas.

198. In January 2010, the Planning and Budgeting Committee (PBC) of the Council for Higher Education has set a multi-year plan for the years 2011-2016, with the goal of lifting barriers and making the higher education system more accessible for the minority populations, including the Arab population (including the Druze, Bedouin and Circassian populations) and the Ultra-orthodox population. The Committee and the Ministry of Finance has allocated a budget of about 500 Million NIS (135.1 Million USD) for this purpose.

199. As part of this plan, the Committee has appointed in January 2010, a professional team headed by the PBC's Deputy Director for Planning and Policy, which invested great efforts in order to study this field and draft operative recommendations. The team's report titled: "Pluralism and Equal Opportunities in Higher Education – Expansion of the Accessibility of Academic Studies to Arabs, Druze and Circassians in Israel" was published in March 2013.

200. The Report mapped the main entry barriers of the Arab population into the higher education institutions, which included lack of information on entry requirements, lack of information regarding the various learning courses and possibilities, employment possibilities and difficulties getting accustomed to academic education. Additional barriers were found to be the psychometric entry test, lack of preparatory counseling and guidance, economic aspects and the need for special academic preparatory classes for Arab students.

201. In its report the team provides details on existing tools and programs for assisting Arab students and for increasing their participation in higher education institutions:

202. In 2001, a permanent steering committee was established in the Council for Higher Education for expanding the accessibility of higher education to the Arab population. This steering committee has an annual budget of 4-5 Million NIS (1.1-1.4 Million USD) which is used for academic counseling for Arab students and social and academic assistance classes; scholarships for excellent Arab third degree students and for supporting Arab students that study in academic preparatory classes. In addition, the majority of the higher education institutions invests additional funds in promoting and supporting Arab students through tutoring, academic assistance classes, Arab guidance counsels etc.

203. In addition to the above, the Planning and Budgeting Committee holds additional support programs for the Arab population or general programs which refer also to Arab students:

- "Maof" Scholarships – intended for excellent scientists of the Arab population, that higher education institution wish to hire as their academic staff. Each year, seven such scholarships are granted (91 scholarships so far) with an annual budget of three Million NIS a year (810,000 USD).
- Tutoring scholarships ("Perah" scholarships) – intended for first degree students who volunteer to tutor high school children in return for 50% of their annual tuition. This project operates at all higher education institutions which receive accreditation from the Higher Education Council. The rate of Arab students who participate in this project is 23% and the rate of schools designated for the Arab population who benefit from this program is 16%. The project's annual budget is about 150 Million NIS (40.5 Million USD).
- Students' assistance fund – the Planning and Budgeting Committee and the Ministry of Education utilize a special fund for providing assistance for students in need. This fund provide for scholarships and loans according to socio-economic key. The fund's total budget in 2013 is 100 Million NIS (27 Million USD). In 2012, 22% of the applications were filed by Arab students and 21% of the funds recipients were Arab students. In addition, 40% of those who applied for a loan from this fund were Arab students, 80% of them decided to take this loan.

Government Resolutions

204. In recent years the Government had approved several multi-year resolutions in favor of the Arab population including the Bedouin, Druze and Circassian populations with a total budget of 3.7 Billion NIS (One Billion USD). Hereinafter are several examples:

205. Government Resolution No. 2861 of February 13, 2011 in which the Government approved a four-year program (2011-2014) intended for promotion of the economic development and advancement of the Druze and Circassian populations by investing mainly in employment, education, infrastructure and transportation. The Program's total budget is 680 Million NIS (184 Million USD).

206. Government Resolution No. 3211 of May 15, 2011 in which the Government approved a five-year program (2011-2015) intended for the economic development and advancement of the Bedouin population residing in northern Israel by investing mainly in employment, education and transportation. The Program's total budget is 353 Million NIS (95.4 Million USD).

207. In the frame of all of these programs which are included in the above mentioned Government Resolutions, the Ministry of Education took upon itself to implement, in the upcoming years, programs aimed at improving the achievements of Arab pupils and students, including by assisting in acquiring academic learning skills. In addition, the Ministry operates educational programs for development of employment and career life in 50 high schools in the Arab population, which, inter alia, expose the pupils to academic life, academic possibilities and future employment opportunities, including by meetings with Arab academic staff members in higher education institutions. The Ministry is working toward the establishment of 60 psychometric centers that will operate in high schools in the Arab population.

208. The professional team headed by the PBC's Deputy Director for Planning and Policy has made several initial recommendations which are based on the following guidelines:

209. Integration of students of minority population in the existing academic system while making the necessary accommodations according to the students' needs.

- The plan takes into account the entire framework of the students' time line – before and after the academic studies – beginning with the high school period and ending in finding proper employment subsequently.
- The plan is a holistic plan – which refers to entry barriers which are found both inside and outside of the academic system.
- The plan is meant primarily to improve the quality of absorption, support and the course of studies for students of minority populations and assists in maximizing all available opportunities to integrate the students in higher education.
- The plan requests the academic institutions' responsibility and commitment to this process together with clear plans and goal of absorption of Arab students, including to advanced degrees.

210. Hereinafter are the teams' main recommendations:

Preparatory Information, Guidance and Counseling

211. Establishment of information and guidance centers for the Arab population. These centers will disseminate updated information of professional and educational guidance, and will provide employment counseling etc. These centers will be established in 19 Arab localities and gradually in additional Arab localities.

212. Education supervisors – these supervisors who will work in Arab localities, will operate in cooperation with high schools in order to provide pupils with information on academic institutions, courses, acceptance thresholds, preparatory courses etc. The supervisors will assist the pupils with their correspondence with academic institutions.

213. Teaching staffs in high schools – will actively inform the pupils about acceptance thresholds in academic institutions and the requirements needed.

Preparatory Training and Courses

214. Beginning in 2013, every preparatory college funded by the PBC, in which minority students are prepared for academic life, will receive additional funds for: Hebrew lessons, dormitories/transportation, preparatory course toward the psychometric exam and a counsel position.

215. In addition, the PBC will participate in a campaign intended for marketing and branding these colleges so to raise the awareness of the Arab population to the advantages of studying in them. In addition, starting from 2014, the PBC will grant excellence scholarships to 20% of the preparatory colleges' graduates who belong to minority populations. The scholarship will be awarded after admission to the first year in an academic institution. The scholarships will cover the first year's tuition.

Academic Preparation Programs towards the First Degree

216. A special course will be implemented for students of minority populations who are accepted to higher education institutions. This is a crash course that will be conducted in the 4 to 8 weeks prior to the beginning of the academic year, in which the students will be provided with important skills and information, including, inter alia, – languages (both Hebrew and English), learning skills and academic orientation, time management, computer literacy, building a weekly schedule, a scholarship seminar, library instruction, information on examinations anxiety, interpersonal communication, campus orientation, social activities etc.

Absorption Programs

217. The PBC will allocate a budget for programs that will ease the absorption of Arab students in the beginning of their first academic year, that will include social guidance, tutoring, academic workshops, mental support, professional academic guidance etc. this in order to reduce first year anxieties, reduce dropout rates and allow for smooth beginning of the academic year.

Absorption of Arab Graduates in the Academic Staff

218. The team recommended encouraging students who excel at their studies to continue their studies to advanced degrees and to integrate qualified candidates of the Arab population as academic staff members.

219. Scholarships and funds – due to the low number of scholarships and funds available to Arab students for first and second degrees, the PBC, together with the Prime Minister's Office and NGOs are working for the establishment of a scholarship and loans fund. Preference will be given for excellence, extra curriculum activities, required professions, etc.

220. As is evident from the information above, the State of Israel sees great importance in raising the numbers of Arab students in higher education institutions and invests great resources, time and thought of the best way of achieving this goal. The Council for Higher Education and the PBC continue to work and promote this issue and will monitor its outcomes in the following years.

Question 8 (c)

Participation in Public Life

221. Every Israeli citizen over the age of 18 (with few exceptions), present in the country on the day of elections, has the right to vote, and every Israeli citizen over the age of 21 has the right to establish a political party and run in the elections for the Knesset. Knesset seats are assigned in proportion to each party's percentage of the total national vote.

222. Currently there are 12 Arab Knesset Members of the 120 Knesset Members (10%), including one woman and one Druze MK.

223. MK Ahmad Tibi is currently Deputy Knesset Speaker. Several Arab MKs are members of the Permanent Knesset Committees – MK Ahmad Tibi and MK Bassel Ghattas are members of the House Committee, MK Ahmad Tibi and MK Hamed Amar are members of the Finance Committee, MK Ibrahim Sarsur is a member in the Economic Affairs Committee, Mk Taleb Abu Arar and Mk Hamed Amar are members in the Internal Affairs and Environment Committee, MK Jamal Zahalka is a member in the Constitution, Law and Justice Committee, MK Esawi Frij and MK Masud Ganaim are members of the Education, Culture, and Sports Committee, MK Bassel Ghattas is a member of the State Control Committee, MK Hanin Zoabi is a member of the Committee on the Status of Women.

224. The Law states that indictment against Members of Knesset may be issued only with the authorization of the Attorney General, who operates independently of any other Government or political entity, making decisions purely on the basis of professional judgment.

225. Unfortunately, over the past years a number of indictments were filed against serving Members of Knesset, affiliated to political parties from across the political spectrum in Israel, holding a wide range of political opinions and points of view.

226. According to the Israeli law, a Member of Knesset has substantive immunity against legal action in regard to any spoken or written expressions of opinion or in regard to any act carried out either within or outside the Knesset, if these actions were carried out in the course of fulfilling his/her duties, or in order to fulfill his/her duties as a Member of Knesset. This Immunity is absolute and cannot be lifted.

227. In regard to actions of an MK that are not in the course of fulfilling his/her duties, he/she may be subject to criminal charges for these actions, with the authorization of the Attorney General. The MK has the right, after receiving a draft of the indictment from the Attorney General, to request that the Knesset shall rule that he/she has immunity from criminal prosecution in regard to charges detailed in the indictment.

228. In addition, note that in accordance with the law, an indicted Member of Knesset, is not required to resign and may continue serving as an MK until the completion of his/her trial. As a rule, during the period that the indictment is pending in court, there are no limitations on the parliamentary activity of the MK, and he/she may continue to serve in parliamentary positions he/she holds. The membership of an MK is only terminated in the event that he/she is definitively convicted of a criminal offence involving moral turpitude.

MK Ahmad Tibi

229. In January 2012, the "Legal Forum for the Land of Israel" approached the Attorney General, asking to open an investigation against MK Ahmad Tibi, following his participation in a convention held in the Palestinian Authority, where he made a speech, that according to the application, contained legitimation and glorification to terrorist acts, incitement against Israel and its existence. After examining the case, the State Attorney decided not to open an investigation against MK Tibi. Following additional such applications, the Attorney General repeated that there is a great doubt in regards to the interpretation of MK Tibi's expressions and whether they can be interpreted as glorification of terrorists or incitement to acts of violence and terrorism. The Attorney general also noted that MK Tibi enjoys substantial immunity in this regard and found no reasons to alter the State Attorney's decision.

MK Mohammed Barakeh

230. Following a police investigation and with the authorization of the Attorney General, an indictment was filed against MK Barakeh, that included charges of insulting a public servant, interference with a policeman in the performance of his duty, failing soldiers in performance of their duties and assault. The indictment was submitted in full conformity to the provisions of the Knesset Members Immunity Law (Rights and Obligation) 5711-1951 (Hereinafter: "Knesset Members Immunity Law").

231. The Attorney General found that in this case the charges against MK Barakeh do not relate to acts carried out in the course of his duties or in order to fulfill his duties as an MK. Mk Barakeh chose not to appeal to the Knesset.

232. In October 2011, the Tel Aviv Magistrate Court ruled that the offences of insulting a public servant and interference with a policeman in the performance of his duty shall be removed from the indictment since these offences are protected under the substantive Immunity granted to MKs.

233. On November 18, 2012, the Court ruled that in regard to the third count of indictment – an act of violence that was allegedly committed against another person and after considering the evidence submitted in the trial, there is no justification to accept this claim that the substantive immunity protects from such charges. The Court also rejected other claims such as the delay of the proceedings and selective enforcement of the law. (C.C. 12318-12-09, The State of Israel v. Mohammed Barakeh (18.11.12)).

MK Sa'id Naffaa

234. On January 26, 2010, following a long debate, the Knesset Committee decided to remove MK Naffaa's immunity. In its preliminary response, the defense claimed that the immunity provided to Knesset members applies to this case since MK Naffaa discussed political issues rather than security issues with the persons he met. The case is still pending before the Nazareth District Court (S.Cr.C. 47188/12/11, The State of Israel v. Sa'id Naffaa). On December 26, 2011, MK Sa'id Naffaa was indicted for illegal travel abroad to an enemy state, aiding an illegal travel abroad to an enemy state to about 280 persons, and two counts of contact with a foreign agent. MK Naffaa was indicted following his trip to Syria in September 2007, despite a refusal of the Minister of Interior to allow this trip.

MK Hanin Zoabi

235. In April 2010, MK Hanin Zoabi left Israel together with five other MKs to meet with Moammar Gaddafi, former President of Libya. Upon their return, an application to revoke their privileges as Member of the Knesset (according to the Knesset Members Immunity Law) was submitted to the Knesset's Committee. This procedure is semi-judicial, and special instructions apply in its regard, in order to assure it fairness and integrity, such as the right to appear and argue before the Knesset, the right to be represented by an attorney, etc.

236. The Supreme Court deliberated on the matter of revoking MKs privileges in several cases, and determined the following principles: The Knesset Committee must take precautions in its decisions in this regard, its decisions are subject to judicial review, the basic condition to revoke a privilege from a MK is the existence of evidentiary basis from which it can be deduced that the MK may use his/her privileges improperly. In addition, the Knesset Committee must be convinced that the MK is going to improperly use his/her privileges and that revoking these privileges will reduce the future risk in the MK behavior. Revoking these privileges is not to be viewed as a punishment but rather as a means to prevent future improper behavior by a MK.

237. With regard to the MKs who traveled to Libya, the first meeting in the Committee was conducted on May 24, 2010. The MKs were asked to present their case before the Committee, but all of them, including MK Zoabi, chose not to do so.

238. Several days later, on May 31, 2010, MK Zoabi took part in the Marmara flotilla during which severe violence was taken against the IDF soldiers, including the use of knives, bats, metal bars and also firearms.

239. On June 7, the Knesset Committee held its second meeting regarding the travel of the six MKs to Libya, and decided to recommend to the Knesset to revoke MK Zoabi of the following MK privileges: 1. the privilege to leave Israel unconditionally (except in times of war); 2. the right to hold a diplomatic Passport; 3. the right to receive reimbursement of legal expenses from the State, if the expenses are related to a judicial procedure resulting from leaving or entering the country or a foreign territory, or from the commission of offences concerning state security, foreign relations and state secrets.

240. This recommendation was deliberated by the Knesset on July 13, 2010, and the Knesset decided to approve the recommendation and revoke the abovementioned rights. This decision was the subject of two appeals that were filed to the High Court of Justice. The Court issued an order nisi and extended the number of judges in this case. The case is still pending (H.C.J 8148/10, MK Hanin Zoabi v. The Knesset).

241. In addition, following MK Zoabi's participation in the flotilla, several complaints were filed to the Knesset's Ethics Committee, stating that the participation of MK Zoabi in the flotilla and her expressions and statements soon after are a violation of the rules of ethics applied to MKs. The Knesset Ethics Committee determined that "The very participation in the flotilla which was meant to break the maritime blockade on the Gaza Strip, that was applied as part of the conflict between Israel and the Hamas, even prior to the harsh consequences were known, and even with no connection between the two, is an act that harms State security, and does not coincide with the legitimate leeway of a MK". The Committee determined that MK Zoabi violated the second rule of ethics, according to which "A MK will observe the respect of the Knesset and its members, shall act in a way that respects his/her status and obligations as a MK and shall avoid improper use of his/her immunities and privileges as a MK." The Committee decided to temporarily remove MK Zoabi from the Knesset and Knesset committees meetings for a period of two weeks, while retaining her voting rights and ability to attend meetings that relate to her personally.

242. MK Zoabi chose not to appeal these decisions.

243. Following her participation in the flotilla, an additional legal process was initiated in the case of MK Zoabi, requesting to revoke her citizenship. Section 11 to the Citizenship Law, determines that the Minister of Interior is authorized to annul the Israeli citizenship of a person, with the consent of the Attorney General, and according to the conditions set by the Law.

244. The Attorney General is well aware of the great importance of the right to citizenship, and even though it is not specifically anchored in Israel's Basic Laws it is considered as a basic right of every person.

245. Following due deliberation regarding this matter, the Attorney General did not approve the revocation of MK Zoabi's citizenship.

246. In addition, In January 2012, the "Legal Forum for the Land of Israel" requested the Attorney General to open an investigation against MK Zoabi in light of her alleged meeting with operatives of the Hamas terrorist organization. After an examination of this case it was decided not to open an investigation against MK Zoabi regarding this matter.

247. Prior to the recent elections of January 2013, several applications were submitted to the Central Elections Committee for the disqualification of MK Zoabi from participating as a candidate. The Committee examined and deliberated on this issue and on December 19, 2012 decided to disqualify MK Zoabi from participating as a candidate. According to Section 7a(a1)(b) to the Basic Law: The Knesset, such a decision by the Central Elections Committee requires the approval of the Supreme Court. In the frame of this procedure, the Attorney general was requested to provide his opinion regarding the disqualification.

248. In his Opinion, the Attorney General reaffirmed his opinion that: "In accordance to the firm tests that were set in the Supreme Court's ruling on the matter of disqualification of a candidate from participating in the Knesset Elections – and despite that in MK Zoabi's case there is a significant and particularly disturbing accumulation of evidence, which are close to the prohibited line – it seems that the requests themselves do not elaborate a sufficient "critical mass" of evidence in regard to MK Zoabi case, that it alone, in accordance to the relevant court decisions, can cause her personal disqualification from participating as a candidate in the Knesset elections". The Attorney General therefore told the Court that to his opinion, the Court should not approve of the Central Election Committee's decision preventing MK Zoabi from being a candidate to the 19 Knesset.

249. On December 30, 2012, the Supreme Court, residing in a panel of nine judges, unanimously decided not to approve the Central Elections Committee's decision (E.A. 9255/12, The Central Elections Committee for the 19th Knesset v. MK Haneen Zoabi (30.12.12)).

Treatment of the Sewage and Wastewater – Eastern Neighborhoods of Jerusalem

250. In the last six years (2007-2012) extensive development works were carried out in order to upgrade the City's sanitation and sewage network with a sum of 42 Million NIS (11.35 Million USD). The works that are currently conducted in Jabel Mukaber, Um Tuba, Tzur Baher, Issawiya, Shrafat and in other location which are detailed below are expected to be completed within two years. Upon their completion, all the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem will be connected to the central sewage system and the majority of the works will then focus on maintenance.

251. The Jerusalem municipality conducted extensive works intended to improve sewage and sanitary infrastructures in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem with a total cost of 210 Million NIS (56.7 Million USD) as detailed below:

- Old City of Jerusalem – the sewage and drainage system is almost complete.
- New Ananta/Ras Ramis, Atour, Wadi Jous, Sheikh Jarrah, Silwan – in all of these neighborhoods the sewage system is complete and operating.
- Kidron stream – the works and operation that were carried out in order to replace the General sewage collector were completed.

- Shoafat – the neighborhood is connected to the sewage system apart from a few houses that cannot be connected due to technical reasons and/or for lack of cooperation on the part of the residents.
- Shrafat – the neighborhood is connected to the sewage system apart from a few isolated buildings.
- Jabel Mukaber – Over 60% of the neighborhood is connected to the sewage system. There is a multi-year program for completion of the rest of the needed connections.
- Ras Al-Amoud – in this neighborhood the operations on the sewage system are still incomplete.
- Beit Hanina – in most of Beit Hanina neighborhood there is proper and organized sewage system, apart from the new neighborhoods that were built without building permits and coordination with the Jerusalem water and sewage company, and their sewage systems are in very poor condition.
- Tzur Baher and Um Tuba – only 30% of these neighborhoods has a functioning sewage system. In the last three year the Jerusalem sewage and water company is operating extensively to connect the rest of the buildings to the municipality sewage system. In addition, the construction of a sewage collecting and purification plant that will serve the nearby villages is currently being completed.
- Akeb Village – the residents are uncooperative and refuse to pay fees and tolls and in several cases attacked maintenance workers and contractors.

Sewage Purification Centers and Pumping Stations which Serve the Residents of the Eastern Neighborhoods of Jerusalem

252. Shmuel Wall – currently a Sewage purification center is being constructed with a cost of approximately 30 Million NIS (8.1 Million USD). This purification center will serve the villages of Tzur Baher and Um Tuba which encompass about 30,000 people.

253. Nabi Musa – currently a sewage purification center is being constructed near Nabi Musa junction. This purification center will serve the villages of Issawiya, A-Tur, Beit Hanina and Mount Scopus. The construction is to be completed in the first half of 2013.

254. Talpiyot (east) Pumping Station – Currently the Jerusalem municipality is planning on an expansion of this facility, which upon its completion will serve the residents of Um-Lison, Arab Al-Swahra and Tzur Baher. The expansion is to be completed by 2015.

The Golan

255. Israeli residents and citizens living in the Golan are entitled to the same rights as any other resident or citizen in all aspects of life, including access to land and natural resources.

256. For further information please see Israel's reply to Question 4 above.

Question 10

General

257. In recent years the State of Israel is facing a massive wave of illegal immigration, of persons who, in the vast majority of the cases cross the border illegally from Egypt. This particular border is 220 Km long and until recently was an open border without any real obstacles.

258. According to the estimations of the relevant authorities, since 2006 over 64,000 persons entered Israel illegally, and as of May 1, 2013 about 55,000 persons are staying in Israel after entering it illegally. The phenomena began with the illegal arrival of a few persons from Sudan, and in 2006, over 700 foreign residents who entered illegally were arrested, in 2007 about 5,200 were caught, in 2008 – 9,000, in 2009 – 5,300, in 2010 – 14,700, in 2011 – 17,300 and in 2012 about 10,421 entered Israel illegally. In 2013, the numbers of illegal arrivals decreased significantly, with only 38 illegal arrivals (until September 2013), a decrease which is mainly attributed to the building of the fence between Egypt and Israel. The majority of the illegal immigrants are from Eritrea (63%) and Sudan (26%) alongside other African countries. Note that until June 2012, the detention period was a few weeks at the most.

259. The Jewish people's history, and the fact that during the Holocaust many Jews were asylum seekers, makes Israel highly sensitive to this humanitarian issue. Due to our history, Israel was among the first countries to adopt and ratify the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees. This sensitivity, in addition to Israel's obligations under international law and the will of the Israeli Government to protect human rights, lead to an honest attempt by all government agencies, to protect the human rights of these individuals despite increasing challenges. In this regard, Israel currently grants protection to more than 50,000 people, allows these individuals to enjoy their basic human rights.

260. The problem of controlling its borders while upholding the rule of law is not unique to Israel. Many other countries face similar dilemmas, and Israel cooperates closely with those countries in order to develop the appropriate legal mechanisms to cope with these challenges. However, the situation in Israel is much more complicated than in other developed countries. Israel is the only developed country with a long land border with the African continent, which makes it a lucrative destination for immigration without the need to use expensive means of transportation. Moreover, tight control of the borders in Europe makes those who seek a better life turn to the relatively easy route to Israel. Additionally, the current regional instability which touches nearly all of Israel's borders and the fact that a large proportion of these individuals come from Sudan – a country which is hostile towards Israel and does not recognize its existence – adds to the security challenges which a small country such as Israel faces. In this regard, many scholars see migration as a regional phenomenon and believe that the policies for coping with it should be regional. However, due to Israel's unique situation in the Middle East it is impossible for us to develop regional strategies for cooperation with our neighbors or countries of origin, as other states with similar challenges do.

261. This unique situation called for taking several immediate steps in various areas such as constructing a physical border on the Egyptian-Israeli border, expansion of the detention facilities in the south, together with several legal amendments to the relevant legislation. These measures are an honest attempt to try and control Israel's borders and reduce the financial incentives to arrive in Israel, while adhering to the rule of law and respecting the human rights of all individuals in its territory.

Equality

262. The principle of equality is a fundamental principle in the Israeli legal system as apparent both in legislation and adjudication.

263. The Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty protects basic guarantees of personal liberty within the framework of Israel's Jewish and democratic character. The goal of the Basic Law is "to defend Human Dignity and Liberty, in order to establish in a Basic Law the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State." Furthermore, many laws emphasize the principle of equality, as detailed extensively in Israel's Initial and Periodic Reports.

264. Just as the Israeli legislature crafts and adopts both new laws and administrative measures to ensure that government agencies adhere to the principle of equality and do not engage in any discriminatory act or practice, the country's independent judiciary serves to interpret, guide, and enforce these measures. The Supreme Court has, on several occasions, reiterated the notion that equality is a constitutional right, derived from the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty,⁴ and that maintaining human dignity also prohibits discrimination.⁵

265. This judicial effort is also guided by the Supreme Court, which plays a pivotal role in the promotion of the principle of equality through the development of jurisprudence dealing with contentious and highly charged political and security-related issues, as detailed in the Periodic Reports.

266. The criticism expressed against the manner in which the State of Israel has been treating asylum seekers does not include claims of discrimination or inequality.

267. The Prevention of Infiltration Law (Offences and Jurisdiction) 5714-1954 (Hereinafter the "Prevention of Infiltration Law"), includes an exception for custody, stipulated in Section 30a(c)(1) and 30a(c)(2), whose purpose is to make sure that requests for asylum are handled within a reasonable time frame⁶ and that genuine refugees are not held in custody. Note that the Population and Immigration Authority (PIA) is making every effort to uphold the schedule detailed in the law.

Amendment No. 3 to the Prevention of Infiltration (Offenses and Jurisdiction) (Amendment No. 3 and Temporary Provision) Law 5772-2012

268. On 16 September, 2013 the High Court of Justice ruled in a petition filed by several NGOs, regarding the constitutionality of Amendment No. 3 to the Prevention of Infiltration Law (Offenses and Jurisdiction) 5772-2012. This Amendment entered into force in January 2012, as a temporary provision, expiring in January 2015. Under Section 30A of the Law, as amended, a person that enters Israel illegally can be held in detention for a period of up to three years, subject to certain exceptions. An extended panel of nine judges ruled that holding persons for such a long period of time constitutes a material violation of their rights, including liberty and dignity, as enshrined in the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. The Court determined that this violation does not meet the proportionality criteria contained within the limitation clause of the Basic Law, and was therefore unconstitutional. The Court annulled Section 30A of the Law. Furthermore, the State was given 90 days to examine the possibility of releasing the 1,750 people held in detention pursuant to this section, on the basis of Section 13F of the Entry into Israel Law 5712 – 1952, which was deemed applicable (H.C.J. 7146/12, Naget Serg Adam et al. v. The Knesset et al. (16.9.13).

269. The Prevention of Infiltration (Offenses and Jurisdiction) (Amendment No. 3 and Temporary Provision) Law 5772-2012, was enacted on January 18, 2012 as a temporary provision for a period of three years and defines an "infiltrator" as: "infiltrator" – a person who is not a resident according to the definition in Section 1 of the Population Registry Law 5725 – 1965, who entered Israel other than by way of a border station prescribed by the Minister of Interior according to Section 7 of the Entry into Israel Law 5712 – 1952

⁴ H.C.J. 721/94. El-Al Israel Airlines v. Danielowitz; H.C.J. 5394/92 Hoppert v. Yad VaShem Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Memorial Authority.

⁶ Following three months from the day of submission of a request for a visa and a staying permit and the handling of the request has not begun (Section 30a(c)(1)), or following nine months subsequent to the submission of such a request if a decision on that request has not been issued (Section 30a(c)(2)).

(Hereinafter the “Entry into Israel Law”). Note that the law is valid for a period of three years and is currently scheduled to expire on January 18, 1, 2015. In addition since the Law was only applied in June 2012, the maximum detention period according to it is two and a half years.

Prevention of Infiltration (Offenses and Jurisdiction) (Temporary Provision)

Law 5773-2013

270. In June 2013, the Knesset approved the Prevention of Infiltration Law which, inter alia, prohibits a person that entered Israel illegally to exit the State with property (including money and property rights) subject to several exemptions, among them that the property in movables intended for his/her reasonable use (Section 7A(b)(1)(a)), property in a value that is not higher than the minimum wage multiplied by the number of months he/she stayed in Israel and property in a value higher than that mentioned in Section (Section 7A(b)(1)(b)(1)) if proved that this property is legally his/hers (Section 7A(b)(1)(b)(2)).

271. Nevertheless, a person that entered Israel illegally will be allowed to exit the State with property, if the border control officer allowed him/her, on an exceptional basis, after being persuaded that the said person is unable to leave Israel to another country (Section 7A(d)(1)) and that there is a proof that his/her close relative is in a life threatening situation (Section 7A(d)(2)).

272. Note that this law is a temporary provision which entered into force on 13 September, 2013 and is scheduled to expire on January 17, 2015. The Minister of Interior has issued regulations according to the Law regarding its implementation on 28 August 2013, which also entered into force on 13 September, 2013.

Case Law

273. On July 7, 2013, the Supreme Court, residing as a Court for Administrative Appeals, rejected an appeal filed by several Ivory Coast nationals against the decision to deny their individual requests for asylum. The appellants stayed in Israel due to temporary group protection, after individual asylum requests filed by them have been denied. Following the end of the temporary group protection, the petitioners requested to review their individual requests claiming that while staying in Israel they joined the FPI party who later became to opposition party in the Ivory Coast – thus, they are in danger if sent back to their country. After reviewing the State’s response and the evidence in this case, the Court rejected the appeal stating, inter alia, that the decision of the relevant authorities was reasonable according to the evidence. In addition the Court stated that the appellants only proved their membership in the FPI party without any political activity beyond that, and that it was not persuaded that the appellants’ activity in the Israeli FPI branch may cause their persecution in the Ivory Coast or threat to their lives or liberty in the Ivory Coast. The Court that examined the individual applications of the appellants however stated that they did not prove any evidence of any change in circumstances that may affect their entitlement to a status of refugees or asylum, and therefore the decisions in their regard were given in accordance with the law (Ad.A. 4922/12, Anonymous v. The Ministry of Interior et al. (7.7.13)).

274. On April 30, 2013, the Administrative Court in Be’er-Sheva accepted a petition filed by an Eritrean woman and her two daughters, aged 8.5 and 11, for their release from custody due to unique humanitarian circumstances. The Court accepted the claim that minority may be construed as special humanitarian justification for release under Section 30a(b)(2) of the Prevention of Infiltration (Offenses and Jurisdiction) Law 5714-1954, as amended in January 2012 (Amendment No. 3). The Court determined that the release of minors from detention was a matter of judicial discretion, taking into account the minor's age and the particular circumstances, and it is not limited to unaccompanied minors.

275. The Court further noted that according to Section 30a(b)(1) to the Law, an almost categorical reason for release from custody regarding a minor is that the continuation of "holding him/her in custody may cause harm to his/her health and there is no other way to prevent the said harm."

276. The Court held that babies and young children require special treatment due to their small size and young age. The Court also noted that the mere age of the appellants was to be considered a special humanitarian consideration, as their prolonged detention and uncertain prospects of release (due to Israel's decision not to deport Eritrean citizens), were sure to affect them emotionally and hamper their emotional development.

277. The Court ruled that the matter will be returned to the Detention Review Tribunal in order to examine other option for the petitioners, such as placing them in Carmel shelter in Osfifiya, which in recent years housed many women who were released from the Saharonim facility (Ad.P. 44920-03-13 (Be'er-Sheva), Saba Tedsa et al. v. The Ministry of Interior (30.4.13)).

278. In another petition, the State noted in its response that the Petitioner and her minor daughter were released from custody in December 2012, and also noted that in May 2013, the Border Control Supervisor, with the approval of the Minister of Interior, ordered the release of nine mothers and their ten minor children which were held in custody since September 2012. The State further noted that as of May 2013, there were only five women and 11 accompanied minors in custody, and that the services and living conditions in the Saharonim facility were adapted to the needs of minors, including health, welfare and education services and special nutrition in provided to them. The State further noted that if any indications will be found that the custody causes harm to the minors' health, including mental health, such minors will be released together with their relative or the person accompanying them (H.C.J. 7146/12, Anonymous v. The Minister of Interior (State response) (29.4.13)).

279. In another case concerning a decision dated January 31, 2012, in which the Minister of Interior, following the declaration of independence of Southern Sudan, informed the nationals of Southern Sudan that they are required to return to their country and that beginning on April 1, 2012 enforcement activities will be taken against illegal immigrants of Southern Sudan who refuse to leave. According to the Court this decision is basically ending the collective protection for nationals of Southern Sudan. The Court rejected the appeal stating, inter alia, that due to the respondent notification that an individual examination will be made; there is no basis to the petitioners claim that there is an obligation to continue the policy of collective protection. The Court further noted that despite the fact that the respondent and the experts agree that the situation in some areas of Southern Sudan is problematic, violent and even dangerous, the petitioners did not base the claim that this situation takes place all across Southern Sudan and endangers every national as such. The Court further noted that the petitioners did not demonstrate that the decision to stop the collective protection and return national of Southern Sudan to their place of origin or another region in this county that does not endangers their life or liberty, is unreasonable. The Court here recognized that non-refoulement is applicable towards asylum seekers whose individual requests for asylum was denied. (Ad.P. 53765-03-12 (Jerusalem District Court), ASSAF the Aid Organization for Refugees and Asylum Seekers in Israel. et al. v. The Minister of Interior (7.7.12)).

Cases of Brutality and Violence against Asylum Seekers

280. Persons who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian border crossed through the Sinai Peninsula, and in some cases, while on Egyptian ground, such individuals were held in camps (“Sinai Camps”) where they suffered heinous crimes and grave abuse at the hands of their captors, for the purpose of obtaining ransom from their family members living in Israel or abroad (“Sinai Victims”).

281. According to Government Resolutions No. 2806 of December 1, 2002 and No. 2607 of December 2, 2007, any case where there is a suspicion that a person is a victim of trafficking in persons (TIP) or slavery is transferred to the Police, which first determines if there is evidence that the relevant person is indeed a trafficking victim. If the relevant authority determines that there is such initial evidence the victim is transferred to a TIP victims’ shelter (Ma’agan or Atlas). Note that it is insignificant if the victim is a witness in the case or not, since he/she is recognized as a victim he/she will be directed to the shelter. Due to this fact, all the Sinai victims, who were forced to provide sexual services to their captors or who were compelled to forced labor and were held in slavery conditions are also directed to the shelter, despite the fact that the offences against them were conducted outside of Israeli borders, by foreign nationals.

282. The investigation division, in the investigation and intelligence department within the Israeli Police monitors and supervises TIP investigation cases and cases regarding associated offences.

283. Victims of trafficking are afforded three fundamental types of rights: shelter, free legal aid and ability to work. These rights (except for the visas granted during court cases) are not contingent upon cooperation with law enforcement. The shelters are supervised and financed by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Social Services and run by an NGO; legal aid is state-funded, by the Legal Aid Branch of the Ministry of Justice; work visas are provided by the Population and Immigration Authority (PIA) in the Ministry of Interior. The victims who are directed to the shelters, and are also directed to aid organizations that provide additional legal aid, including in regard to the question of their status as refugees.

284. As a rule, victims identified as victims of trafficking by the various authorities and NGOs are transferred to the Police. The Police’s threshold for admitting a person to the shelter is fairly low: if there exists preliminary evidence suggesting that the person might be a victim of trafficking, the person is promptly referred to the shelters. The shelters receive every individual referred by the Police. See the responses to Questions no. 34 and no. 36 of the Previous Report regarding the referral process.

285. The services available for the treatment of victims of trafficking in persons for prostitution, slavery and forced labor were established by two Governmental Resolutions, which led to the establishment of the “Ma’agan” shelter for female victims of trafficking for prostitution in February 2004, and the “Atlas” center for male victims in July 2009. The shelters are currently equipped to deal with a total of 88 victims: 35 places within the Ma’agan Shelter for women, 35 places in the Atlas Center for men, and eighteen places within transitional apartments.

286. The shelters function as a single, comprehensive resource aimed to provide all the necessary services and treatment for victims of trafficking, including meeting their physical, medical, emotional and social needs. During their residence in the shelter, a unique rehabilitation program is designed for them.

287. The shelters are staffed with professional employees with diverse backgrounds and specializations. The staff includes a manager, administrative team (including a secretary and maintenance supervisor), social workers, instructors, educators, translators, volunteers, mediators and security crew. These are complemented by two weekly visits by a doctor and visits by a psychiatrist as needed, as well as external professional instructors who lead workshops and classes such as sports, yoga, dance, arts and crafts workshops, Hebrew and English lessons. In short, the shelters provide an open, tolerant, attentive, sensitive and rehabilitative environment for victims of trafficking.

288. In 2012, 21 women who were recognized as slavery/forced labor victims of the Sinai camps were directed to the shelter. 18 of the women were from Ethiopia and three from Eritrea. All of these women were identified by the Detention Review Tribunals, the Israeli Prisons Service (Hereinafter: the "IPS"), aid organizations and were recognized by Police as victims of slavery for providing sexual services and forced labor.

289. Also during 2012, 21 men who were recognized as slavery/forced labor victims were directed to the Atlas center for men. 14 of these men were from Ethiopia (among them two minors over the age of 17) and seven from Eritrea. All of these men were identified by the Detention Review Tribunals, the IPS, aid organizations (including the UN Refugee Agency) and were recognized by the Police as victims.

290. In recent years the Police handled ten cases concerning ransom payments for releasing Sinai victims, where there was involvement of Israeli citizens. In six cases indictments were served, two cases are still under investigation and two cases were closed for lack of evidence.

The Advancement of the Status of Women

291. The advancement and promotion of gender equality and the promotion of women's rights have been on the agenda of every Israeli Government since the foundation of the State of Israel. Equality is a fundamental principle already enshrined in Israel's Declaration of Independence. In addition, the Equal Rights for Women Law 5711-1951 (Hereinafter the "Equal Rights for Women Law"), enacted only three years after the State was founded, is a testimony to the emphasis placed on gender-related issues from the State's inception. Throughout its existence these issues and principles have remained a priority for Israel and are of utmost importance to its Government and society.

292. As early as 1969, Israel had a woman Prime Minister – Golda Meir. Today, in the 19th Knesset the rate of women MK has increased from 19% to 22.5%. In addition, in the current 33rd Government, the rate of women ministers has also increased from 9.7% to 16%. Currently there are four female Government Ministers: Minister of Health Yael German, Minister of Justice Tzipi Livni, the Minister of Culture and Sport Limor Livnat and Minister of Immigrant Absorption Sofa Landver. Two Government Deputy Ministers are women: Deputy Minister of Interior- Fania Kirshenbaum and deputy Minister of Transportation and Road Safety- Tsipi Hotovely. In addition, the Head of the Opposition is also a woman (MK Shelly Yachimovich). In addition to these figures, as of January 2013, the rate of women directors in government corporations was 42% with 20.6% of women serving as chairperson of such directors. In addition, in 2011, the rate of women serving as managers in the private sector was 39% and the rate of women in senior positions within the Civil Service, was 32.6%.

293. Since 2011, women were appointed for the first time to serve at the following positions: the General Director of the Ministry of Finance, the Chief Accountant at the Ministry of Finance, the commander of a police station (in the city of Petah-Tikva) and for the first time a woman was appointed for the position of Director of the thoracic surgery unit in the Soroka University Medical Center in Be'er-Sheva.

294. In June 2012, the United States' State Department, in its Trafficking in Persons Report for the year 2011, has ranked Israel at Tier 1 for the first time since 2001, this is a clear recognition of the U.S. Government of the Israeli efforts and concrete steps taken in order to fight TIP and an important determination that Israel fully meets the minimal standards required to the eradication of TIP. This achievement was also echoed in Israel's tier ranking concerning 2012, released on June 2013.

Legislation

295. On June 10, 2013, the Knesset approved Amendment no. 26 to the Religious Judges Law (Dayanim) 5715-1955, according to which, at least one of the two representatives of the Government, Knesset and the Israeli Bar association to the Committee for appointment of Religious Judges shall be a woman. In addition, the 11th member of the Committee shall be a rabbinic advocate that will be elected by the Minister of Justice. This law is intended to provide adequate representation for women in this important Committee.

296. On November 5, 2012, the Knesset enacted the Welfare Service Law (Adaptation Grant for Women who Stayed at a Shelter for Battered Women) 5773-2012. According to this Law, a woman who stayed at a battered women's shelter at least 60 days, will be entitled to an adaptation grant, provided according to a rehabilitation program upon her leaving of the shelter (within 60 days). This, provided she does not return to her permanent place of residence. According to the Law the grant will be at the sum of 8,000 NIS (2,160 USD) and in regard to women with children an additional 1,000 NIS (270 USD) will be granted for each child.

297. In 2010 and 2011, the Women's Employment Law 5714-1954 was amended in order to grant employment rights and mitigations to new mothers, adoptive parents, intended parents and parents in foster families. According to Amendment No. 46 to the Women's Employment Law (Extension of Maternity Leave to 26 Weeks) which entered into force on March 22, 2010, the maternity leave of an employee who is employed for at least one year prior to her maternity leave, shall be prolonged to 26 weeks. Of which 14 weeks are with pay, and an additional 12 weeks are without pay, during which the employer must reserve her rights at the workplace. The 2011 Amendment No. 48, provides maternity leave for parents in foster families and parents who adopt children and further extends the protection of the law to parents in such cases.

298. In August 2011, Amendment No. 4 to the Student's Rights Law 5767-2007 was enacted, according to which every academic institute will determine the modifications accorded to students on account of fertility treatments, pregnancy, childbirth, adoption or receiving a child for foster care or custody. This amendment applies the principles of promoting gender equality and provides solutions for a variety of family units, whilst increasing the flexibility of filling academic assignments, without reducing the academic quality of these demands.

299. The following measures are aimed at increasing the representation of women in the civil service and in decision making positions:

300. On April 10, 2011, the Knesset enacted the Expansion of the Appropriate Representation of Women Law (Legislative Amendments) 5771-2011 (hereinafter: "the Law"). This Law amended both the National Commissions of Inquiry Law 5728-1968 (Hereinafter the "Commissions of Inquiry Law") and the Equal Rights for Women Law, to obligate appropriate representation for both men and women in inquiry committees and national examinations committees. Moreover, according to the new Law, amending the Equal Rights for Women Law, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women in the Prime Minister Office (the "Authority") will establish a list of women who are suitable and qualified applicants to take part in such committees. According to Section 3(4)(3) to the amendment, a woman who consider herself as suitable to be included in the Authority's list may apply to the Authority in order to be included, specifying her education, experience and training. According to Section 3(4)(5)(a) of the amendment, in cases where the appointing body is unable to locate an appropriate women candidate to participate as a committee member, the appointing body will ask the Authority for details concerning women candidates which are suitable to the committee's field of interests. In addition, the person or team responsible for the appointment will examine the list prior to appointing the members of the committee, and will examine the suitability of the women according to their expertise, education, training and experience.

301. On November 1, 2010, the Knesset enacted the Career Service in the Israel Defense Force (Female Soldiers in Career Service) Law 5771-2010. The Law determines that a female career soldier may not be discharged from the Israel Defense Forces, in the sense of dismissal, due to her pregnancy, during a maternity leave, during a special leave following the maternity leave, or 60 days following these leaves, without the authorization of the Minister of Defense. The Minister shall not authorize the dismissal if, in his/her opinion, it relates to the pregnancy, delivery or an absence of the soldier due to the abovementioned leaves. The Minister may not issue an authorization for dismissal before conducting a hearing in which the soldier may present her arguments.

Case Law

302. A very recent and significant example of the prominent role played by the Israeli judiciary in safeguarding women's rights is the conviction of the former President of the State of Israel, Moshe Katzav, of committing serious sex offences. On 30 December 2010, the Tel Aviv District Court found Mr. Katzav guilty of several serious sex offences, including rape. (S.Cr.C 1015/09, The State of Israel v. Moshe Katzav (30.12.10)). On March 22, 2011, the Court sentenced Mr. Katzav to seven years imprisonment, two years suspended imprisonment and compensation in the amount of 125,000 to his victims. In May 2011, Mr. Katzav appealed against his conviction and sentence and on November 10, 2011, the Supreme Court unanimously rejected his appeal.

303. This case demonstrates the Israeli law enforcement authorities' and judiciary's relentless commitment to promoting and protecting human rights, including women's rights and dignity. It is evident that the Israeli justice system does not shy away from prosecuting even the highest level officials, where sufficient evidence is present.

Administrative Measures

304. In June 2013, the Civil Service Commissioner issued a circular (73/18), in which he notified about several amendments to the Civil Service Regulations (hereinafter "the Regulations"). According to this circular, the fact that parental rights are automatically provided to the mothers, and fathers are required to make special efforts in order to transfer these rights, wholly or partially, to them, anchors the women as the children primary caretakers. This constitutes as a barrier faced by many women when trying to advance to senior positions. Therefore, with the aim of providing equality in the family, assisting the advancement and promotion of women in the Civil Service and to facilitating fathers employed in the Civil Service with better implementation of their parental rights, it was decided to amend the Regulations. According to the amendment, the term "mother's position" will be replaced by the term "parent's position" and parenting rights will not be provided automatically to mothers, instead, any employee, male or female who is a parent to a child/children in the relevant ages, will be entitled to realize its parental rights. However, both parents will not be able to use the same right on the same day.

305. Also in June 2013, the Civil Service Commissioner issued a circular (73/16), notifying an additional amendment to the Civil Service Regulations relating to the reporting of absence hours due to pregnancy related examinations. According to paragraph 33.311 of the Regulations, women civil servants are entitled to absence hours for medical examinations relating to pregnancy. These are not deducted of the employee's annual number of vacation days. Since many of the pregnancy examinations are conducted in the beginning of the pregnancy, at a stage in which the employee is not required by law to inform the employer about her pregnancy, it was decided to allow the employee to submit the medical absence authorization forms, confirming that these examinations are pregnancy related, together with her report regarding her pregnancy, which is required from the fifth month of the pregnancy. Upon receiving these authorizations, the annual number of the employee's vacation days account will be updated accordingly.

306. On May 13, 2013, the Government resolved to appoint a Ministerial Committee for the Promotion of the Status of Women in the Israeli society (Government Resolution No. 139). This committee will be comprised of the Ministers of Senior Citizens, Health, Justice, Interior, Immigration Absorption, and Social Affairs and Social Services and will be headed by the Minister of Culture and Sport. According to the decision, permanent members in the committee's deliberations will include the director of the Authority for the Promotion of Women in the Prime Minister's Office.

307. The Committee will be in charge, inter alia, of forming policies and promotion of various issues relating to the status of women and equal opportunities for women in the Israeli society.

308. In March 2012, the Government approved Resolution No. 4382, aimed at increasing the rate of women who serve and are employed in local municipalities, by special and unique programs intended for promoting and advancing women to leadership positions. This will be carried out by providing women with skills and tools for running in elections for local municipalities, conducting awareness raising and explanatory activities for encouraging women to enter senior and leadership positions in local authorities.

309. In addition, as of 2012, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (Hereinafter the "Authority") conducts special courses throughout Israel for the economic empowerment of women and for women leadership with the goal of integrating women in key positions in the society. The authority also hold special courses for training women to serve as directors, and each year several hundreds of women qualify such courses.

310. On January 3, 2012, the Civil Service Commissioner issued a circular to all Government Ministries' Director Generals, in which he emphasized that government authorities are obligated to operate equally towards both genders. The Commissioner also noted that the Commission will see as serious and will take the necessary measures in any case of discrimination for reasons of gender.

311. The Gender Implications of Legislation Law (Legislative Amendments) 5767-2007, which entered into force on January 25, 2008, requires the Authority to submit an opinion regarding gender implications both in regard to bills and proposed regulations. During 2012, the Authority submitted 63 such opinions on new bills and in the first half of 2013, 49 such opinions were prepared by the Authority, 20 of which were already filed to the Knesset for deliberations on various new bills.

312. The Authority also monitors the way women are portrayed in the media, in ceremonies and in various advertisements. During 2011, the Authority approached 15 advertisers regarding offensive advertisements, and in most cases the offensive advertisement was removed.

313. On the occasion of the International Day for the Elimination of Violence against Women, on November 27, 2011, the Government adopted Resolution No. 3884, on the establishment of a public committee for the examination of treatment of domestic violent men. The committee was charged with creating a plan to deal with such men, which will, inter alia, include reference to existing methods and required legislative amendments.

Implementation of the Prevention of Sexual Harassment Law 5758-1998

314. The Authority continued to distribute an information kit on the prevention of sexual harassment, as well as conducted a radio information campaign and an information and enforcement campaign in cooperation with the Ministry of Economics, in which a letter was sent to employers, workplaces were visited and codes, information kits and pamphlets were distributed.

315. The Code for the Prevention of Sexual Harassment was distributed to employers in five languages, and was also attached to the pay slips of employees in the Civil Service, during May 2011. This is the second year in which this campaign takes place, and it contributed to the awareness for sexual harassment.

Public Disorder in Beit Shemesh

316. During the period of August and December 2011, several incidents related to modesty occurred in Beit Shemesh, including a verbal attack on an eight year old girl. Following this incident and additional such incidents of public disorder, several suspects were detained by the Police, mainly for public disorder offences. Note that no complaint was filed by the eight year old girl or anyone on her behalf.

317. In addition, following these incidents, the Beit Shemesh police station took several enforcement steps and arrested seven suspects for assault, harassment and arson.

Women Segregation in the Public Sphere

318. One of Israel's challenges in the area of gender based equality protection has been recent attempts by some groups to exclude women from the public arena, especially within certain religious communities. The Government rejected these attempts and in December 2011 formed an inter-ministerial team whose task was to recommend various solutions. The inter-ministerial team concluded its work and reported its recommendations to the Government on March 11, 2012.

319. On January 5, 2012, the Attorney General appointed a team headed by the Deputy Attorney General (Civilian Affairs), to examine the marginalization of women from the public sphere. The team was established due to the increasing number of reports regarding various instances of discrimination against women and excluding them from the public sphere, inter alia, through verbal and physical violence. The team was assigned to examine the legal aspects of some of the more prominent examples of this phenomenon, and to reach recommendations to handle this phenomenon, either through criminal or administrative measures. The team was also asked to examine the necessity of legislative amendments.

320. Representatives from the Ministries of Transportation and Road Safety, Health, Interior, Communication, and Religious Services appeared before the committee, as well as representatives from the Police, the Commission for Equal Employment Opportunities, and the Second Authority for Television and Radio. The Team also heard the Legal Advisor to the Municipality of Beit Shemesh.

321. The team received applications from individuals, organizations and Knesset Members regarding the various topics it examined. These applications presented a variety of views and opinions regarding the phenomenon of segregation between men and women in the public sphere. These views were all examined and considered by the team.

322. Note that the Ministry of Justice team was established following the establishment of an inter-ministerial team for the prevention of exclusion of women from the public sphere, which was headed by the Minister of Culture and Sports. The representative of the Ministry of Justice to the inter-ministerial team also acted as a coordinator between the two teams. The inter-ministerial team concluded its work and reported its recommendations to the Government on March 11, 2012.

323. The Ministry of Justice team submitted its report to the Attorney General in March 2013, and as a preliminary remark, the team emphasized that the phenomenon which some of its expressions are referred to as “exclusion of women” is a grievous phenomenon characterized by discrimination against any and all women. This discrimination undermines the foundations of the democratic State of Israel, which recognized the human value of any and all persons.

324. Following are the recommendations of the team on the specific issues:

(a) The separation between men and women during funerals which was found in certain cemeteries, as well as the prohibition on allowing women to eulogize amounts to wrongful discrimination. The team recommended that the Ministry of Religious Services will operate for the immediate cessation of these acts (with an exception in cases where the deceased’s family expressed its will to implement such measures, in which the Jewish burial society is allowed to take such temporary means).

(b) Segregation between men and women in national ceremonies and events – the team noted that the responsibility to protect human rights is entrusted first and foremost on the public authorities. Thus, a Government Ministry or another public authority are not authorized to conduct a governmental or national event, or to auspice one, in which measures to segregate between men and women will be carried out. The team noted that women have a full and equal right to take part in these events, both as audience and as participants. The team determined that in such events there is a prohibition to post any signs, barriers or take any other means in order to direct the crowd for separate seating or separate participation in such a public event. That, even if it is conducted at the request of some of the participants.

(c) The team noted that the only exception to the abovementioned rule is when the event is of a religious nature, and the authority believes that the vast majority of the attendees want such separation.

(d) The team recommended that the Ministry of Health will act in order to end any segregation in Health Funds branches in which segregation which was deemed unwarranted by medical considerations between men and women occurs. The team also recommended that the Ministry of Health will operate immediately for the issuance of a Director General circular on this matter.

(e) The team noted that the problem of separation in certain public transportation bus lines still persists, and is occasionally accompanied by coercion and violence towards women. The team recommended that in all public transportation bus lines, including lines in which such segregation exists, the boarding of the bus by women will not be allowed through the back door (as is done in segregated lines) and all passengers will be required to board through the front door and pay directly to the driver. In addition, all passengers will be allowed to freely choose their seat. The team recommended that the Ministry of Transportation and Road Safety will order operators of public transportation to immediately cease from allowing passengers to board through the back door. In addition the team recommended that the Ministry will increase the enforcement and supervision on public transportation companies and act in order to ensure free and equal use of public transportation services.

(f) The team noted that signs calling for women to choose different routes or dress modestly express a message that women are not free to use any area of the public sphere equally. This infringes upon women human dignity. The team recommended that municipalities which hold the authority to regulate the matter of posting signposts in the public domain and provide licenses for such signposts, must refrain from allowing segregating posts in its domain. The team recommended that while considering setting up signposts, the municipality will attach great importance to the severe infringement caused by the posting of such signs and act not only for their removal but also for the prosecution of the persons responsible according to the law. The team also recommended that the Ministry of Interior should also exert its monitoring and supervising authorities in order to ensure that the municipalities will uphold their duties regarding this issue.

(g) According to the team, the policy of the “Kol Ba-Rama” radio station not to broadcast women voices or hire women as broadcasters infringes the fundamental rights of equality and freedom of expression. The team noted that the fact that this station is intended for a religious public does not mitigate these discriminations. The team advised the Second Authority to conclude its deliberation with the station, for ending this policy, within a six month time frame and to ensure that until then the discriminating means will cease.

325. The team members were disputed regarding the question of whether a criminal legislative amendment is required in order to deal with this phenomenon. On the one hand it was held that the severity of the phenomenon warranted stricter effective measures, as criminal offence, than the administrative measures offered, while others held that the use of criminal law, which is one of the strongest tools that the Government wields over the public, is too powerful and intrusive to be used in regards to behavior which is, although wrong and offensive, not strictly criminal. The team recommended leaving this decision to the Attorney General based on the other recommendations specified throughout their report.

Adoption of the Report by the Attorney General

326. Following the submission of this report, in a meeting that was held on May 6, 2013, the Attorney General decided to adopt the team’s recommendations regarding prohibition of women segregation, and to promote criminal legislation that will prohibit harassment of a person in a way of contempt or humiliation for reasons of religion or religious group, nationality, country of origin, gender, sexual inclination, opinion, political affiliation, personal status or parenting, all of the above with a purpose of preventing access and use of a public service or with the purpose of harming the conditions of receiving such a public service. It was concluded that a draft bill will be presented in the near future.

327. In addition to the above, in Government Resolution No. 4052 (woman/6) of December 29, 2011, the Government resolved that the Authority will operate an open hot-line designated for receiving complaints concerning women segregation. On January 8, 2012, the Authority published the opening of this hot-line. According to information received from the Authority, the complaints that were received were handled with the relevant authorities in each case. According to this resolution, the Ministry of Transportation, National Infrastructures and Road Safety has also opened such hot-line designated for complains regarding women segregation in public transportation.

Advancement of Arab Women

328. C. State of emergency (art. 4) and derogations from international standards

Question 12

Review of the Legislation Governing the State of Emergency

332. The State of Israel remained in an officially-proclaimed state of public emergency since May 19, 1948, four days after its founding, until the present day. The original declaration of a state of emergency was issued by the Provisional Council of State, in the midst of the war that began several months prior to the declaration of Israel's independence on May 14, 1948, with neighboring states and the local Arab population. Since then, the state of emergency has remained in force due to the ongoing state of war or violent conflict between Israel and its neighbors, and the constant attacks on the lives and property of its citizens. For additional information regarding the state of emergency in Israel please see Replies of the Government of Israel to the List of Issues to be taken up in connection with the consideration of the third periodic report of Israel (CCPR/C/ISR/Q/3/Add.1, Question 9, p. 28).

333. On May 8, 2012, Israel's High Court of Justice rejected a petition that was submitted in 1999 by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, to cancel the declaration on state of public emergency in Israel. The Court decided to cancel a previous order nisi and to strike off the petition since the proceedings have been exhausted and especially due to the legislative progress to enact a law that will allow the future cancelation of the state of emergency. The Court noted that although the work is not done yet, it is in the opinion that the authorities should be allowed to continue and conclude the legislation activities which this petition assisted in promoting. The Court also noted that the Israeli reality is still sensitive and complex and does not allow leaving the authorities without the necessary powers they require in times of emergency. The Court further noted that "Israel is a normal state which is not normal – it is a normal state in the sense that it is an active democracy which observes basic rights, among them free elections, freedom of speech, independent courts and legal advice. However it is not normal since the threats over its existence have not yet been lifted, it is the only democracy under such threats and the fight against terrorism still continues and will probably continue in the near future." (H.C.J. 3091/99, The Association of Civil Rights in Israel v. The Knesset).

334. The Court also referred to several legislation processes that have reached their appropriate conclusion recently: the partial replacement of the Extension of Validity of State of Emergency Regulations Law (Supervision of Naval Vessels) [Consolidated Version] 5733-1973 with two new laws: the Shipping Law (Foreign Naval Vessel Under Israeli Control) 5765-2005, and the Shipping Law (Violations Against the Security of International Sailing and Maritime Facilities) 5768-2008. The Court further noted that additional bills in this matter are under various stages of legislation that indicates that the authorities understand that the time has come to part from the rest of the emergency legislation that was in force since the establishment of Israel. The Court stated that due to the circumstances and the measures taken, the Court's interference is not required.

335. In addition to the abovementioned information, in 2012, the link between the Prevention of Infiltration Law and the state of emergency legislation was severed. Furthermore, in the tenure of the previous Knesset (2009-2013), over 100 Supervision Orders that have been previously enacted according to the Supervision on Products and Services Law 5718-1957 have been annulled, leaving only 54 valid orders.

336. The current state of emergency is in force until December 31, 2013. The Knesset extended the state of emergency by only six additional months in order to expedite the separation of the current legislation.

Independence of the Turkel Commission for the Examination of the Flotilla Incident

339. As detailed in Israel's Follow-up to the Oral Presentation by the State of Israel before the Committee on Civil and Political Rights of October 2011, following the flotilla incident of May 31, 2010, the Government of Israel established by Government Resolution No. 1796, dated June 14, 2010 (hereinafter: the Government Resolution) an independent public commission headed by (retired) Supreme Court Justice Yaacov Turkel, for the purpose of examining the conformity of the actions taken by Israel in connection with the flotilla incident with the norms and requirements of International Law. As further mentioned in Israel's Follow-up report, in addition to the esteemed members of the Commission, two international observers were appointed to the Commission, as will be detailed further below. As noted by the Turkel Commission itself in its report, the observers were full participants in all aspects of the Commission's work.⁷

340. The establishment of such a Commission, a measure undertaken only in exceptional circumstances, further amplifies Israel's commitment to comprehensively investigate all aspects of the incident, above and beyond the robust mechanisms of investigation and review provided by Israeli law.

341. The Government Resolution determined that the Turkel Commission could request any individual or organization, Israeli or foreign, to testify before it or to relay information in another manner, on topics which it considered relevant to its deliberations, including the Prime Minister and members of the Israeli cabinet. As per military personnel, section 6 of the Government Resolution sets forth that the Turkel Commission may hear testimony from the IDF Chief of Staff and the head of the Expert Military Investigative–Team, General (Res.) Giyora Eiland.

342. With respect to other military personnel, the Commission's mandate created a special procedure for the collection of testimonies. Section 6 of the Government Resolution sets forth that Turkel Commission shall receive all the required documents for its review, and can also request the head of the Expert Military Investigative–Team, to provide it with the summary findings of the operational debriefings (also known as command investigations) conducted after the flotilla incident. Furthermore, if the Turkel Commission was to decide, after examining these documents, that there is a need for further investigation, it had the authority to request the Expert Military Investigative–Team to instruct the team to do so, and provide it with the summary findings collected thereby.

343. In addition, on July 4, 2010, the Commission’s jurisdiction was broadened and it was given authorities according to Sections 9-11 and 27(b) of the Commissions of Inquiry Law, subject to the abovementioned limitations, provided in Section 6 of the Government Resolution. These Sections of the Commissions of Inquiry Law allow the chairman of an inquiry commission to subpoena a person to testify before the committee or present documents or other exhibits in his/her possession; to require a witness to testify under oath; to force the appearance of a person who did not present him/herself following the subpoena; to collect testimony abroad; to impose a monetary fine on persons who refused to appear after being subpoenaed; to provide a witness with a warrant for expenses; and more.

344. A petition was submitted to the Supreme Court against the limitation on the ability of the Turkel Commission to directly hear testimonies by IDF personnel who took part in the military efforts to prevent the breach of the maritime blockade during the flotilla incident (H.C.J. 4641/10, Uri Avneri et al. v. The Prime Minister et al.).

345. During the deliberations on this petition, the parties agreed (in a decision that was given the status of court decision) to postpone the proceedings, leaving the case as “pending”, since it was unknown at the time whether the Commission would need to subpoena soldiers to testify before it. It was agreed that insofar as the Turkel Commission would wish to subpoena soldiers to testify before it regarding the events of the flotilla, it could request the Government to enable it do so, and were the Government to refuse, the matter would be examined on merit by the Court.

346. In practice, the Turkel Commission used the authority granted to it by the Government Resolution to extend and deepen the scope of the investigations into operational aspects of the incident, where the Commission considered it necessary. It was resolved that a representative of the Commission would work opposite IDF personnel, who were appointed for this purpose and were not involved in the flotilla incident. Subsequently, additional debriefings were conducted according to the specific instructions and guidance provided by the Commission’s representative. As part of these debriefings, the testimonies of numerous combat soldiers and IDF personnel which were directly involved in the incident were provided to the Commission.⁸

347. Furthermore, it is important to add that many senior officials, from both the political and the military ranks, testified before the Commission at length and in detail, including the Prime Minister, the Minister of Defense, the IDF Chief of Staff, the Military Advocate General and the Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories (COGAT).

348. Given the extensive powers given to the Turkel Commission to hear witnesses and receive documents, and the procedure established in the Commission’s mandate and employed vigorously by the Commission in order to present to it testimony of IDF personnel, the Turkel Commission was able to receive all of the necessary information it required from the military authorities.⁹ As noted above, in the course of proceedings before Israel’s High Court of Justice, the Court ruled that in the event that the Commission was interested in hearing direct testimony of military personnel and was unable to do so, the matter would be adjudicated by the Court. However, under the circumstances described above, the Turkel Commission did not find it necessary to directly subpoena soldiers to testify before it. This was because its members were satisfied that the powers granted to the Commission, the information submitted to it and the extensive testimonies provided, including that of the IDF Chief of Staff which testified before it twice, were sufficient.

349. A significant indication as to the independence of the Commission can be found in the statements of the distinguished international observers, Nobel Peace Prize laureate Lord William David Trimble from Northern Ireland (UK), and former Canadian Judge Advocate General of the Canadian Forces, Brigadier General (ret.) Kenneth Watkin QC. In a letter attached to the first part of the Turkel Report, the two observers note that “[t]he Commission made enormous efforts, to get as much information as possible. This involved going back to the IDF for additional information, obtaining further staff to examine all the video material (hundreds of hours) including the CCTV downloaded from the Mavi Marmara and to collate the material so that it has been able to examine each use of force by the IDF. [...] We have no doubt that the Commission is independent. This part of the report is evidence of its rigor.”¹⁰

350. Finally, the Turkel Commission published the first part of the report in January 2011. Many of the determinations made by the Commission, based on the extensive information that was made available to the Commission, including its conclusion that the imposition and enforcement of the naval blockade on the Gaza Strip was lawful and complied with the rules of International Law, were also adopted by the UN-appointed Secretary-General’s Panel of Inquiry on the 31 May 2010 Flotilla Incident (the Palmer Report¹¹).

351. In February 2013, the Commission concluded its work on the second part of its report pursuant to Section 5¹² of its mandate, in which the Commission reviewed the examination and investigation mechanisms in Israel for complaints and claims of violations of the laws of armed conflict and their compliance with Israel’s obligations under international law¹³.

352. Additional support to the Commission’s independence can be found in the statements of the distinguished international observers accompanying the second part of its report. For example, Lord Trimble stated, inter alia: “[i]t is my observation that the members of the Commission and the international observers were free to deliberate and to recommend as we saw fit without interference from, and independently of, the Government of Israel”. Brigadier General (ret.) Watkin QC had retired due to a previous commitment prior to the conclusion of the second part of the report; however, in his letter to the Commission he noted, inter alia, that: “since the completion of the last report the Commission has continued to independently and rigorously investigate the significant issues with which it has been entrusted”.

353. Finally, Professor Timothy McCormack, a Professor of Law at Melbourne University and Special Adviser on International Humanitarian Law to the Prosecutor of the ¹² Section 5 of Government Resolution No. 1796 of June 14, 2010: “In addition the Commission will examine the question whether the examination and investigation mechanism in regard to complaints and claims concerning violations the laws of armed conflict in Israel in general, and the way it is implemented in regard to the present incident are compatible with the State of Israel obligations under international law”.

It reveals, that taken as a whole, Israeli law and practice will stand comparison with the best in the world”. All of these statements are an additional and unmistakable indication as to the independence of the Turkel Commission.

355. Please see the reply to Question no. 4 above.

E. Prohibition of torture, right to liberty and security of person, treatment of persons deprived of their liberty and fair trial (arts. 7, 9, 10, and 14)

Question 15

Prohibition of Torture and the “Necessity” Defense

356. An offence containing a prohibition of torture has not been legislated in Israel. However, acts and behaviors defined as torture under Article 1 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT) and Article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) (causing pain or suffering, whether physical or mental) constitute offenses of assault (Sign Eight to chapter ten of the Penal Law), threat (Sections 192 or 428 of the Penal Law) or causing injury (Sign Four to Chapter Ten of the Penal Law).¹⁴ Furthermore, abuse or cruel treatment towards a victim of an offence is expected to exacerbate the criminal punishment. Section 40(i)(a)(3),(4),(10) and (11) of the Penal Law, which was amended in the past year as part of Amendment No. 113 to the Penal Law (Construction of Judicial Discretion in Punishment), lists “the cruelty, violence and abuse by the perpetrator against the victim of the offence or his exploitation”, and the damage from the offence or the abuse of power of the defendant towards the victim as aggravating circumstances for perpetrating the offence, according to which the appropriate scope of punishment will be determined in the verdict.

¹⁴ See for example: Section 277 to the Penal Law:

Pressure by public servant

1. A public servant who is doing one of the following, is liable to three years imprisonment:
 - (1) Using or ordering to use force or violence against a person, in order to extort from that person or from another person in whom he/she has an interest, a confession of an offense or information concerning an offense;
 - (2) Threatening a person or ordering a person to be threatened, with bodily injury or damage to his/her property or of another person in whom that person has an interest in, in order to extort from him/her a confession of an offense or information about an offense.

And Section 280 to the Penal Law:

Abuse of office

1. A public servant who is doing one of the following, is liable to three years imprisonment:
 - (1) While abusing his authority he performs or ordering to perform an arbitrary act that injures the rights of another person;
 - (2) [...].

357. The defense of “Necessity” remains in Israeli legislation, and this defense has neither been cancelled nor limited by legislation.

The Inspector for Complaints Against the Israel Security Agency (ISA) Interrogators (Hereinafter the “Inspector”)

358. According to the Police Ordinance [New Version] 5731-1971, opening an investigation against an ISA employee is subject to the decision of the Attorney General or the State Attorney or one of his/her deputies. If so decided, such an investigation shall be conducted by the Department for Investigations against Police Officers (DIPO). However, in order to decide upon conducting such an investigation, a preliminary examination is to be made by the Inspector. Following such an examination, the Inspector’s findings are transferred to his/her Supervisor who is a senior advocate in the State Attorney’s Office, who decides if there is room to recommend on opening an investigation.

359. Following comprehensive deliberations, the Attorney General announced in November 2010, that the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators (hereinafter: the “Inspector”), which has been an administrative part of the Israel Security Agency, would become part of the Ministry of Justice and be subordinated – administratively and organizationally – to the Director General of the Ministry of Justice.

360. This reform, establishing an external inspector to examine complaints concerning ISA Interrogations was supported by the Head of the ISA, the State Attorney and the Director General of the Ministry of Justice.

361. Israel is pleased to announce that the procedure of transferring the Inspector to the Ministry of Justice is nearing completion. In June 2013, Colonel (Ret.) Jana Modzgvishvily was chosen to serve as the Inspector. Mrs. Modzgvishvily, who in the last four years served as the Chief Military Prosecutor, recently retired from 22 years of military service, in which she served in many positions in the military advocacy, including several years as a military judge. Following this nomination, the Ministry of Justice is operating to create the additional required positions. Following the completion of the manning of these positions, the unit in the ISA will be dispersed.

Case Law

362. In H.C.J. 1265/11, The Public Committee Against Torture et al. v. The Attorney General (6.8.12), the High Court of Justice reviewed complaints regarding the Inspector. The petition included complaints regarding the Inspector’s authority to examine complaints against ISA Interrogators, the duty of the respondent and the Police (or another authorized body such as the Department of investigation of Police Officers (DIPO)) to investigate any complaint regarding an offence, and the question of organizational affiliation of the Inspector, who was at that time, an ISA employee.

363. The Court noted that a preliminary examination prior to a decision regarding opening a criminal investigation may be part of the decision making process in the State Attorney’s Office and held that such a preliminary examination is an acceptable course of action.

364. The Court also noted that in regard to the authority to order a criminal investigation, as determined by the Court in previous rulings, the authorities are not obligated to automatically open an investigation following complaints, and such duty to open an investigation is conditioned on sufficient evidentiary infrastructure which justifies it.

365. The Court noted that in light of the principle authority to conduct a preliminary examination, and the need of sufficient evidentiary infrastructure to justify the opening of a criminal investigation, the mechanism of the Inspector and the Inspector’s Supervisor (a senior attorney in the Israeli State Attorney's Office of the Ministry of Justice, appointed by the Attorney General) is an appropriate balance between all the relative interests, in parallel to the recently completed process of the Inspector becoming part of the Ministry of Justice.

366. The Court also noted that conducting such a preliminary examination by one specific mechanism, who will not be an ISA employee, but an employee of the Ministry of Justice, will serve the public interest in safeguarding the ISA interrogation methods by ensuring that efficient interrogation tools are used within the boundaries of the law, which will assist in protecting confidential information.

367. The Court found that the availability of an appeal process, both by appealing to the Attorney General, followed by the possibility to petition for judicial review by the High Court Of Justice, provide adequate safeguards. The Court did not examine the cases of the specific plaintiffs but rather recommended that the period of appeal over a decision not to open an investigation in these specific cases will be extended in order to allow them to file an appeal to the Attorney General.

368. In H.C.J. 1266/11, Mahmoud Sa'witi et al. v. The Attorney General (21.10.12), the Public Committee against Torture and the Sa'witi family petitioned the High Court of Justice and requested the Court to instruct the Attorney General to order the Department of investigation of Police Officers (DIPO) to launch a criminal investigation against ISA investigators who were involved in Mahmoud Sa'witi's interrogation during which they presented Mr. Sa'witi with a false display according to which his father and wife had been arrested and detained.

369. The Court further noted that an assistant of the Attorney General replied to this application stating that the ISA has examined this issue and had emphasized that an arrest of an interrogatee's family member is legal when it is done under the same criminal sequence, and there is legal grounds for the arrest of the family member. On such circumstances, there is no hindrance to inform one relative about the detention of the other, including allowing them to meet. However, when a detainee's relative is not arrested and there are no legal grounds for his/her arrest, there is no justification to create a false display in which the detainee's relative is under arrest. The Attorney General Assistant also noted that there was no cause to take such an action, from which a false display was created as if Mr. Sa'witi's father had been arrested. The Court further noted that a previous petition to the High Court of Justice by the Public Committee Against Torture, to totally prohibit the use of family members as a coercive tool during interrogation was denied (H.C.J 3533/08, Mison Sa'witi et al. v. The Israeli Security Service et al. (9.9.09)).

370. The Court noted the abovementioned High Court of Justice ruling (H.C.J. 1265/11, The Public Committee Against Torture et al. v. The Attorney General (6.8.12)) and stated that also in the present case, the appropriate way to examine the specific allegations is by submission of an appeal to the Attorney General against the Deputy State Attorney's decision not to conduct an investigation against the ISA interrogators, according to the verdict in H.C.J. 1265/11. The Court, after receiving the consent of the Attorney General, stated that the date for such an appeal (that has expired already) should be extended in order to allow the petitioners to submit such an appeal.

371. In July 2012, the Public Committee against Torture – Israel, petitioned the High Court of Justice in order to instruct the Attorney General and the State Attorney to order a criminal investigation against a number of ISA interrogators who were involved in the interrogation of A.A.G (petitioner no. 1), for suspicions of use of torture and abuse during his interrogation. According to the complaint, petitioner no. 1 was subject to illegal interrogation means, including physical violence, sleep deprivation, mental stress and threats against his family members. It was also claimed that one of the rooms in petitioner no. 1's home was demolished and he was brought to watch the demolition. According to the complaint, the Attorney General and the State Attorney, based on the recommendations of the Inspector's Supervisor, decided not to open such an investigation – which according to the petition is an unreasonable decision. It was also claimed, that not only that the Inspector's examination of this case did not refute A.A.G's complaint, but it noted that the examination of his complaint gave rise, in certain points, to lessons for the future. However the final decision was that no grounds were found to take legal measures against the interrogators. This case is still pending before the Court (5722/12, A.A.G. et al. v. The Attorney General et al.).

372. In addition, there are several additional pending petitions among them: H.C.J. 1494/12, Anonymous v. The Attorney General et al., regarding the right to review examination material and H.C.J. 7273/12, Jihad Riad Muqrabi et al. v. The Attorney General, regarding the time period to review an appeal against a decision not to open a criminal investigation against ISA interrogators for alleged violence and abuse, by the Attorney General.

Alleged Cases of Torture, Ill-Treatment and Disproportionate Use of Force by Law-Enforcement Officials

373. Every complaint or report regarding torture, ill-treatment and disproportionate use of force against detainees, adults and children alike is investigated promptly by the relevant authorities.

374. A number of sections of the Penal Law provide criminal sanctions against acts of torture. Reference should also be made to the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. Moreover, strict guidelines relating to methods of interrogation of security suspects are also directed to prevention of torture.

375. Another relevant statutory provision is Section 12 of the Evidence Ordinance [New Version] 5731-1971 which invalidates any confession made by an accused person not made freely and voluntarily.

376. Section 34m of the Penal Law allows the defense of conducting an act by a person that was obligated or authorized to do so according to the Law (Section 34m(1)), and acting according to an order of an authorized authority to which he/she was obligated to obey, except if the order was clearly illegal (Section 34m(2)). Where an order is manifestly illegal, as would be the case with an order to commit acts of torture, acting under such order would clearly not constitute a defense for a person accused of committing such acts.

377. Furthermore, Israel's legislation provides for different supervision and oversight mechanisms, including the Israel Security Agency Law 5762-2002 that addresses the major relevant issues concerning the mandate, operation, and scope of functioning of the ISA. This, in order to ensure that the relevant authorities uphold the law in particular, and the prohibition on torture, ill treatment and disproportionate use of force, in particular.

378. For further information regarding the Inspector for Complaints Against the Israel Security Agency (ISA) Interrogators please see the reply to Question No. 15 above.

ISA Interrogators

379. The ISA is responsible by law for the safeguarding of Israel's security, regime, and state institutions, from terrorist threats, espionage and other threats. In order to fulfill its purpose, the Agency performs, among other things, investigations of suspects in terrorist activity. The main goal of such investigation is data gathering intended to foil and prevent terrorist acts.

380. The Israel Security Agency (ISA) operates in accordance with the ruling of the High Court of Justice, and specifically the ruling concerning ISA interrogations from 1999 (H.C.J. 5100/94, The Public Committee against Torture v. The State of Israel).

381. In addition, in 2009, the High Court of Justice, in a panel of three judges headed by the President Dorit Beinisch (retired), rejected a petition which claimed an alleged breach, by the State and the ISA, of the High Court of Justice's 1999 ruling concerning the ISA investigations. (H.C.J. 5100/94, The Public Committee against Torture in Israel v. The State of Israel).

382. The ISA and its employees act within the limits of the law and are subject to both internal and external supervision and review, including by the State Comptroller, the State Attorney's Office, the Attorney General, the Knesset and every instance of the courts, including the High Court of Justice.

383. The detainees undergoing ISA interrogation receive all the rights to which they are entitled according to international conventions to which Israel is a party and the Israeli law, including the rights to legal representations, medical care and visits by the International Red Cross.

384. The ISA directives provide minors with special protections warranted by their age. For example, actions concerned with interrogations involving a minor, including the very decision to detain a minor for interrogation, requires the approval of the highest ranks of the ISA. Furthermore, the interrogation hours are meticulously observed, as well as providing minors with sleep time. Additionally, minors are detained separately from adults. Finally, there is strict observance that minors are interrogated by an investigator which has undergone special training for investigation of youths.

Israeli Police

385. The Israeli Police and the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice views instances of police officers' ill-treatment and disproportionate use of force against detainees with the utmost severity.

386. Serious efforts are being undertaken to eliminate any form of such abuse. Cases of alleged violence are investigated thoroughly and meticulously, using all means to exhaust the interrogation and bring to justice those found to be unnecessarily violent or acting in an unreasonable manner.

387. The Police Disciplinary Tribunal, residing in a case of unlawful use of force towards a non-officer, shall be composed of two police officers and a public representative. The purpose of convening such a tribunal is to elevate the public's trust in police treatment of complaints regarding the unlawful use of force. The tribunal may impose penalties ranging between fines, warnings, reprimands, confinement, demotion, or incarceration.

388. In certain cases, when the use of force is relatively trivial, the Department submits complaint fact sheets, judicially reviewed by a single Tribunal judge through an expeditious process, without legal counsel. The Tribunal considers the type of injury, the results of the use of force, the location of the offence, the officer's disciplinary record and his/her personal circumstances.

389. As detailed in Israel's previous reports, the Department for Investigation of Police Officers in the Ministry of Justice is responsible for most criminal investigations against police officers. Disciplinary proceedings are initiated by submitting a complaint to the Disciplinary Department of the Personnel Division at the Police Central Headquarters, or to any of its branches. Also, administrative sanctions may be imposed at any time during the proceedings, as well as after the proceedings are completed.

Israeli Prisons Service

390. Every prisoner or detainee under the care of the Israel Prisons Service (IPS) has access to the following complaint mechanisms concerning grievances regarding the staff and wardens', including claimed wrongful use of force:

- Filing a complaint to the director of the prison;
- Petitioning the relevant District Court in a prisoner's petition, in accordance with section 62A of the Prisons Ordinance, 5732-1971, and the Procedures (Prisoners Petitions) Regulations, 5740-1980;
- Filing a complaint to the Warden's Investigation Unit (WIU), through the IPS or directly to the Unit. This Unit is part of the Israeli Police, and its members are police officers. The findings of the WIU are subject to the State Attorney's Office scrutiny, who decides whether to institute disciplinary measures or criminal proceedings; or
- Filing a complaint to the Prisoners Complaint Ombudsman, who is a member of the Ministry of Public Security's internal comptroller unit that has the authority to inquire. Following the completion of the inquiry, and based on its findings, the complaint shall be forwarded to the WIU or the Disciplinary Branch in the IPS.

391. Additionally, Section 71 of the Prisons Ordinance establishes rules for Official Visitors in prisons. These Visitors are appointed by the Minister of Public Security and are comprised of lawyers from the Ministry of Justice and other Governmental Ministries, who are appointed on a yearly basis, either for a specific prison, or nationwide. Section 72 of the Prisons Ordinance grants official visitor's authorities to Supreme Court judges and the Attorney General [in prisons] throughout Israel, and to District and Magistrate Courts judges in prisons in their jurisdiction. Official Visitors are allowed to enter the prisons at any given time (unless special temporary circumstances apply), inspect the state of affairs, prisoners' care, prison management, etc. During these visits, the prisoners may approach the visitors and present their complaints, including grievances pertaining to use of force. Prisoners may also make a complaint with the director of the prison and ask for an interview with an Official Visitor. Attorney General's Guideline (No. 4.1201. (1.5.75), updated – 1.9.2002) broadened the scope of the above to also include detention facilities and detention cells in police stations.

392. In addition, Israeli prisons, the Israeli Prisons Service and the Ministry of Public Security are routinely subjected to inspection by the State Comptroller.

Audio/visual Documentation of Interrogations

393. The temporary provision in Section 17 to the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law 5762-2002 (Hereinafter the "Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law"), provides the Police with an exemption from the obligation of audio or visual documentation of interrogations of suspects detained for security offences, an obligation that is set in Sections 7 and 11 to the Law. This temporary provision was enacted after it was revealed that in the special circumstances of a security interrogation, in which the relevant authorities deal with extreme terrorist organizations, the audio and visual documentation of the interrogations may assist these organizations to learn and draw conclusions regarding the interrogations procedure and by that assist and strengthen them for future interrogations, what may lead to foiling future interrogations and investigations.

394. In addition, such documentation may deter interrogatees from providing information, due to the fear that the cooperation with the interrogating authorities will be discovered to or revealed by their families, friends and the terrorist organization to which they belong to.

395. In July 2012, the temporary provision was examined once again, however, since there is no change in the security situation that requires such exemption, and due to improvements in the intelligence capabilities of the terrorist organizations, the Ministerial Legislation Committee decided that the temporary provision is still essential for the investigation and foiling of terrorist offences. Accordingly, the duration of the temporary provision was prolonged by additional three years during which similar arrangements in other states will be analyzed in order to examine the possibility of an alternative arrangement to the temporary provision (for example evidence confidentiality etc.). In addition, during this period, the term “security offence” is expected to be amended, inter alia, by narrowing its definition, and by adding the condition that such an offence is required to be carried out in circumstances in which there is a fear for harming state security or if the offence was carried out in connection to an act of terrorism.

396. The exemption from audio or visual documentation does not exempt the Police from their obligation to properly document security investigations, according to previous rulings, but this documentation may be conducted in writing.

Case Law

397. On February 6, 2013, the High Court of Justice rejected an appeal filed by “Adalah – the Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel” against the Ministry of Defense, in which the petitioners requested the Court to revoke Section 17 to the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law and to instruct the ISA to visually document interrogations of suspects in security offences. The Court determined, inter alia, that in this case, when the arrangement of the temporary provision and the definition of a “security offence” are being reviewed by the State, the petitioners should wait for the results of the examination, and therefore the Court found no room to intervene and dismissed the case (H.C.J. 9416/10, Adalah the Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel et al. v. The Ministry of Defense et al. (6.2.13).

398. In regard to administrative detention please see the reply to Question 4 above.

Article 9 of the Covenant

399. Israel’s derogations to Article 9 of the Covenant are reviewed periodically. At present, Israel has not changed its position in this matter.

Question 18

400. Please see the reply to Question no. 4 above.

401. The most recent development in the efforts to fight terrorism is the current work on the Fight against Terrorism Bill, 5771-2011. In August 2011, this bill was approved by the Knesset in the first reading and is currently waiting to be reviewed by the Knesset Constitution, Law and Justice Committee. Significant efforts were invested in drafting this bill, which includes, inter alia, definitions of “act of terrorism”, “terrorist organization”, “member in a terrorist organization” etc. Some of the definitions were adapted to match similar definitions in other states with a justice system similar to Israel. In any case, all of these definitions were drafted carefully, in order to provide the law enforcement authorities with effective and precise tools in their fight against terrorist organizations and terrorism in general, while protecting human rights and due process rights.

402. This bill, upon its enactment, will continue the fight against terrorism and terrorism offences in the framework of the criminal law in the civil instances, and therefore accordingly, in these instances and proceedings, the defendants shall continue to enjoy all the substantial and procedural safeguards meant to protect the defendants and the transparency of the procedure.

403. This bill, upon its enactment, will allow the annulment of current legislation in the field of fighting terrorism, such as: the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance 5708-1948 (Hereinafter the "Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance"), Prohibition of Financing Terrorism Law 5765-2005 and some of the Defense Regulation (State of Emergency) 1945.

Additional Safeguards and Remedies Available to Detainees

404. These include Amendment no. 42 to the Prisons Ordinance [New Version] 5732-1971 of May 2012, which added Sections 11B to 11E to the Ordinance. These sections refer to adequate detention conditions for prisoners, including adequate sanitation conditions, medical treatment and supervision according to an IPS physician's determination, bed and mattress, the ability to hold personal items, adequate food and water, cloths, items for personal hygiene, adequate lighting and ventilation and the ability to go outdoors, all according to the IPS Regulations. In addition, Section 11C provides the right to integrate in leisure or educational activities according to IPS Regulations. According to Section 11D, the Prisons Service Commissioner shall examine the possibility of rehabilitation of a prisoner who is an Israeli citizen or resident, and will take the necessary steps to ensure maximal integration of that prisoner in rehabilitation activities.

405. In addition, in 2010, the Prisons Service (Detention Conditions) Regulations entered into force. These regulations also specify rights and obligations in regard to detention. Also, in 2012, the Conditional Release from Incarceration Law 5761-2001, was amended and Section 7 to the Law regarding conditional release of a prisoner for medical reasons was expanded, and the Law currently allows the IPS conditional release committee to instruct an early release of a prisoner for medical reasons which include severe medical condition such as a prisoner who is given constant artificial respiration, advanced dementia, unconsciousness, cancer or a prisoner who has a transplant surgery, and all in accordance with the conditions specified in the Law. In addition, the Youth Regulations (Trial, Punishment and Modes of Treatment) 5773-2012, and the Youth Regulations (Trial, Punishment and modes of Treatment) (Version of Notice to a Suspected Minor of His/Her Rights Prior to Investigation) 5773-2013 that were issued pursuant to the Youth (Trial, Punishment and Modes of Treatment) Law 5731-1971, regulate, inter alia, specific instructions regarding the unique treatment of minors, including the obligation to inform the minor about his/her rights according to a specific version, prior to his/her investigation. For additional information please see the replies to Questions 15 and 16 above.

406. The Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Law 5765-2002, as detailed in the previous periodic report, is currently under review towards introducing certain further amendments.

407. Please see the reply to Question 4 above.

Question 21

408. Please see the reply to Question 4 above.

G. Freedom of religion, conscience and expression, right to peaceful assembly (arts. 18, 19 and 21)Question 22*Freedom of Religious Worship

409. Freedom of religion and conscience are an important aspect of Israeli society, and include also the freedom from religion and the freedom of religious worship and the freedom to practice one's religion, which are all basic principles of Israeli law.

410. Freedom of religion was already mentioned in Israel's Declaration of Independence, but with the enactment of Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty has further gained the status of a basic constitutional right. Even though the right itself is not stated specifically therein, the High Court of Justice stated that freedom of religion has a central place in the Basic Law.

Administrative Measures

411. In 2011, the budget of non-Jewish communities stood at a total of 80 Million NIS (21.6 Million USD), which included, among others: 47 Million NIS (12.7 Million USD) for religious services, 19 Million NIS (5.13 Million USD) for development of religious buildings and nine Million NIS (2.43 Million USD) for the development of cemeteries.

412. In 2012, the Ministry of Interior has allocated 55 Million NIS (14.5 Million USD) for religious services for non-Jewish populations. In addition, the Ministry has allocated additional 24 Million NIS (6.315 Million USD) for development of religious sites and structures, of which 7.5 Million NIS (2 Million USD) for the development of cemeteries.

413. The Police is operating to protect the freedom of religious worship and access of persons of all religions to their places of worship without interruption. To this end, the Police invest great efforts and resources. Some of these religious events take place on daily or weekly basis and demand special deployment by the Police, for example, Muslims Friday prayers in the Temple mount, which takes place with the participation of thousands of worshippers. An additional example is Christian holidays' prayers, also with the participation of thousands of worshippers, that demand special deployment, traffic changes and use of special equipment.

Measures Taken to Preserve and Protect Muslim and Christian Religious Sites

414. The Ministry of Interior is operating to provide and ensure the freedom of religion and worship to each and every congregation and assists in construction and development of structures and building of religious purposes. The Ministry of Interior employs religious personnel, as Civil Service employees in order to provide religious services in mosques.

415. In the recent years there is a new development project in the Mount of Olive cemetery carried out by the Jerusalem Development Authority. The development program includes reconstruction of tombstones, cleaning the site, restoration of infrastructure, improving the security (including placing security cameras), fixing signposts and the establishment of an information center at the cemetery. The program budget is 80 Million NIS (21.6 Million USD), of which 600,000 NIS (162,000 USD) are spent annually on cleaning the cemetery. Note that since 2006, 15,000 tombstones were restored and the process is ongoing. In addition, more than ninety cameras were installed at the cemetery so far in order to prevent the vandalism of the tombstones. Security at the cemetery is further enhanced by 24 hours patrols.

416. In addition, please see the reply to Question no. 4 above.

417. In principle, a person designated for security service must perform military service. Military service is a legal duty pursuant to the Law and it applies to every citizen. It is also a moral duty that stems from the State's security needs.

418. Section 36 of the Security Service Law (Consolidated Version) 5746-1986 (hereinafter: "the Law"), states that the Minister of Defense may exempt a person designated for security service (or an army veteran) from performing military service for a number of reasons including "different reasons". This term was interpreted by the Court as providing the Minister of Defense with the discretion to exempt persons for reasons of conscience.

419. In addition, relevant procedures for the drafting authorities were set for this purpose, according to which applications for exemption are handled. According to these procedures, inter alia, in order to review an application for reasons of conscience, opinions of the soldier's commanders, the military advocacy and the drafting authorities are required. All of these opinions are transferred to the relevant military official who determines whether to refer the applicant to the following committee.

420. In 1995 the head of the IDF's human resources branch decided to appoint a special committee (hereinafter: "the Committee") that will review applications of persons designated for security service, soldiers in active service and persons performing their reserve service for release from military service (or reserve service) for reasons of conscience, due to a pacifistic point of view. Prior to the establishment of the Committee, applications were reviewed in an individual and specific manner. The Committee is headed by a military official authorized to issue an exemption from security service, and is comprised of several members, including a public representative who is a person of the academia, a representative of the IDF's behavioral science department, an officer from the Meitav unit (in charge of classification and placement of all those who are designated for security service) and a representative from the military advocacy.

421. The Committee is responsible for recommending to the competent authorities whether to accept an individual's application for exemption from obligatory military service for reasons of conscience or to reject it. Note that the Committee does not possess the authority to decide. This authority is given only to those officials who have been delegated such an authority pursuant to Section 36 to the Law - namely the Committee's chairperson.

422. The Committee carefully examines the applications for exemption for reasons of conscience. If the Committee is satisfied that the main factor for the application's submission is the inherent use of violent force in the military framework, and the absolute objection of the applicant to war, in a way that prevents him/her from serving in a similar framework – at any position, then the committee will recommend to exempt the applicant from performing security service for reasons of conscience. However, if the Committee believes that the main reasons for the submission of such an application are different reasons, such as: the compelling nature of the military framework or personal convenience considerations the Committee's recommendation will be to reject the application.

423. If the Committee is satisfied that the applicant is clearly pacifistic, it recommends the competent authorities to exempt the applicant from security service on the basis of reasons of conscience. Prior to this recommendation, and in light of the current recognition in clear and sincere pacifistic views that justifies the grant of an exemption from security service, the Committee does not consider the IDF's human resources needs or the value of equally fulfilling the duty of security service.

424. The Committee is also authorized to recommend on allowing certain easements in the applicants service, such as: the permission not to hold weapons or to wear uniforms, etc. if it is satisfied that application stems from genuine conscience dilemmas. The abovementioned is true, mutatis mutandis, with regard to the placing of an exempted applicant in certain position or in particular branch that meets the applicant's conscience point of view (for example: the possibility of serving in a non-combat position or in a rear unit).

425. In addition, according to the relevant internal procedures of the drafting authorities, the Committee's chairperson's decisions may be appealed within 30 days. Any such appeal will be heard by a military official who is also authorized to issue an exemption from security service – the Committee's chairperson's commander, who is also authorized to issue an exemption from security service.

426. In regard to additional imprisonment and the principle of ne bis in idem – the relevant authorities do not consider an additional imprisonment, in regard to a person that was not recognized as a conscientious objector, to be a repeated imprisonment. As long as the person designated for security service has a legal duty to perform the security service, and he/she continues to refuse to perform his/her legal duty, it is to be considered as a new offence with a new factual infrastructure and new criminal intent and thus, according to the relevant case law, this justifies an additional indictment.

Freedom of Association

427. The freedom to associate with persons or groups in order to pursue any lawful aim has long been recognized in Israel as a fundamental civil right and a cornerstone of any democratic regime. As with other basic freedoms to which it is related – speech and expression, assembly, thought and conscience – freedom of association is not absolute, and must be reconciled in appropriate circumstances with other legitimate fundamental interests, such as the maintenance of social order, public security, or the very existence of the State. (H.C.J. 507/85, Bahij Tamimi v. The Minister of Defense (16.9.87)).

428. Limitations on the freedom of association – As a rule, freedom of association may be restricted only through express legislative authorization. There are three types of statutory restrictions on the freedom to associate in Israeli law: the first type is found in statutes that regulate the formation and operation of corporations, cooperative associations and the like; the second class of restriction involves statutes which aim to prevent the formation or activity of subversive organizations, including terrorist groups; the third involves direct or indirect restrictions on the freedom to form professional associations in certain fields or the requirement that certain professionals belong to such an association.

429. Activities of human rights organizations – the State of Israel places no legal restrictions on the right of organizations to engage in activities for the promotion and observance of human rights. For legal purposes, these organizations are indistinguishable from any other organization: to the extent that they are registered as associations, they must comply with the applicable law, etc. In every other sense, human rights organizations fully enjoy the freedom to associate and to pursue their various aims. There are hundreds of organizations in Israel which work freely and fruitfully in all areas of human rights. The State has an extensive cooperation with many civil society organizations in many aspects of life.

430. Freedom of opinion and expression – While Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, does not directly articulate the right to freedom of expression and opinion, it has been suggested that these rights fall within the ambit of the general right to human dignity protected by the Basic Law (C.A. 2687/92, Geva v. Walt Disney Co.). The right to freedom of opinion and expression is not explicitly protected in Israel by constitutional legislation. The right to free speech has long been recognized as a supreme, constitutional norm, and any limitations on its exercise for reasons related to public order or the rights and reputation of others must meet strict standards of scrutiny regarding their justification and scope.

431. Limitations on the freedom of opinion and expression – With several exceptions, freedom of expression may be restricted by official action only if, in the specific circumstances of the case, the speech in question gives rise at least to a “near certainty” that the public peace, broadly construed, will be endangered, and only if other means to lessen the severity or the likelihood of such a violation of public peace are of no avail. (H.C.J. 73/53, Kol Ha’am Ltd. v. The Minister of Interior).

432. In criminal prosecutions stemming from prohibited forms of speech, such as incitement to racism, a less demanding standard of proof is applied than the “near certainty” test for prior restraints.

433. In addition, please see Israel’s reply to Question 4 above.

Israeli Legislation Process

434. The State of Israel is a democratic state, which allows every democratically elected Knesset Member the right to present bills that reflect the best interests and will of his/her constituencies, in accordance with the law.

435. Every private bill presented by a Knesset Member goes through a lengthy process, including the preliminary approval of the Speaker of the Knesset and his/her deputies who examine, inter alia, if the bill includes any forbidden racial content or negation of the State of Israel as a Jewish State; a discussion held by the Ministerial Committee for Legislative Affairs regarding the Government’s position; a discussion in the Knesset Plenary and only following the Knesset Plenary’s approval – hearings before the relevant Knesset Committees, and later, the final approval of the Knesset Plenary, symbolizing the legislator’s sanction to the final version of the law.

436. Note that the relevant Knesset Committee is authorized to make significant changes in the wording of the bill, and additional changes may be made by the plenary through reservations filed by Knesset members. This thorough and often prolonged process is aimed at ensuring that the final law reflects due process and the will of the legislator.

437. Israeli courts have the competence of judicial review regarding any act of legislation, in light of the Basic Laws.

The Prevention of Harming the State of Israel by Boycott Law (5771-2011)

438. This Law is intended to protect Israeli citizens from damages caused by organized boycotts and to guarantee that no use of public financial sources will be made in order to support activities that may harm Israeli citizens. The Law does not limit a private person’s consideration if and from whom to purchase goods and services and deals only with organized and deliberate boycotts.

439. An offence according to this law is not a criminal offence but amounts to a civil tort, which in certain cases may lead to compensation. The Law does not have any criminal sanctions or supervision mechanisms, and is subject to the courts’ jurisdiction.

440. Several petitions were filed against this law, and on December 9, 2012, the Supreme Court residing as the High Court of Justice ordered the respondents to provide the reasons why this law or Sections 2-3 of the Law should not be cancelled. The petitions are still pending. (H.C.J. 5329/11, Uri Avneri et al. v. The Knesset et al.).

441. The wide public debate, the amendments that were made to this law and even the criticism all demonstrate the strong democracy and freedom of speech enshrined in the Israeli legal system.

The Obligatory Disclosure for Receiving Support by a Foreign Political Entity
Law 5771-2001

442. Following a wide public debate on the non-transparent nature of foreign governmental funding of NGOs operating in Israel, and concerns raised that it is used to interfere with and influence Israeli politics, several Members of the Knesset initiated a private bill to increase the obligation of transparency required by NGOs receiving such funds, in order to enable better evaluation of their extent and impact. The Bill was enacted on February 21, 2011.

443. According to Section 2 of the Law, any association or company for the benefit of the public which receives a donation from a foreign political entity must notify the Associations Registrar (within one week following the end of that quarter) and specify the identity of the entity providing the donation, the donation's sum, the donation's goals and purposes and any conditions and obligation that were given to the foreign political entity in relation with that donation (both orally and in writing and both direct and indirect).

444. According to Section 4 of the Law, the Associations Registrar will publish the list of association and companies for the benefit of the public who submitted such notifications, together with the information issued in according to Section 2 of the Law on the Ministry of Justice' internet site.

445. According to Section 5(a), any association or company for the benefit of the public who receives a donation according to this Law and which operates its own website, shall publish the information which was included in its quarterly report to the Association Registrar in a noticeable manner.

446. According to Section 5(b) an association or company for the benefit of the public which receives a donation for a specific advertising campaign, must publish, in the frame of that campaign, the acceptance of that donation.

447. According to Section 6 of the Law, association or company for the benefit of the public must do their outmost to find out if any donations they receive originate from a foreign political entity.

448. The issue of transparency required of NGOs regarding contributions received from foreign political entities, has already been stipulated in the Law of Associations, which requires NGOs whose financial turnover exceeds a certain amount (300,000 NIS, (81,000 USD)) and which have received contributions that exceed 20,000 NIS (5,400 USD) from foreign governmental entities, to give an annual report about (1) the amount of the contribution, (2) its purpose, (3) the identity of the contributor, and (4) any conditions for receiving the contribution. As noted, this Law deals with the enhancement of existing obligation.

449. The Law does not prohibit or impose any restriction on receiving the contributions themselves or on the activities of NGOs. The commentary to the Law states that the Law balances between the right of organizations in a democracy to operate freely, and the right of the public to know who funds the organizations' activities.

450. There is nothing in the law to substantially change the currently existing situation in Israel, and there is nothing in the law to harm the democratic process or the standing of the civil society and non-governmental organizations in any manner.

H. Protection of the family (art. 23)

Question 25

The Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision), 5763-2003

451. Please see Replies of the Government of Israel to the List of Issues to be taken up in connection with the consideration of the third periodic report of Israel (CCPR/C/ISR/Q/3/Add.1, p. 53-54).

452. On January 11, 2012, the High Court of Justice issued its verdict in regard to additional petitions against the constitutionality of the Law (H.C.J. 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07, MK Zehava Galon et al. v. The Minister of Interior et al.). The Court rejected these petitions and by a majority opinion of 6 out of 11 judges, found the Law to be constitutional. The purpose of the Law, according to both the majority and minority decisions, is to mitigate the security threat posed by terrorist organizations seeking to harm Israeli citizens. The majority judgments also held that, given this purpose, the Law is proportional in that it is a rational means to attaining this end and that the security benefits of the Law outweigh the negative impact of the restrictions that it places on family unification.

453. The majority judges agreed that the right for family life is a constitutional right, though; they stated that the scope of this right does not include its fulfillment precisely in Israel. It was further determined that if there is an infringement in constitutional rights, among them the right to equality, this infringement is in line with the restrictions paragraph of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty (H.C.J. 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07, MK Zehava Galon et al. v. The Minister of Interior et al. (11.1.12)).

454. Residents of the Golan Heights – the Law states that if the person requesting the permit is a Syrian resident and his/her spouse is a member of the Druze community who lives in the Golan Heights, which is under Israeli jurisdiction, then the Minister of the Interior may consider it a special humanitarian reason (Section 3A1(e)(2)). This section is geared specifically towards allowing family unification for residents of the Golan Heights.

Family Visit Program for Prisoners from the Gaza Strip

455. The IPS directive number 04.42.00 stipulates that criminal and security prisoners are entitled to a visit once every two weeks. Following an Israeli initiative and an IPS decision of July 16, 2012, family visits to prisoners from Gaza Strip which are detained in Israel are now allowed. The visits are the result of cooperation between the Israeli authorities and the ICRC and are conducted together with the ICRC after security examination of the relatives entering Israel. The visits are arranged on a weekly basis (every Monday). Every week 50 prisoners are allowed to receive 150 visitors all together. Each prisoner is allowed to receive up to four visitors, not including the prisoner's children under the age of eight.

456. Note that recently, a petition was filed regarding this issue which is currently pending before the High Court of Justice (H.C.J. 4048/13, Arshid Arshid v. The Military Commander of the West Bank).

Maintaining Contact with Families

457. In order to maintain contact with their families, security prisoners are entitled to send and receive letters, they are entitled to receive family visits (unless there is a specific security prohibition on such visitations) and to meet with their attorneys (even where no legal proceedings are taking place in their regard). In exceptional cases these prisoners have the right to contact their relatives by phone.

Case Law

458. Telephone use by Prisoners suspected of security-related offences – In a recent decision by the Haifa District Court, the Court partially accepted the petition of a security prisoner who demanded to make a daily use of the telephone for a period of 30 minutes. The Court noted that the respondents pose no concrete information that justifies the conclusion that allowing the appellant to conduct phone calls, similarly to that provided to criminal prisoners, entails a threat to state security.

459. The Court further noted that, without expressing its opinion if indeed a 30 minute phone call will inflict an unreasonable burden on the security authorities, there is a variety of possibilities between total denial of phone calls and a 30 minutes daily phone call, and the security authorities may come up with a position that will balance the appellant rights and the burden upon them. The Court returned the issue to the IPS in order to further examine the requested easements in light of its decision. (C.A. 26844-01-13, Aafan Abu Guwaid v. The Israeli Prisons Service et al. (24.3.13)).

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

Distr.: General

Human Rights Committee

Concluding observations on the fourth periodic report of Israel*

1. The Committee considered the fourth periodic report of Israel (CCPR/C/ISR/4) at its 3115th and 3116th meetings (CCPR/C/SR.3115 and 3116), held on 20 October 2014. At its 3127th meeting (CCPR/C/SR.3127), held on 28 October 2014, it adopted the following concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee is grateful to the State party for having accepted the new optional procedure for submission of reports and for the timely submission of its fourth periodic report in response to the list of issues prior to consideration of reports (CCPR/C/ISR/Q/4), under that procedure. It expresses appreciation for the opportunity to renew its constructive dialogue with the State party's high-level delegation on the measures taken by the State party during the reporting period to implement the provisions of the Covenant. The Committee thanks the State party for the responses provided by the delegation orally.

B. Positive aspects

3. The Committee welcomes the following legislative and institutional steps taken by the State party:

(a) The adoption of Amendment No. 4 to the Pupil's Rights Law 5761-2000 whereby sexual orientation and gender identity were added to the prohibited grounds of discrimination against pupils, in March 2014;

(b) The transfer of the function of Inspector for Complaints against Interrogators of the Israel Security Agency (ISA) to the Ministry of Justice, in June 2013;

(c) The establishment of a joint inter-ministerial team, headed by the Deputy Attorney General, tasked with the review and implementation of the concluding observations of human rights treaty bodies, in 2011.

* Adopted by the Committee at its 112th session (7–31 October 2014).

4. The Committee welcomes the ratification of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, on 28 September 2012.

C. Principal matters of concern and recommendations

Applicability of the Covenant, including to the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, Gaza Strip and the Occupied Syrian Golan

5. The Committee regrets that the State party continues to maintain its position on the non-applicability of the Covenant to the Occupied Territories, by claiming that the Covenant is a territorially bound treaty and does not apply with respect to individuals under its jurisdiction, but outside its territory, despite the interpretation to the contrary of article 2, paragraph 1, supported by the Committee's established jurisprudence, the jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) and State practice. It is further concerned at the position of the State party that international human rights law does not apply when international humanitarian law is applicable. The Committee reiterates its view on these matters (see CCPR/CO/ISR/3, para. 5; CCPR/CO/78/ISR, para. 11 and CCPR/C/79/Add.93, para. 10). The Committee notes that the State party maintains its reservation to article 23 of the Covenant. It also notes that the State party has not yet acceded to any of the two Optional Protocols to the Covenant (art. 2).

The State party should:

(a) Interpret the Covenant in good faith, in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to its terms in their context, including subsequent practice, and in light of the object and purpose of the Covenant, and review its legal position so as to acknowledge the extraterritorial application of the Covenant under certain circumstances, as outlined, inter alia, in the Committee's general comment No. 31 (2004) on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant. In this respect, the Committee reiterates and underscores that the Covenant applies with regard to all conduct by the State party's authorities or agents adversely affecting the enjoyment of the rights enshrined in the Covenant by persons under its jurisdiction regardless of the location;

(b) Review its legal position and acknowledge that the applicability of international humanitarian law during an armed conflict, as well as in a situation of occupation, does not preclude the application of the Covenant;

(c) Reconsider its position regarding its reservation to article 23 of the Covenant with a view to withdrawing it;

(d) Consider acceding to the First Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights providing for an individual complaint mechanism;

(e) Consider acceding to the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty.

Accountability for alleged human rights violations committed during the State party's military operations in the Gaza Strip

6. The Committee, while noting that the State party had implemented some of the recommendations of the second report of the Turkel Commission aiming at improving the investigation mechanisms into alleged violations of the laws of armed conflict, and that the implementation of other recommendations are currently being considered by a special Committee set up in January 2014, regrets the State party's failure to provide updated information on investigation into human rights violations related to the "Operation Cast Lead” (27 December 2008-18 January 2009) conducted in the Gaza Strip. The Committee expresses its concern at allegations of human rights violations committed during the military operations in the Gaza Strip known as “Operation Pillar of Defence” (14-21 November 2012) and “Operation Protective Edge” (8 July-26 August 2014), inter alia, the disproportionate number of casualties among civilians, including children; the destruction of homes and other civilian infrastructure, including medical facilities and schools, in particular the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) schools used as shelters for civilians and other United Nations installations during the “Operation Protective Edge” (arts. 2, 6, 7, 9, 12, and 17).

The State party should continue reforming its investigative system, including, as an initial step, by implementing the recommendations of the second report of the Turkel Commission. It should ensure that all human rights violations committed during its military operations in the Gaza Strip in 2008-2009, 2012 and 2014 are thoroughly, effectively, independently and impartially investigated, that perpetrators, including, in particular, persons in positions of command, are prosecuted and sanctioned in a manner commensurate with the gravity of the acts committed, and that victims or their families are provided with effective remedies, including equal and effective access to justice and reparations.

Equality and non-discrimination

7. The Committee reiterates its concern (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 6) that the principle of equality and non-discrimination is not explicitly codified in the State party’s Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty 5752-1992, which serves as the State party’s bill of rights, despite its recognition as a fundamental principle in the State party’s legal system. The Committee, while noting that relevant legislation is currently under review, is also concerned that the Jewish and non-Jewish population are treated differently in several regards and that the State party’s domestic legal framework maintains a three-tiered system of laws affording different civil status, rights and legal protection for Jewish Israeli citizens, Palestinian citizens of Israel and Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem (arts. 2 and 26).

The Committee reiterates its previous recommendation (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 6) that the State party amend its Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty 5752-1992 to explicitly incorporate the principle of equality and non-discrimination. It should ensure equal treatment for all persons within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction, regardless of their national or ethnic origin, and in particular, pursue the review of all laws discriminating against Palestinian citizens of Israel and ensure that any future legislation is fully compatible with the principle of equality and non-discrimination.

8. The Committee is concerned that, despite the steps taken by the State party, Israeli citizens of Arab origin continue to be underrepresented in the civil service, in particular in decision-making positions (arts. 2, 25 and 26).

The State party should step up its efforts to achieve equitable representation of Israeli citizens of Arab origin in the civil service, in particular in decision-making positions in legislative and executive bodies, including the Knesset and the Government.

Punitive demolitions, planning and zoning regime in the West Bank and displacement of Bedouins

9. The Committee is concerned at the resumption of the policy of punitive demolitions in the West Bank since July 2014. It is also concerned about the discriminatory zoning and planning regime regulating the construction of housing and structures by Palestinians in Area C of the West Bank and by Palestinian Bedouins in the central West Bank, including the East Jerusalem periphery, that makes it almost impossible for them to obtain building permits, while facilitating the State party's settlements in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (OPT). The Committee further notes with concern that, for this reason, many are forced to build without a permit and are at high risk of eviction. The Committee is further concerned at the demolition and forcible transfer of Bedouins residing in Area C of the West Bank and at plans to relocate a total of approximately 7,000 people in around 45 residential areas to three urbanized 'townships' elsewhere in the West Bank without taking into account their traditional pastoral economy, social fabric, and rural way of life. The Committee also expresses concern at demolitions, forced evictions and displacement of Bedouin citizens of Israel living in the Negev desert, and notes that the proposed legislation which seeks to legitimize such forcible displacement, including the Bill for the Regulation of the Bedouin Settlement in the Negev, is currently frozen. Finally, the Committee is concerned at the restricted access of Bedouins living in unrecognized and recently-recognized villages in the Negev to basic services, including adequate housing, water and sanitation, health care, education and public transportation (arts. 2, 7, 12, 14, 17, 26 and 27).

The State party should:

(a) Immediately put an end to conducting punitive demolitions given their incompatibility with the State party's obligations under the Covenant and provide effective remedies to victims of destruction of property, forced eviction and forcible transfer;

(b) Refrain from implementing evictions and demolition orders based on discriminatory planning policies, laws and practices affecting Palestinians, including Bedouins, in the West Bank, including the East Jerusalem periphery; remove discriminatory provisions from relevant planning and zoning legislation; provide for procedural protection and due process guarantees against forced evictions and demolitions; ensure the participation of Palestinians in the planning and zoning process and withdraw the so-called 'Bedouin Regulation' plan;

(c) Desist from any actions that may facilitate or result in forcible transfer and forced evictions, particularly of the Bedouin communities in the central West Bank, including the eastern Jerusalem periphery, and forced displacement and dispossession of Bedouins residing in the Negev;

(d) Ensure the participation of Bedouins in the Negev in any process concerning their relocation; ensure that any proposed plans for their relocation take due account of their traditional way of life and, where applicable, their right to ancestral land, and are carried out in accordance with relevant international human rights standards, in particular the principle of non-discrimination, the rights to be informed and consulted, to an effective remedy, and to the provision of adequate relocation sites, and withdraw the discriminatory Bill for the Regulation of the Bedouin Settlement in the Negev (the Praver-Begin Bill).

State of emergency and administrative detention

10. While noting the ongoing legislative process regarding the future cancellation of the state of emergency, the Committee reiterates its concern at maintaining the state of emergency (see CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 7; CCPR/CO/78/ISR, para. 12 and CCPR/C/79/Add.93, para. 11). The Committee also remains concerned at the continuing practice of administrative detention of Palestinians, at the fact that in many cases the detention order is based on secret evidence and at the denial of access to counsel, independent doctors and family contacts (arts. 4, 9, and 14).

The Committee recalls, with reference to its general comment No. 29 (2001) on states of emergency that measures derogating from the provisions of the Covenant must be of an exceptional and temporary nature and are limited to the extent strictly required. It reiterates its previous recommendations (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 7), and requests the State party to:

(a) Expedite the process of reviewing its legislation governing the state of emergency and the necessity of maintaining the state of emergency proclaimed since 1948, as well as revisiting the modalities governing the renewal of the state of emergency;

(b) End the practice of administrative detention and the use of secret evidence in administrative detention proceedings, and ensure that individuals subject to administrative detention orders are either promptly charged with a criminal offence, or released.

Counter-terrorism measures

11. While noting that the legislative process on the Fight against Terrorism Bill, 5771-2011 is underway, the Committee notes the absence of specific information on the definitions of terrorism, and on the legal safeguards afforded to persons suspected of, or charged with, a terrorist or related crime contained in the draft law currently under consideration (arts. 2, 7, 9, 10 and 14).

The State party should ensure that the new legislation governing the State party's counter-terrorism measures is in full compliance with its obligations under the Covenant. The State party should, inter alia, take into account the Committee's previous recommendations on this issue (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 13).

Ongoing blockade of the Gaza Strip

12. The Committee is concerned at the long-standing blockade of the Gaza strip imposed by the State party. It notes with concern that the blockade continues to hamper the freedom of movement with only limited categories of persons able to leave Gaza, such as medical referrals; to negatively impact on Palestinians' access to all basic and life-saving services such as food, health, electricity, water and sanitation; and to delay reconstruction efforts in the Gaza Strip (arts. 1, 6, 7 and 12).

The State party should, in line with the Committee's previous recommendation (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 8):

(a) Lift its blockade of the Gaza Strip, insofar as it adversely affects the civilian population and provide unrestricted access for the provision of urgent humanitarian assistance and construction materials needed for civilian reconstruction efforts;

(b) Ensure that any measures restricting the freedom of movement of civilians and the transfer of goods from, into and within Gaza are consistent with its obligations under the Covenant.

Excessive use of force by State party's security forces

13. The Committee expresses its concern at persistent reports of excessive use of lethal force by the State party's security forces, in particular the Israel Defense Forces, during law enforcement operations against Palestinian civilians, including children, , particularly in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and in the Access Restricted Areas of Gaza. While noting the new policy announced by the Military Advocate General in 2011, according to which criminal investigations are automatically opened into some incidents involving fatalities in the West Bank, and the measures taken to investigate such incidents, the Committee remains concerned that accountability for such acts remains weak. The Committee is further concerned about damage to, and demolition of, properties during arrest operations, which seem disproportionate (arts. 2, 6, 7, 9, and 24).

The State party should:

(a) Take all necessary measures to prevent incidents of excessive use of force during law enforcement operations, including by ensuring that rules of engagement or open fire regulations of the State party's security forces in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the Access Restricted Areas of Gaza, are consistent with article 6 of the Covenant and the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials;

(b) Ensure that prompt, thorough, effective, independent and impartial investigations are launched into all incidents involving the use of firearms by law enforcement officers, including members of the Israel Defense Forces, the Border Police and private security personnel contracted by the State party's authorities;

(c) Ensure that those responsible for the disproportionate demolition of properties and the excessive use of force during arrest operations are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with appropriate sanctions, and that victims are provided with effective remedies.

Torture and ill-treatment

14. The Committee reiterates its concern (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 11) that to date, no crime of torture in conformity with article 7 of the Covenant has been incorporated into the State party's legislation. Furthermore, the Committee reiterates its concern that the "defence of necessity" continues to be legal and is used as a possible justification for torture. It also notes with concern that the Supreme Court implicitly allows the use of so-called "moderate physical pressure" in cases of "necessity". The Committee is also concerned about the exemption from the obligation to provide audio or visual documentation of interrogations in cases of persons detained for security offences. The Committee recalls that the prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in article 7 is absolute, and according to article 4, paragraph 2, no derogations therefrom are permitted, even in time of public emergency (arts. 4 and 7).

The State party should explicitly prohibit torture, including psychological torture, and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment by incorporating into its legislation a definition of torture that is fully in line with article 7 of the Covenant, and ensuring that the law provides for penalties commensurate with the gravity of such acts. It should also: (a) remove the notion of "necessity" as a possible justification for the crime of torture; (b) refrain from inflicting "moderate physical pressure" in cases of "necessity" and ensuring that interrogation techniques never reach the threshold of treatment prohibited by article 7 of the Covenant, and (c) provide for audio or visual documentation of interrogations in cases of persons detained for security offences.

15. The Committee is concerned at reports of the use of torture and other ill-treatment in the State party's detention facilities, including widespread, systematic and institutionalized ill-treatment of Palestinian children. It is particularly concerned that no preliminary investigations by the Inspector for Complaints against the Israel Security Agency (ISA) have led to judicial proceedings against alleged perpetrators (arts. 2, 7 and 24).

The State party should take robust measures to eradicate torture and ill-treatment against adult and child detainees and carry out prompt, thorough, effective, independent and impartial investigations into all allegations of torture and ill-treatment, including in the case of complaints against the Israel Security Agency, hold perpetrators accountable and provide victims with effective remedies, including appropriate compensation.

Violence perpetrated by the State party's settlers against Palestinians in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem

16. The Committee is concerned at the acts of violence perpetrated by the State party's settlers against Palestinians and their property in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and at the lack of effective accountability and protection from such acts by the State party's authorities, partly due to deficiencies in investigating such cases. The Committee takes note of the measures taken by the State party to address this serious matter, including the establishment of an inter-ministerial team to deal with ideologically-motivated crimes (arts. 2, 6, 7, 14, 17 and 26).

The State party should take all necessary measures to prevent violence perpetrated by the State party's settlers and protect Palestinians effectively when such violence occurs. It should strengthen its efforts with a view to ensuring that prompt, thorough, independent and impartial investigations are launched, in a non-discriminatory manner, into all incidents of violence by private actors against Palestinians and their property, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with appropriate sanctions, and victims are provided with effective remedies.

Self-determination of Palestinians, access to natural resources, State party's settlements and related-activities, and the Wall

17. The Committee is concerned about continuing confiscation and expropriation of Palestinian land. It is also concerned at continuing restrictions on access of Palestinians in the OPT, including East Jerusalem, and of residents of the Occupied Syrian Golan, to natural resources, inter alia, agricultural land and adequate water supply. The Committee is further concerned about: (a) the resumption since 2013 of the practice of claiming land as State land; (b) the continued construction of the Wall in the West Bank, the limited allocation of permits for Palestinians to access their agricultural lands situated on the other side of the Wall, and the restricted number and opening hours of access gates; (c) the continuing construction and expansion of settlements throughout the (OPT), which has more than doubled, and the transfer of the State party's settlers to that Territory, and (d) the retroactive legalization of outposts. The Committee notes with concern that those acts undermine the enjoyment by Palestinians of a wide range of their Covenant rights, including the right to self-determination (arts. 1, 2, 9, 12, 17, 18 and 26).

The State party should:

- (a) Ensure and facilitate non-discriminatory access of Palestinians in the (OPT), including East Jerusalem, to land, natural resources, water and sanitation;
- (b) Put an end to the practice of expropriation of land and allocation of State land for the expansion of settlements;
- (c) Cease the construction and expansion of settlements in the OPT, including East Jerusalem and the Occupied Syrian Golan, and all settlement-related activities, including the transfer of its own population thereto, and take measures aimed at the withdrawal of all settlers from those territories;
- (d) Reroute the Wall consistent with the Advisory Opinion of ICJ on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of the Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory of July 2004, and ensure that Palestinians have full access to their lands and livelihood.

Freedom of movement

18. The Committee expresses concern, in conjunction with the concerns raised in paragraphs 12 and 17 above, at the restrictions on freedom of movement of residents of the OPT, including persons residing in the “Seam Zone” between the Wall and the State party. The Committee is further concerned at the treatment of Palestinians residents in East Jerusalem as aliens and the insecurity of their permanent residency status that can be revoked if they live outside the municipal boundary of Jerusalem (arts. 2, 12 and 26).

The State party should take all necessary measures with a view to ensuring respect for the right to freedom of movement for Palestinians throughout the OPT, comprising the West Bank, including East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip, and ensure that any restrictions on freedom of movement are in line with its obligations under the Covenant. It should also ensure respect for the rights of Palestinian residents in East Jerusalem to freedom of movement and freedom to choose residence.

Juvenile criminal justice system

19. The Committee, while noting positive developments in the administration of juvenile military justice, including the increase in the age of majority in the military courts from 16 to 18 years and the adoption of a number of military orders providing for guarantees and safeguards for children, remains concerned that such reforms appear not to be effectively implemented in practice and that Palestinian children are still exposed to arbitrary arrest and detention and often do not enjoy full procedural rights (arts. 2, 7, 9, 10, 14 and 24).

The State party should ensure that any arrest and detention of a child is in conformity with article 9 of the Covenant. It should further ensure that children are:

- (a) Only detained as a measure of last resort and for the shortest possible period of time;
- (b) Treated at all times with respect and dignity and in accordance with their age, specific needs and vulnerability;
- (c) Provided with safe and child-friendly complaint mechanisms, including during trials, regarding treatment at the time of arrest, interrogation and detention, and that proceedings are audio-visually recorded;
- (d) Afforded, in practice, all fair trial guarantees in line with article 14 of the Covenant.

Refugees and asylum seekers

20. The Committee is concerned about the very low recognition rate of refugees in the State party, including of Eritreans and Sudanese from South Sudan seeking such status. While noting that the State party does not deport such persons to their country of origin, it is concerned that the lack of formal procedures at the border for those wishing to apply for refugee status and the lack of a clearly defined legal status for individuals who have not been recognized as refugees but whose continued presence in the country is tolerated, may expose them to the risk of refoulement. Furthermore, while welcoming the decisions of the High Court of Justice of 16 September 2013 and of 22 September 2014 declaring unconstitutional the mandatory detention of asylum seekers for a period up to three years and one year respectively, the Committee is concerned about the prolonged detention of a large number of asylum seekers over the course of past years and the lack of new legislation that would introduce a detention regime in line with the requirements of article 9 of the Covenant (arts. 2, 7, 9, 13 and 26).

The State party should:

- (a) Review its policy of recognition of refugees;
- (b) Ensure that formal procedures for asylum application are made available at its border;
- (c) Create a legal status for failed applicants for refugees status who cannot be deported to their country of origin, allowing them to stay in the State party until return becomes possible, as well as having access to formal employment and basic services;
- (d) Ensure that the new legislation abolishes the system of automatic detention of asylum seekers and requires that in each case, detention is reasonable, necessary and proportionate in light of the circumstances, and reassessed as it extends in time.

Protection of the family

21. The Committee reiterates its concern (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 15) regarding the disproportionate and adverse restrictions imposed by the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) which suspends the possibility, with certain rare exceptions, of family reunification of Israeli citizens with Palestinian spouses living in the West Bank, East Jerusalem or Gaza Strip or with spouses living in several States classified by the State party as “enemy States”. It also expresses concern at the decision of the High Court of Justice of 11 January 2012 upholding the constitutionality of this Law (arts. 17, 23, 24 and 26).

The Committee reiterates that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) should be revoked and that the State party should review its laws, practices and policies with a view to bringing them in line with its obligations under articles 23 and 26 of the Covenant.

Freedom of opinion and expression and freedom of association

22. The Committee is concerned at the chilling effect that the Boycott Law (5771-2011), which provides that a call for economic, cultural, or academic boycott of people or institutions in the State party or the OPT for political reasons is a civil offence, and the so-called “Foreign Funding Law” (5771-2001), which imposes mandatory disclosure of foreign funds received by any association or company, may have on the freedom of opinion and expression and freedom of association (arts. 19 and 22).

The State party should ensure that individuals fully enjoy their rights to freedom of expression and association and that any restrictions on the exercise of such rights comply with the strict requirements of article 19, paragraph 3 of the Covenant as interpreted in the Committee’s general comment No. 34 (2011) on the freedoms of opinion and expression, and article 22, paragraph 2, of the Covenant.

Conscientious objection

23. The Committee remains concerned (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 19) at the proceedings before the special Committee in charge of recommending to the competent authorities to grant or reject an individual’s application for exemption from compulsory military service for reasons of conscience and at its lack of independence given that its membership comprises only one civilian member and all the rest serve as officials of the armed forces. The Committee reiterates its concern that individuals whose conscientious objection applications are rejected may be repeatedly imprisoned for their refusal to serve in the armed forces (arts. 14 and 18).

The Committee reiterates its previous recommendation that the special Committee making recommendations to the competent authorities on conscientious objection applications be made fully independent, and proceedings before it include hearings and provide for a right to appeal against negative decisions. The State party should also refrain from repeated imprisonment for refusal to serve in the armed forces that may constitute a violation of the principle of ne bis in idem.

Dissemination of information relating to the Covenant

24. The State party should widely disseminate the Covenant, the text of its fourth periodic report and the present concluding observations among the judicial, legislative and administrative authorities, civil society and non-governmental organizations operating in the country, as well as the general public. The report and the concluding observations should be translated into the other official language of the State party.

25. In accordance with rule 71, paragraph 5, of the Committee's rules of procedure, the State party should provide, within one year, relevant information on its implementation of the Committee's recommendations made in paragraphs 9, 12, 14 and 19 above.

26. The State party is invited to submit its next report, which will be its fifth periodic report, by 31 October 2018. To that end, the Committee will send the State party in due course a list of issues prior to reporting. The Committee also requests the State party, when preparing its next periodic report, to continue its practice of broadly consulting civil society and non-governmental organizations operating in the country.

Concluding Observation no. 9

Non-application of the Covenant in the “Occupied Palestinian Territory”

1. As has been previously clarified, it is Israel’s position that the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights (hereinafter: “ICCPR” or “the Convention”) is not applicable beyond a state’s national territory. For an elaboration of this position, please see sections 44-48 of Israel’s 4th Periodic Report.¹
2. Notwithstanding this position, in the spirit of openness with which Israel approaches the constructive dialogue with the honorable Committee, we respectfully present the following information.

Planning and Zoning in the West Bank

3. Against the background of the complex legal reality that was created following the Six Day War, Israel took upon itself to subject its military control of the West Bank to the Hague Regulations Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land of 1907 (“the Hague Regulations”), and, accordingly, to maintain the laws that were in force in this area prior to June 1967.²
4. Subsequently, the planning and zoning laws applicable to the West Bank, as well as the regional zoning plans that derive from them, are mostly the original laws that were in effect prior to June 1967.³ Indeed, the main source of law is the Jordanian Planning of Cities Villages and Buildings Law (No. 79) of 1966. These laws apply indiscriminately to all persons residing in the West Bank.
5. Note that the vast majority of Palestinians in the West Bank reside in Areas A and B, which include all Palestinian urban centers and most Palestinian village clusters. In those areas, the responsibility for planning and zoning has been transferred to the Palestinian Authority (hereinafter: PA), as part of the Oslo Accords.
6. In the remaining areas, the Central Supervisory Unit of the Civil Administration and other Israeli authorities in the West Bank operate in order to enforce the law and the local zoning plans without distinction between Israeli citizens or Palestinians residents.
7. The Civil Administration is constantly developing and advancing outline plans for the Palestinian and Bedouin populations in the West Bank. It is working on the development of roughly 90 different plans, which are at different stages of the procedural process. Approximately 20 of these plans have been prepared, approved for advancement and are currently in various stages of the statutory process. An additional ten plans have been prepared and are awaiting various approvals prior to their submission to the planning committees and the rest of the plans are currently classified as works in progress.

² According to Article 43 of the Hague Regulations, the Military Commander is tasked with ensuring security and public order. Within the scope of these duties, the Military Commander and the institutions that he appoints are in charge of enforcing the planning and building laws which were in place prior to 1967.

8. The foregoing is expected to lead to the legalization of dozens of structures that had been constructed illegally. Moreover, in principle, the Civil Administration refrains from enforcing the law regarding illegal construction where an outline plan has been approved or even when a plan is going through the initial stages of the statutory process, even if a person initially violated the law and intentionally built the structure without a building permit.

Palestinian Participation in the Planning Procedure

9. The Civil Administration and the other relevant Israeli authorities operating in the West Bank are actively working to promote the participation of the Palestinian population in the planning process. The Civil Administration has invested substantial resources in an attempt to involve the Palestinian population in the planning process and thus optimize the outcome. Such integration is attempted at all stages of the process, including the preliminary stages of planning, the planning itself and the transition to the approved plans.

10. To this end, in September 2014, the Head of the Civil Administration introduced a new procedure titled "The Procedure regarding the Incorporation of West Bank Residents in the Planning Process (Judea and Samaria), 2014", which requires the relevant bodies to provide a formal setting for interested parties to present their positions regarding issues of planning and zoning, which in turn must be considered by the committee.

11. This procedure was examined by the Israeli Supreme Court⁴ and was deemed to constitute appropriate involvement of the local population, enhancing effective Palestinian participation in the planning process. According to the Court's decision, this procedure will be re-examined and evaluated in the near future by the relevant authorities.

12. Unfortunately, information gathered clearly shows that the PA is applying great pressure on the Palestinian population, aimed at preventing any productive cooperation with the Civil Administration or the Civil Administration's planning authorities in the West Bank. The PA encourages Palestinians not to cooperate with the Israeli planning institutions and in fact actively hinder any cooperation with the planning and construction initiatives intended to promote the needs of the Palestinian population.

Enforcement

13. All enforcement procedures are subject to due process guarantees, such as the right to a fair hearing and the opportunity to take measures to rectify an infringement of the law (for example, by filing a request for a building permit or by proposing an amendment to a zoning plan).

14. Moreover, when an appeal is denied, no enforcement action is taken for a period of time that allows the submission of a petition to the High Court of Justice.

15. These judicial guarantees are available to everyone without any distinction based on religion, race or ethnicity.

16. The data concerning demolition of illegal construction reveals that throughout 2013 and 2014, 29% and 43% respectively of the new cases concerning illegal construction by Palestinians resulted in demolitions. Slightly higher demolition rates applied to Israelis residing in the West Bank, namely, 41% and 48% of the new cases concerning illegal construction in 2013 and 2014, respectively. Claims regarding discrimination in enforcement do not correlate with this data and are unfounded.

Planning and Zoning for the Bedouin Population Residing in the West Bank

17. Over the years, the Civil Administration has operated extensively in order to accommodate the living conditions of the Bedouin population in the West Bank and to allow the establishment of permanent places of residence suitable to their specific needs, accommodating future development resulting from natural growth. Of the outline plans mentioned above, six are specifically designed to provide for the Bedouin population. These plans are currently in advanced stages of the statutory process.

18. In light of the unique tradition and culture of the Bedouin population, the planning undertaken for their benefit seeks to provide them with living arrangements compatible with the modern age while recognizing and providing for aspects of their lifestyle. This is done by mapping the population's preexisting construction clusters, assessing, inter alia, the unique elements of their lifestyle and their attachment to different areas. Based on these assessments, a customized plan is crafted to tailor to their way of life and needs, taking into account their future natural growth. These plans are developed with the aim of preserving each community's traditional way of life and geographical proximity to its current location. It should be stressed that when illegal construction is broad and geographically scattered, major difficulties arise in fulfilling the needs of the population in terms of the provision of energy and water; maintenance of functioning sewer and transportation systems; proper services and adequate infrastructure. Thus, a minimal level of centralization is essential.

19. The Civil Administration devotes great resources and invests undeniable amounts of resources in direct communications with the population in an attempt to integrate the community in characterizing their own wants and needs in order to provide the optimal plans for them. Such integration is attempted in all stages of the process, from the preliminary stages of planning, continuing with the planning itself, and concluding with the transition to the approved plans. As stated above, in 2014, the IDF and the Civil Administration introduced a specific procedure with the aim of ensuring the participation of the local population in planning procedures in the West Bank. For additional information, please see subtitle "Palestinian Participation in the Planning Procedure" on page 5 above.

Sealing and Demolition of Terrorists' Houses

20. Unfortunately, since its establishment, Israel has been under constant terrorist threats and attacks. In times of intense terrorist attacks that threaten the lives of Israeli citizens, Israel, as part of its obligation to ensure the right to life of its civilians, is forced to adopt exceptional measures in order to deter potential terrorists.

21. As explained above, in principle, the laws that were in force in the West Bank prior to June 1967, remain in force. Regulation 119 of the Defense [Emergency] Regulations, 1945, constitutes the basis for the issuance of orders by the Military Commander for taking measures, including, in severe cases, to demolish a property that is linked to perpetrators of severe acts of terrorism. Such orders are issued following an assessment made by the Military Commander indicating the need for the said measures to deter potential perpetrators from committing similar terrorist acts.

22. The exceptional nature of the measures adopted under Regulation 119 is always taken into account. Regulation 119 is used, both within Israel and in the West Bank, in times of escalation of terrorist activity, as a response to outbreaks of terrorist activities aimed against Israeli civilians. Following internal deliberations, in early 2005, Israel suspended the use of such measures. In 2008, following a sharp increase in terrorist attacks originating from parts of Jerusalem, limited measures were employed for a brief period only, in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem. Over the period between 2008 and 2014, Israel had no need to resort to the exceptional step of ordering the demolition of terrorists' houses.

23. Following several attacks — including the murder of a police officer, the 2014 kidnapping and murder of three Israeli teenagers and the 2015-2016 wave of terrorist attacks — Israeli authorities decided to allow the use of the sealing and demolition of houses for purposes of deterrence, in line with Regulation 119, although only in specific and extreme circumstances.

24. The need to make limited use of such measures in the context of the current wave of violence stems from the unique challenges that Israel faces in the fight against terrorism. The current wave of attacks largely consists of acts by so-called “lone wolf” terrorists, who operate individually and unexpectedly, making it very difficult to prevent the attacks through intelligence gathering or other traditional measures. Deterrence becomes an essential tool in preventing these terrorist attacks.

25. Such measures are used in a relatively small number of cases, in a focused and non-arbitrary manner. Demolition or sealing orders are regularly brought before the High Court of Justice. In its judgments, the Court has allowed the use of Regulation 119 in very specific and narrow circumstances. The Court has also reiterated the need to periodically review the use of the Regulation, taking into account updated information regarding the effectiveness of the measures and any changes in the security situation. In a number of cases, the Court quashed demolition orders, or imposed limitations on the requested measures, due to proportionality or other considerations.

26. Enforcement Measures against Illegal Construction in the Eastern Neighborhoods of Jerusalem.

27. Illegal construction harms the local population, as it does not take into consideration planning policies and parameters that are needed to ensure quality of life, the welfare of the population and public needs. Enforcement measures against illegal structures are adopted in accordance with legal guarantees and following due process, subject to judicial review and the right to appeal, and are decided upon without distinction based upon race or ethnic origin.

28. The authorities exercise discretion in the execution of demolition orders and give priority to the demolition of illegal structures that pose an obstacle to the development of the city, for example, an illegal structure that blocks a sewer pipe system, a planned school, access roads, etc.

29. As of November 23rd, 2016, 64 demolition orders against illegal structures were carried out by the Jerusalem Municipality in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem, of which only nine were inhabited (compared to 55 such orders in the western neighborhoods of which nine were inhabited). In 2015, 44 demolition orders against illegal construction were carried out by the Jerusalem Municipality in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem, of which only six were inhabited (compared to 50 such orders in the western neighborhoods of which 14 were inhabited). In 2014, 35 demolition orders against illegal construction were carried out by the Jerusalem Municipality in the eastern neighborhoods of Jerusalem, of which only nine were inhabited (compared to 33 such orders in the western neighborhoods of which 14 were inhabited).

30. During 2014, a new procedure for demonstrating proprietary rights was initiated in order to expedite the issuance of building permits, thus reducing one of the major barriers to obtaining a building permit. This procedure was initiated with the aim of increasing the number of building licenses granted and reducing the need for demolition orders.

Involvement of the Arab population in the planning and zoning process

Outline Plans and basic planning for the Arab population throughout Israel

31. As of December 2016, 131 of 133 Arab localities have approved outline plans. Of these 133 localities: 71 have approved updated outline plans (from 2004 and onward); 17 have new outline plans undergoing statutory approval. It is expected that in the next two years, the approval procedures will be completed. New outline plans are in the process of being prepared for an additional 21 localities, including updating three of the above mentioned approved plans. Outline plans for 12 additional localities is scheduled to begin during 2017. Note that these updated outline plans, excluding those scheduled to be prepared in 2017, comprise 96% of the Arab population in the said 133 localities.

32. As of December 2016, 95 of the aforementioned outline plans for the Arab localities were promoted by the National Planning Administration. The rest of the plans are promoted by the local authorities, local councils or other governmental administrations.

33. The outline plans promoted by the Ministry of Interior have added, on average, 70% to the localities' existing development lands, in addition to existing areas within the locality which are approved but not yet developed.

34. The vast majority of the outline plans allow for a larger population than the population prediction for the relevant planning period.

35. In order to allow the construction of a large number of residential units in a short period of time, the Planning Administration is currently conducting a pilot study, in which it is promoting detailed planning in two Arab localities with several planning challenges (such as the need to divert national infrastructures etc.). This is in addition to the above-mentioned approval of outline plans.

36. In accordance with Government Resolutions No. 2332 (of December 14, 2014) and 959 (of January 10, 2016), concerning the Development and Empowerment of the Druze and Circassian Localities for the Years 2016-2019, which include the preparation of detailed plans for localities of these populations, the Planning Administration is promoting such detailed plans concerning private lands in 13 localities.

Infrastructure as a Basis for Development

37. The updated outline plans are aimed at providing solutions for residential areas, public areas, public open spaces, employment areas, commercial areas etc., as well as preparing the infrastructures needed for the planned and existing development. These solutions take into account a period of at least 20 years.

38. Note that the allocation of parks and open spaces are sometimes not made a priority by the locality and there are many cases in which approved open spaces have been converted to residential areas, or illegal private construction, contrary to the outline plan.

39. One of the common reasons for delays in approving outline plans — in both Jewish and Arab localities — is the lack of infrastructure at the regional level (such as a sewage system etc.). This issue was addressed in Government Resolution no. 208 of July 2015, which included a decision to promote a regional sewage-master plan.

Implementation of the Outline Plans

40. The implementation of the outline plans is carried out by means of detailed plans, which are promoted by each and every locality. Since many of the Arab localities find it difficult to promote detailed plans, and since these plans are essential for obtaining building permits, the National Planning Administration has taken upon itself to initiate a pilot of detailed planning, granting budget and professional support for the promotion of 45 detailed plans in 12 Druze localities. A similar project is to be carried out for other Arab localities.

41. The position of the National Planning Administration is that lack of an updated outline plan should not delay the approval of a detailed plan that is compatible with national planning policy. Thus, in the majority of localities that do not have an approved updated outline plan, detailed plans were and continue to be promoted.

42. Note that there are no gaps between the resources that were allocated for planning in central areas and resources that were allocated for planning in peripheral areas.

Facilitating Housing Issues

43. On July 2015, the Government adopted a set of recommendations included in a comprehensive report analyzing housing issues in Arab localities. This Government Resolution (no. 208) includes close to 40 sections dealing with different aspects of this subject, including, among other things: promoting detailed planning and facilitating its approval, specifying measures to increase suitable land for housing development, facilitating registry issues especially in built-up areas and increasing the number of independent Arab building and planning committees and strengthening them.

Planning for the Bedouin Population

44. In regards to planning for the Bedouin population — there are 18 Bedouin localities with approved outline plans, including the city of Rahat, Lakiya, Hura, Kuseife, Tel-Sheva, Segev Shalom and Ar'ara. All of these plans include infrastructure such as schools, health clinics, running water, electricity, roads, pavements, etc.

45. An additional 11 localities that are under the jurisdiction of the Neve Midbar and A-Kasum Regional Councils also have approved outline plans.

46. In addition, the planning procedures for six additional localities are ongoing.

47. The strategic work of examining and setting rules for the planning of construction solutions for the Bedouin population in the Negev has been undertaken and completed. The work included the collection and presentation of demographic information and planning data. Following this strategic work, recommendations were formulated to expand existing localities and establish new ones, whilst regularizing some Bedouin localities at their current location. The report of stage one of this strategic work, which includes these recommendations, was submitted to the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development in November 2015.

48. In regards to the planning relating to the rest of the clusters in the Bedouin diaspora, following this work, ten leading planning companies were recruited to conduct feasibility studies with the planning areas and to examine special planning solutions for the population in that region. This process is being conducted with the participation of the population in each region and with emphasis on land arrangement and a wide range of housing arrangements. Currently, these companies are conducting field surveys and formulating the resulting data into planning recommendations that will be examined by the Authority for the Regularization of the Bedouin Housing Situation in the Negev, currently handling the bulk of issues in this area. This course of planning, with the special emphasis placed on the participation of the Bedouin population, is unprecedented in Israel.

49. Please note that in almost every planning team there is a position of a social advisor who is a senior member of each team, and his/her responsibility is to maintain contact between the planning team and the local population. The social advisor conducts surveys with the local population; examines the population's desires, requirements, needs and expectations, and later presents them to the planning team. Following the planning stage, the social advisor presents the plan and the planning conception to the local population, in order to receive its view and remarks and to finalize the relevant planning solutions.

50. The Government encourages movement to regulated localities (regardless of the localities' nature as a city, town, village, etc.) by providing unique financial benefits to all residents of the Bedouin diaspora who pursue such movement, regardless of their economic situation and independent of any entitlement test. These benefits include, inter alia, the provision of land plots for free or at a very low cost, and compensation for the demolition of unauthorized structures.

51. The Bill for the Regulation of the Bedouin Localities in the Negev — Currently, the Bill is not being promoted by the Government of Israel.

52. In accordance with Government Resolution No. 2025 of September 23, 2014, the Authority for Planning and Development of Bedouin Housing in the Negev in the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development, is currently in the final stages of the preparation of a strategic plan for the socio-economic development of the Bedouin localities in the Negev. The main goals of this plan are the socio-economic advancement of the entire Bedouin population in the Negev, regularization of the Bedouin localities in the Negev and providing solutions for land claims. As a part of this process, the Authority has held meetings with prominent figures of the Bedouin populations in order to hear their views regarding housing solutions and the regularization of Bedouin localities.

GOI Reply

53. The Gaza Strip is not a part of the State of Israel, and as any other state, Israel has the right to control entry, exit and passage through its borders. This is true all the more so given that the Gaza Strip is controlled by a hostile terrorist organization which is in armed conflict with Israel.

54. Please note that the restrictions placed on movement to and from the Gaza Strip apply only to passage across the border with Israel. There remains the possibility of direct passage of goods and people through the Rafah crossing, which is controlled by Egypt on one side and by Hamas on the other. Israel has no control over this southern entry point into Gaza.

55. Despite the possibility of passage through the Rafah crossing, Israel has significantly eased restrictions on the entry of goods and persons to the Gaza Strip, as described below:

56. Goods — Israel is currently permitting the entry of almost any type of goods, as well as humanitarian aid, into the Gaza Strip, except for munitions and dual-use materials. The entry of dual-use materials, which are materials that can be used for terrorist acts against Israel, requires a designated permit and is subject to supervision mechanisms.

57. As of October 31, 2015, on an average day, over 700 truckloads of goods are transferred into the Gaza Strip.

58. Since September 2014, Israel has permitted the export of goods originating from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank (mainly agricultural products, furniture, textile products and iron) and enables the export of such goods abroad and even into Israel (mainly agricultural products and recently also furniture, textile products and iron).

59. Building Materials — Building materials, specifically concrete, are dual-use materials, as was demonstrated during the summer of 2014 when Hamas made use of such materials in order to launch rockets against Israel and to build a web of offensive underground tunnels. Israel therefore supervises the transfer of building materials in order to defend itself against the construction or rehabilitation of these offensive tunnels or other infrastructures that may be used for terrorist purposes.

60. Despite the risk, Israel permits the transfer of building materials into the Gaza Strip. Such transfer is conducted through the Gaza Reconstruction Mechanism led by the Palestinian Authority with the assistance of United Nations agencies and with Israeli supervision.

61. Between October 2014 and May 2016 over 4.8 million tons of building materials, including concrete and aggregates, were transferred to the Gaza Strip.

62. In addition, as of May 16, 2016 the entry of building materials required for the construction of 127,216 homes were approved, of which 81,026 constructions were completed and 19,974 are currently under construction. In addition, materials required for the building of 12,926 new homes were also approved. Of the new homes to be constructed, over 6,570 have all or part of the building materials needed to complete the construction.

63. The transfer of building materials was also approved for 696 large scale building projects, some funded by the Palestinian Authority and some by foreign countries or international organizations. These projects include the construction of infrastructures such as roads, water, electricity, public buildings, medical facilities etc. Of these large scale projects, 109 have been completed and 407 are under construction.

64. It is important to note that 98% of the requests for building materials were approved. The remaining 2% were declined for technical reasons and not on security grounds.

65. Unfortunately, despite the supervision mechanism and cooperation with the United Nations organization, terrorist organizations often manage to acquire dual-use materials that have been allowed into the Gaza Strip for the benefit of the civilian population.

Movement of Persons

66. Over the last two years, with the aim of encouraging the local economy, Israel has increased the number of entry permits granted to merchants/businessmen. Nearly 800 merchants are permitted to exit and enter the Strip every day.

67. The number of permits issued to members of the Palestinian Authority official sports teams has also increased.

68. Israel provides permits for 200 persons each Friday in order to participate in the prayers on the Temple Mount (Haram El-Sharif).

69. Permits are also issued for Gaza residents to travel abroad in order to participate in conventions, special medical treatments abroad, and to pursue academic studies — mainly for advanced academic degrees. As a gesture of goodwill toward the Palestinian Authority, exit permits from the Gaza Strip for academic studies were granted on several occasions to students studying for first and second degrees.

70. In addition to an increase in the number of Palestinian employees of international organizations that are permitted to enter into Israel and the West Bank in the course of their work, Israel also increased the number of medical personnel and teams authorized to work in hospitals and undergo professional training in the West Bank and Israel.

71. In total there are approximately 1,200 persons passing through the Erez Crossing each day.

The Crime of Torture

72. Acts and behaviors defined as “torture” under Article 1 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (hereinafter: “CAT”) and Article 7 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (hereinafter: “ICCPR”) may constitute offences under the Israeli Penal Law 5737-1977 (hereinafter: the “Penal Law”). For further information, please see Sections 356-7 of Israel’s 4th Periodic Report.

73. On 14 June 2010 the Israeli Government appointed the Public Commission to Examine the Maritime Incident of May 31, 2010 (hereinafter “the Turkel Commission”).⁵

74. In February 2013, the Turkel Commission recommended, among other things, incorporating an offence prohibiting torture into the Israeli Penal Law (Commission’s Recommendation No. 1).⁶

75. On January 5, 2014 the Israeli Government appointed a team headed by Dr. Joseph Ciechanover to review and implement the recommendations of the Turkel Commission (hereinafter: “the Implementation Team”).⁷

76. In its report of August 2015, the implementation team lent its support to this recommendation, noting that “... the crime of torture that shall be defined is expected to set a ban, along the lines of the crime of torture in the Convention against Torture, which includes causing pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, by a public official in order to extract information or a confession from someone, blackmail him, and such similar purposes that will be defined by the law. [...] It should be noted that under the emerging model, which is still under internal review, some offenses will not be defined as independent offenses, but will be included in the draft by reference to existing offenses prescribed in the Penal Law or other offenses in the draft with aggravating circumstances ...”.

77. On July 3, 2016, the Israeli Security Cabinet⁸ adopted the recommendations of the Implementation team, including the abovementioned recommendation.

78. Currently, following extensive discussions, the relevant authorities are in the final stages of drafting a Bill on the prohibition of torture.

⁵ For further details of the composition of the Turkel Commission and its mandate, please see: www.turkel-committee.gov.il.

⁶ <http://www.turkel-committee.gov.il/files/newDoc3/The%20Turkel%20Report%20for%20website.pdf> : “The Ministry of Justice should initiate legislation wherever there is a deficiency regarding international prohibitions that do not have a ‘regular’ equivalent in the Israeli Penal Law, and rectify that deficiency through Israeli criminal legislation. Thus, for example, the Ministry should ensure that there is legislation to transpose clearly into law and practice the absolute prohibition in international law of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment. This is in order to enable ‘effective penal sanction’ for those committing war crimes, as required by international law (Commission’s Recommendation No. 1).”.

The Defense of Necessity

79. As in many other legal systems, the necessity defense, as stipulated in Section 34 (11) of the Penal Law, is one of the defense claims afforded to a defendant in criminal proceedings in Israel. In H.C.J 5100/94 The Public Committee against Torture et. al. v. The State of Israel et. al. (6.9.99), the High Court of Justice held that this defense could apply to a defendant accused of using unnecessary or excessive physical pressure.

80. The petition referred to in paragraph 370 of Israel's 4th Periodic report, in which the High Court of Justice is requested to order the initiation of a criminal investigation into the interrogation conducted against the petitioner, is still pending.

Audio or Visual Documentation of Interrogation

81. The Turkel Commission also recommended that there be full visual documentation of the ISA interrogations, according to rules that will be determined by the Attorney General in coordination with the Head of the ISA (Second Report, recommendation No. 15).

82. In this regard, the Implementation Team recommended that cameras be installed in all ISA interrogation rooms. According to the recommendation, these cameras are to broadcast, regularly and in "real-time", via closed-circuit to a control room located in an ISA facility in which interrogations are not conducted. The broadcast is to be accessible and available to a supervising entity on behalf of the Ministry of Justice at any time without prior notice. The supervising entity is to prepare a concise memorandum, but no record will be kept of the video transmission. The interrogators will have no indication of when the supervising entity is watching them in the control room. In the event that the supervising entity believes that illegal means have been used during the interrogation, it has an obligation to immediately report the matter to the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators in the Ministry of Justice. This outline is acceptable to the Head of the ISA and the Attorney General.

83. As mentioned above, the Israeli Security Cabinet adopted the recommendations of the Implementation team. Consequently, the Ministry of Justice is currently conducting the staff work required in order to implement this recommendation. The Ministry of Public Security and the Police have agreed that this outline will also apply to security interrogations conducted by the Police, subject to certain adjustments.

84. Today, the Criminal Procedure Law (Investigation of Suspects) 5762-2002 requires that the Israel Police carry out audio or visual recording of criminal suspect questioning (Sections 7 and 11), where the crime carries a penalty of imprisonment of ten or more years. However, a temporary provision in the law, which has been extended several times, states that this obligation to document does not apply to a police investigation of a suspect relating to a security offense and that the provisions of the law do not apply to interrogations by the ISA.

85. Recently, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 8 to the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law whereby the outline for the audio-visual documentation of ISA interrogations will also be applied to security interrogations conducted by the Police, subject to certain adjustments. According to this Amendment, the obligation to carry out audio or visual recordings of criminal suspect investigations will not apply to a police interrogation of a suspect in a security offence. Instead, the Amendment requires random inspections and supervision of these interrogations according to police procedures that are to be approved by the Minister of Public Security and the Attorney General. The Amendment provides that the supervising authority will be allowed to conduct such inspections in regard to all ongoing interrogations, at any time, without any advance notice and without the interrogators being aware of such inspections. The Amendment also added the requirement that the Ministers of Public Security and Justice report annually to the Knesset's Constitution, Law and Justice Committee on the implementation of this Amendment. This Amendment will enter into force six months after the day of its publication (June 22, 2017). The first Annual report is scheduled for July 1, 2018.

86. Following the legislation of the temporary provision of June 2015, several non-governmental organizations filed a petition to the High Court of Justice, inter alia, against the constitutionality of this temporary provision (H.C.J 5014/15 Adalah v. The Minister of Public Security). Given the developments outlined above, this petition is still pending. A supplementary response is to be submitted to the Court on January 31, 2017.

GOI Reply

87. The State of Israel attaches great importance to strengthening and promoting the protection granted to minors in the military justice system in the West Bank, while simultaneously taking into consideration the unique circumstances and security situation in the West Bank. This is reflected in both legislation and practice.

88. The severity of the crimes committed by the Palestinian minors and their often ideologically-motivated nature create a unique set of demands from the criminal justice system. Terrorist organizations work to instill a sense of hatred through the indoctrination of children starting in pre-school and continuing all the way through adulthood, using children to advance their political goals. This education leads to many violent acts towards security forces and civilians, including throwing stones and Molotov cocktails and terrorist attacks using knives. 70-75% of crimes committed by the youth of the West Bank are violent.

89. The lack of cooperation on the part of the Palestinian Authority should also be noted, since it makes it almost impossible to provide alternatives to detention.

90. The Israeli judicial systems, as well as all law enforcement agencies, are committed to upholding the rights of minors. In addition, the relevant authorities investigate any complaint and/or allegations of ill-treatment or infringement of minor's rights.

91. Since 2008, an inter-ministerial team headed by the Deputy Attorney General (Criminal Law) has been tasked with assessing and reforming policies with regard to minors in the West Bank. As a result of these efforts, criminal law and practice regarding minors in the West Bank have undergone significant reform. These include:

- The establishment of a Juvenile Military Court;
- Raising the age of majority to 18;
- Introducing a special statute of limitation for minors;
- Improving notification to the family of the minor and to the minors themselves regarding their rights;
- Reducing detention periods.

92. In regard to the issue of reducing detention periods, please note constitutional budgetary difficulties are currently hampering the ability to reduce detention periods but this issue is constantly being reviewed. On January 7, 2016, the State notified the Court that the issue of resources required for further reducing some of the detention periods has not yet been resolved and that the Attorney General had requested the immediate and urgent involvement of the Ministers of Defense, Finance and Public Security in this matter. On December 26, 2016, with the agreement of the Attorney General, the Court issued an order nisi requiring the State's response to the petition. (H.C.J 4057/10 The Association for Civil Rights in Israel v. IDF Commander to Judea and Samaria).

Introduction

1. The GOI is pleased to introduce its Fifth Periodic Report. Since the submission of our Fourth Periodic Report, many developments relevant to the implementation of the Covenant have taken place. This report provides a comprehensive account of the most significant developments. Moreover, the comments made in the concluding observations by the Committee (CCPR/C/ISR/CO/4) dated November 21, 2014 are also addressed.
2. Israeli Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) were invited to submit comments prior to the compilation of the report, through both direct application, and a general invitation posted on the Ministry of Justice (MoJ) website.
3. This Report was compiled by the Counseling and Legislation (International Law) Department at the MoJ, in cooperation with other Governmental Ministries and agencies.

Reply to paragraph 1 of the list of issues (CCPR/C/ISR/QPR/5)

Significant Developments

4. Israel invests great efforts in promoting human rights, including civil and political rights and sees great importance in enforcing and protecting these rights. Since the submission of Israel's Fourth Periodic Report, significant new measures have been taken by the Israeli Parliament (the "Knesset") in this regard as will be detailed below.
5. On October 11, 2018, Israel ratified the 2014 Protocol to the ILO Forced Labor Convention of 1930. This ratification is a part of Israel's continuous commitment to the international efforts to combat and eradicate all forms of modern slavery, including forced labor. The Protocol will enter into force for Israel on October 11, 2019.
6. In March 2016, the GOI ratified the Marrakesh Treaty to Facilitate Access to Published Works for Persons Who Are Blind, Visually Impaired, or Otherwise Print Disabled of the World Intellectual Property Organization.

Legislation

7. On December 31, 2018, the Knesset legislated the Prohibition of Consumption of Prostitution Services Law (Temporary Provision) 5779-2018, which prohibits the consumption of sexual services. The Law was legislated as part of the ongoing efforts of the State to reduce prostitution and provide assistance and rehabilitation to persons in prostitution. According to the Law, the offense of consumption of prostitution services, which includes the presence in a location which is used for prostitution, is an administrative offense that can be fined for 2,000 NIS (540 USD) for first time offenders and double the sum for repeat offenders. According to the Law, he/she who is present in a location which is principally used for prostitution will be seen as being there for the purpose of consumption of such services, unless proven otherwise. Nevertheless, the Law authorizes the State Attorney's Office to indict an offender, in which case the court could impose a fine of up to 75,300 NIS (20,350 USD). The Law further enables the Minister of Justice to set alternative penalties to fines within the Law's Regulations, by means of indictment. The Law will come into force in 2020 for a period of five (5) years. Its extension will be determined in accordance with research on its effects. In addition, the Ministers of Public Security and of LSASS will conduct periodic reviews of its implementation and the overall progress of the efforts to reduce consumption of prostitution.
8. In June 2018, the Knesset legislated Amendment No. 132 to the Penal Law 5737-1977, which criminalizes a proposal to engage in prostitution to both adults and minors (Section 205D). For additional information, see the reply to Question 9.
9. In March 2018, the Knesset enacted the Blocking of Telephone Numbers for the Prevention of Crimes Law 5768-2018, which authorizes a police officer to block a publicized telephone number, if he/she has reasonable grounds to believe that this phone number is used for the commission of crime, including by the internet or other technological applications. This further enables the blocking of telephone numbers publishing prostitution services, including that of a minor and drugs and dangerous substances offences.

10. In July 2017, the Knesset legislated the Authorities for Prevention of Internet Use for the Commission of Offenses Law 5777-2017, which authorizes courts to issue an order for blocking access to a website or for its removal from the internet. Such an order will be issued if it is crucial for the prevention of an ongoing offense set by the Law, such as offences relating to prostitution, child pornography, gambling and drugs and dangerous substances or terrorism. This law enables courts to issue three (3) kinds of orders: order for restricting the access to the relevant website, order for restricting the possibility of locating the relevant website or an order for the removal of a website from the internet – provided that the relevant site is stored on a server in Israel or is under the control of a person present in Israel. The aim of the Law is to provide law enforcement authorities with additional tools to combat the phenomenon of prostitution of minors in the virtual world.

11. The Prohibition of Discrimination in Products, Services and Entry into Places of Entertainment and Public Places Law 5761-2000, was amended twice in 2017 (Amendments No. 4 and 5) in order to add “place of residence” and “wearing uniforms of security and rescue forces or their symbols” to reasons by which discrimination is prohibited. The Law is presumed to be violated, where it has been proven that a person whose business is providing products or public service, or operating a public place, delays the provision of a public service or product in the place of business, or the entrance to a public place – on the basis of race, religion or religious affiliation, nationality, country of origin, gender, sexual orientation, views, political affiliation, age, personal status, parenthood, place of residence or wearing uniforms of security and rescue forces or their symbols – while providing it without delay, in similar circumstances, to persons not related to that group.

12. For information on the Counter Terrorism Law 5776-2016, see Question no. 11.

13. Following the recommendation of the CRC Committee, a 2016 amendment to Section 203C of the Penal Law (amendment no. 127) increased the penalty for the offense of obtaining the service of an act of prostitution from a minor from three (3) years to five (5) years imprisonment. For additional information, see Annex II.

14. On December 9, 2014, the Knesset approved Election Law (Legislative Amendments) 5775-2014, which, inter alia, amended the Knesset Election Law [Consolidated Version] 5729-1969. The voting in Israel is conducted by notes carrying the letters of a specific party, which are placed in envelopes and inserted by the voters in ballot boxes. Prior to this amendment, notes that were marked by handwritten letters were disqualified. This amendment, inter alia, revised Section 76(C) of the Knesset Election Law, clarifying that a blank note marked by a handwritten letter or letter and the party/list of candidates’ label, by a blue pen, in Hebrew, Arabic or both, shall be regarded as a legal note.

Administrative Measures

16. Review and implementation of concluding observations – The work of the joint inter-ministerial team headed by the Deputy Attorney General (International Law), which was established in 2011 for review and implementation of concluding observations of UN human rights committees (for information on this team see Israel’s fourth periodic report) has brought about several significant changes, notably:

17. Raising the marital age from 17 to 18 – Following the Concluding Observations the CEDAW Committee, in December 2013, the Knesset amended the Marital Age Law 5710-1950 in order to raise the minimum marital age from 17 to 18.

19. In 2016, The Israeli Prisons Service (IPS) published its standing order No. 02.39.00 titled “Wardens rules of behavior” which includes an obligation to report any complaint or suspicion against ISA interrogators to the Inspector in the MoJ via the prison commander.

A. Israel’s Reservation to Article 23 of the Covenant

21. Israel’s reservation to Article 23 regarding personal status is reviewed periodically. At present, Israel maintains its position on this matter. This reservation stems from Israel’s constitutional system and respect for religious pluralism, and the autonomy of Israel’s religious communities in matters of personal status.

B. Scope of Application of the Covenant

22. Having carefully reviewed the matter in recent years, Israel continue to maintain that the Covenant applies only to a State territory. The Covenant is implemented by the Government throughout the State of Israel. According to the Israeli legal system, international conventions, as opposed to customary international law, do not apply directly in Israel, unless they were formally legislated. Such is the case with the ICCPR which is implemented through a wide range of legal instruments, such as basic laws, laws, orders and regulations, municipal bylaws, and court rulings.

23. The applicability of the Convention to the West Bank has been the subject of considerable debate in recent years.

24. Moreover, in line with basic principles of treaty interpretation, Israel believes that the Convention, which is territorially bound, does not apply, nor was it intended to apply, to areas beyond a state’s national territory.

25. Israel wishes to note however, that even if one follows the approach outlined, inter alia, in the Committee’s GC No. 31 with respect to the scope of application of the ICCPR Covenant, its conduct would remain consistent with the Covenant requirements. Notably, for example, in jurisprudence of Israeli courts, including its Supreme Court, with respect to the West Bank refers to the provisions of the ICCPR and other human rights treaties. For related example, see Annex No. II.

C. Applicability of International Humanitarian Law

26. The relationship between different legal spheres, primarily the Law of Armed Conflict and Human Rights Law remains a subject of serious academic and practical debate. For its part, Israel recognizes that there is a profound connection between human rights and the Law of Armed Conflict, and that there may well be a convergence between these two bodies-of-law in some respects. However, in the current state of international law and state-practice worldwide, it is Israel’s view that these two systems-of-law, which are codified in separate instruments, remain distinct and apply in different circumstances.

D. The Covenant Optional Protocols

27. Despite periodic consideration of its position on the matter, Israel is currently not prepared to ratify the first and second Optional Protocols to the ICCPR at this stage. Regarding the first protocol, as detailed throughout this report and in the previous reports, Israel’s legal system affords numerous opportunities, for individuals and groups alike, to seek remedies and redress for any alleged violations of their rights.

28. Information on National Human Rights Institutions (NHRI) – For information on mechanisms for the protection of human rights, see Israel Core Document of 2008

(HRI/CORE/ISR/2008) and as amended in 2014 (HRI/CORE/ISR/2015) (Article 2(IV)(A)(vi) to (xiii)), additional mechanisms are listed below.

29. In recent years, the State Comptroller has been addressing Israel's adherence to the various Human Rights Treaties, including the ICCPR, in relation to NHRIs and the promotion and protection of human rights (the "Paris Principles"). In addition, in 2018, the State Comptroller Office' Director General (DG) and his chief of Staff published, in their personal capacities, a paper¹ exploring the State Comptroller Office as a suitable institution to serve as NHRI. Also, in December 2018, a seminar was held by the Minerva Center for Human Rights on the issue of NHRI, in which representatives of NGOs, the Academia and the Government took part, discussing this matter. In February 2019, two (2) researchers of the Minerva Center published a research paper on the matter of establishing an NHRI in Israel.² It is still early to assess the influence of these individual steps on the establishment of an Israel NHRI, however, these measures clearly indicate the importance provided to this matter in Israel.

30. For information on the Early Childhood Council and the Children's and Youth Complaints Commission for Out-of-home Placed Children, see Annex II.

31. Cooperation with Civil Society – Israel makes concerted efforts to include civil society in the legislation process, in developing public policy, and in a variety of projects within Government Ministries.

32. In particular, Israel strives to raise the level of civil society involvement in the UN Human Rights arena. For example, prior to compiling an initial and periodic report to the Human Rights Treaty Bodies, relevant and leading NGOs are approached, and invited to submit their comments and general remarks; in addition, a general invitation to submit alternative reports or specific remarks is posted on the MoJ web site. Civil Society contributions are given serious consideration during the drafting of the reports.

33. Since 2012, the Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs have been participating in a joint project with the Civil Society organizations, specifically relating to the reporting process to the UN Human Rights Committees. This project was initiated with the Minerva Center for Human Rights at the Hebrew University. Through this project, several draft reports are circulated to the relevant NGOs for their comments prior to submission. Additionally, discussions are held following the publication of the concluding observations.

34. In 2017, the Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs, have initiated the "Round Tables" project. This project consisted of six (6) sessions, which took place in different academic institutes around Israel – South, Center and North. The sessions were a unique platform, creating a discourse and further cooperation between NGO members, academics and representatives from the Government, on core human right issues: LGBT Rights, Israelis of Ethiopian descent, Bedouin population, women's rights, rights of people with disabilities and social and economic rights in the periphery.

Review of the Legislation Governing the State of Emergency

35. The State of Israel remains in an officially-proclaimed state of public emergency since May 19, 1948, four (4) days after its founding, until the present day. The state of emergency has been extended periodically (currently in force until January 4, 2020) due to the ongoing state of war or violent conflict between Israel and some of its neighbors, and the constant attacks on the lives and property of its citizens.

36. Over the past ten (10) years, the Israeli authorities have been reviewing the legislation connected to the existence of a declaration on a state of public emergency, in order to enable its termination. As of June 2019, there were only Eight (8) laws and 23 orders connected (some only partially) to the state of emergency, compared to nine (9) laws and 165 orders in 2009. This process is ongoing.

38. Amendment No. 30 to the Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952 (of March 2018) - This Amendment authorizes the Minister of Interior to revoke a permanent residence permit which was issued pursuant to this law, if he/she is convinced that the permit's owner has acted in breach of allegiance against the State of Israel (defined as a terrorist act in accordance to the Counter Terrorism Law 5776-2016, aiding and abetting or solicitation of such an act, taking an active part in a terrorist organization; an act of treason (Sections 97 to 99 to the Penal Law) or severe espionage (Section 113(b) to that law)). Such a permit will not be revoked in regard to a person that at the time of the offence, 15 years has passed of the time he/she received the permit; or in regard to a person who at the time of his/her birth, one of his/her parents had a permanent residency permit, without the consent of the Minister of Justice and only after consultation with the relevant advisory committee. If following such revocation, the said person will be left without a permanent residence permit outside Israel, without the possibility to obtain such residence permit or without any citizenship, the Minister of Interior will provide him/her a temporary residence permit in Israel. In addition, if a person who had his/her permanent residence permit revoked, appeals this decision, the Minister of Interior will allow his/her entrance until the conclusion of the proceedings, unless the Minister is convinced that by doing so there is a substantial threat to State or public security.

39. As stated, this Amendment applies only to specific and severe offences and therefore there is no basis for any allegations that it will harm or compromise the presence of Palestinian residents in the Eastern Neighborhoods of Jerusalem (ENoJ).

Equality and Non-Discrimination

41. Equality before the law and non-discrimination are basic principles of Israel's legal system. For additional information see Israel Core Document of 2008 (HRI/CORE/ISR/2008) (Article 2(IV)(B)) and as amended in 2014 (HRI/CORE/ISR/2015) (Article 2(IV)(B)).

42. These principles are a cornerstone of the Israeli legal system as apparent in both legislation and adjudication. Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty serves as a foundation for prohibiting discrimination and as a guiding principle for the creation of further laws promoting equality. Furthermore, all existing laws are to be interpreted in light of this Basic Law's purposes, in a manner which recognizes values such as human dignity and equality. Many laws emphasize the principle of equality in diverse aspects.

43. The judicial effort in this regard is guided by the Supreme Court, which plays a pivotal role in the promotion of the principle of equality and non-discrimination through the development of jurisprudence, strongly relying on the principle of equality and non-discrimination as a constitutional principle, embodied in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty. Amending this Basic Law is currently not under consideration.

Basic Law: Israel – National State of the Jewish People

44. On July 19, 2018, the Knesset legislated the Basic Law: Israel – National State of the Jewish People 5778-2018 (hereinafter: the "Basic Law") by an absolute majority of 62 votes.

45. The purpose of this Basic Law is to enshrine in a Basic Law the character of the State of Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish people and the state in which the Jewish people uniquely exercise their right of self-determination. This Basic Law is an addition to the existing Basic Laws which enshrine other aspects of Israel's core democratic values, as described above, and which together make-up the identity of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state as established in its Declaration of Independence. According to the Israeli legal system, the Basic Law is of a constitutional nature, and as such it is formulated in a mostly declarative formulation.

46. The characteristics of the State of Israel as a Jewish state which can be found in this Basic Law include its existing name, flag, national anthem and other national symbols. Other features include Jerusalem as the capitol of the State, the Hebrew calendar as an official calendar and the Shabbat (Saturday) and Jewish holidays as official days of rest, while safeguarding rights of members of other religions to maintain their days of rest. The Basic Law also refers to Israel's status as the national home of the Jewish people by promising the open admittance of Jewish immigration and affinity between Israel and the Jewish Diaspora.

47. In addition, the Basic Law declares that the promotion and development of Jewish residence in the State is a national value, regarded as part of the continuing formation of a Jewish homeland in the State of Israel.

48. Furthermore, according to this Basic Law, the official language of the State of Israel is Hebrew, as the historic language of the Jewish people and in accordance with its modern revival. Arabic is granted a special status and its use in state institutions shall be set in law, and the special status previously given to Arabic shall be maintained. This includes the ongoing translation of the Government's Ministries' websites into Arabic by the Israeli Government, Arabic-speaking public schools, broadcasts in Arabic on Israel's national television and radio and the parallel use of Arabic, Hebrew and English, on intercity and local road signs.

49. As formally declared by the Attorney General (AG), this Basic Law does not derogate in any manner from human rights protected under other basic laws of Israel.

Petitions to the High Court of Justice (HCJ)

50. As of October 2019, 16 petitions were filed to the HCJ against the Basic Law: Israel National State of the Jewish People. These petitions are currently pending before an extended panel of the Supreme Court.

Equality between Israeli and Arab Population

51. The GOI is committed and invests great efforts in the promotion and advancement of equality for its nationals of all populations alike, and concerning all spheres of life. In the same manner, great resources are also invested in fighting any form of discrimination.

Arab Population's Representation in Israel's Civil Service (CS)

55. Data indicates a steady increase in the rates of Arab, Druze and Circassian employees in the CS. For More information, see Annex I.

56. Over the past several years, the Government instituted affirmative action programs and mandated target goals to significantly increase the number of minority employees within the CS. For information on national conferences for the integration of Minority Populations in the MoJ and in the CS, on MoJ's conventions and actions to advance women (including Arab women) in the CS, enhancement of recruitment of women in CS tenders and minorities terms of employment, see Annex II.

Arab Representation in Directorates of Government Companies

57. In 2017, 12% on the total number of directors in government companies were Arabs. In 2017, there has also been an increase in the rate of women in government companies – of the 437 directors, 189 (43%) were women compared to 33% in 2007 and 40% in 2011). Nine (9) (4.7%) of these women were Arab.

Women's Participation in Political Parties

58. In the municipal elections of October 2018, Amendment No. 12 to the Municipal Council Law (Funding of Elections) 5774-2014 came into force. This amendment provides for 15% additional funding to bodies that run in the elections (e.g. political parties, independent lists etc.) in which at least one-third (1/3) of their elected and serving members are women. The additional funding begins after the State Comptroller provides a positive audit, and it maintained during their period of service (until the next elections). The Amendment applies to elections of city and local councils, but does not apply to regional councils.

59. In 2013 and in 2018 local elections, the Authority for the Advancement of the Status of Women (AASW) issued a general call to all political parties and local parties to include women on an equal basis on their list of candidates, thus giving due regard to the principle of equality. For additional steps by the AASW, see Annex II.

60. For statistical data on women elected in 2018 local election, see Annex I.

61. Attempts to prohibit or deter women's participation in political parties are regarded very seriously. For example, in the elections to the 20th Knesset, publications appeared arguing that unlawful coercion was exerted on ultra-Orthodox women to keep them from running in the elections. According to the allegations, a rabbi published statements relating to women considering running in any party not under the leadership of the "Great Torah Sages". These statements including threats that such a woman will have to leave her marriage without her ketubah (the money due to her upon divorce), harming her livelihood (it would be forbidden to study in her educational institutions or to purchase any product from her) and her children will be removed from their institutions of study. In light of the severity of these comments, the Deputy Attorney General (Public and Administrative Law), approached the Chairman of the Central Elections Committee that consequently issued a strong condemnation of acts of this kind and communicated this matter, together with a strong condemnation of acts of this kind to all the chairpersons of the parties running for the 20th Knesset.

62. For relevant case law, see Annex II.

A person cannot be denied of property arbitrarily. Any person who believes that his/her right to property was infringed or denied may access a court of law and seek remedies. C. Water supply in the ENoJ

64. The issue of water supply in the ENoJ, beyond the security fence, has been pending before the Supreme Court since 2014. During this period, the State promoted the establishment of additional water supply infrastructure in these neighborhoods. The plan is to ensure reasonable access to water, and the new lines are intended to increase the amount of water supplied in these neighborhoods, in order to improve accessibility. For information on the water lines and additional water projects, see Annex II.

65. For information on access to land and planning in the ENoJ, see Question 22 below.

D. The Regularization of Settlement in Judea and Samaria Law – 5777-2017

66. The Regularization Law was passed by the Knesset on February 6th, 2017, in order to address the problem of buildings in the West Bank that were built without permit on land that is not “public property”.

67. The Regularization Law aims to regulate these buildings by settling their land ownership and zoning status, and in the meanwhile to dismiss administrative measures taken to enforce their removal. According to its terms, the law applies to cases where the buildings were built in “good faith”, namely, without knowing of the status of the lands in question; or alternatively, built with the State’s consent, be it explicit or implicit. The Law only applies to pre-existing construction (built before February 2017). The Law provides two (2) tracks, based on the question of whether a specific individual can show ownership rights in the lands in question, or not. With respect to lands that were proved to be private property, the ownership would remain with the owner. Nevertheless, in certain circumstances, the usage would pass to the authorities and allocated to the current holders. The owner would be compensated, with annual payments of 125% of the value of usage rights of the land, or an equivalent lot in a different location, if possible. This is a temporary arrangement to apply until the question of the status of the West Bank is politically resolved (Section 3(2)). With respect to lands that were not proved to be private property, they will be registered as public property (Section 3(1)).

68. Several petitions³ were filed to the HCJ claiming, inter alia, that the Law is both unconstitutional and constitutes a violation of international law. In another petition, the Court was requested to order the State to begin implementation of the Law.

69. Already during the Law’s legislation process, the AG expressed his opinion that it was unconstitutional. The AG argued that the law constitutes a disproportionate infringement of the basic right to property, which is enshrined in Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, and also that its provisions deviate from well-established doctrines of property law and regulatory taking law.

70. Concerning the petitions to the HCJ, the AG announced that he would not be defending the Law on behalf of the Government of Israel, which is being represented in the hearing by private counsel, and responded to the petition separately from the Government. In his response, the AG asked the Court to accept the petition and declare the law to be void (AG Response dated 22.11.17). In the meanwhile, the AG suggested a procedural arrangement, which was accepted by the Court as an interim order (17.8.17), according to which, the implementation of the Law would be suspended until a final ruling is made, while temporarily freezing enforcement measures. In December 4, 2017, the Supreme Court issued an order nisi pending oral arguments. In June 3, 2018, the petitions were argued in front of an expanded panel of nine (9) justices, and are now awaiting judgement.

71. Violence against women, including domestic violence and sex offenses is a social phenomenon that requires special, system-wide treatment, both in the social and in the criminal level. In recent years, the Government has been enhancing its efforts to combat these phenomena. Hereinafter are several prominent examples of related legislative amendments and administrative measures to counter and fight such violence.

72. For information on legislation amendments relating to gender based violence and legislation amendments and administrative measures on countering sexual harassment, see Annex II.

Countering Domestic Violence

73. A Joint Inter-ministerial Committee on Preventing Domestic Violence was established in 2014. The Committee included representatives from all Ministries. In February 2016, the Committee published its final recommendations. Subsequently on May 2016 a designated sub-committee for implementing the recommendations was established, headed by the Minister of LSAaSS. The Implementation Committee included ten (10) teams; each one focused on different issues: research, protection, information, vulnerable populations, legislation etc. The Implementation Committee recommendations were presented to the Minister of Public Security in October 2016. The recommendations include both aspects of strengthening the current protection and prevention systems, and developing new ones.

74. Israel is currently examining the ratification of the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence (the Istanbul Convention), a process that entails an in-depth examination of all aspects relating to combatting gender-based violence.

75. The Joint Review Team (established in 2003) continues to conduct periodic meetings to examine cases of femicide in order to prevent their recurrence. The team includes participants from the Police, the Ministry of Labor, Social Affairs and Social Services (MoLSAaSS), and the State Attorney's Office.

76. For additional information on measures used to counter domestic violence, see Annex II.

Enhanced Efforts within the Police

77. The policy of treatment of violence against women in general and domestic violence in particular is enforced by the Israel Police in a uniform, equal manner, regardless of religion, race or gender.

78. The Police have a unique apparatus of investigators and investigating officers to handle domestic violence and sexual offences. Designated training courses on domestic violence and sexual offences are conducted regularly for all investigators and patrol officers, including gender-sensitive courses. These trainings include, inter alia, lectures on the relevant legislation and legal aspects, culture-sensitive investigation, visits to assistance-centers and shelters for battered women, victim interview workshop, scene drill, and lectures about sexual harassment, treatment of victims and about domestic and spousal violence. General investigators who are not part of the apparatus also undergo, as part of their basic training, a course that includes detailed review of the guidelines for handling domestic violence offenses. Patrol-police personnel also study the principles of primary treatment of domestic violence offenses according to the relevant protocol.

79. In order to enhance reporting, the Police emphasize the need for better cooperation with a variety of actors relevant to the fight against domestic and sex offences. In this regard, see "Police-Social Worker Model" above. In addition, in order to raise awareness and enhance reporting, an ongoing discourse and collaboration was formed between the Police and leaders of minority groups; mainly concerning improving accessibility and encouraging women to approach the Police and file complaints.

80. For additional information on Police efforts to combat domestic and sexual violence, including: internal supervision, awareness raising, promotion of legislation, the use of electronic monitoring and investment of resources, see Annex II.

81. For additional information on investigation, indictments, sentences, compensation and availability of shelters for Victims of Domestic Violence, see Annex I attached to

Courts Authorized to Impose a Death Penalty

86. The authority to impose death penalty pursuant to the Nazis and Nazi Collaborators (Punishment) Law, 5710-1950 and the Penal Law 5737-1977, is granted to a District Court. According to the Courts (Offenses punishable by a Death Penalty) Law 5721-1961, such cases must be heard before a panel of three (3) judges, and the presiding judge must be a Justice of the Supreme Court of Israel.

87. In every case in which a death penalty may be imposed, the Criminal Procedure Law [Consolidated Version] 5742-1982, requires an automatic appeal to the Supreme Court, even if the defendant has not appealed the sentence or conviction. As with any other convicted person, a person sentenced to death has the right to petition the President of the State for pardon, clemency, or commutation of sentence.

88. A Specialized Military Court has jurisdiction over offenses for which there is a death penalty pursuant to the Military Justice Law 5715-1955.

89. In the West Bank a Military Court with a specific panel (as shall be detailed below), has jurisdiction over offenses for which there is a death penalty pursuant to the Security Provisions Order [Consolidated Version] (Judea and Samaria) (No. 1651) 5770-2009 and the Defense (State of Emergency) Regulations, 1945. According to Section 165 of the Order, such cases must be heard before a panel of three (3) judges, all of whom must be ranked Lieutenant Colonel or higher, and their decision must be unanimous. The Order also stipulates an automatic appeal to a Military Court of Appeals, which shall be held before a panel of five (5) judges, and additional procedural guarantees.

Imposition of Death Penalty within the Reporting Period

90. No death penalties were imposed or executed during the reporting period. Although several provisions in Israel's criminal legislation allow for the imposition of the death penalty, the death penalty has been carried out only twice since the establishment of the State. The first time was after a field trial on June 30, 1948, in the case of Meir Tobiansky, an IDF officer who was accused of treason. Tobiansky was later cleared of all the charges against him. The second time was in the case of Adolph Eichmann, a senior Nazi assault unit commander, who was one of the major organizers of the Holocaust. Eichmann was in charged of facilitating and managing the logistics involved in the mass deportation of Jews to ghettos and extermination camps during WWII.

91. The provisions enabling the death penalty refer to: (1) crimes against the Jewish people or crimes against humanity committed during the period of the Nazi regime, and for war crimes committed during the Second WW; (2) Genocide, conspiracy, incitement or attempt to commit genocide, or of acting as an accomplice to genocide; (3) maximum punishment for offenses constituting treason during armed hostilities; (4) offenses involving illegal use of firearms against persons, or use of explosives or inflammable objects with intent to kill or to cause grievous bodily harm (not applied or requested in practice).

92. The imposition of the death penalty on any person who was a minor at the time the offense was committed is prohibited.

93. On January 3, 2018, The Knesset approved by preliminary reading an amendment to the Penal Law 5737-1977 (Amendment – A Death Sentence for a Person Convicted for Murder in Circumstances of Terrorism). This bill dealt with the sentencing of a death penalty for a murder offence, in case it is also considered as an act of terrorism according to the Counter-Terrorism Law. The bill also dealt with procedural amendments, according to which, a Military Court will be authorized to inflict the death penalty by a majority decision rather than a unanimous decision, and such a final verdict could not be mitigated. At that stage, the Knesset's Constitution, Law and Justice Committee focused on the cancelation of the requirement of a unanimous decision by a Military Court when sentencing a death penalty. In December 2017, the AG noted his objection to this bill stating that it does not co-inside with Israel's statements in international forums, and that although there are several provisions in Israeli law that allow inflicting a death penalty, these were legislated prior the legislation of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty, and the Current bill does not meet the requirements of this Basic Law's limitation clause. Note that during the discussions held in the Knesset regarding this bill, General Recommendation No. 36 regarding Article 6 of the ICCPR (CCPR/C/GC/36) was addressed by the AG, in order to highlight and explain several difficulties in the bill's version. This bill has not been considered further.

The Counter-Terrorism Law

94. On June 15, 2016, as part of Israel's ongoing battle against terrorism, the Knesset enacted the Counter Terrorism Law 5776-2016. This detailed and carefully designed law is part of an effort to provide law enforcement authorities with more effective tools to combat modern terrorist threats while incorporating additional checks and balances necessary to safeguard against inappropriate violations of individual human rights. The Law provides, inter alia, updated definitions of "terrorist organization", "terrorist act" and "membership in a terrorist organization", detailed regulations for the process of designating terrorist organizations, and enhanced enforcement tools, both criminal and financial. The Law nullified previous legislation in the field of counter-terrorism such as the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance 5708-1948, that was linked to a state of emergency. Additional legislation is currently being reviewed and amended in order to disconnect it from a state of emergency. This law does not create discrimination on the grounds of gender, race, color, decent or national or ethnic origin and does not subject individuals to racial or ethnic profiling or stereotyping. For statistical data on indictments according to this law, see Annex I.

95. On March 7, 2018, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 3 to the Law in which, among other things, it vested a Police District Commander with the authority to issue an order authorizing to delay the transfer of a terrorist's body to his/her relatives for up to ten (10) days for one (1) of the following three (3) grounds: a reasonable threat that the funeral will cause serious harm to life; a reasonable threat of the commission of a terrorist act; or a reasonable threat of incitement to terrorism or identification with a terrorist organization or a terrorist act during the funeral. Such an order may be extended from time to time, as necessary, by the Police General Commissioner until the implementation of the terms set for the funeral (Section 70B). Prior to this Amendment, the Police relied on Sections 3 and 4A to the Police Ordinance to delay the provision of a terrorist's remains to his/her relatives for the purpose of protecting public order. However, in the Jabarin case the HCJ ruled that these sections do not constitute sufficient legal basis for such delay and explicit legal authorization is required for such action (H.C.J. 5887/17 Ahmad Moussa Jabarin et. al. v. The Israeli Police et. al. (25.7.17)). In addition, this Amendment also vested the Police with the authority to set terms in regard to a funeral of a person who committed or attempted to commit a terrorist act and subsequently died ("a Terrorist"). According to this Amendment a Police District Commander is authorized to issue an order setting certain conditions in regard to a funeral of a terrorist, for the purpose of protecting the safety and the security of the public, including the prevention of riots, incitement to terrorism or identification with a terrorist organization or a terrorist act. Such conditions may refer to the number and identity of the funeral participants, the funeral time and date, its route and in certain cases the place of burial, while considering the family's position on this issue. A Police District Commander may also order to deposit a guarantee in order to ensure the implementation of these conditions (Section 70A).

97. In February 2013,⁴ the Turkel Commission concluded that Israel's mechanisms for examining and investigating complaints and claims of violations of the rules of the Laws of Armed Conflict ("LoAC") generally complied with its obligations under international law. The Commission nevertheless made several recommendations for further improving the Israeli system, among them the adoption of domestic legislation, a number of structural changes and the anchoring of existing policies in written directives and procedures.⁵

98. Since the issuance of the Turkel Report, the Government has steadily worked to implement the various recommendations. Notably, in January 2014, a professional inter-agency team of experts ("the Implementation Team"), headed by Dr. Joseph Ciechanover was appointed. The Implementation Team thoroughly reviewed the Commission's recommendations and considered the most effective measures for their implementation. The Implementation Team submitted its report to the Prime Minister in September 2015.⁶ The Israeli Cabinet approved the Implementation Team's Report in July 2016 and instructed the Ministry of Finance (MoF) to address the allocation of the necessary funds. The MoF has allocated the required funds to the relevant agencies and the implementation of these recommendations continues. There is also an inter-agency team, which continues to regularly monitor the completion of this process and reports to the Prime Minister every six (6) months.

99. Below are a few examples of recommendations of the Turkel Commission that have been implemented:

- In accordance with recommendation No. 12, a unit was established in the Department of International Law in the MoJ, which is actively involved in giving legal advice on matters pertaining to the LoAC, thus strengthening the capacity of the AG to exercise his/her supervisory powers over the Military Advocate General (MAG).
- In April 2015, and in accordance with recommendations No. 7 and 13, two (2) new AG guidelines were published,⁷ which deal with the relationship between the MAG and the AG and reinforce the avenue of review by the AG of decisions made by the MAG, thereby strengthening civilian oversight of the military justice system. According to the guidelines, the AG reviews appeals on the MAG's decisions regarding investigations and prosecutions of alleged serious violations of international law. The AG may also exercise his review function if he/she considers that it is required due to special public interests or implications. Since the publishing of these guidelines, this avenue of review has been utilized on several occasions.

- In accordance with recommendation No. 5, in July 2014, the IDF Chief of General Staff ordered the establishment of a General Staff Mechanism for Fact-Finding Assessments (FFAM), which would examine exceptional incidents. It is headed by a Major General and relies on high-ranking officers with relevant operational expertise in a variety of fields, who are outside the chain of command for the operational activity being examined. Thus far, it has reviewed hundreds of incidents. The FFAM has broad-ranging powers to obtain information both from within and outside the IDF. Once an FFAM examination is complete, the MAG decides whether the findings and collected materials meet the requirements for opening a criminal investigation. In order to make this decision, the MAG may request supplementary examinations and materials from the FFAM.
- In accordance with recommendation No. 9, in early 2017 a special unit specializing in operational affairs was established within the Military Police Criminal Investigation Division, which consists of experienced officers and investigators who undergo in-depth training with respect to the LoAC as well as operational affairs. This unit has thus far investigated dozens of cases.
- In recommendation No. 15 the Turkel Commission recommended strengthening the thoroughness and effectiveness of the investigations of the Inspector by requiring video recording of interrogations conducted by ISA, to be made according to rules that would be prescribed by the AG in coordination with the Head of the ISA. The Implementation Team recommended that cameras installed in all ISA interrogation rooms will broadcast regularly via closed circuit to a control room located in an ISA facility where interrogations are not conducted. The control room will be accessible and available to an external supervising entity on behalf of the MoJ at any time. The interrogators will have no indication of when the MoJ supervisor is watching them in the control room. The supervising entity must report immediately to the Inspector if he/she believes that illegal means have been used during the interrogation. The Israeli Security Cabinet adopted the recommendations of the Implementation team and after the completion of the necessary technical arrangements and recruitment of suitable supervisors by the MoJ, along with the completion of a work protocol, the supervisors began their work in January 2018. During 2018, hundreds of control and supervision hours were conducted by the supervisors.

100. In regards to non-application of Human Rights Conventions in the West Bank, see Question 2(B) above.

Prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, liberty and security of person and treatment of persons deprived of their liberty

Reply to paragraph 14 of the list of issues

A. Prohibition of Torture in Legislation

101. Inter-Agency staff work on the Draft bill is still ongoing, thus, it is impossible at this stage to provide definitive information with respect to the specific definition of the offense that will be included in the draft bill or with respect to the time frame for the completion of the drafting process.

B. The “Necessity” Defense

102. The “necessity defense”, as stipulated in Section 34(11) of the Penal Law, is one of the defense claims afforded to a defendant in the criminal proceedings in Israel and remains in Israeli legislation. In H.C.J 5100/94 The Public Committee against Torture et. al. v. The State of Israel et. al. (6.9.99), the HCJ held that this defense could apply to a defendant accused of using unnecessary or excessive physical pressure.

103. The use of the so-called “necessity defense” with regard to ISA interrogations, is exceptional and represents a minute percentage of all ISA interrogations of persons that were suspects of terrorist activity.

104. According to the Israel Security Agency Law 5762-2002, the ISA internal rules and procedures as well as methods of interrogations are confidential.

105. A petition for disclosure of similar details was submitted to the Jerusalem District Court, in pursuance to the Freedom of Information Law 5758-1998, and rejected by the Court (Ad.P 8844/08 The Public Committee against Torture v. the Supervisor of the Freedom of Information Law within the Ministry of Justice (15.2.09)).

C. Steps to Refrain from Inflicting “Moderate Physical Pressure” in “Necessity” Cases

106. According to the Israel Security Agency Law 5762-2002, the ISA internal rules and procedures as well as methods of interrogations are confidential.

107. The ISA and its employees act within the limits of the law and are subject to both internal and external supervision and review, including by the State Comptroller, the Inspector at the MoJ, the AG, the State Attorney’s Office, the Knesset and every instance of the courts, including the HCJ.

108. The ISA operates in accordance with the ruling of the HCJ, and specifically the ruling concerning ISA interrogations from 1999 (H.C.J. 5100/94 The Public Committee against Torture v. The State of Israel). Accordingly, the ISA interrogators have no authority to use any exceptional measures against interrogatees in the course of an investigation.

109. The detainees undergoing ISA interrogation receive all the rights to which they are entitled according to Israeli law and international conventions to which Israel is a party, including the rights to legal representation, medical care and visits by the International Committee of the Red Cross.

110. Furthermore, any case of alleged wrongdoing by an ISA investigator can be referred to the Inspector.

111. Investigations of Alleged Cases of Torture – complaints submitted to the Inspector are examined independently and impartially. The Inspector conducts a thorough preliminary examination of such complaints. The preliminary inquiry process includes reviewing all the relevant documents, and interviewing the complainant and his/her interrogators, as needed. The Inspector’s unit concludes its inquiry with a recommendation on the measures that should be taken, such as: criminal investigation, prosecution, disciplinary action, drawing conclusions for the organization or recording the complaint.

112. Following such an examination, the Inspector’s findings are transferred to the Inspector’s supervisor, a senior advocate in the State Attorney’s Office, who examines if there is sufficient evidence to recommend opening an investigation. The decision whether to open such an investigation was delegated to the Deputy State Attorney (Special Affairs). A criminal investigation is opened upon a reasonable suspicion that an offence was committed, based on the existing evidence that were gathered by the Inspector.

113. The Inspector’s preliminary inquiry process has been reviewed and approved by the HCJ (H.C.J. 11/1265 The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel vs. The Attorney General (14.2.2011)) and its extensive and comprehensive work has been recognized in its ruling (H.C.J. 5722/12 As’ad Abu-Gosh vs. The Attorney General (12.12.2017), H.C.J. 9018/17 Fares Tbeish et. Al. v. the Attorney General et. al. (26.11.18)).

114. For statistical data, see Annex I.

115. To date, the complaints did not amount to prosecutions.

116. For information on positive updates concerning the Inspector and the ISA, see Annex II.

D. Audio and Visual Recording of Interrogations

ISA Interrogations

117. For information on the implementation of recommendation No. 15 of the Turkel Commission regarding ISA interrogations, see Question 12 above.

Police Investigations

118. The Criminal Procedure (Investigation of Suspects) Law 5762–2002 (Sections 7 and 11), requires that the Police carry out audio or visual recording of criminal suspect questioning, where the crime carries a penalty of imprisonment of ten (10) or more years.

119. On December 12, 2016, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 8 to the Criminal Procedure (Interrogation of Suspects) Law, which stipulates that this documentation obligation does not apply to police investigation of a suspect relating to a security offense. However, according to this Amendment, the questioning of a suspect in relation to a security offence is subject to random inspections and supervision according to police procedures, to be approved by the Minister of Public Security and the AG. The Amendment provides that the supervising authority, high-ranking Police personnel, will be allowed to conduct such inspections about every ongoing interrogation, at any time, without any advance notice and without the interrogators being aware of such inspections. According to this Amendment, the Knesset's Constitution, Law and Justice Committee is to receive annual reports on the implementation of this Amendment. In December 2017, all Special Investigations Branch officers received the "Protocol for Supervision and Control over Police Interrogation of Suspects in Security Offenses", which include the relevant instructions for such supervision and control and methods of reporting. The relevant procedures have been approved and the supervisors had begun operating in January 2018. For information on supervision during ISA security interrogations, see Question 12, above.

120. Several NGOs filed a petition to the HCJ against the constitutionality of this temporary provision. On January 15, 2017, the Court ruled that the petition was not ripe for adjudication, noting that the required implementing procedures were yet to be formulated. The Court stressed that these procedures must be strict, both concerning the number of inspectors and the working procedures. The Court therefore dismissed the petition without prejudice. (H.C.J. 5014/15 Adalah v. The Minister of Public Security (15.1.17)).

A. Measures Taken to Eradicate Torture and Ill-treatment and the Establishment of an Independent Monitoring Mechanisms

122. See Question 14B and 14C.

Independent Monitoring of Detention Conditions

123. Every prisoner or detainee under the care of the Israel Prisons Service (IPS) has access to complaint mechanisms concerning grievances regarding the staff and wardens', including claims of wrongful use of force:

- Filing a complaint to the Prison Director;
- A prisoner's petition to a District Court;
- Filing a complaint to the Warden's Investigation Unit (WIU), through the IPS or directly to the Unit;

- Filing complaint to the Prisoners Complaint Ombudsman.

124. The Prisons Ordinance establishes rules for Official Visitors in prisons and further grants official visitor's authorities to Supreme Court judges, the AG, and to District and Magistrate Courts judges in prisons in their jurisdiction. For further information on official visitors, see Annex II.

125. Additional monitoring regarding protected persons is conducted by visits of the ICRC personnel.

126. For relevant case law, see Annex II.

B. Arrest conditions of Palestinians, including Children

IPS Detention Facilities – Adults

127. The conditions granted to security prisoners are determined by the IPS Order No. 03.02.00.

128. Due to ongoing security risks security prisoners pose, specific limitations are applied to their vacations, visits and conjugal visit rights. The need to impose such limitations was recognized, scrutinized and affirmed by the Supreme Court in several cases (for example: Pr.P.A 1076/95 State of Israel v. Samir Kuntar (13.11.96)).

129. Alongside these limitations, the security prisoners are offered a variety of services and benefits that enable their detention in appropriate and adequate conditions, whilst respecting their distinctive needs.

130. Breaches of order and discipline in detention facilities necessitate the use of disciplinary and administrative measures, which are carried out in accordance with IPS procedures.

131. Medical Care – Every IPS detention facility employs a general physician, a dentist, a necrology specialist, a psychiatrist and a professional medic who provide regular services. Examinations by expert doctors are available in the IPS medical center, prison infirmary and hospital clinics. Inmates are also allowed to consult with private doctors at their own expense. A medical examination is conducted daily and an inmate can be examined by a physician upon request. Where a need arises for specialist or if there is a need for hospitalization, proper arrangements are made with the relevant hospital and the MoH. In addition, the IPS operates a detention facility intended for prisoners with physical and mental problems, which cares for prisoners with chronic illnesses. Gynecological examinations are held when necessary and upon the request of female prisoners.

132. Generally, family visits are allowed for security-related inmates and are held according to IPS procedures. On June 4th 2019, the HCJ denied a petition and affirmed the Minister of Public Security's decision which denied family visits for Hamas affiliated security prisoners from the Gaza strip. This step is aimed to pressure the terrorist organization with the aim of advancing the return of Israeli citizens and the remains of Israeli soldiers held in captivity. This was approved by the Court, subject to periodic review and as the ongoing provision of other channels of communication with their families. (H.C.J 6314/17 Fadi Sammy Namnam et. al. v. The Government of Israel et. al. (4.6.19)).

133. Access to Legal Counsel – Prisoners are entitled to meet with their lawyers and receive consultations; these meetings are held with or without a divider, according to the circumstances. The exchange of legal material between the lawyer and the prisoner is subject to attorney-client privilege and the legal material is forwarded directly to the inmate.

Palestinian Minors in Military Juvenile Justice System

134. According to the law, minors are held in separate wings from adults.

135. In 2008, joint staff work was held by a special task force composed of senior officials from the MoJ, the MAG Office, the Military Courts, the Israel Police, the Ministry of Public Security and the ISA. As a result of this work, a number of significant amendments have been introduced over the years to the Order, including: raising the age of majority to 18, special statute of limitation, shortening the detention periods and more.

136. Note that ISA's interrogations of minors are conducted by trained minors' interrogators, in accordance with special internal procedures and subject to approval of the senior ranks in the ISA. These procedures provide special protection to the minors, their legal rights, as well as their physical and mental state. The ISA meticulously observes the times of interrogation and hours of sleep provided to the minors.

137. For information on the specific detention periods, see Annex II.

C. Solitary Confinement

138. Solitary confinement – As will be detailed, there is no incommunicado detention in Israel. In Israel, solitary confinement is a punitive measure, and as such, it is imposed only in restricted circumstances, for short and limited periods, and must follow a disciplinary hearing. The manner and the extent of use of solitary confinement fully comply with international law standards.

139. Solitary confinement is used only in a limited and closed list of 41 disciplinary offences set in Section 56 of the Prisons Ordinance 5732-1971; thus, the Israeli practice adheres to the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Mandela Rules).

140. Solitary confinement is extremely restricted and is used for short and limited periods, with a maximum of 14 days only. Where solitary confinement is prescribed for periods of over seven (7) days, there is a requirement to allow a seven (7) days break, following the first seven (7) days of confinement – which means that a prisoner will not spend more than seven (7) consecutive days in solitary confinement. In addition, a period of more than seven (7) days in solitary confinement can be imposed only by the Prison Director or his/her deputy, and must follow a disciplinary hearing. Prior to the disciplinary hearing, the prisoner receives a 48-hour notice, during which he/she can prepare his/her arguments and summon witnesses, if he/she wishes, to make his/her case.

141. During the course of the solitary confinement, contact is maintained with the officials in the ward – prison guards and social workers as well as with physicians/paramedics per request, and attorneys, except for exceptional circumstances. These rules apply equally to criminal as well as security prisoners.

142. Separation is not a punitive measure but rather a preventive procedure regulated by the Prisons Ordinance (New Version) 5732-1971 and by IPS Order No. 04.03.00, which is intended to prevent a prisoner, including prisoners with mental disabilities, from harming her/himself or harming other prisoners or the prison's staff. Separation may also be used due to state or prison security. A prisoner held in separation may be held alone or together with another prisoner ("separation in a pair"), according to the reasons for separation as well as the prisoner's characteristics. The conditions provided in separation are similar to the conditions provided to all other prisoners, these include: medical care, meetings with an attorney, an hour in the prison yard, social worker and visits. The living conditions in the separation ward include a television, video game consoles, telephone, books and newspapers. This preventive measure of separation is subject to re-examination procedures, judicial review and appeal. The authority to hold a prisoner in separation is constantly monitored and requires timely reevaluation in order to minimize to separation time.

Solitary Confinement with regard to ISA interogatees

143. Solitary Confinement is not used as an interrogation method nor as a punitive measure by the ISA. However, naturally, during interrogations there might be a need to separate between several detainees for the purpose of the investigation.

144. The detainees have continuous and frequent contact with the IPS personnel, as well as the medical personnel. They also meet with representatives of the ICRC and are brought before a judge to extend their arrest, where they are represented by their attorneys, all in accordance with the law.

145. Meeting with a lawyer during this period of time may be suspended for up to 21 days regarding interrogatees held in accordance with Section 35 of the Criminal Procedure Law (Enforcement Powers – Arrests), due to the risk of potential harm of the suspect to national security. Postponing the meeting with a lawyer for more than 10 days and up to the maximum period of 21 days requires court approval.

146. When ISA interrogatee is under investigation, his/her family or their lawyer are informed on their location and on their arrest.

Solitary Confinement and Separation of Minors

147. As mentioned above, holding a minor in solitary confinement is done only as a last resort. In addition to all the protection measures detailed above, a minor will see a social worker every day that he/she spends in the solitary confinement.

148. When considering holding a minor in separation, such decision is reviewed prior to the beginning of the separation itself. The use of such separation is only permitted when based on professional consideration.

Procedural Protections of Minors' Rights during Arrest and Detention

149. All aspects of the criminal process, including arrest, interrogation and detention, are conducted according to specific, clear, well-elaborated procedures, and are frequently subject to judicial review. These procedures are available to the public, either online or upon request by interested parties.

150. While in some incidents there might be rare and specific breaches of those procedures, these cases are investigated thoroughly and treated severely, and in no way are these indicative of a general practice.

151. In the event that a procedural violation occurs during any stage of the proceedings, the minor, through his/her parents or attorney (minors are represented by an attorney at all proceedings in the Military Juvenile Courts, including remand hearings), may lodge a formal complaint to the proper authorities. This entails the Investigative Military Police (IMP), the MoJ's Department for Investigation of Police Officers (DIPO), the Inspector for Complaints against ISA Interrogators and the Warden's Investigation Unit (WIU)) and may raise his/her arguments before the military judge during the hearings.

D. Allegations of Torture and Ill-treatment

152. See Question 14C above.

Israeli Police – Treatment of Alleged Ill-Treatment

153. The DIPO is an independent department within the MoJ. This department is specifically designated to investigate complaints of involvement of police personnel in the commission of offences (defined as offences punishable by one (1) year imprisonment or more).

154. The DIPO views with the utmost severity instances of police officers' ill-treatment and disproportionate use of force. Serious efforts are being undertaken to eliminate any form of such abuse. Cases of alleged violence are investigated thoroughly and meticulously, using all means to exhaust the investigation and bring to justice those found to have used unnecessary violence or acted in an unreasonable manner.

155. The DIPO is responsible for most criminal investigations against police officers. Disciplinary proceedings are initiated by submitting a complaint to the Disciplinary Department of the Personnel Division at the Police Central Headquarters, or to any of its branches.

156. In 2017, the DIPO reached a decision in 641 cases against police officers who were interviewed under caution (every case included one (1) police officer or more); 38.8% of these cases ended in criminal indictments (136 cases) or disciplinary proceedings (113 cases). Also, 85% of the criminal procedures against police officers that were concluded in 2017, ended with conviction, 3% of the cases ended with acquittal and 12% of the cases ended with a different decision.

Refugees and asylum seekers

A. Access to Fair and Efficient Asylum Procedures, Protection against Refoulement and an Independent Appeal Mechanism

159. On October 10, 2019, the PIA notified that Sudanese citizens who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian Border will receive temporary residence permit pursuant to Section 2(a)(5) to the Entry into Israel Law for a period of one (1) one year at a time. Sudanese citizens holding a B/1 visa (temporary employment permit) will receive it for a period of one (1) year at a time. Persons from Darfur, the Blue Nile and the Nuba Mountains will receive temporary residence permit pursuant to Section 2(a)(5) to the law, and the previous notification in their passport will be deleted. Eritrean citizens who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian Border will receive temporary residence permit pursuant to Section 2(a)(5) to the Entry into Israel Law for a period of six (6) months each time and the previous notification in their passports will be deleted. Eritrean citizens holding a B/1 visa (temporary employment permit) will receive it for a period of six (6) months at a time. The updated permits will be issued at the time of renewal of the existing permits.

160. Also, the Population and Immigration Authority (PIA) has issued a specific procedure⁸ that regulates this issue (PIA Procedure No. 5.2.0012). The purpose of this procedure is to set the process of caring for asylum seekers in Israel and for those who have been recognized as refugees by the Minister of Interior. According to this procedure, handling of asylum applications is conducted pursuant to the Israeli law while observing Israel's obligations under the Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees of 1951 and 1967 respectively.

161. According to the procedure, the PIA must ensure that information sheets will be available at places of custody, at the PIA's offices and on its website. The information includes the manner of submitting an asylum application, the procedure for handling applications, obligations of the asylum seeker and the asylum seeker's rights to contact a legal representative of his/her choice and of the scope of representation to which he/she is entitled to in the process. According to the procedure, an asylum seeker will not be expelled from Israel, until completion of reviewing his/her asylum application, subject to the principle of non-refoulement.

162. The PIA has a designated unit that handles applications for asylum in Israel. The decisions of the PIA and of the Minister of Interior to deny an asylum application are subject to an appeal to the Detention Review Tribunal, and such appeals are filed frequently. Additional appeals may be filed to a District Court and with the Court's permission to the Supreme Court.

B. Legal Procedure to Relocate African Migrants

163. Israel had reached arrangements with two (2) third countries for the safe relocation of persons from Sudan and Eritrea who entered Israel illegally through the Egyptian border.

⁸ See: https://www.gov.il/en/service/apply_for_asylum_in_israel (as of 25.7.19).

The Government considered this plan a more appropriate way to deal with the situation, due to the unique circumstances that Israel is facing and the geo-political context in the Middle East. A certificate of confidentiality signed by the Prime Minister was issued in respect of the identity of these countries and the details of the arrangements. For information on the criteria for such relocation that were approved by the AG, see Annex II.

164. The relocation to third countries policy was approved by the Supreme Court in the Tzageta case (after certain amendments made). In this case, in ex parte proceedings the State disclosed to the Court the arrangements it had reached with the third country, as well as all the measures that were taken in order to review and supervise their implementation. The Supreme Court rejected the argument that the third country discussed was unsafe, and stated that “[...] the appellants did not prove that the discussed third country is unsafe, that any of the substantive criteria outlined by the AG does not exist in that third country and that the persons being relocated face a threat there”. Note that the ruling dealt with only one of the two third countries (Ad.P.Ap. 8101/15 Tzageta et. al. v. The Minister of Interior et. al. (28.7.17)).

165. Ultimately, for various reasons, the arrangements were not fully implemented. Anyone who wishes to leave Israel voluntarily to these countries can still do so with State assistance according to these arrangements. Based on routine examinations conducted by PIA, there have been no known cases of violations of the principle of non-refoulement.

C. The Detention of Asylum Seekers

Legislation update

166. In recent years a legal and constitutional debate took place between the State and the Supreme Court concerning this issue. On November 19, 2017, the Government approved a Resolution to close the Holot open facility within four (4) months and on March 2018, the facility was closed.

167. Up until several years, tens of thousands of people have entered Israel illegally, not through a border station. Initially, these people had been placed in custody under the Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952, for a relatively short period of time, given the limitations on the length of custody as set by this law. In light of the ever-growing dimensions of this phenomenon and its implications for the State of Israel and Israeli society, the Government raised the need to provide tools and additional means to deal with this phenomenon. Thus, the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Jurisdiction) Law 5714-1954 was amended several times. However, several provisions of these Amendments were annulled the HCJ (H.C.J. 7146/12 Naget Serg Adam et. al. v. The Knesset et. al. (16.9.13)), (H.C.J. 8425/13 Gabrilasy et. al. v. The Knesset et. al. (22.9.14)).

168. On December 17, 2014, Amendment No. 5 to the Law entered into force. This Amendment included three (3) key changes: (a) it stipulated that a person who enters Israel illegally may be held in detention for a period of up to three (3) months. This Section applies only to persons who entered Israel illegally after its enactment. (b) It also stipulated that the following persons would not be sent to Holot open facility: women, minors, persons above the age of 60, a parent who is responsible for a minor, a victim of a trafficking in person offence according to the Penal Law, and people who the Border Control Commissioner is convinced that their placement in the “Holot” facility may damage their health due to their age, state of health including mental health, and there is no way to prevent such damage. (c) The Amendment also instructed that the maximum period a person can be placed in “Holot” facility was 20 months. (c) According to the Amendment,

169. On August 11, 2015, the HCJ rejected most of the petition filed against this amendment and ruled that the new amendment is constitutional except for the provision that enabled illegal migrants to stay in “Holot” open facility, for up to twenty (20) months. The Court found this period was non-proportionate and gave the Knesset a six (6) month period to enact a new amendment to the Law. In the interim, the Court set a twelve (12) month period as the maximum. (H.C.J. 8665/14 Dasseta v. the Knesset (2.2.2015)).

170. Following this HCJ decision, in February 2016, The Knesset approved Amendment No. 6 to the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Jurisdiction) Law which sets the maximum period a person can be held in “Holot” facility at 12 months. However as noted above the Holot open facility was later closed by the GOI.

Saharonim Facility

171. The “Saharonim” Detention Facility is located in the Negev, the southern part of Israel. The purpose of the facility is to detain persons who entered Israel illegally initially, immediately following their illegal entry into Israel, mainly from the Sinai Peninsula.

172. According to the Prevention of Infiltration (Offences and Jurisdiction) Law 5714-1954, persons who entered Israel illegally were held at “Saharonim” from the time of their entry into Israel for a maximum of three (3) months. The purpose of this initial period at “Saharonim” was to process these people, determine their identity and nationality, and explore alternatives for their relocation from Israel. Note that as of 2019, no new illegal entries from the Sinai Peninsula were recorded and therefore there are no new arrivals to the detention facility for this reason, but several dozens are still detained in the facility, mostly illegal migrants who violated the terms of their stay in Israel.

173. To date, as part of the Government policy, women and minors are not held at “Saharonim”.

174. The facility is managed by the Israel Prison Service (“IPS”), and the conditions of the facility meet the relevant national and international standards and regulations of detention facilities.

Examination of asylum requests procedure

175. The rule set by the Entry into Israel Law, is that “a person who is not an Israeli citizen or an immigrant pursuant to the Law of Return 5710-1950, and is staying in Israel without a stay permit, shall be expelled from Israel as early as possible unless he/she voluntarily leaves before that”. An exception to this rule stems from the State of Israel’s commitment pursuant to the 1951 Refugees Convention. The principle of non-refoulement enshrined in Article 33 of the Refugee Convention constitutes a fundamental principle of international law and was enshrined into Israeli case law, two (2) decades ago through the HCJ ruling of H.C.J. 4702/94 Al-Tai v. The Minister of Interior (11.9.95). In the Al-Tai case, the former President of the Supreme Court, Justice Aharon Barak, determined that the principle of non-refoulement, according to which a person cannot be deported to a place where her/his life or liberty will be endangered, is not limited only to refugees. Justice Barak held that the principle of non-refoulement is applicable to any government authority decision dealing with the deportation of a person from Israel.

176. A custody order shall not be issued pursuant to the Entry into Israel Law against a person who is staying in Israel illegally before allowing him/her the opportunity to voice his/her claims, and the foreign national is provided with information on his/her legal rights, and he/she has the option to be represented in the hearing. According to the abovementioned PIA Procedure, the interview is conducted in the official language of the foreign national’s state or another language he/she understands and if required, with the help of a translator. Within this framework, the Border Control Commissioner considers all the circumstances relating to that person, including his/her age or health. Additionally, should an asylum request be raised, the person will be given the opportunity to submit such request from custody and, the applicant shall not be deported until conclusion of review of the application.

D. The “Holot” Facility and Legislation Initiatives

177. As of July 2019, the Government has not brought forward any plans to reopen the facility.

178. In 2018, a private bill titled “Bill to Amend Basic Law Human Dignity and Liberty (Amendment – Validity of an Exceptional Law Regarding Persons Who Entered Israel Illegally)” was filed by a Knesset member. According to this bill, a law concerning the prevention of illegal entrance into Israel, including instructions therein regarding the period of stay in Israel or concerning exiting Israel of persons who entered Israel illegally, will be valid even if it does not meet subsection 8 to the Basic Law: Dignity and Liberty.

179. As of December 2018, this bill was taken off the Knesset's legislation schedule. The AG strongly opposed this bill and in his opinion he noted, inter alia, that "[...] This stands in direct contradiction to the most basic principles of Israel's constitutional law, which are based on its definition as a Jewish and democratic state, and recognize the fundamental rights given to every human being. These basic principles guarantee protection of human rights from harm by the Government that is not for a worthy purpose and is not proportionate. This recognition is anchored in international treaties to which the State of Israel is party, and is a cornerstone of international law."

E. Health Services for Non-Residents

180. For information on medical services available to migrants and foreign workers, see Annex II.

181. Health Care for Foreign Workers – In 2016, an amendment was made to the Foreign Workers Order (Employee Health Benefits Package) 5761-2001, which regulates the health services to which legal foreign workers in the care-giving field are entitled. According to this Amendment, a foreign worker in the nursing-care field who is found unable to fulfill his/her work duties due to a medical condition and had made the necessary arrangements to return to his/her country of origin is entitled to compensation in the amount of 80,000 NIS (20,800 USD), if ten (10) years have passed since they received a permanent working permit in Israel. The compensation is given towards medical expenses in the country of origin, given that their medical insurance will no longer apply. This amendment entered into force in November 2017.

182. Training – For information on national interpretation call center and training courses operated and provided by the MoH, see Annex II.

B. Planning in Arab Localities

Outline Plans and Basic Planning for the Arab Population

185. As of June 2018, 132 of 133 Arab localities have approved outline plans. Of these 133 localities: 76 have approved updated outline plans (from 2005 and onward) and 18 have new outline plans undergoing statutory approval. In the next two (2) years, these approval procedures are to be completed. New outline plans are in preparation for additional 29 localities, including updating seven (7) of the above-mentioned approved plans. Note that these updated outline plans, comprise 96% of the Arab population in the said 133 localities.

186. Note that local authorities do not have the authority to approve outline plans and these are usually examined and approved by the relevant district authority. The National Planning Administration (NPA) has promoted 95 of the aforementioned outline plans for the Arab localities. Five (5) outline plans are currently promoted by the Authority for Development and Housing of the Bedouin Population in the Negev; The rest of the plans are promoted by the local authorities of the local councils.

187. The outline plans promoted by the NPA have added, on average, 70% to the localities' existing development lands, in addition to existing areas within the locality which are approved, but not yet developed. The vast majority of the outline plans allow for a larger population than the population prediction for the relevant planning period.

188. In 2015, an inter-ministerial team headed by the MoJ was established with the aim of examining barriers in the field of housing for the Arab population (the 120 days team). In July 2015, the team published its recommendations, which were later adopted in relevant GRs that inter alia, refer to this issue. In the course of its work, the team became aware of a number of barriers regarding housing, both in the general population and in the Arab population. In order to break these barriers, in recent years an additional joint team headed by the MoJ and the MoF was established to review these barriers and recommend on solutions. The joint team is yet to form its final recommendations.

Access to Plans Information

189. Every outline plan promoted by the NPA, regardless of the nature of the locality concerned, is done with cooperation and close consultation with the head of the said local authority. The planning process includes public participation meetings and various other means for public information about the plan and the planning process.

190. The plan documents, when ready to be submitted for statutory approval, are first submitted for approval of the local authority. As of 2018, an outline plan for an Arab locality includes explanatory notes in Arabic, describing the main subjects of the plan, its purpose and objectives.

191. The statutory approval process of every plan includes depositing the plan for 60 or 90 days for public reference and objections. The plan's deposition is advertised on an official website, consisting all the main plans and its documents, alongside visible publication on billboards within the locality concerned, at the local and regional Building and Planning Committees and in (at least) three (3) newspapers. In localities where 10% or more of the population is Arab, all the advertisements are posted in Arabic and Hebrew and advertised in Arabic in at least one (1) local Arab newspaper.

192. Implementation of the Outline Plans – This is carried out by detailed plans by each locality. Since many of the Arab localities encounter difficulties in promoting the required detailed plans, and due to the plans' significance towards obtaining building permits, the NPA has taken upon itself to initiate a pilot of detailed planning, designating a budget (54 Million NIS (14.6 Million USD)) and professional support for promoting 45 detailed plans in 13 Druze localities. A similar project for other Arab localities will follow.

193. Parallel to supporting detailed plans by the NPA, the importance of strengthening the ability of Arab localities to promote and implement detailed planning within their own locality also became evident. This was addressed in GR No. 922 (see below), determining measures for achieving this goal, including strengthening Arab Local councils and setting up new Arab Local Building and Planning committees, allotting a budget of 100 Million NIS (27 Million USD) for this task.

194. To this end, the possibility of establishing new local building and planning committees by splitting them from the regional committees in which these councils currently belong is being examined. This, while addressing the difficulties that arose in many aspects, including some challenges regarding the local authorities' refusal to regulate enforcement of building and planning regulations, and the need to provide a comprehensive solution for the rest of the local committees.

195. As part of this task, a budget of 29 Million NIS (7.83 Million USD) was approved for supporting the financing of strategic planners in 33 minority local authorities with more than 9,000 residents each, who are also members of regional building and planning committees. This, in order to strengthen planning capacities in these authorities.

196. For additional information (including on GR No. 4078 (29.7.18) and on the Committee for the Promotion of Priority Housing Areas, see Annex No. II.

197. As of September 2018, eleven (11) plans of priority housing areas were approved by the said Committee, totaling in over 14,500 housing units. Nine (9) additional plans are in various stages of approval (roughly 33,000 housing units). All these plans enable the acquirement of a building permit without needing any further planning process.

198. The position of the NPA is that lack of an updated outline plan should not delay approving a detailed plan that is compatible with the national planning policy. Thus, in the majority of the localities lacking approved updated outline plan, detailed plans were, and are, promoted continually in order to issue building permits.

Relevant Government Resolutions

199. For relevant GRs, see Annex II.

200. Druze and Circassian populations – The population of Druze and Circassians in Israel includes about 141,000 people in 22 localities. All these localities have approved updated outline plans, or are in the process of planning.

201. In accordance with Government Resolutions No. 2332 (December 14, 2014) and 959 (January 10, 2016), concerning the Development and Empowerment of the Druze and Circassian Localities for the Years 2016–2019, which include the preparation of detailed plans for localities of these populations, the National Planning Administration is promoting such detailed plans concerning private lands in 13 localities.

202. Affordable Housing – The Ministry of Construction and Housing (MoCH) has established a special website in Arabic containing the information presented in the Hebrew website and additional information designated for the Arab population. Such information covers the governmental program for affordable housing (“A Price for Residents”), the procedure for participating and upgrading participation in the program, financial benefits, the technical specifications of the available apartments, etc.

203. Furthermore, in 2015–2016, the MoCH widely published campaigns aimed at the Arab population through advertising “A Price for Residents” projects in Nazareth and Sakhnin. The MoCH continues to operate to promote linguistic accessibility for the Arab population.

Planning in the Eastern Neighborhoods of Jerusalem (ENoJ)

204. The new outline plan for the city of Jerusalem, which is currently under approval procedures, determines the planning policy in all of the city’s neighborhoods and jurisdictions areas. This plan incorporates two (2) mechanisms in order to expand the residential building percentage in the ENoJ.

205. The first mechanism is an expansion of the residential building percentage in all the approved residential areas in the ENoJ. Currently the approved residential building percentage in these neighborhoods is between 37% to 70%, of permitted building from the overall size of the plot, while the new outline plan increases this percentage up to 180% (by allowing multi-story building), which, under certain conditions, may even reach 240%. According to the new outline plan in the boundaries of the Old City, the additional building rights may only reach 160%. Since 2005, hundreds of plans that are compatible with the abovementioned outline plan have been promoted, considerably expanding the residential building rights in the ENoJ.

206. In addition, the new plan sets 14 new polygons titled “proposed urban residential areas”. The plans for some of these polygons are promoted by either the Jerusalem Municipality or the residents themselves. Hereinafter are several examples: a master plan for A-Swakra (2,500 residential units) and a detailed-plan for Dir Al-Amud and Al-Muntar (750 residential units) are promoted by the Municipality, a detailed-plan for Ein-Iluza (1,000 residential units) is promoted by the residents and an outline plan for Tel-Adessa

(2,500 residential units) is promoted by the residents. Note that every plan that is filed in accordance to the policy of the new Jerusalem outline plan receives the support of the planning institutions.

207. In the frame of every master plan promoted by the Jerusalem municipality, there is a structured procedure of public participation throughout all the planning stages.

208. The Jerusalem municipality, via the local committee for planning and construction, issues building permits in the ENoJ similar to any other area in the city. Following the submission of building permits applications, these applications are examined and if they correlate with the approved outline plans, a permit is issued. In 2019 (until mid July), 102 construction permits were given in the ENoJ out of 173 applications. In 2018, 184 construction permits were granted out of 331 applications and in 2017, 115 such permits were granted.

209. For relevant case law, see Annex II.

Educational Initiatives in the ENoJ

210. For information on GR No. 3790 (April 13, 2018) on the mitigation of social and economic gaps and the economic development of ENoJ, regarding education in the ENoJ, and information on the number of Classrooms under construction in the ENoJ, see Annex II.

Demolition of Illegal Structures

211. Illegal construction harms the local population, as it does not take into consideration planning policies and parameters that are required to ensure quality of life, the welfare of the population and public needs, and in many cases prevent the option of optimal development of the neighborhood (e.g. by building on future planned roads, public building plots etc.). Enforcement measures against illegal structures are taken in accordance with legal guarantees and following due process, subject to judicial review and the right to appeal.

C. The Bedouin Population

General

212. Bedouin population – There are more than 250,000 Bedouins living in the Negev desert area. About 76% of them live in urban and suburban centers which have been legally planned and constructed. The remaining 24% reside in hundreds of unauthorized and unregulated clusters mainly within the Al-Qasoum and Neve Midbar regional authorities. These clusters spread over roughly 500,000 dunams (500 Sq. Km), obstructing urban expansion in the greater Negev area and the common good of all Bedouin population.

Planning for the Bedouin population

213. There are 18 Bedouin localities with approved outline plans, including the city of Rahat, Lakiya, Hura, Kuseife, Tel-Sheva, Segev Shalom and Ar'ara. All of these plans include infrastructure such as schools, health clinics, running water, electricity, roads, pavements, etc. Additional 11 localities that are under the jurisdiction of the Neve Midbar and A-Kasum Regional Councils also have approved outline plans.

214. In addition, the planning procedures for six (6) additional localities are ongoing.

215. The strategic work of examining and setting rules for the planning of construction solutions for the Bedouin population in the Negev has been undertaken and completed. This process is conducted with the participation of the population in each region and with emphasis on land arrangement and a wide range of housing arrangements. For additional information, see Israel's 4th Periodic Report to the CESCR (p. 35).

216. Additional development plans are in process in several other Bedouin towns; Rahat, for example, will be approximately tripled in size (from 8,797 dunams (8.8 Sqr. KM) today to 22,767 dunams (22.8Sqr KM)). The project is estimated to cost approximately 500

Million NIS (135.13 Million USD). Other localities are also in the process of expansion, development of infrastructures and construction of industrial and employment areas.

217. The Government's current policy is to provide residence possibilities in the recognized localities. This is done either by encouraging relocation by offering financial and/or land incentives or by on-the spot regularization. Note that movement incentives are available to all residents of the Bedouin unauthorized who seek such movement, regardless of their economic situation and independently of any entitlement test. These benefits include, inter alia, provision of free of charge land plots or for a very low cost, and compensation for the demolition of unauthorized structures. On the spot regularization will enable a large majority of those currently residing in unrecognized areas to continue residing there in the future within regularized localities without the need to relocate anywhere else. Note that an unauthorized village with no acceptable planning prospects cannot be regulated.

218. For information on building plans for the Bedouin population (deposited and approved), see Annex I.

Demolition of Illegal Structures – Bedouin Population

219. Unauthorized building by some of the Bedouin population is carried out without any plans as required by the Planning and Building Law 5725-1965, and with no pre-approval by the planning authorities. It causes many difficulties in terms of providing services to the residents of these unauthorized villages.

220. Israel cannot overlook such disregard to the planning and zoning rules and is compelled to issue demolition warrants for these unauthorized structures. Initially, a warning is granted to the person who constructed the structure, so he/she may challenge the demolition through the judicial process. If the person fails to overturn the demolition warrant, he/she is required to demolish the unauthorized structure. Only in cases where the unauthorized structure is not demolished by the person who constructed it, the authorities will act to demolish it. Note that enforcement activities are conducted only against structures that were constructed after 2010 and are found in areas that do not belong to any local authority. All enforcement activities are conducted in accordance with the law.

221. Note that in regard to 2016, 2017 and 2018, the majority of the illegal structures (more than 90%) that were demolished by the State authorities were not used for residence, but were makeshift structures such as animal sheds, huts, shipping containers, fences, concrete floors, iron scaffolding, dirt piles etc. Only a very small percent of the demolished structures were inhabited, since the owners of these illegal structures that were built on State land without permits as required by Law, did not adhere to stop work orders that were issued during the building period.

222. For relevant statistics and case law, see Annex II.

The Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003

223. In May 2002, following a horrendous wave of terrorist attacks against Israeli population, the Government decided to temporarily suspend granting individuals legal status in Israel through the process of family reunification, regarding individuals who live in an enemy state or in an area from which terrorist activity is emanated against Israel. Subsequently, the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003 was enacted in July 2003, limiting the possibility of granting residents of the West Bank and Gaza Israeli citizenship or permanent residency pursuant to the Citizenship Law or the Entry into Israel Law, including by means of family reunification. This, due to the fact that dozens of Palestinians that received such Israeli status for the purpose of family reunification, had used it in order to engage in terrorist activities. The wave of terrorist attacks that began in October 2015 has shown that status given for the purpose of family reunification is still being misused for terrorist activity.

224. That said, the possibility of family reunification remains available in accordance with the law, the PIA procedures and lack of security preventions. The Law sets several easements regarding population with low security risk, to which, subject to all the relevant examinations, family stay permit may be granted (for example, a male spouse over the age of 35, who is a resident of the West Bank, or to a female spouse over the age of 25, who is a resident of the West Bank, with their minor children).

225. In addition, The Law enables entry to Israel for the purposes of medical treatment, employment, or other temporary grounds, for an overall period of up to six (6) months. In addition, the Law allows the granting of a temporary residence permit or a stay permit for humanitarian reasons or if he/she identifies with the State of Israel and its goals and he/she has significantly acted for the promotion of state's security, economy or another important matter of the state, or for another special state interest.

226. The Law's constitutionality has been scrutinized and upheld by the majority of the Supreme Court sitting twice in an extended panel of eleven (11) judges for the second time in January 2012. (H.C.J. 466/07, 544/07, 830/07, 5030/07 MK Zehava Galon et. al. v. The Minister of Interior et. al.).

227. The Law was extended several times and was valid until June 30, 2019. Due to the Knesset's dispersal, the law was extended automatically until December 17, 2019.

228. Nevertheless, following statements of the Supreme Court, the Minister of Interior has decided on a number of changes aimed at providing humanitarian relief for those to whom the Law applies. The Government gave notification that holders of temporary residency (A/5) visas will be able to extend the visa for a period of two (2) years, instead of one (1) year at a time.

229. In addition, the Government notified the Court that holders of temporary permits for stay in Israel granted by the Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories (COGAT), whose family reunification applications were filed before the end of 2003 (the year the Temporary Provision was enacted) and there is no security prevention, would be granted temporary residence. This status includes registration in the Population Registry, entitlement to social security benefits and national health insurance for them and their minor children who were born after January 1998. They will also receive an Israeli identity document. This upgrade will be made available to persons who comply with several standard criteria (namely, that their marriage is an authentic and sincere one, that they live in Israel and that there are no security or criminal impediments to the upgrade).

230. For relevant statistics, see Annex I. for relevant case law, see Annex II.

231. In regards to health care, the National Health Insurance Regulations (Registration to a Health Fund, Rights and Obligations of Persons Who Receive a Permit Pursuant to the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763-2003) 5776-2016, which entered into force on August 1, 2016, established a health insurance that includes similar health services (according to different provisions) to those set by the National Health Insurance Law relating to persons who hold temporary stay permits pursuant to Sections 3, 3A(2) or 3A1(a)(2) of the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law.

Freedom of expression, assembly and association

Reply to paragraph 24 of the list of issues

A. The Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952

232. As a general rule, a person who is not an Israeli national does not have a vested right, or any constitutional right, to enter the State. The principle of sovereignty dictates that entry and stay in a state and the control of its national borders is subject to the state's discretion.

233. On March 6, 2017, the Israeli Knesset amended the Entry into Israel Law 5712-1952 (Amendment No. 28). According to this amendment, a person who is not an Israeli citizen or a permanent resident will not be granted a visa or any residency permit, if she/he or the organization or body that she/he acts on its behalf, has knowingly published a public call to boycott Israel, as defined under the Prevention of Damage to State of Israel through Boycott Law 5771-2011, or if she/he has made a commitment to participate in such boycott. According to this amendment, the Minister of Interior has discretion to grant a visa or a residency permit despite this provision, under special grounds that will be noted.

234. In July 2017, The Population and Immigration Authority (PIA) published criteria that clarify the kind of organizations that this amendment refers to. The criteria clarifies that the Amendment refers to an organization that actively, consistently and continually supports and promotes a boycott of Israel; activist which hold high-ranking positions in such organizations; and prominent independent activists who take substantial, consistent and continuous action for the promotion of boycotts and similar activity against the State of Israel. An organization that is merely promoting a critical agenda against Israeli policy would not be banned from entering the State. As noted above, additional criteria were also set for exceptional cases of activists which although fall under the definition, their entry will be considered by the Minister of Interior. The Ministers' decisions under this law are subject to possible judicial review.

235. For additional relevant case law, including concerning Ms. Lara Alqasem and Mr. Omar Shakir, see Annex II.

236. Due to the lack of any constitutional right of non-nationals to enter Israel, claims raised that Amendment No. 28 breaches the constitutional rights of foreign nationals, including freedom of thought, opinion and speech, are unfounded.

237. For statistical data on the number of persons who were denied entry into Israel pursuant to this Amendment, see Annex I.

238. A petition regarding the constitutionality of the Amendment was filed to the HCJ. On February 28, 2018, after hearing comments made by the Court and after consulting with his attorney, the petitioners retracted their petition without prejudice. (H.C.J 3965/17 Prof. Alon Harel et. al. vs. The Knesset et. al (28.2.18)). For additional relevant case law, see Annex II.

B. Disclosure Requirements Concerning Beneficiaries of Donations by a Foreign Political Entity Law 5771–2011 (Hereinafter: “the Disclosure Requirement Law”)

239. In 2016, an Amendment to the Disclosure Requirement Law introduces quarterly and annual reporting requirements to the Registrar of Non-profit Organizations applicable to non-profit organizations and charitable companies that receive contributions from foreign states, federations of states, and state-affiliated entities (hereinafter: “foreign political entities”).

240. The quarterly report must include the identity of the contributor, the amount of the contribution, the purposes of the contribution, and the terms of the contribution. Quarterly reports submitted to the Registrar, as well as a list of beneficiaries that submitted such a report, are available on line. Failure to submit quarterly reports constitutes, in the case of a non-profit organization, a strict liability offense according to Section 64A of the Non-profit Organization Law 5740–1980, warranting a maximum fine of 29,200 NIS (7,900 USD), and in the case of a charitable company, an administrative offence warranting a fine of roughly 7,500 NIS (2,000 USD).

241. In addition to reporting requirements, the Law also requires the aforementioned organizations and companies to (a) publish the information included in their quarterly reports on their website, and, (b) when a foreign political entity provided funding designated specifically for a special public campaign, to publish the fact of the donation on the campaign.

242. According to the Amendment No. 1 to the law (detailed below), this reporting requirement applies only to donations that were made from 2017 onward. As of July 2019, 26 non-profit organizations filed reports on such foreign donations for 2017 and 20 organizations reported for 2018, respectively. As required by the law the details are published on the Registrar's website. Additional reports are expected to be filed during 2019.

243. Note that this legislation does not place any limits on the funding of NGOs, does not discriminate between NGOs and does not place any limit or restrictions on the activity of NGOs or their freedom of association.

Disclosure Requirements Concerning Beneficiaries of Donations by a Foreign Political Entity Law (Amendment-Increasing the Transparency of Donations from a Foreign Political Entity to Beneficiaries whose Primary Funding is from Contributions by a Foreign Political Entity) 5776-2016

244. This amendment aims to further enhance transparency with respect to those non-profit organizations and charitable companies whose primary source of funding is foreign political entity.

245. According to the amendment, non-profit organizations and charitable companies that receive the majority of their funding from foreign political entities within a given reporting year, are required to clearly indicate this fact in publications directed towards the public, including in publications appearing on billboards, television, newspaper, a website homepage, or internet campaigns. With respect to written reports prepared by the organization/company that are designated for a public audience, there is an additional requirement to provide a written notice to the reader that the names of the foreign political entity funders can be found on the Registrar's website.

246. The Amendment also introduces enhanced transparency requirements in such beneficiaries' interactions with public and elected officials. Letters or emails sent by such beneficiaries to public and elected officials on matters relating to the official's professional duties must mention the fact that the majority of their funding comes from foreign political entities. A representative of such a beneficiary wishing to participate actively in a Knesset Committee session must inform the chairperson of the committee that she/he is a representative of a beneficiary within the meaning of the amendment prior to the session, and if there was no opportunity to do so, then during its course. If, during the session, a representative is asked by a Member of Knesset (MK) whether she/he is a representative of a beneficiary within the meaning of the amendment, the representative is required to respond.

247. A violation of the aforementioned transparency requirements regarding publications and written correspondence with public and elected officials constitutes a strict liability offense in the case of non-profit organizations and an administrative offense in the case of public companies, warranting the aforementioned fines.

248. This amendment was approved by the Knesset plenary on July 12, 2016. Its application began on January 1, 2017.

249. The Law, whether in its previous or amended form, does not impose restrictions on the ability of civil society organizations to raise funds in support of their activities. Rather, it aims to enhance transparency with respect to non-profit organizations and charitable companies whose primary source of financing is from foreign political entities.

C. Human Rights Defenders and Aspects Regarding Freedom of Expression and Association in Israel

250. Israel has a very active civil society, with hundreds of NGOs active in a large number of issues, including human rights issues. Israel values such organizations that advance and promote human rights.

251. For information on Israel's constructive discourse with different NGOs, see Question no. 3, above.

252. The State of Israel, as a democratic society, places no legal restrictions on the right of organizations to engage in activities for the promotion and observance of human rights, which fully enjoy the freedom to associate and to pursue their various aims, according to the applicable law.

253. Accordingly, every person and every organization in Israel enjoy the freedom of assembly. The right of assembly was recognized in the Israeli legal system as a basic right, which either derives from or stands alongside the right to freedom of expression. The Supreme Court has recognized it as a fundamental right of the Israeli legal system and as a cornerstone of our democracy (H.C.J. 148/79 Sa'ar v. The Ministry of Interior and The Police).

254. To enable the full exercise of this right, AG Guideline 3.1200, further requires the allocation of police forces with the objective of protecting the demonstration and its participants from any form of external harassment.

255. Note that every complaint regarding harassment of human right defenders is examined thoroughly by the relevant authorities.

256. The Police does not discriminate between different populations and acts with equality according to the powers vested in it by law.

257. For relevant case law, see Annex II.

D. Inflammatory Comments made by Government Ministers

258. Indeed, there have been a few cases in which a number of politicians have made in the past inflammatory comments regarding certain persons or populations.

259. The freedom of political opinion and of expression of a political nature has been rigorously defended by Israeli courts as essential to the existence of democracy. The Supreme Court has consistently upheld the principle that freedom of expression entails the freedom not only to express popular opinions, but also those which the majority despises,⁹ as well as the freedom to criticize government action.¹⁰ The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that freedom of political expression is entitled to the highest degree of protection.¹¹

260. According to the Israeli law, a MK has substantive immunity against legal action in regard to any spoken or written expressions of opinion or in regard to any act carried out either within or outside the Knesset, if these actions were carried out in the course of fulfilling his/her duties, or in order to fulfill his/her duties as a MK. This Immunity is absolute and cannot be lifted.

261. Actions of a MK that are not in the course of fulfilling his/her duties, may be subject to criminal charges, with the authorization of the AG.

262. In regards to non-application of Human Rights Conventions in the West Bank, see Question 2(B) above.

Freedom of Expression

263. The right to freedom of expression has long been recognized as a supreme, constitutional norm in Israel, and any limitations on its exercise for reasons related to public interest, public order human rights or the rights and reputation of others must meet strict standards of scrutiny regarding their justification and scope. While Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty 1992, does not directly articulate the right to freedom of expression and opinion, the Supreme Court regards these rights as constitutional rights protected in this Basic Law.

264. Generally, freedom of expression may be restricted only if the speech in question gives rise to at least “near certainty” that the public peace, broadly construed, will be endangered, and only if other means to lessen the severity or the likelihood of such a violation of public peace are of no avail. (H.C.J. 73/53, Kol Ha'am Ltd. v. The Minister of Interior).

⁹ E.A. 2,3/84, Neiman v. Chair of the Central Elections Committee of the Eleventh Knesset.

¹⁰ H.C.J. 351/72, Kenan v. Council for Review of Films and Plays.

¹¹ See for example H.C. 6396/96, Zakin v. The Mayor of Be'er-Sheva.

265. Certain types of speech are expressly forbidden by Knesset legislation. For example, The Denial of the Holocaust Prohibition Law 5746-1986, prescribes a maximum punishment of five (5) years' imprisonment for publications which deny or minimize the extent of the crimes against the Jewish people and humanity committed during the Nazi regime in Germany, with the intent of defending perpetrators of such crimes or of praising or identifying with them. In addition, various provisions in the Penal Law prohibit seditious utterances, incitement to racism, insult of a public servant, and speech that is calculated to outrage the religious beliefs of others.

266. Note that according to Police' procedure No. 03.300.227, any decision on an investigation of a reporter concerning an offense related to his/her professional work and any search at the reporter's home require authorization of a Police officer in the national level and the State Attorney's Office and will be conducted according to a court order.

The Annulment of the Press Ordinance Law 5777-2017

267. This law annulled the Press Ordinance which was enacted in 1933 and greatly infringed upon the freedom of speech, an important milestone in the area of the freedom of expression.

268. The Press Ordinance was Mandatory legislation enacted in 1933, which set the requirement to receive a Government license in order to print and issue a newspaper. The Ordinance also established the Minister of Interior's authority to close a newspaper that published information which is likely to endanger the public peace. The Ordinance later became part of Israel's legal system.

269. Due to its restricting nature on the freedom of expression several petitions were filed against this Ordinance. Following a 2014 petition to the HCJ against this Ordinance by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, in June 2016, the abovementioned bill was issued, and later approved by the Knesset. (H.C.J. 6175/14, The Association for Civil Rights in Israel et. al. v. The Minister of Interior et. al. (26.6.17)).

A Bill concerning the prohibition on photographing and documenting of IDF soldiers

270. In 2018, several Knesset Members issued a Bill titled "A Bill to Amend the Penal Law (Amendment – Prohibition on Documentation of IDF Soldiers)" 5778-2018. This bill is aimed at adding a new offence to the Law, according to which, filming, photographing or recording IDF soldiers carrying out their duty, and publishing the content, including on social media and media networks, when the recordings are made with the intention of undermining the spirit of IDF soldiers and Israel residents, will be considered an offence punishable with up to five (5) years imprisonment. Moreover, if the person making the recording or the publishers are acting with the intent to harm state's security, the offence is punishable by up to ten (10) years imprisonment. During the legislation process before the Ministers Legislation Committee (The "Committee"), the AG voiced his objection to this version of the bill and noted a significant concern that this bill will fail to achieve its objectives while causing harm to individual rights and liberties. Specifically having a chilling effect on the freedom of expression, which receives strong constitutional protection in Israel, and possibly significantly harming the freedom of the press and the public's right for information. The AG noted that he is of the opinion that this bill is therefore unconstitutional and should not be advanced as it is. Instead, a proposal was made to amend Section 275 to the Penal Law, concerning obstruction to a police person in the line of duty, so that it will also include an obstruction to an IDF soldier in the line of duty. According to the proposal, such an offence will be punishable with up to three (3) years imprisonment (instead of one (1) year imprisonment). On June 2018, the Committee rejected the original wording of this bill and decided to approve the alternative version. This version was approved in a preliminary hearing. The Committee further decided that the matter of a minimum punishment will be discussed in a later stage before the Knesset's Constitution, Law and justice Committee. Due to the current elections, this bill was not brought before the Knesset Constitution, Law and justice Committee, and in order to renew its legislation process it should be resubmitted.

Freedom of conscience and religious belief

Reply to paragraph 26 of the list of issues

Conscientious Objection

271. Since its inception, the IDF has respected the freedom of conscience as a fundamental human right. In this regard, Section 36 of the Israeli Defense Service Law provides the Minister of Defense with the authority to exempt a person eligible for conscription, or a person who is a member of the IDF reserves forces, on the grounds of conscience.

272. Persons eligible for conscription under the Defense Service Law may submit a request for an exemption to the regional military conscription bureau.

273. Request which show prima facie substantial grounds for an exemption for reasons of conscience are brought before the Special Military Committee. The committee is headed by the IDF's Chief Enlistment Officer at a rank of a lieutenant colonel or higher and comprised of a representative of the human resources branch, an officer at a rank of captain or higher with psychological training from the behavior science branch, a legal advisor from the Military Advocate General's Corps, and a civilian representative, usually from the Academia. All of the committee members are independent in formulating their recommendation.

274. The committee examines the requests in accordance with the law and the jurisprudence of the HCJ. The applicant may present evidence and call upon witnesses before the committee, in order to support his/her request and has the right to be represented by an attorney throughout the proceedings.

275. The committee is authorized to grant an exemption or to deny the request. The committee is also authorized, in certain cases, to recommend certain leniencies and adjustments to the applicant's service, such as permission not to carry arms or to wear uniforms during his/her service, or assignment to a non-combat unit, so as to ensure the applicant's military service will meet, to the extent possible, the requirements of their conscience and personal beliefs.

276. Where an applicant's request has been denied, that applicant is obligated by law, as is every other eligible person, to complete the enlistment procedures and conduct his/her military service. In the event that such a person continues to attempt to avoid enlistment, the military authorities are provided with legal authority to take certain steps in order to enforce the enlistment.

277. In the event that such a person continues to disregard the orders given to him/her by his/her commander to complete the enlistment process, the military authorities may order disciplinary proceedings and even file a criminal indictment in a military court against him/her. Criminal proceedings are, of course, filed based on the person's disobedience of a lawful order, rather than on the basis of their particular political views.

278. For related case law, see Annex II.

Right to take part in the conduct of public affairs

A. Amendment No. 62 to the Knesset Elections Law

279. Every four (4) years Israel holds general elections for the Knesset. According to Section 4 of Basic Law: The Knesset, these election are to be general, national, direct, equal, secret and proportional to the total number of votes. According to these principles, every Israeli citizen over the age of 18 (with few exceptions), present in the country on the day of elections, has the right to vote freely. One hundred (100) persons or more who are Israeli citizens and residents may establish a party by registration, and every Israeli citizen that on the date of serving the party's list is over the age of 21 has the right to run and be elected in the democratic elections for the Knesset. Knesset seats are assigned in proportion to each party's percentage of the total national vote.

280. In March 2014, the Knesset approved Amendment No. 62 to the Knesset Elections Law. In the scope of this amendment, the electoral threshold for political parties to be elected to the Knesset was raised from 2% to 3.25%. In the explanatory notes for this amendment, the Knesset notes that the purpose of this threshold is to reduce the number of political parties represented in the Knesset by preventing the representation of very small parties and encouraging them to unite with other parties in one electoral list. The explanatory notes further state that such a rate for this threshold is common in other countries as well, and that several parties may run in a unified list, but still remain separate parties in the Knesset, provided that an advanced notice is provided to the Knesset Chairperson.

281. Minorities vote for Knesset lists (political parties) along with the entire political spectrum. In addition, Arab political parties have been consistently represented in the Knesset, as is the case in the current 21th Knesset. As of October 2019 (22th Knesset), there are 14 Arab Knesset Members (note that the total representation of the Arab population stands on 15 MK as MK Ofer Cassif was also entered the Knesset via the Joint Arab List Party. Of the 14 Arab MK, one (1) is Bedouin MK and three (3) are Druze MK. Also note that three of the Arab MKs are women. As of July 2019, (21st Knesset), there are 13 Arab MKs, of whom Eight (8) are Arab MK, two (2) are Druze and one (1) Jewish MK (including three (3) women). As of January 2019 (20th Knesset), there are 18 Arab Knesset Members, three (3) of whom are Druze, and three (3) are Bedouin MKs (two (2) of whom are women).

282. For information on two (2) petitions that were filed to the HCJ against this Amendment No. 62, see Annex II.

B. Amendment No. 44 to The Basic Law: The Knesset (Dismissal of a Knesset Member in accordance with Section 7A) 5777-2016

283. The right to vote and to be elected are of the most important rights in a democratic state, as they implement the public right to be represented in the House of Representatives, and express the fact that the electing public has legitimate positions that deserve to be heard be involved in the political discourse of shaping policy in the country. For this reason, the restrictions on this right should be reduced to minimum, and they must protect vital interests. In the past, the Knesset established within Basic Law: The Knesset, limitations on candidates and Knesset members in order to preserve the public's trust in the Knesset. Along with these restrictions, the Knesset, in section 7A of the Basic Law, established the right of democracy to protect itself against those who attempt to exploit the democratic tools in order to deny the very existence of the state or to violate its basic principles (see below). However, up until this Amendment, these limitations did not allow for the dismissal or suspension of the elected Knesset member.

284. This Amendment authorizes the Knesset to decide on the dismissal of a Knesset member from his/her tenure in the Knesset, if he/she acted, expressly or implicitly to incite to racism or in order to support an armed conflict, by of an enemy state or a terrorist organization, against the State of Israel. The proposed dismissal is dependent upon the approval of 90 Knesset Members in the Knesset Plenary, and can only be brought to a vote after it was approved by a three quarters (3/4) majority of the Knesset Committee, upon a request of 70 Knesset members (ten (10) of which are not obligated to agreements requiring their support to the Government).

285. The dismissed Knesset member has the right to appeal such decision to the Supreme Court.

286. Two (2) petitions were filed to the HCJ against the constitutionality of this Amendment. On May 2018, the Court affirmed this Amendment and rejected both of these petitions. The Court stated, inter alia, that although this amendment entails substantial infringement to basic rights, it does not infringe the Israel's basic principles. The Court added that due to the purposes of this Amendment and the checks and balances prescribed therein, it does not negate Israel's core democratic identity. (H.C.J. 5744/16 Adv. Shahar Ben Meir v. The Knesset et. al. (27.5.18)).

C. Amendment No. 46 to The Basic Law: The Knesset 5777-2017

287. On March 14, 2017, the Knesset approved Amendment 46 to Section 7A(a) to the Basic Law: The Knesset. According to the previous version of the Section, a list of candidates will not participate in an elections to the Knesset, and no person shall be nominated in such elections, if the list's goals or actions or the acts of the person, as the case may be, include, specifically or implicitly, one of those: (1) the negation of the existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, (2) incitement to racism, (3) support in an armed struggle of an enemy state or a terrorist organization against the State of Israel. Amendment No. 46 added the possibility of preventing a person from being nominated in such election statements made by this person include one (1) or more of the three (3) prohibitions noted in this section. Note that this Amendment does not discriminate in its application against specific person or population, nor it refers only certain political side.

288. For relevant case law on political expression of Knesset Members, see Annex II.

289. For information about Arab representation in the 20th, 21st and 22nd Knessets and key roles in the 20th Knesset, see Annex I.

Introduction

1. The State of Palestine acceded to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights on 1 April 2014, without entering any reservations. The drafting of the present report – which is the first official report of the State of Palestine under this instrument – demonstrates the desire of the State to implement the Covenant at the national level and to fulfil its obligations under article 40. The report describes national measures, frameworks and procedures particularly as concerns the legislative, judicial, administrative and regulatory issues involved in the implementation of the Covenant, as well as factors and difficulties that affect its implementation.
2. The report explains the current status of the rights enshrined in the Covenant in the light of the long-standing Israeli colonialist occupation, the grievous crimes and violations associated therewith, the systematic and widespread practices and policies, as well as the attempts by the occupying power to enact a far-reaching body of laws, military orders and illegal racist policies that seek to consolidate the Israeli colonialist regime. This is the main obstacle preventing the Palestinian people from enjoying their fundamental and inalienable rights, chief among which is the right to self-determination.
3. The present report was prepared by a standing committee made up of the competent government bodies, in cooperation with relevant civil society institutions. In drafting the report, the State of Palestine drew from the provisions of the Covenant itself as well as from guidelines and general comments issued by the Human Rights Committee. In a spirit of partnership and national dialogue, the first draft of the report was sent to civil society institutions which then participated in comprehensive consultations at the national level in the State of Palestine including the West Bank, Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip. The constructive comments made served to enhance the report. In addition to this, the preparation of the report coincided with the development of the fourth national development plan, which is consistent with the obligations of the State of Palestine under the United Nations Agenda for Sustainable Development, of which civil and political rights are a part.
4. The State of Palestine wishes to make it plain that nothing in the present report exempts Israel, the occupying power, from its legal responsibilities under international law, particularly international humanitarian law, international human rights law and the advisory opinion given by the International Court of Justice in 2004 on the legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. This includes a requirement upon Israel, as the occupying power, to respect the Covenant and to apply it to Palestinians. Moreover, the report in no way affects the right of the Palestinian people to exercise their immovable and inalienable historical rights, particularly the right to self-determination, return and independence.

5. For more than 10,000 years the Palestinian people have uninterruptedly been born, grown and lived in the land of their ancestors, Palestine. During that time, they have preserved their national identity and their immovable right to self-determination along with other inalienable rights. Despite the historical injustice they have suffered, the unlawful and long-standing Israeli occupation and the denial of their right to self-determination and independence, the Palestinian people remain wedded to all their rights as recognized under international treaties and conventions as well as under resolutions concerning people's right to self-determination – and in particular the Palestinian people's right to self-determination – of the United Nations, international institutions, the Human Rights Council and the General Assembly as well as under resolutions 181 (1947) and 194 (1948) and under Security Council resolutions 242 (1967), 338 (1973) up to and including 2334 (2016).
6. The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was established as an inclusive political framework and the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, recognized at the level of the United Nations and internationally. It has guided the Palestinian people on their journey towards the realization of their inalienable rights, notably the right to self-determination, the right of return and the independence of the State of Palestine with Jerusalem as its capital, on the basis of the natural, historical and legal right of the Palestinian Arab people to their homeland, Palestine.

7. The Palestinian National Council (PNC) adopted the National Charter and the PLO Statutes as the two supreme constitutional documents underpinning the Palestinian people's exercise of their right to self-determination. The Charter regulates the operations of the National Council as a representative institution for the Palestinian people and the highest legislative authority, and it envisages an executive body in the form of the Executive Committee.

8. The State of Palestine recognizes the right to self-determination for all, as proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence, which is an expression of the national will of Palestinians as represented by the Palestine Liberation Organization, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

9. The Declaration of Independence, which is a constitutional and foundational document, emphasizes the commitment of the State of Palestine to the principles and objectives of the United Nations and to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It further stipulates: "State of Palestine is the State of Palestinians wherever they may be. Therein they shall develop their national and cultural identity, enjoy full equality of rights, and have their religious and political beliefs and human dignity safeguarded under a democratic parliamentary system based on freedom of opinion; freedom to form parties; respect of the majority for minority rights; respect of minorities for majority decisions; social justice and equality; and non-discrimination in public rights on grounds of race, religion or colour, or between men and women, under a constitution that ensures the rule of law and an independent judiciary, in full consistency with the age-old spiritual and cultural heritage of Palestine embodying tolerance and religious coexistence."

10. The Palestinian Government promulgated the Palestinian Basic Law in 2001 (amended in 2003) to create a transitional document guaranteeing the fundamental rights and principles that enable the Palestinian people to exercise their right to self-determination and that enable the political process to achieve that end, until the adoption of an official constitution for the State of Palestine.

The Palestinian Basic Law, as amended in 2003, contains a body of articles intended to fulfil the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. These include:

- Article 2, which states that the people are the source of authority;
- Article 5, which stipulates that the system of governance in the State of Palestine is to be democratic;
- Article 26, which affirms the right of Palestinians to participate in the political process.

11. The Basic Law includes a raft of provisions relating to political participation and the democratic system of governance, such as the election of the Head of State (art. 34); the election of members of the Legislative Council and the definition of its role (art. 47); and the composition of the Legislative Council (art. 48). These measures are intended to fulfil the right to self-determination and the principle according to which the people are the source of authority. The Basic Law goes on to define certain components of the Palestinian political process; for example, in article 63 which defines the Council of Ministers as the basic executive organ of government.

Laws have been passed to regulate the mechanisms and means whereby the elective political process is conducted:

- Local Council Election Act No. 10 of 2005;
- Decree-Law No. 1 of 2007, which regulates general (presidential and legislative) elections.

The domestic laws of the State of Palestine address the importance of involving women in the political process and set quotas for them.

12. The first legislative and presidential elections were held in 1996. In 2005, voters were again called to the urns to elect a President, and a new Legislative Council was elected in 2006. The division of Palestinians and the refusal of Israel, the occupying power, to allow the electoral process in occupied Jerusalem has prevented further legislative and presidential elections from being held.

Exercising the right to self-determination under occupation

13. Israel, the occupying power, constitutes the fundamental obstacle in this connection and it works to prevent the Palestinian people from exercising their rights. In this it receives support and encouragement from parties intent upon undermining the international multilateral system, a system founded on laws and rights, and upon preventing the establishment of a democratic and equitable international order in which peoples, including the Palestinian people, can fulfil their inalienable rights. Chief among those rights is the right to self-determination, independence and return for Palestine refugees on the basis of General Assembly resolution 194, as well as the right to economic, social and cultural development.

14. The Government of the Israeli occupation continues to set up a colonialist system based on racist laws that deprive the Palestinian people of the right to self-determination and steal large portions of land for the construction of the wall and of illegal settlements. Furthermore, the occupying forces deliberately carry out arbitrary arrests and prosecute Palestinians in sham courts that lack minimum fair trial guarantees. The International Court of Justice, for its part, has also stated that the wall of expansion and annexation, and the system underpinning it, constitute a serious violation of the right to self-determination of the Palestinian people.

15. The Israeli system of expansion and colonialism over occupied Palestinian land is the principal cause hindering the Palestinian people's exercise of natural and legal sovereignty over their own territory and resources. The occupying authorities disrupt the development of the Palestinian people and make constant structural changes to prevent Palestinians from enjoying their rights and their resources.

16. Israel, the occupying power, has been imposing a military and economic blockade on the Gaza Strip since 2007 and has been responsible for repeated military incursions and the destruction those incursions have wreaked. Moreover, the occupying authorities prohibit the entry of basic supplies, including foodstuffs, into the Gaza Strip and their repeated acts of aggression have not only killed and injured thousands of Palestinians but have damaged the environment and provoked a humanitarian crisis. The amount of groundwater suitable for human consumption has dropped to just 5 per cent of available groundwater supplies leading to concerns among United Nations agencies and others that the Gaza Strip will not be viable for life by 2020.

17. The occupying authorities continue to prevent millions of Palestine refugees from fulfilling their right and their desire to return to the homeland from which they were displaced, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 194 (1948).

18. Since its illegal annexation of Jerusalem, Israel, the occupying power, has been taking steps which it describes as "legal" or "administrative" but which are in fact racist measures that aim to change the legal condition and status of the occupied city. In this connection, it carries out acts of ethnic cleansing, seizes lands and property, forcibly evicts Palestinians, destroys their homes, breaks up their families and restricts residency. The purpose of this is to empty Jerusalem of its original Palestinian inhabitants and alter the demographic makeup of the city.

19. The unlawful policies and practices of Israel have impeded the Palestinian people's right to an independent and geographically contiguous State of Palestine, with Jerusalem as its capital, a State where life is viable and which is able to develop economically, socially and culturally. They have likewise impeded the ability of the Palestinian Government to adopt and implement national policies in various areas of life. Nonetheless, attempts at national reconciliation have continued with a view to ending the division among Palestinians, and efforts are ongoing to put an end to the occupation and to ensure that the Palestinian people can exercise their right to self-determination and their natural and legal sovereignty over their own land.

Sustainable development and the right to self-determination

20. Despite the colonialist occupation policies that seek to undermine the developmental efforts of the State of Palestine, sustainable development nonetheless lies at the core of the vision of self-determination held by the leaders and government of the Palestinian people. This includes the right to dispose of natural resources as sovereign rights holders and the economic, social and cultural empowerment of citizens. This position of the State of Palestine has been expressed through its commitment to the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development; its adherence to the Rio Declaration and the principles enshrined therein concerning the rights to self-determination and development of peoples under foreign occupation; and its unreserved accession to human rights treaties. In fact, the Government of the State of Palestine believes that sovereignty over natural resources, enjoyment of the benefits of sustainable development and not being left behind are among the most important aspects of the exercise of the right to self-determination.

Institutional measures

21. The State of Palestine cherishes a firm belief in the need to build a society where the principles of international law and of human rights can take root, just as it believes in protecting those rights against any violation or abuse. Palestine has taken a number of legislative measures and has rolled out measures and policies to help promote, develop and uphold human rights. In 2014, having acquired the status of non-member observer State of the United Nations, Palestine acceded to seven of the core human rights treaties.

22. In May 2014, the President of the State of Palestine issued a decree for the formation of a ministerial-level standing national committee to follow up on the obligations incurred by the State following its accession to international institutions, charters, covenants and protocols. The committee is chaired by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants with members drawn from other ministries and competent institutions, and with the Independent Commission for Human Rights acting as observer. The ministerial-level committee established a subcommittee of technical experts as well as a subcommittee to harmonize domestic legislation with international treaties and to consolidate the status of the latter in the domestic legal panorama. These various committees are currently being formed and trained in order to ensure that human rights have a firm footing in all national institutions.

23. A department for international treaties has been set up inside the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants to strengthen human rights and implement measures aimed at fulfilling obligations arising from the accession of the State of Palestine to international treaties. Palestine has submitted initial reports under the human rights treaties to which it has acceded and has received a body of recommendations, which is acting to implement in line with its own national mechanisms.

24. The State of Palestine has incorporated the obligations arising from its accession to international treaties into its “Citizen First” national policy agenda for the years 2017–2022 and into its sectoral and intersectoral strategies, all of which together constitute the fourth national development plan and are consistent with the United Nations 2030 Sustainable Development Goals.

25. The State of Palestine has announced its commitment to the United Nations Agenda for Sustainable Development and, via a high-level committee on sustainable development, submitted its voluntary national review on the implementation of the Agenda to the high-level political forum on sustainable development. The review was discussed before the General Assembly of the United Nations in 2018.

Incorporation of the Convention in the domestic legal order

26. The Declaration of Independence, the highest constitutional reference of the State of Palestine, sets forth the legal grounds for adherence to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Bill of Human Rights and the principles of the United Nations. In addition to this, chapter II (entitled Public rights and freedoms) of the amended Basic Law also reaffirms the provisions enshrined in the Covenant. These include the right to personal freedom and security (arts. 11 and 12); the prohibition of coercion and torture (art. 13); the right to a fair trial (art. 14); the prohibition of medical experiments without legal consent (art. 16); the inviolability of private dwellings (art. 17); freedom of belief, worship and religious rites (art. 18); freedom of opinion and expression (art. 19); freedom of residence and movement (art. 20); the right to participate in political life, to form parties, trade unions and associations, to participate in elections and to hold meetings (art. 26); the right to establish newspapers and media outlets (art. 27); the prohibition of expulsion from, or denial of return to, the homeland and the prohibition of travel bans and of the deprivation of citizenship (art. 28); the obligation to care for children and mothers (art. 29); the right of recourse to law and of compensation for judicial errors (art. 30); and the right to compensation for harm resulting from violations of individual freedoms (art. 32). The Government of Palestine has introduced a number of legislative reforms since 1994 and has worked to enact a broad body of legislation and laws.

27. In the light of the different legislation and laws that have been imposed on the State of Palestine during various historical periods and for the purpose of laying the groundwork for a unified legal system and helping the State fulfil its obligations, the Supreme Constitutional Court issued its ruling No. 5/2017 interpreting article 10 of the amended Basic Law. That article reads: “Human rights and freedoms shall be protected and respected, and the State of Palestine shall work without delay to accede to regional and international declarations and treaties that protect human rights.” The Court decreed that international treaties to which the State of Palestine has acceded are to take precedence over domestic law but to have a status inferior to that of the Declaration of Independence and the amended Basic Law. This is conditional upon the treaties in question having acquired force of law with the completion of the formal stages required for the issuance of a domestic law for their implementation. Thus, the domestic legal order rests on the duality of international and domestic law.

Legislative harmonization committee

28. On 7 March 2017 – acting on a decision of the national committee to follow up on the obligations incurred by the State following its accession to international institutions, charters, covenants and protocols – the Council of Ministers issued a decree for the formation of a legislative harmonization committee, to be headed by the Ministry of Justice. The task of the committee is to review existing laws and bills, and to decide on priorities vis-à-vis the updating or amendment of legislation to bring it into line with the international treaties to which the State of Palestine has acceded. The committee works in partnership with civil society institutions and the Independent Commission for Human Rights so as to ensure that the State of Palestine has a unified legal system that is consistent with international law.

Judicial remedies

29. The Declaration of Independence provides for equality and non-discrimination, under a constitution that guarantees rule of law and an independent judiciary. In the same vein, article 9 of the amended Basic Law states: “Palestinians shall be equal before the law and the courts, without distinction on the basis of race, sex, colour, religion, political views or disability.”

30. The Palestinian judiciary is regulated by a set of preemptory norms and by the general principles of rule of law, equality, non-discrimination and judicial independence. The right of recourse to law is protected and guaranteed for all persons, and all Palestinians have the right to resort to their “natural judge”, with legal procedures being regulated by law in such a way as to ensure the prompt settlement of cases. Court proceedings envisage two stages of judgment governed by the principles of good governance and of compensation for judicial errors. There is a dual court system:

- The regular courts, which deal with civil, criminal and administrative cases. These include the Supreme Court of Justice, which has the power to consider and adjudicate disputes relating to administrative decisions; therefore, it is competent to decree legal protection for individuals who face any kind of discrimination from any government administrative body and to order the removal of that discrimination.

- The Supreme Constitutional Court which, under article 103 (1) of the amended Basic Law, has the power “to consider the constitutionality of laws and regulations etc., to interpret the provisions of the amended Basic Law and of domestic legislation and to adjudicate jurisdictional conflicts between judicial bodies and administrative bodies that have judicial jurisdiction”.

Office of the Public Prosecution

31. The Office of the Public Prosecution is a division of the judiciary, its mandate set forth in the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act No. 3 of 2001). It alone is competent to launch and pursue criminal proceedings, and no other body may bring a criminal case. It is also the principal body responsible for conducting investigations and bringing charges. In addition, it has responsibility for enforcing sentences handed down in criminal cases and for bringing and pursuing disciplinary proceedings against judges and prosecutors. A number of specialized prosecution offices have been established in the Office of the Public Prosecution and a human rights unit has existed there since 2016. Under the law, the unit is responsible for following up on complaints received from the public and it works to ensure that human rights standards are incorporated into the Office’s work.

Administrative remedies

32. Under Complaints Management System No. 8 of 2016, the general department for complaints within the Council of Ministers monitors the operation of complaints units in ministries, government bodies, governorate offices and security agencies, all of which receive complaints concerning the performance of the Government and its institutions from individual members of the public as well as from civil society groups. The general department for complaints and the complaints units undertake to provide a written reply to petitioners within a maximum of 30 days from the date a complaint was filed. The online complaints system for government institutions was consolidated in 2016. Other bodies also receive complaints, such as the legal affairs section of the Office of the President, the grievances and human rights office of the police and an online complaints department that receives complaints concerning the operation of the courts.

33. The Independent Commission for Human Rights (Bureau of Grievances), which was established under article 31 of the amended Basic Law, plays an important oversight role. Its mandate extends to cases involving human rights violations and complaints made by citizens; at the same time, it works to raise awareness about legal matters and it monitors national legislation and policies and the extent to which they are consistent with international human rights standards.

34. In addition to this, civil society institutions constitute important national mechanisms for the protection and promotion of human rights. Their mandates range from defending human rights, to advocating for the demands of specific groups such as women, children or persons with disabilities, to encouraging involvement in public life and elections.

Compensation

35. The right to compensation is enshrined in domestic legislation, first and foremost in the Basic Law, as amended, article 32 of which stipulates: “Any violation of any personal freedom, of the sanctity of the private life of human beings, or of any of the rights or liberties guaranteed under the Basic Law or any other law shall be considered a crime. Criminal and civil cases resulting from such violations shall not be subject to any statute of limitations. The National Authority shall guarantee just compensation to those who suffer harm in that connection.” The issue of compensation is also addressed in the Civil Torts Act of 1944 while compensation for civil claimants is covered in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

36. Under article 106 of the amended Basic Law, court judgments are binding. Failing to enforce them or obstructing their enforcement in any way constitutes a crime punishable by imprisonment and – if the accused is a public official or anyone charged with public service – dismissal. The prevailing party has the right to appeal directly to the competent court, and the Government is responsible for guaranteeing compensation.

37. The Code of Civil and Commercial Procedure (Act No. 2 of 2001) admits action against judges or prosecutors in the event that they conduct their work fraudulently or deceitfully, or commit a gross professional error that cannot be rectified, as well as in other cases where the law dictates that judges are responsible and liable for compensation.

Awareness-raising

Training

38. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), in coordination with relevant United Nations agencies and organizations, have developed and rolled out a training plan for national teams involved in the drafting of reports under the human rights treaties.

39. With a view to building the capacities of persons working in judicial service, several training courses on human rights were run between 2014 and 2020 for judges in regular and sharia courts, members of the Office of the Public Prosecution and law enforcement officials.

40. Thanks to coordination between the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants, a number of training courses on harmonization mechanisms have been held for members of the legislative harmonization committee.

Human Rights Day

41. Since acceding to international human rights treaties, the State of Palestine has been organizing annual activities as part of its commemorations of Human Rights Day. These activities – which take place through a partnership between the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education, the Ministry of Justice, the Independent Commission for Human Rights, OHCHR and other partners – include the following:

- Supplying schools with posters bearing the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;
- Arranging for programmes to be broadcast on Palestinian television;
- Printing hundreds of leaflets with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the seven core human rights treaties to which the State of Palestine acceded in 2014; these have been distributed to ministries, government institutions and the governorates;
- Sending text messages containing rights-related information, in collaboration with Palestinian providers of mobile communication services and for a specified time period;
- Broadcasting films and conducting interviews regarding the human rights situation in Palestine.

Educational curricula

42. As per article 35 (1) of Decree-Law No. 8 of 2017 regarding public education, educational curricula for all stages of schooling are developed with a focus on the norms enshrined in national legislation and international human rights treaties. The State of Palestine has undertaken to introduce human rights principles into its school curricula, and the Ministry of Education has rolled out several programmes and projects aimed at raising awareness about human rights. They include:

- A citizenship programme encompassing activities and events on international human rights instruments;
- A programme to teach students about the concepts of human rights, international humanitarian law and related international instruments; this includes student meetings to discuss human rights violations in Palestine.

Publication of reports

43. The State of Palestine has sought to promote dialogue between the Government and civil society through national consultations to discuss the drafts of the initial reports prepared by official institutions for the human rights treaty bodies. The drafts are discussed and assessed with civil society and its views are then taken into account when drafting the final version of the reports. Moreover, the authorities form partnerships with civil society groups when drawing up plans to implement the recommendations made by the human rights treaty bodies.

44. Since Israel, the occupying power, bars civil society institutions in the Gaza Strip from accessing the West Bank just as it bars access to the Gaza Strip, two separate national consultative meetings were held on the present report: one in December 2017 at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants with civil society institutions in the West Bank including those that operate in occupied Jerusalem; and another in March 2018 by videoconference at the Independent Commission for Human Rights with civil society institutions in the Gaza Strip. The consultations were attended by representatives from ministries of the State of Palestine and from civil society and human rights institutions working in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

45. The final versions of the initial reports of the State of Palestine to the monitoring bodies established under the international human rights treaties have also been published on the website of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants, as well as on the official website of all ministries concerned. Palestine undertakes to discuss its reports under the human rights treaties with the relevant treaty bodies and to follow up on the implementation of the concluding observations and recommendations those bodies make.

Equality and non-discrimination

46. The Declaration of Independence, which is the highest-ranking constitutional document of the State of Palestine, guarantees the fulfilment of rights and freedoms and decrees full and universal equality without discrimination. The Declaration also emphasizes the commitment of the State to the principles and objectives of the United Nations and to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Equality and non-discrimination are also enshrined in article 9 of the amended Basic Law, which states: "Palestinians shall be equal before the law and the courts, without distinction on the basis of race, sex, colour, religion, political views or disability." As may be seen, the prohibition of discrimination is a general principle of supreme legal standing, which means that any legislation that does not take account thereof may be overturned on grounds of unconstitutionality by the Supreme Constitutional Court. Thus constitutional laws trace a legal pathway towards equality and non-discrimination.

47. Existing laws contain explicit provisions prohibiting discrimination and enjoining equality; for example, in legislation governing elections and the recognition of all citizens' right to vote and to stand for election. In addition to this, the Civil Service Act No. 4 of 1998 and the Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000) both prohibit discrimination in working conditions between men and women. The Palestinian Children's Act No. 7 of 2004 includes provisions to protect children against discrimination, while the Disability Rights Act No. 4 of 1999 guarantees the rights of persons with disabilities and protects them against all forms of discrimination.

48. Article 14 of the draft constitution of the State of Palestine of 2015 states: "All Palestinians are equal before the law, enjoy the same rights and have the duties prescribed by law, without distinction as to origin, race, sex, religion, social status, opinion or disability."

49. The draft criminal code also envisages the criminalization of discriminatory acts, which it punishes by imprisonment and a fine. The text defines discrimination as: "Any differentiation among natural persons on the basis of national or social origin, colour, sex, family status, health status, disability, political opinion, trade union affiliation, or actual or presumed affiliation or non-affiliation with a race, nation, lineage or specific religion."

50. A draft law on the protection of the family from violence includes a definition of discrimination against women that is consistent with the definition enshrined in the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. The bill considers such discrimination to be a criminal offence and envisages appropriate penalties.

51. The political will and the commitment of the State of Palestine to prohibit all forms of discrimination, and to take all necessary measures in that connection, is well expressed in its accession to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and to other international human rights treaties.

Challenges

52. Israel, the occupying power, geographically fragments the Occupied Palestinian Territory and attempts to destroy the Palestinian social fabric while subjecting Palestinians to a body of racist laws. Palestinians living in occupied Jerusalem are subject to the Permanent Residency Act while Palestinian civilians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip are subject to military law. At the same time, Israeli civil law is applied to Israeli colonists. Moreover, Israel continues to impose its policy of denying Palestinians – whether refugees or displaced persons living outside the Occupied Palestinian Territory – the right of return.

53. The report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Palestinian territories occupied since 1967, presented to the General Assembly in 2012, stated that: “Israel has created a regime of separation and discrimination, with two separate systems of law in Palestinian territory: one system applies to the settlers, and treats the settlements as de facto extensions of Israel and grants settlers the rights of citizens with the protections of a quasi-democratic State. In contrast, the Palestinians are subject to a system of military administration that deprives them of legal protection and the right to participate in shaping policies regarding the land in which they live. These separate systems reinforce a regime in which rights depend on national identity and citizenship. A dual system of roads, one for settlers and one for Palestinians, further entrenches the discriminatory separation between the two communities.”

54. For its part, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination has established that it has a mandate to consider complaints lodged by the State of Palestine against Israel, the occupying power, and its racist practices against the Palestinian people.

Foreigners

55. All laws that regulate rights and freedoms apply to citizens and foreigners without distinction, with the same limitations and the same guarantees. The State guarantees the right to take legal action and to have recourse to the courts, in line with the Declaration of Independence and the amended Basic Law, which recognize the principle of equality and the rule of law.

Article 3

56. To complement the legislative and policy measures adopted by the State of Palestine to prevent discrimination, as outlined above, additional legislative and policy measures have been adopted to ensure that women and men enjoy equal rights under the Covenant. They include:

Legislative measures

57. The Declaration of Independence states that women and men are equal in their enjoyment of all fundamental rights and freedoms, while the amended Basic Law envisages a number of general legal guarantees to ensure that women are able to exercise their right to equality, non-discrimination and equality of opportunity.

58. There is a supreme political will in favour of achieving equality between women and men, and this has translated into a body of legislative reforms and bills the purpose of which is to curb forms of behaviour that discriminate against women. One of these is the draft law on the protection of the family from violence, which contains a definition of discrimination against women that is consistent with the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Alongside the legislative harmonization committee, a committee for gender-fair legislation has also been created and a technical committee has been formed to review and update the system of laws governing personal and civil status. All these committees are working to review and draft legislation from a gender perspective and to bring it into line with international standards.

Policy measures

59. The Ministry of Women's Affairs was established in 2003 as a national institution for the advancement of women. Its purpose is to uphold the Government's commitment to formulating and implementing policies, strategies and measures to eliminate discrimination. At its inception, the Ministry adopted the Beijing Platform for Action.

60. Gender units have been reintroduced as part of the structure of governmental bodies, where they work to integrate gender-related issues into various sectors and to monitor government programmes and policies. There are units with special names, depending upon the nature of their activity: the "women's health development" in the Ministry of Health; the "general department for women's work" in the Ministry of Endowments; and the "unit for male and female statistics" in the Central Bureau of Statistics. The gender unit in the Ministry of Information is also working to institutionalize gender issues and to monitor, from a gender perspective, the laws, programming policies and plans that govern the media, broadcasting and production.

61. The Gender Policy Institute was established pursuant to a 2019 decree of the Council of Ministers. Its purpose is to produce studies and research that can be used as a foundation upon which to develop gender-equality policies.

62. In March 2018, the Council of Ministers issued decrees granting women the right to apply for passports and open bank accounts for their children and to take them to school.

63. At the level of national planning, the Palestinian government is working to include gender issues in national and sectoral policies and in general budgets. In that connection, the Government adopted its national development plan: "Building the State and Embodying Sovereignty 2014–2016", the priorities of which included greater protection for women, increased participation in the labour market and easier access to basic services. The Government also adopted its national policy agenda 2017–2022: "Citizen First" and its intersectoral plan for gender equality and justice 2017–2022.

64. A higher national committee was set up in 2012 for the implementation of Security Council resolution 1325 (2000) on women, peace and security. The committee aims to improve protection for women in the face of Israeli occupation and its members include governmental and non-governmental institutions, who represent the national coalition for the implementation of resolution 1325.

65. In 2010, most political parties signed a pledge to promote the involvement of Palestinian women in the political decision-making process, at a minimum level of 30 per cent. Among recent decisions taken by the Palestinian Central Council was one to roll out mechanisms for the implementation of that pledge and to bring domestic laws into line with the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.

66. Ever since 1996, gender has been incorporated into the surveys conducted by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, which now yield detailed gender-based data. The Bureau also has a national plan for monitoring sustainable development indicators 2030 and has conducted a survey on violence in Palestinian society between 2011 and 2019.

67. Civil society institutions that focus on women's activities also play an effective role as they seek to support and empower women in all fields. They work to promote community awareness about the rights and status of women and they play an important role in eradicating customs and practices that discriminate against women.

68. One expression of effective political will in this connection was the 2014 accession – with no reservations – of the State of Palestine to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. This represents a step forward in the national efforts to protect the rights of Palestinian women and to remove discriminatory provisions from existing legislation and policies. The State of Palestine submitted its initial report under the Convention in March 2017 and is currently in the process of implementing the concluding observations of the relevant treaty body.

69. The State of Palestine acceded to the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women in 2018, and to the Convention on Consent to Marriage, Minimum Age for Marriage and Registration of Marriages, the Convention on the Nationality of Married Women and the Convention on the Political Rights of Women in 2014. Moreover, as part of regional efforts towards the advancement of women, the State of Palestine joined the Arab Women Organization in 2003 and it ratified the statutes of the Women's Development Organization of the Organization of Islamic Cooperation, in 2013.

Public and private sector work

70. In the State of Palestine, labour is regulated by the Basic Law, as amended, and by the Civil Service Act No. 4 of 1998, as amended – as regards work in the public sector – and by the Labour Code of 2000 – as regards work in the private sector. These laws envisage equality between women and men as concerns the right to work, employment opportunities and wages. Quality of work is assessed using the same standards as those applied to the assessment of professional performance and promotion. These laws also respect women's right to have children and their right to paid maternity leave without any loss of seniority, benefits or promotion. As part of its plan of action, the legislative harmonization committee is reviewing amendments to the Public Pensions Act and the Civil Service Act, and is taking steps to ensure equal pay and pension rights. It is also reviewing the Labour Code to penalize discrimination and harassment in the workplace.

71. Although the involvement of women in the workforce has increased over recent years, it remains very low compared to that of men. In 2018, 21 per cent of all women of working age were participating in the workforce, as compared to 10 per cent in 2000. The comparable statistic for men in 2018 was 72 per cent. Moreover, there is a clear gap between the sexes in average daily wage, which for women is 92 shekels and for men 129 shekels, according to data collected by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics. With a view to closing that gap, the harmonization committee is reviewing the Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000) to bring it into line with international standards and with recommendations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women regarding equal pay for men and women for work of equal value. For its part, the Ministry of Labour is increasing its oversight and sanctions to ensure that the law is duly applied.

Level of participation of women in political and public life

72. Statistics show that the number of women in positions of responsibility, in both the public and private sectors, as well as in parliament and in senior positions is low. Around 5 per cent of members of the Central Council and 11 per cent of the PLO National Council are women while the Executive Committee, which is the highest executive body in the Organization, has one woman.

73. The proportion of women on the Legislative Council increased after the 2006 elections, rising to 12.9 per cent, as compared to 5.6 per cent following the 1996 elections. Under Decree-Law No. 1 of 2007 regarding general elections, a "female quota" system was introduced as an interim special measure.

74. In the same way, Local Councils Act No. 10 of 2005 also envisages a "female quota" system. Nonetheless, the proportion of women in local elections, at the level both of candidacy and of electoral outcomes, remains very low, as the table below shows:

Election	Proportion of female candidates	Proportion of successful female candidates
2004–2005	19.2%	13.7%
2012	24.8%	21%
2017	26%	21%

75. As concerns student councils, despite an increase in the proportion of women in the student body of universities and colleges, prevailing societal norms still stand as a major obstacle to their participation. In fact, the proportional distribution of student council membership in Palestinian universities and institutes in the West Bank stood at 23.2 per cent female and 76.8 per cent male in 2015 and at 87.6 per cent male compared to 12.4 per cent female in 2016. There are no student councils at universities in Gaza with the exception of the Islamic University, which has two councils, one for males and one for females, each with 11 members.

76. Three women held ministerial posts during the eighteenth administration. Women also hold senior positions, such as head of the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics and head of the Bureau for Legal Advice and Legislation, while the governors of Ramallah and of Birah are women.

77. The number of female judges is increasing gradually, with four female sharia judges and two female officials authorized to conclude marriage contracts. The table below shows the number of judges in the State of Palestine in 2018:

Type of Court	West Bank		Gaza Strip		Palestine
	Male	Female	Male	Female	Male	Female
Chief Qadi/Head of Supreme Court	1	0	0	0	1	0
Supreme Court	25	3	5	1	30	4
Court of Appeal	23	5	10	0	33	5
Court of first instance	64	9	8	1	72	10
Anti-corruption court	2	1	0	0	2	1
Magistrates' court	57	23	11	2	68	25
Total	172	41	34	4	206	45

78. There has been a tangible increase in the proportion of women holding positions in the Office of the Public Prosecution where, in 2018, 21 per cent of the members of the Office were women. Details are given in the table below:

	2016		2017		2018
	Male	Female	Male	Female	Male	Female
Chief prosecutor	34	6	40	5	38	5
Deputy prosecutor	56	13	82	27	85	28
Assistant prosecutor	30	14	4	1	0	0

79. In 2019, 54 per cent of the staff of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Migrants were women. In addition, there were 12 women of ambassadorial rank, some holding influential international decision-making positions.

80. According to data from the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, women accounted for 43 per cent of public sector workers in the State of Palestine in 2019, although the proportion of women decreases further up the ladder of the public administration, particularly as regards senior positions. In fact, women working in the civil service hold only around 12 per cent of posts at general-manager level and above. There has been no significant change in that figure, which stood at 11.7 per cent in 2015.

81. In 2017, women accounted for 33.3 per cent of editors-in-chief.

Combating domestic violence

82. As a complement to the process of legislative reform, ongoing efforts are being made to enact the decree-law to protect the family from violence, and to introduce legally binding and socially flexible provisions within a framework of norms to protect privacy and confidentiality, which are necessary to obviate the risk of family disintegration. The draft decree-law will help to facilitate legal action, as all relevant cases are exempt from legal fees and are treated as urgent at every stage of proceedings. The bill defines all forms of violence and discrimination, and designates penalties for each, and it includes provision for protection orders for victims, children under guardianship, witnesses and anyone who provides assistance to a victim. In addition to this, the draft decree-law regulates the possibility of mediation in cases of minor offences or infractions. This possibility – which is admitted just once, with the approval of the parties and under the supervision of the Office of the Public Prosecution – does not impede a civil action from being brought before the competent court and, in the event of non-compliance with the mediation conditions, criminal proceedings are launched. The bill has been reviewed by the legislative harmonization committee and steps are currently being taken to enact it.

National mechanisms

83. With a view to institutionalizing the action taken to combat violence against women, a national anti-violence committee was established under a 2008 decree of the Council of Ministers. The committee drafted a strategy to combat violence against women 2011–2019 and, on the basis of an evaluation of that strategy, produced another for the period 2020–2030, consistent with the Sustainable Development Goals and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Moreover, in 2014, the committee adopted a “risk situation review system” for female victims of violence.

84. A national observatory on violence against women was established under a decree of the Council of Ministers in 2017. Its purpose is to provide a digitalized database of cases of violence to help in policymaking, in enforcing or amending legislation and in decision-making.

85. The Ministry of Social Development takes in female victims of violence and provides them with social, legal and psychological counselling services free of charge. In case of need, it refers them to centres that provide protection and shelter, either run by the Ministry or under ministerial supervision. These centres, in turn, provide the women with overnight accommodation, shelter, protection and rehabilitation.

86. The operation of the centres is regulated by the Protection Centre Regulations No. 9 of 2011 and by the National Referral Regulations of 2013. Moreover, a national referral team has been formed and a detailed procedural manual has been drafted. There are four protection centres providing such services in the West Bank – the Mehwar Centre, the Girls’ Welfare Home, the Safe House and the Women’s Emergency Protection Home – and two in the Gaza Strip – the Safe House and the Hayat Centre. Of the latter, only one provides shelter, which means it is not possible to handle every case in which a woman might request protection.

87. The Ministry of Social Development incorporates female victims of violence into its relief and development programmes as urgent special cases, and it organizes joint programmes with non-governmental organizations (NGOs). In 2017, the Ministry dealt with 336 cases involving female victims of gender-based violence.

88. In 2008, family protection units were established within the police to address cases of domestic violence and sex crimes. In the Gaza Strip, in the absence of any specialized family protection units, the police receive complaints from female victims of violence and help to resolve disputes with, as appropriate, the assistance of reconciliation committees.

89. In 2016, a special prosecutor’s office was established to protect families from violence and to strengthen the role of the Office of the Public Prosecution in protecting female victims of violence. Furthermore, a gender unit has been set up in the Office of the Public Prosecution and a unified operations manual has been drafted for prosecutors to use when dealing with female victims of violence.

90. Family guidance and reconciliation units have been created in the sharia courts. An infrastructure has been set up in the courts of first instance with mediation and legal counselling services being provided before having recourse to the courts. In 2016, these units dealt with a total of 4,476 cases in the West Bank.

91. Since the beginning of 2017, female victims of violence have been exempted from all fees for medical reports issued by State-run hospitals, and the Ministry of Health has adopted a number of measures to speed up the handling and follow-up of issues related to women's health and safety. The procedural manual has been updated and registers created in which to record cases of gender-based violence.

92. Surveys on violence in Palestinian society, conducted in 2011 and 2019, showed that the prevalence of spousal violence suffered by women who are or have been married stood at 37 per cent in 2011, a figure that had dropped to 27 per cent in 2019. In 2019, moreover, 61 per cent of women preferred to remain silent about violence they might have suffered at the hands of their husbands, as compared to 65.3 per cent in 2011. Only 0.7 per cent of women sought assistance from a psychological, social or legal aid centre in 2011, a figure that had risen to 1.4 per cent by 2019.

93. Palestinian women are subjected to dual violence under the Israeli occupation, which not only threatens their human security but also contributes to further depriving them of their fundamental rights, including the right to self-determination and the right of return. Thus women are one of the groups most heavily impacted and affected by the policies and crimes of the Israeli occupation and the practices in which it engages that restrict livelihoods and deny access to public services such as education, employment and health care, as a result of which many women are constrained to give birth at border points with no access to reproductive health services. Added to this is the forced displacement of Palestinian Bedouins, the imposition of discriminatory policies and legislation in occupied Jerusalem, policies of deportation and the deportation of spouses and children, denial of family reunification and the dispersal of Palestinian families in various ways. The 2011 statistical survey shows that about half of Palestinian families have been directly subjected to violence by Israeli occupying forces and colonists.

94. The issue of marriageable age, divorce and custody is addressed in the reply to article 23.

Enrolment of girls in school

95. Article 24 (1) of the amended Basic Law states: "Education is the right of all citizens and is compulsory until, at least, completion of the basic level. Education is to be free of charge in State-run schools and institutes." In addition, the Decree-Law of 2017 regarding public education recognizes the equality of males and females to enrol in school under the same conditions and to study the same curricula.

96. There is a political will to develop new school curricula that take account of concepts of gender, that adopt standards of non-differentiation between the sexes, that affirm the importance and effectiveness of women's role in society and their involvement in political and public life and in decision-making posts and that introduce changes in line with concepts of gender.

97. The number of females and males in the education system – according to statistics from the Ministry of Education and Higher Education – is shown in the table below:

Years	Number of students in all governorates and at all levels	Females	Males
2014–2015	1 171 596	590 501	581 095
2016–2017	1 229 756	619 166	610 590
2018–2019	1 288 920	652 463	636 457

98. In the year 2016/17, school dropout rates in the State of Palestine stood at 0.71 at the basic level (0.89 for males and 0.53 for females) and at 2.44 for the secondary level (2.48 for males and 2.41 for females). The Ministry of Education is making efforts to reduce those rates to a minimum by opening new schools and new sections for female students, particularly in marginalized and remote areas. It is doing so despite the systematic destruction and demolition of Palestinian schools by the Israeli occupation authorities.

99. The Ministry of Education also seeks to reduce illiteracy rates by opening literacy centres. Data from the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics has shown a decline in illiteracy rates since 1997, which have fallen among Palestinians aged 15 and above from 13.9 per cent in 1997 to 2.8 per cent in 2018. Over the same period, the decline in illiteracy rates among females was from 20.3 per cent to 4.3 per cent.

Nationality

100. The Declaration of Independence defines Palestinian identity in the following terms: “The State of Palestine is the State of Palestinians wherever they may be; where they can develop their national and cultural identity and enjoy full equality of rights.” Article 5 of the Palestinian National Charter states: “Palestinians are the Arab citizens who habitually resided in Palestine until 1947, whether those who were expelled therefrom or who remained therein. Anyone born to a Palestinian Arab father after that date, in or outside Palestine, is Palestinian.”

101. According to the operational definition used by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), Palestine refugees are persons who resided in Palestine between June 1946 and May 1948, and who lost their homes and livelihoods as a result of the 1948 war. UNRWA services are available to all refugees who are registered with the Agency and reside in its areas of operation, to whom the aforementioned definition applies and who are in need of assistance. The offspring of those Palestinian refugees are likewise Palestinian refugees.

102. The exercise of the rights associated with Palestinian nationality is closely tied to the ending of the Israeli occupation, which imposes illegal and arbitrary controls over Palestinian civil affairs. Article 7 of the amended Basic Law states: “Palestinian nationality is to be regulated by law”. Yet, while awaiting the issuance of such a law – the Israeli occupation being a major obstacle to its enactment – the issue of nationality in Palestine continues to be regulated by a body of other legislation. This includes the Civil Status Act of 1999, the unified provisions of Palestinian nationality decrees issued at the time of the British Mandate in 1925, the Jordanian Nationality Act of 1925, as amended, and a number of Israeli military orders. For its part, Israel arbitrarily imposes the Permanent Residency Act on the original Palestinians landholders, under which they are considered as residents in occupied Jerusalem.

103. Under Circular No. 42 of 2010, issued by the Palestinian Ministry of the Interior, Palestinian women who are married to non-Palestinians and who hold a Palestinian identity card are entitled to grant their children a Palestinian passport and register them on their own identity card before the children reach the age of 16. The same rules apply to Palestinian men married to non-Palestinians.

Legislation criminalizing rape

104. Criminal legislation makes rape and other sexual acts imposed upon a woman by coercion – such as indecent assault, inappropriate advances, abduction and indecent acts or comments – a criminal offence. It does not, however, impose deterrent penalties commensurate with the severity of the offence. In fact, a person who commits an act of rape faces a minimum term of imprisonment of 5 years, increased to 7 years if the victim is under 15. In cases where the victim is aged between 15 and 18 and the perpetrator is a legitimate or illegitimate ascendent of hers, the penalty is imprisonment for between 3 and 15 years.

105. Decree-Law No. 5 of 2018 was issued in March 2018 to abrogate article 308 of the Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960). Its purpose is to ensure that a person who perpetrates a criminal assault against a woman cannot benefit from a suspension of criminal proceedings and seek impunity by marrying the victim.

Article 4

106. States of emergency are regulated under chapter VII of the amended Basic Law (arts. 110–114). Under those provisions, a state of emergency is to be declared only in cases where national security is threatened due to war, invasion, armed insurrection or natural disaster. The purpose of the state of emergency, the area it covers and its duration must all be clearly defined. That duration cannot exceed 30 days, which can be extended for a further 30 days, with the approval of the Legislative Council.

107. Restrictions on fundamental rights and freedoms may be imposed only to the degree necessary to achieve the purpose set forth in the declaration of the state of emergency. Moreover, any arrests or detentions during the emergency are to be reviewed by the Prosecutor General or the competent court within a period of not more than 15 days. For its part, the Legislative Council – at its first meeting following the declaration of a state of emergency – has the right to question the executive about any action taken during that time. It should be noted, moreover, that in no case may any inalienable rights be infringed during a state of emergency.

Definition of terrorism in current legislation

108. Article 147 of the Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960) contains the following definition of acts of terrorism: “All acts that aim to create a state of panic and give rise to a generalized public risk, and that are committed using explosive or incendiary devices, inflammable substances or epidemiological or bacterial agents.”

109. Decree-Law No. 20 of 2015 on combating money-laundering and the financing of terrorism, as amended, contains the following definition: “(1) A terrorist or terrorist organization is any individual or group of terrorists who perpetrate any of the following acts: (i) Commit, attempt to commit or participate as an accomplice in any terrorist act using any means, directly or indirectly, organize acts of terrorism, or direct others to commit them; (ii) Contribute to acts of terrorism with a group of persons working to achieve a joint objective where the contribution is deliberate and has the aim of supporting a terrorist act or is made in the knowledge of the group’s intention to commit a terrorist act.”

110. Decree-Law No. 20 of 2015, as amended, includes provision for the creation of a national committee to combat money-laundering and the financing of terrorism as well as a committee for the implementation of Security Council resolutions concerning terrorist financing. The latter committee has responsibility for the prompt implementation of, in particular, Security Council resolutions 1373 (2001) and 1267 (1999) as well as of other associated resolutions and of Security Council resolution 2178 (2014) concerning foreign terrorist fighters. Moreover, a list has been drawn up with the names of individual terrorists and terrorist organizations while asset-freezing lists have been published in the Official Gazette. Via recourse to the competent court it is possible to enter a challenge against inclusion in the list or to appeal a decision of the committee.

Article 5

111. With the Palestinian Declaration of Independence – which is the supreme constitutional document in the domestic legal system – the State of Palestine undertakes to abide by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the principles and objectives of the United Nations. For its part, article 10 of the amended Basic Law guarantees respect for fundamental rights and freedoms. Thus, human rights principles are considered as constitutional norms and, if any piece of legislation is at odds therewith, it can be challenged on grounds of unconstitutionality before the Supreme Constitutional Court, the rulings of which are binding upon all authorities of the State. Rights and freedoms, moreover, are protected by the law and all violations are treated as offences in which neither criminal nor civil proceedings are subject to the statute of limitations. Fair compensation for persons who have suffered harm is envisaged under article 32 of the Basic Law. In its ruling No. 5/2017, the Supreme Constitutional Court decreed that international conventions and treaties, including human rights treaties, are to take precedence over domestic law once they have gone through the formal procedures. The Palestinian leadership is pursuing a policy aimed at promoting human rights in the State of Palestine by signing and acceding to human rights treaties and fulfilling the concomitant obligations, thereby further expanding the application of those rights at the national level.

Article 6

112. The right to life lies at the very heart of human rights and therefore enjoys full legal protection. In fact, the Palestinian Declaration of Independence and the amended Basic Law impose respect for human rights, foremost among them the right to life. Any violations of those rights are treated as offences in which neither criminal nor civil proceedings are subject to the statute of limitations.

Violation by the Israeli occupation of Palestinians' right to life

113. Israel, the occupying power, pursues – and has pursued since beginning its colonization more than 72 years ago – a systematic and broad-ranging policy that deliberately targets the right to life of the Palestinian people. This takes the form of collective persecution and punishment imposed by the occupiers against Palestinian civilians, and the implementation of policies and practices that flagrantly violate international human rights law. Indeed, the Israeli occupying forces resort to forms of physical elimination, massacres and alarming patterns of deaths and injuries as well as extrajudicial executions against Palestinian civilians and children. In many cases, the killing of Palestinians is the result of an excessive and unjustified use of force. In addition to this are the crimes and violence systematically perpetrated by Israeli settlers against Palestinian civilians.

114. During the ethnic cleansing of the Nakbah in 1948, the Israeli occupiers destroyed Palestinian villages and towns and committed more than 70 massacres during which they killed more than 15,000 Palestinians. Overall, more than 100,000 Palestinians and Arabs have fallen since the Nakbah, including 10,853 who died at Israeli hands between 29 September 2000 and 7 May 2019.

115. Israel, the occupying power, has used destructive force on a wide scale during its repeated attacks against the Gaza Strip. In 2014, at least 2,127 Palestinian civilians were killed while 11,036 were injured, the majority of the victims being women and children. In fact, 23 per cent of the dead and 32 per cent of the injured were women while children accounted for 27 per cent of the dead and 30 per cent of the injured.

116. During 2015, 175 Palestinians died at the hands of the Israeli occupation forces and Israeli settlers. In 2016, that figure stood at 105; in 2017 at 76 and in 2018 at 299.

117. Israel, the occupying power, continues its systematic policy of using excessive and deadly force against peaceful demonstrators in the Great Return March and to break the blockade in the Gaza Strip. Between the start of the March of return in March 2018 and May 2019, 16,800 persons have been injured; 136 persons have lost limbs and 272 people have been killed, including 54 children, 6 women, 4 paramedics and 3 journalists.

Enforced disappearance

118. Israel, the power responsible for the illegal occupation, arbitrarily detains and forcibly conceals hundreds of Palestinians, some of them in the so-called “cemeteries of numbers”. Moreover, it discloses no information about those cemeteries or about the fate of Palestinians it has, over more than 53 years, detained or executed extrajudicially.

119. The State of Palestine has strengthened its own legal and administrative mechanisms to ensure systematic and effective control to prevent enforced disappearances. The amended Basic Law and the Code of Criminal Procedure identify the agencies invested with powers of arrest and detention; the designated locations and procedures for arrest and detention; the issuance of warrants and summonses; the extension of detention and pretrial custody; procedures for establishing identity; the right of accused persons to communicate with family members and avail themselves of the assistance of a lawyer; the submission of complaints by detained persons and inmates; and the reporting of detainees or inmates who are being held illegally. In addition to this, a number of governmental and civil society bodies are invested with powers of supervision over places of detention and custody.

120. Registers are kept of inmates in correctional and rehabilitation centres while a criminal fingerprint register has been developed for use in police stations. A series of standing guidelines for law enforcement officials has been issued by administrative authorities with oversight and monitoring powers, regarding the obligation to abide by codes of conduct, laws and instructions.

Use of force and firearms by Palestinian security forces

121. Under articles 2 and 3 of Firearms and Ammunition Act No. 2 of 1998, it is forbidden to acquire or carry firearms without a licence from the Ministry of the Interior. The manufacture, repair, import and trade of weapons and ammunition is also prohibited, save in accordance with the terms of the licence. Article 8 of Decree-Law No. 8 of 2007, regarding preventive security, enjoins respect for the rights, freedoms and safeguards envisaged in Palestinian domestic law and in international treaties. Moreover, article 52 of Decree-Law No. 23 of 2011, regarding the police, states that officers may resort to the use of force and firearms only to the extent necessary to perform their legitimate duties and tasks. Moreover, such use must be the only means available once all other non-violent means have been exhausted, and the rules and procedures governing the use of force and firearms under current law must be followed. For its part, the Revolutionary Criminal Code criminalizes the resort to armed force in a manner contrary to the instructions imparted to law enforcement officials.

122. The Minister of the Interior issued Decree No. 211/2011 containing rules on the use of force and firearms by members of the Palestinian security forces. Under those rules, security personnel must refrain from using force except in circumstances of extreme peril and they must abide by the principles of necessity and proportionality while also safeguarding civil rights and freedoms. Circular No. 07/2017 reaffirms that police officers must abide by instructions and rules when using force and firearms.

123. With a view to ensuring accountability, and in the wake of events in the governorate of Bethlehem on Friday 18 September 2015 during which law enforcement and public security forces attacked a child, the head of the National Security Forces issued a circular according to which such actions are to be considered as individual acts committed by persons who were acting in violation of standing orders and instructions. As a consequence, an investigation was launched by order of the head of the National Security Forces with a view to identifying those responsible for the acts in question. The commission of inquiry concluded that accountability lay with the officers concerned and disciplinary action was taken against them, ranging from relief of duties to disciplinary confinement, imprisonment and delayed promotion.

Death penalty

124. The death penalty is envisaged for a number of offences under criminal legislation: the Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960), the Mandate-era Criminal Code (Act No. 74 of 1936), the Revolutionary Criminal Code of 1979 and the Explosives Act, as amended, which is in force in the West Bank. The State of Palestine is working to abolish the death penalty from legislative texts, to which end a draft criminal code has been prepared which does not contemplate the death penalty for any offence. The draft code is currently being reviewed by a committee, which is seeking to ensure its consistency with international human rights treaties. The enactment of the draft criminal code is a priority for the State of Palestine in its process of legislative reform.

Procedural guarantees surrounding the death penalty

125. Courts of first instance are competent to consider offences of all kinds. The Code of Criminal Procedure (Act No. 3 of 2001) sets forth the procedures to be followed in criminal proceedings, which legislators have made particularly stringent in cases involving the death penalty. Under articles 244 and 245 of the Code, a lawyer must be present to represent the accused person, and a lawyer is to be appointed for persons who lack the means to engage one for themselves. In addition, any sentence of death must be handed down by consensus (art. 272) and “the sentence must be signed by the judges and read out in public in the presence of the prosecutor and the accused, while the convicted person must be informed of the right to appeal” (art. 277). Moreover, “a request for a retrial does not entail the suspension of the enforcement of the sentence, save in the case of a death sentence” (art. 380 (1)).

126. The Code of Criminal Procedure also states: “Sentences of death and of life imprisonment are automatically subject to appeal under the law even if the parties themselves do not appeal them” (art. 327); and “all sentences of death and of life imprisonment are automatically subject to appeal in cassation under the law even if the parties themselves do not appeal them” (art. 350).

127. As concerns amnesties or reduction of sentence, the President of the State of Palestine has the right to grant a special pardon or to commute sentences, whereas general amnesties and an amnesty for a particular crime can only be enacted by law (art. 42 of the amended Basic Law).

128. Under the amended Basic Law and the Code of Criminal Procedure, a sentence of death handed down by any court is not to be carried out until ratified by the President of the State of Palestine (art. 109 of the amended Basic Law and art. 409 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In this regard, it should be noted that the President of the State of Palestine has not ratified any death sentence since 2005, which is evidence of a political will in the State of Palestine to suspend the death penalty.

129. According to article 7 (2) of Decree-Law No. 4 of 2016 concerning the protection of juveniles: “A juvenile shall not be sentenced to death”. This constitutes a legislative development in the State of Palestine that is consistent with standards enshrined in international human rights treaties. Moreover, the Decree-Law defines a juvenile as “a child who was under 18 at the time the criminal act was committed”.

130. Article 17 (2) of the Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960) states that, if a death sentence is handed down against a woman who is pregnant, it is to be commuted to a term of life imprisonment with hard labour. Under article 215 of the Mandate-era Criminal Code (Act No. 74 of 1936): “If the court is faced with convincing evidence that a woman convicted of murder is pregnant, she is to be sentenced to a term of life imprisonment.” Moreover, under article 414 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act No. 3 of 2001): “A sentence of death may not be carried out against a pregnant woman. If the woman then gives birth to a living child, the court that handed down the sentence is to commute the death penalty to a term of life imprisonment.”

Military courts

131. In addition to the safeguards enshrined in the amended Basic Law, the Revolutionary Code of Criminal Procedure states that a sentence of death may not be carried out until it has been ratified by the Commander-in-Chief. Moreover, the body authorized to ratify a sentence may commute the death sentence to a lesser penalty, repeal or suspend it, or order a retrial of the condemned party. In addition, a death sentence handed down against a pregnant woman is to be suspended until she has given birth.

132. As a way of ensuring two levels of jurisdiction in the military justice system, Decree-Law No. 31 of 2016 was issued to amend the 1979 Revolutionary Code of Criminal Procedure. Under the Decree-Law, the Military Court of Appeal was established which is competent to hear any appeal against judgments and rulings handed down by the Standing Military Tribunal (a court of first instance) and those handed down by the Special Military Tribunal.

133. In June 2018, the State of Palestine became a party to the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty, and the State is seeking to implement the international obligations arising from that accession. This includes amendments to legislation on the death penalty by the committee responsible for harmonizing legislation with international covenants and treaties.

134. In 2014, the State of Palestine acceded to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

Maternal mortality

135. Rates of maternal mortality – i.e., the death of women during pregnancy, childbirth and until the forty-second day after birth – are shown in the table below:

Year	No. of cases recorded in the State of Palestine	West Bank	Gaza Strip
2014	30	13	17
2015	20	5	15
2016	18	9	9
2017	8	3	5

136. A number of steps have been taken to reduce the incidence of such cases. A care programme for high-risk pregnancies is being rolled out alongside community awareness-raising campaigns on the health of mothers and children, and reproductive health in general. A health education guide is being drafted and a high-risk pregnancy care service is being developed in primary health-care centres. The mechanism for reporting maternal deaths – in State-run, private and UNRWA institutions – has been updated and linked to a computerized system in order to improve monitoring and help determine causes of death.

Abortion

137. Abortion is prohibited under current law, with the exception of therapeutic abortion. Article 8 (1) of Public Health Act No. 20 of 2004 states: “It is prohibited to perform an abortion on any pregnant woman in any way unless such action is necessary to save her life, as testified by two specialist doctors (at least one of whom must be a gynaecologist) and under the following conditions: (a) The prior written consent of the pregnant woman or, if she is unable to provide it, the written consent of her husband or guardian; (b) The abortion must take place in a health-care institution.”

138. Abortions for pregnancies that were procured unlawfully (rape or incest) are carried out very limitedly. The initiative is taken by the Office of the Public Prosecution, which seeks a legal opinion from the Palestinian Fatwa Board before authorizing an abortion for a pregnancy resulting from rape or incest.

139. The Department for Women’s Health and Development and the Community Health Division, which are both part of the Ministry of Health, provide integrated reproductive health-care services in all regions, including marginalized areas. In that connection, family planning services have been made available in primary health-care centres at nominal fees, contraceptives have been included on the list of essential medicines of the Ministry of Health, the family planning protocol has been updated to meet the standards of the World Health Organization (WHO) and medical teams have been trained in the use of the protocol with a view to avoiding unwanted pregnancies.

Legislative steps to reduce so-called “honour killings of women”

140. Legislation previously in force – notably article 340 of the 1960 Criminal Code and article 18 of the Mandate-era Criminal Code – envisaged circumstances whereby a person who committed the offence of “killing a woman for reasons of honour” could benefit from a reduction or outright cancellation of any penalty. However, Decree No. 7, issued in May 2011, rescinded all abrogating and mitigating circumstances relating to “honour killings of women” envisaged in those articles.

141. Decree-Law No. 10 of 2014 expressly prohibits perpetrators of “honour killings” from benefiting from the mitigating circumstances envisaged under article 98 of the 1960 Criminal Code, while Decree-Law No. 5 of 2018 states that article 99, which also envisages mitigating circumstances, is not applicable in cases involving offences against women and children.

Article 7

Prohibition of torture in existing legislation

142. Torture and cruel treatment are prohibited under article 13 of the amended Basic Law which states: “(a) No one may be subjected to coercion or torture. Accused persons and others who are deprived of their liberty are to be treated correctly; (b) Any statement or confession given in violation of the provisions of the preceding paragraph is invalid.”

143. Article 208 of the Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960), which concerns the extraction of statements and information, states that anyone who subjects a person to any form of violence or force that is inadmissible by law, in order to extract a confession or information relating to an offence, is liable to a term of imprisonment of between 3 months and 3 years, unless the actions committed attract a harsher penalty.

144. Article 109 (b) of the Mandate-era Criminal Code also addresses the issue of acts of violence by public officials. According to that provision, any public official who subjects a person to force or violence or who orders them to be so subjected, for the purposes of extracting – either from the person concerned or from someone close to them – a confession or information relating to an offence, is considered to have committed a crime.

145. According to article 280 of the Revolutionary Criminal Code of 1979: “Anyone who subjects a person to any kind of force that is inadmissible by law, in order to extract a confession or information relating to an offence, or who orders such force to be used, shall be liable to a term of imprisonment of not less than 3 months. Where such acts of violence lead to illness or injury, the term of imprisonment shall be not less than 6 months. Where torture leads to a person’s death, the perpetrator shall be liable to a term of imprisonment with hard labour of not less than 5 years.”

146. Article 37 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act prohibits torture or the use of force against inmates and states that inmates are not to be addressed using obscene or degrading language.

147. Under article 7 of the Decree-Law of 2016 concerning the protection of juveniles, it is prohibited to subject juveniles to physical or mental torture, or to punishment or treatment that is cruel, degrading or demeaning to human dignity.

148. The draft Palestinian criminal code includes the following definition of torture, which is consistent with the Convention against Torture: “Any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for the purpose of obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.”

Accountability of law enforcement officials

149. With regard to disciplinary sanctions, the Palestinian Security Forces Service Act envisages penalties for anyone who violates their duty, while Decree No. 192 of 2009 of the Minister of the Interior underscores the need to hold law enforcement officials accountable for any violations of discipline. In the light of those provisions, the handbook of disciplinary violations for members of the Palestinian Security Forces considers abuse, torture or ill-treatment as first-degree violations which are liable to be penalized by dismissal from service. The Public Prosecutor, as the overall supervisor of the actions of law enforcement officials, holds full powers to pursue disciplinary action.

150. As concerns criminal sanctions, the Office of the Public Prosecution and the Office of the Military Prosecutor are – under the aforementioned laws – responsible for collecting evidence, carrying out inquiries, bringing charges and conducting the prosecution in cases involving torture and ill-treatment.

151. As concerns civil sanctions, the civil courts consider claims for compensation in accordance with general provisions and rules set forth in the Civil Torts Act No. 36 of 1944. Persons pursuing a civil suit also have the right to attach their claim to the criminal case, and the two are then considered together before the criminal court.

Inadmissibility of confessions obtained by torture

152. According to article 13 of the amended Basic Law, any statement or confession obtained via coercion or torture is invalid. Under article 214 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, in order for a confession to be valid, it must have been made freely and voluntarily, without pressure, physical or moral coercion, inducement or promise. Moreover, the confession must be consistent with the facts and it must constitute a clear and unequivocal acknowledgment of having committed the offence.

Oversight and complaints mechanisms

153. On the subject of oversight mechanisms, article 128 of the Code of Criminal Procedure stipulates the obligation to report the presence of any inmates who are being unlawfully detained. At the same time, article 6 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act states that inmates must necessarily be admitted to and released from prison under a legal warrant. In order to reinforce that provision, articles 10–12 of the same Act confer the power to inspect correctional and rehabilitation centres on the following authorities, each within its own mandate: the Minister of Justice and the Minister of the Interior or their deputies; heads of governorates; the Public Prosecutor and deputy prosecutors; and judges of the Supreme Court and of central courts. Moreover, the Independent Commission for Human Rights, as well as international and local civil society institutions, also play a role in ensuring effective oversight by making visits and receiving and following up on complaints.

154. Since the State of Palestine acceded to the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, the authorities have worked to establish a national torture prevention mechanism. The United Nations Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture had been supposed to make a field visit to the State of Palestine in April 2019, and Palestine had welcomed the initiative and provided the Subcommittee with information to facilitate its task; however, Israel, the occupying power, refused to grant entry visas to the members of the Subcommittee thereby preventing the visit from taking place.

155. As concerns complaints, article 127 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and article 18 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act both include provision for the right of inmates and detainees to file complaints. Such complaints are recorded in a special register so that they can be adequately followed up and addressed.

156. The structure of law enforcement agencies includes departments for handling complaints from inmates, each within its own area of jurisdiction. One of these is the human rights unit in the Office of the Public Prosecution and the Office of the Military Prosecutor, which takes steps to ensure that complaints are properly addressed. Those steps include:

- Referring the victim to a forensic doctor in order to get a medical report detailing any bodily injuries and the length of time the victim is incapacitated;
- Drafting crime scene investigation reports;
- Removing the person against whom the complaint is lodged from proximity to the inmate in order to protect the latter and ensuring that the preliminary investigation remains confidential;
- The Office of the Military Prosecutor refers the case to the competent court so that the accused person can be tried on charges of torture.

Compensation

157. Article 32 of the Basic Law, as amended, envisages the right to compensation for violations of public rights and freedoms. According to the Code of Criminal Procedure, persons who have suffered harm as a consequence of a crime or violation against them may file a civil case in pursuit of just compensation. The relevant provision is contained in article 194 (1), which states: "Anyone who has suffered harm as a consequence of an offence may submit a request to the prosecutor or to the court that is examining the case expressly invoking their civil right to compensation for the harm suffered as a result of the crime."

158. Under article 94 of the Palestinian Security Forces Service Act No. 8 of 2005, an officer who violates instructions shall bear any consequent civil liability. Such violations may include the infliction of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment. In the same way, article 173 of the Act addresses offences committed by non-commissioned officers and enlisted personnel of the security services.

Inmates condemned to death

159. Under current legislation, and specifically under article (59 (1) and (2) of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act, inmates facing death sentences are placed under round-the-clock surveillance, while the Public Prosecutor or his representatives, religious figures and the prison doctor can visit the inmate at any time.

Operational rules for law enforcement personnel

160. Codes of conduct, which govern working standards and ethics, expressly prohibit the use of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. These codes include the following: the code of conduct for judges, the code of conduct for members of the Office of the Public Prosecution, the code of conduct and ethics for police officers; the code of conduct for civil defence personnel; the code of conduct for members of the preventive security service; the code of professional conduct and ethics for members of the intelligence services, the handbook of disciplinary violations for members of the Palestinian security forces; the code of conduct concerning the use of force and firearms by members of the security forces; the code of ethics and conduct for members of the security forces; the procedural guide for health services; and the procedural guide for complaints units in the security services.

161. On 13 September 2009, the President of the State of Palestine issued instructions – which were circulated to the heads of all security agencies – to cease any form of torture or other practices harmful to human rights and dignity. On 14 May 2013, the President issued further instructions addressed to all agencies with powers to arrest, detain or conduct investigations, stressing the need to comply with laws prohibiting torture and to respect international treaties.

162. The Minister of the Interior has issued a number of decrees in this connection. Decree No. 149 of 2009 concerns compliance by the security services with rules and standards for treating detainees and precludes physical or psychological punishment of any kind or any form of torture against persons deprived of liberty. Decree No. 192 issued by the Minister of the Interior on 1 December 2009 concerns disciplinary offences committed by members of the Palestinian security forces that involve harming, torturing or ill-treating others in violation of humanitarian values and legislation in force. First-degree violations are punishable by the administrative penalty of separation from service. A further decree in 2017 envisaged the formation of a team to monitor the human rights obligations of the Minister of the Interior.

163. Circular No. 6 of 2010, issued by the Director-General of the Palestinian police, prohibits the use of violence, torture or any other form of cruel or degrading treatment when dealing with citizens. In addition, several circulars issued by the general intelligence services contain instructions to staff to comply with the standards enshrined in the Convention against Torture and to observe all relevant laws. Circulars issued to members of the preventive security service also underscore the importance of abiding by legal procedures relating to summons, arrest, search, seizure and the taking of statements, as well as the need to take steps to ensure that summoned, arrested or detained persons are not subjected to ill-treatment.

Training

164. The Ministry of the Interior conducts ongoing human rights training for all members of the security forces, including awareness-raising about obligations stemming from the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the Optional Protocol to the Convention.

165. Palestinian security agencies have held 416 training courses, lectures and workshops on a range of human rights issues, including torture, dealing with children and women victims of violence, psychosocial counselling, family protection, categorization of inmates and relevant laws.

166. In 2017, the Ministry of the Interior and An-Najah National University signed a memorandum of understanding regarding academic qualifications for staff of the Ministry of the Interior, the security forces, the Ministry of Justice, the department of forensic medicine and the military medical services. The aim was to raise awareness about the Convention against Torture and to adopt the Istanbul Protocol as a training model with a view to establishing, on the basis of those criteria, a national team specializing in anti-torture issues.

167. In 2018, the Ministry of the Interior signed a cooperation agreement with the Muwatin Institute at Birzeit University for the development of a training curriculum on human rights issues, with the title: "A guide to human rights and democracy for security forces and State institutions". The agreement also envisaged training for staff of the Ministry of the Interior and security forces on how to draft human rights training manuals.

Prohibition on the extradition, deportation, expulsion or forced removal of any person

168. Under article 7 of the Extradition Act of 1927, in force in the West Bank, and article 6 of the Extradition Act of 1926, in force in the Gaza Strip, a fugitive criminal is not to be extradited if the crime in questions is political in nature. The extradition of fugitive criminals in cases where they might be liable to be tortured is not prohibited under either Act. Extradition is also addressed in the 2005 General Intelligence Services Act, which states that provisions regarding persons accused of extraditable offences contained in treaties between the State of Palestine and other States must be observed in a manner that is not at variance with the law.

Combating torture at the international level

169. The accession of the State of Palestine to the Convention against Torture, without reservations, particularly as concerns the jurisdiction of the Committee against Torture under article 20 of the Convention, is an expression of the State's political will to ban torture and of its engagement in the efforts of the international community to that end. In 2017, the accession of the State of Palestine to the Optional Protocol to the Convention was a further qualitative step and preventive measure aimed at banning torture and ill-treatment. Under a decree of the Council of Ministers on 19 August 2019, a national anti-torture preventive mechanism was set up in the State of Palestine as an independent body.

170. In January 2015, the State of Palestine, acting pursuant to article 12 (3) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, deposited a declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the Court to consider, with retroactive effect, crimes committed since 13 June 2014. The State of Palestine then deposited its instrument of accession to the Rome Statute, which thus entered into effect.

171. In addition to this, the State of Palestine joined the International Criminal Police Organization (INTERPOL) in 2017, after which it set up its INTERPOL National Central Bureau, which has been properly equipped to carry out its duties and staffed with experienced police officers.

Correctional methods in schools

172. Article 4 (15) of the Decree-Law on Public Education of 2017 states: “It is prohibited to use violence as a means of discipline. All students are entitled to protection.” In addition to this, the Ministry of Education and Higher Education has, since 2013, embraced a policy to reduce violence and promote discipline in State-run and private schools, which is applicable in all governorates and is part of a strategy to improve the quality of education and to create a safe and violence-free school environment. The strategy includes activities that are intended to consolidate the use of the policy among education-sector workers as a key reference with which to address issues related to school violence. The activities focus on capacity-building, establishing a system for referring cases of violence from schools to the competent institutions, improving the school environment and setting up educational guidance centres in schools exposed to the violence and violations of the Israeli occupation. A competition of creative innovations for fostering a safe school environment and curbing violence has been launched in some schools, and a training guide has been produced on how to deal with gender-based violence in schools.

173. Female circumcision is not prevalent in the State of Palestine.

Experimentation on human beings

174. The Basic Law, as amended, forbids experimentation on human subjects without the consent of the individual concerned. The relevant provision is contained in article 16, which reads: “It is unlawful to conduct any medical or scientific experiment on any person without prior legal consent.” Moreover, article 60 of Public Health Act No. 20 of 2004 stipulates that sick persons have the right to receive a clear explanation of any proposed treatment, which they can consent to or refuse. They can also accept or refuse to participate in any research or training being conducted by the health-care institution.

Torture practised by Israel, the occupying power, against Palestinians

175. Israel, the occupying power, perpetrates various crimes of torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading practices against the Palestinian people, and particularly against Palestinian prisoners and detainees being held in the prisons of the Israeli occupation. In fact, Palestinian inmates in those prisons, especially children, face harsh and inhuman conditions and, as of July 2019, 220 of them had died as a consequence of torture, medical neglect or direct targeting.

176. The 1999 “ticking time-bomb” ruling of the Israeli Supreme Court ruling left the door wide open to the use of torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment against Palestinian prisoners, on the pretext of “necessity”. In fact, Israeli prison administrators and investigators exploit the Supreme Court’s ruling to use harsh and prohibited physical means of interrogation against Palestinian prisoners under the pretext of “the seriousness of the situation”. Moreover, such interrogations remain secret and are conducted in the absence of oversight by any external independent body.

177. In 2015 Israel, the occupying power, ratified a “force-feeding” law which allows for the forcible feeding of prisoners on hunger strike. In this way, the law provides an umbrella for the occupation authorities to use torture against hunger-striking prisoners and comes to constitute a form of subjecting individuals to medical experiments against their will.

178. The systematic Israeli policy of holding back the bodies of the dead is part of a broader policy of collective punishment used by the authorities against the Palestinian people. Indeed, the Israeli occupying authorities are still holding the bodies of 294 Palestinians, dating back as far as 1967, and are refusing to hand them over to their families for humane burial in accordance with their religious beliefs.

179. Since 2007, the Israeli occupation has been imposing an illegal blockade on the Gaza Strip during which time it has carried out measures contrary to international law, launched repeated attacks and inflicted collective punishment that continues to this day. Under its illegal blockade, Israel has made life in the Gaza Strip a form of physical and psychological torture.

180. The Israeli aggression against the occupied Gaza Strip in 2014 had devastating consequences at various levels: economic, social, political, material and human. During the course of its attack Israel, the occupying power, committed war crimes and crimes against humanity, including the killing of civilians, the destruction of civilian property and the use of prohibited weapons. One of these was white phosphorus, which indiscriminately caused burns, disfigurements and permanent disabilities to hundreds of Palestinian civilians in the Gaza Strip. The attack and the associated collective punishments against the human rights of Palestinians in the Gaza Strip have given rise to harsh living conditions and filled life there with pain and suffering.

Article 8

181. Under the 2015 Decree-Law on combating money-laundering and the financing of terrorism, as amended, all monies obtained from human trafficking or the sexual exploitation of women and children are considered to be illegal assets and to constitute grounds for the offence of money-laundering, with offenders being liable to imprisonment and a fine.

182. Under the heading “Incitement to debauchery and undermining public ethics and morals”, articles 310–312 of the 1960 Criminal Code envisage penalties of up to 3 years’ imprisonment for anyone who has leads or attempts to lead a female aged under 20 into prostitution, or a person under the age of 15 into an act of sodomy, or who uses threats, intimidation, deception or narcotics to induce a female into an act of illicit intercourse. In addition, anyone who furnishes, rents or purchases a location to use for purposes of prostitution or who participates in the use of a location as a brothel is liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 6 months and/or a fine.

183. In order to promote its commitment to combat human trafficking, the State of Palestine has set up a national team with representatives from competent institutions to work on a draft law on human trafficking. The new law includes a definition of trafficking and envisages condign penalties, which become more severe if the victim is a child, lacks competency or is a person with a disability. The draft law also envisages the formation of a national committee with the task of developing a comprehensive national strategy to combat human trafficking, establishing a database, drafting reports, setting up mechanisms and providing support and protection for victims.

184. For its part, the draft criminal code contemplates two offences: human trafficking and enslavement. Enslavement means: “The exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership over a person, including the exercise of such power in the course of trafficking in persons, in particular women and children.”

185. The Ministry of Social Development runs several programmes to provide services to female victims of violence, including one for the protection and social rehabilitation of female victims of exploitation and trafficking. The State of Palestine is continuing to develop anti-human-trafficking mechanisms, in which regard a database is being compiled wherewith to monitor and document trafficking offences. At the same time, a series of training and capacity-building programmes has been rolled out to help develop human resources in this field.

186. Thanks to the control it exercises over the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including Jerusalem, its fragmentation of Palestinian geographical unity using all possible means and the permanent obstacles it places on Palestinians’ freedom of movement, Israel, the occupying power, has hampered the efforts of the competent Palestinian authorities to combat human trafficking.

187. The State of Palestine acceded to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, in 2017. In addition, also in 2017, it acceded to the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and to the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. In 2018, it acceded to the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery. Moreover, the State of Palestine is a party to the 1904 International Agreement for the Suppression of the White Slave Traffic and the 1921 International Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, while in 2013 it ratified the Arab Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and joined the Arab Network to Combat Human Trafficking.

Prohibition of forced and compulsory labour

188. The amended Basic Law and applicable labour laws prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labour or exploitation of workers. According to article 25 of the Basic Law, work is the right of every citizen and labour relations are to be regulated in such a way as to ensure justice for all. The Law also envisages welfare, insurance and health and social care for workers.

189. The Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000) also states that work is the right of every citizen capable of performing it, on the basis of equality of opportunity and without discrimination of any kind. The Code includes legal safeguards for the protection of workers, such as terms and conditions of employment, working hours, wages, holidays, vocational health and safety requirements, insurance against workplace injuries and conditions for the employment of minors and women.

190. A labour inspectorate has been set up in the Ministry of Labour to monitor workplaces and thus protect workers and harmonize working conditions. The inspectorate has judicial oversight powers and can receive complaints and impose sanctions under the law.

191. The Ministry of Labour oversees contracts for domestic workers, and the Minister of Labour has issued a decree to regulate domestic work in such a way as to guarantee the rights of persons who operate in that sector while increasing penalties for employers who violate the law.

192. The results of a workforce survey conducted by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics in 2019 show that 30 per cent of salaried employees in the private sector in the State of Palestine earn a monthly wage that is less than the minimum wage (1,450 shekels). The proportion of salaried employees earning less than the minimum monthly wage in the West Bank fell from 12 per cent to 10 per cent between 2018 and 2019, while it rose from 72 per cent to 80 per cent in the Gaza Strip, over the same period.

193. With regard to the enforcement of sentences of hard labour, which is one of the penalties envisaged in the current Criminal Code, the courts do hand down sentences to that effect; however, the sentence is applied as one of imprisonment without hard labour. This is because Palestinian correctional and rehabilitation institutions do not impose hard labour as a punitive measure.

194. Under article 399 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, anyone who has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment of up to 3 months is entitled to make a request to the Office of the Public Prosecution to serve that sentence outside a correctional and rehabilitation institution centre, as an alternative to deprivation of liberty, unless the sentence expressly excludes that option.

Article 9

195. Current domestic legislation guarantees individuals the enjoyment of freedom and personal security, which cannot be infringed except by law. In that connect, article 11 of the amended Basic Law stipulates: "Personal freedom is a natural right that is guaranteed and may not be infringed. No one may be arrested, searched or detained, have their freedom or freedom of movement restricted in any way except by a court order issued in accordance with the law. The duration of pretrial detention is determined by law and no one can be detained or imprisoned except in places subject to the laws regulating prisons.”

196. Article 29 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act No. 3 of 2001) states: “No person may be arrested or imprisoned except by order of the authority competent to do so by law. Such persons must be treated in a manner that preserves their dignity and may not be physically or morally harmed.”

197. Article 12 of the Basic Law, as amended reads: “Persons who have been arrested or detained are to be informed of the reasons for their arrest or detention. They are to be promptly informed, in a language they understand, of the nature of the charges against them. They have the right to contact a lawyer and to be tried before a court without delay.” Summonses and arrest warrants are to be signed and stamped by the competent authority and are to include the name, description and surname of the accused persons, the offences of which they stand accused and the articles under which they are being charged, their full address and the duration of detention, if any. The enforcing official must show the warrant to the persons being arrested and inform them of its contents (arts. 110 and 112 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

198. Accused persons have the right to postpone their questioning for 24 hours until their lawyer can be present. However, in cases of flagrante delicto, necessity or where prompt action is required for fear of losing evidence, prosecutors can proceed with the questioning before the lawyer is present. Following the interrogation, the lawyer then has the right to examine any statements made by the accused (arts. 97 and 98 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

199. Articles 3 (3) and 8 of the Crime Prevention Act No. 7 of 1954, which is in force in the West Bank, and articles 3 (8) and 8 of the Crime Prevention Act No. 48 of 1933, which is in force in the Gaza Strip, grant the administrative authority (the governor) powers of arrest in special cases, when necessary as an administrative measure in order to ensure public security and order. However, the governor may exercise this power only against persons whose presence at large poses a menace to the public and only in cases where those persons refuse to make a pledge of good conduct, a pledge that can be backed by a financial surety. Thus, this power may be exercised against persons in circumstances that indicate they are on the verge of committing an offence, habitual offenders or persons who pose a menace to the public if they remain at large without some form of financial surety.

Duration of custody and detention

200. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure, law enforcement officials are required to bring arrested persons, if they have not been released, before the competent prosecutor within 24 hours. Once the director of a detention centre has delivered an accused person to the Office of the Public Prosecution, the interrogation must take place within 24 hours, after which prosecutors must order either the detention in custody or release of the person concerned.

201. Following the interrogation, prosecutors may hold an accused person for 48 hours. That period may then be extended by the courts in accordance with the law. In other words, an arrested person may not be held for more than 48 hours before appearing before a judge, who is entitled to extend the detention for a period of up to 15 days or order the release of the person concerned having first heard his or her statement. Custody may be renewed for further periods up to an overall total of 45 days.

202. No one may be held in custody for more than 45 days unless a request is submitted to the court of first instance by the Public Prosecutor or one of his deputies. In such a case, the further period of detention may not exceed an additional 45 days. Before the end of that 3-month period, the Office of the Public Prosecution must bring the accused person before the competent court for trial, with the period of detention then being extended until the end of the trial. In no case may the overall period of detention be in excess of 6 months. This means that the sum total of all the periods of pretrial detention must not exceed 6 months, calculated from the first day of the arrest and detention of the accused person. Otherwise, the person concerned must be released immediately unless he or she is referred to the competent court for trial. In no case, may custody continue for a period longer than the penalty prescribed for the offence for which the person was arrested. If the courts issue a ruling that an accused person is to be released, that release must be effected immediately, unless the individual concerned is imprisoned or detained for another reason. The period spent in detention is to be calculated as part of the sentence if the person concerned is convicted and sent to prison.

203. Although the question of pretrial detention is regulated in the Code of Criminal Procedure, the procedures and safeguards are left to the judge's discretionary authority. In particular, it is up to the judge to decide to extend custody after having heard statements from the Office of the Public Prosecution and the accused person, which may sometimes lead to an extension of the period of detention. Furthermore, the law does not specify a time limit for the trial but simply states that the proceedings are to begin within six months of the arrest. This explains the increase in the number of detainees who are still under trial.

204. The Ministry of the Interior has produced statistics concerning the number of detainees and convicted persons in institutions that are subject to the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act.

205. Articles 62 and 63 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act prescribe disciplinary penalties that can be imposed against inmates. Those penalties are: a caution, solitary confinement for up to 1 week or the withdrawal of certain benefits envisaged for the class of inmates concerned for a period of up to 30 days. Disciplinary sanctions may be imposed on the inmate only after an investigation and after taking the statement of the inmate and considering his defence. The grounds for the penalty must be made explicit and recorded in the register.

206. Under a 2012 decree of the Minister of the Interior, a criminal fingerprint register has been developed for use by the police. It serves to record and archive fingerprints and other information from suspects, convicted persons, detainees and inmates in correctional and rehabilitation institutions and detention centres, as well as fingerprints and other related evidence found at crime scenes by police experts.

Oversight

207. As noted earlier, domestic laws grant a number of different bodies the authority to supervise detention centres. As a way of ensuring that no one can be illegally detained, the law also includes provision for registers wherein to record admissions and releases.

208. Article 178 and 179 of the 1960 Criminal Code prescribe penalties for unlawful arrest or imprisonment. The relevant passage states: “Any official who detains or imprisons someone in a manner other than that prescribed by law is liable to a term of imprisonment of between 3 months and 1 year.” Moreover: “If the directors or guards of prisons, disciplinary institutions and correctional centres, or any official vested with their powers, admit a person without a warrant or order from the courts, or detain a person for longer than the decreed period, are liable to a term of imprisonment of between 1 month and 1 year.”

209. According to article 180 of the Code, the aforementioned officials, officers and enlisted personnel of the police and the gendarmerie and administrative officials who refuse to bring or delay bringing a detainee or a prison inmate before a competent court or judge, when asked to do so, are liable to a term of imprisonment of up to 6 months and to payment of a fine of up to 50 dinars.

210. Article 33 (3) of Ordinary Courts Act No. 5 of 2001 provides that the Supreme Court of Justice has jurisdiction to consider applications challenging imprisonment and requesting the release of unlawfully detained persons. According to article 34 (3) and (4) of the Act, applications and appeals before the Supreme Court of Justice by individuals and bodies must be brought on grounds of violation of law or regulations, of an error in the application or interpretation of law or regulations or of abuse of power, as set forth in law.

211. Article 131 of the Code of Criminal Procedure guarantees detained persons the right to apply for release on bail. It reads: “If the accused person has not been referred for trial, the application for release on bail is to be addressed to the judge authorized to issue the arrest warrant.” If the accused person has already been referred to the courts, then article 132 becomes applicable, which reads: “If the accused person has been referred for trial, the application for release on bail is to be addressed to the court competent to conduct the trial.”

212. Article 32 of the amended Basic Law guarantees fair compensation for persons who have suffered an abuse of their rights and freedoms, including unlawful arrest. This is reconfirmed under article 387 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which states: “A person acquitted following a retrial has the right to claim compensation from the State for damages arising from the earlier sentence.”

213. According to annual compilations of complaints, which are produced by the Council of Ministers, there were 43 complaints concerning illegal detention in 2015 of which 34 were addressed; there were 71 such complaints in 2016 of which 64 were addressed; and there were 107 complaints in 2017.

Detention in psychiatric hospitals

214. There are two psychiatric hospitals in the State of Palestine: Gaza Hospital and Bethlehem Hospital. Patients can admit themselves or they can be brought in by their family who request their admittance. The police can bring in persons in their custody whom they suspect of having a mental disorder for them to be assessed by the hospital. The courts can also refer convicted persons who suffer from mental conditions that require admittance to a psychiatric hospital rather than to a correctional and rehabilitation centre.

215. In the first three of the aforementioned cases, the person is admitted on the basis of an assessment by the doctor on duty, who can contact a consultant psychiatrist in case of need. Definitive admittance to the hospital depends upon the outcome of that assessment. Medical staff discuss and assess cases and, if they agree that a person should be admitted, the case is assigned to a specialized doctor for follow-up for a duration of between 7 and 30 days, unless the case is particularly serious in which case that period can be extended. Persons are detained in psychiatric hospitals against their will only in very severe cases. If they appeal against their admittance, an assessment of their mental condition is conducted before deciding whether or not they can leave the institution. However, appeals are not officially recorded and there are no official statistics on the number of such cases.

Arbitrary administrative detention practised by Israel, the occupying power

216. Arbitrary administrative detention by Israel, the occupying power, is part of a systematic and broad-ranging government policy and constitutes a form of collective punishment against Palestinians. In fact, the occupying authorities have detained around 1 million Palestinians since 1967, heedless of any international standards regulating the rights of detainees.

217. Jurisdiction to bring a detainee before the military courts lies with the so-called “military command” of the Israeli occupation. In April 2002 the delay was extended to 18 days, which is evidence of the arbitrary and unjustified detention of Palestinians by the Israeli occupation. The duration of arbitrary administrative detention can extend to up to 6 months, which may then be further extended unconditionally. Moreover, all cases of arbitrary administrative detention come before the military courts sitting in camera and, using flimsy pretexts, no defence lawyer is given the opportunity to examine documents or information pertaining to the case. Moreover, of course, the public are not allowed to attend. Thus detainees are deprived of their right to a fair and public trial.

218. Israel, the illegal occupying power, uses unjust laws to arrest thousands of Palestinians arbitrarily. The unjust Israeli military laws that underpin administrative detention orders go back to the Emergency Act of 1945, which dates from the Mandate era. In fact, Palestinians suffer arbitrary administrative detention in the Occupied Palestinian Territory under three different legal systems: in the West Bank, Palestinians are detained under Military Decree No. 1651; in Jerusalem, they are detained under the Emergency Powers (Detention) Act of 1979, under which the Minister of Defence is authorized to issued orders for arbitrary administrative detention in state of emergency; and in the Gaza Strip, they are detained under the 2002 Incarceration of Unlawful Combatants Act.

Article 10

219. The legal system regulating prison conditions envisages rights and principles to ensure humane treatment and respect for the dignity of persons deprived of their liberty. Notably, article 13 (1) of the amended Basic Law requires that accused persons and others who are deprived of their liberty be treated correctly. In addition, article 29 of the Code of Criminal Procedure states that persons who have been arrested are to be treated in a manner that preserves their dignity and they may not be physically or morally harmed. For its part, article 37 (2) and (3) of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act prohibits torture or the use of force against inmates. It also states that inmates are not to be addressed using obscene or degrading language. The Decree-Law concerning the protection of juveniles represents an important step by the State of Palestine towards achieving consistency with the standards enshrined in international human rights treaties, particularly as it has adopted the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice. As part of its international obligations, the State of Palestine is reviewing laws and regulations that have a bearing on conditions of detention and deprivation of liberty, in order ensure that they comply with human rights standards.

220. The Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act includes a body of legal principles, safeguards and inmates' rights. They include:

- Prohibiting torture or the use of force against inmates (art. 37);
- Leaving inmates free to practise religious rituals and obligations (art. 37);
- The inspection of detention centres and the appointment of inspectors and social workers (sec. 4);
- The right to health care and medical services (sec. 5);
- Education for inmates (sec. 9);
- Training and employment for inmates (sec. 12);
- Visits and communication with the outside world (sec. 15).

221. The administration of correctional and rehabilitation centres is underpinned by a structure wherein tasks, responsibilities and specialized departments are all clearly defined; at the same time, administrators of security agencies have adopted codes of conduct and circulars to regulate the actions of their staff and to ensure that inmates are well treated. Implementing regulations have been drafted for the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act, and a guide to operational procedures has been produced for the legal units of the Palestinian security services as well as a consolidated operational manual for the delivery of health services in correctional and rehabilitation centres. In partnership with civil society institutions, a list of rights of detained persons has been drawn up and circulated to all places of deprivation of liberty.

222. Correctional and rehabilitation centres

Detention facilities in the West Bank are divided into three categories depending upon duration of detention and on the authority to which they are affiliated:

- Permanent detention centres: These are subject to the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act and are answerable to the General Directorate of Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres;
- Temporary detention centres (police custody): Arrested persons are subject to the Code of Criminal Procedure; detention lasts no more than 24 hours and is overseen by the Directorate General of Police;
- Detention facilities affiliated with the security services: These facilities are linked to the security agencies in the West Bank – Preventive Security, General Intelligence and Military Intelligence – and each is supervised by the administrators of the agency concerned. Military detainees are detained under warrants issued by the military prosecutor of Military Intelligence, and detention can be extended in accordance with the 1979 Revolutionary Code so that the detainees can then be brought before the military courts.

Correctional and rehabilitation centres in the Gaza Strip

A number of detention facilities have been opened in the governorates of the Gaza Strip to alleviate overcrowding in the main facility. These facilities are as follows:

- The Southern District correctional and rehabilitation centre located in the governorate of Khan Yunus, where prisoners from the southern governorates of the Gaza Strip (Rafah and Khan Yunus) are held;
- The Central District correctional and rehabilitation centre located in the governorate of Dayr al-Balah, where prisoners from that governorate are held;
- The North Gaza correctional and rehabilitation centre located in the town of Bayt Lahiya in the governorate of North Gaza, where prisoners from that governorate (Jabaliyah, Bayt Lahiya and Bayt Hanun) are held.

223. Oversight mechanisms

- The Code of Criminal Procedure and the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act both grant inmates the right to lodge complaints;
- The oversight and inspection unit of the Department for Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres undertakes periodic visits to monitor fulfilment of obligations vis-à-vis inmates' rights;
- The Military Prosecutor has instructed staff of the Office of the Military Prosecution to inspect military-run detention centres;
- Medical oversight is performed by military medical services;
- Several memorandums of understanding have been signed between the Ministry of the Interior, the Independent Commission for Human Rights and local and international civil society institutions, under which those bodies are allowed to visit and inspect places of deprivation of liberty, examine conditions and conduct interviews with inmates.

225. The question of juveniles is addressed in the reply to article 24.

Disciplinary system

226. Under law and practice, disciplinary sanctions are limited to three types: a caution, solitary confinement for up to 1 week or the withdrawal of certain benefits envisaged for the class of inmates concerned for a period of up to 30 days. Inmates have the right to challenge any sanctions. Statistics concerning disciplinary sanctions imposed in correctional and rehabilitation centres in 2015 and 2016 are shown in the table below.

Classification of inmates

227. The classification of inmates is dealt with under articles 24 and 25 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act. Male inmates are held separately from female inmates while juveniles are placed in special centres. Inside the facility, inmates of both sexes are classified and distributed in separate sections: detainees, inmates being held in civil cases such as debt and maintenance payments, inmates with no previous convictions and inmates with previous convictions. Inmates facing sentences of death are kept separately and placed under constant supervision.

228. With a view to improving infrastructure, the Department for Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres developed a strategic plan 2014–2016 to build model correctional and rehabilitation structures in a number of governorates. The plan aims to respond to the needs of inmates, improve their living conditions and ensure that each individual has at least four square metres of space within dormitories. It also envisages the expansion of special sections and outside courtyards in new facilities, with areas set aside for services such as gyms, libraries, workshops, etc.

Health services

229. Military medical services, which are part of the military establishment, are responsible for the provision of medical care in correctional and rehabilitation centres. Inmates undergo a full medical examination within 24 hours of being admitted to a facility and before being released, with the results being recorded in their medical file. If the examination reveals any outward signs indicating that the inmate might have been tortured, the doctor complies a detailed medical report on the state of health of the individual concerned, and the director of the facility is informed so that the necessary legal steps can be taken. If an inmate refuses to submit to a medical exam, the doctor is to record that refusal in the official register.

230. Some correction and rehabilitation centres continue to suffer from a shortage of medical clinics, as well as a lack of permanent doctors or nurses, and most do not have a dentist or a psychiatrist. This means that the prison administration is sometimes forced to take patients to government hospitals.

231. Medical visits and services (by number of inmates referred for treatment) are as follows:

Psychological guidance

232. The department for social welfare and psychological guidance, which is part of the Department for Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres runs specialized programmes to examine the social conditions of inmates and, in cooperation with the Ministry of Social Development and civil society institutions, it gives inmates access to psychiatrists and social workers. If necessary, cases are duly referred to psychiatric hospitals outside the correctional and rehabilitation centres.

233. The following statistics were compiled by the Ministry of the Interior regarding periodic visits by counsellors and social workers to correctional and rehabilitation centres where they provide psychosocial support, hold lectures, run psychological release sessions and social interventions, conduct interviews and perform various other activities.

Rehabilitation

234. Working with the competent ministries, the Department for Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres is preparing rehabilitative plans and programmes to improve conditions for inmates and to raise their levels of education and culture. To that end, it also runs literacy courses. The table below shows the number of adult inmates who have received education in correctional and rehabilitation centres run by the Directorate General of Police.

Programme	Literacy	Parallel education (intermediary level)	General secondary
2015	73	25	22
2016	64	23	5
2017	36	17	12

235. Article 41 of the Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres Act stipulates that inmates are to acquire a vocation or skill and to be given vocational training while serving their sentence in order to help them earn a living following their release. In fact, the Department for Correctional and Rehabilitation Centres provides many inmates with training in areas such as food preparation, shoemaking, photography, design, hairdressing, embroidery and other skills. In 2015, a total of 97 inmates in different centres benefited from these training programmes, and 69 in 2016.

Homes for older persons

236. The “Beit al-Ajdad” centre, administered by the Ministry of Social Development, is the only government-run centre of its kind. It provides care and protection for older persons who have no one to look after them and it provides basic life services and health care in an appropriate psychosocial and environmental setting. The Ministry of Social Development has developed a national strategic plan for the care of older persons 2016–2020.

Palestinian prisoners in the jails of the Israeli occupation

237. The Israel Prison Service continues to strip Palestinian prisoners and detainees of their fundamental rights, with hundreds of them still denied the right to receive family visits and the right to education and health. Moreover, they are subjected to various forms of torture and to practices that constitute a violation of the right to humane treatment, such as being transferred from one prison to another or to the courts on long journeys in conditions that give rise to suffering and pain in a vehicle known as the “bosta”.

238. From 1967 to July 2019, a total of 220 Palestinian prisoners died in the prisons of the Israeli occupiers. Of that number, 75 were murdered, 7 were shot inside prisons, 65 died as a result of deliberate medical negligence (a form of torture and maltreatment that is practised broadly and systematically by Israel against Palestinian prisoners) while 73 died under direct torture.

239. In 2018, more than 1,800 prisoners in Israeli prisons, or about a quarter of the total, were ill. This included at least 26 who were suffering from cancer and at least 80 with some kind of disability (physical, psychological or sensory). Others were suffering from serious and chronic conditions or from gunshot wounds inflicted by the occupiers. All these individuals are experiencing wretched conditions as a consequence of deliberate medical neglect, severe torture, ill-treatment and inattention, all of which serves to worsen their state of health.

240. Palestinian female prisoners in the jails of the Israeli occupation also suffer difficult health conditions as a consequence of the policy of medical negligence. This includes being denied medication or being given out-of-date medicines, as well as being deprived of necessary surgical procedures. They lack access to gynaecological care, which is especially problematic for those who were pregnant when detained. They are forced to give birth with their hands bound, regardless of the pain they endure in labour and childbirth.

241. Arbitrary solitary confinement is one of the harshest random punishments inflicted against Palestinian detainees by administrators of the jails of the Israeli occupation. The individual concerned is detained alone for long periods in a cramped, dark and dirty cell that lacks the minimum requirements for a humane and dignified life, giving rise to serious health complications.

242. Enforcement Act No. 23 of 2005 regulates the procedures surrounding the settlement and implementation of court rulings concerning financial obligations, including contractual debts. Under articles 155 and 156 of the Act, debtors – once they have been duly informed – must refer to the enforcement department to propose a settlement for the debt they have been ordered to pay, in a manner that is consistent with their financial capacities. If debtors fail to propose an appropriate settlement, the enforcing judge can – as a last resort and at the request of the creditors – order the imprisonment of debtors in the following cases: if the debtors refuse or neglect to pay their debt even though they possess sufficient assets to do so; if the debtors have surrendered part of their assets to a third party or concealed them in order to prevent the creditors from receiving their due; or if it is apparent that the debtors intend to flee without settling the debt they have been ordered to pay.

243. The judge can order imprisonment for a term of not more than 91 days a year, in a single case of unpaid debt, and the term of imprisonment may not exceed 21 days if the sum in question is no greater than 500 Jordanian dinars. The order of imprisonment is revoked and the party concerned is released immediately once a settlement has been agreed or the debt has been settled. No order of imprisonment may be issued in cases of debts between spouses, antecedents and descendants, or persons with mental disorders.

Article 12

244. The Palestinian Nakbah of 1948 was a tremendous tragedy for the Palestinian people, a process of ethnic cleansing during which the Palestinian people suffered destruction and were expelled from their land to be replaced by others. Of the 1.4 million Palestinians who were living in historic Palestine in 1948, 800,000 were then driven from their villages and towns. According to UNRWA records, the number of registered Palestine refugees in 2018 was around 6 million; i.e., nearly half of all the Palestinians in the world.

245. In 1948 the United Nations adopted resolution 194, which affirmed the right of Palestinians displaced from their homes to return as soon as possible. However, in the face of United Nations resolutions and recommendations, Israel, the occupying power, violates Palestinians' right of return while, at the same time the racist Israeli Law of Return allows any Jew of any nationality to enter, live and settle.

246. During the war of 1967, Israel, the occupying power, invaded the rest of the Palestinian territory, forcibly displacing and deporting more than 200,000 Palestinians from their homeland.

247. Following the occupation of Palestinian territory in 1967, an identity card system was introduced under a military order issued by the Israeli occupiers. Under the system, all Palestinians then in the West Bank, including Jerusalem, and in the Gaza Strip, were required to obtain an identity card issued by Israel, the occupying power, as a condition for so-called “permanent residence”. In addition, the Israeli occupation authorities conducted a census of Palestinians to establish a new register of residents of the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

248. Israel, the occupying power, then imposed identity cards on the Palestinians who had been registered in that census, with distinct and discriminatory cards for each area: blue for Jerusalem, orange for the West Bank, red for the Gaza Strip. No Palestinian who was not present in the Occupied Palestinian Territory at the time was registered in this census, irrespective of whether the absence was a result of displacement or for any other reason. The occupiers do not recognize Palestinians who were not registered in the census, considering them to have lost their identity and their right to “reside” in their homeland.

249. Subsequently, the authorities of the Israeli military occupation imposed arbitrary decrees, procedures and conditions that have led to thousands of Palestinians having their identity cards withdrawn, thereby losing their status as “resident”. And in order to have the cards restored, they have to go through a complex process the outcome of which, in most cases, was negative.

250. Israel, the occupying power, through its control of the “population register”, monopolizes the residence files and the issuance of identity cards and permits so that no Palestinian passport can be issued unless linked to an identity card number in the register.

251. The consequence of all these colonialist policies, military decrees and arbitrary procedures has been to deprive hundreds of thousands of Palestinians of entry and residence in their own homeland.

Jerusalemites in their occupied city

252. Israel, the occupying power, distinguishes between Israelis and Palestinians in matters of citizenship, residence and civil status issues generally. Indeed, while Israelis receive full rights of permanent residence in occupied Jerusalem – a city that has been forcibly annexed in violation of international law – the Israeli occupiers force Palestinians, the original owners of the land, to carry permanent “residence” cards issued by the occupying authorities.

253. Palestinians can easily lose their right to return to Jerusalem if their “residence” is cancelled. In fact, under the guidelines of the occupying power, Palestinian Jerusalemites lose their right to “residence” if they reside in a foreign country for seven years, if they obtain residency in a foreign country or if they acquire a foreign nationality. Moreover, they lose their rights in any case if they are unable to prove that Jerusalem is their “centre of life”. Since 1967, the right of “residence” has been withdrawn from more than 14,500 Palestinians as part of what is clearly a discriminatory policy aimed at emptying occupied Jerusalem of its Palestinian population, forcibly deporting them and altering the city’s demographic character. Moreover, since 2003, the authorities of the Israeli occupation have placed a freeze on applications for family reunification, meaning that Palestinians in occupied Jerusalem or within the Green Line are forced to apply for reunification for their Palestinian husbands/wives in the West Bank or the Gaza Strip.

254. Israel, the occupying power, controls all Palestinian crossing points as well as land borders, airspace and territorial waters. It imposes restrictions on foreign trade and the movement of goods, and it restricts and hinders access to agricultural land and fishing zones. It also places harsh restrictions on the movement of Palestinians, not allowing them to travel without prior Israeli authorization as the West Bank, Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip remain separated.

255. The racist wall of annexation and expansion that was built by Israel, the occupying power, on occupied Palestinian land is one of the main bulwarks of the colonialist system of occupation, as well as being a blatant violation of international law, of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice and of Palestinians’ right of movement. Indeed, 80 per cent of the wall lies inside the borders of the West Bank in such a way as to fragment Palestinian territory even further. The wall of annexation and expansion has isolated more than 12 per cent of the area of the West Bank and has led to the imposition of restrictions on around 1.9 million people who live in areas near the structure and/or colonies. Palestinians thus isolated require a permit just to leave or return to their homes for purposes of work, study, medical treatment or accessing their farmland.

256. Israel, the occupying power, has instituted a system whereby it uses discriminatory permits to restrict movement, which it imposes on the basis of addresses on identity cards. Palestinians need Israeli permits to travel to and enter certain areas of the Occupied Palestinian Territory, such as occupied Jerusalem and the buffer zones between the wall and the Green Line, as well as travel permits to move between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The fact is, moreover, that the process of obtaining such permits is complex and almost impossible.

257. Israel, the occupying power, has severed the connecting tissue of Palestinian territory via a complex network of military checkpoints reinforced by military deployments across the West Bank. It has blocked access to main roads with a series of reinforced checkpoints made up of concrete blocks and steel doors. Between November 2014 and November 2016, OHCHR counted around 85 fixed checkpoints in the West Bank.

258. The Karamah crossing is the only crossing point from the West Bank abroad. Since 1967 – under flimsy security-related pretexts and without a court order – tens of thousands of Palestinians have been arbitrarily denied the right to travel. Between 2014 and 2017, a total of 8,874 people were turned back from crossing points and prevented from travelling by the Israeli occupation authorities, while in 2015, 83,895 persons were prohibited from travelling under a prior decree issued by the occupying power, according to statistics from the Authority for Civil Affairs.

259. By imposing an illegal blockade on the Gaza Strip since 2007, Israel, the occupying power, is implementing a policy of collective punishment against 2 million Palestinians. The blockade has made it almost impossible to leave the Gaza Strip as exit permits are rejected even when presented on medical or humanitarian grounds. The occupying authorities also restrict access to Gaza by land and sea thereby hindering access to fundamental life necessities and exacerbating poverty and unemployment.

260. The Israeli attack against the Gaza Strip in 2014 led to the forced displacement of 65,000 persons. In addition to this, the Israeli policy of arbitrary administrative demolition of Palestinian homes constitutes one of the most important tools of indirect forced displacement. Since 2009, the Government of the Israeli occupation has doubled the use of its policy of destroying homes and facilities, as a means of collective punishment. In that connection, as of March 2019, 5,884 Palestinian homes and facilities in the West Bank, including Jerusalem, had been destroyed displacing 9,210 Palestinians and affecting the lives of a further 71,672.

261. Israel, the occupying power, has denied United Nations special rapporteurs entry into the Occupied Palestinian Territory, in contravention of the relevant recommendations of the Human Rights Council. In addition, the Israeli occupation authorities have a policy of curbing the international presence and limiting the ingress of foreigners and of staff of international organizations, while those who come from abroad to express their solidarity are arrested and deported from the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

Right of movement under Palestinian legislation

262. Article 20 of the amended Basic Law stipulates: “Freedom of residence and movement is guaranteed within the limits of the law.” Under article 11, no prohibition may be placed upon freedom of movement except by court order, in accordance with the law, while article 28 reads: “No Palestinian may be expelled from the homeland, prevented from returning or leaving, stripped of nationality or handed over to any foreign entity.”

263. The law places certain conditions upon the issuance of travel bans whereby the courts can issue travel bans in accordance with article 277 of the Code of Civil and Commercial Procedure if they are satisfied that a defendant intends to travel – without providing a financial surety – in order to evade a financial obligation.

264. According to article 11 of the General Intelligence Service Act, the head of the Service can ask the Public Prosecutor to issue a ban to prevent a foreigner from entering or leaving the country, or to prevent a citizen from travelling, for reasons related to national security.

Such decrees are subject to review by the Supreme Court of Justice. For example, in Case No. 234/2017 the Court overturned a decision by the Office of the Public Prosecution to prevent a citizen from travelling on the grounds that prosecutors did not provide the Court with any evidence, information or court order that explained why the ban had been applied. The Court thus upheld the provisions of the amended Basic Law.

265. Any citizen with an identity card number, irrespective of age, is entitled to a Palestinian passport valid for five years. If all supporting documentation is provided, the issuance of a regular passport takes one day. Information relating to the processing of passport applications, based on data from the Ministry of the Interior, is shown in the following table.

Year	Applications processed
2015	231 505
2016	246 949
2017 (up to April)	82 920

Article 13

266. As indicated above, as a consequence of the policies they pursue and their control over all crossing points, it is the authorities of the Israeli occupation who control entry, exit and deportation to and from the Occupied Palestinian Territory and thereby prevent the State of Palestine from accomplishing its duty to grant humanitarian or political asylum. The control it exercises also opens the way for Israel to practice forced deportation against foreigners.

Article 14

The judiciary

267. Article 97 of the Basic Law, as amended, stipulates: “Judicial authority is independent and is exercised by courts of different kinds and levels. The law determines how courts are to be formed and their jurisdiction, and they issue their rulings in accordance with the law. Sentences are pronounced and enforced in the name of the Palestinian Arab people.” Article 98 of the Basic Law reads: “Judges are independent and, in their administration of justice, are subject to no authority other than that of the law. No one may interfere with the administration of justice.”

268. The 2002 Judiciary Act regulates the appointment and employment of judicial personnel while the Supreme Court has the jurisdiction to consider any objections related to administrative matters affecting judges. For its part, article 16 of the Act states that, in order to exercise judicial authority, a person must possess full legal competence, hold a diploma in statutory or sharia law, not have been convicted for a breach of honour or trust, be of sound character and good reputation and terminate membership of any political party or political organization.

269. According to articles 47–55 of the same Act, the president of each court is to supervise the judges who work there, a task that also involves alerting them to any violations they might commit. If the violations persist, the Public Prosecutor can bring disciplinary proceedings before the Disciplinary Board, which is made up of the two most senior judges of the Supreme Court and the most senior judge of the Court of Appeal. If the Board is of the view that the proceedings need to be pursued, the offending judge is summoned to appear and is informed of the subject matter of the case and the evidence. The trial is conducted in camera unless the judge in question requests that it be held in public, and a decision is rendered after having heard the case for the prosecution and the judge’s own defence. The penalties at the Board’s disposal are a caution, a censure or dismissal. A ruling for dismissal does not affect the judge’s remuneration rights.

270. The work of lawyers is regulated by Act No. 3 of 1999 concerning the legal profession, which sets forth the conditions for registration in the register of lawyers practising statutory law. The Act also envisages the formation of the Bar Association and defines its objectives, membership conditions, the rights and duties of lawyers registered with the Association, regulations for the training of lawyers, disciplinary boards and the financial affairs of the Association.

The courts

271. The Palestinian judiciary is divided as follows: (a) The regular judiciary, which includes the various levels of criminal court (magistrates' courts, courts of first instance, appeal and cassation) and of civil court (magistrates' courts, courts of first instance, appeal and cassation); (b) Sharia courts (sharia and religious courts); (c) The Supreme Constitutional Court; (d) Special courts; (e) Military courts.

Special courts

272. The law provides for the possibility of creating specialized courts. These include electoral appeals courts; municipal courts; income tax appeal courts; first instance courts dealing with matters relating to customs and excise and anti-corruption courts.

Military courts

273. Under article 101 (2) of the amended Basic Law, military courts are to be established under special laws and have no mandate or jurisdiction beyond military matters. The military judiciary is an independent body that enforces the law against members of the Palestinian security forces who have committed offences. The structure of the system of military tribunals and their areas of jurisdiction are set forth in articles 119–123 of the Revolutionary Code of Criminal Procedure, which provide for a central military tribunal, a standing military tribunal, a military court of appeal, a special military tribunal and a military field court.

Customary courts

274. Article 114 of the amended Basic Law repealed all provisions then in force to govern states of emergency. As a consequence, there are no customary courts in the State of Palestine.

Religious courts

275. Under article 101 (1) of the amended Basic Law, sharia and religious courts deal with matters related to personal status. There are sharia courts for Muslims with three different levels: courts of first instance, appeal courts and the Supreme Sharia Court, the latter dealing exclusively with questions relating to the interpretation of the law. There are also ecclesiastical courts for Christians, which deal with personal status matters in accordance with the relevant laws of Christian religious communities.

Fair trial guarantees

276. Palestinian legislation – first and foremost the Declaration of Independence – envisages equality and non-discrimination under a constitution that guarantees the rule of law and an independent judiciary. In addition, the amended Basic Law, the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Judiciary Act all contain basic principles intended to ensure respect for fair trial standards. The most important of these are the right of recourse to a “natural judge”; the presumption of innocence; the right of arrested or detained persons to be promptly informed of the reasons for their arrest; the right to legal aid; the right to be tried before an independent, neutral and competent court; and the right to public trial and sentencing in criminal, civil and commercial courts, unless the court decides to hold proceedings in camera.

Legal aid

277. Article 14 of the amended Basic Law states: “Accused persons are innocent until proven guilty at a legal trial during which they have enjoyed the guarantees necessary for their defence. Persons accused of a major offence must have a lawyer to defend them.”

278. Legislators have taken action to ensure that accused persons are able to contact their lawyers at every stage of the trial. In that connection, articles 244–245 of the Code of Criminal Procedure state that, if an accused person does not appoint a defence lawyer the court shall, at its own expense, do so on that person's behalf.

279. A bill has been drafted for a legal aid fund, the purpose of which is to ensure that all categories of person have access to legal remedies. Under the bill, when questioning a person accused of a major offence or of a crime that attracts a term of imprisonment of more than 1 year, the Office of the Public Prosecution or the competent court must appoint a lawyer from the list of lawyers held by the fund, to represent and defend that accused person according to law.

Interpreters

280. The right of accused persons to avail themselves of the services of an interpreter during questioning and trial is enshrined in article 264 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as a supplementary right to the right to defence. Indeed, questioning takes place in Arabic and if any of the accused persons and/or witnesses do not speak that language, the president of the court is to appoint a licensed interpreter.

281. The appointment of a sign-language interpreter is regulated under articles 267 and 268, according to which, if the accused is a person with mutism or a person who is deaf or unable to write, the president of the court is to appoint an interpreter who is accustomed to addressing the accused person or persons with a similar condition, either by signs or by other technical means. However, if the accused is able to write, the court clerk is to transcribe the questions and comments and to show them to the accused who will then respond in writing. The clerk then reads out the replies before the court.

Trial without delay

282. Article 12 of the amended Basic Law stipulates that anyone who has been arrested or detained is to be brought to trial without delay. The time limits for completing the investigation and referring the accused before a competent court are set forth in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Trials in absentia

283. According to article 291 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a court can decide to try an accused person in absentia if that person fails to hand himself in once he has been duly informed and the period of grace has been published in the Official Gazette. Accused persons are not allowed to appoint a representative for a trial in absentia. According to article 296 of the Code, if the accused hands himself in or is arrested before the penalty handed down expires under the statute of limitations, the sentence and all the other proceedings are annulled as a matter of course and a retrial is held in accordance with normal procedures. Challenges against sentences handed down in absentia are addressed in articles 314–322 of the Code as one way to appeal against sentences. Persons convicted in absentia for less serious offences and misdemeanours can challenge the sentence within 10 days of being informed thereof. Challenges from civil claimants are not admitted.

Evidence and witnesses

284. Provisions relating to evidence are contained in articles 205–236 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Evidence in criminal proceedings can be established using all means of proof, unless the law states that specific means must be used. If the evidence does not indict the accused or is insufficient for a conviction, the court is to hand down an acquittal. Any sentence can be based only on evidence that was presented during the trial and that was discussed during the proceedings, publicly and in the presence of the parties concerned. During the course of proceedings the court can – either at the request of the parties or on its own initiative – order the submission of any evidence it deems necessary to clarify the truth. The court may hear testimony from persons who spontaneously present themselves to provide information in the case.

285. Under article 77 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, prosecutors or investigators may summon anyone whom they believe can give testimony that might uncover the truth, irrespective of whether or not the names of such persons appear in the reports or complaints. They may also hear testimony from persons who present themselves spontaneously.

Review by higher judicial bodies

286. Criminal cases are tried at two levels. Courts of the first level are magistrates' courts and courts of first instance. Courts of the second level are the courts of appeal and courts of first instance sitting as courts of appeal. The Court of Cassation deals with legal questions and not with the subject matter of cases; i.e., it does not consider the factual basis of disputes but examines appeals relating to the application of the law.

Compensation

287. Article 30 (3) of the amended Basic Law regulates the question of compensation for judicial error. Article 387 of the Code of Criminal Procedure states that a person acquitted following a retrial has the right to claim compensation from the State for damages arising from the earlier sentence. Moreover, the State may take back compensation paid out to civil claimants, informants or false witness who occasioned the original sentence.

Policies

288. At the policy level, a strategic plan for the justice sector and rule of law has been adopted for the period 2017–2022. It aims to establish a legally structured justice system that operates efficiently and effectively to ensure fair trials, as well as justice-sector institutions that operate within an integrated institutional and regulatory framework.

289. A presidential decree was issued in September 2017 for the creation of a “national committee for the development of the justice sector and the judiciary”. The tasks of the committee include reviewing the system of judicial legislation and producing a comprehensive vision for the advancement of the justice sector and the judiciary. In addition, the Ministry of Justice is making efforts to amend the Judiciary Act, also with a view to the advancement of the judiciary, particularly vis-à-vis the problem of lengthy legal proceedings.

290. On 15 July 2019 – in accordance with recommendations made by the “national committee for the development of the justice sector and the judiciary” – the President of the State of Palestine issued two Decree-Laws. The first envisaged the dissolution of the Supreme Judicial Council and the formation of a transitional supreme judicial council for a period of one year tasked with establishing courts of different levels, regulating justice, drafting bills to reform the judiciary and restore public trust, promoting opportunities for accessing justice and cutting the length of legal proceedings, then re-establishing the Supreme Judicial Council in accordance with the law. The other Decree-Law amended the Judiciary Act No. 1 of 2002 so as to reduce the retirement age for judges to 60.

291. The State of Palestine ratified the Riyadh Arab Agreement on Judicial Cooperation in 1983. Under that treaty, citizens of States parties, each within its own borders, have the right to bring legal action before judicial bodies in order to demand their rights, and they have the right to legal aid.

Obstacles placed by the Israeli occupiers on the right to take legal action

292. Israel, the occupying power, enacts military laws and orders that prevent court rulings from being implemented, or even issued. These include Military Order No. 1060 under which Palestinian courts have no jurisdiction to consider land ownership claims in relation to disputes with Israeli colonists. In other words, the courts have no mandate to consider objections from Palestinians related to land ownership when a decision has been made to confiscate their land. Moreover, the occupiers' control over the roads and the hindrance of movement constitute obstacles to accessing the courts and to enforcing judicial decisions and rulings.

Israeli military courts

293. The Israeli military courts are an integral part of the colonialist system and of the persecution of the Palestinian people. Such courts have been established by military order ever since the beginning of the occupation, and the judges and prosecutors who operate in them are all part of the Israeli military. These courts exist illegally within the occupying State, a situation that has persisted for more than 40 years and that has turned the prosecution of civilians before military tribunals from an exception to a permanent state of affairs. The proportion of cases examined by Israeli military courts in the occupied West Bank, wherein convictions are handed down against Palestinians stands at between 95 and 99 per cent.

294. Palestinian detainees can be held in Israeli prisons for 90 days without charge, and that period can be extended. The vast majority of Palestinian detainees are held in prisons outside the Occupied Palestinian Territory where they are often subjected to torture and degrading treatment in order to extract confessions. In addition, the authorities of the Israeli occupation place obstacles that hinder contact between detainees and their lawyers while, using the pretext of "confidential cases", the military courts can consider charges against detainees without allowing them or their legal representatives to examine them. Thus, having been informed about a case by the military prosecutor, the court decides on the legality of detention and whether it is to be extended or revoked. Moreover, trial proceedings are conducted in Hebrew, a language that the Palestinians do not know. Court documents are also in Hebrew, including those that accused persons are compelled to sign during their detention. The rulings of military courts cannot be challenged or appealed in other courts that are outside the system of military occupation.

Article 15

295. The principle of the non-retroactive nature of laws is enshrined in article 15 of the amended Basic Law, which reads: "Punishment is personal and collective punishment is forbidden. There can be no crime and no punishment except as determined by law. Penalties are to be imposed only by court order and can apply only to actions committed after the entry into force of the law." The non-retroactive nature of laws is also upheld in current criminal legislation under which no penalty can be handed down that was not envisaged in the law at the time the offence was committed, with the proviso that the law more favourable to the accused person is the one that should be applied, if that more favourable law came into force before a definitive sentence was handed down.

Article 16

296. An individual acquires legal personality (legal standing) as an embryo, even before birth, and that personality persists throughout a person's life, until death. Article 17 of the Palestinian Children's Code (Act No. 7 of 2004), as amended, states: "All children have the right to respect for their legal personality."

297. As concerns legal agency, article 943 of the Compendium of Legal Judgements of A.H. 1293 states: "A minor incapable of discernment is one who does not understand sale and purchase; i.e., does not understand that they represent, respectively, a surrender and a gain of property, and who does not recognize immoderate and flagrant fraud." It should be noted that females possess legal capacity on an equal footing with males.

298. Civil, criminal and administrative laws do not distinguish between the testimony of a woman and of a man or give a different weight to one or the other. Cases where testimony is accepted or heard by way of consultation or where legal agency is denied are one and the same for men and for women. However, in the sharia courts, and as concerns contracts of marriage, the testimony of one man is equivalent to that of two women.

299. As concerns financial arrangements between spouses, a system of separation of assets is applied under which each spouse keeps what they own and what they earn during their life together and each retains the right to keep, administer and dispose of their assets independently without having to seek the consent or approval of the other. The wife keeps her original family name and uses it in all official transactions.

300. The procedures and documents required to report a birth and record it in the official register are detailed in Civil Status Act No. 2 of 1999, be it for citizens, foreigners or children of unknown parents. A foetus retains the right to its share of inheritance even before birth and, if a live birth follows, the infant is entitled to the share of the inheritance acquired as a foetus. Palestinians in occupied Jerusalem who wish to record their children in the population register and obtain birth certificates face the arbitrary and complex procedures imposed by the occupation authorities.

301. According to article 43 of the Civil Status Act, a Palestinian who can show that one parent is Palestinian may, at the age of 16, obtain an identity card. However, the occupying authorities, which control the population register system, arbitrarily deny many Palestinians an identity card even if they reside within the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

302. The Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of Health are working on an automated programme for registering births and deaths, via links with hospitals. Under the programme, the hospitals automatically communicate such events to the population register so that birth and death certificates can be issued. The Bureau of the Chief Qadi is also involved, for the recording of marriages and divorces. The programme uses identification codes for different geographical divisions, which are then linked to the registers; however, the latter are under the control of the Israeli occupiers and this hinders the implementation of the programme.

303. Article 17 of the amended Basic Law states that homes are sacrosanct and may not be monitored, entered or searched other than under a duly reasoned court order issued in accordance with the law. Any actions taken in violation of those provisions are invalid and anyone who suffers harm as a consequence thereof is entitled to fair compensation.

304. Article 181 (1) of the 1960 Criminal Code stipulates: "Any official who, acting in that capacity, enters a person's home or any annexes of that home in a manner other than as allowed by law is liable to a term of imprisonment of between 3 months and 3 years and to payment of a fine of between 20 and 100 dinars."

305. Procedures regulating searches are set forth in articles 39 to 52 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. According to those provisions, homes may be entered and searched only as part of an investigation, under a warrant issued by the Office of the Public Prosecution or in the presence of a representative from the Office, and on the basis of charges that a person dwelling in the home that is to be searched has committed or was involved in committing a crime, or if there is a strong indication that the person possesses objects relating to the crime. The search warrant – duly reasoned – must be drawn up by a law enforcement official.

306. According to those provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it is possible to enter without a warrant only in exceptional cases: requests for assistance from within, such as in fire or flood, cases of flagrante delicto and cases where a suspect is being pursued.

307. As concerns the privacy and confidentiality of correspondence, communications and personal information, article 4 of Cable and Wireless Communications Act No. 3 of 1996 underscores the need to protect the privacy and confidentiality of communications on Palestinian territory, which cannot be violated save by the public authorities, in exceptional cases and within the limits of the law.

308. Article 356 of the 1960 Criminal Code criminalizes abuse of authority on the part of officials of the postal or telephone service. This includes examining, destroying or misappropriating correspondence or revealing its contents to anyone other than the addressee, offenders being liable to imprisonment or a fine. In an exception to that provision, the Code of Criminal Procedure gives the Public Prosecutor or his deputies the power to seize letters, parcels and the like when they are associated with a crime or the perpetrator of a crime. In addition, and also exceptionally, a magistrate can authorize the interception and recording of cable and wireless communications when such is necessary to uncover the truth behind a crime that attracts a term of imprisonment of not less than 1 year (art. 51).

309. On 6 May 2019, the Council of Ministers issued Decree No. 3 concerning the personal data of citizens. Under the Decree, providers of Internet and communications services are forbidden from using, directly or indirectly, subscribers' personal data for commercial purposes, without prior permission from the persons concerned.

310. Israel, the occupying power, arbitrarily seizes correspondence and parcels entering and leaving the State of Palestine. This leads to delays in the dispatch and receipt of those items and violates Palestinians' right to privacy, as private correspondence and parcels are broken open and their contents perused. In 2010 Israel, the occupying power, arbitrarily detained more than 10 tons of postal correspondence and parcels. Most of these were emptied of their contents or arbitrarily destroyed before finally being released in 2018, after having been withheld for eight years.

311. According to annual compilations of complaints, which are produced by the Council of Ministers, there were 105 complaints concerning violations of the sanctity of private life in 2014. In 2015, there were 89 such complaints of which 85 were addressed; there were 312 such complaints in 2016 of which 256 were addressed; and there were 123 complaints in 2017.

312. With regard to the storage of personal information, the Directorate for Civil Status is responsible for keeping records on natural, personal and family details. Such records are confidential and, other than by the persons concerned, can be accessed only exceptionally and under a court order. In addition, alterations or corrections can be made to personal status records only under a definitive ruling handed down by a competent court, with the exception of those concerning nationality, religion or profession and certain civil status entries such as marriage or divorce.

313. Articles 358 to 367 of the 1960 Criminal Code cover the offences of slander, defamation and denigration. A case can be brought against a person responsible for slander, defamation or denigration only on the basis of a complaint of the injured party or that party's heirs. Injured parties may also accompany their complaint with a request for compensation for any material or moral harm suffered. The same matter is addressed in articles 201–209 of the Mandate-era Criminal Code.

314. Decree-Law No. 16 of 2017 regarding cybercrime met with great protest and criticism as a consequence of which it underwent wide public debate with the involvement of representatives of civil society. In the wake of those community discussions, the original Decree-Law was replaced with Decree-Law No. 10 of 2018 regarding cybercrime, which takes account of the right of individuals to the confidentiality of their electronic data. Article 22 of the Decree-Law prohibits the arbitrary or unlawful interference in the privacy of any person or in the affairs of that person's family, home or correspondence. The Decree-Law allows the Office of the Public Prosecution or the competent court – exceptionally and only for the purposes of uncovering the truth and achieving justice – to get a subscriber's electronic data from an Internet service provider, all procedures being governed by legal conditions set forth in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Article 18

315. Palestine is the cradle of the Abrahamic religions and the location of the holy sites. The preservation of religious belief, as well as equality and non-discrimination on religious grounds, are enshrined in the Declaration of Independence as being integral to the fulfilment of the Palestinian spiritual and cultural heritage of tolerance and coexistence down the centuries.

316. Article 18 of the amended Basic Law reads: "Freedom of belief, worship and the practice of religious rites are guaranteed, provided they do not impinge upon public order or public morals.” Under article 4 (1) of the Basic Law, Islam is the official religion of the State of Palestine while the sanctity of other Abrahamic religions is to be respected.

317. Under the heading “Crimes affecting religion and the sanctity of the dead”, articles 273–278 of the Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960) envisage imprisonment or a fine for anyone who publicly insults the prophets, who destroys or defiles a place of worship, a slogan or anything else that a group of persons hold to be sacred, thereby intending to denigrate a religion followed by any group of persons, or who without cause or legitimate excuse interferes with religious rites or insults the religious feelings or beliefs of others.

318. Under the heading “Offences relating to religion and public monuments”, articles 146–150 of the Mandate-era Criminal Code (Act No. 74 of 1936) state that anyone who destroys, damages or defiles any place of worship or any object which is held sacred by any class of persons, or who wilfully disturbs any meeting of persons assembled for religious worship, or who commits any trespass in any place of worship, or who wounds the religious feelings of any person, or who destroys any religious monument, is guilty of a misdemeanour.

319. The different religious communities independently regulate their own spiritual affairs, practise religious rites and organize personal status matters in accordance with the personal status laws applicable to each community.

320. The Samaritan community lives in Mount Gerizim in Nablus and it owns synagogues where members of the community can practise their religious rites and beliefs, one inside the old Samaritan quarter in the city of Nablus and another in the centre of the Samaritan quarter on Mount Gerizim.

321. Churches accredited by the State of Palestine were granted official recognition under a presidential decree of 2008. They are: the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate, the Latin Patriarchate, the Armenian Orthodox Patriarchate, the Custody of the Holy Land, the Coptic Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, the Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate, the Ethiopian Orthodox Patriarchate, the Maronite Patriarchal Exarchate of Jerusalem and Palestine, the Melkite Greek Catholic Patriarchate, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Jordan and the Holy Land, the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East, the Syriac Catholic Patriarchal Exarchate and the Armenian Catholic Patriarchal Exarchate.

322. With a view to alleviating the financial burdens on churches and their property, Decree-Law No. 9 of 2014 was enacted under which recognized Christian communities are exempted from certain taxes and fees. Under article 2 of the Decree-Law, transactions undertaken, claims made and property used by the Christian communities are exempted from taxes and fees of all kinds.

323. A presidential decree was issued in 2012 that brought into being a supreme committee for church affairs in the State of Palestine. The committee deals with affairs of concern to local churches, including questions related to the law, to real estate and to institutional matters. It also coordinates with local, regional and international bodies on church affairs and activities related to inter-religious dialogue.

324. With a view to ensuring the free practice of religious rituals and respect for ecclesiastical rights, the State of Palestine signed the Comprehensive Agreement with the Vatican in June 2015, the purpose of which is to regulate and protect the rights of Palestinian members of the Roman Catholic Church.

325. The State of Palestine guarantees all Palestinians the right to religious holidays. In addition to the holidays envisaged in the Labour Code and the Civil Service Act, Council of Ministers Decree No. 217 of 2004 grants holidays for the religious feasts of Eastern and Western Christianity, while Council of Ministers Decree No. 6 of 2016 grants holidays for the religious festivities of the Samaritan community.

326. According to a 2017 survey of Palestinians on Palestinian territory, conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics and disaggregated by religion, Muslims number 4,615,683, Christians 46,850, followers of other religions 1,384 and non-declared 1,509, among a total population of 4,665,426.

Religious education

327. A module on Islamic education and a module on Christian education has been integrated into the basic curriculum followed in Palestinian schools. Under a decree issued on 9 August 2018 by the Minister of Education, twelfth-grade Christian textbooks have been integrated into the general secondary examination taken by Christian students.

328. Children from the Samaritan community of Mount Gerizim pursue their education in Palestinian schools. The community has its own school attached to the Ministry of Education, which, in addition to Samaritan children, is attended by others living near the Samaritan neighbourhood. The school, which follows the curriculum prescribed for other Palestinian schools, is also used to impart evening classes in Hebrew and theology to members of the community.

Violations and attacks against holy sites by the Israeli occupiers

329. Israel, the occupying power, controls the holy sites, including the Al-Aqsa Mosque, the Dome of the Rock, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and other locations. In violation of freedom of belief, the authorities of the Israeli occupation use closures, checkpoints and the enforcement of a punitive and discriminatory system of permits to restrict the right of Muslims and Christians to visit holy sites. The effect of these measures is that the vast majority of persons are denied the practice of their religion.

330. As the policy of incitement, discrimination and racist hate speech on the part of the Israeli authorities continues, the Al-Aqsa Mosque is witnessing daily violations by the Israeli Government and settlers. At the same time Israel, the occupying power, is seeking to enforce the temporal and spatial division of the Al-Aqsa Mosque. Serious violations took place in July 2017 reaching the point that prayers at the Mosque were forbidden and security cameras and electronic gates were installed accompanied by a systematic policy of repeated intrusions. In addition to this, during the course of 2018, the Israeli occupying authorities issued 176 decrees to remove Palestinians from the Al-Aqsa Mosque, including clerics and staff. Israel, the occupying power, has also sought to pass discriminatory, racist and anti-religious laws, one example being laws banning the call to prayer.

331. The occupying forces allow attacks by Israeli settlers against persons frequenting the Ibrahimi Mosque/Tomb of the Patriarchs to continue and to escalate. In addition, the occupiers ill-treat worshippers and erect checkpoints and, in 2014, they banned the call to prayer from the Mosque on 624 occasions. The call to prayer was also banned on 590 occasions in 2015, on 644 occasions in 2016 and on 631 occasions in 2018.

332. Since 1967, Israel, the occupying power, has been carrying out systematic attacks on Christian holy sites, imposing restrictions and augmenting pressures. This has included a policy whereby arbitrary and exorbitant taxes are imposed on holy sites and restricted access for Palestinian Christians to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and other churches. At the same time, Israeli settlers continue to desecrate Christian and Islamic places of worship and cover them in racist slogans, without being held accountable.

Article 19

333. Freedom of opinion and expression is a constitutional right guaranteed under the Declaration of Independence and upheld in the Basic Law, as amended, article 19 of which reads: "Freedom of opinion is not to be infringed. All persons have the right to express and disseminate their opinions orally, in writing or through any other means of expression or art, as provided by law."

334. The right to establish and the freedom to work in newspapers and media outlets are enshrined in article 27 of the amended Basic Law, as is the prohibition of censorship and control, with the exception of financial controls. Moreover, it is forbidden to issue cautions to a newspaper or media outlet, suspend, seize or abolish it save in accordance with the law and under a court order. This is upheld in the Printing and Publications Act of 1995, article 2 of which states: "The press and printing are to be free, and freedom of opinion is guaranteed for all Palestinians, who can openly express their views in speech or writing, pictorially or graphically, using any means of expression and information.” Articles 3 to 5 of the same Act regulate the right of citizens, political parties, cultural and social organizations and unions to express their views and ideas, to make their accomplishments known and to circulate and disseminate news, information and statistics. Under the Act, all natural and legal persons, including political parties, have the right to own newspapers.

335. Article 21 of Decree-Law No. 10 of 2018 regarding cybercrime envisages freedom of opinion and expression in digital media. It guarantees freedom of the press and printing, including paper, visual, audio and digital publications, and freedom of artistic and literary creativity. No legal action may be taken to block or confiscate any artistic, literary, or intellectual work, or against the creators of such works, except by court order. No punishments of deprivation of liberty may be imposed for crimes committed because of the public nature of artistic, literary or intellectual work.

336. The code of conduct for Palestinian media professionals enjoins acceptance of democratic principles and respect for the opinions of others. It states that the media must systematically pursue freedom and democracy, preserve the cultural and national identity of the Palestinian people (without leading to isolation), adopt the values of tolerance and acceptance of others’ opinions, and give due coverage to matters of public interest through documented information while remaining attentive to marginalized groups and areas.

337. As a way of generalizing access to information via the Internet, the Palestine Telecommunications Company provides citizens with Internet services, directly or through licensed service providers. According to data from the 2017 census, 51.7 per cent of Palestinian households have Internet access, with the total number of high-speed Internet subscribers in the State of Palestine standing at 357,071 in 2017, as compared to 119,488 in 2010.

338. Articles 17–23 of Printing and Publications Act No. 9 of 1995 explain the procedures involved in obtaining a licence to issue publications or set up institutions, such as printing presses, publishing and distribution houses, research foundations, polling companies, press offices, translation bureaux and advertising agencies. Decree No. 18 of 2018 of the Council of Ministers regulates the systems and mechanisms whereby licences are granted to terrestrial and satellite radio and television stations, satellite broadcasting companies and offices of satellite and media production companies. Under article 5 (8) of the Decree, for a station to obtain a licence it must first gain technical approval from the Ministry of Communications and Information Technology and endorsement of its financial standing from the Ministry of the Interior. The decision to grant or refuse a licence is then made by the Ministry of Information within 60 days of the date of the application and the station is given an exclusive frequency once it has fulfilled all the technical requirements. Any decision to refuse a licence can be appealed before the High Court of Justice.

339. Licensed media organizations as of March 2018, according to data from the Ministry of Information, are shown in the table below:

Advertising agencies	370	Producers of stamps and seals	14
Printing presses	274	Information offices	26
Publishing and distribution houses	121	Polling companies	5
Libraries	255	Magazines	226
Press offices	145	Newspapers	112
Press agencies	38	Study and research foundations	156
Translation bureaux	56	Media production companies	90
Licensed radio and television stations	52	Licensed rebroadcasting companies	3
Licensed broadcasting companies	4 of which the occupiers have arbitrarily closed 2.	Offices of Arab and international satellite channels	5
Licensed national satellite channels	2	National satellite television channels awaiting a licence	2

Foreign media outlets

340. In order to obtain a licence, foreign channels must fulfil the same conditions and go through the same procedures as those outlined above and, in addition, must obtain approval from the Council of Ministers. Thus, an additional 30 days are granted for the issuance of a decision, and a decision to refuse a licence can be appealed before the High Court of Justice. There is no requirement for the owner of the foreign channel to be Palestinian.

341. As of 2015, most of the foreign satellite stations operating in the State of Palestine broadcast via the 9 accredited and licensed Palestinian satellite-broadcasting service companies, which serve some 150 Arab and foreign satellite stations. Four Arab and foreign satellite channels are licensed to operate directly from their own offices, without using the Palestinian broadcasting service offices. There are 78 accredited foreign media outlets and 53 Arab satellite television stations, but none in the Gaza Strip apart from the Al-Jazeera office. Other satellite broadcasters operate via media offices licensed to work with foreign reporters.

Legal restrictions on freedom of opinion and expression

342. Article 37 of the Printing and Publications Act prohibits the publication only of the following material:

- Any confidential information concerning the police and the security forces, their weapons, equipment, locations, movements or training;
- Material that disparages religions and religious doctrines that enjoy freedom under the law;
- Material that would damage national unity, incite crime, disseminate hatred, discord and conflict or give rise to sectarianism among members of society;
- Minutes of the confidential meetings of the National Council and of the Council of Ministers;
- Material or news intended to undermine confidence in the national currency;
- Material or news that would harm the dignity or personal freedom of individuals or damage their reputation;
- News, reports, letters, articles and images that are contrary to public morals;
- Advertisements promoting medicines, medical preparations, cigarettes and the like, unless publication is authorized in advance by the Ministry of Health.

343. Under article 23 of the same Act, a printing and publication licence cannot be revoked or withdrawn as long as there is no violation of the conditions under which it was granted, except where the licence expires automatically in cases where publication is suspended for an extended period of time, the length of which is defined by law depending upon the periodicity of the publication concerned. Newspapers issued by political parties are exempted from these provisions and do not lose their licence irrespective of how long they suspend operations. Moreover, a printing licence cannot be revoked as a penalty for a violation of publishing conditions. Such penalties are limited to monetary fines in limited cases set forth in article 47. A court can impose a temporary interruption of publication for a period of up to 3 months.

344. Slander, defamation and denigration are addressed in articles 188–199 and 358–367 of the Criminal Code (Act No. 16 of 1960) and in articles 201–209 of the Mandate-era Criminal Code. They are treated as offences that undermine the honour and dignity of individuals and that may be caused by a misunderstanding of the framework governing freedom of opinion and expression. Under current law, forms of behaviour that unduly and without legal justification undermine the honour and dignity of individuals, and that are contrary to freedom of opinion and expression, are punishable offences. The legal provisions relevant to such offences can constitute a challenge to freedom of opinion and expression due to errors committed when seeking to define the behaviour of an accused person using the terms set forth in the law. In order to promote freedom of opinion and expression, the State of Palestine is preparing a draft criminal code that does not envisage such offences at all and is consistent with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

345. Decree-Law No. 16 of 2017 regarding cybercrime was met with a wave of criticism as a consequence of which it underwent debate within the community, with the involvement of civil society institutions, and a body of amendments was adopted which was then presented to the legislative harmonization committee. Subsequently, the original Decree-Law was replaced with Decree-Law No. 10 of 2018 regarding cybercrime, in which ambiguous provisions were removed, penalties lightened and substantial amendments introduced. Discussions are still ongoing between governmental bodies and civil society institutions to reach an optimal regulatory framework on cybercrime. This is evidence of a political will in the State of Palestine to safeguard freedom of opinion and expression and to involve civil society in the process of achieving consistency with international standards.

346. A unified draft law on the media is currently being prepared which will include electronic media, publicity and advertising, audiovisual media, classification of productions by age category, and the Printing and Publications Act. A committee has been formed to prepare, in cooperation with other competent bodies, a first draft of the new law on the basis of international standards governing the right to freedom of opinion and expression.

347. A national mechanism to report on the safety of journalists and on questions related to impunity was launched in November 2019. The mechanism – which reports on crimes and violations against journalists – envisages a team that includes relevant government ministries, the Palestinian Journalists' Syndicate (as the national partner of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in the State of Palestine) and civil society institutions. The mechanism documents violations against journalists and submits its reports to UNESCO. It also offers vocational training on how to document human rights violations against journalists, in cooperation with the Independent Commission for Human Rights and OHCHR.

348. In August 2016, the State of Palestine officially signed the Declaration on Media Freedom in the Arab World, which entails a clear commitment to the principles of media freedom, press independence, access to information and the defence of journalists' rights.

349. With a view to promoting freedom of the media and the press, in June 2016 a cooperation agreement was signed between the Palestinian Journalists' Syndicate and the Office of the Public Prosecution of the State of Palestine. One of the most significant provisions of the agreement is that journalists are not to be detained by the Office of the Public Prosecution in cases related to freedom of opinion and expression. Moreover, the head of the Syndicate or his representative is entitled to be present when a journalist is being questioned, and they are to be informed of all the steps taken against journalists accused of offences related to the practice of their profession. In cases of flagrante delicto, the Syndicate is to be informed within 24 hours of any measures taken against a journalist. In addition, a line of communication has been established in order to deal with the daily problems that can arise in journalists' work.

350. In 2017 and in collaboration with the Palestinian government and partner institutions, the Palestinian Journalists' Syndicate launched a policy paper for the reform and development of the Palestinian media, the purpose being to set up mechanisms to support and develop the Palestinian press.

351. In September 2014, the media development centre at Birzeit University launched a nationwide initiative aimed at promoting the media in Palestine. The initiative – which covered legal reform, academic development, gender, infrastructure, media training, vocational safety, self-regulation, media and society, and public media – was signed by the Office of the Prime Minister with the participation of national institutions. The aim was to improve the status of official and unofficial Palestinian media outlets and bring them into line with international standards governing media freedom.

352. In partnership with national and international human rights institutions, the Ministry of the Interior has issued a manual on dealing with journalists in the field. The manual has been used in the course of several interactive workshops between representatives of the security services and the Palestinian Journalists' Syndicate.

353. Under their code of ethics and conduct, members of the Palestinian security forces must ensure the freedom of visual, audio and written media and the freedom of media professionals and journalists to work in all fields, and that they must facilitate journalists' access to information in a timely manner, in accordance with the law. Law enforcement agencies have also issued instructions and circulars stressing the need to respect the work of journalists. These include Circular No. 06/2017 issued by the Directorate General of Police, which reminds all police officers of the need to respect journalists, facilitate their work, protect them and guarantee their personal safety, the aim being to guarantee the exercise of freedom of opinion and expression and to protect the journalistic profession. In addition to this, Circular No. 08/2012, also issued by the Directorate General of Police, emphasizes the importance of respecting legal procedures when filing any report or complaint against a journalist and of monitoring by the competent authorities.

Court rulings

354. The national courts are eager to abide by the obligations arising from the country's accession to International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and to highlight self-criticism and constructive criticism as aspects of freedom of opinion and expression. In that connection, in May 2017, the Nablus Magistrates' Court handed down a ruling in criminal case No. 3525/2016 in which it acquitted an accused person on charges of broadcasting false news liable to undermine national prestige, in violation of article 132 (1) of the 1960 Criminal Code; of inciting sectarian strife, in violation of article 150 of the Code; of defamation, in violation of article 193; and of insulting the Head of State or his deputy, in violation of article 132 (2). The Court ruled that the statements of the accused person in the course of a televised interview on a satellite channel were made in the context of his political views and did not constitute an offence. In its consideration of the charges, the Court drew on the provisions of article 19 of the Basic Law, as amended, which is consistent with article 19 (2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, with article 32 of the Arab Charter on Human Rights, with article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and with General Assembly resolution 53/144 of 1998, all of which reaffirm the right to freedom of expression.

Israeli violations against journalists and media organizations

355. In an effort to cover up the truth by suppressing the media and eradicating freedom of expression, Israel, the occupying power, obstructs the work of journalists, including Palestinian journalists. The year 2014, in particular, witnessed a series of bloody crimes against Palestinian journalists, especially during the Israeli attack against Gaza during which 17 journalists, one of them an Italian national, lost their lives.

356. In 2016, Israel, the occupying power, attacked 176 journalists and 18 media outlets. The same figures for 2017 were 458 and 48 respectively. The pace of Israeli violations against journalists and media freedom then escalated, with 679 violations in 2018. Violations range from arbitrary detention to the imposition of harsh and indiscriminate conditions on journalists such as bail payments and house arrest. Journalists have also been directly targeted with tear gas canisters and a number have been injured by live fire and rubber bullets.

357. Two photographers, Yasser Murtaja and Ahmed Abu Hussein, were killed after being fired on by soldiers of the Israeli occupation while covering the Great Return March in the Gaza Strip in April 2018. In November 2019, the journalist Moaz al-Amarna lost his left eye while covering an attack by the forces of the Israeli occupation against Palestinian protesters in Hebron.

358. The year 2018 also saw new Israeli legislation to restrict freedom of opinion and expression and the work of the press. This took the form of the approval by the Israeli Knesset of a law prohibiting the filming of soldiers of the Israeli occupation which, via the imposition of fines, would prevent journalists from recording the crimes committed by the occupying military forces. This is in addition to the arbitrary legal action taken against Palestinians to prevent them from exercising their freedom of opinion and expression.

359. The commitment of the State of Palestine to the principles and objectives of the United Nations is enshrined in the Declaration of Independence. Article 150 of the 1960 Criminal Code envisages imprisonment or a fine for anyone whose writing, speech or actions seek to foment, or result in, sectarian or racial strife, or who seeks to incite conflict between the communities and groups of the nation.

360. In the same context, article 8 (d) of the Printing and Publications Act states that journalists must refrain from publishing anything that might fuel violence, intolerance or hatred or that would incite racism or sectarianism. Article 37 of the Act prohibits any material that disparages religions and religious doctrines that enjoy freedom under the law, or that would disseminate hatred, discord and conflict or give rise to sectarianism among members of society.

361. Under article 24 of Decree-Law No. 10 of 2018 regarding cybercrime, anyone who creates a website, an electronic application or an online account, or who disseminates information via the Internet or via any other form of information technology for the purpose of displaying any written words or behaviours that might lead to racial or religious hatred or to racial discrimination against a particular group on grounds of ethnicity, community, colour, appearance or disability, is liable to imprisonment and/or a fine.

362. Article 66 of the Decree-Law regarding general elections prohibits the use of electoral propaganda containing any criticism of or incitement against other candidates on grounds of their sex, religion, community, profession or disability, or that would provoke tribal or sectarian strife among the groups in society, or that would cause any conflict that could affect the unity of the Palestinian people.

363. The greatest cause of provocation remains the Israeli colonialist occupation, under whose yoke the State of Palestine languishes. At the same time Israel, the occupying power, uses official discourse and media platforms as a means of inciting racism against Palestinians, spreading inflammatory and racist statements, allegations and ideas calling for the killing of Palestinians and justifying the violations, massacres and crimes committed against them. Among these racist statements was one published by the newspaper Israel Today on 18 May 2016: “The ethnic cleansing of Palestinians was a victory for justice”.

364. Official Israeli discourse also incites against the struggle of the Palestinian people, especially Palestinian prisoners. Such allegations seek to criminalize the legitimate resistance of the Palestinian people against the occupation and their right to self-determination, which has been upheld in international resolutions. The prevalent Israeli narrative stigmatizes the Palestinian struggle and Palestinian prisoners with the word “terrorism”; moreover Israel, the occupying power, has launched an inflammatory campaign against financial allocations for Palestinian prisoners – who are victims of Israeli arbitrary detention – on the pretext that such payments are a form of “support for terrorism”. This constitutes a violation of international law, including the Geneva Conventions; in fact, according to the Fourth Geneva Convention, the Detaining Power shall provide for the support of those dependent on the internees, if such dependents are without adequate means of support or are unable to earn a living.

365. Article 26 (5) of the amended Basic Law guarantees the right to hold private meetings without the presence of police officers and to hold public meetings, marches and gatherings within the limits of the law. This right is regulated under Public Assemblies Act No. 12 of 1998, which defines a public meeting as “any public gathering where at least 50 people have been invited to attend in an open public place, including public squares, fields, stadiums, parks, etc.”

366. Signed written notification must be delivered to the governor or director of police at least 48 hours before a public meeting is due to be held, specifying the venue, time and purpose of the gathering. The governor or director of police may place conditions on the duration or course of the meeting in order to safeguard the movement of traffic, which are to be conveyed in writing to the organizers within 24 hours of the delivery of the notification. If the organizers receive no written reply, they may hold the public meeting as specified in their notification.

367. Decree No. 1 of 2000 of the Minister of the Interior, which contains the implementing regulations of the Public Assemblies Act, states that the director of police may request a meeting with the organizers to discuss the details of a public gathering. Such a meeting can serve to ensure that participants stay away from trouble spots and that the gathering does not violate the law or threaten public order. The director of police may impose security requirements as a way of ensuring the public safety.

368. The implementing regulations stipulate that the response from the police to a written request to hold a public gathering should take the form of a written authorization setting forth the conditions and security requirements, as determined by the director of police, in addition to any other conditions. The police have the right, in accordance with the law, to terminate and break up a gathering if it departs from its purpose, violates the conditions under which it was authorized, disturbs security and public order or is marred by rioting that endangers the well-being or property of citizens.

369. The code of conduct concerning the use of force and firearms by members of the Palestinian security forces takes full account of the principles of necessity, proportionality, graduality and accountability, while also reconciling the maintenance of security and public order with the safety of citizens. The code prohibits the arbitrary use of force and firearms while article 20 of the text describes the procedures to be followed to disperse a non-violent gathering, and article 22 the procedures for dispersing an unlawful gathering.

370. As concerns accountability, following the events that took place during the vigil before the court complex in Birah and Bethlehem in March 2017, a commission of inquiry – with members from the Independent Commission for Human Rights and the Bar Association – was established by decree of the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior to uncover the truth behind the incident. In the light of the findings of the commission of inquiry, the Prime Minister signed a document regarding the implementation of its recommendations on the “court complex” events.

371. Beginning in September 2018, the nation’s governorates, and Ramallah in particular, witnessed a series of public protests against a decree-law on social security. These peaceful rallies, which continued for five months, were characterized by very high levels of discipline on the part of security forces and adherence to the principles of freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of opinion. No violent incidents took place and the protests came to an end in January 2019 when the protesters’ demands were met and the decree-law on social security was withdrawn.

372. In June 2018, human rights activists staged a peaceful public protest in Bethlehem demanding a series of political changes. The protest was met with discipline on the part of the security forces, who withdrew as soon as they had ascertained that the situation was stable and secure and that there were no disruptions or threats to public order. After that, only the traffic police remained on hand to ensure the movement of vehicles and the right of way.

373. Palestinians also staged a great wave of weekly peaceful demonstrations along the fence delimiting the Gaza Strip. The demonstrators were demanding the right of return of Palestinian refugees, as enshrined in General Assembly resolution 194, and the lifting of the illegal blockade of the Gaza Strip imposed by Israel, the occupying power. According to the report of the United Nations independent international commission of inquiry on the protests in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, the demonstrations were “civilian in nature” and the demonstrators were generally unarmed, while the Israeli occupying forces used excessive force against them. This led to the death and injury of thousands of demonstrators, including children, women, persons with disabilities, journalists and paramedics, who were deliberately targeted.

Article 22

374. The Palestinian Declaration of Independence stipulates that all Palestinians are to enjoy full equality of rights under a democratic parliamentary system that is based on freedom of opinion and the formation of political parties. For its part, article 26 of the amended Basic Law states that Palestinians have the right to participate in political life, both individually and collectively. In particular, they have the right to form and join political parties, trade unions, associations, federations, leagues, clubs and popular institutions, in accordance with the law.

Associations

375. Historically speaking, associations have always played a prominent role in Palestinian society and have been involved in many aspects of cultural, social, rights-related and voluntary work as well as in services and other areas. The right to form associations and the exercise of all non-profit activities are regulated by legislation. The Charitable Associations and Civil Society Bodies Act of 2000, and its implementing regulations, set forth the procedures for forming such groups. Article 1 of the Act reads: “Palestinians have the right freely to engage in social, cultural, professional and academic activities, which includes the right to form and manage associations and non-governmental bodies in accordance with the provisions of this Act.”

376. The formalities for registering an association are explained in article 4 of the Act. An application for registration is to be presented to the competent department of the Ministry of the Interior, after which the Minister must issue a decision within no more than two months from the date the application was made. If, two months after the application was presented to the competent department, no decision has been taken, the association or body is automatically considered to be registered by law. If the Minister of the Interior rejects an application for registration the decision must be duly reasoned and the applicants have the right to lodge an appeal before the competent court within 30 days of the date they receive written notification of the rejection. Under article 14 of the Act, associations and bodies are exempt from taxes and customs duties on the movable and immovable assets required to achieve their objectives as set forth in their statutes. As of 2018, there were 3,982 registered associations in the State of Palestine.

Political parties

377. Palestinian parties and factions have played an important role in national history. Most of them came into being as factions and forces created to resist the occupation then, thanks to their revolutionary and popular legitimacy, earned the right to continue to exist. Many political factions and forces were incorporated into the framework of the Palestine Liberation Organization, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, although their internal affairs continue to be governed by their own statutes. The amended Basic Law affirms the right to form and join political parties, while articles 48–53 of Elections Act No. 13 of 1995 explain how to register political groupings with a view to participating in elections.

378. Israel, the occupying power, violates the right of Palestinians to form and join political parties, as Palestinian factions and parties are considered illegal under the military laws and orders issued by the authorities of the unlawful Israeli occupation. In that context, the occupying authorities consider the affiliation of Palestinians to political parties to be a crime and, thus, persons who do belong to a party are liable to arbitrary arrest. The Israeli occupiers also violate the right to form associations and institutions and, between 2000 and 2009, closed more than 35 institutions in occupied Jerusalem, including the Palestinian Prisoner Society.

Trade unions

379. The Palestinian trade union movement emerged in the early 1920s. The right to form trade unions is regulated under the Labour Code (Act No. 7 of 2000), and the Ministry of Labour registers unions and monitors their activities. As of 2019, there were 566 trade union organizations registered with the Ministry.

380. As of June 2019, members of trade and professional unions accounted for 19.3 per cent of the workforce. Male members of trade and professional unions accounted for 17.2 per cent of the male workforce, and female members of trade and professional unions accounted for 30.7 per cent of the female workforce.

381. The right to strike is regulated under article 67 of the Labour Code. The party intending to strike must provide the other party and the Ministry of Labour with written notification explaining the reasons for the action. Such notification is to be given two weeks before the intended strike action, or four weeks in the case of public institutions, and it must be signed by 51 per cent of the employees of the establishment concerned or, in the case of closure, by the same percentage of the managing board. Striking and closure are not permitted while proceedings are underway to consider a collective dispute.

382. A ministerial committee has been formed that is cooperating with partner institutions to study and draft a new bill to regulate trade unions in the light of standards concerning union freedom and plurality. The bill is intended to regulate the formation of trade union organizations, employers' organizations and public-sector unions.

Article 23

383. Under the Personal Status Act, marriage is a contract between a man and a woman whom it is permissible for him to marry, for the purpose of forming a family and procreating. The Personal Status Act No. 61 of 1976 is applicable to personal status matters in the West Bank, while the law applicable in the Gaza Strip is the Family Rights Act No. 303 of 1954. For its part, the sharia court in Jerusalem applies the current personal status laws of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, notably the Jordanian Personal Status Act No. 36 of 2010. These laws are all based on Islamic sharia. As for the Christian communities, each applies its own personal status laws in its own ecclesiastical court.

384. The personal status laws of Muslims and Christians coincide on certain general principles concerning marriage, the most important of which are: that a contract of marriage can be concluded only between a man and a woman; that the full and free consent of both parties is a core condition for a marriage to be valid; and that personal status documents must be registered before sharia or ecclesiastical courts.

Marriageable age

385. In order to fulfil its obligations under human rights treaties and to implement treaty body recommendations, chiefly those of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, the State of Palestine issued Decree-Law No. 21 of 2019 to amend certain pieces of personal status legislation that fixed marriageable age. The Decree-Law states that eligibility for marriage requires both parties to be of sound mind and both to be at least 18 years of age.

Rights and duties of spouses

386. Marital relations are based on reciprocity of rights and duties wherein each partner treats the other well, and the wife obeys her husband in all permissible matters while the husband is responsible for maintaining the household. Both spouses are responsible for the upbringing of their children and for administering their children's assets until they attain their majority. These responsibilities fall chiefly upon the father even if the children are under the custody of their mother or relatives. Legislation also requires the wife to live in the home of her legal husband and to move home when he does, and a marriage contract may not include any clause that is at variance with that provision. A wife may not refuse to live in her husband's home save for a legitimate reason the validity of which is to be decided by the courts. Moreover, personal status laws forbid women who have custody of children from travelling without consent from the children's guardian.

387. The husband and wife hold their financial assets independently, and each has the right to own, administer and supervise their own funds and property independently of the other. In the case of divorce, both spouses retain their own assets even if those assets were acquired during their married life.

Divorce and separation

388. A man has the right to divorce his wife of his own will and for any reason, even without her consent, and he must register the divorce with the sharia court. If the divorce takes place in absentia, the court must notify the wife within one week of the registration. For her part the wife can insist that the marriage contract give her the right to opt for a divorce. In such a case, she can dissolve the marriage union if her husband violates his marital obligations as enshrined in the law and in the marriage contract. To that end, she can bring a case for separation before the sharia court via consensual or court-mediated khul' proceedings. A woman also has the right to demand that the judge award her compensation if her husband has divorced her arbitrarily and on irrational grounds. An award of compensation does not affect the divorced woman's other marital rights, including the right to maintenance. As concerns the Christian communities, some of them admit divorce, such as the Orthodox, while others admit separation, such as the Catholics.

Child custody

389. Under the Personal Status Act, a mother has the right to keep custody of her children as long as she has the necessary capacity. After the mother, custody reverts to the next woman in the line of succession provided for in the Hanafi school. The woman who retains custody forfeits that right if she marries a man who is not in a degree of consanguinity that precludes marriage to the child in her custody (mahram). Her right is restored if the reason for its removal no longer subsists.

390. According to the 1976 Personal Status Act, a mother's custody over her children lasts until they attain their majority. For female custodians other than the mother custody ends, in the case of a boy, when he reaches the age of 9, and in the case of a girl, when she reaches the age of 11. Under the Family Rights Act, a judge can extend the woman's custody over a girl from the age of 7 up to the age of 9 and, over a boy, from the age of 9 up to the age of 11, if the child's interest so warrant.

391. As concerns the right of children to meet and visit their parents, Circular No. 59/2012 issued by the Bureau of the Chief Qadi reaffirms the right of the non-custodian parent to host the children once a week for up to 24 hours, taking account of their age, circumstances and best interests. The hosting period may be extended, with the agreement of the two parties and with due sureties. Family reconciliation plays an important part in determining and achieving children's best interests.

Family reunification

392. The fact that the authorities of the Israeli occupation control the Palestinian population register means that many families are separated, because thousands of Palestinians are prevented from entering or leaving the country or because one of the spouses is from the Gaza Strip. Moreover Israeli citizenship laws, which are rooted on racial and national discrimination, prevent the reunification of families in which one spouse is a Palestinian from Jerusalem and the other is a Palestinian from the West Bank or the Gaza Strip.

Polygamy and forced marriage

393. A man may marry up to four wives on condition that he treats them all equally, while a wife may stipulate in the contract of marriage that her husband cannot take other wives. If he then does so, she has the right to take action. All the Christian schools prohibit polygamy.

394. Article 34 (3) of the 1976 Personal Status Act and article 36 of Family Rights Act No. 303 both state that a marriage is invalid if it takes place under duress. For its part, article 44 (8) of the Children's Act, as amended, prohibits subjecting children to forced marriage.

395. According to the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, about 20 per cent of the women who married in 2017 were under the age of 18. In 2010 that figure stood at 24 per cent.

Article 24

396. Article 29 of the amended Basic Law imposes a national obligation to care for children and mothers. Children, moreover, have the right to comprehensive protection and care; they are not to be exploited for any purpose and they are to be protected against abuse and ill-treatment. If children are sentenced to a penalty of deprivation of liberty, they are to be held separately from adults and they are to be reformed while being treated in a manner consistent with their age.

397. The Children's Act, as amended, envisages the right of children to be recorded in the civil register as soon as they are born. According to articles 17–19 of the Civil Status Act, someone is to be charged with responsibility for informing the Ministry of the Interior of the birth and for providing information about the infant after which, once the birth has been duly registered, a birth certificate is issued. Article 16 of the Children's Act states that children have the right to an appropriate name that is not insulting or degrading. As concerns children of unknown parents, the Ministry of Social Development oversees the registration procedures and, having verified that the child's dossier is complete, sends it to the Ministry of the Interior so that the infant can be registered and a birth certificate issued.

398. Article 947 of the Compendium of Legal Judgements states that a person with discernment is one who "is able to administer and preserve his assets and who can guard against imprudence and dissipation".

399. Article 18 of the Children's Act stipulates: "Every Palestinian child has, as soon as they are born, the right to Palestinian nationality, in accordance with the provisions of the relevant law." However, as stated earlier, the occupation prevents the issuance of a Palestinian law regulating the right to nationality.

Juveniles

400. The Decree-Law of 2016 concerning the protection of juveniles embraces the concept of the best interests of the child; this includes restorative justice, mediation and reparation measures. Article 1 of the Decree-Law defines a juvenile as: "A child who is under the age of 18 when he or she commits a criminal offence or is in a situation that places him or her at risk of delinquency." The age of criminal responsibility is 12.

401. In order to ensure their best interests, units for juveniles were set up in 2016 as part of the structure of the police and of the Office of the Public Prosecution. Specialized judges have been appointed, a digital system has been introduced to control the duration of cases, efforts are being made to ensure the confidentiality of trial proceedings and legal fees have been waived. Beginning in 2013, the Ministry of Social Development has been recruiting lawyers in the West Bank in order to provide free legal aid for children, while memorandums of understanding have been signed with NGOs that provide such services.

402. The Prosecutor General has instructed that juveniles should be detained only as a last resort; if they are held in custody, they should be placed in social welfare institutions; they should be kept separate from adults, both at court and in places of detention, and no juvenile under the age of 15 should be held in custody at all. As a consequence, there has been a perceptible decrease in arrests of juveniles by juvenile-court prosecutors, from over 600 arrests in 2016 to 158 in 2017.

403. Under a 2010 decree of the Council of Ministers, the Ministry of Social Development set up a national commission for juvenile justice. Subsequently, in 2016, the same Ministry developed a strategic plan for juvenile justice and set up a committee to monitor the implementation of the Decree-Law concerning the protection of juveniles. The Ministry has also developed a procedural guide for the referral of juveniles in which the roles of the various organs of the judiciary and of other governmental bodies are explained, as well as a guide to alternatives to detention. Moreover, a memorandum of understanding has been concluded between the Supreme Judicial Council and the Ministry regarding follow-up on issues related to juvenile justice.

404. Dar al-Amal is a social welfare institution for the detention and custody of juveniles in the West Bank while Dar al-Rabea performs the same function in the Gaza Strip. Both institutions take in children between the ages of 13 and 18. There is no equivalent institution for female juveniles although the care home for girls has, over past years, taken in girls who are in conflict with the law. These institutions are part of the Ministry of Social Development and are periodically visited by the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the Independent Commission for Human Rights and NGOs.

405. A total of 236 children were held in Dar al-Amal in 2014, 170 in 2016 and 205 in 2017, while, in 2014, there was a single case of a girl in conflict with the law being held in the care home for girls. The low number of girls may be attributed to the prevailing societal culture whereby such cases are often resolved very quickly, before they even reach the courts. Work is currently underway to improve Dar al-Amal and to adopt a system of education and of medical and psychological testing for the young inmates. In the course of 2015, 900 juveniles were held in Dar al-Rabea which, in coordination with the Palestinian Centre for Democracy and Conflict Resolution, provides free legal aid to juvenile offenders. A reformation committee has been set up inside the institution to follow up on cases involving juveniles.

Arrest and torture of Palestinian children by the Israeli occupation forces

406. Thousands of Palestinian children have fallen victim to the systematic and widespread Israeli practice of arbitrary detention. Between 2000 and 2020, some 18,000 Palestinian children were held in the prisons of the Israeli occupation. And detained children have been subjected to various forms of torture, abuse, humiliation and denial of the most basic human rights.

407. One of the findings of the report of Defence for Children International on children arrested by the Israeli occupation forces was that 324 out of the 429 Palestinian children arrested between 2012 and 2015 were subjected to physical violence. Israeli interrogators used verbal abuse, threats and solitary confinement to extract confessions from a number of detained children. All children convicted by the occupation forces between 2012 and 2015 received custodial sentences.

Prohibition of discrimination

408. According to article 3 of the Children's Act, as amended: "(a) All children are to enjoy the rights envisaged in the present Act without discrimination on grounds of sex; colour; nationality; religion; language; national, religious or social origin; wealth; disability; birth; parentage or discrimination on any other grounds; (b) The State is to take all appropriate measures to protect children from discrimination of all kinds, in order to ensure effective equality and to guarantee the rights enshrined in the present Act."

409. Inheritance rights are addressed under current personal status laws.

Children deprived of a family environment

410. Children's right to alternative care arrangements is covered under existing legislation, with article 32 of the amended Children's Act stating: "Children who have been deprived of a natural family environment, whether permanently or temporarily, have the right to alternative care: (a) In an alternative (foster) family that provides guardianship and care; (b) In public or private social welfare institutions, if no foster family is available."

411. The Ministry of Social Development also provides care services for orphans, with cash payments to all children who have lost their father or both their parents. Children of unknown parentage and orphans deprived of a family environment are sometimes cared for in private institutions or foster families under the supervision of the Ministry of Social Development. There are currently five child welfare institutions in the State of Palestine.

412. The placement system is regulated by the Foster System Regulations, which were endorsed by the Council of Ministers in 2013. Under the Regulations – which apply to children of unknown parentage and children deprived of care within their own families – foster families must fulfil certain conditions. A placement database has been set up and a procedural manual developed on how to interact with children of unknown parentage and children born outside marriage.

413. Adoption in its globally accepted sense does not exist in the State of Palestine, the alternative being a system of tutelage or placement. Under the tutelage system the needs of the tutored child are fully addressed and the child enjoys rights equal to the sponsor's own offspring with the exception of the legal rights stemming from family lineage such as those relating to marriage, inheritance, etc. The following documents can be issued for a tutored minor: a birth certificate with an invented four-part name, a custody document and, possibly, a passport.

414. Decree-Law No. 10 of 2019 concerns evidence linked to adoption among Christian communities. The purpose of the Decree-Law is to enable the adoption of children of unknown parents by Christian families if the evidence points to the children themselves being Christian.

Protection against human trafficking

415. Article 42 of the Children's Act, as amended, dictates that children must be protected from all forms of exploitation, including sexual exploitation. Article 44 (5) of the Act states that the sexual or economic exploitation of children constitutes a threat to children's well-being, one to which they must not be exposed. According to article 47, a child is at risk of delinquency if he or she is found, lives or works in an environment related to prostitution, debauchery or immorality or similar illicit actions. One task of child counsellors is to undertake preventive and therapeutic intervention in all cases where the well-being of children is threatened (art. 52).

416. In 2017, the State of Palestine acceded to the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography.

Child labour and the economic exploitation of children

417. Article 14 of the Children's Act, as amended, prohibits the employment of children under the age of 15. It also prohibits employing children in hazardous work or in any form of labour that might impede their education or damage their health. Violations of these provisions are punishable with a fine of between 1,000 and 2,000 Jordanian dinars, with the penalty being increased in accordance with the number of victims. For repeat offences, the penalty can even extend to the full or partial closure of the establishment concerned. Article 43 of the Act prohibits the use of children for begging or their employment in unlawful conditions.

418. The table below shows the proportion of children aged 10–17 who work, with or without pay, according to data from the Central Bureau of Statistics:

Year	Total	Boys	Girls
2016	3.9%	7.4%	0.3%
2017	3.4%	6.6%	0.1%
2018	3%	6%	0.2%

419. There is a widespread phenomenon of "disguised begging", whereby children sell simple items, usually at places such as Israeli military checkpoints or traffic lights. The Ministry of Social Development coordinates with other bodies to monitor such children and takes action to protect them. In 2017, 27 cases of begging were addressed, 12 involving boys and 15 involving girls. One obstacle to protecting children from economic exploitation lies in the fact that the Israeli occupiers deliberately impede the access and operations of the Palestinian police, making it difficult for them to arrest persons suspected of involvement in the economic exploitation of children. Moreover, the economic situation in the Gaza Strip, which has been worsened by the Israeli blockade, has left many schoolchildren looking for work, sometimes hazardous work.

420. With a view to formulating policies to protect children from economic exploitation, and in partnership with civil society institutions and trade unions, the Minister of Labour issued Decree No. 80 of 2013 for the formation of the National Committee on Child Labour.

421. The Office of the Public Prosecutor for Juveniles and the relevant police departments and ministries conduct field visits to places of work and take appropriate action if they discover any violations. The Ministry of Labour receives complaints, which it verifies then pursues before the courts. Child victims of economic exploitation are offered rehabilitation in vocational training centres run by the Ministry of Labour then reintegrated into society where they continue to be monitored via the child protection network. Ministries also carry out awareness-raising campaigns on child labour and exploitation in various fields.

422. The outcome of an inspection conducted by the Ministry of Labour in 2015 showed that visits had been carried out in 4,727 establishments employing 55,179 workers of whom 167 were found to be children. The following action was taken in regard of child-labour offences: cautions issued in 3 cases; dismissal in 4 cases because the work being performed was of a kind prohibited for children; guidance provided for the child and the employer in 8 cases; establishment closed and child dismissed in 1 case; warnings issued in 40 cases; and matter referred to the Ministry of Social Development in 2 cases. In addition to this, 16 cases in which children were being exploited inside the Green Line were referred to the Ministry of Social Development for it to apply protection measures in accordance with the law.

Article 25

423. The Declaration of Independence stipulates that the State of Palestine is for Palestinians wherever they may be and is to be governed by a democratic parliamentary system. The Basic Law, as amended, states that the people are the source of authority and that the system of governance in the State of Palestine is to be democratic, representative and based on political and party pluralism. According to electoral laws, presidential and legislative elections are to be held every four years while the central electoral commission is responsible for managing, supervising and ensuring the impartiality of the electoral process.

Conditions governing elections and candidacy for elections

424. Decree-Law No. 1 of 2007 regarding general elections regulates both presidential and legislative elections. Article 28 (1) of the Decree-Law states that the right to vote applies to all Palestinians in the West Bank, including Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip, irrespective of their religion, opinions, political affiliation, social or economic status or educational attainments.

425. Article 27 of the Decree-Law stipulates that, in order to be eligible to vote, an individual must be Palestinian, be at least 18 years of age and be registered in the definitive electoral roll. For the purposes of the Decree-Law a person is deemed to be Palestinian:

- (a) If he or she was born within the borders of Palestine as delineated at the time of the British Mandate or had the right to acquire Palestinian citizenship under laws in effect at that time;
- (b) If he or she was born in the Gaza Strip or West Bank, including Jerusalem;
- (c) If the provisions of paragraph (a) above apply to any of his or her ascendants, regardless of their place of birth;
- (d) If he or she is the spouse of a Palestinian woman or Palestinian man, as defined above.

426. Under article 36 of the Decree-Law regarding general elections, candidates for the post of President must be Palestinian born to Palestinian parents, be at least 40 years of age, be permanently resident on Palestinian territory and fulfil the conditions required to exercise the right to vote.

427. Under article 45 of the Decree-Law, candidates for membership of the Legislative Council must be Palestinian, be at least 28 years of age, be registered in the definitive electoral roll, not have been convicted for a serious offence or for a breach of honour or trust and be permanently resident on Palestinian territory.

428. Article 7 of Local Council Election Act No. 10 of 2005 stipulates that, in order to be eligible to vote in local council elections, an individual must be Palestinian, be at least 18 years of age, be resident in the relevant electoral district for a period of at least 6 months prior to the election, be registered in the definitive electoral roll and not have lost legal capacity.

429. Under article 18 of the Decree-Law, candidates for membership of local councils must be registered in the definitive electoral roll, fulfil the conditions required to exercise the right to vote, not have been convicted for a breach of honour or trust or for a major offence, not be a functionary or employee of the Ministry of Local Government, the security services or a local body, or a lawyer serving one of those institutions, be resident in the electoral district where they are standing for a period of at least one year prior to the election and not be a candidate in another district or on another list.

Legislation depriving citizens of their right to vote and stand as candidate in elections

430. Under, respectively, articles 29 (1) and 37 of the Decree-Law regarding general elections, persons can be deprived of their right to vote or to stand for President if a definitive court order has been issued against them depriving them of that right or depriving them of legal capacity, if they have been convicted for a breach of honour or trust and have not been rehabilitated or if they have acquired Israeli nationality.

431. According to article 326 of the Commercial Code (Act No. 12 of 1966): “Persons who are bankrupt lose their political rights in the month in which their bankruptcy is declared. They may not vote or be elected to municipal councils or to professional bodies and they may not discharge public duties or functions.”

Electoral system

432. Under current electoral laws, presidential elections take place by direct, free and secret universal ballot. Members of the Legislative Council and of local councils are elected by secret ballot using a list-based system of proportional representation.

433. As a way of promoting women’s right to political participation and to involvement in general and local elections, electoral laws have embraced a “female quota” system. In fact, the Decree-Law regarding general elections and the Local Council Election Act both set minimum levels for female representation on electoral candidate lists. However, the level of female representation is still only at the levels dictated by the law and has not yet reached 30 per cent, which was the level set in political parties’ self-imposed pledge.

434. Electoral legislation also envisages the allocation of seats for Palestinian Christians in some local electoral districts and in legislative elections, as well as a seat for the Samaritan community in the Nablus district.

435. Voters who are illiterate or have a disability that prevents them from marking the ballot paper for themselves can, with the agreement of the staff at the voting station, seek assistance from a person of their trust. The ballot is then to be monitored by the electoral commission.

Local elections of 2017

436. During the local council elections of May 2017, 587 lists were presented with a total of 4,822 candidates, with women accounting for 26 per cent of all candidates. On 199 councils, the candidates won by acclamation as only one electoral list had been presented for the district.

437. The 2017 elections were monitored by 78 local and international institutions. In addition, there were 914 accredited journalists, as compared with 557 in previous elections. The central electoral commission considered 102 administrative appeals concerning the 2017 election and, of 34 cases referred to the local-council electoral appeals court, 4 were admitted.

438. Israel, the occupying power, imposes severe restrictions on Palestinians’ freedom of travel thereby hindering the movement of voters and of staff of the central electoral commission. It also rejects any arrangements that might allow prisoners to participate in the voting process and it arrests members of the Legislative Council. In addition to this, Israel engages in numerous forms of harassment against Jerusalemites, such as threats of forced deportation, something that led to their decreased participation in the second legislative elections. In 2004, the occupying authorities closed voter registration centres in Jerusalem and arrested the people working there.

Public office

439. Article 26 (4) of the amended Basic Law stipulates that access to public office and public-service posts is to be governed by the principle of equal opportunity. Moreover, appointment and promotion in State functions is to be marked by equality and non-discrimination among candidates, and criteria of competence and experience are to be applied in the selection of candidates. A minimum quota of 5 per cent is set for the employment of persons with disabilities.

440. Under article 24 of the Civil Service Act, as amended, persons appointed to public office must be Palestinian or Arab, be at least 18 years of age, be free from any illnesses that might impede the discharge of their duties (persons with disabilities may be employed if their disability is not such as would prevent them discharging their duties) and not have been convicted for a major offence or for a breach of honour or trust, unless they have been rehabilitated.

441. According to article 96 of the Act, the service of public functionaries ends when they reach the mandatory age of separation, if they are unfit for duty, if they resign, if they lose their post, if they are pensioned off or dismissed from service, if a definitive sentence is handed down against them for a major offence or for a breach of honour or trust, or if they die. Jurisdiction to consider disputes relating to public office lies with the High Court of Justice.

Article 26

442. Equality, non-discrimination, rule of law, equality before the law and the courts, and a guaranteed right for all persons to have recourse to justice are enshrined in the Declaration of Independence and in the amended Basic Law. The Palestinian judicial system provides remedies without discrimination while numerous legal and administrative provisions exist that explicitly prohibit discrimination. These include article 18 of Decree No. 3 of 2006 of the Supreme Judicial Council, which concerns a code of conduct for the judiciary and states: “In the discharge of their judicial functions judges must, in their words and deeds, treat all persons equally, whether or not they are parties to the case, and must not discriminate between them on grounds of religion, race, colour or for any other reason.”

Article 27

443. The legal and political system of the State of Palestine contains no restrictions that may prevent anyone from exercising their right to culture or to profess their religion and practise their religious rites. This is clearly set forth in the Declaration of Independence, which is the highest-ranking document in the legislative hierarchy of the State of Palestine. It stipulates that the State of Palestine is the State of Palestinians wherever they may be. Therein they shall develop their national and cultural identity, enjoy full equality of rights, and have their religious and political beliefs and human dignity safeguarded under a democratic parliamentary system based on equality and on non-discrimination in public rights on grounds of race, religion or colour, or between men and women.

444. It should also be emphasized that any mention of individual ethnic, religious or linguistic characteristics within Palestinian society in no way compromises the Palestinian identity of such groups or implies that they are “minorities” in the Palestinian legal system. On the contrary, they are part of the Palestinian “whole”, which has its own ethnic, linguistic and cultural specificities.

445. Palestinian society is characterized by its harmony, its seamless national fabric and its Palestinian identity. One expression of this is to be found in its cultural associations and centres, museums and religious rituals. By way of example, Palestinian Samaritans perform their religious rituals at their synagogues in Nablus (Mount Gerizim) and still speak to one another using the Samaritan language, an ancient Semitic tongue. A number of Samaritan institutions have been established including the Samaritan Legend Association, a Samaritan youth club, a Samaritan study centre and the Samaritan Museum in Mount Gerizim, which celebrates Samaritan heritage.

446. In order to preserve Armenian culture, a club for local Armenians has been established, as well as an association for Armenian youth, the Araks Catholic club and an Armenian charitable association in Jerusalem. Armenian Palestinians continue to use the Armenian language among themselves and have access to a cultural infrastructure that includes the library and museum of the Monastery of St. Jacob. Other institutions have been created such as the Association of St. Mark in Jerusalem, the Syriac Club, the St. Ephrem Syriac Orthodox Society. The magazine Al-Hikma seeks to revive Syriac culture and the St. Ephrem school has been founded for the teaching of Aramaic.

447. Palestinians of African descent in Jerusalem run an association that acts as an important community centre for political and cultural events. Palestinian Copts use Coptic in their religious rites and rituals, while the Coptic Church owns a number of civil institutions of which perhaps the best known are the Coptic schools. Famous Coptic churches and monasteries in Jerusalem include the Monastery of the Sultan, the Monastery of Saint Anthony, the Monastery of St. George and the Church of the Blessed Virgin. In Jericho there is the Monastery and Church of St. Anthony and the Monastery and Church of Sts. Zacchaeus and Andrew. Palestinians of Moroccan origin have established a Moroccan women's association in Jerusalem. The Moroccan quarter itself contained dozens of archaeological sites, the most famous being the Afdaliyyah School, but the bulldozers of the Israeli occupiers destroyed the 135 archaeological buildings there.

448. The ongoing violations being committed by Israel, the occupying power, and its systematic and widespread racist policies effectively prevent the State of Palestine from acting to guarantee Palestinians' right to culture. These violations include forcibly entering, confiscating and closing institutions, cancelling events, suppressing cultural activities that express Palestinian identity, etc., particularly in occupied Jerusalem, as part of a plan to Judaize the city.

449. The State of Palestine promotes the active involvement of all Palestinian people in the administration of public affairs. Conditions governing voting and candidacy, as set forth in current electoral laws, do not discriminate between Palestinians on grounds of race, colour, descent, religion or national or ethnic origin. With regard to temporary measures, the municipality of Bethlehem has a permanent seat for Syriacs, while Priest Saloum Amram Yitzhaq was elected to the Palestinian Legislative Council in 1996.

450. The State of Palestine acceded to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination in 2014. It is working to implement the concluding observations issued by the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination following its consideration of the initial report of the State of Palestine, and is taking action and applying measures to protect the rights of the groups protected under the Convention.

Human Rights Committee

Concluding observations on the fifth periodic report of Israel*

1. The Committee considered the fifth periodic report of Israel¹ at its 3841st and 3842nd meetings,² held on 2 and 3 March 2022. At its 3868th meeting, held on 22 March 2022, it adopted the present concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee is grateful to the State party for having accepted the simplified reporting procedure and for submitting its fifth periodic report in response to the list of issues prior to reporting prepared under that procedure.³ It expresses appreciation for the opportunity to renew its constructive dialogue with the State party's delegation on the measures taken during the reporting period to implement the provisions of the Covenant. The Committee thanks the State party for the oral responses provided by the delegation and for the supplementary information provided to it in writing.

B. Positive aspects

3. The Committee welcomes the adoption by the State party of the following legislative, policy and institutional measures:

- (a) Government Resolution No. 550, which aims, inter alia, to promote diversity and the inclusion of the Arab population in the private and public sectors, in 2021;
- (b) Amendment No. 137 to Penal Law 5737-1977, which recognizes racist motives as an aggravating circumstance for the offence of murder, in 2019;
- (c) Amendment No. 20 to the Legal Aid Law 5732-1972, which grants free legal aid to victims of serious sexual offences throughout criminal and administrative proceedings, in 2017.

C. Principal matters of concern and recommendations

Implementation of the Covenant and its Optional Protocol

4. The Committee notes the information provided by the State party on court cases that referred to the provisions of the Covenant and that law enforcement officials, members of the Israel Defense Forces, Israel Prison Service, Israel Security Agency and legal practitioners are provided with training on human rights, including international human rights law. It

* Adopted by the Committee at its 134th session (28 February–25 March 2022).

³ CCPR/C/ISR/QPR/5.

regrets, however, that the State party has not yet acceded to the two Optional Protocols to the Covenant and maintains its reservation to article 23 of the Covenant (art. 2).

5. The State party should continue and strengthen its efforts to raise awareness among judges, prosecutors, lawyers, law enforcement officers, security forces, civil society actors and members of the general public about the Covenant and its applicability in domestic law, including by providing training on the provisions of the Covenant. Furthermore, it should consider acceding to the two Optional Protocols to the Covenant and withdrawing its reservation to article 23 of the Covenant.

Applicability of the Covenant to the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan

6. The Committee reiterates⁴ its concern that the State party maintains its position that the Covenant does not apply with respect to individuals under its jurisdiction, but outside its territory, despite the interpretation to the contrary of article 2 (1) supported by the jurisprudence of the Committee, various other treaty bodies, the International Court of Justice and State practice. It is further concerned at the State party's position that international human rights law does not apply when international humanitarian law is applicable (art. 2).

7. Recalling its previous recommendations,⁵ the Committee urges the State party to:

(a) Interpret the Covenant in good faith, in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to its terms in their context, including subsequent practice, and in light of the object and purpose of the Covenant, and review its legal position so as to acknowledge the extraterritorial application of the Covenant under certain circumstances, as outlined, inter alia, in the Committee's general comment No. 31 (2004) on the nature of the general legal obligation imposed on States parties to the Covenant. In this respect, the Committee reiterates and underscores that the Covenant applies with regard to all conduct by the State party's authorities or agents adversely affecting the enjoyment of the rights enshrined in the Covenant by persons under its jurisdiction, regardless of the location;

(b) Review its legal position and acknowledge that the applicability of international humanitarian law during an armed conflict, as well as in a situation of occupation, does not preclude the application of the Covenant.

National human rights institution

8. The Committee notes that, notwithstanding the general support expressed by the State party for the establishment of a national human rights institution in line with the principles relating to the status of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights (the Paris Principles), no such institution has yet been established (art. 2).

9. The State party should step up its efforts to establish a national human rights institution in line with the Paris Principles, including by ensuring the pluralism of its membership and the diversity of its composition, and allow civil society organizations to participate in this process.

Non-discrimination

10. The Committee expresses its deep concern about the Basic Law: Israel – The Nation-State of the Jewish People of 2018, which may exacerbate pre-existing systematic and structural discrimination against non-Jews in the State party. It is particularly concerned that, under this Law, the right to self-determination is “unique to the Jewish people”, Hebrew is the State language while Arabic is downgraded to a language with “special status” and the development of Jewish settlements is viewed as a “national value” (art. 2).

⁴ CCPR/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 5; and CCPR/C/ISR/CO/3, para. 5.

11. The Committee reiterates the recommendations made by the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination⁶ and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights⁷ that the State party review and amend the Basic Law: Israel – The Nation-State of the Jewish People with a view to eliminating its discriminatory effect on non-Jewish people and ensuring the equal treatment of all persons within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction, in conformity with the Covenant.

12. The Committee takes note of the measures aimed at promoting representation of the Arab population and women in the civil service and amendment No. 12 to the Municipal Council Law (Funding of Elections) 5774-2014 aimed at enhancing women's representation in political parties. However, it remains concerned at the continuing underrepresentation of these groups in the civil service and in government, particularly in decision-making positions, including in the regional councils and the Knesset (arts. 2, 25 and 26).

13. Bearing in mind the Committee's previous recommendations,⁸ the State party should strengthen its efforts to achieve equitable representation of Israeli citizens of Arab origin and women in the civil service and in government, particularly in decision-making positions in legislative and executive bodies, including the Knesset.

Settlement activities and the wall

14. The Committee is deeply concerned at the continued construction and expansion of Israeli settlements and unauthorized outposts in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan, and the transfer of the State party's population thereto, despite the recommendations made by different treaty bodies,⁹ the Security Council,¹⁰ the Human Rights Council¹¹ and the General Assembly.¹² It notes with concern the State party's interference with the full access of Palestinians and the Syrian Arab population to their lands and livelihood in the occupied territories, through wrongful expropriation, confiscation, requisitions and encroachment. It is further concerned that, despite the ruling of the High Court of Justice that the Regularization Law of 2017 is unconstitutional, there remain other alternative mechanisms under Israeli law allowing for the retroactive legalization of unauthorized outposts and structures in settlements. It notes with deep concern the continued construction of the wall in the West Bank, which significantly restricts Palestinians' enjoyment and exercise of rights and freedoms, including freedom of movement and access to land, especially agricultural land, property and natural resources (arts. 1, 2, 9, 12, 17, 18 and 26).

15. Recalling its previous recommendations,¹³ the Committee urges the State party to:

(a) Cease the construction and expansion of settlements in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan, and all settlement-related activities, including the transfer of its own population thereto;

(b) Put an end to the practice of expropriating private land owned by Palestinians and the Syrian Arab population and declaring it as "State land" for settlement purposes;

view to ensuring Palestinians' full access to their lands and livelihoods and the enjoyment of their Covenant rights, including the right of self-determination.

State of emergency

16. While noting serious security concerns affecting the State party and the ongoing review of the national legal framework on emergencies and related measures, the Committee remains deeply concerned that the State party maintains the state of emergency and continues to resort to emergency measures. It also notes with concern that emergency measures taken during the two-year state of emergency in response to the coronavirus disease (COVID-19) pandemic have further restricted the enjoyment of Covenant rights by Palestinians in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, especially in the Gaza Strip (art. 4).

17. Recalling its previous recommendations,¹⁵ the Committee calls on the State party to ensure that revisions to the national legal framework on emergencies and related measures, including those relating to the protection of public health in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, as well as any restrictions, are made in strict accordance with the conditions outlined in the Covenant, particularly in the Committee's general comment No. 29 (2001) and its statement on derogations from the Covenant in connection with the COVID-19 pandemic (2020).¹⁶

Counter-terrorism measures

18. The Committee is concerned that Counter Terrorism Law 5776-2016 contains vague and overbroad definitions of "terrorist organization" and "terrorist act" and may be used to oppress and criminalize legitimate political or humanitarian acts, as illustrated by the designation, in October 2021, of six Palestinian civil society organizations as terrorist organizations based on secret information. It is further concerned about the use of secret evidence in counter-terrorism proceedings, which is inaccessible to defendants and their lawyers, thereby violating their right to a fair trial. It is also deeply concerned that amendment No. 30 to the Entry into Israel Law of 2018, providing for the revocation of permanent residency on the vague ground of "breach of allegiance against the State of Israel", which is defined as a terrorist act under the Counter Terrorism Law, has been used to revoke the permanent residency of Palestinian residents and human rights defenders advocating for the rights of Palestinians, including human rights lawyer, Salah Hammouri (arts. 2, 9, 12 and 14).

19. The State party should review its Counter Terrorism Law 5776-2016 with a view to ensuring that the definitions of "terrorist organization" and "terrorist act" therein, as well as the powers conferred by and the limits on the exercise of the Law, are in full compliance with the Covenant and the principles of legal certainty, necessity, proportionality and the rule of law. It should also clarify the definition of "allegiance against the State of Israel", including under amendment No. 30 to the Entry into Israel Law, and refrain from using this provision to control the demographic composition in the State party or to silence human rights defenders advocating for the rights of Palestinians. Furthermore, the State party should ensure that persons suspected of or charged with terrorist acts or related crimes are provided, in law and in practice, with appropriate procedural safeguards, in accordance with the Covenant, particularly its articles 9 and 14.

Violence against women

20. While noting the provision of training to investigators and patrol officers on handling cases of violence against women and the opening of a 24-hour emergency centre for victims of domestic violence, the Committee remains concerned at underreporting by victims of violence against women and the lack of impact assessment of measures taken to combat such violence. It regrets the lack of disaggregated data on cases of violence against women, which would allow for targeted prevention and protection measures (arts. 2, 3, 6, 7 and 26).

¹⁵ CCPR/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 10.

¹⁶ CCPR/C/128/2.

21. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Address the underreporting of violence against women, including by ensuring that all women have access to information about their rights and available remedies, and conduct awareness-raising campaigns about the unacceptability and adverse impact of violence against women;

(b) Intensify efforts to investigate all allegations of violence against women, prosecute and, if found guilty, punish perpetrators with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offences, and provide effective remedies to victims, including by strengthening training of relevant public officials, including judges, lawyers, prosecutors and law enforcement officers;

(c) Establish a reliable system for the collection of statistical data on violence against women, disaggregated by race or ethnic origin, in order to effectively target measures to ensure their protection.

Past human rights violations

22. While noting the progress made in implementing the recommendations of the Turkel Commission, including the establishment of a special unit within the Military Police Criminal Investigation Division, the Committee regrets the lack of updated information on investigation into human rights violations in the Gaza Strip related to “Operation Cast Lead” (27 December 2008–18 January 2009), “Operation Pillar of Defence” (14–21 November 2012), and “Operation Protective Edge” (8 July–26 August 2014), and their outcomes (arts. 2, 6, 7, 9, 12, and 17).

23. Bearing in mind the Committee’s previous recommendations,¹⁷ the State party should continue and strengthen its efforts to implement the recommendations of the Turkel Commission, including by impartially and thoroughly investigating all allegations of human rights violations committed during the military operations in the Gaza Strip in 2008–2009, 2012 and 2014, bringing perpetrators, including those with command responsibility, to justice, and providing victims or their families with effective remedies and guarantees of non-repetition.

Settler violence in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem

24. While noting information provided by the State party on the investigations conducted into “ideologically based offences” by settlers in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, the Committee remains concerned about: (a) a significant increase in the number and severity of incidents of settler violence in recent years;¹⁸ (b) the involvement of the Israeli security forces in such violence; and (c) a very low rate of indictments and convictions of perpetrators, fostering a general climate of impunity. The Committee notes with concern the underreporting by victims, owing to their lack of trust in the authorities and fear of reprisals, and the lack of access for victims to justice and effective remedies (arts. 2, 6, 7, 14, 17 and 26).

25. Recalling its previous recommendations,¹⁹ the Committee urges the State party to intensify its efforts to prevent and combat violence perpetrated against Palestinians by the Israeli settlers in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, as well as by Israeli security forces alongside these settlers, and to provide adequate protection to victims. To this end, the State party should ensure that all allegations of settler violence are thoroughly and impartially investigated, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if found guilty, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offences, and that victims are provided with effective remedies.

¹⁸ A/76/336, para. 17.

¹⁹ CCPR/C/ISR/CO/4, para. 16.

Excessive use of lethal force

26. The Committee is deeply concerned by continuing and consistent reports of the excessive use of lethal force by the Israeli security forces against Palestinian civilians, including children, and the lack of accountability for these acts, resulting in a general climate of impunity. It is particularly concerned about excessive force used in policing demonstrations, including the Great March of Return between March 2018 and December 2019, during which 183 people, including children, paramedics, journalists and persons with disabilities, were shot dead. It is also concerned that no perpetrator has been brought to justice for excessive force used against 260 Palestinians, including children, during the escalation of hostilities in Gaza in May 2021 (arts. 6, 7 and 21).

27. Bearing in mind the Committee's previous recommendations,²⁰ the State party should take all necessary measures to prevent the excessive use of force during law enforcement operations, including by:

(a) Ensuring that rules and regulations governing the engagement of, or opening of fire by, the Israeli security forces in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip, and their practice, are consistent with the Committee's general comments Nos. 36 (2018) on the right to life and 37 (2020) on the right to peaceful assembly, the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials and the United Nations Human Rights Guidance on Less-Lethal Weapons in Law Enforcement;

(b) Ensuring that prompt, thorough, effective, independent and impartial investigations are launched into all incidents involving the excessive use of force by the Israeli security forces, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if found guilty, punished, and that victims are provided with effective remedies;

(c) Providing regular training to all members of the Israeli security forces on the use of force, the employment of non-violent means and crowd control, and ensure that the principles of necessity and proportionality are strictly adhered to in practice.

Prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

28. The Committee is deeply concerned that, despite the affirmation in the State party's report of 2017²¹ that its authorities were in the final stage of drafting a bill on the prohibition of torture, no such law has been adopted. It is also concerned that the State party continues to recognize the defence of "necessity" as a legal justification for torture and that an independent monitoring mechanism has not been established for detention facilities. While noting real-time monitoring of the interrogation rooms of the Israel Security Agency through closed-circuit television, the Committee remains concerned that no recording, apart from a concise memorandum, is kept of the video transmission of the actual interrogations, leaving torture victims without audio or visual documentation to be used as evidence in courts (arts. 7 and 14).

29. Bearing in mind the Committee's previous recommendations,²² the State party should place an absolute ban on torture, including by incorporating into its legislation, such as the draft basic law on the rights of suspects and defendants, a definition of torture that is fully in line with article 7 of the Covenant, and removing the notion of "necessity" as a possible justification for the crime of torture. It should also establish an independent and effective monitoring mechanism for all detention facilities within its territory and occupied territories, keep audio and visual documentation of all interrogations taking place in the facilities of the Israel Security Agency and ensure that such documentation can be used as evidence in courts.

30. The Committee is deeply concerned about reports of the widespread and systematic practice of torture and ill-treatment by Israel Prison Service guards and the Israeli security forces against Palestinians, including children, at the time of arrest and in detention. It is particularly concerned about the use of physical and psychological violence, sleep deprivation, stress positions and prolonged solitary confinement, including against children and detainees with intellectual or psychosocial disabilities. It also notes with concern a very low rate of criminal investigations, prosecutions and convictions concerning allegations of torture and ill-treatment (arts. 7, 9, 10 and 24).

31. In view of the Committee's previous recommendations,²³ the State party should take all necessary measures to end the practice of torture and ill-treatment against Palestinian detainees, particularly children, in line with the Covenant and international standards, as reflected in the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules). In particular, it should consider abolishing the use of solitary confinement against children and developing alternative measures where necessary. It should ensure that all allegations of torture and ill-treatment are promptly, impartially, thoroughly and effectively investigated, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if found guilty, are punished with sanctions commensurate with the severity of the crime, and that victims are provided with full reparation, including rehabilitation and adequate compensation.

32. The Committee is particularly concerned that, pursuant to amendment No. 3 to the Counter Terrorism Law of 2018, the Israeli police authorities have been withholding the bodies of Palestinian militants and civilians who allegedly committed terrorist acts and were killed by the Israeli security forces. It is further concerned that the bodies were used as leverage for the release of the bodies of Israelis held by Palestinian militant groups, and that the authorities set conditions for the release of bodies, including the payment of deposits and specific requirements for the funerals, including a limited number of participants and immediate burial. It expresses concern that the practice of withholding the bodies of the deceased and denying the right of their families to bury them may amount to collective punishment and to torture and ill-treatment (arts. 6 and 7).

33. The State party should review amendment No. 3 to the Counter Terrorism Law of 2018, allowing for the withholding of bodies of deceased Palestinians, with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Covenant, and immediately return the bodies of deceased Palestinians to their families.

Liberty and security of persons

34. The Committee is concerned about the widespread practice of arbitrary arrest and detention, including in facilities located in Israel, of Palestinians, including journalists, human rights defenders and children, in violation of international humanitarian law and the Covenant. It is further deeply concerned about the continuing practice of administrative detention of Palestinians, including children, without charge or trial and without the guarantee of fundamental legal safeguards, as in the case of human rights defender Salah Hammoudi. It notes with concern the use of secret evidence in administrative detention proceedings and routine approvals and renewals by military courts of administrative detention orders, even in cases involving detainees with serious health issues, such as Amal Nakhleh who was a minor at the time of his arrest (art. 9).

35. Bearing in mind the Committee's previous recommendations,²⁴ the State party should immediately put an end to the widespread practice of arbitrary arrest and detention, including administrative detention, of Palestinians, in particular children. It should ensure that Palestinian detainees, including those held in administrative detention, are provided with all legal and procedural safeguards, including the rights to be informed of the reason for their arrest and detention, to access legal counsel, to be brought promptly before a judge and to notify a person of their choice of their detention, in line with article 9 of the Covenant and the Committee's general comment No. 35 (2014) on liberty and security of person.

²³ Ibid., para. 15.

²⁴ Ibid., para. 10.

Freedom of movement

36. The Committee reiterates²⁵ its deep concern about the continuing restrictions on freedom of movement imposed by the State party throughout the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, through its discriminatory permit regime and the designation of access-restricted areas. It is further concerned that, in enforcing movement and access restrictions, the Israeli security forces often use lethal force, such as live ammunition, leading to deaths and serious injuries of, inter alia, Palestinian commuters from the West Bank to the Israeli settlements or Israel, Gazan farmers whose lands were designated as an access-restricted area, and Gazan fishermen fishing along the coast of Gaza, where the authorized fishing zones are often reduced or entirely closed (arts. 2, 12 and 26).

37. Bearing in mind the Committee's previous recommendations,²⁶ the State party should ensure that any restrictions imposed on the freedom of movement of Palestinians from, into and within the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, are consistent with the requirements for permissible restrictions set forth in article 12 (3) of the Covenant. It should also ensure that the enforcement of restrictions on movement and access in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, is fully in line with the Covenant, the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 2004 and other international standards (see para. 27 (a) above), that all members of the Israeli security forces found responsible for excessive use of force are held accountable and appropriately sanctioned and that victims of those acts receive effective remedies.

Blockade of the Gaza Strip

38. The Committee is deeply concerned about the long-standing air, sea and land blockade of the Gaza Strip imposed by the State party, which amounts to the collective punishment of the residents of Gaza, and about its adverse impact on the enjoyment of the right to freedom of movement and other rights under the Covenant, including access to basic and life-saving services. It is also concerned about the decrease in the approval rate of applications for exit permits from Gaza and reported delays and even denials of applications for exit permits submitted on behalf of patients in need of medical treatment (arts. 1, 6, 7 and 12).

39. Recalling its previous recommendations,²⁷ the Committee urges the State party to lift the blockade of and closures in the Gaza Strip and end the practice of collective punishment. The State party should ensure that any measures restricting the freedom of movement of civilians and the transfer of goods from, into and within Gaza are consistent with its obligations under the Covenant. It should also take the necessary measures to provide unrestricted access for urgent humanitarian assistance and to make its exit permit system more transparent and effective, including by prioritizing requests for patients in need of medical treatment and those accompanying patients, especially child patients.

Treatment of refugees and asylum seekers

40. The Committee is concerned about the persisting low recognition rate of refugees in the State party and the reported lack of coherent and transparent rules and criteria for the refugee status determination procedure. It is further concerned at significant waiting times for the asylum procedure, lack of access to free legal aid throughout asylum proceedings and the automatic detention of asylum seekers and refugees who enter the country irregularly. It also notes with concern reports that, despite the State party's assurance that the third countries were safe and there has been no known case of the violation of the prohibition of non-refoulement, some Sudanese and Eritrean refugees who were relocated from Israel to undisclosed third countries have been subjected to ill-treatment and human trafficking (arts. 2, 6, 7, 9, 13 and 26).

²⁵ Ibid., paras. 12 and 18.

²⁶ Ibid., para. 18.

²⁷ Ibid., para. 12.

41. Recalling its previous recommendations,²⁸ the Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Introduce dedicated legislation governing the rights of refugees and asylum seekers and relevant procedures, in conformity with international human rights and refugee laws;

(b) Make asylum procedures more effective and reduce the waiting times, including by increasing the financial and human resources of the competent authorities handling asylum applications;

(c) Provide asylum seekers with access to free legal aid throughout asylum procedures, including appeal proceedings;

(d) Review its policy of relocating Sudanese and Eritrean refugees to undisclosed third countries, with a view to finding safe and durable solutions for them in line with the principle of non-refoulement.

Demolition and forced eviction in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem

42. The Committee is concerned about the State party's increased and intensified practice of the demolition of Palestinian houses and other infrastructure – such as schools and water, sanitation and hygiene structures – in the West Bank, including in Sheikh Jarrah, amid the COVID-19 pandemic, and the forced evictions and forcible transfer of those whose homes are destroyed. While noting the State party's claim that demolitions are limited to illegal constructions, the Committee regrets that Palestinians have been systematically deprived of their land and housing rights for decades, and the restrictive zoning and planning regime in the West Bank makes it almost impossible for Palestinians to obtain construction permits, leaving them with no choice but to build illegally and risk demolition and eviction. In this respect, the Committee expresses its deep concern that the systematic practice of demolitions and forced evictions based on discriminatory policies have led to the separation of Jewish and Palestinian communities in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, which amounts to racial segregation (arts. 2, 7, 12, 14, 17, 26 and 27).

43. The Committee strongly reiterates its previous recommendations²⁹ that the State party refrain from implementing evictions and demolition orders based on discriminatory planning policies, laws and practices affecting Palestinians, and also Bedouin, in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem. The State party should review and reform its planning and zoning regime and construction permit system in order to prevent forced evictions and demolitions resulting from the fact that it is impossible for Palestinians to obtain construction permits and ensure that affected populations are allowed to participate in the planning process. It should also ensure that procedural safeguards and due process guarantees are provided against forced evictions and demolitions.

Family reunification

44. The Committee is concerned that the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order) continues to prohibit family reunification of Israeli citizens with their Palestinian spouses living in the West Bank or Gaza Strip, or with spouses living in States classified as "enemy States". It is further concerned that, under the Law, East Jerusalem residents are required to either surrender their residency and live in the West Bank or apply for an annual permit for the non-resident spouse. It also notes with concern that Palestinian women whose residency status depends solely on that of their spouses may be reluctant to report domestic violence or file for divorce (arts. 17, 23, 24 and 26).

45. The Committee strongly reiterates its previous recommendations³⁰ that the State party revoke the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Order), with a view to removing disproportionate and adverse restrictions on the right to family life. The ²⁹ Ibid., para. 9.

State party should also address the vulnerability of women whose residency status solely depends on that of their spouses and take adequate protection measures, including in cases of domestic violence or divorce.

Conscientious objection to military service

46. The Committee reiterates³¹ its concern about the predominantly military nature of the membership of the special military committee that decides on requests for conscientious objection to compulsory military service. It is further concerned that conscientious objectors continue to be subjected to repeated punishment and imprisonment for their refusal to serve in the army (arts. 2, 14, 18 and 26).

47. The Committee reiterates its recommendations³² that the State party take concrete measures to diversify the membership of the special military committee that handles requests for conscientious objection, with a view to making it fully independent and impartial. The State party should also put an end to the practice of repeated punishment and imprisonment of conscientious objectors, which may amount to a violation of the right not to be tried or punished again for the same offence.

Freedom of expression

48. The Committee is deeply concerned about serious restrictions on the right to freedom of expression in the State party, in particular:

(a) The chilling effect of:

(i) Amendment No. 28 to the Entry into Israel Law, which allows the authorities to deny entry into Israel and the Occupied Palestinian Territory to any foreigner who publicly calls for a boycott of Israel;

(ii) The amendment of 2016 to the Disclosure Requirements Concerning Beneficiaries of Donations by a Foreign Political Entity Law, which requires non-governmental organizations that receive more than half of their funding from foreign sources to indicate that fact in every communication to the public;

(b) Increasing reports of the arbitrary arrest and detention of journalists and human rights defenders, as well as threats, intimidation, harassment and attacks directed against them, and of smear and defamation campaigns aimed at discrediting civil society organizations and discouraging support and funding for their work;

(c) The use of counter-terrorism legislation to criminalize the work of civil society organizations and their members, such as the designation, in October 2021, of six Palestinian civil society organizations as “terrorist organizations” and the declaration of these organizations as “unlawful” by the Israeli military commander in the West Bank (art. 19).

49. Bearing in mind the Committee’s previous recommendations,³³ the State party should:

(a) Review the above-mentioned laws that may restrict the exercise of freedom of expression with a view to bringing them into line with article 19 of the Covenant;

(b) Guarantee the effective protection of journalists and human rights defenders against any kind of threat, pressure, intimidation, attack and arbitrary arrest and detention, and ensure that such acts are independently and thoroughly investigated, those responsible are brought to justice and victims are provided with effective remedies;

(c) Refrain from intimidating, harassing, arresting, detaining or prosecuting for terrorist offences journalists and human rights defenders who are exercising their right to freedom of expression, and ensure that six Palestinian organizations designated as “terrorist” and declared “unlawful” are provided with procedural safeguards, including access to evidence, and the right of appeal to an independent body. The Committee further recalls that any restrictions on the right to freedom of expression on national security grounds must comply fully with the strict requirements of article 19 of the Covenant and the Committee’s general comment No. 34 (2011).

Participation in public affairs

50. The Committee is concerned about legislation of the State party that may have discriminatory effects on the exercise of the right to participate in public affairs by members of minority groups, particularly the Arab population, including:

(a) Amendment No. 62 to the Knesset Elections Law, which raises the threshold for political parties to be elected to the Knesset from 2 per cent to 3.25 per cent;

(b) Amendment No. 44 to the Basic Law: The Knesset, which allows the expulsion of a Knesset member from tenure upon the approval of 90 Knesset members, on two grounds: incitement to racism; and support for armed struggle of an enemy State or a terrorist organization;

(c) Amendment No. 46 to the Basic Law: The Knesset 5777-2017, which expands the grounds for disqualifying candidates from election to the Knesset, including for “the negation of the existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State” (arts. 2, 25 and 26).

51. The State party should bring its electoral regulations and practices as well as its laws concerning political parties into full compliance with the Covenant, including its article 25. In particular, it should review the aforementioned amendments with a view to ensuring that members of minority groups, especially the Arab population, are not disproportionately affected in exercising their rights under article 25 of the Covenant.

D. Dissemination and follow-up

52. The State party should widely disseminate the Covenant, its fifth periodic report and the present concluding observations with a view to raising the awareness of the rights enshrined in the Covenant among the judicial, legislative and administrative authorities, civil society and non-governmental organizations operating in the country, and the general public. The State party should ensure that the report and the present concluding observations are translated into the official languages of the State party.

53. In accordance with rule 75, paragraph 1, of the Committee’s rules of procedure, the State party is requested to provide, by 25 March 2025, information on the implementation of the recommendations made by the Committee in paragraphs 9 (national human rights institution), 29 (prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment) and 43 (demolition and forced eviction in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem) above.

54. In line with the Committee’s predictable review cycle, the State party will receive in 2028 the Committee’s list of issues prior to the submission of the report and will be expected to submit within one year its replies to the list of issues, which will constitute its sixth periodic report. The Committee also requests the State party, in preparing the report, to broadly consult civil society and non-governmental organizations operating in the country. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 68/268, the word limit for the report is 21,200 words. The next constructive dialogue with the State party will take place in 2030 in Geneva.

Concluding observations on the initial report of the State of Palestine*

1. The Committee considered the initial report of the State of Palestine¹ at its 4007th and 4008th meetings,² held on 5 and 6 July 2023. At its 4030th meeting, held on 21 July 2023, it adopted the present concluding observations.

A. Introduction

2. The Committee welcomes the submission of the initial periodic report of the State of Palestine and the information presented therein. It expresses appreciation for the opportunity to engage in a constructive dialogue with the State party's high-level delegation on the measures taken by the State party since the entry into force of the Covenant to implement its provisions. The Committee is grateful to the State party for its written replies³ to the list of issues,⁴ which were supplemented by the oral responses provided by the delegation, and for the additional information provided to it in writing.

3. The Committee recognizes that the ongoing Israeli occupation and partial annexation of the territory of the State party, the expansion of settlements and the continued blockade of the Gaza Strip, which are illegal under international law,⁵ pose severe challenges for the State party in fully implementing its obligations under the Covenant and lead to grave violations of the rights of Palestinians, such as arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment, excessive use of force and abuse by Israeli security forces, acts of violence by Israeli settlers, restrictions on freedom of movement, freedom of association and freedom of expression, forced displacement and evictions, seizure of private land, house demolitions and illegal settlements, restrictions on gaining access to health-care services and denial of access to humanitarian aid. The Committee recalls the obligations of Israel, as the occupying Power, under international humanitarian law and international human rights law.⁶ It recognizes that the above-mentioned challenges limit the State party's effective control of its jurisdiction over its own territory and its capacity to implement the Covenant. However, it reminds the State party that the Covenant is applicable in its entire territory and that the State party should take all possible measures to implement it in all parts of the territory. In that regard, the Committee regrets that, notwithstanding the agreement between Fatah and Hamas to end Palestinian division, signed on 12 October 2017, the State party has made limited progress in resolving internal political issues that negatively affect the full enjoyment by Palestinians in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip of their rights under the Covenant and contribute to the political and geographic fragmentation of the State party's territory. It notes that, owing to this fragmentation, Palestinians continue to be subject to multiple legal systems that impede the full realization of their rights under the Covenant.⁷

B. Positive aspects

4. The Committee welcomes the accession to the following international instruments by the State party since its accession to the Covenant:

(a) The Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on a communications procedure, on 10 April 2019;

(k) The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, on 2 April 2014;

(l) The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, on 2 April 2014;

(m) The Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict, on 2 and 7 April 2014 respectively;

(n) The Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, on 2 April 2014.

C. Principal matters of concern and recommendations

Legal framework

5. While welcoming the publication of the Covenant in the Official Gazette, the Committee regrets that the Second Optional Protocol has not yet been published. The

⁷ CEDAW/C/PSE/CO/1, para. 9; CERD/C/PSE/CO/1-2, para. 3; CRC/C/PSE/CO/1, para. 4; and CAT/C/PSE/CO/1, para. 4.

Committee is concerned about the lack of clarity during the dialogue as to why the Covenant and the Second Optional Protocol have not been promulgated under domestic law. The Committee is also concerned that the interpretation of the Supreme Constitutional Court in its decisions No. 4 (2017) of 19 November 2017 and No. 5 (2018) of 12 March 2018, according to which international treaties acceded to by the State party take precedence over national legislation only insofar as they are consistent with the national, religious and cultural identity of the Palestinian Arab people, may impede the enjoyment of the rights set forth in the Covenant. Furthermore, the Committee is concerned about the multiple non-unified legal systems in the West Bank and the Gaza strip (art. 2).

6. The State party should enact legislation to ensure the unification of its legal systems. It should finalize the publication of the Covenant and the Second Optional Protocol in the Official Gazette and promulgate them under domestic law. The State party should also revise existing legislation with a view to preventing legal uncertainty or ambiguity that could provide grounds for legal interpretations contradictory to the State party's legal obligations.

Anti-corruption measures

7. The Committee is concerned about reports that corruption, including nepotism, remains pervasive in many sectors of public life, particularly in appointing and promoting government officials and members of the judiciary. The Committee regrets the lack of specific information provided by the State party on the effectiveness of its National Cross-Sectoral Strategy for Integrity and Anti-Corruption (2020–2022) and on the specific measures in place to ensure the independence, transparency, effectiveness and accountability of anti-corruption bodies, such as the Anti-Corruption Commission, the Anti-Corruption Court and special prosecutors. The Committee is also concerned about reports of arrests of anti-corruption protesters and the lack of protection of whistle-blowers (arts. 2 and 25).

8. The State party should intensify its efforts to prevent and eradicate corruption and impunity at all levels, including by:

(a) Promptly, thoroughly, independently and impartially investigating and prosecuting all cases of corruption, particularly those involving high-level public officials, and, if a person is convicted, applying penalties commensurate with the seriousness of the offence;

(b) Ensuring the independence, transparency, effectiveness and accountability of all anti-corruption bodies, including the Anti-Corruption Commission, the Anti-Corruption Court and special prosecutors;

(c) Revising and supplementing the legal framework to better protect anti-corruption activists and whistle-blowers, preventing undue harassment of lawful anti-corruption activities and ensuring access to publicly held information;

(d) Expanding training and awareness-raising campaigns to inform judges and prosecutors, public officials, politicians, the business community and the general public about the economic and social costs of corruption and the mechanisms in place to address it.

State of emergency

9. The Committee is concerned about the far-reaching powers conferred on the Government under Decree-Law No. 7 of 2020 in the context of the coronavirus disease (COVID-19) pandemic, which allowed restrictions on the right to peaceful assembly. The Committee is also concerned that the state of emergency under the decree-law was extended beyond the lawful period provided for in article 110 of the Basic Law (art. 4).

10. In the light of the Committee's general comment No. 29 (2001) on derogations from provisions of the Covenant during a state of emergency, and the Committee's statement on derogations from the Covenant in connection with the COVID-19 pandemic,⁸ the State party should:

(a) Guarantee that any measures introduced to protect the population in the context of a state of emergency, including during pandemics, are temporary, proportionate, strictly necessary and subject to judicial review;

(b) Ensure that legislation is not used in times of emergency to unduly restrict the right to assembly, recognizing that this right constitutes an important safeguard for ensuring that the State party's use of emergency powers, including during pandemics, complies with its obligations under the Covenant.

Non-discrimination

11. The Committee notes the information provided by the State party that a definition of discrimination has been included in the draft decree-law on protection of the family from violence, and also in the recommendations by the Legislative Harmonization Committee following its review of the Labour Code. It remains concerned, however, about the absence of comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation providing full and effective protection against all forms of discrimination prohibited under the Covenant, including direct, indirect and multiple discrimination, and effective remedies in judicial and administrative proceedings for victims. The Committee is also concerned about reports of discrimination, stigmatization, harassment and violence, including by law enforcement officials, against persons on the basis of their real or perceived sexual orientation or gender identity, Bedouin persons and persons with disabilities, and the lack of adequate investigations conducted into such acts (arts. 2, 3, 7, 17 and 26).

12. The Committee recommends that the State party:

(a) Consider enacting comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation that provides full and effective protection against discrimination in all spheres and contains a comprehensive list of prohibited grounds for discrimination, in accordance with the Covenant, including sexual orientation and gender identity, and provides for effective remedies in case of violations;

(b) Take steps to combat stereotypes about and negative attitudes towards persons on the basis of their sexual orientation or gender identity, Bedouin persons and persons with disabilities, including training and awareness-raising programmes for law enforcement officials;

(c) Ensure that all acts of discrimination, stigmatization, harassment and violence against persons on the basis of their sexual orientation or gender identity, Bedouin persons and persons with disabilities are promptly and effectively investigated, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence and that victims receive full reparation.

Violence against women and domestic violence

13. The Committee is concerned that a number of gaps remain in the scope and coverage of legislation on violence against women and girls and domestic violence and in enforcement mechanisms. The Committee is also concerned that domestic violence, including marital rape, is still not explicitly criminalized in national legislation, and that legal amendments removing lenient penalties and excuses for the killing of women have proven ineffective in combating femicide. The Committee is further concerned about reports that women are pressured by their families, often by the use of violence, torture or ill-treatment or threats thereof, to commit suicide to protect the so-called "honour" of the family. The Committee is concerned that women who pursue complaints through the courts are often revictimized by intrusive and negative media attention, including in the public space through smear campaigns, by intimidation by defendants and the prosecution, and by drawn-out investigations. It is concerned that administrative detention is used against women and girls who are victims of gender-based violence, so-called “protective custody”, under the pretext of protecting them (arts. 2, 3, 7, 23 and 26).

14. The State party should:

(a) Adopt and enforce comprehensive legislation criminalizing all forms of violence against women and girls, explicitly addressing domestic violence, marital rape and crimes committed in the name of so-called “honour”;

(b) Repeal laws discriminating against women and pass legislation and reinforce public policies to protect women from violence;

(c) Ensure that cases of violence against women and girls, whether violence in the public space or domestic violence, are promptly and thoroughly investigated, that steps are taken during investigations to avoid the revictimization of victims, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence and that victims receive full reparation;

(d) Enhance its efforts to provide training for law enforcement officials, members of the judiciary, prosecutors and other stakeholders on how to detect, investigate and handle cases of violence against women and girls, including domestic and sexual violence, effectively and in a gender-sensitive manner;

(e) Conduct public education programmes on discriminatory norms and beliefs to combat the stigmatization and revictimization of women seeking help through the existing services of the national authorities, including for judges, prosecutors, law enforcement authorities and the media;

(f) Abolish the practice of so-called “protective custody” in cases of gender-based violence and instead take protective measures, such as increasing the number of shelters, that ensure the full protection of women’s rights;

(g) Encourage the reporting of violence against women by, inter alia, reinforcing existing or creating new reporting mechanisms and informing women and girls of their rights and of the existence of legal assistance and other services through which they can receive protection and compensation;

(h) Strengthen awareness-raising among women and girls, including in rural areas, about the legal remedies available to ensure the protection of their rights.

Voluntary termination of pregnancy and sexual and reproductive rights

15. The Committee is concerned about the highly restrictive legal framework for legal access to abortion, which subjects both doctors and patients to criminal prosecution under articles 321, 322 and 324 of the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960, and which results in a high number of unsafe, clandestine abortions. The Committee is also concerned about reports that many women and girls experience barriers to access to a range of methods of contraception owing to their socioeconomic status (arts. 2, 3, 6, 7, 17 and 26).

16. In the light of paragraph 8 of the Committee’s general comment No. 36 (2018) on the right to life, the State party should:

(a) Amend parts of the domestic legal and institutional framework, including articles 321, 322 and 324 of the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960, as incorporated by the State party, to ensure that women and girls who undergo abortions and the doctors or others who attend to them are not subject to criminal penalties, and lift barriers such as those relating to medical and religious authorizations, since the existence of such penalties and barriers compel women and girls to resort to unsafe abortions;

(b) Take appropriate measures to facilitate women’s access to information about voluntary termination of pregnancy and strengthen the provision of sexual and reproductive health services, including equal and affordable access to contraceptive methods, especially for women and girls experiencing unfavourable socioeconomic circumstances.

Right to life

17. The Committee is deeply concerned that, despite the State party's accession to the Second Optional Protocol to the Covenant, the death penalty continues to be applied in the State party. Furthermore, the Committee is deeply concerned by reports of the high and rising number of cases in which the death penalty is imposed in the Gaza Strip, the frequency of its application, and the lack of judicial guarantees, particularly when civilians are prosecuted in military courts. In this regard, the Committee is also concerned that a review of the draft criminal code has been pending since 2010 (arts. 6, 7 and 14).

18. The State party should immediately take all the measures necessary to ensure the implementation of the Second Optional Protocol to the Covenant, including by effectively abolishing the death penalty within its jurisdiction and ensuring that no one within its jurisdiction, including in the Gaza Strip, is executed, and by providing all required judicial guarantees and refraining from prosecuting civilians in military courts. The State party should also finalize the review of the draft criminal code.

19. The Committee is concerned about reports that in many cases the use of force and firearms by law enforcement officials, and in particular during the protests in 2021 following the postponement of elections, has been incompatible with the fundamental principles of legality, necessity, proportionality and accountability. The Committee is also concerned about the lack of independent monitoring mechanisms (art. 6).

20. The State party should take all the measures necessary to prevent the excessive use of force during law enforcement operations, including by:

(a) Ensuring that Minister of the Interior Decree No. 187 of 2020 concerning instructions and procedures for the use of force and firearms by police officers is in conformity with the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials and the United Nations Human Rights Guidance on Less-Lethal Weapons in Law Enforcement;

(b) Strengthening its regular training of law enforcement officials on the use of force and ensuring that the principles of legality, necessity and proportionality are strictly adhered to in practice;

(c) Establishing an oversight mechanism, independent from the Ministry of the Interior, to ensure that all reports of excessive use of force by law enforcement officers are investigated promptly, effectively and impartially, that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence and that victims of such violations receive full reparation and redress.

21. Noting the continued occupation of the State party's territory, the Committee is concerned about the lack of health services for patients with chronic and terminal diseases, and about the suspension by the State party of its coordination agreement with Israel regarding medical referrals. The Committee is equally concerned about reports of a decrease in coordination among the competent authorities of the State party and hospitals to facilitate the medical referral system for patients living in the Gaza Strip seeking medical treatment outside the Gaza Strip (art. 6).

22. The State party should take all the measures necessary to ensure that everyone, in particular residents of the Gaza Strip, has adequate access to health-care services, particularly life-saving medical treatment and support. To this end, it should review the suspension of its coordination agreement with Israel regarding medical referrals and take measures to increase coordination among the competent authorities and hospitals to facilitate the medical referral system for patients living in the Gaza Strip seeking medical treatment outside the Gaza Strip, and implement the recommendations of the World Health Organization of 2023.

Prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

23. The Committee is deeply concerned about reports that confessions have been obtained under duress, coercion, ill-treatment and/or torture, and that, despite article 13 (2) of the Basic

Law, regarding the inadmissibility of evidence obtained by duress or torture, such confessions are admitted as evidence in court (art. 7).

24. In the light of the recommendations of the Committee against Torture,⁹ article 15 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the Principles on Effective Interviewing for Investigations and Information Gathering (the Méndez Principles), the State party should ensure in practice that confessions obtained through torture or ill-treatment are ruled inadmissible, and that cases of such confessions are investigated.

Liberty and security of person

25. The Committee is concerned about the use of administrative detention by the State party under the Jordanian Crime Prevention Act of 1954, which is applicable in the West Bank and allows for detention without charge. The Committee is also concerned about the increasing number of persons held in administrative detention, often on governors' orders, and for long periods, during which detainees are deprived of basic procedural guarantees. The Committee is further concerned about reports of widespread use of detention in cases of non-payment of debt. The Committee is seriously concerned about reports that individuals are held in unlawful and incommunicado detention by armed non-State actors, including for "collaboration with the enemy" and for criticizing armed groups (arts. 7 and 9).

26. In the light of article 9 of the Covenant and general comment No. 35 (2014) on liberty and security of person, the State party should:

(a) Take immediate measures to amend the Jordanian Crime Prevention Act of 1954 with a view to abolishing administrative detention without charge;

(b) Use administrative detention only as a last resort, when necessary and proportionate, for as short a period as possible and not beyond the legal limits, and subject to judicial review, respecting all procedural guarantees;

(c) Take all the measures necessary, including reviewing legislation, regulations, administrative orders and practices, to ensure that detention is used only commensurately with the gravity of the offence, and not in cases of non-repayment of debt;

(d) Take all possible measures to ensure that no one is held in unofficial places of detention on its territory, including by non-State actors; and investigate the existence of any unofficial places of detention and identify and punish those who establish and maintain them.

Treatment of persons deprived of their liberty

27. The Committee is gravely concerned about consistent reports indicating that persons in custody, including in the facilities under the authority of the security forces and intelligence services, are subjected to torture or ill-treatment, in particular during the investigation stage of proceedings, and that detainees are denied access to legal aid, to their family and to medical assistance. The Committee is also concerned about reports that fundamental legal safeguards are often not respected. The Committee is further concerned about reports that only a few complaints of torture and ill-treatment in places of deprivation of liberty have led to prosecution and even fewer to conviction of the perpetrators, which contributes to a climate of impunity. The Committee is concerned that the State party has not yet established a national preventive mechanism as required under the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. The Committee is similarly concerned about reports that existing investigation bodies, principally the Public Prosecutor, lack independence (arts. 7, 9 and 10).

⁹ CAT/C/PSE/CO/1, para. 31.

28. The State party should:

(a) Ensure that conditions of detention are compatible with such international standards as the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules);

(b) Ensure that all detainees, irrespective of the offence with which they have been charged, have prompt and regular access to their legal representatives, families and any medical assistance that they may require;

(c) Ensure that all detainees are afforded, in law and in practice, all fundamental legal safeguards from the very outset of their deprivation of liberty;

(d) Investigate promptly, thoroughly and effectively all cases of torture and ill-treatment in all places of deprivation of liberty, to ensure that perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence and that victims of such violations receive full reparation and are provided with redress;

(e) Ensure that all persons deprived of their liberty have access to an independent and effective complaints mechanism for the investigation of allegations of torture and ill-treatment that guarantees prompt, effective and direct access to the monitoring bodies responsible for handling such complaints and to the remedies referred to in article 2 (3) of the Covenant;

(f) Publish findings of related investigations and outcomes of cases of torture and ill-treatment with a view to strengthening transparency and accountability;

(g) Establish a national preventive mechanism and ensure its full operational independence and financial autonomy in accordance with its obligations under the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture;

(h) Implement governance reforms to ensure the institutional and functional independence of investigative bodies.

Elimination of slavery, servitude and trafficking in persons

29. The Committee is concerned that various forms of labour exploitation remain prevalent, including of children, particularly in the Gaza Strip. Furthermore, the Committee is concerned about reports of trafficking in persons, and about the delay in enacting legislation thereon. Moreover, it is concerned about the extremely low wages, which are insufficient for workers to achieve a minimum acceptable standard of living (arts. 2, 7, 8, 24 and 26).

30. The State party should intensify its efforts to eliminate forced labour, including by increasing labour inspections and ensuring continued accountability, including through follow-up and sanctions, particularly in the Gaza Strip, paying specific attention to labour performed by children. The State party should also consider enacting of legislation on trafficking in persons. The State party should take measures aimed at significantly improving working and living conditions, including through targeted measures to raise wages for workers.

Right to freedom of movement

31. The Committee is concerned about the incompatibility of the legal grounds for issuing travel bans under the General Intelligence Service Act with the right to freedom of movement under the Covenant. The Committee is also concerned about reports that the Ministry of the Interior refuses to issue passports to Palestinian citizens residing in the Gaza Strip, including activists, human rights defenders and opposition leaders, and that women in the Gaza Strip are subjected to discriminatory restrictions on their freedom of movement, such as the practice of male guardians preventing women from travelling (arts. 3, 9, 12, 17 and 26).

32. In the light of the Committee's general comment No. 27 (1999) on freedom of movement, the State party should ensure that its national legislation and practical application thereof guarantee freedom of movement without discrimination, including on the basis of gender, and avoid any restrictions that are incompatible with article 12 of the Covenant.

Treatment of refugees and internally displaced persons

33. The Committee is concerned about the high level of poverty and the poor living conditions in refugee camps, which are not suitable for long-term accommodation, often have no running water, electricity or sewage systems and are overcrowded, and about a general, widespread lack of adequate access to health-care services within and outside refugee camps (arts. 2, 7, 9, 12 and 26).

34. The State party should provide durable housing solutions in a timely manner and improve the dire living conditions in refugee camps, provide sustainable income-generating opportunities and other livelihood measures, and revisit and strengthen current financial assistance schemes to ensure that the basic needs of refugees and internally displaced persons are met, paying particular attention to adequate access to health-care services. To this end, the State party should increase its coordination with international partners, including the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

Access to justice, independence of the judiciary and fair trial

35. The Committee is concerned about reports of the persistent lack of independence and impartiality in the prosecution service and the judiciary of the State party. It is particularly concerned about the lack of transparency in the procedure for the selection and appointment of prosecutors and judges, including the presidents of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Constitutional Court. The Committee is also concerned about the establishment and control by the executive branch of Government of the Supreme Council of Judicial Bodies and Authorities, significantly hampering the independence of the judicial system. The Committee is further concerned about allegations of politically motivated arrests and trials and violations of fair trial guarantees (art. 14).

36. The State party should:

(a) Safeguard, in law and in practice, the full independence, impartiality and safety of judges and prosecutors and prevent them from being influenced in their decision-making by any form of undue political pressure;

(b) Ensure that procedures for the selection, appointment, suspension, removal and disciplining of judges and prosecutors comply with the Covenant and relevant international standards, including the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary and the Guidelines on the Role of Prosecutors;

(c) Take all the measures necessary to prevent and sanction any abuse of the powers granted to the Supreme Council of Judicial Bodies and Authorities caused by undue interference from the executive branch that undermines its independence;

(d) Ensure that all defendants are afforded all fair trial guarantees in practice, regardless of their political affiliation or opinion, including equality of arms and the presumption of innocence, in accordance with article 14 of the Covenant and the Committee's general comment No. 32 (2007) on the right to equality before courts and tribunals and to a fair trial.

Right to privacy

37. The Committee is concerned about the incompatibility with the Covenant of Decree-Law No. 10 of 2018 regarding cybercrime, including the provisions that electronic search and wiretapping measures may be authorized by the Prosecutor General and are not subject to judicial review. The Committee is also concerned about the lack of sufficient safeguards against arbitrary interference with the right to privacy in the form of surveillance, interception activities, access to personal data, and the diffusion of personal data with a view to discrediting opposition leaders, activists, and individuals on the basis of their gender, gender identity and sexual orientation. The Committee is particularly concerned about reports that the Preventive Security Service, which conducts electronic surveillance, is granted extensive monitoring powers, and that the existing oversight mechanism over its activities is not effective (art. 17).

38. In the light of the Committee's general comment No. 16 (1988) on right to privacy, the State party should:

(a) Ensure that any interference with the right to privacy, including activities carried out by the Preventive Security Service under Decree-Law No. 10 of 2018 regarding cybercrime, is subject to judicial review and to effective and independent oversight mechanisms;

(b) Bring regulations governing data retention and access, surveillance and interception activities into conformity with the Covenant, and ensure strict adherence to the principles of legality, proportionality and necessity;

(c) Ensure that no personal data is shared arbitrarily;

(d) Strengthen existing monitoring mechanisms to ensure that all allegations of abuse are thoroughly investigated, that such investigations lead to appropriate sanctions where warranted and that victims have access to effective remedies in cases of abuse.

Freedom of expression

39. The Committee is concerned that certain provisions of the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960 criminalize expression in the State party, particularly under articles 144 (insulting a public official), 150 (inciting sectarian strife), 191 (slandering a public official) and 195 (insulting a higher authority). The Committee is deeply concerned about reports that these provisions have been used as legal grounds for intimidation, attacks, arbitrary arrests and prolonged detention against journalists, human rights defenders, including women defending women's rights, corruption whistle-blowers and government critics (arts. 19 and 20).

40. The State party should redouble its efforts to prevent and prohibit public officials from interfering with the legitimate exercise by journalists, human rights defenders, including women defending women's rights, corruption whistle-blowers and government critics of their right to freedom of expression, including by:

(a) Bringing parts of the domestic legal and institutional framework that may unduly restrict media freedom, including the Jordanian Criminal Code of 1960, into full conformity with article 19 of the Covenant and with the principles of legal certainty, predictability and proportionality, taking into account the Committee's general comment No. 34 (2011) on the freedoms of opinion and expression;

(b) Refraining from using criminal provisions as a tool to suppress critical reporting on matters of public interest;

(c) Strengthening the protection of journalists, human rights defenders, including women defending women's rights, corruption whistle-blowers and government critics from any kind of threat, pressure, intimidation or attack;

(d) Ensuring that all violations are promptly, effectively and impartially investigated, that those responsible are appropriately prosecuted and, if found guilty, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence and that victims obtain redress and full reparation.

Right of peaceful assembly

41. The Committee is concerned that Decree-Law No. 7 of 2021, amending the Charitable Associations and Civil Society Organizations Act (Act No. 1 of 2000), may unduly restrict the right of peaceful assembly, and about reports that its provisions have been invoked by police and law enforcement to hamper the organization of peaceful assemblies. The Committee is also concerned about reports of the arrest and ill-treatment of peaceful protestors and excessive use of force in dispersing peaceful assemblies by the Palestinian security forces, Gaza Strip security forces and non-uniformed individuals, against activists, journalists and protestors, particularly in the aftermath of the postponement in April 2021 of national elections. The Committee regrets the lack of information provided by the State party regarding the status of the anti-corruption demonstrators arrested in July 2020 (art. 21).

42. In accordance with article 21 of the Covenant and in the light of the Committee's general comment No. 37 (2020) on the right of peaceful assembly, the State party should:

(a) Consider reviewing Decree-Law No. 7 of 2021, amending the Charitable Associations and Civil Society Organizations Act (Act No. 1 of 2000), to ensure its conformity with the Covenant;

(b) Promptly, thoroughly and impartially ensure that all allegations of excessive use of force and arbitrary arrest and detention by law enforcement officials during peaceful assemblies are investigated, that those responsible are prosecuted and, if found guilty, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence and that victims obtain redress and full reparation;

(c) Ensure the protection of peaceful demonstrators, human rights defenders, including women, and journalists covering peaceful demonstrations from threats, intimidation, harassment and attacks, including by private actors;

(d) Ensure that any potential proceedings against the 2020 anti-corruption demonstrators are in full compliance with the Covenant.

Freedom of association

43. The Committee is concerned that Decree-Law No. 7 of 2021, amending the Charitable Associations and Civil Society Organizations Act (Act No. 1 of 2000), may unduly restrict the right to freedom of association. The Committee is also concerned about reports that the requirement for civil society organizations in the Gaza Strip to submit their funding documents to the Ministry of National Economy constitutes a de facto restriction of their right to freedom of association, as it significantly delays the disbursal of funds and hampers their operations. The Committee is further concerned about the dissolution of the Union of Public Employees (art. 22).

44. The State party should take appropriate measures to ensure a safe and enabling environment for civil society organizations, including by considering reviewing the Charitable Associations and Civil Society Organizations Act (Act No. 1 of 2000), which regulates civil society activities, with a view to removing unduly restrictive requirements regarding their funding and operation. The State party should also consider reviewing the decision to dissolve the Union of Public Employees.

Participation in public affairs

45. The Committee is concerned about the legal and institutional framework governing the holding of national parliamentary and presidential elections, notably as provided for in the presidential decree of 30 April 2021, by which the elections were postponed, and about the compatibility with the Covenant of the dissolution in 2018 of the Palestinian Legislative Council. The Committee is particularly concerned about reports of cases of intimidation, attacks, arbitrary arrests and detention, and killings of opposition candidates and politicians, prior to and following the postponement of the national elections, and during the local elections in the West Bank in 2022. The Committee is also concerned about reports of a lack of adequate guarantees to ensure the true and effective independence of the Central Elections Commission. The Committee is further concerned about prohibitively high financial fees and administrative barriers that prevent potential candidates from standing for election (arts. 2, 18, 22, 25 and 26).

46. The State party should review the legal and institutional framework governing the holding of elections, notably as provided for in the presidential decree of 30 April 2021, to ensure that any postponement of elections is in compliance with the Covenant, including articles 2, 18, 22 and 25 thereof. The State party should take all the measures necessary to prevent all cases of intimidation, attacks, arbitrary arrests and detention, and killings of opposition candidates and politicians, and ensure that such cases are promptly and thoroughly investigated, that the perpetrators are prosecuted and, if convicted, punished with penalties commensurate with the gravity of the offence, and that victims receive full reparation. The State party should also take all the measures necessary to ensure that the Central Elections Commission is impartial and independent of the executive and is able to exercise its role as a guardian of democratic pluralism. The State party should remove prohibitively high financial fees and administrative barriers that prevent potential candidates from standing for election.

D. Dissemination and follow-up

47. The State party should widely disseminate the Covenant, the two Optional Protocols thereto, its initial report, the written replies to the Committee's list of issues and the present concluding observations with a view to raising awareness of the rights enshrined in the Covenant among the judicial, legislative and administrative authorities, civil society and non-governmental organizations operating in the State, and the general public.

48. In accordance with rule 75 (1) of the Committee's rules of procedure, the State party is requested to provide, by 27 July 2026, information on the implementation of the recommendations made by the Committee in paragraphs 14 (violence against women and domestic violence), 36 (access to justice, independence of the judiciary and fair trial) and 46 (participation in public affairs) above.

49. In line with the Committee's predictable review cycle, the State party will receive in 2029 the Committee's list of issues prior to the submission of the report and will be expected to submit within one year its replies, which will constitute its second periodic report. The Committee also requests the State party, in preparing the report, to broadly consult civil society and non-governmental organizations operating in the State. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 68/268, the word limit for the report is 21,200 words. The next constructive dialogue with the State party will take place in Geneva in 2031.
